LAIDLER, HARRY W. (1884–1970). Prolific author, founder and a leader of the League for Industrial Democracy for decades, Harry W. Laidler epitomized the gradual and scientific strategy of socialization through economic planning. Born into a comfortable Brooklyn family with liberal and socialist connections, Laidler graduated from Wesleyan University and took advanced degrees at Brooklyn Law School and Columbia University. He joined the Socialist Party in 1903 while attending the American Socialist College in Kansas, and took part in the founding of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society (ISS) two years later. Named to the ISS executive to represent undergraduates, he became organizational secretary in 1910, and editor of its new Intercollegiate So- cialist magazine in 1913 (and edited its successor, Socialist Review, from 1919 to 1921). Under Laidler's leadership, the ISS engaged in a wide range of activities and converted many intellectuals—including Paul Douglas, later a U.S. senator; poet Babette Deutsch; and W. E. B. Du Bois—to socialist ideals. The ISS lost many members to pro-war sympathies and others to Bolshevik sympathies, between 1917 and 1921. With its change of name to the League for Industrial Democracy in 1921, Laidler became executive secretary, a position he would hold until 1957.

During the 1920s and, especially, the 1930s, Laidler successfully promoted the League for Industrial Democracy as American socialism's premier educational apparatus. A speaker's bureau, a considerable list of pamphlets, and Laidler's own works purveyed a rational socialist alternative to planless capitalism. In line with this effort, Laidler was president of the National Bureau of Economic Research, 1930–1932 and 1948–1949, and chair of its board of directors, 1932–1934. Politically, Laidler was meanwhile quite active in socialist support for Robert La Follette in 1924, and helped manage Norman Thomas's 1928 and 1932 presidential campaigns. His own electoral efforts—he was the Socialist Party's New York gubernatorial candidate in 1936 and senatorial candidate in 1938—climaxed in his election as American Labor Party nominee from Brooklyn to the New York City Council, where he served in 1940–1941. He had become inactive in a splintered Socialist Party in 1938, although he retained his basic convictions.

Laidler would be remembered best, however, as durable functionary, pamphleteer, and scholarly author. His works included Boycotts and the Labor Struggle (1913), The History of Socialist Thought (1927), Social-Economic Movements (1944), and a nearly one-thousand page survey, The History of Socialism (1968).

[See also American Labor Party; Intercollegiate Socialist Society; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Karnoustos, Carmela Ascolese. "Harry W. Laidler and the Intercollegiate Socialist Society." Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1974.

—HARRY FLEISCHMAN

LARDNER, RING, JR. (b. 1915). A leading Left talent in Hollywood's Screen Writers Guild during the 1930s–1940s, Ring Lardner, Jr., might be considered the member of the "Hollywood Ten" whose revenge against political repression was most complete. In *M*A*S*H*, whose film script he wrote, and on which the television series was based, Lardner helped to launch one of the most popular of anti-war epics in the American popular culture and to bridge the gap between the ideals of the Old Left and the sentiments of the New.

Son of the famous humorist and short story writer, Lardner, Jr., went to work for David O. Selznick in 1935 at the age of twenty, and joined John Howard Lawson and others in the Left-led effort to organize a writers' union. He accumulated several important credits over the next few years, but broke through as coauthor of Woman of the Year, starring Katherine Hepburn. This arguably feminist drama, which allowed Hepburn to make speeches on woman's rights while costar Spencer Tracy argued the point, also had a dark side that reminded some later critics of *M*A*S*H*, which he also scripted. Lardner shared an Oscar in 1942 for his accomplishment.

Subpoenaed by the House Committee on Un-American Activities in 1947, he became one of the "Hollywood Ten," who, after declining to answer the committee's questions, were prosecuted for contempt of Congress and formally blacklisted by a resolution of the Motion Picture Producers' Association. When the Supreme Court decided in 1950 not to review their case and they went to various federal prisons, Lardner served more than nine months (one of his fellow inmates, convicted former congressman J. Parnell Thomas, had been one of his questioners). A decade later, in "My Life on the Blacklist," written for the Saturday Evening Post, he defended the right of free speech and association in the entertainment industry. He had, in fact, left the Communist Party in the early 1950s, but remained active in movements against political repression and continued writing for such Left publications as Mainstream. His first novel, The Ecstasy of Owen Muir (1954) and his memoir, The Lardners: My Family Remembered (1976), were critically well received.

*M*A*S*H* returned Lardner to the entertainment limelight and won him another screenwriting Oscar. A dark comedy about a U.S. medical team in the Korean War, it mixed humor with semidocumentary style and delivered a devastating blow to right-wing patriotism. Pauline Kael called it the "best American war comedy since sound" had been added to film. *M*A*S*H* owed its greatest popularity, however, to its political timeliness. Korea stood in for Vietnam, with the madness of the American presence in Southeast Asia presented clearly and forcefully. As television vehicle for Alan Alda, *M*A*S*H* became the most successful (i.e., sold in the most residual markets) series in the history of American television.

[See also Hollywood Blacklist; Hollywood Left; Popular Culture.]

FURTHER READING

Ceplair, Larry, and Steven Englund. The Inquisition in Hollywood. Rev. ed. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.

Lardner, Ring, Jr. The Lardners: My Family Remembered. New York: Harper and Row, 1976.

—PAUL BUHLE

LATIN AMERICAN SOLIDARITY MOVEMENTS, 1960s-1980s. In the 1980s, solidarity with the peoples of Central America became a key rallying point for a new kind of popular movement in the United States. This development had its own trajectory, and was in no simple sense a revival of anti-Vietnam War organizing. Its political touchstone was, of course, the reservoir of post-Indochina anti-interventionism (however passive or isolationist), which cuts deep into almost all strata in the United States, but its organizing principle was an instinctual solidarity—a commitment to stand with the people, often at some risk. The origins of this solidarity lay in events of the 1960s and 1970s: the Cuban Revolution, the Alliance for Progress and Vatican II-inspired emigration of thousands of North American missionaries and volunteers into the hemisphere's poorest countries, and the seizure of power by U.S.-sponsored dictatorships from the Tierra del Fuego to the Caribbean.

Cuba's triumph placed armed struggle against North American hegemony on the table, with permanent consequences. An ecumenical "hands off Cuba" movement grew up around the Fair Play for Cuba Committee in 1960-1961, helping to spark the New Left. Many young activists and new committees joined this proto-solidarity campaign of mass delegations, rallies, speakers' tours, and newspaper appeals before the Cuban missile crisis and various congressional committees ended matters. Much less visibly, over the decade marked by the coup in Brazil (1964), the invasion of the Dominican Republic (1965), the Green Beret-led counterinsurgency in Guatemala (1966 on), election of the Unidad Popular in Chile (1970), and the "dirty war" in Argentina (1974 on), the return from Latin America of North American people of faith led to a "conscientization" at the bases of the Catholic church and mainstream Protestant denominations that proved impervious to Cold War logic, spawning the informal intrainstitutional networks of activists central to the movement of the 1970s and 1980s. Meanwhile, Vietnam and the struggle for the rights of African Americans radicalized thousands of people across the United States, generating a large but inchoate and quarrelsome movement unified solely by its commitment to "anti-imperialism." Awareness of revolution and repression in Latin America grew rapidly, culminating in the Venceremos Brigades that, coming directly from the ruins of Students for a Democratic Society, sent thousands to do agricultural work in Cuba in the early seventies.

For many different kinds of people, General Pinochet's 1973 coup in Chile was only the most egregious example of full-blown imperialism in the Americas. The fall of Salvador Allende catalyzed anti-war veterans of all stripes, the reviving Communist Party, returned church and lay volunteers, and anti-interventionist McGovern Democrats. The substantial Chile solidarity movement of the seventies also reflected the deep divisions of the Chilean exile movement, which played into political animosities in the United States (e.g., the broad network around the Communist party-organized National Chile Center versus its smaller, more militant rival, Non-Intervention in Chile). Similar problems affected the other major effort of the time, the Puerto Rico Solidarity Committee. Very successful campaigns were implemented—against "torture ships" visiting U.S. ports, to free prisoners throughout the hemisphere, for a "Bicentennial without Colonies," huge concert tours—but coordinated organizing for Chile and Puerto Rico had subsided dramatically by the end of the decade.

In these same years, a faith-based "human rights" community had diffused across the United States in the wake of Vietnam and Chile. Exemplified by the Ecumenical Program for Inter-American Communication and Action (1968), the Washington Office on Latin America (1974), the Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy (1975), and offices within the National Council of Churches and the U.S.

Catholic Conference, this Washington, D.C.–based informal network dedicated itself, with considerable success, to ending congressional support for the regimes of Latin America's Southern Cone. The presidency of Jimmy Carter became the apogee of such organizing, as activists worked in tandem with some elements of the administration to undercut Somoza and, however briefly, to extend highly conditioned aid to "Nicaragua Libre."

In 1978–1979 virtually all the diffuse strands of solidarity and anti-interventionism described above coalesced, summoned by urgent Nicaraguan appeals. In February 1979, the National Network in Solidarity with the Nicaraguan People (later the Nicaragua Network) was formed by local and national Latin America committees, task forces, and human rights groups, with the endorsement of Senator Edward Kennedy and several liberal unions and religious orders. A rapid mobilization across the country encouraged the United States to hasten Somoza's demise and built support for the first successful revolution since Cuba. Simultaneously, Salvadoran exiles in San Francisco, Los Angeles, and elsewhere began organizing systematically among North Americans. In 1980, with Nicaraguan triumph apparently assured, the faith-based networks, peace groups, and self-conscious "solidarity activists" all turned to the bloody confrontation in El Salvador, as pervasive death-squad terror (symbolized by the murders of Archbishop Oscar Romero and four U.S. churchwomen) also radicalized anew larger numbers of church and laypeople.

In October 1980, East and West Coast conferences created the Committee in Solidarity with the People of El Salvador (CISPES), which was fueled by an early flood of hundreds of committees; over the next decade CISPES built a distinctive national organization via its close relationship with the Salvadoran community as well as planned grass-roots expansion and a systematic program. Faith activists linked up nationally through the Religious Task Force on El Salvador, based in Catholic women's orders, and the Inter-Religious Task Force on El Salvador and Central America, oriented toward the Protestant churches. In the early eighties this very visible movement concentrated almost entirely on blocking intervention in El Salvador in a groundswell of local protest and education, while low-key support for Nicaraguan reconstruction continued on a much-reduced scale. Meanwhile a loose framework for Guatemala solidarity was established in 1980 (the Network in Solidarity with the People of Guatemala and other groups) out of a small but well-established base of churchpeople and scholars, though the absence of awareness and activism around the Guatemalan holocaust was to remain an obvious weakness of solidarity organizing for the next decade.

After the successful "demonstration election" in El Salvador in March 1982, the militance of the movement abated and organizing took on a more regional character as the contra war against Nicaragua heated up. Coffee harvest brigades and the faith-based Witness for Peace program brought thousands of North Americans to Nicaragua, leading to the Pledge of Resistance campaign, a local and national effort that committed tens of thousands to civil disobedience in the event of a major escalation. Meanwhile, a different sort of grass-roots network developed around the plight of Salvadorans and Guatemalans: the Sanctuary Movement, which between 1982 and 1985 committed four hundred local congregations to illegally sheltering refugees, provoking major governmental infiltration and prosecution.

The public focus of the Central America movement in Reagan's second term was Nicaragua (following the election of José Napoleón Duarte in El Salvador), with dozens of sister-city projects, intense legislative battles, and the "Quest for Peace" campaign that matched U.S. aid to the contras in goods and services to Nicaragua. By 1987–1988, an unprecedented commitment from the church and labor hierarchies, impelled by massive if decentralized grass-roots organizing, had convinced the Democratic Party leadership to press its own ambiguous policy of nonintervention as the Iran-contra scandal broke open.

Meanwhile, Salvadoran solidarity groups, the best-organized sector of the movement (and most independent from the vagaries of press and congressional concern), played a crucial role from 1985 on, providing support to the new popular movement in El Salvador. CISPES and faith-based and labor activists literally "accompanied" this movement throughout the country, funded it, and held back the Salvadoran government's security forces through intensive human rights pressure from the United States.

At the end of the eighties, Nicaragua had survived at enormous cost, and the solidarity movement had done much to limit the proxy war and provide material support, though the Sandinistas were effectively

"demonized" in mainstream political discourse here. The largest military commitment of the United States since Vietnam had meanwhile run aground in El Salvador, and consolidated organizing by North Americans had become an integral part of the Salvadoran people's struggle. None of the wars in Central America had reached any final closure, but a maturing and largely united movement had put down deep roots in the United States.

[See also Congreso del Pueblo de Habla Española; Cuban Americans; Latin American Studies; New Left; Newsreel and Post-New Left Radical Filmmaking.]

FURTHER READING

- Crittenden, Ann. Sanctuary. New York: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1988.
- Gosse, Van. "'The North American Front': Central American Solidarity in the Reagan Era." Reshaping the U.S. Left: Popular Struggles in the 1980s. Vol. 3, The Year Left. Edited by Michael Sprinker and Mike Davis. London: Verso, 1988.
- Gosse, Van. Where the Boys Are: Cuba, Cold War America and the Making of a New Left. London: Verso, 1993.
- Gosse, Van. "El Salvador Is Spanish for Vietnam: The Politics of Solidarity and the New Immigrant Left, 1955-1993." In The Immigrant Left in the United States, edited by Paul Buhle and Dan Georgakas. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.
- Griffin-Nolan, Ed. Witness for Peace: A Story of Resistance. Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1995.
- Levinson, Sandra, and Carol Brightman, eds. Venceremos Brigade. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1971.
- Melville, Thomas, and Marjorie Melville. Whose Heaven? Whose Earth? New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1971.
- Schultz, Lars. Human Rights and United States Policy toward Latin America. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Smith, Christian. Resisting Reagan: The Central America Peace Movement. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

—VAN GOSSE

LATIN AMERICAN STUDIES. Few scholarly fields have been as sensitive to political events as that of Latin American studies, and few have engendered so many activist scholars. Before the 1960s the study of Latin America in the United States was largely descriptive, and critical study was confined to journalistic approaches, particularly the work of John Reed, Carlton Beals, and Carey McWilliams. The revision-ist approach to American foreign policy of William Appleman Williams was of major importance in providing a framework for the analyses of the region that were to be developed in the following decades.

Political interest in the region engendered by the Cuban Revolution gave rise to an increased demand for Latin American policy experts. This in turn stimulated interest in the field in the academic world and generated millions of dollars in foundation and government funding, which led to more dynamic scholars being attracted to it. C. Wright Mills, the leading radical academician of the period, wrote Listen, Yankee, a favorable account of the changes taking place in Cuba and a devastating attack on U.S. foreign policy in the hemisphere. The Cuban Revolution also inspired many young scholars to study revolutionary change in Latin America and to seek out their counterparts in Latin America in a period when the civil rights movement was bringing the rise of a radical movement within the United States.

A center for the study of the region had been developed in the 1950s at Stanford University, under the leadership of Spanish language professor Ronald Hilton. Students in the program were responsible for the publication of the monthly Hispanic American Report, which featured articles on current events in all the Latin American republics. Although the curriculum did not include theoretical components, much less leftist theoretical perspectives, the attention to the objective reality and the lack of bourgeois methodology imposed by social science disciplines, as well as the influence of Stanford's Marxist economist Paul Baran, attracted a number of students who came with or developed a Left perspective and who made substantial contributions to the ensuing development of radical scholarship on Latin America in the United States. These included Donald Bray, Ronald Chilcote, James Cockcroft, Timothy Harding, Dale Johnson, and Saul Landau, who worked in concert with James Petras and Susanne Jonas, both of whom were trained at the University of California at Berkeley.

The theoretical paradigm adopted during this period was dependency theory. This outlook was influenced by the work being done in Latin America by the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America, by the writings of several Brazilian scholars including Fernando Henrique Cardoso, by the thought of traditional Communists, and by the German scholar Andre Gunder Frank. A key work of this period was Latin America: The Struggle with Dependency and Beyond (1974), edited by Chilcote and Joel Edelstein, with an introduction by the editors and country studies written by Latin American and North American authors using a dependency framework with emphasis on political economy.

In 1966 the Latin American Studies Association (LASA) was founded, reflecting the level of importance the field had achieved for academic professionals. At early meetings of the association the radical wing of its membership began successfully to introduce political resolutions critical of U.S. policy in the region. Politicization of all of the social sciences increased as a result of the protests and teach-ins generated by opposition to the Vietnam War. Ultimately, resolutions came to be approved routinely at LASA business meetings with the old guard failing to mount even token objections. The panels at meetings and LASA committees began to include Marxists, radical political economists, dependency theorists, and feminists. Within LASA a coalition of leftist Latin Americanist scholars, the Union of Radical Latin Americanists, was formed during the period of professional resistance to leftist activity. This group faded as participants' views became less opposed by the mainstream, and the Progressive Latin Americanist Network, a less explicitly radical coalition, was formed to support scholarship critical of U.S. foreign policy.

Meanwhile, the radicalism of the sixties was replaced by a more rigorous theoretical scholarship, both in Latin America and in the United States. This was stimulated in the United States by the development of the journal Latin American Perspectives, which began publishing in 1974. Edited by a collective of editors residing in southern California, with Chilcote as the managing editor and with U.S. and foreign editors who actively participated in the reviewing and editing of articles, this journal sought to be an anti-imperialist, non-sectarian forum for authors of many political persuasions. In its pages a critical assessment of dependency theory was undertaken and articles appeared interpreting Latin American reality from various leftist perspectives by authors from the United States, Latin America, and Europe.

Also during this period, many Latin Americanists, some influenced by Latin American intellectuals, became dissatisfied with the role of scholarly observers of social inequities and theorists of change, with praxis being limited to participation in demonstrations and teach-ins. They helped develop support groups for radical Latin American movements and made propagandistic films. Some began to participate in or organize political groups founded on Marxist-Leninist principles.

In the eighties the concern of North American researchers focused on the crisis in Central America and U.S. intervention there. In addition to participating in support groups, scholars formed the Guatemalan Scholars Network, the Faculty Committee on Human Rights in El Salvador, and the Central American Resource Center in Austin, Texas, to provide accurate information for public discussion. A LASA task force that observed the 1984 Nicaraguan elections attested to their fairness. A group of progressive scholars (Policy Alternatives for the Caribbean and Central America) developed policy proposals as alternatives to the hegemony over policy-making assumed by the governmental establishment.

At the end of the century, radical Latin Americanist scholarship in the United States, although built on the foundation of critical anti-imperialist class analysis constructed in earlier decades, was characterized by a more pragmatic and policy-oriented approach than in the past. Theoretical approaches, while more sophisticated than in the 1960s, were less deterministic.

[See also North American Congress on Latin America.]

—MARJORIE WOODFORD BRAY

LATVIAN AMERICANS. A small Baltic nationality group, Latvians briefly played an important role in the U.S. Left as ardent allies of Bolshevism and financial supporters of the earliest U.S. Leninists.

Latvia, like Lithuania and Estonia, was a buffer zone between major nations. Industrialization and modernization took place in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries only in selected urban districts. Emigration to the United States centered in a very few locations, especially Greater Boston, with immigrants working mostly in light manufacturing.

Like several other immigrant socialist groups, Latvians were organized at first in the United States as a branch of the homeland party. Affiliating with the Socialist Party in 1908, they maintained close European ties. In the Latvian party, the Right had been historically weak, due largely to the difficulty of reforms and of gradual labor improvements. The dominant Left, linked more closely to Lenin than any other national party faction, early on looked to the Bolsheviks for leadership in search of socialism and national independence.

Centered in Boston, the Latvian (or "Lettish," after the German geographical designation of "Lettland") federation claimed sixteen hundred members by 1915. Its leader, Fricis Rozins, had been a pioneer of Lettish socialism, escapee from Siberia and close ally of Lenin. Rozins edited the federation organ Stradneeks (Worker) and finessed a brief takeover of the Massachusetts Socialist Party (weak since the early years of the twentieth century) by the Left in 1913–1914.

As a result of defeat at the 1915 state convention, the Latvians established an English-language outlet, the Socialist Propaganda League (SPL), whose manifesto boasted the names of long-standing Left-socialists and aimed at capture of the party for the Left.

In the furious factionalism of the next few years, the Latvians and the SPL frequently took the lead in espousing an ultraorthodox Leninism, as understood at the time. Letts sponsored the rise of Louis C. Fraina as a proto-Bolshevik intellectual, and the SPL put forward a campaign to recruit Americans for the armed forces in Russia (although unable to do so over U.S. State Department opposition). The Revolutionary Age (1918–1919), for a short period the premier English-language Bolshevik organ in America, was published in Boston with Lettish financial backing. In the breakup of the Socialist Party, the Latvian along with the Russian Federation and others supported withdrawal from the party into a formal Communist Party (rather than awaiting expulsion, for tactical reasons).

Factionalism and repression did not greatly diminish the Lettish following, but in the open Communist movement that emerged in the 1920s, they ceased to play a central role. Stradneeks, edited by John Knudsin and Boston-area supporters, nevertheless remained an important source of support for the Massachusetts Left for decades. The successor organ, American-Latvian, edited by Edward Maurin, closed its doors only in the 1980s, after Maurin's death.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Fraina, Louis C.]

FURTHER READING

Draper, Theodore. Roots of American Communism. New York: Viking Press, 1957.

Additional information supplied by Anne Burlak Timpson.

—PAUL BUHLE

LAWRENCE STRIKE. Few people anticipated that the operatives in the numerous textile mills that filled Lawrence, Massachusetts, would strike when mill owners instituted a wage cut in January 1912. The working class in the city was composed of at least twenty-five (and estimates go as high as forty) different nationalities; these workers were mostly unskilled and had been beaten down by years of poverty and poor living conditions. But when thirty-five hundred Italian and Jewish operatives, mostly women, marched out of Everett Mill to protest the wage cut, workers in the other mills quickly followed. By 13 January there were twenty-five thousand mill workers out on strike, among them Italians, Jews, Germans, French Canadians, Poles, Lithuanians, Franco-Belgians, Syrians, Greeks, Letts (Latvians), and Turks.

Thus began the strike for "Bread and Roses." The strikers' demands quickly extended beyond restoration of their original wages. At a meeting on 14 January, they established demands for a fifteen percent wage increase; a fifty-four-hour work week; abolition of the premium and bonus systems; double pay for overtime; and no discrimination against those who struck.

Several factors worked to keep this diverse group of strikers together. As historian Ardis Cameron has pointed out, working-class women in Lawrence had established solid family and community networks that provided an enormously important foundation for the strikers. Women who had befriended each other across ethnic lines before the strike joined together on the picket lines and at the "local centers of female activity" such as kitchens, stoops, and grocery stores to fight for their rights. The strikers were also drawn together by shared symbols such as the ever-present American flag and a wide range of songs they sang regularly. They sang standard songs of solidarity such as "The Marseillaise" and composed their own songs—"In the Good Old Picket Line," for example, mentioned several different ethnic groups, either praising them for their steadfastness or goading them for their lack of class loyalty. The strikers also participated in numerous parades, which allowed them to witness their own strength in a festive setting.

The solidarity of the strikers would not have been what it was, however, were it not for the presence of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). The strike at Lawrence, to which the IWW sent representatives almost immediately, constituted the radical union's greatest success on the East Coast. In conducting the strike IWW organizers were wonderfully innovative. Joseph Ettor and Arturo Giovannitti established a strike committee composed of two delegates each from twenty-seven different ethnic groups. This ensured the democratic nature of the strike. The frequent parades were organized under IWW auspices. IWW organizers also instituted the moving picket line (to circumvent a court injunction) and the "children's exodus," which sent many of the strikers' children to sympathizers in New York, Philadelphia, and other East Coast cities. Both tactics were unprecedented in American working-class history. These impressive organizing efforts clearly worried unsympathetic city officials. Ettor and Giovannitti were arrested on a trumped-up murder charge. Their places were taken, however, by IWW leaders Big Bill Haywood and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, who carried on the struggle ably.

The IWW and the strikers faced many opponents: a brutal police force that attacked men, women, and children picketers alike; judges who handed out injunctions and stiff sentences liberally; church leaders, the majority of whom spoke out against the strike and the strikers; the militia, whose presence turned Lawrence into an armed camp. The American Federation of Labor also voiced its bitter opposition to the strike. John Golden, president of the United Textile Workers, an affiliate of the federation, declared angrily, "This is a revolution, not a strike."

The strikers held strong in the face of this opposition, however, and the mill owners were forced to settle late in February. The strikers won wage hikes of five to twenty-two percent (those paid the least receiving the greatest increase); time and a quarter for overtime; premium payments every two weeks rather than once a month; and an agreement that the owners would not discriminate against them. The victory was an enormous achievement—Eugene Debs called it "the most decisive and far-reaching ever won by organized workers." Moreover, concerned textile mill owners all over the East Coast reacted fearfully to the events in Lawrence. By 1 April, an estimated 275,000 textile workers in New England had received pay increases. The IWW and Lawrence workers continued to press for the release of the still-imprisoned Ettor and Giovannitti. On 27 September, ten thousand workers again filled the streets to protest the unjust treatment of the strike leaders. On 25 November both were acquitted.

Although the organization established in Lawrence could not sustain itself—union membership fell sharply shortly after the strike—there is no question that the tactics of the IWW and the tremendous unity of the diverse, largely unskilled working population constituted a landmark in American working-class history.

[See also Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley; Giovannitti, Arturo; Haywood, William D.; Industrial Workers of the World; Tresca, Carlo.]

FURTHER READING

- Cameron, Ardis. Radicals of the Worst Sort: Laboring Women in Lawrence, Massachusetts, 1860–1912. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.
- Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley. The Rebel Girl: An Autobiography, My First Life (1906–1926). New York: International Publishers, 1955.
- Forner, Philip S. The Industrial Workers of the World, 1905–1917. New York: International Publishers, 1965.

—MICHAEL TOPP

LAWSON, JOHN HOWARD (1894–1977). Playwright, screenwriter, and theorist, John Howard Lawson was one of the dominant figures in the radical art scene associated with the Communist movement. A third-generation American of Jewish background, Lawson was born in New York City into an affluent, progressive household. As a young boy, Lawson went on tours to Europe and Canada and across the United States. He had resolved to become a playwright by age twelve and entered Williams College at fifteen, the youngest member of his class. By the end of his sophomore year, he had published more than twenty articles in the college literary magazine. He sold his first play, Standards, to producers Sam Harris and George M. Cohan in 1915. The next year, he wrote four plays, one of which, Servant-Master-Lover, he sold to Oliver Morosco. Lawson seemed poised to become the first serious American-born playwright.

The First World War interrupted his writing. En route to serve with the American Red Cross, he met John Dos Passos, also a volunteer. The friendship proved to be central to Lawson. Staying on in Paris after the war with other artists of his generation, Lawson wrote Roger Bloomer, the first expressionist play of the American theater. Also the first of his works to be produced, it ran for two years. In 1925 his play Processional ran for ninety-six performances.

Lawson had meanwhile become a Communist and was elected to the national executive committee of the Proletarian Artists and Writers League. He joined with Dos Passos, Mike Gold, and others to form the New Playwrights Theater. Its purpose, Lawson explained, was to present "mass plays done for workers at prices that workers can afford." Likewise dedicated to theatrical experimentation, the New Playwrights Theater produced Lawson's Loudspeaker (1927) and The International (1928) before dissolving later that year.

By 1930–1931, Lawson had begun writing for the movies, completing five scripts for RKO, one of which, Bachelor Apartment, was produced. His play Success Story (later adapted for the screen as Success at Any Price) was produced in 1932 in New York. Two more plays, Gentlewoman and The Pure at Heart, opened in 1934. During the same period, Lawson helped organize the Screen Writers Guild, and remained a leading figure in it. Active in the Scottsboro case, he was twice arrested in Alabama, and served as a member of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners. In 1936 Lawson published his first book, Theory and Technique of Playwriting, which elaborated his desire to explore and expand the formal possibilities of the genre.

His political work began to take a severe toll on his artistic acceptance. In 1937, Processional was revived by the Federal Theater Project, and the Group Theater produced Marching Song, but these were the last of his plays to be produced in his lifetime. Writing for a time quite successfully for the movies, Lawson saw six of his scripts produced between 1938 and 1943: Blockade (1938), Algiers (1938), They Shall Have Music (1939), Four Sons (1940), Sahara (1943), and Action in the North Atlantic (1943). Despite his apparent respectability, as early as 1944 the Tenney Committee of California targeted Lawson and his activities—in particular his active role in the Writers Congress held in 1943 at the University of California at Los Angeles—for investigation.

Lawson suddenly faced criticism on all sides. Against Albert Maltz, who in 1946 argued in the New Masses that art had to be evaluated independently of political line, Lawson insisted on the Marxist concept of art as a form of social criticism that did not transcend the environment that creates the artist. Those Hollywood activists and others hoping for a more liberal interpretation of strategic theory in the Communist milieu looked upon Lawson as an aesthetic hard-liner. Only a year after Cosmopolitan gave Lawson an award for his cinematic contributions to the war effort, he faced indictment as a member of the "Hollywood Ten." His final film, Smashup (1947), produced before the blacklisting went into effect, barely preceded a 1948 conviction on contempt of Congress charges and a one-year jail term (he shared a cell with Dalton Trumbo) beginning in 1950. That year, he finished a book, The Hidden Heritage, wrote a never-to-be-produced play, In Praise of Learning, edited the prison newspaper, and under a pseudonym penned a movie script for Alan Paton's anti-apartheid classic, Cry, the Beloved Country.

Released from prison but unable to write for films under his own name, Lawson entered into a secret agreement with Edward Lewis for work to appear under Lewis's name. Under such pen names as James Howard and James Christopher, Lawson completed scripts for a number of films, including The Careless Years (1957) and Terror in a Texas Town (1957). Lawson also continued to write critical works—Film in the Battle of Ideas (1953) and Film: The Creative Process (1964)—while lecturing on play- and screenwriting until his death. He continued to insist that form as well as content be the concern of the committed playwright.

[See also Hollywood Blacklist; Lardner, Ring, Jr.]

FURTHER READING

- Brown, Richard Peyron. "John Howard Lawson as an Activist Playwright, 1923–1937." Ph.D. diss., Tulane University, 1964.
- Ceplair, Larry, and Steven Englund. The Inquisition in Hollywood: Politics in the Film Community, 1930–1960. Rev. ed. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
- John Howard Lawson Archive. Morris Library, Southern Illinois University.
- Lawson, John Howard. "Organizing the Screen Writers Guild." In The Cineaste Interviews, edited by Dan Georgakas and Leonard Rubenstein. Chicago: Lake View Press, 1983.

—NORMA JENCKES

LEACOCK, ELEANOR BURKE (1922–1987). Anthropologist and social activist, Eleanor Burke Leacock documented the political and economic sources of class, gender, and racial oppression. Leacock authored more than eighty articles and ten books and was internationally respected for her scholarship on Marxist social theory. Her writings on race and class, gender, colonialism, and capitalist development informed a tireless political engagement.

Leacock's 1952 doctoral thesis challenged the prevailing contention that private property was universal. The Montagnais-Naskapi "Hunting Territory" and the Fur Trade (1954) analyzed the impact of commodity production on property and labor relations in a foraging society. After eleven years of part-time teaching, and work on the Bank Street School Project, Leacock finally obtained a full-time teaching position at Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute. While there she wrote a critical appreciation of Lewis Henry Morgan concerning egalitarian societies and cultural evolution (1963); numerous articles on race and class stratification in education, as well as Teaching and Learning in City Schools (1969); and Culture of Poverty: A Critique (1971). In 1972 she was asked to revamp and chair the department of anthropology at City College/City University of New York, where she remained until her death while conducting field research in Samoa on capitalist development and teenage suicide.

Leacock was pivotal in the reemergence of the women's movement, and in the development of Marxist feminism and feminist anthropology, beginning with her edition of Engels's The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State (1972). A selection of her essays on ideologies of gender and theories of women's subordination appeared as Myths of Male Dominance (1981).

In the 1980s Leacock coedited a series of anthologies: on colonialism and women's status (Women and Colonization, 1980), on foraging peoples' resistance to stratification (Politics and History in Band Societies, 1982), and on capitalist development and gender (Women's Work, 1986). Her purpose in research and writing was human emancipation, and she brought to that endeavor formidable scholarship, insight, and courage.

[See also Anthropology; Morgan, Lewis Henry.]

FURTHER READING

Gailey, Christine Ward. "Eleanor Burke Leacock." In Women Anthropologists, edited by Ute Gacs, Jerrie McIntyre, et al. New York: Greenwood Press, 1988.

—CHRISTINE WARD GAILEY

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY.

See Intercollegiate Socialist Society.

LEAGUE OF REVOLUTIONARY BLACK WORKERS. Alone among Black Power organizations of the 1960s, the League of Revolutionary Black Workers (LRBW) placed its major focus on organizing industrial workers while positing a socialist solution to the problems of black America. Although never gaining the kind of mass media exposure given to the Black Panther Party, the League had an enormous impact on black revolutionaries and on Marxist tendencies within the New Left. The League also made contact with extraparliamentary groups in Europe, particularly in Italy. The LRBW strove to take the movements previously identified with the leadership of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., and Malcolm X to a new stage of organization and consciousness. Its history also provides an example of how the black revolutionaries of the 1960s often had links to preceding radical movements.

The LRBW originated in a wildcat strike of black workers in May 1968 at the Detroit Dodge main plant of the Chrysler Corporation. The strike was the first in fourteen years and black radicals were its organizational core. Coming a year after the most extensive and costly radical insurrection in American history, the wildcat was a front-page story in the Wall Street Journal and was given extensive coverage in the Detroit press. The wildcatters formed an organization called DRUM (Dodge Revolutionary Union Movement), which expressed as much hostility toward the United Auto Workers (UAW) as to the company. By their actions the DRUM workers indicated they were unwilling to wait for white workers to ally with them and they would not dilute their demands for racial justice for the sake of hypothetical white support.

The anger that erupted at Dodge Main was symptomatic of the frustration felt by Detroit's entire black working class. A series of RUMs were formed in various workplaces. Most were at auto plants (ELRUM: Chrysler's Eldon Avenue Gear and Axle; FRUM: Ford's River Rouge complex; CADRUM: General Motors' Cadillac plant) but there were nonauto RUMs as well, such as those organized by United Parcel workers and health workers. RUM-like groups also began to appear in other cities, at steel mills in Birmingham, Alabama, and at auto plants in Baltimore, Maryland; Fremont, California; and Mahwah, New Jersey. The Detroit RUMs consolidated into the LRBW with the goal of first organizing the black workers of Detroit and then the black workers of the entire United States.

Although the League appeared to be a by-product of the "Great Rebellion" of 1967 to outsiders, it reflected more than a decade of agitation and education. The black radicals who came of political age in the 1950s had much more of a Marxist orientation than activists in the South and most other northern cities. This was due in part to a vibrant Detroit radicalism that had centered around the Communist party, black cultural groups, and Trotskyist publishing groups with roots in the Workers Party of the 1940s. Rather than accepting the nonviolent-resistance strategy of King, the Detroit radicals tended to be supportive of the methods of the Chinese and Cuban revolutions. When Robert Williams, head of the Monroe, North Carolina, chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, clashed with King over the need for armed self-defense, a Detroit group in support of Williams was formed. The supersecret Revolutionary Action Movement also had Detroit adherents.

Black radicals had been influenced by the Socialist Workers Party's Friday Night Forums; by study groups run by Marty Glaberman of Facing Reality, a local C. L. R. James support group; and by close contact with James Boggs, whose The American Revolution: Pages from a Negro Worker's Notebook (Monthly Review Press, 1963) attracted national attention. A group that joined the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) was expelled for wishing to do more than fund-raising in the North. Radicals were also involved in the Northern High School student strike, Uhuru (a Detroit action group), and the Freedom Now Party, an all-black political party that achieved ballot status in Michigan. Future League leaders participated in a 1964 trip to Cuba designed to challenge the State Department ban on travel to the island and met with Che Guevara when he appeared at the United Nations. There were also contacts with supporters of Malcolm X and various radical writers and graphic artists from an older generation of militants. Many of the activists took college classes at Wayne State University, but they worked in basic industry to support themselves.

Acting on Lenin's injunction to create a political press, the Detroiters launched the Inner City Voice in 1967 with John Watson as editor. The paper was well received but became irregular due to the refusal of various printers to handle such radical material. The paper had to be produced in a Muslim shop in Chicago and trucked back to Detroit. To overcome this problem, a group of Wayne-based radicals organized to have Watson elected the first black editor of the South End, the university's daily paper. Arguing that the paper was a community resource, Watson often put its pages at the disposal of various RUMs throughout the 1968–1969 academic year. Other radical groups were also welcomed to use the South End. Under Watson's editorship, there was considerable agitation against the war in Vietnam, a series of articles supportive of the Palestine Liberation Organization, and a special issue criticizing the military junta in Greece from a Left perspective.

Among the radicals in the plants, the most important was General Baker. ("General" is a given name, not a rank.) Baker had been known for his revolutionary views for years, but following the Great Rebellion of 1967, he began to attract a mass following. Also playing a crucial role in creating the first RUMs in Detroit factories was Mike Hamlin. Yet another major League personality was attorney Ken Cockrel. With his white law partner, Justin Ravitz, Cockrel won a number of celebrated cases with sensationalistic racial and class aspects. He was well known throughout the city for his efforts to curb police abuses, and he often served as the public spokesperson for the League. Unlike other black organizations, the League never had to go outside its own leadership for legal defense.

One problem the organization never resolved was an exact self-definition. The founders knew what the LRBW was not. It was not a political party. It was not a caucus within the UAW. It was not an independent union. In many ways the League was like a latter-day Industrial Workers of the World, an organization willing to address immediate issues in a militant and winning fashion but with its true passion a total transformation of capitalist society.

Tactical problems stemmed directly from the vague self-definition. Should a RUM attempt to capture the UAW local or should it operate as a dual union? Should nonindustrial issues become part of the immediate agenda? RUMs were limited to non-whites, but how should cooperating whites be handled? This last issue was complicated by the fact that many black workers attracted to the League had intense nationalist feelings. Various solutions were posed at various times at different RUMs, but the League did not survive long enough to have a consistent policy. Thousands of workers would respond to League calls, but contradictory policies and impractical methods ultimately undermined the organization's momentum. Formal membership never ran to more than a few hundred.

The fate of the League was determined in 1969 when James Foreman, a major leader of SNCC, became associated with it. Foreman wanted the League to be transformed into a national organization with various components dealing with the full range of black community needs. In this sense Foreman set out to remold the League as the successor of SNCC just as Stokely Carmichael sought to remold the Black Panther Party to the same end.

Foreman's immediate project was the Black Economic Development Conference (BEDC), which demanded $500 million in reparations from religious institutions to fund long-term black economic self-sufficiency. BEDC was not to be an independent organization but a conduit to action groups in the field. Foreman was partially successful and approximately $1 million passed through BEDC. Most of this sum was channeled to groups around the country with Foreman connections. A significant amount went to the components and allies of the League.

BEDC money made it possible for the League to have a modestly paid staff and to finance its own printing shop, film company, and bookstore. The goal of the printing component, Black Star Publishing, was to establish a newspaper and to create educational materials without being held hostage to the whims of outside printers. Black Star published a number of leaflets and posters and one book, The Political Thought of James Foreman (1970).

The example of the League led other Detroit radicals to form the Motor City Labor League (MCLL), a mostly white organization with independent socialist goals but one supportive of and cooperative with the LRBW. Its most successful undertaking was a radical book club that involved hundreds of Detroiters who met to discuss a series of highly political books. LRBW members worked with the book club. Two radical bookstores and a second radical book club were among the MCLL's longer-term legacies.

Detroit Newsreel was established by whites who came from New York City to make a film about the League. After a volatile relationship, the League took over the film collective as its own and retained three of the white filmmakers as creative and teaching staff. The final product of this effort was Finally Got the News (1970), a feature-length documentary designed to spread League views nationwide. Its political impact was lessened by the circumstance that it was released just as the League was going into schism. The film did get shown extensively over the years and was also screened in Europe. It remains a remarkable expression of the times and the one black radical film under editorial control of the organization it endeavored to celebrate. Black Star Productions tried to work with Jane Fonda and other Hollywood personalities on successor films, but the efforts never bore cinematic fruit.

Two factions had developed in the League by early 1970. One, composed mainly of the plant organizers, wanted to concentrate on industrial organization and to solidify the local base. The other, largely involved in outreach and mass education, felt the League could only advance by expanding. The dispute was fed by personal jealousies, the impact of black nationalism at the factory level, and outside radical forces who came to a Detroit they now spoke of as the American Petrograd. Watson, Cockrel, and Hamlin led the League faction that allied with Foreman for a national strategy. Their vehicle was to be the Black Workers Congress (BWC), originally conceived with the League as its central hub. For most of the 1970s the BWC would seek to re-create League-type structures in various localities. It would work closely with Asian and Latino groups with a similar orientation and with Maoists who wished to build a new Marxist-Leninist party. The BWC was never able to become a viable entity and it expired with the collapse of Maoism and the new party movement.

The group that retained the League name was led by General Baker, Chuck Wooten, John Williams, and Luke Tripp. They never affiliated with the BWC and in spite of continued plant actions, the League more or less disintegrated. Contributing to the decline was the defection of some RUM leaders back to the UAW and the activities of the Communist Labor Party (CLP), which had originated as a split from the Communist Party and prided itself on its adherence to a pre-Khrushchev style of Communism. The CLP recruited a block of League cadre. The most prominent of these was General Baker, who would later run unsuccessfully for state office under the CLP banner. A split within the MCLL brought additional members into the CLP camp. These included individuals active in the local National Lawyers Guild. The CLP kept most of its membership secret so any influence it might have in the plants was not easily determined. The organization also worked to establish radical bookstores in major cities, but the CLP link was not acknowledged.

The BWC forces soon suffered a split within the split. Cockrel, allied with elements of the MCLL that had not gravitated to the CLP, decided it was wisest to work in the arena of electoral politics. Justin Ravitz ran successfully for a ten-year judgeship in the criminal court (1972) as part of an effort to reform the judiciary and control the police. Two years later Coleman Young was elected Detroit's first black mayor. Like Judge George Crockett (soon to be elected to Congress), Young was from an older generation that had been victimized by McCarthyism. Although his administration was highly supportive of business, Young hired a number of radicals to work in his administration, including some League personnel. He soon established himself as an unbeatable incumbent. Cockrel, who had mayoral ambitions of his own, had to settle for a seat on Detroit's Common Council some years later and eventually chose to go back into private practice. When Cockrel died of a heart attack in 1989 at age fifty-one, the press and elected officials spoke of him as one of the city's most gifted citizens and the man who had been most likely to succeed Coleman Young.

By the late 1980s the League was another chapter in local radical and black history, but more so than in any other major city, many of its activists and allies had achieved a measure of political power without renouncing their radical views. They could be found in the mass media, in the UAW hierarchy, in university administrations, and in public office. The general assumption was that should another wave of rebellion arise, they would be able and willing to help.

[See also Armed Struggle, 1960s–1970s; Civil Rights Movement; James, C. L. R.; Maoism; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Workers Party.]

FURTHER READING

Allen, Ernie, "Dying from the Inside: The Decline of the League of Revolutionary Black Workers." In They Should Have Served That Cup of Coffee, edited by Dick Cluster. Boston: South End Press, 1979.

Archives of the League of Revolutionary Black Workers. In materials deposited by Dan Georgakas at Reuther Library, Wayne State University.

Detroit under Stress. A Pamphlet of the From the Ground Up organization, Detroit, 1973.

Georgakas, Dan, and Marvin Surkin. Detroit: I Do Mind Dy- ing. 2d ed. Boston: South End Press, 1998. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1975.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

LEAGUE OF STRUGGLE FOR NEGRO RIGHTS. See National Negro Congress.

LEHR- UND WEHRVEREINE. The armed workers' societies of the 1870s–1880s typified the boldness of contemporary radical immigrant efforts and stirred pride among militant workers while provoking fear and hatred among conservatives and business leaders. As early as 1875, a Lehr- und Wehrverein (Education and Defense Society) had been formed in Chicago, in response to the excessive violence of the state militia during the wave of strikes in 1873. Continuing brutal treatment of workers by police and militia during the national railroad strike of 1877 spurred the growth of these societies of armed workers in several cities, especially Chicago. Their stated goals were to preserve the constitutional rights of freedom of the press, speech, assembly, and the right to bear arms. In this sense, such groups "educated" their members about the right to class self-defense. Historic links can be traced to the Turner tradition, to the Swiss defense league Hilf Dir—a militarized association established during the 1860s to found a German republic—and to the ethnic militia units that had fought in the Civil War. The movement spread primarily among German Americans: beyond Chicago, after 1884, there were armed groups in Detroit, Cincinnati, Saint Louis (two), Omaha, Newark, New York (two), San Francisco, Denver, and other cities. These groups numbered from fewer than twenty members to more than four hundred in Chicago.

When these armed societies first sprang up, most German American members of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP) appeared to believe them necessary to defend workers' constitutional rights and to counterbalance the so-called citizens' militias, which enlisted few workers. Soon, however, the SLP national executive committee began to distance itself from what it considered the confrontational, extremist tactics of the armed organizations. In late 1878 it ordered party members to withdraw from them. The effect of this decree, along with a general disillusionment with electoral politics, caused many individual members and some entire sections of the SLP, especially notable in Chicago, to withdraw from the organization. Until the Haymarket Affair, members of the German and Bohemian Lehr- und Wehrverein marched regularly in Chicago socialist demonstrations. Adverse court action, antianarchist hysteria, and a state militia bill put an effective end to this form of organization.

[See also Anarchism; Black International; German Americans; Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

Hess, Christine. "German Radicals in Industrial America: The Lehr- und Wehrverein in Gilded Age Chicago." In German Workers in Industrial Chicago: A Comparative Perspective, edited by Hartmut Keil and John B. Jentz. De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1983.

—CHRISTINE HESS and CAROL POORE

LENS, SIDNEY (1912–1986). For five and a half decades, Sidney Lens was active as a labor organizer, writer, and peace agitator. Born Sidney Okun in Newark, New Jersey, Lens changed his surname in the mid-1930s when he was blacklisted for union activity. The only child of Russian Jewish immigrants, Lens was three when his pharmacist father died and his mother entered New York City's garment-district sweatshops to support herself and her son.

After graduation from high school at age seventeen, Lens worked as a waiter at an Adirondack resort. In the summer of 1930 he led a strike of fellow waiters and, as a result, was dragged from his bed one night, beaten, and abandoned in the woods by the local sheriff and his deputies. This launched Lens upon his career as a labor organizer. During the Depression he helped organize advertising writers at New York's Hecht Bros., sit-down strikers for the United Auto Workers in Detroit, and cab drivers in Washington, D.C.

In 1934 he joined James P. Cannon's Communist League of America, a precursor of the Socialist Workers Party. Soon thereafter, the League merged with pacifist and labor agitator A. J. Muste's American Workers Party to form the Workers Party of the United States. Deeply influenced by the pacifism of Muste, Lens nevertheless remained active in Trotskyist groups such as the Revolutionary Workers League, which he joined in 1936. After the 1930s, however, he became a largely unaffiliated radical who felt a new socialist party had to be created with labor as its core. To this end he encouraged various third-party efforts for the rest of his life, including Dr. Benjamin Spock's People's Party in the early 1970s and Barry Commoner's Citizens Party in the early 1980s. He was a member of both.

In 1941 Lens successfully organized waiters and retail clerks into Local 329 of the United Services Employees Union (an affiliate of the Congress of Industrial Organizations) in Chicago, ridding the union of old Capone mob influence in the process. He became the local's director in 1942 and, until his retirement in 1966, Local 329 remained his base of operations. In 1946 he took Local 329 into the American Federation of Labor's Building Services Employees International Union to counter isolation from the mainstream of the labor movement.

In 1949 Lens published Left, Right, and Center: Conflicting Forces in American Labor, which examined the failures of "business unionism" and which was the first of his twenty books. Other major books included The Counterfeit Revolution in 1952, which analyzed the strengths and weaknesses of Stalinism; Radicalism in America in 1966, a history of radicalism from before the Revolution to the 1960s; The Military-Industrial Complex in 1970; Poverty, Yesterday and Today and The Promise and Pitfalls of Revolution in 1974; and Unrepentant Radical, a 1980 autobiography.

In the 1950s Lens helped found the journals Dis-sent with Irving Howe and Liberation with A. J. Muste. At the same time he began contributing regularly to the Progressive and became a contributing editor of the magazine in the late 1960s. In 1978 Lens was named senior editor of the journal, a position he held until his death.

Lens opposed America's entry into World War II, viewing it as an imperialist conflict, and for the rest of his life he attempted to combine labor organizing with agitation for peace. In 1960 he was a cofounder of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee and soon thereafter became a leader in the anti-Vietnam War movement. In 1962 he was an unsuccessful peace candidate for Congress and in 1980 he ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate. During the 1960s he was cochair of the New Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam, and in 1976 he became a founder of Mobilization for Survival, an antinuclear peace organization. Lens remained active as a respected leader of Left and peace groups until his death, helping to organize New York's first Conference on Socialism and Activism, in 1985.

[See also Peace Movements; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

Lens, Sidney. Unrepentant Radical. Boston: Beacon Press, 1980.

—ERIC LEIF DAVIN

LE SUEUR, MERIDEL (1900–1996). A champion of women and the working class, Meridel Le Sueur was a prominent Midwest poet, journalist, short story writer, novelist, historian, and poet laureate of Saint Paul, Minnesota. She was born in Murray, Iowa. Her parents were suffragist Marian Wharton, creator of the "Little Blue Books," and Arthur Le Sueur, former Socialist mayor of Minot, North Dakota.

After dropping out of high school, Le Sueur acted on the New York stage and lived there in an anarchist commune with Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman. She left for Hollywood, where she worked briefly as a stunt woman in silent films. During World War I and the Palmer Raids, Le Sueur witnessed attacks on her parents and on other radicals. She was jailed in 1927 for protesting the executions of Sacco and Vanzetti.

After an early period of writing in the 1920s characterized by themes of sexual awakening and influenced by D. H. Lawrence, Le Sueur emerged as a major proletarian writer in the 1930s. She embraced a creative and political role as "voice, messenger, and awakener" of the oppressed, particularly women. She wrote for the New Masses and the Daily Worker, reporting on unemployment, breadlines, strikes, and the plight of farmers. Le Sueur became a Communist Party organizer, taught in the Writers Project of the Works Progress Administration, and helped to establish flourishing literary networks through the John Reed clubs and the American Writers Congress. In 1940 she published her best-known anthology of stories, Salute to Spring. At this time she also wrote The Girl (1978), a novel based on her life among destitute women during the Great Depression, and North Star Country (1945), a unique fusion of folklore and history about the Midwest.

With the advent of the Cold War and the McCarthy witch-hunts, Le Sueur, though a prominent literary figure, was excommunicated from the publishing world, hounded and driven out of jobs by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. She remained creatively active "underground," sustained during this dark time by her identification with the collective suffering of women.

Recognition returned for Le Sueur with the resurgence of political activism and the rebirth of the feminist movement in the late 1960s. Many of her writings, long out of print, were reissued and hailed by younger generations who recognized an early champion of the poor and of the "anonymous" woman. Her work derived optimism from her faith in the nurturing potential embodied in women and a belief in the inevitability of working-class victory over capitalism, a system she perceived as antagonistic to the biological and ecological continuum of the individual, nature, earth, and society.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Mainstream; New Masses; Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s.]

FURTHER READING

Coiner, Constance. Better Red: The Writing and Resistance of Tillie Olsen and Meridel Le Sueur. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Haml, Patricia. "Meridel Le Sueur: Voice of the Prairie." MS, August 1975.

Hedges, Elaine. Introduction to Ripening: Selected Work, 1927–1980, by Meridel Le Sueur. Old Westbury, N.Y.: Feminist Press, 1982.

Roberts, Nora R. Three Radical Women Writers: Class and Gender in Meridel Le Sueur, Tillie Olsen, and Josephine Herbst. New York: Garland Publishing, 1996.

Yount, Neala Janice Schleuning. "'America—Song We Sang without Knowing': Meridel Le Sueur's America." Ph.D. diss., University of Minnesota, 1978.

—PRAIRIE MILLER

LEWIS, AUSTIN M. (1865–1944). California-based lecturer, writer, and activist attorney, Austin M. Lewis devoted his life to the socialist cause. A major theoretician for the direct action, industrial unionist left-wing within the Debsian-era socialist movement, he also took on a number of notable Left- and labor-related West Coast legal battles.

Born in England in 1865, the son of a Lancashire schoolmaster, Lewis later attended the University of London where he acquired both bachelor's and law degrees. While in London in the 1880s, he became interested in the socialist cause and the writings of William Morris. He immigrated to California in 1890 where he taught school at San Rafael. He also worked briefly as a journalist, contributing to the San Francisco Examiner and other papers. Admitted to the California bar in 1898, he soon established a reputation as a voice for socialism and as a movement attorney. He campaigned for governor of California on the Socialist Party ticket in 1906.

Lewis published several significant works under the auspices of Charles H. Kerr Company. His The Militant Proletariat (1911) was initially hailed as one of "the most important contribution to Socialist theory that has yet been produced by any American writer," and "the most important work on American economic development and the tactics of the American Socialism that has yet appeared." He also penned The Rise of the American Proletariat (1907), The Art of Lecturing (1908), and Proletarian and Petit-Bourgeois, and also found time to do various translations for Kerr including Friedrich Engels's Anti-Dühring, published as Landmarks of Scientific Socialism (1907).

As a left-wing strategist and theoretician, Lewis strove to produce a sound, rigorous Marxian analysis of contemporary conditions in order to bolster the argument for industrial unionism. The Militant Proletariat went further than any other book of the period to elucidate the reasons for the rise and the national necessity of a "new unionism" capable of transcending the narrow confines of conservative, outmoded craft unions. Lewis's work, a clear contribution to the Marxian discussion on the nature and composition of the American working class, helped to clarify a solid and unassailable Left position. It received a favorable reception within Left circles, drew the expected criticism from the foes it assailed, and passed through several editions.

As an attorney, Lewis devoted his career to such causes as the defense of Robert "Blackie" Ford and Herman Suhr, two organizers for the Industrial Workers of the World who had been charged with murder in the aftermath of California's Wheatland Riot of 1913. He played a key role in the lengthy campaign to pardon Tom Mooney and Warren Billings and battled for repeal of California's criminal syndicalism law in the 1920s. He helped organize the Northern California branch of the American Civil Liberties Union and served as its counsel. He also took on numerous pro bono cases in defense of itinerant and impoverished migrant workers.

FURTHER READING

- Buchanan, Agnes Foster. "The Story of a Famous Fraternity of Writers and Artists." Pacific Monthly (Portland, Ore.) 17, no. 1 (January 1907).
Byington, Lewis Francis. The History of San Francisco. 3 vols. Chicago: S. J. Clarke, 1931.

De Leon, Solon. American Labor Who's Who. New York: Hanford, 1925.

Dubofsky, Melvyn. We Shall Be All: A History of the I.W.W. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1969.

Ruff, Allen. We Called Each Other Comrade: Charles H. Kerr and Company, Radical Publishers. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1997.

San Francisco Chronicle, 28 January 1940.

—ALLEN RUFF

LEWIS, LENA MORROW (1868–1950). The first woman elected to the national executive committee of the Socialist Party, Lena Morrow Lewis was one of the movement's most successful and long-term organizers. Born in Gerlaw, a small town near Monmouth, Illinois, Lena Morrow served for six years as a district superintendent of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union before turning to the campaign for woman suffrage. She soon realized that "women are victims of class distinctions more than of sex distinctions." In 1902 she took her commitment to women's advancement, finely honed organizing skills, and "revolutionary spirit" into the Socialist Party. Traveling among distant party locals on the West Coast, Morrow paused briefly in 1903 to marry the well-known socialist lecturer Arthur Lewis. The couple traveled together for a while, but within a few years Lena Morrow Lewis returned to the life of solitary itinerant lecturer for Socialism.

Although Lewis continued to support the woman's movement, particularly the suffrage campaign, she did so with the expectation that educated, enfranchised women would aid the struggle for Socialism. In her mind, the class struggle encompassed women's emancipation. For this reason she did not support autonomous women's organizations within the Socialist movement and directed women as individuals to stand up to male chauvinists within their locals. "The woman who will be a real and permanent service to the party," she argued, "is the one who maintains her place in the movement and her right to work solely and only on the grounds of her merit and fitness to do things." To demand separate clubs seemed to Lewis either a demeaning request or an appeal for special privilege.

In 1910–1911 Lewis became a principal in a sex scandal involving national secretary J. Mahlon Barnes. Although renominated to the national executive committee, Lewis returned in 1913 to her former position as national organizer and accepted an appointment in Alaska. Among miners and their wives, she found a congenial outpost and stayed there until 1917. She edited the Alaska Labor News and ran for Congress in 1916 on the Alaskan Socialist Party ticket.

Lewis remained in the party after the historic split in 1919 and returned to her original setting, the West Coast. In 1925 she became managing editor of the Oakland Labor World, an important daily newspaper. When the paper folded during the Depression, Lewis moved to the New York area, where a small group of Socialists could provide financial support. In 1936 she quit the party and became a founding member of the Social Democratic Federation, the conservative wing of the party centered in New York's garment trades. She passed her remaining years working at the Tamiment Institute, organizing the papers of the defunct Rand School of Social Science.

[See also Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Mari Jo. "Lena Morrow Lewis: Her Rise and Fall." In Flawed Liberation: Socialism and Feminism, edited by Sally M. Miller. Westport Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981.

Lewis, Lena Morrow. Papers. Tamiment Library, New York University.

MARI JO BUHLE

LIBERATION. The monthly magazine Liberation embodied the radical pacifist commitment to rebuild the Cold War-devastated American Left by developing a Third Camp political position. The stance included an international posture scrupulously independent of both American and Soviet foreign policy, and a domestic focus critical of the cautiousness then shared by liberalism and social democracy alike. This commitment, combined with an openness toward the counterculture, allowed the publication's editors to provide much of the national leadership for the anti-war movement, as well as to become the only group of older radicals to significantly influence the younger generation of the 1960s New Left.

The magazine was founded in 1956 by an editorial board that included David Dellinger, Bayard Rustin, and A. J. Muste. Its founding statement, "Tract for the Times," labeled Marxism and liberalism "empty patter and jargon" because both helped justify political timidity and statist oppression. The manifesto, however, went beyond state politics. The founding editorial called for decentralization and for each individual to have "direct participation" in decisions affecting work and leisure. The stance rested in part on an anarchistic critique of the Marxist emphasis on "capturing the state." Liberation's founders were also sympathetic enough to cultural politics to list boredom, along with war, poverty, and authoritarianism, as one of the "great evils" to be overcome.

The new magazine quickly became one of the most important voices of the emerging New Left. The editorial board grew to include such figures as Barbara Deming, Paul Goodman, Sidney Lens, and Staughton Lynd. The list of authors in the first decade included James Baldwin, Daniel Berrigan, Kenneth Boulding, Vera Brittain, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Allen Ginsberg, Todd Gitlin, Michael Harrington, Nat Hentoff, Martin Luther King, Lewis Mumford, Diana di Prima, David McReynolds, Theodore Roszak, and Bertrand Russell. Between summer 1965 and spring 1966 alone, the magazine published Carl Oglesby's November speech to a national anti-war demonstration castigating American liberalism, "Let Us Shape the Future"; "Sex and Caste," a memorandum by Casey Hayden and Mary King, staffers of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, about sexism in the New Left; and Staughton Lynd's "Coalition Politics or Nonviolent Revolution," a cogent criticism of attempts to ally the Left with Democratic Party liberalism. Such talent won mid-decade endorsements from Noam Chomsky and Susan Sontag, designating Liberation required reading for radical intellectuals as circulation peaked at almost ten thousand.

The editors of Liberation were particularly important in steering the anti-war movement toward a full critique of American liberalism. In this, its main opponents within the movement were social democratic backers of the realignment, a strategy that supposed the Democratic Party could be shorn of its southern racists and then transformed by labor into a majoritarian social democratic party. Pacifist critics like Staughton Lynd wrote that realignment required acceptance of President Johnson's foreign policy, and thus constituted a "coalition with the marines." On the other hand, one of the strongest backers of realignment was Liberation editor Bayard Rustin. The debate grew bitter until Rustin left the board in 1965 as part of his eventual transformation into a leading figure of a type of Cold War liberalism that often allied with the neoconservative movement.

Liberation's editors believed pacifist principles and nonviolent tactics could allow the Left to refuse to choose sides in the Cold War and simultaneously build a new radical movement. This domestic version of Third Camp politics promoted a middle ground between the caution of electoral liberalism and social democracy, and the growing fascination with revolutionary violence and Leninist party building. The ideal could not survive the late 1960s.

The magazine's decline was partially one of leadership. Muste died in 1967, while Lynd and Dellinger left active involvement with the editorial board shortly thereafter. Lynd exited frustrated with the failure of radical change. Dellinger departed first for his trial as part of the Chicago Eight, and then for a failed attempt to create Seven Days, a radical newsweekly. At the same time, pacifism's popularity declined as fewer people were willing to claim violence might never be appropriate, particularly after Nixon won the presidency and continued the war in Vietnam. Liberation limped into the new decade with a revolving group of editors, managing to survive until 1976 with little of the previous decade's originality or vitality.

[See also Dellinger, David; Muste, A. J.; New Left; Pacifism; Peace Movements; Rustin, Bayard.]

FURTHER READING

DeBenedetti, Charles, and Charles Chatfield, assisting author. An American Ordeal: The Antiwar Movement of the Vietnam Era. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1990.

Goodman, Paul, ed. Seeds of Liberation. New York: George Braziller, 1964.

Scatamacchia, Cristina. "Politics, Liberation, and Intellectual Radicalism." Ph.D. diss., University of Missouri, 1990.

—ALLEN SMITH

LIBERATION NEWS SERVICE. Founded in the summer of 1967, Liberation News Service (LNS) provided news of the counterculture and the New Left to hundreds of periodicals with a total readership in the millions, thereby serving as an alternative to the Associated Press or United Press International.

LNS was most influential in the late 1960s and early 1970s, but it continued to send material to subscribing periodicals until 1981, when it finally went out of business. Over the years, perhaps two hundred people were involved in LNS, usually with eight-twenty full-time participants or staff at any one time. Funding came from subscribing periodicals and from a variety of private donors; the organization could not have functioned without significant amounts of volunteer labor.

SUPPORT THE INTERNATIONAL BOYCOTT OF CALIFORNIA TABLE GRAPES

Leaflet by Homer Hurst circulated by Liberation News Service.

LNS was founded by Marshall Bloom and Raymond Mungo, staff members of the U.S. Student Press Association (USSPA). Bloom and Mungo, former New England college editors known for their outspoken opposition to the U.S. role in Vietnam, decided to start an alternative press service when Bloom was fired by USSPA for his denunciation of the National Student Association for having accepted funds from the Central Intelligence Agency.

LNS became firmly established after the October 1967 anti-Vietnam War demonstration at the Pentagon, when LNS material documented aspects of the anti-war movement ignored or misunderstood by the "straight media." Starting that fall, printed "packets" were sent out two or three times a week to a mailing list that grew from a few dozen to several hundred subscribers. The packets included hard news of liberation struggles and resistance to oppression in the United States and around the world, plus features, opinion pieces, poetry, photographs, cartoons, and artwork. LNS offered useful copy on national and international affairs to the "underground press," which utilized the technology of inexpensive offset web-press printing to become a fixture in hundreds of cities and small towns.

Several hundred counterculture and movement papers regularly reprinted LNS articles and graphics. The organization operated during its first year in Washington, D. C., where USSPA was located, receiving considerable assistance from the Institute for Policy Studies. LNS relocated in mid-1968 to New York City's Upper West Side, near Columbia University. The move resulted in part from attention LNS received for its insider coverage of the April 1968 student strike at Columbia. Around the same time, LNS merged with a similar press service, Student Communications Network, launched by the University Christian Movement, and benefited from the new connection by attracting funds from the left-wing sectors of mainstream Protestant churches.

LNS's contribution to American journalism included an advocacy position on formerly taboo topics, such as psychedelic drugs and homosexuality, as well as promoting activism on behalf of movements for social change, especially various Third World liberation movements and feminism. LNS staff members often liked to think of themselves as propagandists in the "good sense of the term," that is, propagating ideas that would make the world a better place. LNS added a touch of professionalism to the underground press and also sponsored several national get-togethers for writers and activists interested in alternative media. The people of the underground press helped forge a national youth culture and in both subtle and direct ways influenced their colleagues in the "establishment media." The LNS print shop offered its facilities at low cost or no cost to other movement groups, in particular the Black Panther Party, whose position on black issues was supported, almost blindly, by the LNS staff. The lifestyle of LNS staff members mirrored that of many movement activists, including group meals, communal living, subsistence salaries, and considerable interest in mind-expanding drugs, rock and roll, sex, and intimate relationships.

LNS's material represented a broad spectrum of socialist, anarchist, pacifist, civil rights, and "hippie" concerns, but gradually the organization became more decidedly Marxist and more critical of such tendencies as pacifism and the counterculture. Many staff members felt loyalty to Students for a Democratic Society.

In retrospect, this dichotomy between "politics" and "culture" seems exaggerated, but this was a factor in a serious and unresolved split in the summer of 1968. The increasingly uncomfortable schism motivated a faction, supporters of founder Bloom, to use proceeds from a fund-raiser (a showing of the Beatles' Magical Mystery Tour) to buy an old farm in Montague, Massachusetts. The split crystallized after a majority of the staff voted for a more structured collective control, undermining the freewheeling style of Bloom and Mungo. For a brief time, news packets were produced in New York City and in Montague, but within a year, the Montague faction ceased publication. Bloom committed suicide on 1 November 1969. In the mid-1970s, residents of the Montague farm became prime movers of the movement against nuclear power when a local utility proposed construction of a nuclear power plant nearby.

Dogmatism on various levels, from obsessive concern about having a correct political line on many national and international issues, to internal organizational matters, such as the distinction between manual laborers (printing press operators) and intellectual laborers (editors and writers), led to internal strife at various times in LNS history. Even after the 1968 split, lengthy, tedious meetings and the often emotional departure of staff members resulted from these internal problems. In its latter years, with the underground press virtually defunct, LNS served a variety of community newspapers and periodicals serving specialized audiences.

The story of the organization's early years is interestingly and humorously told by Mungo in his book Famous Long Ago (though this account is often self-serving and one-sided). Many copies of periodicals that subscribed to LNS, plus internal papers of the organization, were acquired by the special collections library of Amherst College, where they form a collection named in memory of Marshall Bloom.

[See also New Left; Underground Press.]

FURTHER READING

Leamer, Larry. The Paper Revolutionaries: The Rise of the Underground Press. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1972.

Mungo, Raymond. Famous Long Ago: My Life and Hard Times with Liberation News Service. Boston: Beacon Press, 1970.

Peck, Abe. Uncovering the Sixties: The Life and Times of the Underground Press. New York: Pantheon, 1985.

—ALLEN YOUNG

LIBERATION THEOLOGY. Vatican Council II (1962–1965) not only brought enormous changes to the Roman Catholic Church (worship in vernacular languages, respect for religious freedom, openness to human experience) but it also prompted Catholics to ask basic questions. In Latin America church people began to raise questions such as: How should the church relate to the extremes of wealth and poverty? What is the meaning of Christian faith in Latin America today? Out of this questioning came new pastoral strategies, especially in the form of small, lay-led base communities in villages and barrios. Liberation theology was an articulation of the new approach.

In contrast to the time-honored methods of proceeding from doctrine to application, liberation theology insists on the primacy of praxis: it is critical reflection on practice already underway. Out of the suffering and struggle of the poor comes new insight into traditional Christian themes (God, creation, Israel, Jesus Christ, the church). There is especially a critique of injustice ("structural sin"). In seeking to understand society, church people and theologians make use of Marxism, as do virtually all Latin Americans who are serious about social change. It is significant that this theology emerged just when novelists and social scientists were expressing a new sense of Latin American identity.

Liberation theology is not unique. It has something in common with the "Christian socialism" of the nineteenth century and the "social gospel" prevalent earlier in this century and perhaps with the earlier Reinhold Niebuhr. Similarly, black theologians in the United States (taking their inspiration not only from the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., but also from the Black Power movement), Africa, and the Caribbean have produced their own liberation theologies. Insofar as it articulates the experience of an oppressed group, feminist theology is similar and is perhaps the most widespread and most radical liberation theology in the North American context.

The major writings of Latin American liberation theologians are available in English translation, mainly through Orbis Books. More important, several movements and currents in U.S. churches showed the influence of liberation theology. Witness for Peace grew out of a 1983 vigil in northern Nicaragua where the contras were expected to attack. Thousands of people went to Nicaragua through its programs, which generally included some contact with church groups inspired by liberation theology. Similarly, the Sanctuary movement arose out of efforts to protect fleeing Central Americans from deportation. Indeed, many individuals became involved in Central America solidarity activities through church contact. Similarly, there was a kinship between liberation theology and the spirit animating church people in the peace movement as a whole. It is not farfetched to see the influence of liberation theology in two letters of the U.S. Catholic bishops, The Challenge of Peace (1983) and Economic Justice for All (1986). While the predominant voice in each was liberal, radical questions were raised (e.g., the bishops advocated an "option for the poor" and questioned the present distribution of wealth in the United States). The rightward drift of the church undercut these advances, but by the 1990s, liberation theology doctrines could be found at many levels of clergy and lay activity.

[See also Christian Socialism.]

FURTHER READING

- Berryman, Phillip. Liberation Theology. New York: Pantheon, 1987.
- Boff, Leonardo, and Clodovis Boff. Introducing Liberation Theology. Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 1987.
- Gutiérrez, Gustavo. A Theology of Liberation: History, Politics, and Salvation. Rev. ed. Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 1988.

—PHILLIP BERRYMAN

LIBERATOR. Max Eastman and his sister Crystal founded the Liberator in March 1918 to print John Reed's reports of the Bolshevik Revolution (which would eventually become Ten Days That Shook the World). Reed had originally gone to Russia as a correspondent for the Masses, but on August 1917 the postmaster of New York suppressed that magazine under the Espionage Act. The Liberator became the Masses under a new masthead, and was on the streets before the first trial of the Masses editors had even begun.

The Liberator was smaller, more focused, and more political than its flamboyant predecessor, but it attracted work from most of the Masses' artists and writers, as well as contributions from William Gropper, Reginald Marsh, and Boardman Robinson in graphics, and Edmund Wilson, John Dos Passos, Jean Toomer, and Mary Heaton Vorse in prose and poetry, among many others. The Liberator's primary impact came from its labor reporting, its cultural criticism, and the dissemination of information from the Soviet Union. As staff member Joseph Freeman was to write in his 1936 autobiography of this postwar period, the Liberator might have mistakenly ignored Eliot's The Waste Land when it appeared in 1922, but "we alone consistently devoted the pages of our publication to the Sacco-Vanzetti case, the partition of China by the imperialist powers, the oppression of Haiti by American bankers, the Garvey movement among the Negroes, the Mexican Revolution, [and] the wage-cut campaign in this country." Mike Gold covered the coal-miners' strike in Pennsylvania and contributed (under his real name, Irwin Granich) the prophetic essay "Towards Proletarian Art" (February 1921), while Floyd Dell produced articles like "Art under the Bolsheviks" (June 1919) and a series on "Literature and the Machine Age," which ran in 1923–1924. Circulation once reached eighty thousand (compared with twenty-five thousand for the Masses) under the editorship of Eastman and Dell, but the magazine was never finally able to solve the problem that had haunted its predecessor, namely, the split between its art and its politics; the magazine "had one foot in bohemia," Freeman complained "the other in the revolutionary movement." While the Bolshevik Revolution provided a model for a society in which the two had been fused, as Freeman said, in this country by 1922 "the era of the Tired Radical had begun."

After Eastman himself left to witness the revolution in Russia in 1922, he turned the magazine over to Hugo Gellert, Claude McKay, Gold, and Freeman, who formed two boards, one political and one artistic, under the control of the Communist Party. Such an unnatural arrangement could not long survive, and in the fall of 1924 the Liberator was fused with other Communist periodicals, moved its offices to Chicago, and became the Worker's Monthly, which continued under the editorship of Robert Minor, Earl Browder, and Max Bedacht. The spirit of the Masses and the Liberator would be picked up again in 1926 when the New Masses began publication with many of the editors, writers, and artists of the Masses-Liberator tradition as contributors.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Dos Passos, John; Gellert, Hugo; Gold, Michael; Gropper, William; Masses; New Masses; Reed, John; Sacco-Vanzetti Case.]

FURTHER READING

Freeman, Joseph. An American Testament: A Narrative of Rebels and Romantics. London: Gollancz, 1938.

Klein, Marcus. Foreigners: The Making of American Literature, 1900–1940. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.

—DAVID PECK

LIBERTY BOOK CLUB/MARZANI AND MUNSELL. See Union-Sponsored Radical Films.

LILIENTHAL, META STERN (?–1948). Writing under the pen name "Hebe" or the surname of her first husband, Stern, Meta Stern Lilienthal produced scores of leaflets, short essays, and pamphlets on women and their concerns for the Socialist Party. She edited a women's page in the New Yorker Volkszeitung and a "Votes for Women" column in the New York Call, and provided an important link between the German- and English-language sectors of the socialist movement. In 1908 she served briefly on the Woman's National Committee, resigning because she believed its leadership did not sufficiently acknowledge the need for women to organize separately from men.

Born in New York City, Lilienthal grew up in a Socialist environment. Her mother, Augusta Lilienthal, had emigrated from Germany in 1861, joined the Socialist Labor Party, and wrote on woman's rights for Die Neue Zeit. Her freethinking parents provided their only daughter with a classical education, including a few years at Barnard College. Lilienthal also devoted one year to studying the major socialist texts before joining the Socialist Party. Well versed in history as well as economics, she specialized in writing short pieces of propaganda. Two lengthy pamphlets illustrate her grounding in historical materialism: From Fireside to Factory (1916) and Women of the Future (1916). In her mind, socialism nevertheless represented "something more than an economic science, or a political theory; it has become a religion, a philosophy of life."

Lilienthal continued her mother's advocacy of woman suffrage and was instrumental in directing the energies of the Socialist Party into the major New York suffrage campaigns of 1915 and 1917. She believed that suffrage was a sex, not a class, issue and encouraged the party's cooperation with mainstream groups, including the National American Woman Suffrage Association. After the ratification of the suffrage amendment to the U.S. Constitution, Lilienthal edited a short-lived "New Citizens" column in the New York Call.

After 1919 Lilienthal turned to the peace movement. She published an autobiography, Dear Remembered World (1947), focused on her New York childhood. Writing her memoirs shortly before her death, she raised for posterity her parents' ideals, which she listed as "economic security, physical well-being, and personal happiness for the great mass of mankind."

[See also New Yorker Volkszeitung; Socialist Labor Party; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism, 1870-1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.

—MARI JO BUHLE

LIPPARD, GEORGE (1822-1854). Born on a Pennsylvania-German farm, George Lippard became a popular antebellum journalist and writer of fiction who actively embraced the cause of the poor and working classes, both native and immigrant. He eventually settled in Philadelphia, relentlessly expanding his literary production and reform movement activities there until his death from tuberculosis at age thirty-two. By then he had become a radical literary celebrity and lecturer.

His most successful book, The Quaker City, or the Monks of Monk Hall (1844), depicted an urban society of frightful decadence through the central metaphor of seduction and rape. Condemned by polite circles as immoral, the book sold sixty thousand copies in 1844 alone. Lippard argued that his book exposed "all the phases of a corrupt social system."

Later works, such as New York: Its Upper Ten and Lower Million (1853) reemphasized the degeneration brought by class privilege and selfishness. Contrasting with depraved commercial values was the self-sacrificing nobility of the revolutionaries described in Washington and His Generals (1847), and beside these heroes Lippard placed, in Paul Ardenheim, the Monk of Wissahickon (1848), a type of mythical Inspirer based on the Germantown Pietists.

In 1849 Lippard launched an ambitious national workers' organization, the Brotherhood of the Union. Among its followers was Uriah Stephens, who drew on its example when founding the Knights of Labor in 1869. The Brotherhood was to champion the underdog and pariah and promote reform. It survived in various forms for over a hundred years, finally becoming an insurance cooperative.

[See also Pietist Communes in Pennsylvania.]

FURTHER READING

Lippard, George. The Quaker City, or the Monks of Monk Hall. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1995.

Mott, Frank Luther. Golden Multitudes: The Story of Best Sellers in the United States. New York: Macmillan, 1947.

Reynolds, David S. George Lippard. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Reynolds, David S., ed. George Lippard, Prophet of Protest: Writings of an American Radical, 1822-1854. New York: Peter Lang, 1986.

—JOSEPH JABLONSKI

LITERARY CRITICISM. Socialist literary criticism in the United States dates from the origins of socialist movements; the stream of book reviews and literary manifestos begins with Orestes Brownson's "American Literature" (1839) and George Lippard's reviews in the Quaker City Weekly in the 1840s, and continues through the nineteenth century. However, a distinctive body of socialist criticism does not emerge until the turn of the century along with the Debsian Socialist Party. In his Forces in American Criticism (1939), the first major Marxist history of American literary criticism, Bernard Smith points to the founding of the Comrade in 1901 and to Emma Goldman's The Social Significance of the Modern Drama (1914). Nevertheless, the founding moment for contemporary socialist literary criticism, the source of its paradigms and dilemmas, lies in the controversies of the 1930s, in large part because those debates shaped the birth of modern professional university literary criticism.

There were three main tendencies in socialist and Marxist literary writing in the Depression years. First, there were polemics and exchanges among writers and reviewers, announcing and denouncing strategies of literary production. The controversy over Mike Gold's attack on Thornton Wilder, the debates over the creation of a "proletarian literature," and the exchanges between a host of small magazines issued by the John Reed Clubs had the vitality and vitriol characteristic of literary avant-gardes. Second, there were several major attempts to write a literary history of the United States, all deeply influenced by progressive historiography, and particularly by V. L. Parrington's monumental Main Currents in American Thought. The essays of William Charvat and Granville Hicks's The Great Tradition remain perhaps the most interesting of these works. Third, there were a few scattered attempts to develop a Marxist poetics, a theory of literary form and a method of reading and interpretation, notably in the essays of Kenneth Burke.

The years of the Cold War saw the institutionalization of professional literary criticism, and the general eclipse of socialist critics. Several of the literary critics associated with the journal Science and Society were victims of the anticommunist purge of the academy. The debates among writers and reviewers about socialist writing ceased; the proletarian literature "episode" was caricatured and laid to rest. The Marxist literary histories, and indeed literary history itself, fell from favor, in the turn to the formalism of the "new criticism." There were a few attempts by socialist critics to combine this technical criticism with a historical vision, notably in the American studies tradition inaugurated by F. O. Matthiessen's American Renaissance (1940), and in the work of remaining socialists among the "New York Intellectuals," particularly Irving Howe. But for the most part, the literary criticism of the 1950s and 1960s was built around the explicit and repeated exorcism of the themes and methods of socialist and Marxist criticism.

The celebrated "takeover" of the Modern Language Association in 1968 might be taken as the inauguration of a new Left literary criticism, which increasingly found its home in the universities. In part this reflected the professionalization and academization of literary criticism and literary writing generally; in part, it was a result of the social struggles in the greatly expanded postwar university system; and in part it marked the general displacement of literary criticism among nonacademic Left cultural critics by a new critical writing about film, television, and rock music. Left literary criticism took two main directions in the 1970s and 1980s: one tendency, represented by the journal Radical Teacher and by Richard Ohmann's influential English in America (1976), contested the teaching of English in schools and colleges, criticizing the technocratic ideologies of composition instruction, the exclusions of the accepted literary canon, and the politics of established ways of reading. Allied with the emerging programs in Afro-American studies, women's studies, and ethnic studies, the work of these critics in recovering, republishing, and teaching working-class, minority, and women writers began to transform literary education in the United States and provoked one of the central cultural debates of the Reagan era, the controversy over the "canon."

The other tendency, represented by the Marxist Literary Group and by Fredric Jameson's groundbreaking Marxism and Form (1971) and The Political Unconscious (1981), introduced the literary and cultural theories of European Marxism to an American audience, developed a distinctive way of reading and interpreting literary texts, and sparked theoretical debates over culture and ideology in journals like Social Text, October, Cultural Critique, and ReThinking Marxism. This work, part of an unprecedented flowering of English-language Marxism in the two decades after 1968, reconstructed Marxist analysis of literary and film form by replacing the class analytic and realist aesthetic of earlier U.S. Marxist critics with a combination of the Frankfurt modernism of Walter Benjamin and Theodor W. Adorno, Georg Lukács's theory of reification, and Louis Althusser's account of ideology. If the Marxist criticism of the 1930s devoted its energies to literary history, that of the 1980s concentrated on literary theory and interpretation.

Though contemporary socialist literary criticism is dominated by the work of university critics, the tradition of criticism written by poets, novelists, and playwrights is powerfully incarnated in the essays of Tillie Olsen, Amiri Baraka, E. L. Doctorow, and June Jordan, among others. Unlike the university critics whose work addresses the politics of teaching literature and the place of literary scholarship in historical materialism, these essays address the relation of writers to political action, outline the genealogies of a usable past, and suggest the lineaments of a socialist aesthetic.

[See also Hicks, Granville; Howe, Irving; Matthiessen, Francis Otto; Modern Quarterly/Modern Monthly; Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s.]

FURTHER READING

- Bullock, Chris, and David Peck. Guide to Marxist Literary Criticism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1980.
 Denning, Michael. "The Special American Conditions: Marxism and American Studies." American Quarterly 38 no. 3 (1986).

- Kavanaugh, James H., and Fredric Jameson. "The Weakest Link: Marxism in Literary Studies." In The Left Academy, edited by Bertell Ollman and Edward Vernoff, vol. 2. New York: Praeger, 1984.
- Lauter, Paul, ed. Reconstructing American Literature. Old Westbury, N.Y.: Feminist Press, 1983.
- Nelson, Cary, and Lawrence Grossberg, eds. Marxism and the Interpretation of Culture. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.
- Newton, Judith, and Deborah Rosenfelt. Feminist Criticism and Social Change. New York: Methuen, 1986.

—MICHAEL DENNING

LITHUANIAN AMERICANS. The first wave of migration from Lithuania to the New World followed the widespread famines of 1867 and 1868, although individuals had immigrated to the United States as early as the seventeenth century and in greater numbers following the anti-czarist uprisings in Poland and Lithuania in 1795, 1831, and 1863. The majority of later immigrants were young peasants who fled to escape both famine and conscription into the Russian army. They crossed the border into East Prussia mostly on foot, traveled across Germany working often as farmhands, and managed, when they reached Hamburg, to book steerage travel to America.

Most Lithuanians settled first in the mining areas of Pennsylvania. Their communities soon divided into believers and secularists, known as Laisvamaniai (freethinkers). At the turn of the century, Lithuanian students and other revolutionaries fleeing czarist oppression found a fertile field for organizing among these coal miners, who had already learned some lessons about the class struggle from their Irish and Italian co-workers.

In 1878 Gazietė Lietuviška (Lithuanian Gazette) appeared in New York. Its ideology was a joint Lithuanian-Polish nationalism. It closed a year later. In 1884 Unija (Union) marked the beginning of the leftist movement among Lithuanian Americans. Between 1894 and 1898 dozens of socialist groups sprang up among Lithuanian workers in Pennsylvania, New York, and other areas of the Northeast. The groups were known as koupos (detachments); some were independent, others were loosely linked to the Socialist Labor Party. At the same time, individual Lithuanian Marxists, mostly recently arrived from Lithuania or from exile in Siberia, started to propagate socialism.

In 1904 the Lithuanian Atheist Association of America called a joint socialist conference in New York, where the delegates elected Dr. Šliupas to represent American Lithuanian workers at the Second International congress in Amsterdam, Holland. But Šliupas was not seated because the Social-Democratic Party of Lithuania objected to the representation of a "nongeographic entity." Theoretically, then, Lithuanian socialism was represented in Amsterdam by Rosa Luxemburg, who was seated as the representative of the Socialist Party of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania, although her knowledge of Lithuania was minimal.

After the 1905 revolution in Russia, large numbers of educated Lithuanian socialists arrived in the United States and a gradual crystallization of forces took place: the secular camp gradually split into a clearly socialist movement on the one hand and a liberal-bourgeois movement on the other, both confronting the clergy-led Catholic organizations. A clearly socialist publication, Kova, appeared at that time in the New York area, and another, Naujoji Gaidynė (New era), began in Pennsylvania. Kova published until the start of World War I, when it was forced to close.

The participation of Lithuanian workers in the American trade union movement was always significant. Among the twenty-one miners who were killed by sheriff's deputies during the Pennsylvania strikes in 1897 were five Lithuanians. Not only in the coal mines but also in steel (Cleveland and Pittsburgh), meat packing (Chicago), needle trades (New York), and textiles (New England), Lithuanians played a role in organizing. In the 1930s Lithuanians were prominently represented in the formation of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, especially in the automobile industry.

Politically the Lithuanian socialist movement had gradually split into right and left wings during the early 1920s with the left taking the majority. Two daily newspapers, Laisvė (Liberty) in New York and Vilnis (Surge) in Chicago, represented the movement. Many organizations came into being, the most prominent being the Lithuanian Workers Literary Society, the fraternal Lithuanian Workers Association, and the Lithuanian Art Union. The right wing of the socialist movement became increasingly conservative.

When Lithuania became incorporated into the Soviet Union in 1940, the Lithuanian American community split sharply. While the Left greeted the development, the Right saw it as a catastrophe and welcomed the Nazi conquest of Lithuania in 1941. After the defeat of Hitler's Germany, tens of thousands of Lithuanians, among them a number of Nazi collaborators, fled the returning Soviets, and many of these refugees reached the United States. The balance of political forces in the community changed dramatically: the new arrivals, sophisticated and educated, many formerly connected to the government apparatus in Lithuania, inaugurated an atmosphere of fear and quasi-terror, especially in Chicago, where the Left found itself under constant attack. By the 1960s, with both sides aging and many retiring to Florida, internecine struggles had ebbed. Laisve and Vilnis, the former Left dailies, became semiweeklies. In 1988 Laisve closed its doors.

[See also Bimba, Anthony; Communist Party, USA; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Paul. Marxism in the USA. London: Verso, 1987.

—RUDOLF BARANIK

LITTLE, FRANK (1879–1917). Hobo agitator and one-eyed rebel, Frank Little was the son of a Cherokee Indian mother and Quaker father. In 1900 he became a metal miner and joined the Western Federation of Miners (WFM). A militant direct actionist, Little left the WFM for the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in 1906. A fearless and uncompromising agitator, he was repeatedly beaten and jailed for his union-forming activities. Helping to lead numerous free-speech fights, Little later organized Japanese and Mexican agricultural and construction workers in Fresno into IWW Local 66. Little worked as a "foot-loose" organizer bringing harvesters, lumberjacks, and the metal miners into the IWW. In 1914 he was elected to the IWW's general executive board and played a critical role in the formation of the Agricultural Workers Organization and the IWW's job delegate system. In 1916 he resumed his organizing activities among miners, participating in strikes on the Mesabi Range in Minnesota and in Arizona. With a recently broken leg, he traveled to Butte, Montana, to help striking miners shortly after the Speculator Mine fire. The night after his speech, labeled a "treasonable tirade" by the press, Little was brutally murdered by six men. His killers were never identified.

Paradoxically, his murder fueled passage of state an-tisediton laws that were later used to persecute and imprison Wobblies.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; Western Federation of Miners/International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers.]

FURTHER READING

Chaplin, Ralph. Wobbly: The Rough and Tumble Story of an American Radical. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948.

—SAL SALERNO

LITTLE BLUE BOOKS. Emanuel Haldeman-Julius (1889–1951) began publication of the Little Blue Books in Girard, Kansas, soon after purchasing an interest in the Appeal to Reason in 1919. Responding to a request for inexpensive textbooks from Marian Wharton, head of the English Department of the Socialist People's College in nearby Fort Scott, Haldeman-Julius prepared a set of fifty paperbound booklets, three and a half by five inches in size, consisting of the Appeal Pocket Series and the People's Pocket Series. This collection of literary classics and socialist tracts was advertised in the Appeal at five dollars per set.

Response from subscribers was immediate and significant. Mass-production techniques had to be utilized to meet mail-order demands. As more sold, prices were lowered and series titles changed to reflect the newer prices (the Ten Cent Pocket Series, etc.). In 1923 the series became the Little Blue Books and expanded into a "University in Print," with original writings substituted for most of the reprint titles. (Shakespeare and Ingersoll were among those authors kept in print even if they did not meet the annual quota of ten thousand sales per title.) Although translations of the Greek and Roman plays (as well as other cultural titles) gave way to better-selling joke books and how-to manuals, the political integrity of the series was maintained by original contributions from W. E. B. Du Bois, Bertrand Russell, Kate Richards O'Hare, Upton Sinclair, Anna Louise Strong, Clarence Darrow, and others. Many young Left writers, such as James T. Farrell, saw their first publications under the Haldeman-Julius imprint. Haldeman-Julius published 2,203 titles in the various series. Nothing was too controversial for him to make available: from Margaret Sanger on birth control (1919) through numerous debunkers of religion and politics (strongest in the 1930s) to critics of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (1948).

[See also Appeal to Reason.]

FURTHER READING

Cothran, Andrew. "The Little Blue Book Man and the Big American Parade." Ph.D. diss., University of Maryland, 1966.

Haldeman-Julius, Emanuel. The First Hundred Million. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1928.

Johnson, Richard Colles, and G. Thomas Tanselle. "The Haldeman-Julius 'Little Blue Books' as a Bibliographical Problem." Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America 64 (1970).

—GENE DE GRUSON

LLANO COOPERATIVE COLONY. The establishment of the Llano del Rio Cooperative Colony was inspired by the vision of socialist organizer Job Harriman. Harriman, a former Socialist Labor Party candidate for governor of California and for vice president, was in 1911 the leading candidate for mayor of Los Angeles. His campaign became embroiled in the controversy over the sensational McNamara bombing trial, which ultimately led to his defeat. Disillusioned, Harriman decided that the future of socialism lay in economic organization rather than electoral politics. He and his associates bought nine thousand acres of land in Antelope Valley, north of Los Angeles, and established a cooperative community, the Llano del Rio Colony.

The Llano community was officially founded on May Day in 1914 with a small number of colonists and the promise of a $4 per day wage, an eight-hour workday, health care, and other benefits of social cooperation. On this basis, it quickly grew in numbers and range of activities. By 1917, membership had reached a thousand, two thousand acres had been put into cultivation, economic enterprises included factories, warehouses, and a hotel, and the community's publications had achieved wide circulation. However, problems began to multiply as the wage system proved unworkable, the dry climate posed difficulties for agriculture, internal conflicts developed, and surrounding ranchers became overtly hostile. It was decided to move the colony to a more hospitable site.

In October of 1917, two hundred members moved all their belongings on chartered trains to west central Louisiana, an area with a history of supporting Socialism and the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). There, the community established the New Llano Colony on twenty thousand cleared acres bought from a lumber company. In its difficult early months, the community lost almost all its members and narrowly escaped complete disaster. Thereafter, it began to grow and steadily developed into one of the most impressive communitarian experiments in U.S. history. While the socialist influence remained strong in New Llano, the majority of the new members were at most socialist sympathizers. The strongest commitment was to the practical experiment in social cooperation that the colony embodied, rather than to any larger political ideology.

The achievements of that experiment were quite impressive. At its height, the colony had six hundred members who participated in a wide range of enterprises. These eventually included a canning factory, sawmill, peanut butter factory, broom factory, ice house, print shop, sheet metal factory, laundry, bakery, hospital, hotel, theater, woodworking shop, electrical shop, machine shop, plumbing shop, blacksmith shop, service station, restaurant, library, theater, school, funeral home, wood-drying kiln, commissary, offices, and a train depot. The private homes and rooming houses were all supplied with electricity and running water. The colony produced its own timber for the sawmill and raised berries. Some of the enterprises, such as the canning factory and the ice house, did extensive business with the surrounding communities. Branches of the colony were established in Elton, Louisiana, Premon, Texas, and Gila, New Mexico, to diversify production.

In the areas of social and cultural life, there were notable advances and some serious shortcomings. Women were accepted as full-time workers in many of the community's enterprises. But although they gained free time thanks to the cooperative child care, food preparation, and other services, they bore the burden of combining full-time employment with a disproportionate share of the remaining housework. Decision-making remained primarily in the hands of males. The most notable ideological inconsistency was the exclusion of blacks from the colony. The members feared persecution by the local community if it were integrated (even though the IWW had previously, and successfully, established biracial labor organizations in central Louisiana).

The colony's educational and intellectual achievements were significant. Children went to school half a day and worked in the industries the other half. Education stressed contributions to the community, practical and intellectual skills, and independent thinking. All children were taught to play musical instruments. The community constructed a large day-care center for the younger children, an exceptional undertaking for the period. Commonwealth College, the first cooperative college in the country, had its beginning at New Llano, and the colony established the first library in the area, with five thousand volumes. It was also known for its printing and publishing activities, and became an important publisher of socialist and progressive literature.

Despite its achievements, for most of its history the Louisiana colony was plagued by internal conflict. These centered around the personality of George Pickett, the former coach, real estate agent, and insurance salesman who succeeded Harriman as leader. New Llano lost one-third of its members in 1924 when Pickett's faction defeated the followers of the ailing Harriman. Pickett's energy, ingenuity, and authoritarian style gained him a strong following but also generated a fierce opposition that rebelled against his increasingly dictatorial methods. Particularly notorious were his "Psychology Meetings," which were designed not only to discuss issues but also to discredit dissenters. Finally, in 1935, a "revolution" was staged against Pickett, and he was removed from office. The membership then split into irreconcilably hostile camps, and legal battles over control began. The colony had also come under severe stress from the Depression, which produced serious economic setbacks and a flood of destitute new members. The local elite, which was always hostile to New Llano, is thought to have influenced the courts to hand down decisions aimed at destroying the community. Continuing conflicts and unwise economic ventures finally ruined the colony, which was sold by a court in 1939 for a mere $6,600.

For decades, neighbors in the Leesville area talked admiringly about the community's accomplishments and its peaceful, hard-working members. While the Llano Colony illustrates the dangers of authoritarian leadership and factionalism, its greatest lesson is its demonstration of the impressive achievements possible for ordinary people working together in a cooperative community.

FURTHER READING

Murrah, Bill. "Llano Cooperative Colony, Louisiana." Southern Exposure 1 (1973-1974).

OTHER RESOURCE

American Utopia. Written and directed by Beverly Lewis. Firefly Productions and Louisiana Public Broadcasting, 1994. Video cassette.

—JOHN P. CLARK

LLOYD, HENRY DEMAREST (1847-1903). A dedicated activist-writer throughout the Gilded Age, Henry Demarest Lloyd was a lawyer by training but a journalist by choice. The archetypal American muckraker, he attacked the evils of oligopoly in articles, speeches, and books for over thirty years. He was also a champion of organized labor and applied socialism, and the main spokesman for the National People's Party, an early populist coalition. As both a publicist and an intellectual, Lloyd was a principal precursor of the Progressive era.

After becoming financial editor of the Chicago Tribune in 1874—and marrying Jessie Bross, daughter of the Tribune's main owner—he documented the corruption and violence of the Standard Oil Company, and called for federal regulation of the railroads, then the vital force in American capitalism's rapid growth. Eventually, his political differences with the paper's owners led to his resignation, but his wife's wealth allowed him to continue his reform work. In 1886, he became deeply involved in the case of the Haymarket anarchists, and subsequently led their clemency campaign.

Throughout the 1890s, Lloyd wrote books on labor, monopoly, and economic alternatives. His magnum opus, Wealth against Commonwealth (1894), was the first well-documented exposé of a monopoly—Standard Oil. It was also an indictment of capitalist abuses in general and an argument for radical reform based on freedom, love, and community values. His vision of social change stressed true fellowship in a new industrial democracy, "nothing so narrow as the mere governmentalizing of the means and processes of production," but instead a spiritually-based socialism.

His conclusions eventually led him to search the world for practical solutions. After touring cooperatives in Great Britain, he wrote Labor Copartnership (1898). After visits to New Zealand and Australia, he produced two reports on social democracy, A Country without Strikes (1900) and Newest England (1900). Even after his health failed, he jumped into the 1902 anthracite coal strike, serving with Clarence Darrow as counsel for the United Mine Workers and arguing before a presidential commission. He died in 1903 while leading a Chicago campaign for municipal ownership of street railways.

As America's first muckraker, Lloyd opened the way for advocacy in journalism, combining his core belief in democratic values with sincere outrage, thorough reporting, and sharp perceptions. Rather than just observing, he also participated, acting on his beliefs and searching for solutions. Despite his radicalism, he was widely accepted in liberal church circles and among the emerging middle class, while simultaneously influencing the direction of American socialism.

—ROBIN LLOYD

LOCAL 1199, RETAIL, WHOLESALE AND DEPARTMENT STORE UNION. Drug, Hospital, and Health Care Employees Union Local 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union (RWDSU) has experienced a complicated political and organizational history. Founded in 1932 as the Retail Drug Employees Union, Local 1199 emerged out of the efforts of Jewish Communists linked to the Communist Party's Trade Union Unity League to organize New York City drugstores on an "industrial union" model. Combining pharmacists, clerks, soda men, and porters in one organization, the drugstore union also prioritized the goal of equal opportunity for blacks within the pharmaceutical industry, waging significant campaigns on behalf of the employment of black pharmacists in Harlem in the late thirties and early forties. From its earliest days, a key figure in the union's development was its general organizer and president since 1934, Leon Julius Davis, the son of religious Jews from Pinsk, Russia, who had emigrated to the United States in 1921 at the age of fifteen.

While Local 1199 had achieved considerable organizing successes by the early 1950s (signing up over half the independent drug-stores in the city and winning a banner forty-hour-week contract from Whelan's, the industry's biggest firm in 1953), the local, which had participated in the formation of the Congress of Industrial Organizations' RWDSU coalition in 1938, was temporarily besieged by pressures from the postwar Red Scare. Forced out of the Congress of Industrial Organizations in 1949, a year later Local 1199 sought protection in the alliance of left-wing locals grouped under Arthur Osman's Distributive, Processing, and Office Workers of America, before eventually returning to the RWDSU (along with Osman's District 65, Wholesale and Warehouse Workers) in 1954. With a stable but restricted jurisdiction in the area's drugstores, Local 1199 membership by the mid-fifties had peaked at six thousand members.

Its next big move began in 1957–1958 when drug-store union leaders in concert with Elliott Godoff, a left-wing castoff from the Teamsters Union, initiated a campaign in the city's voluntary, nonprofit hospitals. After an initial victory at Montefiore Hospital in the Bronx in 1958, Local 1199, Drug and Hospital Employees Union, quickly found itself leading a full-fledged crusade among the "forgotten"—and overwhelmingly black and Hispanic and female—hospital service workers. A forty-six day strike in 1959 at seven metropolitan hospitals highlighted the plight of a work force unprotected by national labor and welfare legislation and earning less than poverty-level wages. Although stopping short of outright recognition, the 1959 settlement provided a crucial foot in the door for a rank-and-file union presence, and through persistent pressure, the union was able to secure legal rights to collective bargaining from Governor Nelson Rockefeller and the state legislature in 1963. A $100-per-week minimum contract in 1968 highlighted the consolidation of the union's strength in the metropolitan area. A year later, a summons from beleaguered nurses' aides in Charleston, South Carolina, would launch the hospital workers' into an expanded organizing drive, formalized in the creation of the National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees in 1973.

Throughout its history, Local 1199 and the national union it spawned have set an example of political commitment rare on the American labor scene. While 1199 leaders by the early 1950s had largely abandoned ties to the Communist Party, the Left culture in which many of them had matured continued to make an impact. From the beginning, for example, hospital organization was closely and self-consciously tied to the pace of the civil rights movement.

Bayard Rustin, A. Philip Randolph, and especially the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference acted as close allies in 1199 organizing drives. Likewise, 1199 was the first union to protest U.S. involvement in Vietnam. Later the union actively inserted itself in actions against South African apartheid and American involvement in Central America. As late as 1988, the National Union had become the first in the country formally to endorse the presidential campaign of the Reverend Jesse Jackson.

With the retirement of president Leon Davis in 1982, however, the union encountered a major internal crisis of succession. A failed merger attempt with the Service Employees International Union and hostility between New York district president Doris Turner and National Union leaders touched off several years of bitter racial tension and factional infighting. So inflamed were relations that in 1984 the 1199 National Union formally separated from both the RWDSU and New York Local 1199 (which remained within the international union), although even this settlement did not end conflicting claims to authority within the New York organization.

The union's leadership crisis, which had taken an exceptional toll since the 1980s, was decisively resolved with the election of Puerto Rican-born Dennis Rivera to the presidency in 1989. Effectively reuniting the union's left-wing old guard with minority rank-and-file constituencies, Rivera, a self-described socialist, demonstrated a shrewd grasp of politics. He was able to influence specific congressional elections, maintain a warm alliance with Democratic mayor David Dinkins, and establish good relations with the Catholic archdiocese. Refocusing the union's organizational resources, Rivera presided over two modest breakthroughs: chartering some ten-thousand-plus home care workers as union members and winning a "job security" contract in 1992 which promised retraining for laid-off workers. At the same time, the union resurrected its cultural program through the Bread Roses Women of Hope poster series, which adorned subway walls and bus shelters with images and words of women such as Sojourner Truth, Dolores Huerta, and Toni Morrison. Local 1199 definitely had shaken itself out of its doldrums by the time its founder, Leon Davis, died in September 1992.

The union's inner calm was restored as its national relationships soured. A battle with the union's parent RWDSU led to secession in 1991, a move that isolated Local 1199 from the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO). This relationship was not restored until the election of John Sweeney as new AFL-CIO president in 1995. At that time, the now 117,000-strong Local 1199 got its own charter from the AFL-CIO as an independent entity. One of its first moves was to rejoin the powerful New York City Central Labor Council. Although involved in an industry under severe restructuring that entailed job cuts and job redefinition, Local 1199 fared relatively well. Using a variety of attacks, including massive rallies in Times Square and one-day work stoppages, the union was able to win most of its strikes and organizing campaigns. Local 1199 was able to raise its wage/benefit packages for its members during a period when a rival New York union dealing with the same industry suffered cutbacks in its wage/benefits packages. Rivera also proved effective in his mass media appearances and encouraged intellectual debates on how labor could regain its former influence.

FURTHER READING

Fink, Leon, and Leon Greenberg. Union Upheaval in the Quiet Zone: A History of the Hospital Workers, Local 1199. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989.

—LEON FINK

LOCAL 9, PACKINGHOUSE WORKERS.

Representing workers at the George A. Hormel plant in Austin, Minnesota, Packinghouse Workers Local 9—familiarily referred to as Local P-9—occupies an important place in twentieth-century labor history. In the 1930s Austin unionists played a major role in the organization of midwestern packinghouses. First in the Independent Union of All Workers (IUAW), and later as part of the Packinghouse Workers Organizing Committee of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), Austin activists helped packinghouse workers form viable unions across the Upper Midwest. More recently, Local 9 (now affiliated with the United Food and Commercial Workers) emerged at the forefront of the nationwide fight against concessions. Spurred by wage cuts and new managerial policies, Hormel workers engaged in a protracted but ultimately unsuccessful strike in 1985–1986. Despite its defeat, the strike was significant, for it was carried on in open defiance of the international union and the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO).

Cartoon by Mike Konopacki, 1986.

The IUAW emerged suddenly in the summer of 1933, following a brief work stoppage in the hog-killing department at the Hormel plant. Organized by Frank Ellis, a former member of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), the fledgling union gained recognition after a successful sit-down strike in November 1933. Influenced by the IWW's "One Big Union" concept, the IUAW quickly expanded beyond the Hormel packinghouse. In Austin and in the nearby town of Albert Lea, the IUAW organized workers in restaurants, taverns, hotels, garages, retail stores, dairies, lumberyards, and small factories. Much of this expansion was sparked by Eva Sauer, a retail clerk who became a full-time IUAW organizer in 1934. Using demonstrations, strikes, consumer boycotts, and, when necessary, the massive presence of unionists from the Hormel plant, the IUAW built a solid regional organization within a few short years.

Although its organizing activities were broad ranging, the outstanding feature of the IUAW was its effort to assist packinghouse workers in the formation of unions elsewhere in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, and the Dakotas. Constrained by limited funds and ferocious resistance by the packing companies, these efforts met with only partial success. Nonetheless, the nuclei created by the IUAW in many midwestern plants provided the entrée for the CIO when it moved into the meat-packing industry in 1937. Moreover, the IUAW's activities left an indelible mark on the character of packinghouse unionism. The industrial unions they helped found derived their strength from rank-and-file mobilization and powerful shop floor organization, defining characteristics of the future United Packinghouse Workers of America, the dominant union in the meat-packing industry through the 1950s.

In the early 1940s, Local 9 and the Hormel Company agreed on an innovative system of profit sharing. Under its terms, Hormel workers became the highest-paid packinghouse workers in the country. For more than three decades, relative industrial peace prevailed in Austin. Beginning in the late 1970s, however, new managerial policies started to erode Hormel workers' job security. In 1985, faced with company demands for further concessions, Hormel workers went out on strike. The ensuing conflict, which lasted ten months, involved such tactics as a corporate campaign against Hormel and the First Bank of Minnesota, civil disobedience, and a national boycott of Hormel products. It also divided the labor movement, pitting rank-and-file activists against union officials in a number of international unions. A widespread support network allowed the local to continue its strike despite the intervention of the National Guard, the company's recruitment of replacement workers, and the opposition of the AFL-CIO bureaucracy. The strike ended in May 1986, when the United Food and Commercial Workers placed the Hormel local in trusteeship and signed a back-to-work agreement with the company.

FURTHER READING

- Blum, Fred. Toward a Democratic Work Process: The Hormel Packing-House Workers Experiment. New York: Harper, 1953.
- Englemann, Larry. "'We Were the Poor People': The Hormel Strike of 1933." Labor History 12 (fall 1971).
- Halstead, Fred. The 1985-1986 Hormel Meat-Packers Strike in Austin, Minnesota. New York: Pathfinder, 1986.

—RICK HALPERN

LONDON, JACK (1876-1916). Born in Oakland, California, the bastard son of William Henry Chaney, an itinerant astrologer, and Flora Wellman, a spiritualist mother, Jack London—he acquired the surname when his mother married his stepfather, John London—was raised in poverty along the docks of the Bay Area. At age fourteen he acquired a small sailboat and soon began to raid the lucrative oyster beds that lay just offshore but were owned by the railroad interests. Following several close brushes with the police, he gave up pirating and headed for Alaska to participate in the gold rush. After a year of unsuccessful panning for gold, he returned to Oakland and began to write the stories of the North that would make him famous.

Journal cover announcing London short story, 1917.

During the winter of 1900, Jack London wrote The Call of the Wild. Published by Houghton-Mifflin the following year, it was the nation's best-selling work of fiction. From that point until the end of his life, London was one of the most widely read writers in the world. Since his death, his best-known works have remained in print in several languages.

Although London's "dog stories" made him famous, his articles, essays, short stories, and novels about the dreadful social conditions throughout the world made him important and somewhat notorious. An avowed socialist from his early teens, London was an ardent supporter of industrial unions and a fierce foe of corruption in government and the power of monopolies. He lectured across the nation on the evils of an economic system that kept almost half the citizenry impoverished at all times. Novels such as

People of the Abyss, about the underclass in London, and The Iron Heel, a prophetic account of the rise of a fascist state, directly affected the way people looked at the world. London was also instrumental in getting Upton Sinclair's The Jungle published, a book that changed forever the American government's role in protecting its citizens from corporate abuse.

Throughout his life London continued to champion the cause of social justice and corporate accountability. The one major inconsistency in his thought was his prejudice against Orientals. At the time of his premature death, he had drifted away from the Socialist Party but he remained an avid admirer of Big Bill Haywood. London's lean prose was greatly admired by the rank and file of the Industrial Workers of the World, and his scathing comic definition of a scab was featured in many of the union's publications and songbooks. Following the October Revolution, London became (as he would always remain) the most widely read American author in the Soviet Union.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Labor, Earle, et al., eds. Letters of Jack London. 3 vols. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1988.
- London, Jack. Jack London, American Rebel: A Collection of his Social Writings. Edited and introduced by Philip S. Foner. New York: Citadel Press, 1947.
- London, Jack. Essays of Revolt. Edited and introduced by Leonard D. Abbott. New York: Vanguard Press, 1926.
- London, Joan. Jack London and His Daughters. San Bernardino, Calif.: Borgo Press, 1995.
- Sinclair, Andrew. Jack: A Biography of Jack London. New York: Harper and Row, 1977.

—CHUCK PORTZ

LONDON, MEYER (1871–1926). Trade union lawyer and Socialist congressman, Meyer London favored peaceful and evolutionary methods to achieve the cooperative commonwealth. "As a Socialist," London declared, "instead of denying the existence of the class struggle, I seek to minimize its bitterness."

London was born in Russia and emigrated to New York's Lower East Side in 1891, where his father had published the first radical Jewish newspaper in America. Preferring action to words, he opted for a legal career. Joining first the Socialist Labor Party, London quickly switched over to the new Socialist Party, attracted by its working-class roots and American leadership.

As a lawyer, London's most significant achievement came as counsel to striking cloak-makers in 1910. For eight weeks, fifty thousand workers stayed away from their machines, while London negotiated with the employers and mediator Louis Brandeis. The resulting agreement, known as the Protocol, created a mechanism for resolving labor grievances without resorting to strikes. In 1912 London handled the legal work during the twelve-week strike of seven thousand furriers and again emerged victorious.

With strong trade union support, London defeated the incumbent Democratic congressman from the Lower East Side in 1914, making him only the second Socialist representative ever to sit in the House and the first from the East Coast. He won reelection in 1916. London championed numerous social welfare measures, but his major activity during his first term was vehement opposition to the Wilson administration's preparedness program. He voted against the declarations of war against Germany and Austria-Hungary.

London's positions after April 1917 antagonized both the extreme Right and the extreme Left. He opposed the conscription law and the Espionage and Sedition acts, stands that "one-hundred percent American" groups considered treasonous. Similarly, left-wing Socialists were infuriated by London's decision not to vote against military appropriations and financing bills, but merely to be recorded as "present." Citing his "duty" to American soldiers to "provide them with everything they need," London appealed to his fellow Socialists for "common sense in their attitude in this great crisis of the world." But many radicals believed London had betrayed the Saint Louis Platform declaration to resist all wartime activity; they were further incensed by his efforts to keep Russia in the war and his criticism of the Brest-Litovsk treaty. London's opposition to Allied intervention in Russia did not appease them. The congressman also faced attacks from Zionist organizations upset by his refusal to endorse a Jewish homeland in Palestine. With the Democrats and Republicans united behind a single "patriotic" candidate, the Socialists split, and the Zionists hostile, London lost his seat in November 1918.

Two years later, London recaptured his place in Congress. He fought unsuccessfully against the tariff and tax policies of the Harding administration, but did gain passage of the first law sponsored by a Socialist congressman: a measure giving greater protection to workers of bankrupt firms. Gerrymandering of his district's boundaries made reelection in 1922 an impossibility, and London never again held public office.

[See also Lower East Side, New York City; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Frieberger, William Joseph, "The Lone Socialist Vote: A Political Study of Meyer London." Ph.D. diss., University of Cincinnati, 1980.

Goldberg, Gordon Jerome, "Meyer London: A Political Biography." Ph.D. diss., Lehigh University, 1971.

Rogoff, Harry. An East Side Epic. New York: Vanguard Press, 1930.

—MARK I. GELFAND

LORE, LUDWIG (1875–1942). The last leading editor of the influential New Yorker Volkszeitung and a precocious formulator of pluralistic or polycentric Communism, Ludwig Lore stands out as a most unique figure bridging eras of American left-wing activity. Born to Jewish parents in Friedberg, Germany, Lore graduated from Berlin University and, a committed socialist, worked in the textile industry until emigrating to the United States in 1903. Originally connected with the Industrial Workers of the World, he established himself within the Socialist Party as a New York journalist and supporter of the party's Left. He felt especially drawn to Leon Trotsky during the latter's sojourn to the United States, and characteristically retained a sense of personal loyalty to the Russian leader even when it had become politically unpopular.

But Lore could in no matter be described as a Leninist or Trotskyist. An early enthusiast of the Russian Revolution, he served as coeditor (with Louis Fraina and L. B. Boudin) of the Class Struggle, a pro-Bolshevik monthly (1917–1919), whose pages remained open to eclectic contributions. Meanwhile, Lore's own base of support, German Americans for the most part at least a generation older than himself, looked to him for intellectual and cultural leadership. He guided the Volkszeitung into advanced middle age with political dignity and literary style. Executive secretary of the German Socialist Federation, he sought to steer a course between reform socialism and hyper-Bolshevism. After some hesitation, he personally led his troops into the Communist movement.

Within 1920s Communism, Lore remained a rare independent spirit, alternatively pursued and shunned by various factions. His Volkszeitung adopted an independent editorial policy, or rather retained its independence of pre-Communist days along with its high literary quality. Repeatedly attacked for "Trotskyism," Lore found himself expelled, through Party manipulation of the German Federation leadership, in 1925. He and the Volkszeitung departed with their support virtually intact—a feat not accomplished again until the departure of the Yiddish Morgen Freiheit from the Communist movement nearly a half-century later. Due in no small part to his leadership, the paper survived, as a progressive weekly, to see the defeat of Nazism. By the 1930s, Lore himself left the Volkszeitung to write an influential daily column for the New York Post. According to testimony, possibly falsified, released by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Lore also conducted intelligence activity for the Soviet Union, naming Whittaker Chambers as a fellow operative.

[See also German Americans; New Yorker Volkszeitung.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Paul. "Ludwig Lore and the New Yorker Volkszeitung." In The German Radical Press in America, edited by Ken Fones-Wolf and Elliott Shore. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990.

Draper, Theodore. American Communism and Soviet Russia. New York: Viking Press, 1960.

—PAUL BUHLE

LOS ANGELES COUNCIL, CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS. Los Angeles was the largest city in the nation to have a Communist Party-guided Industrial Union Council. The Committee for Industrial Organization (later to become the Congress of Industrial Organizations; CIO) caught the imagination of Depression-era Angelenos early in 1937 when workers at Douglas Aircraft in Santa Monica responded to the firings of supporters of the United Automobile Workers (UAW) by conducting a sit-down strike. Workers at Northrop Aircraft soon adopted the tactic to gain union recognition. Aid for the sit-down strikes came from a number of quarters, including the longshoremen at San Pedro and garment workers in Los Angeles. Bill Busick of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU) led the two strikes as the leader of the informal collection of CIO-allied unions; he went on to serve as chairman of the formal organizing committee. A former pamphleteer and soapbox orator who had run for assemblyman on the Socialist party ticket, Busick had the distinction of being bailed out of jail by Upton Sinclair. Later in the year when the Central Labor Council of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) expelled unions whose internationals were loyal to John L. Lewis's Committee for Industrial Organization, the insurgent unionists were free to form the Los Angeles CIO Council. Before long, the council came under the control of unionists affiliated with or friendly to the Communist Party, at least partially as a result of Lewis's appointment of Harry Bridges as CIO director for the western states. The withdrawal from the CIO of the ILGWU removed any significant Left opposition to the Party within the council.

The person most closely associated with the council was Philip "Slim" Connelly, an Irishman who served as chief executive officer from 1939 to 1949. An editorial writer with the Los Angeles Herald-Express, Connelly led his fellow workers in obtaining the first contract between a Los Angeles-area newspaper and the Newspaper Guild. Elected president of the local in early 1938, Connelly soon became a Guild international vice president. Shortly afterwards, Connelly was elected president of the California State Industrial Union Council. In 1939, Connelly gave up his positions with the Guild to become the full-time secretary for the Los Angeles CIO Council. (Connelly replaced UAW West Coast director Lew Michener, who resigned to focus on organizing the aircraft industry). Connelly's assistant for much of this time was Oscar Fuss, who held a number of political and legislative posts. The son of Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe, Fuss initially directed the Workers Alliance in Los Angeles, where he organized workers in the Works Progress Administration, the unemployed, and seasonal farmworkers.

The council came to represent 100,000 workers, three-quarters of whom were in four basic industries: automobile, airplane, steel and rubber. During World War II, CIO shipbuilding expanded rapidly. The only industry unique to Los Angeles was film, and the ten-thousand-member CIO Conference of Studio Unions was an important force until its defeat during the 1945–1946 Hollywood strike and lockout. Longshoremen, while never numbering more than three thousand, always played a disproportionate role in the organization, as did a number of smaller but militant unions: the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packinghouse and Allied Workers of America merged with the Food, Tobacco, Agricultural and Allied Workers Union, the United Furniture Workers, the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers and the warehousemen within the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.

In 1937, Los Angeles was still the citadel of the Open Shop, with political and economic power concentrated in the hands of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Los Angeles Times. Channeling the energy of newly empowered workers, the CIO helped to modify the dominant political culture by replacing anti-labor politicians with supporters. The Los Angeles CIO Council played a leading role in the 1938 elections of the progressive Culbert Olson as governor and Fletcher Bowron as mayor; the 1939 election of a new city council majority; and the 1940 defeat of the anti-labor district attorney. The CIO Council's relationship with liberal politicians (as with liberal activists) deteriorated rapidly following the signing of the Hitler-Stalin Pact. The council broke with Franklin D. Roosevelt and Governor Olson over the need for war preparations and helped organize an opposition slate to the 1942 Democratic National Convention (which lost badly at the polls).

One of the council's most important achievements was the creation of a progressive culture that revolved around events in the block-long, three-story CIO building. Dances, forums, and rallies were combined with regular union meetings, leafleting and picketing, and meetings with visiting labor leaders. There were also parades, fund-raisers, and campaigns to defend Harry Bridges and other activists facing deportation. One of the most effective organizing tactics was the "dawn patrol," whereby activists would leaflet a targeted factory as the first shift came to work. The CIO created its own communication network. The council sponsored a fifteen-minute daily radio program, Our Daily Bread, and union members received a weekly Southern California edition of the state CIO's Labor Herald. When the situation called for urgent communication or a mass mobilization, activists distributed tens of thousands of flyers to workers as they changed shifts.

The council moved early on to incorporate Latinos and African Americans into the union movement. According to James Daugherty, then organizing in the all-white utility industry, Connelly during a meeting in 1939 urged labor leaders to pressure employers to hire more minority workers. Latinos and African Americans also obtained positions of prominence in the CIO Council and affiliated locals, particularly leftist unions with a significant minority membership.

Latinos, most of whom had arrived following the start of the Mexican Revolution in 1910, were the largest minority group in Los Angeles, numbering roughly 250,000. Frank Lopez was the most prominent Latino in the council. Elected council vice president in 1938, he was a liaison to the Spanish Speaking Congress and worked for a number of unions, principally the Furniture Workers and the UE. Other Latino leaders were Bert Corona, elected president of the ILWU Warehouse Workers Local 26, and chair of the council's Committee to Aid Mexican Workers. Guatemalan-born Luisa Moreno, who organized local cannery workers, became an international vice president of the FTA and vice president of the California CIO Council.

African Americans were also early members of the CIO. Beginning in the late 1930s the council worked with the National Negro Congress and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The local black population doubled to 150,000 during World War II. Many faced job discrimination and a severe shortage in housing, and became a special focus of the CIO's civil rights agenda and labor organization. Top African American CIO leaders included California CIO vice president Revels Clayton (National Maritime Union) and Assemblyman Augustus Hawkins (Shipbuilders), who served as the first legislative director under the CIO's statewide political action committee. The council also worked very closely with Charlotta Bass, publisher of the California Eagle.

The racial-ethnic angle was also key to a number of successful CIO organizing drives. At Wilson and Company, the last of the Big Four packinghouses to be organized, African American workers were recruited by Revels Clayton. Refugio Martinez, an international organizer for the Packinghouse Workers, focused on Mexican Americans.

The CIO Council also formed a number of antidiscrimination and minority committees, and encouraged its affiliates to negotiate nondiscrimination clauses in union contracts, promote minorities on the job and within the union, and to coalesce with community groups. Highlights of the council's focus on civil rights include the Sleepy Lagoon Defense Committee, in which a number of CIO leaders played prominent roles (including Mexican American UE staffer Joe Marty, who preceded Carey McWilliams as the group's chair). The CIO also took the lead in opening up wartime public housing and defense jobs for African Americans and in protesting discriminatory hiring practices by the municipal railway.

In the spring of 1947, Connelly and the council lent their prestige to the formation of a local chapter of the American Jewish Labor Council and its Conference to Combat Anti-Semitism, which sought to reach out to the area's 200,000 Jews. The council did not formally "endorse" the group, however, due to the recent edict that councils not support organizations unless they were first approved by the national CIO; Phil Murray and top CIO officers backed the rival Jewish Labor Committee, which was a member of the competing Socialist-ILGWU-Workmen's Circle-Forward milieu. Conference participants reflected the dissolving Popular Front milieu, and included Dr. Sanford Goldner, chapter chair; Louis Schwartz, News Venders Union Local 75; Elinor Grennard, United Public Workers; Brother Schaffer, Morning Freiheit Association; Saul Berisky, Jewish People's Fraternal Order; and James Rantauzzo, Progressive Citizens of America.

With the Republican-led Congress's passage of the Taft-Hartley Act in the summer of 1947, the council went on record supporting a one-day national strike. The CIO then mobilized its membership for the annual Labor Day parade. According to conservative estimates, the CIO turned out forty-five thousand marchers—fully half of its membership. In contrast, the AFL turned out fifty thousand of its claimed half-million membership.

The council sought to protect recently hired minority workers who were vulnerable to layoffs with the transition to a peacetime economy. The council backed unsuccessful efforts to enact a Permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission in Congress, in the California Legislature, and via a statewide voter initiative. The council focused on local strategies. In urging attendance at a 1948 council-sponsored Leadership School on "How to Fight Discrimination," Connelly wrote, "[Union] delegations will be most effective if they include both the so-called 'white' leaders as well as those who may be Negro or Mexican or Japanese, or of some other minority." And perhaps setting the precedent for the establishment of affirmative action twenty-five years later, a conference committee recommended that "locals consider special seniority adjustments for minority workers such as that granted veterans" in light of the fact that "minority workers have little seniority because they have been employed in most plants only since the needs of the war broke down the door to their employment."

Council leaders became vulnerable to the shifting balance of power within the national CIO because of their high-profile support for third-party presidential candidate Henry Wallace and opposition to the Marshall Plan to provide economic aid to non-Communist Europe. While the council did not formally oppose the positions adopted by the national CIO, it refused to ratify them. This gave opponents (led by the Steelworkers and backed by the UAW, the United Railroad Workers, and the national CIO-appointed CIO regional director) the opportunity to marshal their forces to take control of the Los Angeles council. Connelly's marriage to Southern California Communist Party head Dorothy Healey symbolized the relationship between the Party and the council. In a special high-stakes election with all CIO locals participating, Connelly failed to obtain majority support, and in 1949 the Left lost control of the organization. In 1950, in conjunction with the national CIO's purge of international unions with links to the Communist Party, the parent body revoked the charter of Los Angeles CIO Council as well as that of the California CIO Council.

The rechartered and reorganized Greater Los Angeles CIO Council continued until 1958 when it merged with several local AFL Central Labor Councils to form the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, AFL-CIO. Connelly returned to journalism, editing the People's World. Along with Healey, he was a defendant in the 1952 California Smith Act Trials.

FURTHER READING

- Burt, Kenneth C. "Changing of the Guard: Latinos and Labor in Los Angeles, 1948–1952. Labor's Heritage (forthcoming).
- Healey, Dorothy Ray, and Maurice Isserman. California Red. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.
- Robert H. Zieger, The CIO, 1935–1955. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

—KENNETH C. BURT

LOVESTONEITES. The term "Lovestoneites" is a designation for the "Right Opposition" led in the United States by Jay Lovestone from the time of their collective expulsion from the Communist Party in 1928 to their formal dissolution in 1941. Not a movement like Trotskyism or Maoism, the Lovestoneites distinguished themselves in two regards. First and foremost, their highly placed union connections gave them disproportionate influence in the needle trades and, indirectly, among automobile workers. Their small but vital intellectual following produced work of high quality, if nominal influence within the Left. As unionists and authors after 1940, they also made a significant impact as Cold War operatives.

Jay Lovestone was born 1898 in Lithuania and emigrated to the United States in 1907. He emerged from City College of New York as leader of the Socialist Club, both articulate and fanatically devoted to the extreme wing of Russian Revolution supporters who favored an "underground" organization. He edited, from the "underground," the Communist, noted for its shrillness and factionalism. By the middle 1920s, Lovestone became the chief lieutenant of Charles E. Ruthenberg, whose factional strength centered in the needle trades—that is, among New York Jews. Upon Ruthenberg's death, Lovestone reached his highest office, deputy secretary-general of the workers (Communist) Party, from which post he directed the expulsion of real and suspected Trotskyists.

Moving from extreme left to right within the Communist spectrum, Lovestone became the foremost proponent of "American Exceptionalism." According to this perspective, little could be expected from a largely corrupted American population, in the midst of imperialist-laden prosperity, but Communists could cultivate trade union contacts and non-Communist intellectuals. This perspective had the considerable virtue of encouraging a rethinking of Communist policies in a more open fashion, and permitting a hitherto unacceptable latitude in work with non-Communist intellectuals and activists. Thus Bertram Wolfe, Lovestone's ideological aide, led the Party's Workers School into a period of near amity with a variety of Marxist intellectuals; meanwhile Charles (Sasha) Zimmerman, leading figure of International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU) Local 22, sought to apply a policy of stabilization to the generally hectic Communist union politics.

Lovestone's support for Nikolai Bukharin, proponent of "Right" policies within the Comintern, cost him and his followers leadership of the Party in 1929, following a confrontation in Moscow with Joseph Stalin. Expelled, the dissident Communist Party (Majority), so called, actually took only a few hundred members along, but these included Zimmerman and Wolfe. Throughout the early to mid-1930s, the Communist Party Opposition urged internal reform of the Soviet Union while defending the Russian regime's socialist bona fides from capitalist and Trotskyist criticism. Meanwhile, ILGWU Local 22 became for a time the largest single union local in America, and Lovestone along with his supporters found themselves in steady alliance with ILGWU leader David Dubinsky and the aging but still-vital Yiddish-speaking anarchist faction. Lovestone himself evolved an institutional-syndicalist formula similar to that of earlier pro-American Federation of Labor (AFL) anarchists, "everything in and through the unions." Local 22, indeed, conducted an extraordinarily vigorous educational and leisure apparatus, almost rivaling that of the Socialist or Communist movements. Individual Communists, often vigorously in opposition to Zimmerman's policies, for critical periods of the 1930s–1940s supported the Zimmerman leadership.

Meanwhile, the Lovestoneite organ Revolutionary Age, later renamed Workers Age, became the most literate of the Marxist weeklies in the United States. Bertram Wolfe and Will Herberg (later to become a conservative theologian), among a small crew of others, wrote intelligently on politics, economics, culture, and science. Taking a middle position between Trotskyists and Communist regulars, the Lovestoneites sought to support positive developments in the Soviet Union while increasingly committing themselves to criticisms of bureaucracy. The New Workers School, directed by Wolfe, sought to continue the more open atmosphere of the 1920s efforts and incorporate more Marxism than the increasingly social democratic Rand School.

The Lovestoneites, however, established no significant recruitment either among workers or intellectuals. Like the Trotskyists, they established contacts (some would say "spies") in Socialist Party youth circles of the middle 1930s, most notably in the Revolutionary Policy Committee. Individual Lovestoneites found themselves at the helm of new union locals, but the Lovestoneites lacked a messianic international figure like Trotsky and a grand strategy such as the formation of a new International. Under the guidance of Lovestone, moreover, they seemed to prefer maneuver among leaders over public appeals for their own cause and organization. Revolutionary Age/Workers Age never found its audience beyond "insiders." Nor did Lovestone, Wolfe, Herberg, and the small handful of others distinguish themselves as public intellectuals until they had broken entirely with the Left.

The Moscow trials and the Spanish Civil War, but also the changing character of American trade unionism, turned the Lovestoneites in a conservative direction. Growing disbelief in the guilt of the defendants in the trials crystallized into a complete hostility to Stalin's leadership. Support for the Spanish Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista (Workers Party of Marxist Unification), previously aligned with the thin international stratum of Bukharin supporters (Germany's Heinrich Brandler the most distinguished, with the Indian leader M. N. Roy a close second), reinforced this drift.

Lovestone's own alliance with the AFL against the new Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) had a more immediate practical effect upon Lovestoneite activity. Dubinsky, fanatically anticommunist but also deeply resentful of the wide influence exerted by his former mentor, Sidney Hillman, bitterly opposed CIO influence within the needle trades and in its organs, and he often denounced Communist influence on the CIO. With Dubinsky's cooperation, Lovestone therefore placed his personal operatives with Homer Martin, erratic factional leader of the young United Auto Workers, and guided Martin in his group's withdrawal from the CIO union into an avowedly anticommunist (and essentially racist) AFL affiliate.

By 1941, the Lovestoneites (by this time renamed the International Labor League of America) announced dissolution—a virtually unknown act in the Left. While urging members to join the fast-fading Socialist Party, the leadership had set itself upon a more severe path. Lovestone, along with his lieutenant Irving Brown, moved into the highly placed Free Trade Union Committee (FTUC), originally established to aid European unionists but reorganized as the AFL's anticommunist organ overseas. Working in close concert with the U.S. State Department and Central Intelligence Agency, the FTUC (and later, in a combined AFL-CIO, the International Department) became the bastion of anticommunism within American labor officialdom. Lovestone, intimately close to George Meany and for decades author of his foreign-policy papers, also edited Free Trade Union News. In an important sense the personal architect of interventionist trade union policy, Lovestone facilitated the entanglement of the American "New Right" and the AFL-CIO leadership, whose American Institute for Free Labor Development and other regional equivalents received substantial funds from private conservative sources and the National Endowment for Democracy. In essence, Lovestone had established an intelligence community beachhead within labor for such successors, within the AFL-CIO leadership, as Meany's adviser Max Shachtman (architect of AFL-CIO support for the Vietnam War) and teacher's union president Albert Shanker (foremost international neoconservative union leader of the 1980s). Charles Zimmerman, in his later years, was chair of Social Democrats USA, a socialist split with highly placed representatives and allies in the Reagan administration's foreign policy apparatus.

Bertram Wolfe, himself in later years established at the Hoover Institution, much-touted "think tank" of the "Reagan Revolution," played a similar if considerably less significant role in Russian studies. His notable Three Who Made a Revolution, the most scholarly of the early anticommunist studies, may be said to have disappeared among the flock of post-1960s works of varying ideological character.

The collapse of the Soviet Union in 1989 brought a final chapter to the Lovestone saga. The impact of the Lovestone group's working within the AFL-CIO and spending tens of millions of dollars had had scarce influence on the collapse of Communism. Nor did their affiliates successfully displace former government-guided and now independent Communist unions. But the very intensity of this effort, combined with a relative indifference to the steady AFL-CIO decline at home, fed the rift with labor reformers. Shortly after John Sweeney succeeded Lane Kirkland as president of the AFL-CIO in 1995, the International Department was defunded to a large degree and its longtime leaders retired.

[See also Communist Party, USA; International Ladies Garment Workers Union; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Alexander, Robert. The Right Opposition. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981.

Buhle, Paul. "Spies Everywhere." Radical History Review 67 (winter 1997).

Klehr, Harvey, John Earl Haynes, and Fridrikh Igorevich Firsov. The Secret World of American Communism. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.

—PAUL BUHLE

LOWE, CAROLINE A. (1874–1933). A member of the Socialist Party from 1903, Caroline A. Lowe was a well-respected regional organizer in Kansas and Oklahoma. Born near Cottontown, Essex County, Ontario, Canada, she moved at age five with her parents to Kansas City, Kansas, where she attended public schools. At age seventeen, she became a teacher and helped organize a local teachers' association. In 1908 she quit her profession to become a national lecturer for the Socialist Party. Lowe toured the Oklahoma socialist encampments during the summers of 1909 and 1912, sharing the speaking platform with labor movement luminaries such as Mother Mary Jones and Eugene V. Debs. She served from 1910 to 1912 as secretary of the Women's National Committee and managed its offices in the party's national headquarters in Chicago. In 1914 Lowe ran for the Kansas state legislature on the Socialist Party ticket and helped launch the People's College of Fort Scott, Kansas.

In 1914 Lowe enrolled in law school; she was admitted to the Kansas bar in 1916. As early as 1914, she joined the free-speech fights and was arrested in Kansas City. During World War I, she defended members of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in well-publicized trials in Chicago; Wichita, Kansas; and Everett, Washington. Lowe became IWW counsel in the defense of fifty-four deportees brought to Ellis Island in early 1919 from Seattle, Washington, aboard the infamous "Red Special." With the assistance of Charles Recht, chief counsel for the New York Bureau of Legal Advice, she secured the unconditional release of almost all of the defendants, a major civil liberties achievement in the context of the Red Scare.

In 1923, she joined a law firm in Pittsburg, Kansas, and was appointed the official counsel for the United Mine Workers' District 14, aiding miners in workers' compensation cases. She retired from practice about one year before her death.

[See also Socialist Party; Woman's National Committee.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism, 1870–1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.

Early, Frances H. A World Without War: How U.S. Feminists and Pacifists Resisted World War I. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1997.

Lowe, Caroline A. Papers. Kansas Collection, Haldeman-Julius Room, Pittsburg State University, Pittsburg, Kans.

—FRANCES H. EARLY

LOWER EAST SIDE, NEW YORK CITY. The area of Manhattan known as the Lower East Side was one of the original geopolitical centers of the American Left. Bordered roughly by the East River and Broadway, Chambers and Fourteenth Streets, at the turn of the century it was more densely populated than Bombay. Allegedly ruled by unwashed, ignorant, and immoral foreigners in dire need of Americanization, the Lower East Side was indeed an urban hell where thousands of exploited immigrants starved in foul tenements. But thousands of people also created a vibrant, multiethnic cultural life, in which socialism, communism, anarchism, and every form of immigrant radicalism thrived.

In the 1840s, free blacks had established a community in what was a predominantly Irish neighborhood, and the first small wave of German immigrants already foreshadowed the mass influx that was to start four to five years later. Eastern European Jews would not move in in significant numbers until around 1880, Italians and Chinese a little later. Tenements, the notorious "prisonlike structures" that became almost synonymous with the Lower East Side, hardly existed in the 1840s. By 1865, however, more than 15,000 tenements housed 480,000 people. The area had been developed quickly and real estate speculators like the Astors made a fortune with their cheap five-story monstrosities.

The Sozialistische Turnverein became the cultural center of the German community on the Lower East Side in the 1850s and early 1860s. In the tradition of the German Turner movement of the 1830s, this organization promoted "true liberty, prosperity, and free education for all." Its members were not only trained to master the parallel bars but took up fencing and shooting to be prepared for the, as they thought, imminent revolt in Germany. The Turners, from their headquarters on Orchard Street, later from a fancy hall "uptown" on Fourth Street, ran a school, a bar, a restaurant, offered drama and poetry classes, and sponsored lectures on whatever was in vogue or promised a good laugh—phrenology, vegetarianism, homeopathic medicine, woman suffrage. The New Yorker Turnzeitung, the club's publication, introduced the writings of Marx and Engels. The Turnverein itself did not have a political arm, but through its members maintained ties to virtually all political organizations and in the 1850s tried to unify the hopelessly chaotic German American political scene, populated by wings and factions warring over some substantial and many obscure personal and philosophical differences.

After the Civil War, with the Turnverein degenerating into just another German "Verein," a new generation of immigrant radicalism appeared on the Lower East Side. Its headquarters was the Tenth Ward Hotel on the corner of Broome and Forsythe Streets, and its figurehead Friedrich Adolph Sorge, "adjutant of the great Karl and the quintessence of the Prussian gendarme" according to one critic. Competing socialistic groups formed, argued, and split up in rapid succession. The Soziale Partei "tried its hand at electoral politics and failed"; the Allgemeine Deutsche Arbeiterverein initially united communists and Lassalleans, but eventually purged itself of all social-democratic tendencies (and members) to become Section 1 of the International Workingmen's Association. The Arbeiterunion was the central body of the German workers, equivalent to the English-speaking Workingmen's Council. Newspapers, a major agitprop medium and a way of transforming often abstract ideas into something tangible, abounded again. The Arbeiterunion paper, for example, was initially edited by Adolf Douai, veteran "Forty-Eighter," supporter of woman suffrage, educator, and textbook author. The difference between the old "romantic revolutionaries," for whom free education for all was a step on the road to liberation, and the new hard-nosed radicals becomes clear in Sorge's opinion on the school war: "Liberation of the workers . . . is not at all dependent on public education. . . . The consciousness of their place in society is completely sufficient."

Outside the Tenth Ward Hotel and its stern politics, the living and working conditions of the immigrants on the Lower East Side didn't improve. Unemployment or twelve-hour workdays in sweatshops and tenements, the five-dollar weekly salaries, infant mortality, typhoid fever, tuberculosis, and industrial accidents still dominated people's lives. Although no permanent mass organization developed among the immigrants, thousands of people joined picnics, parades, and protest marches to voice their grievances and to let the outside world know that they were not dumb masses but workers with a clear understanding of their situation and of possible remedies. In the early 1870s, eight-hour agitation began and the Paris Commune raised hopes among the Lower East side radicals. However serious the theme of these public spectacles, they were always also entertainment, part of the radical culture. During those years, the Germania Assembly Rooms on the Bowery and Houston Street was one of the centers of social life in the German community. A preview to the annual Allgemeine Arbeiterfest held at the Germania featured musical and dramatic presentations of works by the old favorites Johann Strauss and Ferdinand Freiligrath, but the highlight of the evening was the premiere of a piece by two local artists, a one-acter aptly titled Capital and Labor: A Farce.

The farcical aspects of the struggle between capital and labor, however, became bloody reality once more when the police broke up a demonstration in Tompkins Square Park on the Lower East Side in January 1873. Some six thousand people—women and children as well as twelve hundred members of the German Tenth Ward Workingmen's Association—had assembled to demand public-works programs to alleviate the unemployment and hunger on the Lower East Side caused by the depression. The police moved in and started to beat up the crowd. "In the northwest corner [of the park], however, the Tenth Ward German workers held fast and battled the police" (although their paper, the Arbeiterzeitung, had warned against a demonstration). In the first line stood Justus Schwab "carrying the red flag of the Commune." Body count: forty-six people were arrested, twenty-four of them Germans, and Mayor Havemeyer, himself of German descent, could declare that "public works belong to other countries, not ours." Attempts to oust the police board failed. Justus Schwab, who so courageously defended the red flag in Tompkins Square, was a prominent figure on the Lower East Side. He ran a bar on First Street and First Avenue, a radical hangout, frequented by the illustrious Emma Goldman and her anarchist friends. The anarchists appeared on the East Side in the 1880s, all bringing their Russian, Italian, or German political traditions along.

By 1880 the ethnic composition of the Lower East Side had started to change. The Germans tended to move uptown, an exodus prompted by the arrival of eastern European Jews, who were viewed with much stronger anti-Semitism than the "more civilized" German Jews. Yiddish became the language of the Lower East Side and Jewish socialism replaced German radicalism.

In Eisl's Golden Rule Hall on Rivington Street in 1882, Abraham Cahan explained the realities of the Lower East Side to the Propaganda Association for the Dissemination of Socialist Ideas among Immigrant Jews. The leaders of the association were disappointed that their Russian propaganda did not seem to take hold. Here people speak Yiddish, Cahan pointed out—and he was promptly hired as Yiddish-language lecturer. That is how Yiddish radicalism came to the Lower East Side, at least so the story goes. Cahan went on to become one of the heroes of Lower East Side, powerful editor of the Forward, a newspaper housed in a building on East Broadway whose entrance was decorated with reliefs of Marx, Engels, Liebknecht, and Lassalle.

Again, a vibrant culture developed in dire poverty. Yiddish theaters opened along Second Avenue; later on, every better café claimed "Trotsky drank here," from the Garden Cafeteria near the Forward building to the Café Royale, now a laundry on Second Avenue. The new forms of popular culture and mass entertainment that developed around the turn of the century immediately became part of the Lower East Side life.

Jewish workers, however, did more than wait "for the paradise promised by the socialists, and while waiting, [singing] Yiddish songs." They had their first big organizing success with the formation of United Hebrew Trades—although a hostile observer claimed that its "entire knowledge of unionism extends from East Broadway to Houston Street and from the Bowery to Sheriff Street." The International Ladies Garment Workers Union won great strikes and in 1914 the Lower East Siders even sent a Socialist, Meyer London, to Congress. He was reelected twice, and died in the twenties, run over by a car on Second Avenue, in his coat pocket a copy of Chekhov's short stories.

[See also German Americans; Yiddish Left.]

FURTHER READING

Howe, Irving. World of Our Fathers. Simon and Schuster, 1976.

Nadel, Stanley. "Kleindeutschland: New York City's Germans, 1845–1880." Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 1981.

Wechsler, Robert. New York Labor Heritage: A Selected Bibliography of New York Labor History. New York: Tamiment Library, 1981.

—ANNETTE P. BUS

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER. A leading anarchist and free-thought newspaper of the late nineteenth century, Lucifer was founded by Moses Harman in 1883. After bitter experiences in Civil War Missouri, where he had suffered death threats as an abolitionist, Harman brought his family to Valley Falls, Kansas, in 1879, where he soon established ties with the liberal movement in the state. The greatest contribution of Lucifer was its printing of a wide-open letters column that became a national forum, particularly of anguished reports from women of sexual problems. The explicit nature of these letters brought down several prosecutions and jail sentences on Harman, who was charged with sending obscenity through the mail.

During one period when Harman was incarcerated, Lucifer was edited by Lois Nichols Waisbrooker (1826–1909), an advocate of free love, spiritualism, and woman's rights. It was Waisbrooker who initiated the infamous "Horse Penis" affair. She printed a graphic paragraph from a U.S. Department of Agriculture book, Special Report on Diseases of the Horse, and when the issue was barred from the mail, she ran a streamer in subsequent issues—"Published under Government Censorship"—pointing out that she was being persecuted for printing a paragraph that the government itself had published, and that it seemed much more solicitous of the health of horses than of human beings.

Harman later moved Lucifer to Chicago, where prosecutions continued almost to his death in 1910. His newspaper played a dramatic role in the history of free thought in America, particularly with regard to sexual and women's liberation.

[See also Free Love; Tucker, Benjamin R.]

FURTHER READING

Sears, Hal D. The Sex Radicals: Free Love in High Victorian America. Lawrence: Regents Press of Kansas, 1977.

Waisbrooker, Lois. A Sex Revolution. 2d ed, Topeka, Kans.: Independent Publishing, 1894.

—FRED WHITEHEAD

LUDLOW MASSACRE. An attack on 20 April 1914 by troops of the Colorado National Guard on a tent village inhabited by striking coal miners and their families, mostly Italian, Greek, and eastern European immigrants, gave the Ludlow Massacre its name. Two women and eleven children were among those slain. Called a battle by the Guard, it was an incident of the Colorado Fuel and Iron strike (1913–1914), a coal strike centered in southern Colorado near Trinidad. Strikers led by the United Mine Workers of America demanded improved safety and living conditions, higher wages, and union recognition. The largest company involved was the Rockefeller-owned Colorado Fuel and Iron Company.

In October 1913 Governor Elias Ammons ordered the Colorado National Guard into the strike region. The Guard, supposedly a neutral force, quickly allied itself with the coal companies. By early April the strike had bankrupted the state, and the governor ordered most troops out of the region. The remaining companies were increasingly joined by mine guards notoriously hostile to the strikers. On the morning of 20 April these troops began circling the Ludlow tent colony. Around nine o'clock the first shot was fired (each side accused the other of it). Troops began firing into the tents as many inhabitants were getting out of bed or getting dressed. Strikers returned fire from a trench dug to one side but were poorly armed and by 4:00 P.M. had run out of ammunition. At dusk the troops entered the tent village with war whoops and burned it to the ground. The dead women and children were found suffocated by smoke in one of the tent cellars dug for them to run into in case of attack. As the news electrified the nation, the miners began an armed rebellion that continued for ten days until President Woodrow Wilson ordered the U.S. Army into the southern Colorado coal field.

In response to Ludlow, reformers, socialists, and others organized protest demonstrations and rallies across the United States. In New York the socialist novelist Upton Sinclair led a silent picket in front of the offices of John D. Rockefeller. The Socialist Party criticized his action on the grounds that the system was at fault, not individuals like Rockefeller. This objection did not prevent similar pickets from appearing in front of Rockefeller's Standard Oil offices in Chicago and San Francisco.

Others prominent in the protests included the reformer Jane Addams, who presided over a large protest meeting in Chicago, and Max Eastman, the socialist editor of the Masses. Eastman took the train to Colorado to report on the debacle. Sinclair also went to Colorado and it was on his suggestion that a progressive Denver judge, Benjamin Barr Lindsey, accompanied a group of strikers' wives across the country for the purpose of publicizing the plight of the strikers. Sinclair's novel King Coal grew out of his involvement with these protests.

Back in Tarrytown, New York, members of the Industrial Workers of the World picketed the Rockefeller estate, while in New York City four of their comrades died in a Lexington Avenue tenement when a time-bomb exploded prematurely. It was generally believed that the bomb had been intended for the Rockefeller townhouse.

Such widespread negative publicity prompted the Rockefellers to launch a pioneering corporate public relations campaign, as well as to institute an important form of the company union in the Colorado coal mines. Although these were largely token efforts, they represented an important ideological shift toward liberalism on the part of some capitalists.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; Sinclair, Upton; Western Federation of Miners/International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers.]

FURTHER READING

- Long, Priscilla. "The Women of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Strike, 1913–1914." In Women, Work, and Protest: A Century of U.S. Women's Labor History, edited by Ruth Milkman. Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1985.
- Long, Priscilla. Where the Sun Never Shines: A History of America's Bloody Coal Industry. New York: Paragon, 1989.
- McGovern, George S., and Leonard F. Guttridge. The Great Coalfield War. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1972.
- Papanikolas, Zeese. Buried Unsung: Louis Tikas and the Ludlow Massacre. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1982.

—PRISCILLA LONG

MACDONALD, DWIGHT (1906–1982). Best known as the editor, publisher, and most prolific contributor to Politics magazine (1944–1949), Dwight Macdonald was also among the most radical of the New York intellectuals during the most creative phase of that group. As a Trotskyist he helped edit Partisan Review. But Macdonald broke with the other editors when they offered “critical support” of the Allied cause in World War II, and founded his own journal of anarchism and then pacifism. Politics enlisted the energies of such European writers as Simone Weil and Albert Camus, as well as refugees from Nazism and Fascism, and was distinguished by an independent effort to reexamine the categories of Marxism and the automatic allegiance to the working class or to trade unions. The monthly (later quarterly) defined the militarism of the modern state and the depersonalization of an apathetic citizenry as the chief evils to be combated. But Macdonald’s own radicalism dissipated during the Cold War, when he saw the Soviet Union as the major peril to peace and to individual liberty. By the early 1950s he not only “chose the West” but largely abandoned interest in politics itself, devoting himself to cultural criticism. Macdonald returned to dissent by the middle of the 1960s, putting his polemical bite and graceful wit in the service of opposition to military intervention in Vietnam and in support of Students for a Democratic Society.

[See also Anarchism; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Arendt, Hannah. “He’s All Dwight.” New York Review of Books 11 (1 August 1968).
 Glazer, Penina M. “From the Old Left to the New: Radical Criticism in the 1940s.” American Quarterly 24 (December 1972).
 Whitfield, Stephen J. A Critical American: The Politics of Dwight Macdonald. Hamden, Conn: Archon Books, 1984.
 Wreszin, Michael. A Rebel in Defense of Tradition: The Life and Times of Dwight Macdonald. New York: Basic Books, 1995.

—STEPHEN J. WHITFIELD

MAGÓN, RICARDO FLORES. See Flores Magón, Ricardo.

MAINSTREAM. During the tumultuous late 1930s, the Communist Party periodical the New Masses had shifted from monthly to weekly publication, promising to devote considerable space to literary and other cultural fields. The coverage proved uneven and rarely achieved the level of aesthetic sophistication maintained by the then still vaguely Marxist Partisan Review. In 1945–1946 a group of young writers, largely members of the cultural section of the Communist Party, projected a magazine to publish fiction, poetry, literary and art criticism, and theoretical explorations of a possible Marxist aesthetic. Notable in this group was Charles Humboldt (1910–1964), a World War II veteran then studying mural art in Mexico, via the GI Bill.

The first issues of Mainstream, especially noteworthy for such authors as Tom Bell, Alexander Saxton, and Meridel Le Sueur, evoked considerable enthusiasm. Although circulation began to climb, Party membership and funds had begun to decline, and cultural needs possessed no political priority. The New Masses, which had meanwhile lost many readers, merged into the Masses and Mainstream, with all four editors carryovers from the New Masses. Charles Humboldt was listed merely as part of a cosmetic board of nineteen contributing editors. Masses and Mainstream, as unwieldy as its name, floundered until a major reorientation in 1956. Milton Howard remained titular editor but Humboldt was listed as managing editor and became the de facto editor of the monthly, renamed Mainstream in September. In 1957 he became sole editor in fact.

Until Humboldt’s resignation in 1960, the magazine achieved an extraordinary level of literary sophistication, imaginative breadth, and cosmopolitan interests. Especially notable was its emphasis on Latin American artistic development, a first in the U.S. Left. Through all the financial and political hazards of the Cold War and all the problems of an ever more rigidly philistine Communist leadership, Mainstream managed to grow. Humboldt remained responsible for almost every function, meeting weekly with four contributing editors (novelists Barbara Giles and Philip Bonosky and two critics, Sidney Finkelstein and Annette Rubinstein) to secure advice and help in his successful solicitation of material from such distinguished non-Communist radicals as John Berger, Joseph Needham, Jean-Paul Sartre, Kenneth Tynan, and others.

As early as 1956, the divergence of the official Party outlook and Mainstream culminated in a searching effort by Humboldt to question the accepted view of the artist's responsibility to society. After many compromises, ultimatums, and continued financial crises, Humboldt resigned in 1960, along with a number of contributing editors. (He went on to work at the National Guardian until shortly before his death.) The magazine grew steadily more characterless and isolated, and expired in 1963, the final notable American Communist literary publication.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Le Sueur, Meridel; Literary Criticism; McGrath, Tom.]

—ANNETTE RUBINSTEIN

MALCOLM X. See Civil Rights Movement.

MALKIEL, THERESA SERBER (1874–1949). A Jewish immigrant from Bar, Russia, Theresa Serber Malkiel arrived in New York in 1891, went to work in the needle trades, and involved herself in the labor movement, socialism, and feminism. Her political activity in the socialist movement epitomizes the difficulties and contradictions encountered by socialists on gender and class issues. Confronting the dilemma of autonomy and integration, she generally opposed women's separatism and, with other women militants, systematically denounced the sex discrimination prevalent among socialists.

Malkiel helped organize the Infant Cloak Makers Union of New York in 1894, led a well-publicized strike, and helped guide the local into the doomed Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance. Breaking with the Socialist Labor Party in 1899, she became the local leader of Socialist women in Yonkers, New York, in the new Socialist Party of America (created in 1901).

In 1908 Malkiel was elected a member of the Socialist Party-sponsored Woman's National Committee, designed to facilitate national propaganda and support for women.

In those years Malkiel crusaded primarily for the issues of woman's suffrage and work. In 1907 the Second International had ordered all Socialist parties to support votes for women but banned cooperation with the autonomous "bourgeois suffragists." Malkiel herself saw the vote as a crucial stepping stone toward gender equality but primarily as a weapon for the conquest of socialism.

Malkiel denounced the exploitation of women in the workplace and at home. Oppressed as workers, they also had to confront discrimination by workmates and union leaders. Women's only hope, according to Malkiel, lay in collective action and organization. The 1909 shirtwaist workers' strike gave Malkiel, a former shirtwaist worker and a member of a Socialist Party women's support committee, the opportunity to involve herself fully with immigrant female workers.

Home was the other facet of women's lives, and Malkiel identified domestic labor—unpaid and unrecognized—as the specific female oppression and warned working girls against the lures of marriage, doomed to bring a double working day and a more exhausting existence. More privileged in her personal life, Theresa Serber married Leon Malkiel, a socialist lawyer, in 1900. They had one daughter.

When Theresa Malkiel projected herself into an ideal future, freed from industrial and sexual exploitation, she left the family structure more or less unchanged. The decisive factor was the newly won gender equality that would enable wives to carry out their "mission" as mothers and educators with dignity. In Malkiel's Diary of a Shirtwaist Striker (1910), the young Jewish heroine experiences liberation from industrial exploitation as well as from patriarchal family relationships. In a new egalitarian context, the heroine fulfills the traditional female mission and guides her meek, male companion toward the Socialist Promised Land.

On the eve of World War I, the Socialist Party decided to retrench on women's issues. Committed to pacifism, Malkiel fought on for suffrage and immigrant women. After the war, she became less politically active.

[See also Socialist Labor Party; Socialist Party; Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance; Woman's National Committee.]

FURTHER READING

- Basch, Françoise. Theresa Malkiel: Journal d'une gréviste. Paris: Editions Payot, 1981.
- Basch, Françoise. "The Socialist Party of America, the Woman Question, and Theresa Serber Malkiel." In Women in Culture and Politics: A Century of Change, edited by J. Friedlander et al. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986.
- Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism, 1870-1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.
- Malkiel, Theresa Serber. The Diary of a Shirtwaist Striker. Introductory essay by Françoise Basch. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1990.
- Miller, Sally M. "From Sweatshop Worker to Labor Leader: Theresa Malkiel, a Case Study." American Jewish History 68 (December 1978).

—FRANÇOISE BASCH

MAOISM. For a few brief years during the 1970s, advocates of the type of Marxism-Leninism promoted by the Chinese Communist Party constituted the largest and most dynamic trend of the U.S. socialist left. This self-described "New Communist Movement" (the term "Maoism" was then frowned upon) was overwhelmingly a creation of young people radicalized in the tumultuous 1960s. At its height, U.S. Maoism could claim a core of roughly ten thousand activists devoted to its mission of constructing a new, "genuinely revolutionary" vanguard party to supplant the Communist Party, USA (CPUSA), and other allegedly reformist groups of the Old or New Left.

U.S. partisans of "Mao Tse-tung Thought" were never able to unite into a single Maoist party. But the largest radical newspaper of the time, the Guardian, (circulation twenty thousand plus), was a proponent of New Communist goals from 1971 to the end of the decade. Additionally, the various Maoist cadre organizations (which ranged in size from a few dozen to more than a thousand members) produced dozens of other newspapers, journals, books and pamphlets that reached thousands beyond the Maoist ranks. The New Communist Movement was the most racially diverse sector of the U.S. Left—African Americans, Puerto Ricans, Chicanos, and Asian Americans made up twenty-five to thirty percent (or more) of its leadership and membership ranks. Several thousand New Communist activists rooted themselves in industrial jobs and working-class communities, and some played central roles in local and even occasional nationwide struggles. These included support for major strikes, such as the May 1972–February 1974 walkout in Texas and New Mexico by four thousand mainly Chicana women at Farah Company (then the largest U.S. manufacturer of men's and boy's pants), and mass mobilizations against the initial high court decisions rolling back affirmative action (Bakke v. University of California, 1977–1978).

Beginning in the late 1970s—as the Chinese Party ever more openly abandoned its earlier advocacy of anti-imperialism and social revolution—the Maoist trend began to disintegrate almost as rapidly as it had arisen. For a time, the depth of Maoism's crisis was obscured by the energy of a few "second-wave" efforts at party building, which generally avoided the extreme ultra-Left tactics and overinflated rhetoric that characterized Maoism's early days. But these late-seventies initiatives never attained the size or influence of their predecessors. To the contrary, the always contentious relationships among the different Maoist groups became even worse. The largest organizations experienced splits and large-scale membership losses if not total collapse. Maoism's (and China's) prestige on the broader left plummeted. By the middle of the 1980s Maoism as a viable trend had disappeared, although various small organizations espousing offshoots of Maoist ideology continued to exist on the fringes of the U.S. Left.

The immediate impetus for the rise of U.S. Maoism was the large-scale radicalization that took place in the late 1960s. The pivotal year was 1968, which saw the Vietnamese Tet offensive, the French May and the Czech August, the assassination of Martin Luther King and subsequent rebellions in black communities across the United States, and the forced withdrawal of Lyndon Johnson from the presidential race only to be followed by the Democratic nomination of Hubert Humphrey as police battered demonstrators in the streets of Chicago. Thousands of young people decided that "the system" could not be reformed and that social revolution in the United States was necessary, desirable, possible, and even just around the historical corner. They then set out to discover an ideology, strategy, and organization that could bring that revolution about.

This new generation of aspiring revolutionaries immediately encountered the outlook of the Chinese Communist Party at the height of its international prestige. As a variant of Marxism, Maoism offered a systemic analysis linking interventionist war and domestic injustice to the economic imperatives of monopoly capitalism. It presented itself as the prime example and main champion of the Third World national liberation movements which were "shaking the empire." China's "Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution" (more accurately, the claims made for it) seemed to offer a more militant and democratic version of socialism than that of the Soviet Union.

Maoism also stressed the pivotal role of the working class at just the moment when a round of militancy was stirring among U.S. workers and activists leaving the campuses were chafing at the limits of student and youth politics. More worker-hours were spent on strike in 1971 than in any year since 1946. The powerful in-plant resistance of African American auto workers in Detroit centered by the League of Revolutionary Black Workers appeared to prove the Maoist thesis that the most explosive social fuel for revolution lay at the intersection of class exploitation and racial oppression. And the militancy of young, mostly white workers in the nationally publicized Lordstown, Ohio, strike indicated the possibility of radicalism spreading to a sector that had been shunned by most of the New Left.

Maoism's advocacy of a disciplined, secretive party also spoke to the frustrations many felt with the chaotic functioning of most New Left formations—as well as to the growing concerns they had about building organizations capable of resisting infiltration and repression. Maoism defended extralegal tactics, armed self-defense, and preparation for military struggle in a way that appealed to those who had directly experienced the massive state violence of the late sixties; this contrasted sharply with the far more cautious perspectives of Old Left groups. Finally, during its formative period Maoism did not appear to be an ideology distinct from or in competition with broader currents of revolutionary thought, especially the views of the Vietnamese and Cuban Communist parties and the liberation movements in Southern Africa and the Middle East. Thus U.S. Maoism took shape only partly as an orthodox expression of Chinese doctrine: other versions of Marxism-Leninism which gave major emphasis to the struggles of Third World peoples abroad and communities of color at home were also part of the mix.

Though Maoist ideas rapidly gained influence, the Maoist organization directly descended from the Old Left isolated itself badly. The Progressive Labor Party (PL) had been formed in 1962 by a breakaway faction of the CPUSA which sympathized with the Chinese when the Sino-Soviet dispute burst open in 1960–1961. PL (publishers of the newspaper Challenge) sent its cadre into Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) in February 1966 where they played a prominent and controversial role, centering one of the two main factions in SDS's June 1969 split and collapse. But by that time PL was moving away from mainstream Maoist positions to sharply attack the Vietnamese communists for "selling out" and the Black Panther Party for "anti-working-class nationalism." These positions alienated the vast bulk of young radicals. So, instead of joining PL (which retreated to its own idiosyncratic brand of Marxism), they began to create new organizations.

This process took shape within a broad Left milieu sympathetic to China and "Chairman Mao." The Black Panther Party, for example, was never a specifically Maoist group, but its members sold Mao's "Little Red Book." The prestigious independent socialist magazine Monthly Review also portrayed Maoism in a very favorable light. Within this supportive climate, a layer of activists determined to construct a U.S. Maoist party began to coalesce into study circles and study-action collectives. Between 1968 and 1972 dozens of these were formed by (overwhelmingly white) activists coming out of SDS, especially from the Revolutionary Youth Movement II faction which had opposed both PL and the Weatherman group. Similar groups were forged by activists who had spearheaded the Puerto Rican, Chicano, Asian American, and African American youth movements. (This racial divide in the New Communist Movement's origins was never fully overcome; while some organizations and circles became genuinely multiracial, others from the beginning were composed either overwhelmingly of whites or overwhelmingly of people of color.) A small number of older ex-members of the CPUSA, or of PL, took part in the process; and in a few cities (Detroit being the most important) there was a turn toward Maoism on the part of newly radicalized young workers, especially black workers. Informal links steadily developed between many of these circles and individuals. The Guardian took on the role of a movement-wide forum for news, communication, and debate. Gradually, nationwide democratic-centralist groups ("preparty formations") began to emerge.

A consensus on the political "lines of demarcation" defining the New Communist Movement was soon built: advocacy of violent revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat; rejection of the Soviet and U.S. Communist parties for alleged "revisionism" (discarding the revolutionary principles of Marxism-Leninism); defense of Stalin as a great revolutionary and belief that after Khrushchev's criticism of Stalin in 1956 the Soviet Union had moved toward restoration of capitalism and become an antirevolutionary force. Domestically, the Maoist current saw the key to the U.S. revolution as forging an alliance between the "multinational working class" and the "oppressed nationalities." Maoism held that the struggles of African Americans, Puerto Ricans, Chicanos, Asian Americans, and Native Americans had an independent, cross-class revolutionary dynamic and generally characterized them as oppressed nations struggling for self-determination. Supposedly the "spontaneous movements" of workers and oppressed nationalities were growing rapidly in size and militancy; the crucial need was for a disciplined Bolshevik-style vanguard with the correct political line to provide adequate leadership: hence "Party Building Is Our Central Task." With a few exceptions, Maoist groups had an unfriendly attitude toward the rapidly growing women's liberation movement (dismissing it as petit bourgeois) and were intensely hostile to homosexuality and the emerging lesbian/gay rights movement. The New Communists also saw themselves in bitter competition with all other trends on the socialist left and—while sometimes proclaiming the need for united fronts—usually adopted a combative posture toward progressive reformers in the mass movements.

The largest Maoist groups in the early 1970s were the Revolutionary Union (RU) and the October League (OL)—both of which emerged mainly out of SDS—and the Communist League (CL)—formed when some former members of SDS joined with a core of activists who had left the CPUSA after defending Stalin in 1956–1958. RU was founded as the Bay Area Revolutionary Union in 1968, grew into a nationwide organization in 1970–1971, and declared itself the Revolutionary Communist Party (RCP) in September 1975. It published the newspaper Revolution (later the Revolutionary Worker) and at its height included upwards of a thousand members. OL was formed in 1972 through the merger of local collectives in Atlanta and Los Angeles, and grew to almost a thousand members (about one-third activists of color, a greater percentage than RU and more typical of the "multinational" New Communist organizations—those that did not focus on a specific oppressed minority). OL published the newspaper the Call and proclaimed itself the Communist Party (Marxist-Leninist), or CP(ML), in June 1977. Meanwhile, CL—unusual in that it had stronger roots in pre-1956 Stalinism than in post-1968 Maoism—made its biggest impact when it recruited a large number of activists from Detroit's League of Revolutionary Black Workers in 1971. Somewhat smaller than RU and OL, CL declared itself the Communist Labor Party of North America (CLP) in September 1974; it published the People's Tribune.

Other groups formed in this period (some of which, in various combinations, became more prominent during New Communism's second wave) included 1 Wor Kuen, formed as a nationwide organization by a 1971 merger of New York and San Francisco collectives of Asian American youth; the Puerto Rican Revolutionary Workers Organization, formed by the section of the Young Lords Party which turned to Maoism in 1971–1972; the Black Workers Congress (BWC), an outgrowth of the League of Revolutionary Black Workers, which for a time after its 1971 founding congress existed as a loose national "mass/cadre" hybrid and, after a series of internal battles, consolidated as a small Maoist group in 1972–1973; the August Twenty-ninth Movement, which grew out of a section of the Chicano movement in the Southwest and held its "Unity Congress" in 1974; the Revolutionary Communist League, whose roots lay first in the Committee for a Unified Newark and then the Congress of Afrikan Peoples, which was active in several of the key expressions of the early-seventies Black Liberation Movement such as the National Black Assembly and the African Liberation Support Committee; the Workers Viewpoint Organization, initiated by ex-PL members as the Asian Study Group in 1973 and becoming the Communist Workers Party (CWP) in 1979; the Marxist-Leninist-led Union of Democratic Filipinos, which anchored U.S. solidarity work with the Maoist Communist Party of the Philippines; and the Central Organization of U.S. Marxist-Leninists, which later became the pro-Albania Marxist-Leninist Party (MLP). The Chicago-based Sojourner Truth Organization and the loose "Midwest Federation" of collectives which it led also functioned within the New Communist milieu, although its unorthodox brand of Marxism owed more to influences from the Italian extraparlimentary left (among others) than to Maoism.

The height of optimism about uniting Maoism's different strands into a single party came in 1973. That spring, spokespeople for almost all the major Maoist groups participated in a series of forums sponsored by the Guardian. The biggest, entitled "What Road to Building a New Communist Party?" drew twelve hundred people to a New York City auditorium, and the tape and transcript were heard and read by thousands more across the country.

But it was downhill from there. Capitalism was proving far more resilient than the radicals of the late 1960s had believed, and expectations of imminent revolutionary upheavals were rapidly receding. The 1974 recession led to a decline rather than rise in worker militancy, affecting not just Maoism but all trends on the far left. The mass movements from the 1960s in which Maoism had first found a base—the student, anti-war, and Black Liberation movements especially—were ebbing; meanwhile the currents on the rise—the women's, lesbian/gay, and antinuclear movements—were far less hospitable to Maoist views. Rival trends within the U.S. Left—in particular, a social democracy reenergized by the emergence of the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee and the launching of the newspaper In These Times in 1976—began to give Maoism serious competition. Entrenched problems of sectarianism, doctrinaire orthodoxy, and antidemocratic practices began to sap membership morale and repel potential supporters.

Simultaneously, the policies of the Chinese Communist Party began to put U.S. Maoists in a serious bind. In 1974 the Chinese unveiled their "Theory of the Three Worlds" as a justification for alliances with reactionary governments in the Third World, conservative European politicians, and even the U.S. military against the Soviet Union, which the Chinese began to describe as the more dangerous of the "two superpowers." Maoism's initial attraction to 1960s activists was largely that it seemed more militantly anti-U.S. imperialist than the Soviet Union; now the Chinese Party was cozying up to Washington, calling for a stronger North Atlantic Treaty Organization, attacking Cuba as a Soviet puppet, and distancing itself from the most vibrant national liberation movements in Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America because they received Soviet support.

Until the end of the Vietnam War in spring 1975, the consequences of China's new posture remained somewhat muted. But matters came to a head just a year later when conflict broke out in Angola following the successful conclusion of that country's long battle against Portuguese colonial rule. China sided with South African- and Central Intelligence Agency-backed mercenary armies against the Movement for the Popular Liberation of Angola (MPLA)—which had led the anticolonial struggle—because the MPLA was backed by Cuba and the Soviet Union. U.S. Maoism was faced with a choice between following Beijing or sticking to its anti-imperialist roots, and the result was a bitter rupture: most of the largest organizations backed China, while the Guardian, the CLP, dozens of smaller circles, and most of Maoism's periphery supported the MPLA.

While this split was still raw, Chinese internal politics exploded. Mao died and the winners in Beijing's subsequent power struggle arrested his closest allies (the "Gang of Four"). They quickly reversed the policies of the Cultural Revolution and embarked upon even greater cooperation with the United States. Shortly thereafter, China's closest ally, Albania, denounced Maoism; China's protégés in Southeast Asia, the Khmer Rouge, were exposed as genocidal killers and overthrown by a Cambodian faction backed by the Vietnamese (1979); China then launched an unsuccessful invasion of Vietnam.

All this left Maoism in shambles. Some Maoist groups (OL, for example) proclaimed loyalty to whatever faction held power in Beijing. Others decided to hold up the banner of the ousted Gang of Four (RCP, which lost forty percent of its members to the break-away Revolutionary Workers Headquarters in the process) or the Albanian Communists (the MLP and a split-off from the BWC called the Marxist-Leninist Organizing Committee, later the CPUSA-ML). This unraveling process took a few years to unfold, however, and when it began some of the weaker forces from Maoism's first phase believed they could build a party that avoided the blind loyalty to Beijing and infantile Left posturing that they hypothesized had wrecked the initial Maoist efforts.

These new initiatives were both smaller and more politically diverse than those earlier in the decade. At one pole were those circles who had broken most sharply with China's policies in the controversy over Angola: they formed a loose "antidogmatist and antirevisionist trend" which included the Guardian, a network of local collectives calling itself the Organizing Committee for an Ideological Center, the Union of Democratic Filipinos, and sets of activists grouped around the new journals Theoretical Review and Line of March. A round of internal battles in 1977–1982 produced the roughly four-hundred-member Line of March group, which published Frontline newspaper and steadily moved closer to Soviet positions in world politics, eventually defining itself as "anti-Maoist"; other activists and circles from this trend joined Line of March or abandoned the party-building project. At the other end of the spectrum was the League of Revolutionary Struggle (LRS), formed in 1978 by a merger of I Wor Kuen and the August Twenty-ninth Movement, with the Revolutionary Communist League joining a year later. LRS, publishers of Unity newspaper and somewhat larger than Line of March, stuck close to the official positions of the Chinese Communist Party until the Tiananmen Square massacre in 1989. The other group to attain significant size in these years was the eclectic CWP, which gained national attention after five of its members and supporters were murdered by Ku Klux Klansmen at a demonstration in Greensboro, North Carolina, in November 1979. Smaller organizations that attained a measure of influence during the late seventies and early eighties included the Boston-based Proletarian Unity League, which promoted the notion of a purified Maoism free of infantile Left tactics, and the California-centered Democratic Workers Party, which advocated an unorthodox strain of communism ("world systems theory") and was notorious for its cultlike functioning even in a movement hardly known for democracy or openness.

A few of these organizations remained vibrant into the 1980s and played significant roles in the Central America solidarity movement, Jesse Jackson's presidential campaigns, and the Rainbow Coalition. But by this time they were a disparate set of competing parties rather than any kind of identifiable trend. And even these were shattered by the profound crisis which overtook every section of world communism beginning in the mid-1980s. CWP transformed itself into the non-Leninist New Democratic Movement in 1984 and then disintegrated altogether; Line of March officially disbanded in 1989 and the LRS in 1990; the OL/CP(ML) and most of the other groups from Maoism's first wave had collapsed earlier in the 1980s.

Today only a few organizational remnants of 1970s Maoism survive—and these are either tiny or unrecognizable as Maoist or both. RCP and the Maoist Internationalist Movement (the only two groups which would admit to the Maoist label), as well as PL, exist as minuscule sects totally isolated from the rest of the Left. The small Freedom Road Socialist Organization (formed via a merger of the Proletarian Unity League and a shrunken Revolutionary Workers Headquarters) carries on without any regular press or public presence. The bigger and more active League of Revolutionaries for a New America can trace its roots to the now-disbanded CLP, but today it is neither explicitly Marxist-Leninist nor a political party.

Far more numerous are the thousands of individuals who passed through New Communism and now play influential roles in various social movements, especially in the trade unions and in communities of color. But the diverse lessons they have drawn from their Maoist experience do not add up to a coherent set of politics. By the late 1990s, it seemed that the popular 1970s Maoist prediction "The Future Is Bright, the Road Is Tortuous" had proven only half correct—and not the inspiring half that once infused U.S. Maoism with tremendous self-confidence and revolutionary zeal.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Khrushchev Revelations; National Guardian; New Left.]

—MAX ELBAUM

MARCANTONIO, VITO (1902–1954). The most electorally successful radical American politician in the twentieth century, Vito Marcantonio, a handsome five-foot-six-inch spellbinder, served as congressman from East Harlem in Manhattan for fourteen years (1934–1936, 1938–1950). In 1944 his district was expanded to include Yorkville. Marcantonio joined the American Labor Party (ALP) soon after its founding in 1936, becoming at once the leader of its left wing and by 1942 its de facto and by 1948 its elected leader.

Ideologically and organizationally, Marcantonio was closely allied with the Communist Party. He presented domestic issues from a class perspective and approached foreign policy within a Leninist conception, but in general did not attack the capitalist system as a whole nor advocate socialism. He was the only American political figure to consistently insist on the Communist Party's legitimate place in the country's political reality. In 1943, on the floor of the House, for example, he questioned "the war against the Communists, who, as an integral part of 130 million Americans, are fighting and working like all other Americans for victory against the enemy." In 1952 he described the Party as an "American party operating in what it considered to be the best interests of the American working class and people." Marcantonio politically allied himself with the Party within the ALP and held office in or otherwise promoted scores of organizations, unions, and publications associated with the Party, such as the International Labor Defense, the Furriers Union, and the New Masses.

Marcantonio, however, was not a Communist. He had occasional disagreements with the Party, including in 1953 an acrimonious and semipublic clash over its decision to withdraw support from the ALP. While accepting the Party's ideological lead and its place in the politics he supported, Marcantonio represented an independent force based on his charisma and his fiercely loyal constituency. For the Party, Marcantonio became a national spokesman for its general program; for Marcantonio, the Party provided the financial and human resources needed to fuel his organization. And it was Marcantonio's political machine that—through its legendary delivery of services and tireless electioneering—converted East Harlem's adulation for its native son into votes.

Driving Marcantonio's politics were the needs of the people—the Italian Americans, Puerto Ricans, and blacks—of East Harlem. Born in the center of its Italian community on East 112th Street, he resided at the time of his death on East 116th Street. In ways small and big he was organically a part of what in the thirties was the largest Italian community in the United States and what has been described as the most Italian community in the United States. He lived in the same house with his grandmother and mother, marched in church processions, socialized with Mafia chieftains, and wore religious amulets. In the House, he upheld the rights of the foreign born and the contributions of Italians to American society with an unrivaled persistence and ferocity. In 1944, when a congressman from Alabama disparaged Marcantonio's nationality, he reminded the House that "while my people did not come over on the Mayflower, [they] have always fought for liberty. . . . We are an integral part of the living flesh and blood of our country." Italian Harlem gave a majority of its votes to Marcantonio in all the elections he contested.

By 1936 he had created a second electoral base, East Harlem's El Barrio, the largest Puerto Rican community in the continental United States and the center of Puerto Rican life in New York City. Reflecting the powerful Left currents in Puerto Rico, this community had a wide array of Left organizations. It became the only place where the ALP was the first party. Marcantonio adopted the Puerto Rican cause as his own: he became co-counsel for Pedro Albizu Campos, the leader of the independence movement; submitted five bills for Puerto Rico's independence; and in general acted as de facto congressman for Puerto Rico. In 1949, in the center of Italian Harlem before fifteen thousand people, he shouted: "Yes, I do defend the Puerto Ricans as our most recently arrived, as against the kind of discrimination that was practiced against the Irish, the Jews, and the Italians in the past."

The blacks, though fewer in numbers, added to Marcantonio's East Harlem coalition. In the House, he was the major proponent of civil rights legislation, serving as sponsor and floor leader for the anti-poll tax and Fair Employment Practices bills. Countless times he proposed antidiscrimination amendments onto appropriations bills and then forced roll-call votes. Shortly after Marcantonio's death, Paul Robeson described him as the "Thaddeus Stevens of the first half of the twentieth century . . . the foremost spokesman for the rights of man the Congress has produced in the twentieth century."

Marcantonio's radicalism engendered an increasingly virulent and determined opposition. In 1944 his district was enlarged to include Yorkville, an area whose majority German- and Irish-American population, largely successful working- and middle-class, proved inhospitable. Nonetheless, his huge majorities in East Harlem returned him to the first Republican Congress since 1928. In 1947 the state legislature passed the Wilson-Pakula Act (which Marcantonio said had everything but his picture on it) abolishing the open primary system. This prevented a candidate registered in one party from entering the primary of another party without the permission of the county committee of that party.

Initially, Marcantonio—who had served as La Guardia's aide-de-camp in the district while he represented East Harlem in the House from 1922 to 1931—followed in his mentor's footsteps by running as a Republican. Later, despite his ALP affiliation, he contested both major party primaries, winning one (1938, 1940, 1946) or both (1942 and 1944). In 1948, amid a growing press campaign identifying him with Communism and organized crime, he had to seek reelection under the banner of the ALP, which was generally described in the press as Communist influenced, or controlled, or dominated. In a three-way contest, he narrowly won. In 1949, in part to keep alive his only political vehicle, he ran as the ALP candidate for mayor. In a three-way race, he received a majority in East Harlem and a plurality in the district as a whole, but only 13.8 percent of the citywide vote. Finally in 1950, shortly after casting the sole vote in opposition to the Korean War, Marcantonio faced George Donovan, the coalition candidate of the Democratic, Republican, and Liberal parties. Despite an increase in his vote from 1948 (from thirty-six to forty-three percent) and East Harlem's sixty-percent majority, Marcantonio could not overcome what he called the "gang up."

After his defeat, Marcantonio became co-attorney for the Communist Party before the Subversive Activities Control Board and represented individuals (including W. E. B. Du Bois) whose political views placed them in legal jeopardy. On 9 August, while returning from a printer with nominating petitions for an attempted comeback, Marcantonio fell dead of a heart attack in City Hall Park. The Roman Catholic Church refused him a Catholic burial. Amid a massive outpouring of people, he was buried near La Guardia in Woodlawn Cemetery, where his epitaph reads: "Vito Marcantonio: Defender of Human Rights."

[See also American Labor Party; Italian Americans; Puerto Ricans.]

FURTHER READING

- LaGumina, John Salvatore. Vito Marcantonio: The People's Politician. Dubuque, Iowa: Kendall/Hunt, 1969.
 Meyer, Gerald. Vito Marcantonio: Radical Politician. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1989.
 Rubinstein, Annette, ed. I Vote My Conscience: Debates,

Speeches, and Writings of Vito Marcantonio, 1935–1950.

New York: Vito Marcantonio Memorial, 1956.

Schaffer, Alan. Vito Marcantonio: Radical in Congress. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1966.

—GERALD MEYER

MARCH ON WASHINGTON. See Randolph, A. Philip; Rustin, Bayard.

MARCUSE, HERBERT (1898–1979). If anyone warrants the title of the theorist of the 1960s New Left, it is the German émigré philosopher Herbert Marcuse. Many consider this ironic. By the time Marcuse had emerged as the "guru of the New Left" (Time), he was in his sixties and the movement was notoriously distrustful of "anyone over thirty." The New Left was also known for both its activism and its impatience with intellectuals, while Marcuse's prose is often experienced as forbiddingly Germanic and abstruse. For this reason, too, the affinities between his ideas and the movement are surprising.

The fact is, however, that Marcuse was a New Leftist avant la lettre; his links to the movement were deep. Already in the 1930s, in a context of socialism in one country and fascism in several, and through the 1950s, in a context of American consumer capitalism, Marcuse was exploring in theory the prospects of a radicalism beyond not only Stalinism and Social Democracy, but beyond (if still with) Marxism itself. In his writings, the New Left would find coherent expression of some of its own deepest impulses: among them, critique not only of capitalism, but of technological rationality; focus on the sexual natural of both domination and emancipation; preoccupation with culture and consciousness as vital dimensions of revolution; a fusion of pessimism with a will to radical criticism and revolt; and unabashedly utopian tendencies. Likewise, Marcuse would find in the New Left of the 1960s a social embodiment of many of his ideas.

Eros and Civilization: A Philosophical Inquiry into Freud (1955; reissued with an important "Political Preface" in 1966) and Soviet Marxism: A Critical Analysis (1958) were in this connection preparatory works. One-Dimensional Man: Studies in the Ideology of Advanced Industrial Society (1964), published amid the civil rights movement and the Berkeley free-speech uprising, established direct ties between Marcuse and the New Left. His main subsequent writings—"Repressive Tolerance" (1965); Essay on Liberation (1969); Counter-Revolution and Revolt (1972); and The Aesthetic Dimension (1978)—and the innumerable essays, talks at meetings and rallies, letters, and travels from the late 1960s until his death, constitute a remarkable burst of politically inspired productivity, and reflect his engagement with and hopes for the movement. It is in this specific sense that he was its theorist.

Like many of the student radicals his writings would influence in the 1960s, Marcuse came from a family of means. Born in Berlin on 19 July 1898, he grew up in the comfortable and cultivated confines of the German-Jewish bourgeoisie. This proved to be a fruitful vantage point for critically observing the onset of the "iron cage" of bureaucracy that, during the years of Marcuse's youth, Max Weber had defined as the inescapable destiny of industrialism.

The Great War drew Marcuse toward the political Left. During the revolutionary ferment at the war's end, he participated in a Berlin Soldier's Council and was briefly a member of the Social Democratic Party of Germany. With the ebbing of the revolutionary wave, many in Marcuse's generation of leftists placed their bets on vanguard parties of the Leninist type or gradualist reforms. He turned to aesthetics and philosophy, and entered the University of Freiburg. Many of his writings from the 1920s are weighty works of scholarship: the (unpublished) 1922 doctoral dissertation on the German "artist novel"; the 1925 bibliographic study of Friedrich Schiller, the Romantic dramatist and aesthetic theorist; and the 1932 Habilitationschrift (required for eligibility as a university professor) on Hegel's philosophy of "historicity." Nevertheless, these texts indicate the vigor of Marcuse's romantic anticapitalism and his continued effort to articulate the cultural bases of alternatives to the bourgeois order.

Much influenced by Georg Lukács's History and Class Consciousness (1923), and immersed in Hegelian philosophy, Marcuse, in 1927, began several years of close association with Martin Heidegger. His essays in both scholarly and Social Democratic journals, including a brilliant commentary on Marx's "1844 Manuscripts" on alienation, which had appeared in print for the first time in 1932, show Marcuse trying to restore to Marxism an activist philosophy of subjectivity and a culturally radical vision of emancipa-tion. Some see him as having been the first "Heideggerian Marxist."

Shortly before the Nazi seizure of power in 1933, Marcuse began his affiliation with the "Frankfurt School" of social theory, soon joining its migration to Geneva, Paris, and finally New York. Some of his major essays from this phase of his career appeared in translation in Negations: Essays in Critical Theory (1968). Reason and Revolution: Hegel and the Rise of Social Theory (1941) is the great work of this period. Under the impact of fascism on the one hand and the leading thinkers of the Frankfurt circle, Max Horkheimer and T. W. Adorno, on the other, the Heideggerian and utopian dimensions of Marcuse's thinking tended to recede, while a more Hegelian and rationalist Marxism, as well as a more intensive critique of industrial society, came to the fore. With Eros and Civilization and One-Dimensional Man, Marcuse united these elements of his thinking.

During and shortly after the war, he worked, along with other members of the exiled Frankfurt group, in a branch of the Office of Strategic Services, forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency, doing research on Nazi and Fascist ideology in conjunction with Allied plans for occupation and denazification of Germany. His first wife, Sophie, died in 1951. During the early 1950s Marcuse was affiliated with Columbia and Harvard Universities, taking a more permanent post in philosophy at Brandeis University in 1955. When Brandeis did not renew his contract in 1964, he assumed his last academic position at the University of California in San Diego, where he became the bête noire of the southern California right wing. Marcuse's second wife, Inge, the widow of Franz Neumann, died in 1973. Three years later, he and Erica Sherover, his longtime student and research assistant, were married. Marcuse died in Starnberg, West Germany, on 29 July 1979.

[See also New Left; Psychoanalysis.]

FURTHER READING

- Breines, Paul, ed. Critical Interruptions: New Left Perspectives on Herbert Marcuse. New York: Herder and Herder, 1970.
- Geoghegan, Vincent. Reason and Eros: The Social Theory of Herbert Marcuse. London: Pluto, 1981.
- Katz, Barry. Herbert Marcuse: Art of Liberation. London: Verso, 1982.
- Kellner, Douglas. Herbert Marcuse and the Crisis of Marxism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984.
- Lipshires, Sidney S. Herbert Marcuse: From Marx to Freud and Beyond. Cambridge, Mass.: Schenkman, 1974.

Mattick, Paul. Critique of Marcuse. London: Merlin, 1972.
 Schoolman, Morton. Imaginary Witness: The Critical Theory of Herbert Marcuse. New York: Free Press, 1980.

—PAUL BREINES

MARCY, MARY EDNA (1866–1922). A major publicist, pamphleteer, and editorialist for Debsian Socialism's left wing, working-class militant Mary E. Marcy was a central figure at Charles H. Kerr Publishing Company in the 1910s. A key member of the editorial board of Kerr's International Socialist Review (ISR) after December 1908, Marcy played a significant role in shaping the Left line against war and militarism prior to U.S. entry into World War I. She joined the Socialist Party in 1903 and the Industrial Workers of the World in 1918.

Marcy's muckraking "Letters of a Pork Packer's Stenographer" ran serially in the ISR in 1904 and won her instant notoriety within Left circles. She and her husband, Leslie H. Marcy, soon became regular contributors to the Kerr monthly. A student of John Dewey at the University of Chicago, she maintained a political and pedagogical conviction that Marxian theory had to be presented in a clear, simple fashion if the movement was to make serious headway with American workers. One of her many writings, her now classic economics primer, Shop Talks on Economics, first appeared in the ISR in 1911 and subsequently went through numerous editions and translations and reached a circulation of over two million by 1922.

Marcy also wrote children's books and materialist tracts on housework and on sexual relations. Women as Sex Vendors; or, Why Women Are Conservative (1918) examined women's subordinate status in relation to sex and morality. She followed this theme in a short dramatic work, A Free Union: A One-Act Drama of "Free Love" (1921).

An irrepressible oppositional voice to World War I, Marcy became a target of governmental surveillance and harassment following U.S. entry. Demoralized and exhausted by personal and political losses effected by the war and the onslaught against the Left, she took her own life in 1922.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; International Socialist Review.]

FURTHER READING

Carney, Jack. Mary Marcy. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1923.

—ALLEN RUFF

Mary Marcy's best-known children's book, 1922.

MARKHAM, EDWIN (1852–1940). Born in Oregon City, Oregon, the youngest of nine children and originally named Charles Edward Anson, Edwin Markham was the son of a mother who was a religious fanatic and a father who denied his paternity. Shortly after his parents' divorce, Markham and his mother moved to central California. Before he was twelve he had become a farm laborer, tended sheep, and had received a few months of schooling. In his early twenties he graduated from Christian College in Santa Rosa.

Markham became a school teacher and principal, entered into an unhappy nine-year marriage, began reading widely in Christian socialism, and published his first poems. Following the death of his mother in 1891 he changed his name to Edwin, entered San Francisco's literary life, and again experienced an unhappy, but brief, marriage. During these years he was an intimate member of a group of poets and authors which included Joaquin Miller, Jack London, and Ambrose Bierce.

In January 1899, the San Francisco Examiner published Markham's "The Man with the Hoe," lavishly illustrated and set in special type. Based upon Jean-François Millet's painting of a tired, work-worn French peasant which had deeply moved Markham when he first viewed it several years earlier, the poem eloquently articulated Markham's Christian socialism. It became an instant success in socialist circles, cost Markham his friendship with the conservative Bierce, and brought him international recognition. In impassioned blank verse Markham described a peasant "bowed by the centuries," carrying "on his back the burden of the world," who is so "distorted and soul-quenched" by backbreaking and mind-numbing labor that he is "dead to rapture and despair" and a "brother to the ox." "Oh masters, lords and rulers in all lands," warned the poet, "How will it be with kingdoms . . . with those who shaped him to the thing he is . . . when this dumb Terror shall reply to God after the silence of the centuries?" Almost immediately in the United States and in Europe the poem became a powerful and emotionally charged symbol of worker exploitation. There were no takers to railroad magnate Collis Huntington's offer of a $5,000 honorarium to any poet who might refute the poem in equally effective verse. The poem was ultimately translated into forty languages, appeared virtually in every socialist publication in the world, was issued in special printings, and continues as a staple in poetry anthologies to this day.

Now Markham was freed financially to become a full-time poet. In 1900, married for the third time, this time happily, he moved to Staten Island, New York, where he became active in the city's literary life. In 1901 he published "Lincoln, Man of the People," his only other poem to match "The Man with the Hoe" in originality of expression, although not in popularity. He was a founder of the New York Poetry Society (now the Poetry Society of America) in 1910, and in 1914 he incorporated several articles he had written into Children of Bondage, a strongly worded indictment of child labor. Markham continued publishing his poems, but overall his work was undistinguished. Throughout the 1920s and 1930s he was a popular lecturer before socialist audiences until failing health led eventually to his death.

FURTHER READING

Ermiston, Susan, and Linda Cirino. Literary New York: A History and Guide. New York: Gibbs-Smith, 1995.

Ferlinghetti, Lawrence, and Nancy Joyce Peters, eds. Literary San Francisco: A Pictorial History from Its Beginnings to the Present Day. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1980.

Markham, Edwin. The Man with the Hoe and Other Poems. New York: Doubleday and McClure, 1899.

Starr, Kevin. Inventing the Dream: California through the Progressive Era. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Stidger, William. Edwin Markham. New York: Abingdon Press, 1933.

—EDMUND B. SULLIVAN

MASSES. The radical magazine the Masses reflected the changing relationship between art and politics in the early twentieth century, as did its successor, the Liberator (1918–1924). The Masses was founded in 1911 by the Dutch-born socialist Piet Vlag (with silent backing from Rufus Weeks, vice president of the New York Life Insurance Company) to promote consumer cooperatives in the United States. Modeled after the earlier cultural publication the Comrade, it included literature by Tolstoy and Sudermann (translated by the editor, Thomas Seltzer), didactic artwork, and articles in support of cooperatives, right-wing Socialism, woman suffrage, and child labor laws. Its contributors included Mary Heaton Vorse, Walter Lippmann, Art Young, and Josephine Conger-Kaneko. This earnest but dull publication failed in 1912 after attempting to merge with the Chicago-based Progressive Woman. Later that year a group of artists revived the Masses as an American equivalent to the lavishly illustrated European satiric journals Simplicissimus and L'Assiette au Beurre; they invited Max Eastman to serve as editor and to raise funds (largely through contributions from wealthy progressives). The artists sought "a magazine we could run around in and be free"—contributors received no pay but exercised artistic control. In protest against the journalistic marketplace, they structured the Masses as a worker-owned cooperative with all editorial decisions to be made by group vote. As editor, Eastman moved the magazine away from Socialist Party "dogma" and toward a more wide-ranging program condemning racism, supporting direct action and the Industrial Workers of the World, and advocating a political theory of "hard-headed idealism"—socialism tempered with the pragmatic philosophy of John Dewey. William English Walling contributed a column on European socialism. The strongest writing was labor reportage from Vorse and John Reed, who joined the staff in 1913. After the Chicago critic Floyd Dell became managing editor that year, the literary content expanded to encompass poems by Carl Sandburg, Amy Lowell, and Louis Untermeyer, and stories by Sherwood Anderson, in addition to early attempts at proletarian fiction. Dell, a noted "Greenwich Villager," also brought an interest in psychology, feminism, and free love. The Masses soon encountered legal difficulties stemming from its attacks on the capitalist press and organized religion, and its advocacy of birth control. All of these positions were presented with irreverent humor, echoing the editors' promise to "conciliate nobody, not even our readers." The journal soon attracted a reputation and a following far beyond its circulation of between fifteen thousand and twenty-five thousand.

The MASSES

The Return from Toil.

July 1913 cover by John Sloan.

The Masses was noted for its art. As official art editor, the painter and illustrator John Sloan redesigned the layout and worked with printers to reproduce vivid two-color covers and the heavy black crayon drawings favored by followers of the socially conscious cartoonist Honoré Daumier. The magazine attracted a group of urban realists who later became known as the Ashcan School (George Bellows, Stuart Davis, Glenn Coleman, and others); their drawings of New York's immigrant neighborhoods in the Masses rival their better-known "fine art" paintings and prints. The Masses also printed political cartoons "too naked and true for the money-making press" by Robert Minor, Boardman Robinson, Maurice Becker, Kenneth Russell Chamberlain, and Art Young, social satire, and figure studies and landscapes with no overt political message.

The twin goals of "free expression" and "appealing to the masses with the livelier forms of propaganda" led to conflicts that erupted during World War I, when most of the art staff "struck" over the issue of adding propagandistic captions to "straight" illustrations. Eastman's efforts to commit the Masses to an anti-war position eventually ran afoul of the postmaster general, who revoked the magazine's mailing license under the Espionage Act of 1917. In an early test of free-speech laws, the Masses editors were vindicated during a series of well-publicized court cases in 1917 and 1918 but lost access to the mails through a legal technicality; the loss of distribution outlets forced the magazine out of business in December 1917.

[See also Gellert, Hugo; Giovannitti, Arturo; Greenwich Village; Liberator; Minor, Robert; New Masses; Reed, John; Sandburg, Carl; Vorse, Mary Heaton; Young, Art.]

FURTHER READING

- Eastman, Max. Enjoyment of Living. New York: Harper, 1948.
- Eastman, Max. Love and Revolution: My Journey through an Epoch. New York: Random House, 1964.
- Fishbein, Leslie. Rebels in Bohemia: The Radicals of The Masses, 1911-1917. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1982.
- Heller, Adele, and Lois Rudnick, eds. Beginnings: The Cultural Moment, 1915. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1991.
- Jones, Margaret C. Heretics and Hellraisers: Women Contributors to The Masses, 1911-1917. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993.
- Maik, Thomas A. The Masses Magazine, 1911-1917. New York: Garland Publishing, 1994.
- Sheppard, Alice. Cartooning for Suffrage. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1993.
- Zurier, Rebecca. Art for the Masses: A Radical Magazine and its Graphics, 1911-1917. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1988.

—REBECCA ZURIER

MATTHIESSEN, FRANCIS OTTO (1902–1950). One of twentieth century's most influential literary scholar/critics, F. O. Matthiessen was born in California, grew up in Illinois, went to Yale as an undergraduate and, after two years in Europe as a Rhodes scholar, attended Harvard for his graduate degrees. He began his career as an instructor at Yale (1927–1929), but soon returned to Harvard, where he was a commanding teacher and influential adviser and activist (1929–1950).

Like the New Critics (e.g., John Crowe Ransom, Robert Penn Warren, Cleanth Brooks), Matthiessen stressed close attention to the text itself, to the tones, images, and ambiguities of the words on the page. Yet he also insisted that each text be examined within its social and political as well as literary contexts, and he showed a passionate concern for the contemporary impact of the literature of America's past. He argued that the insights into the national character articulated by Emerson, Whitman, Thoreau, Hawthorne, and Melville, and the ideals of freedom and equality that they affirmed, provide a "literature for our democracy." These words appear in the preface to Matthiessen's major book, American Renaissance (1941), which, as the literary historian Sacvan Bercovitch has said, "reset the terms for the study of American literary history; it gave us a new canon of classic texts; and it inspired the growth of American Studies in the United States and abroad."

Matthiessen's life was multifaceted and complex, and his personal, professional, and political interests and loyalties were precariously balanced. He was an Ivy League professor; a homosexual; a devout Christian; a socialist; a political radical who wrote highly favorable studies of the conservative authors T. S. Eliot (1935; rev. 1947) and Henry James (1944); a believer in the primacy of high artistic standards whose final book focused on the stylistically clumsy Theodore Dreiser (1951); an advocate of equality and inclusiveness who rarely wrote about women authors (an exception is his first book, on Sarah Orne Jewett, 1929) and not at all about African American authors (not one is included in the Matthiessen edition of the Oxford Book of American Verse, published in 1950).

Matthiessen was involved in many progressive groups and organizations, including the Harvard Teachers Union and the Massachusetts American Civil Liberties Union. He told the critic Daniel Aaron that "only his conviction of Original Sin" prevented him from becoming a member of the Communist Party. One of his students, Leo Marx, noted that "one hundred years ago in New England he might have been a minister," adding that Matthiessen referred to his appointment at Harvard as "accepting a call." During the postwar years, Matthiessen was viewed with suspicion and hostility by both the political Right and the anti-Stalinist Left (e.g., Irving Howe). He committed suicide in Boston on 1 April 1950.

FURTHER READING

- Aaron, Daniel. American Notes: Selected Essays. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1994.
- Bercovitch, Sacvan. "The Problem of Ideology in American Literary History." Critical Inquiry 12 (1986).
- Cain, William E. F. O. Matthiessen and the Politics of Criticism. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1988.
- Gunn, Giles. F. O. Matthiessen: The Critical Achievement. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1975.
- Howe, Irving. "The Sentimental Fellow-Travelling of F. O. Matthiessen." Partisan Review 15 (1948).
- Marx, Leo. The Pilot and the Passenger: Essays on Literature, Technology, and Culture in the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Stern, Frederick. F. O. Matthiessen: Christian Socialist as Critic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.
- Sweezy, Paul M., and Leo Huberman, eds. F. O. Matthiessen (1902–1950): A Collective Portrait. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1951.
- White, George Abbott. "Ideology and Literature: American Renaissance and F. O. Matthiessen." In Literature in Revolution, special issue of TriQuarterly 23/24 (winter/spring 1972).

—WILLIAM E. CAIN

MATTSON, HELMI. See Toveritar/Naisten Viiri.

MAURER, JAMES HUDSON (1864–1944). A machinist and steamfitter, James Hudson Maurer was a major figure in the Socialist Party and the American Federation of Labor from 1901 until the early 1930s. He joined the Knights of Labor in 1880 and held local and regional offices in the Reading, Pennsylvania, area. During the 1890s he was blacklisted because of activities as an organizer for the People's (Populist) Party, Henry George's single tax clubs, and the Socialist Labor Party. In 1901 Maurer joined the Socialist Party, eventually serving as its candidate for vice president of the United States in 1928 and 1932. In 1910 Maurer was the first Socialist elected to the Pennsylvania State General Assembly, where he led the fight for workmen's compensation and child labor laws.

Maurer served as president of the Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor (1912–1928) and was a founder and first president of Workers Education Bureau (1921–1929). During World War I Maurer was an active opponent of U.S. participation. Other activities included campaigning for birth control, serving on the executive board of the 1924 presidential campaign of Robert La Follette, and participating in a labor delegation to the Soviet Union in 1927. He was elected to the Reading City Council in 1927 on the Socialist Party slate.

[See also Municipal Socialism; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Maurer, James Hudson. It Can Be Done. New York: Rand School Press, 1938.

—ALAN SINGER

MAY DAY. An ancient holiday marked by celebrations in praise of spring and by symbolic evocations of fertility, May Day perhaps inevitably became the revolutionary holiday of the nineteenth-century workers' movement. As in British artist Walter Crane's famous May Day drawings (much reprinted in the U.S. socialist press), the vision of socialism seemed to speak at once to the natural yearnings for emancipation from the winter season and from the wintry epoch of class society.

In May 1886 several hundred thousand American workers marched into international labor history when they demonstrated for the eight-hour day. An unusual and informal alliance between the fledgling American Federation of Labor (AFL), local assemblies of the Knights of Labor, and disparate tendencies within the anarchist movement ignited a pent-up demand for shorter working hours. The social and labor ferment that crested in 1885–1886 also marked the maturing of the Knights of Labor into the first meaningful national labor organization in the United States. The leadership of the Knights, however, envisioned the eight-hour day as an educational, political, and evolutionary achievement rather than an agitational and revolutionary one. On the other hand, the infant AFL, soon to molt from the impotent Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions, tied its star to the militant eight-hour actions. The third grouping in the labor triad comprised that section of the anarchists, mainly European immigrants, who emphasized trade union work as a vehicle to social revolution.

Cartoon by I. Swenson from the Industrial Worker, 1920.

This uneasy and unsettled coalition targeted 1 May 1886 as the day of industrial reckoning. In Boston, Milwaukee, New York City, Pittsburgh, and especially Chicago, tens of thousands of workers rallied and struck for "eight hours for work, eight hours for rest, eight hours for what we will." The nation's newspapers warned that the spirit of the Paris Commune was loose in the land and pointed to specific personalities among the anarchists to prove the point. But the day passed peacefully except in the misgrained minds of some employers who reluctantly capitulated to the eight-hour day.

Whether that May day would have been a one-time workers' holiday or "forever remembered," in the words of Samuel Gompers, "as a second Declaration of Independence," is a moot point. The events of a few days later projected it into an international framework and seared the conscience of labor activists ever since. A rally by striking lumbermen near the scene of a labor conflict at the McCormick Harvester Works in suburban Chicago led to a clash with scabs at the famous farm-implement company.

Chicago police, already seasoned in labor brutality, mortally wounded several demonstrators.

The Chicago anarchists, who only a few days earlier had organized the peaceful eight-hour parade locally, called for a protest demonstration against the killings. The following night, on 4 May, a thousand rallied at Haymarket Square in the city. The mayor of Chicago listened warily in the crowd until a thunderstorm sent His Honor and most of the throng home for the evening. Inexplicably, a large contingent of police seemingly waited for the mayor's departure to forcibly disperse the remaining two hundred demonstrators. As the officers sallied into the depleted group, a bomb was thrown into their ranks. Dozens of policemen were injured and eventually seven died, although some may have perished from their comrades' panicked shooting. That response led to widespread but undocumented wounding of many nameless protesters.

The media's failed predictions of violent upheaval for the May Day rallies three days earlier was now easily transferred to the "Haymarket Affair." The forces of law and order understood that the carnage at Haymarket, regardless of who threw the missile, could discredit the labor movement and eradicate its more radical European appendages through a nascent Red Scare. The ensuing show trial in Chicago blessed the miscegenation of May Day and the Haymarket bombing in the popular mind.

The concept of May Day had meanwhile spread rapidly to the international workers' movement, one of American labor's (and radicals') most important innovations. In 1889 the International Socialist Congress in Paris, with full knowledge of the American precedent, designated 1 May as an eight-hour holiday for workers of the world. Already by 1891 May Day became the occasion for violent clashes between police and radicals, as in Rome. Elaborate ceremonies soon evolved, with songs, banners, uniforms, even dioramas to mark the date, often with drawings of the Haymarket victims uplifted as a martyrology. Anarchists, understandably, expressed this particular aspect with the most fervor.

While some labor historians and commentators have claimed that the reaction to the Haymarket bombing debilitated the Knights of Labor and severely curtailed the growing ascendancy of organized labor, the puzzle contains many more pieces than that. The AFL, for example, continued its agitation over the eight-hour day with annual May Day rallies and ceremonies during the 1890s. The proliferation of May Day was thereafter increasingly intertwined with socialist politics, because spiraling conservatism by Gompers and the AFL elevated Labor Day over May Day as the preferred holiday of the American House of Labor.

Immigrants who had participated abroad in May Day events brought the celebrations back to the United States around the turn of the century. More than twenty nationalities held ceremonies—often both miniature versions of events in homelands and a time of joining symbolically with other American workers—from urban neighborhoods to mining camps and farm districts. Finnish Americans, following in part premodern festivities, erected huge bonfires, around which they sang the "Internationale" in Finnish. Immigrant children's musical and theatrical groups, a major focus of leisure activities for all ages, staged their epiphanic performance of the year. Older participants listened to speeches, drank, and danced from night to early dawn.

English-language socialist May Day ceremonies, and even those conducted by the Industrial Workers of the World, although impressive at times, could hardly rival the intensity of the ethnic celebrations. The May Day demonstrations and marches, especially in New York City, perhaps most effectively combined the various groups and sentiments. The advent of World War I, widespread repression, and the division of the movement into Socialist and Communist camps dampened May Day and fairly ended celebrations among mainstream unions. Communists led a partial revival during the 1930s, when the slogan "All Out for May Day" regained a resonance. The Cold War, the isolation of the Left unions, and the aging of the ethnic constituency fairly ended public ceremonies. Radical student-based movements of the 1960s–1970s occasionally attempted, without much success, a revival of the holiday. Most Americans remain oblivious of the continued May Day celebrations of labor, socialist, and communist movements across Europe.

To many Americans (whose elected leaders had, by the 1950s, attempted to institute a celebration of Law Day on 1 May), May Day evoked only images of missiles and tanks on display in Red Square. The real spirit could be found elsewhere, as among black South African miners who, at tremendous personal risk, took off that day to demonstrate for better working conditions and to remember the Haymarket martyrs.

[See also Anarchism; Communist Party, USA; Haymarket Incident; Second International; Socialist Labor Party; Socialist Party; Third International.]

FURTHER READING

- Hobsbawm, Eric, and Terence Ranger, eds. The Invention of Tradition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Roediger, David, and Franklin Rosemont, eds. Haymarket Scrapbook. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1986.
- Vecoli, Rudolph. " 'Primo Maggio' in the United States: An Invented Tradition of the Italian Anarchists." In May Day Celebration, Quaderni della Fondazione G. Brodolini, edited by Andrea Panaccione. Venice: Marsilio Editori, 1988.

—SCOTT MOLLOY

McCARTHYISM. During the late 1940s and 1950s, thousands of men and women who were or had been active in the Left fell victim to a massive wave of political repression. Named McCarthyism in honor of the senator from Wisconsin who dominated the news with his reckless charges of subversion in the federal government, the movement was actually a far broader and more effective campaign that not only helped destroy the American Communist Party as an effective political organization, but also drove the Left out of American politics for more than a decade. Nonetheless, when compared with political repression in other societies, McCarthyism was comparatively mild. Only two people (Julius and Ethel Rosenberg) were executed and a few hundred others sent to jail; unemployment and the threat of deportations were the main punishments.

Though anticommunism had long been an important element of American politics, it was not until the United States became involved in the Cold War that it became the dominant element. At that point, the anticommunist program of the political Right was transformed into a national crusade to eliminate Communism and all the groups, individuals, and ideas associated with it from any position of influence within American society. The McCarthyist crusade operated on several levels and contained several different strands. A common thread, however, was the proposition that Communism was such a serious threat to the nation's security that its adherents did not deserve the political and civil rights that other Americans enjoyed. In this period, even the most extreme McCarthyites—like those who felt that the United Nations was as subversive as the Communist Party—often had enough political or economic power to pass legislation or to get people fired.

The McCarthyist crusade began in Washington, D.C., where the Truman administration, under pressure from the traditionally more anticommunist Republican Party, mounted a campaign against domestic Communists as a way of defending itself against charges that it was soft on Communism. The centerpiece of that campaign was a loyalty-security program for government employees. The program, embodied in President Truman's Executive Order 9835 of March 1947, barred Communists, fascists, and other totalitarians as well as anybody guilty of "sympathetic association" with them. Though there was some criticism of Executive Order 9835 at the time, most of it was directed against the program's lack of procedural safeguards and reliance on unnamed informers. The core of the program, the institution of a political test for employment, was not seriously questioned and, in fact, quickly spread from the federal government to private employers.

The Truman administration's loyalty-security program made the campaign against domestic Communism a national priority. It also established the Socialist Workers Party pamphlet cover, early 1950s.

STOP McCarthyism!

Your Stake in the Fight

- as a
- working man or woman
  - union member
  - Negro
  - member of any racial or religious minority
  - liberal
  - housewife and mother
  - artist — writer — professional

Pioneer Publishers

10 cents

two-stage procedure that was to characterize McCarthyism. First the supposed subversives were identified, then they were punished. The first stage, that of identification, was usually handled by some kind of governmental organization, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, for example, or a congressional investigating committee, though conservative journalists and right-wing vigilante groups also fingered people, often with help from the Bureau.

The second stage of the McCarthyist process was the application of sanctions. Federal, state, and local governments sometimes administered this stage as well. Most of the time, however, the second stage of McCarthyism was handled by private employers who readily collaborated with the process by firing the individuals who had been identified as politically undesirable during the first stage. Although the first-stage identification procedure is quite well known and is, in fact, what most people usually identify as McCarthyism, it is clear that without the second-stage application of sanctions, the anticommunist offensive would have been much less effective. That second stage not only made it difficult for Communists and other leftists to remain politically active and lead normal lives, but also drew the private sector into the picture.

Most of the people affected were Communists or former Communists who refused to repudiate their past political activities. The Party's leaders probably suffered the most severe penalties. Although the federal government never actually outlawed the Party, it harassed it so severely that it had to devote most of its activities to its own defense. Probably the most significant action in that regard was the indictment and conviction of the Party's top leaders under the 1940 Smith Act for "conspiring to teach and advocate" the forcible overthrow of the government of the United States. Though the Smith Act was a clear violation of the First Amendment's protection of free speech, in 1951 the Supreme Court upheld the Communist leaders' conviction, thus reinforcing the notion that the Party's activities constituted a "clear and present danger" to the nation's security.

Another important element in the McCarthyist campaign was the anticommunist investigations carried out by conservative congressmen. These investigations performed several functions. They not only identified individuals as politically undesirable, but they also provided a forum for the Republican Party's charges that Democratic administrations had tolerated communist subversion. These charges gained substance after the House Un-American Activities Committee's (HUAC) hearings on Communists in government in the fall of 1948 uncovered in the Alger Hiss case what appeared to be an example of high-level espionage. Accused of having been a Communist and then of having passed government documents, Hiss, a former State Department official, denied the charges and was ultimately convicted of perjury, primarily on the testimony of Whittaker Chambers, a self-confessed former spy. The Hiss case not only gave substance to the Republican charges that the New Deal regime had been harboring Communists, but it also enhanced the stature of HUAC and the other anticommunist investigating committees.

Joseph McCarthy was only the most notorious of the congressional anticommunist investigators. He differed from the rest only in that he attacked liberals as well as radicals. But the burden of his charges was the same: he was trying to pin responsibility for such supposed American setbacks as the Communist victory in China on internal subversion. When McCarthy got out of control and continued his attacks even after a Republican administration had taken over, he was finally stopped. But his earlier charges and those of the other congressional investigators did enormous damage, both to the careers and personal lives of the individuals they targeted as well as to the rest of society.

Because employers collaborated with the anti-communist investigating committees by firing the people who refused to cooperate with them, the committees' witnesses had few options. Cooperation, as the committees defined it, meant giving the names of former political comrades, a degrading procedure designed to force people to repudiate their left-wing pasts. Witnesses who named names usually kept their jobs; witnesses who did not usually lost theirs. In addition, they risked going to jail for contempt of Congress. The Supreme Court, whose majority apparently condoned the anticommunist crusade, did not protect people from having to answer the committees' questions about their political beliefs and associations. The only protection the Court upheld was that embodied in the Fifth Amendment's privilege against having to testify against oneself. The committees, which knew that many of their witnesses had invoked the Fifth Amendment only to avoid becoming informers, exploited these people's predicament by branding them as "Fifth Amendment Communists."

Though the men and women who faced congressional investigators received the most publicity during the McCarthy period, thousands of other people also lost their jobs or were harassed in other ways. Loyalty oaths proliferated, especially for government employees at the state and local level. Security clearances for defense-related work affected scientists and engineers. Exact figures are hard to come by, though one source estimates that approximately ten thousand people may have lost their jobs. Unemployment was not the only sanction. The Immigration and Naturalization Service threatened to deport foreign-born radicals and the State Department denied passports to suspected Reds. There were unofficial harassments as well, from the entertainment industry blacklists to anonymous telephone calls. Many people who did not lose their jobs or go to jail nonetheless suffered considerable personal strain and anxiety.

It is difficult to assess the damage that McCarthyism did to the American Left. Certainly, it contributed to the demise of the American Communist Party as a politically viable movement, though the Party's own internal problems and self-destructive behavior in the face of the campaign against it was also a factor. More important, by increasing the personal risks associated with political radicalism, McCarthyism created a climate that discouraged people from participating in left-wing activities. Those radicals who remained active had to devote most of their attention to self-defense. As a result, it was not until McCarthyism began to subside in the late 1950s that the American Left could again focus on such issues as peace, racial equality, and economic justice.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Federal Bureau of Investigation; House Committee on Un-American Activities; National Lawyers Guild; Rosenberg Case.]

FURTHER READING

- Carleton, Don E. Red Scare! Right-Wing Hysteria, Fifties Fanaticism and Their Legacy in Texas. Austin: Texas Monthly Press, 1985.
- Caute, David. The Great Fear. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1978.
- Navasky, Victor. Naming Names. New York: Viking, 1980.
- O'Reilly, Kenneth. Hoover and the Un-Americans. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1983.
- Schrecker, Ellen W. No Ivory Tower: McCarthyism and the Universities. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

—ELLEN W. SCHRECKER

McGRATH, TOM (1916–1990). One of America's most prolific and intrepid radical poets, Tom McGrath was born in North Dakota at the outset of the great Non-Partisan League period of the state's history. McGrath's father, a farmer, was sympathetic to the Industrial Workers of the World as well. This rural experience was critical to the formation of McGrath's consciousness and to his sensibility from his literary beginnings to his latest works.

After studying at the University of North Dakota and receiving a B.A., McGrath was awarded a Rhodes Scholarship. Because of World War II, he attended graduate school at Louisiana State University instead. For a time in 1942, McGrath worked as a welder in the shipyards of New Jersey, and became active with the Communist Party. The brutal conditions of work, and penetration of unions by organized crime, helped form the basis of an important collection of poems, Longshot O'Leary's Garland of Practical Poesie (1949), and a novel, This Coffin Has No Handles (1984).

After the war and army service in Alaska, McGrath took the Rhodes Scholarship at New College, Oxford, and in 1951 accepted a teaching position at Los Angeles State College. In 1953 he refused in defiant terms to cooperate with the House Un-American Activities Committee, and he was dismissed from his academic position. Regarded on the Left as an especially promising political writer, he continued his work as editorial assistant on the short-lived Mainstream (1946–1947) and on a science-fiction novel, The Gates of Ivory, The Gates of Horn (1957). He also commenced a multilayered narrative "pseudo-autobiography" (McGrath's own description), including narratives from the frontier heritage of North Dakota, the crushing of the Industrial Workers of the World, life on the New York waterfront, and the defeat of the Left. This Letter to an Imaginary Friend has appeared in four sections. Parts 1 and 2 were published by Swallow Press in 1969 and parts 3 and 4 by Cooper Canyon Press in 1985. McGrath has had three volumes of his selected poetry published since the early 1960s: New and Selected Poems (1964), The Movie at the End of the World (1972), and Selected Poems (1988). A documentary on his life and work also bears the title The Movie at the End of the World. A Soviet edition of his selected work was published in Russian by Raduga in Moscow (1984), and his novel This Coffin Has No Handles was published in their journal Foreign Literature (1987).

[See also Mainstream; Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s.]

FURTHER READING

"The Dream Champ." Special issue of North Dakota Quarterly (fall 1982).

"Thomas McGrath: Life and the Poem." Special issue of Tri-Quarterly (fall 1987).

Stern, Fred, ed. The Revolutionary Poet in the United States. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1988.

—FRED WHITEHEAD

McKAY, CLAUDE (1890–1948). A decisive personal link between the Harlem Renaissance, the West Indies, and the Left, Claude McKay had published two volumes of poetry in Jamaica before arriving in the United States in 1912. Like his literary aspirations, McKay's political tendencies had already developed early in Jamaica, where he came into contact with Fabian socialists through his brother's interest in the ideas of Sir Sidney Oliver and through his own love of the works of George Bernard Shaw.

McKay's first year in America occurred at a moment when socialist thought and action were widely felt. The zeal and unwavering idealism of the Industrial Workers of the World appealed most to him, and by 1919 he had joined their ranks. During this phase, he met and became close friends with Hubert H. Harrison, dynamic Harlem street-corner orator, black socialist, and prolific essayist. When McKay's books later failed to get proper recognition in the black press, Harrison took up the cudgels, extolling McKay as "the greatest living poet of Negro blood in America today."

The Masses also deeply influenced McKay with its stirring (if sometimes inconsistent) antiracism. He joined his friend Max Eastman on the board of the Liberator, created in 1917 to succeed the repressed Masses, and remained an editor into the early 1920s. The Liberator in 1919 published his famous poem "If We Must Die," a stirring call to arms against aggressive capitalism. Not yet thirty, McKay was fully committed to the struggle—and to a literary career.

McKay soon joined such Harlem radical figures as Harrison, Cyril Briggs, Richard B. Moore, and Harry Haywood in the African Blood Brotherhood, a small but vital political group that merged with the Communist Party. But he continued to function as a maverick, refusing to submit to Party discipline, determined not to allow his ambitions and ideas to be controlled or subordinated. Meanwhile, he remained a tireless poet, journalist, and black radical. From 1919 to 1923 he traveled to Russia, Germany, and other parts of Europe, making a dramatic appearance at the Comintern and acquiring an international reputation among radical intellectuals. He remained unimpressed by political accolades and attention (possibly, as he suggested in his autobiography, because he could not take the American Communist movement as seriously as it took itself). He achieved the wide literary recognition he had sought with the publication of his poetry volume Literary Shadows (1923).

Ironically, the three novels destined to bring McKay lasting fame and notoriety—Home to Harlem, Banjo, and Banana Bottom—were all written and published during a twelve-year hiatus in Europe. He had portrayed black life, in the United States and elsewhere, in many aspects; he had written deeply about the dilemmas of blacks in Western civilization, and about the pleasures of ordinary mass life. But he felt an alienation or melancholy, mirrored in his inability to gain the proper remuneration or royalties from these works. McKay returned to the United States in 1934 a lonely and destitute literary figure, disenchanting with communism.

The remainder of his life would be anticlimactic. Although he continued to write, his creative impulse withered along with his failing health. In 1938 he formed a friendship with Ellen Tarry, a black Catholic writer of children's books. Through her influence, he converted to Roman Catholicism less than four years before his death.

FURTHER READING

Baker, Houston. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.

Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.

Cooper, Wayne. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.

—HERB BOYD

McKENNEY, RUTH (1911–1972). Best remembered for her first and best-selling book, My Sister Eileen (1938), which inspired two Broadway plays and a Hollywood film, Ruth McKenney joined the Communist Party of the United States in the late 1930s and edited the "Strictly Personal" weekly column in the New Masses. Born in Mishawaka, Indiana, and educated at Ohio State University, McKenney worked for a time as a newspaper reporter and contributed short fiction to such mainstream magazines as Harper's and the New Yorker. In 1937 she married fellow New Masses writer Richard Branstein, who wrote under the name Bruce Minton, and later published a fictionalized version of their courtship and marriage, Love Story (1950).

When McKenney met Branstein, both were working on books on the American labor movement. McKenney's Industrial Valley (1939) recounts the conditions surrounding the Akron, Ohio, rubber workers' strike of 1936. McKenney used articles in local newspapers to piece together a daily journal of the strike. Industrial Valley presents a vivid portrait of class relations in Depression America and follows political events into the homes of individual workers. A sociological study and political commentary, Industrial Valley was judged at the time of its publication "the most original and readable piece of American labor history ever written." The American Writers Congress awarded McKenney its prize for nonfiction in 1938 and again in 1939.

McKenney next tried her hand at a proletarian novel, Jake Home (1943), a story about a fictional union organizer and Communist that met, despite favorable reviews, with little popular acclaim. McKenney's unsuccessful novel nevertheless provided a vivid portrait of problematical sex and class relations within the labor movement, a subject that eventually earned McKenney sharp criticism from the Daily Worker. While McKenney herself believed her protagonist was too pious, she concluded that her Communist critics required a yet more idealistic and one-dimensional treatment that placed labor organizers "in a sort of left-wing Little Women fireside atmosphere."

McKenney wrote several articles in the New Masses on the relationship between wage-earning and women's domestic responsibilities. Unlike Mary Inman, she did not value domestic labor and argued to the contrary that women's emancipation depended upon their equal access to the realm of social production.

In 1946 McKenney and Branstein were expelled from the Communist Party for failing to condemn the discredited leadership of Earl Browder. They drifted in the political wilderness while collaborating on historical fiction and travel literature.

[See also Communist Party, USA; New Masses; Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s.]

—MARI JO BUHLE

MCKINNEY, EDWARD BRITT (early 1900s?–1940s?). Afro-American preacher and Southern Tenant Farmers Union (STFU) organizer, Edward Britt McKinney—called E. B. or Britt by his friends—was a bald, garrulous preacher and a near-legendary organizer for the biracial New Deal-era STFU. McKinney joined the Socialist Party in 1933 and was greatly influenced by Marcus Garvey's black nationalism. He was the first black vice president, and therefore the highest-elected Afro-American official of the STFU from its founding in 1934 to 1938. He organized an STFU local in Marked Tree, Arkansas, on the principle of biracial cooperation, inviting whites to Afro-American meetings. Through his leadership, Afro-American and white STFU locals in Marked Tree grew together instead of apart. In 1934 delegates to the STFU convention elected McKinney as vice president. From 1934 to 1938 he worked feverishly, utilizing his church contacts to enlist members into STFU locals. In 1935 he was among an STFU delegation that traveled to Washington to challenge the Agricultural Adjustment Agency concerning the plight of sharecroppers.

McKinney's longtime Garveyism grew stronger after 1935, however, as he saw African Americans beaten year after year to placate poor whites who were also given slightly better government service. His devotion to black separatism inadvertently led him into the middle of a controversy between STFU leader H. L. Mitchell and Donald Henderson, head of the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America (UCAPAWA), both of whom were white. In 1937 STFU leaders had voted reluctantly to enter this affiliate of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, but Mitchell staunchly resisted UCAPAWA efforts to gain centralized control over STFU operations. In 1938 McKinney attempted to create a separate Afro-American organization within the STFU by gaining separate recognition of thirteen black locals in Arkansas by the UCAPAWA. As a result, Mitchell charged that McKinney was working with Henderson to split the STFU along racial lines. At a special executive council meeting in September 1938, McKinney was expelled from his post as vice president and from the union itself for these activities. McKinney then joined two other ousted white leaders, Claude Williams and Commonwealth College in Arkansas and W. L. Blackstone of the President's Council on Farm Tenancy, to oppose Mitchell's leadership of the STFU. However, Mitchell courted McKinney at the fifth annual STFU convention at Cotton Plant, Arkansas, in late 1938, and McKinney decided to repudiate Williams and Blackstone.

McKinney's rejection of black separatism won him readmission to the union, although he did not regain the vice presidency. In 1939 McKinney joined other Afro-American STFU leaders in staying with the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the ongoing conflict between Mitchell and the UCAPAWA. This decision virtually ended farm labor organizing efforts in the 1930s. Apparently, no one knows what happened to the dynamic black leader McKinney, known as a "pillar of Granite in a weary land."

[See also Mitchell, H. L.; Southern Tenant Farmers Union.]

FURTHER READING

Canton, Louis. A Prologue to the Protest Movement: The Missouri Sharecroppers Roadside Demonstration of 1939. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1969.

Grubbs, Donald H. Cry from the Cotton: The Southern Tenant Farmers Union and the New Deal. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1971.

Southern Tenant Farmers Union Papers. Southern Historical Collection, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill.

—ORVILLE VERNON BURTON

McLEVY, JASPER. See Municipal Socialism.

McNAMARA CASE. On 1 October 1910, two explosions tore into the downtown printing plant of the Los Angeles Times. The blasts and a fire they touched off killed twenty-one men. The following April, after an investigation led by private detective William J. Burns, two brothers active in the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers (BSIW)—Secretary-Treasurer John J. McNamara and his younger brother James B. McNamara—were arrested in the Midwest, brought to Los Angeles, and indicted for murder. Thus began one of the most important legal cases in U.S. labor history.

Unionists of all political persuasions portrayed the McNamaras as victims of a frame-up by their corporate enemies. There was a good deal of circumstantial evidence to support this view. Since 1906, the very existence of the BSIW had been under attack from the National Erectors Association, a management group in which United States Steel, the nation's most powerful open-shop corporation, was a major influence. At the same time, organizers from the American Federation of Labor (AFL) had been engaged, since 1910, in a full-scale and partially successful effort to recruit Los Angeles workers into unions. Harrison Gray Otis, publisher of the Times, was a determined foe of organized labor. Convicting the McNamaras for bombing his plant would ruin the local union drive and humble the AFL nationally.

In its breadth and commitment, labor's campaign for the brothers was unprecedented. Samuel Gompers, who Burns hinted had aided the bombers, declared the McNamaras "innocent victims of capitalist greed," vowed to raise $350,000 for the defense team, and hired celebrated attorney Clarence Darrow to lead it. William D. Haywood of the Industrial Workers of the World called for a nationwide general strike on the first day of the trial; unionists throughout California contributed a full day's wages to the cause; and on Labor Day, 1911 (which the AFL renamed "McNamara Day"), huge crowds in every major American city outside the South gathered to proclaim the brothers' innocence. Across the United States, Socialists and business unionists worked together on the defense. In Los Angeles, they also campaigned to elect as mayor Job Harriman, leader of the local Socialist Party. Harriman won a plurality of the vote in a November primary and was favored to win the runoff election a month later.

However, the entire effort rested on quicksand: the McNamaras were guilty. The testimony of a state's witness named Ortie McManigal and Burns's skillful sleuthing revealed that the Times explosion was the crowning blow to a series of eighty-seven bombings that top officers of the BSIW, including John J. McNamara, had carried out since 1906 to force the National Erectors Association to recognize the union. James B. McNamara had placed the dynamite outside the printing plant, intending only to damage the building. But the explosives unexpectedly ignited several drums of highly flammable ink.

On 1 December 1911 (four days before the mayoral runoff), the two brothers came to court and pled guilty—James to the bombing itself and John as an accessory to the dynamiting of a local factory. James received a sentence of life imprisonment, John a sentence of fifteen years. Job Harriman's bid for mayor was decisively defeated. And Los Angeles remained an open-shop stronghold.

But the class hostilities the case revealed did lead, in 1912, to the formation of the pro-labor Federal Commission on Industrial Relations and a tacit alliance between the AFL and President Woodrow Wilson. Ironically, the bomb set by James McNamara allowed Samuel Gompers to join hands with those who ruled the progressive state.

[See also Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Foner, Philip S. History of the Labor Movement in the United States. Vol. 5, The AFL in the Progressive Era, 1910–1915. New York: International Publishers, 1980.
- Kazin, Michael. Barons of Labor: The San Francisco Building Trades and Union Power in the Progressive Era. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
- Stimson, Grace H. Rise of the Labor Movement in Los Angeles. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1955.

—MICHAEL KAZIN

MESSENGER. See Randolph, A. Philip.

MEXICAN AMERICANS. The radicalism of Mexican Americans has taken four primary forms. Irredentist movements sought to restore the lands taken after the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; Mexicans organized their own nationals and Mexican Americans for revolution in Mexico; unions have organized both Mexican and mixed locals that were often radical and had ties with American-led organizations such as the Communist Party; and nationalist movements have sought to assert Mexican needs and culture outside of the political and social institutions of the United States.

The Mexican War waged for the lands that are now the American Southwest did not end with its conclusion in 1848. Excluded from, or literally thrown out of, the economic opportunities of the new territories of the United States, several Mexicans became outlaws and popular heroes. Most notably, Joaquín Murieta, Juan Flores, and Tiburcio Vásquez took to the hills of California in symbolic protest in the two decades after the war in the pattern of the social bandit described in the work of Eric Hobsbawm. In Texas in 1859 Juan N. Cortina raised an army of twelve hundred men that captured the town of Brownsville to secure for Mexicans the rights promised them in the 1848 treaty. Himself a member of the wealthy elite, Cortina railed at the lawlessness that characterized the actions of many Anglo-Texans against lower-class Mexicans. Forced across the border in 1860, he fought against the French during their occupation of Mexico. In a more formal fashion, Las Gorras Blancas (White Caps) organized in New Mexico in association with the Knights of Labor in the late 1880s to protest the alienation of their lands. Land grabbers had dispossessed many Hispanic New Mexicans from their ancestral common lands, pressing them into dependence on wage labor, particularly for the railroads. There many, such as Las Gorras Blancas' founder Juan José Herrera, became involved in the Knights and were exposed to its philosophy of cooperativism. Their activities, though, centered around cutting the fences that had to come to exclude them from their old lands, especially in and around the town of Las Vegas in San Miguel County. In 1890 many of them joined the Peoples Party, which won the county elections, though with little programmatic effect. Factionalized over the use of violence and involvement in elections, Las Gorras Blancas faded from the New Mexican landscape by the mid-1890s, though symbolic wire-cutting continued.

In the Rio Grande Valley of South Texas, Mexicans organized a military movement to regain sovereignty over their lands. In 1914 and 1915 El Plan de San Diego proclaimed "the independence and segregation of the states bordering on the Mexican nation of which states the Republic of Mexico was robbed in a most perfidious manner by North American Imperialism." Such native Tejanos as Aniceto Pizaña and Luis de la Rosa directed armed bands of from twenty-five to one hundred in the valley. By July 1915, raids had become nearly a daily occurrence. By this time over half of the Rio Grande Valley's population left and the area's economy was in ruins. This state of war existed until October, when the border patrols on both sides increased and the raids declined. Again, the land question motivated most of the fighters, though the Texas Rangers—essentially the land-grabbing ranchers' thugs—and the commercialization of life brought by the railroads sparked their actions.

In the late 1950s Reyes López Tijerina (b. 1923) initiated new efforts to restore the ancestral lands of New Mexico that had been granted by the Spanish Crown before 1846. Trying to enlist the support of the Mexican government, the United Nations, and the American courts, Tijerina attempted to enforce the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the legality of the land grants. Legal channels produced only frustration. In 1963 he organized the Alianza Federal de Mercedes, which attracted hundreds of barrio dwellers in Albuquerque who had been pressured off the land and into welfare or wage dependency, and thousands of Hispanic farmers from northern New Mexico and southern Colorado who barely subsisted on the remains of their ancestral lands. Through marches on the New Mexico capital, this organization brought mass pressure, albeit futile, on the state government to recognize their cause. Then, in October 1966, Tijerina and 350 Aliancistas occupied a portion of Kit Carson National Forest that they understood to be part of the San Joaquín del Río Chama grant. Arresting two rangers for trespassing, they elected a traditional alcalde and ayuntamiento. After they were turned out, Tijerina was arrested and released on bail. The state's establishment—Anglo and Mexican—called him a Communist and a "creature of darkness." On 5 June 1967, Tijerina and twenty armed Aliancistas captured the Tierra Amarilla Courthouse in an effort to place District Attorney Sanchez under citizens' arrest. The ensuing shootout seriously wounded two officers. The rebels fled to the hills, as a two-thousand-man army terrorized the countryside searching for them. After their surrender, a jury remarkably acquitted Tijerina, though he was jailed for the previous incident, effectively causing the demise of the Alianza.

Before World War II, the "GI Generation," and the Zoot-Suit Riots of 1943, Mexicans in the United States usually focused their political interests on the events south of the border. The Mexican Revolution (1911–1920) particularly fired the passions of Mexicans in the United States, where supporters of all factions could be found. As early as 1891 Catarino Garza, a journalist from South Texas, and a thousand followers attacked across the border to liberate northern Mexico from the dictator Porfirio Díaz. Most significantly, the anarchist Partido Liberal Mexicano organized for the revolution in the American Southwest after its leader, Ricardo Flores Magón, fled there in 1905.

In the Southwest before the 1930s most Mexicans worked seasonally on the railroads and in agriculture. Thus their union struggles tended to be spontaneous and ad hoc until the Communists' Cannery and Agricultural Workers Industrial Union provided stable leadership in the late 1920s and early 1930s. Several exiled anarchists led such Mexican unions as the Confederación de Uniones Campesinas y Obreros Mexicanos, which organized the fields of southern California in the 1930s. American and Mexican Communists, Mexican anarchists, and the Mexican consulate all competed for leadership of this and other agricultural unions.

In urban centers, Mexican workers participated in the unionization drives of the 1930s including "red" Trade Union Unity League unions and Communist-tinged ones of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). The recentness of the Mexican Revolution drew some Mexicans to revolutionary ideology and rhetoric, or at least they did not fear it as much as their Anglo shop-mates. Two of the most remarkable women in Southwestern U.S. history, Guatemalan-born Luisa Moreno and Emma Tenayuca of San Antonio, state secretary of the Communist Party in Texas, organized in such unions. In fact, the militance and solidarity of Mexican workers proved essential to the organization of several of the CIO's more radical unions in the Southwest, particularly the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America; United Furniture Workers; and the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. The Communist Party recruited some Mexican union leaders to its ranks and pushed for equality within the unions. Such Party organizations as the Workers Alliance and the International Labor Defense participated in Mexican causes where no one else treaded.

This era also saw the emergence of the Spanish Speaking Peoples Congress, which Luisa Moreno organized in 1938. An explicitly radical organization, it took stands on community, labor, legislative, and immigration issues in the Southwest. Red-baiting and factionalism ended its career in 1940, though it had six thousand members at its peak. Truman-McCarthyism effectively precluded a revival of such Mexican radical activity after World War II, though such groups as the Community Services Organization (CSO), the Mexican American Political Association (MAPA), and the reformist American GI Forum and League of United Latin American Citizens maintained a Mexican political presence in California.

In the 1960s farm workers and youth led the resurgence of a Mexican challenge to Anglo economic, cultural, and political supremacy. Trained at the CSO in San Jose, César Chávez organized the United Farm Workers in 1962, which eventually brought a modicum of justice to the fields of California through strikes and the famous secondary boycotts of grapes and lettuce. The first Mexican American of true national stature, Chávez inspired a new era of oppositional politics on the part of Mexican Americans.

The Crusade for Justice in Colorado, El Partido la Raza Unida in Texas, the high school student strikes ("blowouts") in East Los Angeles and later in South Texas and Denver, and El Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlán (MEChA) on college campuses, represented a new nationalism that challenged both Anglo cultural and political dominance as well as the accommodationist views of the 1950s generation of Mexican Americans. The youth took the word Chicano to distinguish themselves from assimilationists. (The word derives from the Nahuatl pronunciation of Mexicano and usually denoted someone of rough, lower-class origins.) They also took the phrase in use in Mexican communities since the nineteenth century to denote the Mexican people—La Raza.

Rodolfo "Corky" González, boxer and author of the inspirational epic poem "I Am Joaquín," founded the Crusade for Justice in Denver in 1966. Vigilant in its attempts to "nationalize every school in our community" and in its defense of the Chicano community against the police, the crusade founded its own school, newspaper, and social center.

In 1967 college students in San Antonio founded the Mexican-American Youth Organization (MAYO), which gained financial assistance from the Ford Foundation. Challenging the Democratic Party in that city, it lost its funding, and one of MAYO's organizers and main spokespersons, José Angel Gutiérrez, then went to Crystal City in South Texas to put MAYO's principles into action in his hometown. In mid-1969 his organization and strategy began unfolding as the majority Chicano population began taking over the school board, city council, and even a few businesses through boycotts, and, with the founding of La Raza Unida Party in the spring of 1970, elections. By 1974, Crystal City and Raza Unida had become the pride of the Chicano movement in Texas.

In 1972, though, other nationalists such as Corky González grabbed hold of the idea and, against Gutiérrez's wishes, thrust the party into national politics. Its zealous supporters' demands for a Chicano third party factionalized Chicano political leaders and essentially doomed La Raza Unida. Gutiérrez's efforts did change forever the attitude of Mexican American politics in Texas. There would no longer be the old deference: "Psychologically," he stated, "if you give in to one of those bastards [the Rangers], you've had it. That's been the life of our parents. That's why they go around with their hats in their hands. This has to be stopped. We've got to be just as arrogant."

In March 1968, fifteen thousand students walked out of five East Los Angeles high schools protesting the lack of Chicano teachers, the irrelevance of their Anglo-oriented classes, and general disrespect for their culture. The police and arrests and trials of the leaders eventually restored order, but not before students perfected the tactic, using it for two more years to ensure the responsiveness of school authorities.

The period from fall 1966 to spring 1967 saw the emergence of the first Chicano student groups on California college campuses. Concerned primarily with issues of cultural identity and a sense of obligation to the barrios from which they came, these students later formed the United Mexican American Students (UMAS) in summer and fall of 1967 at the University of California at Los Angeles, from which it quickly spread to other southwestern campuses. Moving away from a service orientation toward political agitation, UMAS, and later MEChA—into which some UMAS chapters had transformed—redefined the goals of education for Chicanos away from preparation for assimilation to "service to the Chicano community . . . and for the purpose of realizing political, social, and economic change." The First Annual Chicano Conference in Denver, which Corky González called forth in 1969 with an attendance of over two thousand, proved the high point of this movement. By the mid-1970s, MEChA chapters had begun to divide between nationalists, often affiliated with La Raza Unida; Marxists, who also joined Marxist-Leninist groups; and those who wanted a cultural emphasis.

Toward the mid-1970s many Chicano activists shifted their focus to cross-national issues. Indeed, they came to reject notions of Chicanismo because it divided those who lived north of the border from those who lived in Mexico. Bert Corona (b. 1918), a veteran of the CIO and organizer of MAPA, organized Centro de Acción Autónoma—Hermandad General de Trabajadores (CASA) in Los Angeles to unite all "Mexicanos" against abuses of undocumented workers.

In the 1990s Los Angeles remained the third largest Mexican city in the world, but huge migrations of people from Asia and all of Latin America have transformed it into a city more resembling the Third World than the great middle-class, suburban metropolis for which it had been famous. In response to this reality, Mexican "radicalism" took new forms in California. Multinational consciousness tried to counter the assaults of the declining and angry middle class regarding basic public services theretofore offered all residents regardless of citizenship status. Communities of Mixtec Indian agricultural workers in the Imperial Valley strove to forge binational organizations between Sacramento and Oaxaca. Radical Latino priests staved off police seeking to apprehend "illegal" refugees fleeing Central American death squads. An emerging radical border movement of immigration activists and artists reflected the ways in which the burgeoning cities along the border seemed to be melding into a new urban cultural form neither Mexican nor American but clearly derived from both.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Congreso del Pueblo de Habla Española; Flores Magón, Ricardo; Migratory Agricultural Labor; Union-Sponsored Radical Films.]

FURTHER READING

- Acuña, Rodolfo. Occupied America: A History of Chicanos. 3d ed. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.
- Castillo, Pedro, and Albert Camarillo, eds. Furia y Muerte: Los Bandidos Chicanos. Los Angeles: Aztlán Publications, 1973.
- Castro, Tony. Chicano Power: The Emergence of Mexican America. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1974.
- Ferris, Susan, and Ricardo Sandoval. The Fight in the Fields: Cesar Chavez and the Farmworkers Movement. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1997.
- Gómez-Quiriones, Juan. "Research Notes on the Twentieth Century." Aztlán 1, no. 1 (spring 1970).
- Monroy, Douglas. "Anarquismo y Comunismo: Mexican Radicalism and the Communist Party in Los Angeles during the 1930s." Labor History 24 (winter 1983).
- Monroy, Douglas. "Fence Cutters, Sediciosos, and First-Class Citizens: Mexican Radicalism in America." In The Immigrant Left in the United States, edited by Paul Buhle and Dan Georgakas. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.
- Rosenbaum, Robert J. Mexicano Resistance in the Southwest. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1981.

OTHER RESOURCE

Jarrico, Paul (producer), Herbert Biberman (director), Michael Wilson (writer). Salt of the Earth. Film.

—DOUGLAS MONROY

MIDWEST DAILY RECORD. Chicago-based and Communist-run, the Midwest Record was first published as a daily and then as a weekly newspaper from 12 February 1938 through 2 March 1940. The paper was distributed throughout the Midwest and at its height reached a circulation of 15,090. In a cramped office, Louis Budenz, later an informer for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, edited the paper and worked with William Patterson, associate editor; Jan Wittenberg, business manager; Molly West; and other Chicago progressives. With Communist Party membership around three thousand in the late 1930s, the paper was intended to broaden the appeal of a newly Americanized Party and the Popular Front movement it promoted. In this spirit, the paper was dedicated to Abraham Lincoln and began publication on the anniversary of his birth. It promoted the "unity of the farmers, small businessmen, professionals, the workers and the Negro people. . . in a great American People's Front." In the Popular Front tradition, the paper printed stories about the triumphs of the Soviet Union, the setbacks of Franco and fascism, and the successes of local unions. Features reported workers' militant interracial solidarity in factories and passionate actions of the unemployed at relief stations where Communist Party members demanded money and jobs for the unemployed. Like the Daily Worker, the paper featured regular articles by Heywood Broun, Mike Gold, and Harry Gannes as well as coverage of health, sports, youth, and the arts. Local Chicago union organizers like DeWitt Gilpin wrote for the paper, as did renowned sociologists such as St. Clair Drake. The paper gave little voice to women's daily issues, whether those of housewives or industrial workers, despite critical letters to the editor and occasional pieces by Elizabeth Gurley Flynn. The paper began with a $60,000 debt, which was never fully settled. It was this financial crisis as well as changes in the political climate that ended the run of Chicago's own Communist paper.

FURTHER READING

Budenz, Louis. This Is My Story. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1947.

Klehr, Harvey. The Heyday of American Communism: The Depression Decade. New York: Basic Books, 1984.

Laswell, Harold Dwight, and Dorothy Blumenstock. World Revolutionary Propaganda: A Chicago Story. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1939.

Nelson, Steve, James R. Barrett, and Rob Ruck. American Radical. Pittsburgh: Pittsburgh University Press, 1981.

—RANDI STORCH

MIGRATORY AGRICULTURAL LABOR. Migratory workers have faced debilitating problems of chronic migration, job insecurity, low wages, disfranchisement, and racism. Drawn from a labor pool of unemployed and underemployed people, the workers are primarily nonwhite immigrant and native workers who are racially stigmatized, politically disfranchised, and excluded from meaningful federal and state labor legislation. These problems have militated against long-term organizations and successful strikes; yet conditions have led to sharp conflicts and radical response.

Often-reprinted illustration from publications of the Industrial Workers of the World, drawn by unknown artist in the 1910s.

The migratory agricultural labor system developed to meet the seasonal demands of large-scale industrialized capitalist agriculture that emerged following the Civil War. The rapidly disintegrating old agriculture provided the migrants: black and white ex-tenants and sharecroppers from the South moved up and down the Atlantic Coast harvesting fruits and vegetables; white farm-workers from the Middle South and Midwest formed another migrant stream into the North Central states; and from Texas and across the border came Mexican workers to work the fields in Texas, California, and the Southwest. California was the most industrialized of the agricultural states, tended by a succession of migrant workers since the 1880s: Indians, Chinese, Hindustanis, Japanese, Filipinos, Mexicans, and Anglos.

The conditions of industrialized agriculture gave rise to organizing, primarily in California. Spontaneous strikes among Mexicans, Filipinos, Japanese, and other groups occurred with the harvest and acted as a de facto form of collective bargaining. Japanese workers used their work gangs as incipient labor organizations. In the 1910s the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) worked with migratory agricultural workers in California. The IWW found a base with Mexican workers influenced by the anarcho-syndicalist Partido Liberal Mexicano (Mexican Liberal Party) allied with the IWW. Japanese, Chinese, and Filipinos also joined. The brief Wobbly involvement was on a hit-or-miss basis, in part because they avoided tight organization. Their influence came to an end with the 1917 trials of the Wobblies.

By the 1920s, the agricultural industry in Arizona and California had developed industrywide organizations that centralized labor recruitment, set wage rates, and dealt with labor uprisings on an industrywide basis. These effectively squashed spontaneous strikes and necessitated more sophisticated labor organizing. Two forms of organization emerged: ethnic-based organizations and left-wing unions. The two at times worked together, at times conflicted.

Ethnic-based groups established the first permanent agricultural labor organizations. Filipinos organized ethnic organizations. By the late 1920s, Mexican mutual-aid societies, long active in Mexico as de facto labor organizations, began to engage in collective bargaining. In 1927 the Confederación de Uniones Obreros Mexicanos, later renamed the Confederación de Uniones Campesinos y Obreros Mexicanos (CUCOM), was formed, uniting Mexican unions and federations in an effort to encourage Mexican labor organization. CUCOM exhibited a mixture of radical rhetoric and adherence to legal and nonviolent tactics similar to its parent organization, the Mexican union Confederación Regional Obrera Mexicana. CUCOM was active in strikes from 1928 to 1937. In 1936 CUCOM was taken over by anarcho-sindicalist leadership, which worked closely with progressive Anglos, Filipinos, and Japanese.

Ethnic organizations were as ideologically diverse as their communities. While some were conservative, Mexican veterans of the Mexican Revolution, socialists, members of the IWW and the Partido Liberal Mexicano (long based in Los Angeles), and Communists provided leadership in the 1920s and 1930s. In the 1920s Mexicans formed all-Mexican cells of the Young Communist League and the Communist Party of the United States. While their relationship with the Party was at times strained, left-wing Mexicans, Japanese, and Filipinos called on progressive Anglos to help in organizing in the 1930s.

In 1928 the Communist Party, following a shift in Party tactics, formed the Trade Union Unity League (TUUL) and, in 1931, the Cannery and Agricultural Workers Industrial Union (CAWIU) to organize agricultural workers in California. The militant CAWIU was small, financially limited, and had only a handful of organizers, yet led a series of agricultural strikes. During the Depression, growers slashed wages. Encouraged by the erroneous belief that they were included in Section 7a of the National Recovery Act, workers went on strike in crop after crop in California, resulting in an almost general strike. More than 140 strikes occurred in California between 1930 and 1939. While Mexicans composed the largest group, there were also Filipino, Japanese, and Anglo participants. The strike wave crested in the October 1933 cotton strike by more than eighteen thousand workers and continued into 1934. In 1934 CAWIU leaders were indicted for violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. In 1935 the Communist Party dissolved the TUUL and CAWIU in its move to a "popular front."

With the dissolution of the CAWIU, Filipino and Mexican ethnic organizations and the left wing of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) led agricultural organizing from 1935 to 1937. In 1937 veterans of the CAWIU and Filipino and Mexican unions became part of the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America (UCAPAWA), an affiliate of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. UCAPAWA was active in California, Texas, and other states. Although the strongest union to date, the union increasingly focused on cannery and packing-house workers, and made few substantial gains for field-workers. In 1942 the federal government introduced a contract labor, or "bracero," program that depressed wages and prevented organizing until its demise in 1964. The following year the United Farm Workers (UFW) union was organized.

The UFW picked up from the movements of the 1930s. Composed of Mexicans and Filipinos, the UFW became a social movement in the 1960s. Through public support, the secondary boycott, and gradual political and AFL support, the union obtained contracts and successfully pressured for more favorable pesticide legislation and an Agricultural Labor Relations Board in California. By the 1980s the UFW was no longer a social movement but was declining in strength, in large part due to the problems endemic to agriculture, to increased mechanization, and to the movement of large companies to other countries where labor was cheaper. The migrant streams along the East Coast and from Texas up through the Midwest have not had the same degree of organization found in California. By the 1970s, however, small unions were gaining ground in Florida, Texas, Ohio, and Arizona and were branching out in small, localized strikes in other states.

The increase in undocumented workers in agriculture since the 1950s led to unions such as the Arizona Farm Workers, the Texas Farm Workers, and the Ohio-based Farm Labor Organizing Committee, which have organized undocumented workers and have stressed the need for organizing across international borders. In 1980 these organizations helped sponsor the First International Conference in Defense of the Full Rights of Undocumented Workers, attended by more than sixty organizations in the United States and Mexico, to push for the organization of workers across borders.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Industrial Workers of the World; Mexican Americans; Mitchell, H. L.]

FURTHER READING

- Jamieson, Stuart. Labor Unionism in American Agriculture. Bureau of Labor bulletin no. 836, Dept. of Labor. Washington D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1945.
- Kushner, Sam. Long Road to Delano. New York: International Publishers, 1975.
- McWilliams, Carey. Factories in the Field: The Story of Migratory Farm Labor in California. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1969.
- Sanchez, Guadalupe, and Jesus Romo. "Organizing Mexican Undocumented Farm Workers on Both Sides of the Border." Working Papers in U.S.-Mexican Studies, no. 27, Program in United States-Mexican Studies, University of California, San Diego, 1981.
- Weber, Devra. Dark Sweat, White Gold: California Farm Workers, Cotton and the New Deal. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994.

—DEVRA WEBER

MILITANT. See Socialist Workers Party; Trotskyism.

MILLS, CHARLES WRIGHT (1916–1962). A leading figure in the revival of radical social thought during the 1950s, C. Wright Mills published two major books—White Collar (1951) and The Power Elite (1956)—that analyzed in a fresh and incisive way the class structure of American society. In the first of them he examined the profound changes that had taken place in the nature of the American middle class since the early nineteenth century, from the condition of independent self-employed producers to that of "hired employees." The traditional and prevailing ideology, with its emphasis on independence, individualism, and mobility, more appropriate to the earlier world of small property owners, had become simply a mystification in the mid-twentieth century, and the "new" middle class were "morally defenseless as individuals and politically impotent as a group."

Mills's book on the power elite analyzed another aspect of the class structure, namely the existence in the supposedly "classless" United States of a largely self-perpetuating group that dominates the rest of society. But Mills did not describe this as a "ruling class"; on the contrary, he rejected the Marxist conception of class in favor of a theory of elites, arguing that "'ruling class' is a badly loaded phrase. 'Class' is an economic term; 'rule' a political one. The phrase 'ruling class' thus contains the theory that an economic class rules politically. That short-cut theory may or may not at times be true, but we do not want to carry that one rather simple theory about in the terms that we use to define our problems." His underlying view of American society—and by implication of other modern capitalist societies—was expressed in terms of a division between the power elite and the masses, and of the emergence in the twentieth century of "mass societies" characterized by the powerlessness of isolated, easily manipulated individuals. But critics of Mills's analysis pointed out that he did not provide an adequate account of the bonds that created a single "power elite" out of the three major elites—political leaders, big-business executives, and the military chiefs—that he distinguished; and further, that in European societies and in other regions of the world outside the United States, classes and class conflict still had a predominant role in politics.

In sum, Mills's conception of the "power elite" seemed to many radical critics more simplistic and less profound than Marx's theory of class, and it is the notable revival of Marxist social thought—in sociology, anthropology, and political economy—that has inspired the major radical movements of the past three decades, however much it has been critically revised under the influence of new social movements (especially feminism and the ecology movement). On the other hand, Mills undoubtedly contributed something of great and permanent value to the radical movements of the 1950s and 1960s by his emphasis on the need to create or reanimate voluntary and local organizations through which individuals might acquire a genuine control over decisions of public policy. Implicitly Mills was arguing for the "participatory democracy" that became the ideal of the radical movements in the 1960s and has remained the animating idea of radicalism and socialism in the late twentieth century, in opposition to the existing highly centralized societies, whether they are those of advanced capitalism, dominated by giant corporations, or those of bureaucratic socialism.

Had Mills lived, he would undoubtedly have given a clearer sense of direction to the radical movements of the late 1960s in the United States and would have had a continuing influence on the European New Left, with which he was closely linked. As it is he became in his short lifetime the most powerful and influential critic of American society, and of the "higher learning" in America, since Thorstein Veblen.

[See also New Left; Sociology.]

FURTHER READING

- Bottomore, Tom. Critics of Society: Radical Thought in North America. London: Allen and Unwin, 1967.
- Eldridge, John. C. Wright Mills. Chichester and London: Ellis Horwood/Tavistock, 1983.
- Horowitz, Irving Louis, ed. The New Sociology. New York: Oxford University Press, 1964.

—TOM BOTTOMORE

MILWAUKEE. Site of electoral socialism's premier achievement in the United States, the heavily German American city of Milwaukee offered a model exception to a generally sorry record. Socialists held the mayoralty of Milwaukee from 1910 through most of the 1930s, and again from 1948 to 1960. Through the 1910s, they regularly elected a substantial minority and sometimes a majority of the city council. In the heyday of the 1910s–1920s, they regularly had a delegation in the state legislature, and they sent Victor Berger to the House of Representatives for six terms. Equally important from a national standpoint, they sometimes delivered up to a third of the local vote for the Socialists' national ticket.

Fundamentally, local Socialists had worked hard to create a unified labor movement in the last decades of the nineteenth century, and had built a powerful educational apparatus and broad appeal to the mostly craft-labor, German American population. Socialists challenged a notably corrupt Republican Party for local power, thrusting aside a weak Democratic Party machine. Quickly demonstrating their ability to elect candidates and to govern without corruption—a curious procedure in those days—they won over large sections of the middle class and forward-looking business classes. Those who, in other cities, would have bitterly opposed the socialist political movement, learned to accept a social program of advanced progressivism, even when hitched to a rhetoric of eventual socialist transformation.

Several other factors, external and internal, helped to explain the Milwaukeeans' success. A Polish population of Germanic connections, bitterly abused in the strikes of 1886–1888, contained an unusually large proportion of Socialist sympathizers, so that the church had little luck in pitting Catholics against Socialists. A number of other ethnic Milwaukee populations—Croatian, Slovene, and Jewish especially—had strong Socialist followings. The Milwaukee Socialists, for their part, maintained an internal discipline and collective sense of purpose rare in the U.S. Left. "Bundle brigades" regularly leafleted every neighborhood in the city in several languages, proclaiming socialist integrity and idealism. They carefully minimized friction with the church and professional classes, and aimed their shafts at consensual public enemies, such as the streetcar franchise. They developed a powerful and popular daily, the Milwaukee Leader, mostly funded by the labor movement. And when faced with the war crisis, they carefully wove a pattern of legal anti-war protest that further endeared them to the German American community, even while prominent (American-born) Milwaukee intellectuals went over from socialism to nationalism.

The flagship of a Socialist Party barely surviving in the 1920s, the Milwaukee movement managed a holding action. Popular mayor Dan Hoan cooperated with progressive council members in such programs as the first low-cost cooperative housing project, and long-range financial planning that allowed Milwaukee to lead American cities in nearly attaining solvency. Almost uniquely among major cities of Lake Michigan, Milwaukee also forbade obstruction of the shoreline from public enjoyment. In a national sense, for the remnants of the Socialist movement, Milwaukee Socialism loomed large by contrast to their own standing. Although with reservations, Milwaukeeans helped facilitate the transfer of party leadership to Norman Thomas, as they sought to restrain disputes arising between the aging "Old Guard" and impatient younger forces.

The Depression brought Dan Hoan near the center of the Socialist maelstrom where party factions battled each other for control. Moved by their own example and the brief bloom of Socialist fortunes in smaller Wisconsin working-class towns, Hoan and his followers hoped for a Socialist political renewal at the local level. Thomas's strong 1932 campaign and the triumphant municipal showing of Milwaukee Socialist candidates in 1931 made this seem possible. But nationally and locally the new, powerful opposition to the Milwaukee Socialists from the Left (the Communist Party) and from the Right (the New Deal) undercut the effort. Besides, Milwaukee Socialists disagreed bitterly among themselves over what strategic course to follow. The labor movement by this time ceased to support the Leader (reduced to a weekly in 1929) and left the Socialists without any possibility of strong backing. Important local activists moved on to leadership positions in their growing national unions. Increasingly reduced by this time from a vital mass movement to a club of old-timers and cadre of idealists—albeit still mostly self-taught workers or lower professionals—Milwaukee Socialists entered into the state Farmer-Labor Progressive coalition. Through this shift, Socialists all but lost their remaining identity. Continuing internal disputes, and Mayor Hoan's defeat in 1940, virtually extinguished the movement.

And yet the idea of Milwaukee Socialism did not entirely disappear. Frank Zeidler owed his lengthy administration, 1948–1960, both to personal popularity and to an established tradition. His liberal administration, bitterly criticized for its attempts to ease racial relations in changing neighborhoods, continued the main themes of honesty, efficiency, and a vaguely (or at least abstractly) cooperative spirit. After his years as mayor, Zeidler remained the major personality of a tiny Socialist Party and a spokesman for local causes. Running for the U.S. presidency in 1972, he gained the largest number of votes of any Socialist candidate since Norman Thomas—a disproportionate number from Milwaukee, where “socialism” had never become a frightening word.

In the 1990s, Milwaukee revived its radical tradition in remarkable ways. Its labor movement formed, along with that in Madison, a core of support for David Newby, state president of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, one of the most ardent radicals among such highly placed officials anywhere in the nation. The New Party was centered in Wisconsin, where it found many willing to rekindle the tradition of Berger, Zeidler, and Robert La Follette.

FURTHER READING

- Beck, Elmer Axel. The Sewer Socialists: A History of the Socialist Party of Wisconsin. 2 vols. Fennimore, Wis.: Westburg Associates Publishers, n.d.
- Miller, Sally. “Milwaukee: Of Ethnicity and Labor.” In Socialism and the Cities, edited by Bruce M. Stave. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1975.
- Wachman, Marvin. History of the Social-Democratic Party of Milwaukee, 1897–1910. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1945.

—PAUL BUHLE

MINNEAPOLIS TEAMSTER STRIKES. Three successive strikes by Minneapolis truck drivers in 1934 resulted in the defeat of the Citizen's Alliance—the dominant employer organization that had broken nearly every major strike in that city since 1916. The strikes also established the industrial form of union organization through the medium of an American Federation of Labor (AFL) craft union and set the stage for the organization of over-the-road drivers throughout an eleven-state area, transforming the Teamsters into a million-plus member union. The strikes were notable for their almost unequaled advance preparation, military tactics, and the degree to which they drew the active participation of union, non-union, and unemployed workers in Minneapolis alike into their struggle. The strikes were led by veteran union militants expelled from the American Communist Party in 1928 as Trotskyists.

Carl Skoglund and V. R. (Ray) Dunne, the central leaders, had been expelled from the AFL Central Labor Union in Minneapolis in 1925 for their political views. In 1931 Skoglund obtained membership in Teamsters Local 574, a small general drivers' local. The president, William Brown, was supportive of their perspective for organizing drivers, helpers, and inside workers into an industrial union formation that could break the hold of the Citizen's Alliance.

By late 1933, working in Minneapolis coal yards, they had consolidated a volunteer organizing committee, including Grant and Miles Dunne (V. R.'s brothers), Harry DeBoer, and Farrell Dobbs. Dobbs, DeBoer, and Shaun (Jack) Maloney became key leaders of the over-the-road drivers' organizing campaign from 1935 to 1940.

On 7 February 1934, a strike was called in the coal yards, shutting down sixty-five of sixty-seven yards in three hours. Under the leadership of DeBoer, an innovative strike tactic was introduced for the first time—cruising picket squads patrolling the streets by automobile. Cold winter demand for coal brought a quick end to the strike two days later, resulting in a limited victory for the union. Local 574's membership rose to three thousand by April, as the organization drive continued.

In preparation for a general drivers' strike, 574 got agreement for active support from Minneapolis unemployed organizations and the Farm Holiday Association, allied with the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party. On 15 May, Local 574, now six thousand members strong, voted to strike all trucking employers, demanding union recognition, the right to represent inside workers, and wage increases.

UNITED LABOR ACTION      THE ORGANIZER      SMASH THE CITIZENS ALLIANCE

 TWO TWENTY-FIVE      SOUTH THIRD STREET
 MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA, WEDNESDAY, AUG. 26, 1936

VICTORY!

Settlement Goes Through!

[illegible]

See Panko & Wolkoff!

could split as the state of and get a settlement the 100 million dollar and all other

Then the birds made but the struggle does not end.

Blatant are coming largely 500 ready to win in every sense. Many others should pass the 500. But very many more should speak by protest on the subject and so it is that the game is unbalanced one. After that we shall remain vigilant and see that all conditions of the settlement are followed to practice. Last of 1974 is now going to show at the struggle.

Let's get out the water and let's see to it that every body has a good one.

[illegible][illegible][illegible]

Vote for 574 in the Elections
Make Minneapolis a Union Town

Daily paper of the striking Minneapolis Teamsters, 22 August 1934.

The union deployed cruising picket squads from strike headquarters, a big garage where they also installed a hospital and commissary. A strike committee of one hundred was elected, with broad representation from struck firms. A women's auxiliary was established at the suggestion of Carl Skoglund.

On Monday, 21 May, a major battle between strikers and police and special deputies took place in the central market area. At a crucial point, six hundred pickets, concealed the previous evening in nearby AFL headquarters, emerged and routed the police and deputies in hand-to-hand combat. Over thirty cops went to the hospital. No pickets were arrested.

On Tuesday, 22 May, the battle began again. About twenty thousand strikers, sympathizers, and spectators assembled in the central market area, and a local radio station broadcast live from the site.

Again, no trucks were moved. Two special deputies were killed, including C. Arthur Lyman, a leader of the Citizen's Alliance. No pickets were arrested. On 25 May a settlement was reached that met the union's major objectives, including representation of inside workers.

In the following weeks, it became clear the employers were not carrying out the agreement. Over seven hundred cases of discrimination were recorded between May and July. Another strike was called on 16 July. The union's newspaper, the Organizer, became the first daily ever published by a striking union.

Trucking was again effectively closed down until Friday, 20 July, when police opened fire on unarmed pickets, wounding sixty-seven, two of whom, John Belor and Henry Ness, died. The Minneapolis Labor Review reported attendance of 100,000 at Ness's funeral on 24 July.

A public commission, set up later by the governor, reported: "Police took direct aim at the pickets and fired to kill. Physical safety of the police was at no time endangered. No weapons were in possession of the pickets."

On 26 July, Farmer-Labor governor Olson declared martial law and mobilized four thousand National Guardsmen, who began issuing operating permits to truck drivers. On 1 August, National Guard troops seized strike headquarters and placed arrested union leaders in a stockade at the state fairgrounds in Saint Paul.

The next day, the headquarters were restored to the union and the leaders released from the stockade, as the National Guard carried out a token raid on the Citizen's Alliance headquarters. The union appealed to the Central Labor Union for a general strike and the governor issued an ultimatum that he would stop all trucks by midnight, 5 August, if there was no settlement. Nevertheless, by 14 August there were thousands of trucks operating under military permits. Although the strike was gravely weakened by martial law and economic pressure, union leaders made it clear that it would continue.

On 21 August a federal mediator got acceptance of a settlement proposal from A. W. Strong, head of the Citizen's Alliance, incorporating the union's major demands. The settlement was ratified and the back of employer resistance to unionization in Minneapolis was broken. In March 1935 International president Daniel Tobin expelled Local 574 from the International Brotherhood of Teamsters (IBT). However, in August 1936 Tobin was forced to recant and recharter the local as 544. The leaders of 544 went on to develop the area and conference bargaining that exists today in the IBT.

Local 544 remained under Trotskyist leadership until 1941, when eighteen leaders of the union and the Socialist Workers Party were sentenced to federal prison, the first victims of the antiradical Smith Act.

[See also Dobbs, Farrell; International Brotherhood of Teamsters; Socialist Workers Party; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Citizen's Alliance Papers, Minneapolis Central Labor Union Papers. Minnesota Historical Society, Archives and Manuscripts Division, Saint Paul, Minnesota.
- Dobbs, Farrell. Teamster Rebellion. 4 vols. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1972.
- Taped interviews with Oscar Coover, Jr., Farrell Dobbs, V. R. Dunne, Carl Skoglund. Oral History Collection, Minnesota Historical Society, Saint Paul, Minnesota.
- Walker, Charles Rumford. American City. New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1937.

OTHER RESOURCE

- De Graaf, John (producer/director). Labor's Turning Point. Minneapolis: Labor Education Service, University of Minnesota. Film.

—DAVID RIEHLE

MINOR, ROBERT (1884–1952). A leading radical cartoonist before 1920, Robert Minor amazed readers and anarchist comrades in two ways: he abandoned his art entirely and he abandoned his anarchist leanings to become a Communist leader, especially known for his aggressiveness regarding the "Negro Question." Raised in San Antonio, Texas, a poor lawyer's son, Minor left school at fourteen to take a series of menial jobs. A self-taught artist, he joined the San Antonio Gazette in 1904 and the next year moved to the Saint Louis Post Dispatch. In an age of rapidly changing cartoon work, from the elaborately detailed drawings of the nineteenth century to the simpler, more direct styles of the twentieth, Minor made himself a giant through his intentionally rough lines, his unaffected presentation of human expression, and his keen sense of humor. Perhaps as much as any artist on the Left, he epitomized the adoption of Honoré Daumier's passion along with his litho-graphic crayon work. (A notable technical innovator, Minor himself adapted the metal plates used in cartoon reproduction to simulate the crayon line.)

Converted to socialism in 1907, Minor swiftly moved into the Left. He studied art in Paris in 1911, and there became enamored of anarcho-syndicalism. Returning to the United States the following year, he took a prestigious position at the New York Evening World, allowing him to draw anti-war cartoons until an editorial change of heart forced him to the Socialist Call (and on the side, the anarchist Mother Earth). His fame as a radical artist reached a peak at the Masses, whose editorial board he joined in 1916, at a turning point in the history of that magazine. Under the shadow of war, it had lost a lighter tone and some of its more prominent artists; Minor contributed brilliant, bitter satire, especially but not only on the war issue.

At the same time, Minor began to become more active politically. At first, he drew close to anarchist causes, organizing a political defense committee for labor martyr Tom Mooney. Then, visiting Russia as a war correspondent shortly after the revolution, he met Lenin, and began a conversion completed in 1920 with the repudiation of his anarcho-syndicalist beliefs for Bolshevism. He continued to publish cartoons for a time in the Daily Worker, but as a busy functionary gave up drawing entirely in 1926. Two years later Minor became editor of the Daily Worker, and emerged as a key aide and spokesman for Communist Party leader Earl Browder.

Repeatedly arrested for public agitation in the 1920s–1930s, Minor became known as "Fighting Bob." He ran unsuccessfully several times for office—mayor of New York City, governor of New York, and U.S. senator—and served as a correspondent during the Spanish Civil War. When Browder himself was imprisoned in 1941, Minor briefly served as acting general secretary. His close association with Browder, however, removed him from leadership after Browder's 1945 downfall. Made Washington correspondent for the Daily Worker, he fell ill and withdrew from political work before his death.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Humor.]

FURTHER READING

- Zurier, Rebecca. Art for the Masses. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1988.

—PAUL BUHLE

MITCHELL, H. L. (1906–1989). Founder of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union (STFU), H. L. Mitchell was one of the foremost twentieth-century American socialists engaged in farm activism and multiracial organizing. Born in Halls, Tennessee, Mitchell worked at farm chores from the age of eight, and after high school graduation tried his hand at a number of jobs, from bootlegging in prohibition days to sharecropping. As an eleven-year-old newspaper boy, he had ridden a special train to Dyersburg, Tennessee, and watched whites lynch a young black man. Searching for some way to understand the world around him, Mitchell became what southerners called a “reading fool.” Converted to socialism, he in turn converted his friend, Clay East, and the two created a “Red Square” for Norman Thomas’s 1932 presidential campaign in Tyronza, Arkansas, around Mitchell’s dry-cleaning shop and East’s filling station.

In 1934 the two spearheaded the interracial STFU. With Mitchell’s organizing skills and East packing a pistol as the duly elected township constable, the union thrived. By protesting sharecropper evictions, organizing strikes, and lobbying for federal legislation to improve agricultural conditions in the South—with the support and cooperation of black and white farm families—southern radicals forcefully fought the system. Along with strikes to raise wages, their most successful effort culminated in the formation of the Delta Cooperative Farm at Rochdale, Mississippi, by tenants evicted from Arkansas plantations for joining the STFU. This project became the model for the Farm Security Administration, created as a result of growing national concern for the plight of the southern tenant farmer.

At its peak, the STFU could claim thirty thousand members, a newspaper, the Sharecroppers’ Voice, from Memphis, and a series of public-relations successes in the national press and politics (including “Sharecroppers Week” declared by New York mayor Fiorello La Guardia). Along with the Communists of the Alabama-based Share Croppers Union, Mitchell and the STFU had effected the most important links of rural, radical southern blacks and whites since Populism, and foreshadowed the future civil rights movement.

Mitchell’s hopes for a sustained, mass movement of sharecroppers ran into several formidable obstacles. Franklin Roosevelt’s political détente with southern planters forbade any major federal commitment to southern social change, even while Eleanor Roosevelt often expressed her own sympathy for Mitchell’s cause. The Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), absorbing the STFU in 1938, demanded from tenant farmers an impossible style of organization and commitment of scarce resources. Mitchell’s relations with Communist labor leaders in the CIO rapidly became unsustainable. Most of all, the low prices for commodities and the impending mechanization of southern agriculture fatally undercut sharecroppers’ bargaining power.

Withdrawing from the CIO with his following much weakened, Mitchell opened “Washington’s smallest lobby,” a little corner of agitation for the tenant farmer and agricultural worker. After the war, he moved the STFU remnant into the American Federation of Labor, and eventually into the meat-cutters’ union. Along the way, Mitchell pioneered the support movement around California farm-workers’ unionization, and organized southern fishermen and sugar cane workers.

By the 1970s–1980s, Mitchell set a new and unique task for himself: the public exploration of the STFU’s history. As no other American Left figure, he single-mindedly set about speaking on campuses and at scholars’ meetings, offering microfilm editions of the STFU papers for sale to libraries, writing his own history, and encouraging media treatment of it. By these efforts and sheer force of personality, Mitchell made an inestimable contribution not only to radical history but also to the sense of continuity among newer generations.

[See also Southern Tenant Farmers Union.]

FURTHER READING

- Dunbar, Anthony P. Against the Grain: Southern Radicals and Prophets, 1929–1959. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1981.
- Grubbs, Donald H. Cry from the Cotton: The Southern Tenant Farmers’ Union and the New Deal. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1971.
- Mitchell, H. L. Mean Things Happening in This Land. Montclair, N.J.: Allenheld, Osmund, 1979.
- Mitchell, H. L. Roll the Union On: A Pictorial History of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1987.

—ORVILLE VERNON BURTON

MITFORD, JESSICA (1917–1996). One of six daughters of England’s Lord and Lady Redesdale, Jessica Mitford showed her rebellious nature at an early age by running away to the Spanish Civil War in 1937 with fellow rebel Esmond Romilly, Winston Churchill's nephew. Long at odds with her family, especially sisters Unity (termed an ideal Nordic woman by Hitler) and Diana (wife of Oswald Mosley, Britain's fascist leader), she emigrated to the United States in 1939 while Romilly fought in the Royal Canadian Air Force. She gave birth to their daughter in the United States, but Romilly was killed in action.

Mitford was working for the Office of Price Administration in Washington, D.C., during the World War II when she met attorney Robert Treuhaft. They married when they moved to the San Francisco Bay area in 1943. Now known as Decca Treuhaft (Decca being her nickname), she became an activist and fund-raiser for the Civil Rights Congress, Communist Party, and the People's World. With her civil rights lawyer husband, she spurred nationwide campaigns to defend African American and radical victims of Jim Crow and McCarthyism in the 1940s and 1950s. She headed a group of women who traveled to Mississippi to save Willie McGee, a black truck driver falsely accused of rape. Her first published book was Lifefitselfmanhip, a satire on Left jargon self-published to raise money for the People's World.

Mitford resigned from the Communist Party in 1958, stating it had become "sadly irrelevant." A Fine Old Conflict, published in 1977, is a memoir of her years as a Communist. Rather than spelling an end to her social activism, however, her resignation from the Communist Party turned out to be a prelude to her emergence as a celebrated muckraker whose targets included the funeral industry and medical experiments on prisoners. The American Way of Death was a national best-seller of 1963. Six years later she published The Trial of Dr. Spock, which defended Benjamin Spock, William Sloane Coffin, Jr., Michel Ferber, Mitchell Goodman, and Marcus Raskin, who had been charged with aiding and abetting young Americans who sought to violate the Selective Service Act. Her other works include Daughters and Rebels (1960), Kind and Usual Punishment: The American Prison Business (1973), Poison Penmanship: The Gentle Art of Muckraking (1979), and The American Way of Birth (1992). Many of these books and articles for Esquire, the Nation, and the San Francisco Chronicle contributed to major changes in public policy.

[See also Civil Rights Congress.]

—PELE DELAPPE

MODERN DANCE. Emerging as a new art in New York in the late 1920s, modern dance was born of the quest to discover the real capacities of the human body as a means of expression, which in turn implied a revolt against the stifling conventions of ballet. The principal initiators of the new movement were Doris Humphrey, Martha Graham, and Helen Tamiris. Although there have been many male dancers of significance, the central and innovative figures of modern dance have been women, exemplifying an important aspect of feminist culture that not only persisted but flourished after the eclipse of organized feminism following the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920.

Emphasizing that modern dance began as a movement of, by, and for women is the fact that its chief forerunners were two maverick matriarchs. At the turn of the century Isadora Duncan had boldly proclaimed a strong feminist dimension of her own dance, inspiring at least two generations of women—and not only women—to take risks for the sake of freedom and self-fulfillment. An enthusiastic supporter of the Russian Revolution, Duncan left a legacy of wholehearted rebellion.

The less radical Ruth St. Denis also played a liberating role, spearheading exploration of the possibilities of non-Western dance. As it happened, the vaudevillian St. Denis influenced the course of modern dance more directly than the "Divine Isadora," largely because Duncan lived in Europe while modern dance was slowly taking shape in her native land. Duncan's dance, moreover, was the spontaneous and unique result of her own intuition and, as such, unteachable by anyone but her. Of course there were, and still are, some worthy proponents of one variety or another of "Duncan dance": the line of descent from Isadora through Julia Levien to Annabelle Gamson, the outstanding interpreter of Duncan's dances in the 1980s, is straight and unmistakable. Dance à la Isadora was featured at the anarchist Modern School in Stelton, New Jersey, and the "Natural Rhythmic Expression" taught by the little-known Bird Larson at New York's socialist Rand School also owed much to Duncan's example. But the fact that there are so many different versions of Duncan dancing raises doubts about how much of Duncan survives in any of them. Few of the founders of modern dance ever saw Duncan herself dance, and they tended to be unimpressed by what they did see of Duncan-style dancing, which, in any case, has been peripheral to the development of the modern movement.

St. Denis, by contrast, was engaged in the day-to-day business of giving practical, technical dance instruction to pupils who intended to earn their living by dancing. For more than fifteen years, first in Los Angeles and later in New York, she directed (with Ted Shawn) the Denishawn School of Dancing and Related Arts.

St. Denis's own variety of theosophy was an important part of the Denishawn curriculum. Instilled with her belief that Dance (with the capital D) was a mystical mission, the best students were expected to remain with the company, not only as teachers, but as propagators of the Denishawn faith on extensive tours. Such a self-effacing regimen was not for everyone, and it is hardly surprising that the most gifted dancers eventually broke away.

Among the graduates of Denishawn were two dancers who, by 1929, were recognized leaders of a "revolution" in dance. A direct descendant of Miles Standish, Martha Graham (1893–1991) was born and raised in a Pittsburgh suburb and moved to California with her parents in 1908. After seven years with Denishawn she set out on her own. By decade's end the very titles of her performances—"Revolt," "Immigrant," "Poems of 1917," "Heretic"—seemed to confirm New York Times critic John Martin's remark that her effect "has not been one of warmth and elevation, but rather of tension and disturbed thinking."

Doris Humphrey (1895–1958), who was born in Oak Park, Illinois, and grew up in Chicago, went west in 1917 to enroll in Denishawn, in whose company she remained for eleven years. In 1925–1926 she took part in the Denishawn tour of Asia. An outstanding theorist as well as practitioner of dance (her classic treatise, The Art of Making Dances, was published posthumously in 1959), Humphrey played a role in the formation and elaboration of the modern movement equal to that of the more publicized Graham, and not a few dancers and critics have regarded her as the greater choreographer.

Helen Tamiris (1905–1966), a third major figure in the formative years of modern dance, started out as a student of classical ballet in New York City, where she was born. Remarkably versatile, she later choreographed Broadway musical extravaganzas and Hollywood films such as Show Boat and Annie Get Your Gun. In the late 1920s she was one of the first modern dancers to identify herself with the revolutionary workers' movement. "The validity of the modern dance," she argued, "is rooted in its ability to express modern problems and, further, to make modern audiences want to do something about them."

Although critics applied the term "revolutionary" to any and all modern dancers, Tamiris's avowedly activist orientation was not shared by Graham or Humphrey, who remained aloof to the political turmoil of the Depression years. Graham's biographer, Don McDonagh, notes that "her vision was directed to unlocking the fetters that bound the spirit, not those twisting the social fabric." In a period of mass labor organizing, Humphrey refused to join a union, fearing that such membership might somehow limit her freedom.

The apoliticism of some of its leading personalities notwithstanding, modern dance began as an integral part of the American Left milieu, and was universally regarded as such. "I never heard of a modern pro-fascist dance," wrote Margaret Lloyd, dance critic for the Christian Science Monitor. The new movement was repeatedly denounced in the conservative press and, for a time, was treated unkindly in mainstream liberal papers as well. The modern dance audience, moreover, consisted almost entirely of young people who thought of themselves as radicals and revolutionists.

Tamiris welcomed the objective link between social radicalism and the new dance, while Graham and Humphrey can be said to have resigned themselves to it. All three, however, agreed that dance could not and should not be reduced to any sort of propaganda or even to a narrowly "social" esthetic. For her part, Tamiris clearly felt that a certain amount of red-flag-waving was permissible, as in her "Revolutionary March" of 1929, and even Graham and Humphrey sometimes touched on "social" themes. But the heart of their work lay elsewhere. Most of their dances—such as Humphrey's "The Shakers" and "Square Dances," Graham's "Frontier" and "Letter to the World" (inspired by Emily Dickinson), Tamiris's "Circus Sketches," "Prize Fight Studies," "Negro Spirituals," and "Walt Whitman Suite"—were rooted in myths, poetry, folklore, and other magic-laden byways of the American past and present. Left critics tended to be sympathetic to this effort. Recognizing in such dances something of the Left's own striving toward a radical reinterpretation of the American experience, they embraced the new movement as an important component of an emerging revolutionary culture.

For an increasing number of student dancers, however, this vague association of modern dance and social radicalism was not enough. These youngsters, many of whom were members of the Communist or Socialist parties, sought to place the whole modern dance movement at the service of the revolution. Eager to make dance itself play a role in the overthrow of capitalism, they choreographed dances to serve the workers' everyday struggle against the bosses. The Communist Party's ideological tightening-up at the turn of the decade hastened this process. With slogans of "Bolshevization" and the "Third Period" quickening their pulses, young dancers took their cue from manifestoes for "proletarian culture" and proclaimed that "dance is a weapon."

Tamiris, the most politically radical of the elders, was a natural leader of these boisterous troops. Ironically, however, Graham's and Humphrey's students made up much of the active core of such militant groups as the Red Dancers, organized in 1929, the Rebel Dance Group, New Dance Group, Theatre Union Dance Group, Office Workers Dance Group, and nearly a score of others that formed over the next few years. Several of Graham's students, celebrated dancers in their own right in later years, were especially prominent. Jane Dudley danced "In the Life of a Worker" (1934) and "Song for Soviet Youth Day" (1935); Anna Sokolow danced an "Anti-War Cycle" (1937) and Sophie Maslow offered her comrades "Two Songs About Lenin" (1934) as well as a "May Day March" (1936). Eleanor King, Humphrey student who later established her own school in Seattle, choreographed "A Song About America" (1939), featuring homages to the abolitionists and the Haymarket martyrs; sponsored by the Communist Party, the performance took place on the fifteenth anniversary of the death of Lenin. There were dances to poems by Communist Mike Gold and Socialist Arturo Giovannitti, and others inspired by the Scottsboro and Tom Mooney cases. Is it necessary to add that most of these dances were ultraserious, even somber? Here and there, however, humor was allowed to hold the stage, as in the Red Dancers' "Sell-Out" (1934), choreographed to a parody of "The Man on the Flying Trapeze" and first performed at a textile workers' union meeting in Paterson, New Jersey.

Of the quality of the dancing itself little is known, for these dances long ago disappeared from the reper-tories, and few if any were filmed. Critic John Martin was probably not far from the mark when he wrote, in America Dancing (1936): "In the early stages of the movement, dancing . . . consisted of choosing some literary slogan in conformity with orthodox radical political thinking, and of showing with what energy the dancer or dancers involved agreed with the sentiments thus conveyed. The power of expressional movement, the real stuff of the dance, was not seen to exist."

Undaunted, however, by criticism from anyone other than workers or comrades, the movement spread like wildfire and the modern dance audience, once a mere coterie, grew enormously. The young radicals performed at the New School for Social Research and other educational institutions as well as at trade union picnics, strike meetings, and political rallies. It was said that Graham and Humphrey had a hard time scheduling performances for the first of May because so many of their dancers were away giving performances of their own at May Day gatherings.

The proliferation of radical dance groups around the country inevitably suggested a federation. The Socialist Party's Rebel Arts included several dance groups, but the Workers' Dance League, politically allied with the Communist Party, was much larger and more influential. Organized in 1932, the league had more than a dozen affiliated groups in New York City, plus others in Brooklyn, Yonkers, Newark, Passaic, Boston, Washington, D.C., Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Chicago, and Los Angeles. Individual dues were twenty-five cents a year. Its "Aims and Functions" included: "Building a dance art vital and clear, a dance art that is inspired by and useful to workers. Organizing dance groups in working class neighborhoods. . . . Broadening the dance audience by performing wherever workers gather. . . . Educating dancers and audiences to the problems of the working class. . . . Cooperating with artists in other fields of revolutionary cultural activity."

Working conditions in the dance world were generally poor—long hours and low wages prevailed—and the Workers' Dance League Bulletin (later New Dance) regularly covered dancers' struggles to improve their lot. In November 1934 league members, with Tamiris in the forefront, helped form the New York Dancers' Union, open to all dance-workers. A year later New Dance reported that the burlesque dancers were organized but that the effort to line up the taxi-dancers had thus far met with limited success. An ad hoc Dancers' Emergency Association was set up to organize the unorganized dancers but, like many other organizations of "cultural workers" spearheaded by Communists in those years, the "dancers' union" proved ineffectual and ephemeral.

Unemployment during the Great Depression was a serious problem for dancers, and many, including those in the Workers' Dance League, looked to President Roosevelt's New Deal relief programs to solve it. Meanwhile, significant changes were taking place in the Left dance scene. With the advent of the Communist Party's Popular Front line in 1935, the Workers' Dance League quietly became the New Dance League, and the shrill rhetoric of its early days was toned down in the process. The accent was no longer on class war and impending revolution but rather on the need to support the Congress of Industrial Organizations and to combat race discrimination and fascism.

This policy doubtless facilitated the administrative involvement of a number of Party members and sympathizers in Works Progress Administration (WPA) projects. Tamiris helped organize the Federal Theater Project and, by means of a visit to Roosevelt's adviser Harry Hopkins, saw to it that dance was an integral part of the program. Late in 1935 the Dance Project was started in New York, with a hundred dancers; a unit began in Chicago the following year. WPA productions, some of which had impressively long runs, provided work for many unemployed dancers and incidentally introduced modern dance to a substantially larger audience. This experiment in government-subsidized dance proved short-lived, however, for Congress put a stop to it in July 1939. In New York, according to ballet-critic Anatole Chujoy's Encyclopedia of Dance (revised edition, 1967), the Dance Project "petered out" even earlier "due chiefly to improved theater business." Other commentators, including many dancers active in the project, maintained that Congress acted in response to prodding by the recently formed House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC).

If Popular Front strategy eased the entrance of Communist-oriented dancers into the larger society, it also diminished the necessity for an organization made up exclusively of Communist-oriented dancers. In addition to the Workers' Dance League and Rebel Arts there were numerous dance groups linked to unions; the International Ladies Garment Workers Union in New York had an extensive dance program involving more than two hundred participants. The National Dance Congress in May 1936 brought together the whole range of American professional dancers and prepared the way for the amalgamation of the league and other groups to form the American Dance Association a year later. The Congress was organized by Tamiris, who became the first president of the new association. Communists, liberals, apolitical dancers, and perhaps even a few conservatives, were now united under one umbrella.

There were many reasons why the explicitly revolutionary political phase of modern dance was of such short duration. The free-spirited young women who made up the great majority of modern dancers could hardly have felt at home for long in any male-dominated political apparatus. A tension that must sometimes have been overwhelming existed between these dancers' well-meaning social aspirations and their fundamentally avant-grade sensibilities. A few may have abandoned dance to work full-time for the Party, but most of them preferred to abandon the Party. By mid-decade, when it became more widely known how severely modern dance was frowned on by the official ballet-loving "socialist realist" aestheticians of the Soviet Union, the romance between dancers and Communists was already declining. Most dancers, in any case, were interested in politics as it affected dance more than in politics as such. "These young rebels," wrote Eleanor King many years later, "were as much against abstraction and mysticism in dance as they were against fascism, exploitation of the workers, and poverty."

It is notable that the decade of "red" dance produced no enduring body of Left dance criticism—a failure all the more striking in view of the pioneering role of socialists in this field. Back in the 1910s, two of the most prominent personalities of the Masses—novelist/essayist Floyd Dell and painter John Sloan—had commented insightfully on the dance of Isadora Duncan. In the same years Louis C. Fraina, Marxian economist and a founder of the Communist Party, edited and wrote much of Modern Dance magazine; although this publication focused on social dancing, Fraina also wrote of Duncan and other fore-runners of the new dance of the late twenties. Another periodical, the Dance-Lover, which started in 1923 and evolved into today's Dance Magazine, was edited for its first four years by an outspoken leftist, Vera Caspary, best known as the author of the film scenario Laura, based on her own detective novel. These promising beginnings, however, were not fulfilled. The Communists' Daily Worker, New Theater magazine, and especially the New Masses (the Socialists' equivalent was Arise) included much material on dance, but most of it was mere reportage and the rest tended to be trite superficialities or propagandistic bombast.

As dancers' faith in the Soviet Union diminished, so did their sympathy for the cause of socialism. "There are no reds in modern dance today," Margaret Lloyd wrote in 1948, but in fact the radical dance movement was already over by the start of World War II. The anti-war dancers of the 1930s did not perform their anti-war dances once war had begun. By the end of the decade the character of the entire modern movement had changed beyond recognition. Activist dance largely disappeared: the postwar strike wave and the struggle against Taft-Hartley had to get along without dancers' support. Showing just how far the pendulum had swung, in 1954-1956 the once-red-baited Martha Graham, whose company had included so many emphatically pro-Communist dancers, made several overtly anticommunist overseas tours organized by the U.S. State Department, who touted her as America's "Ambassador of Dance." The sole survivor of the Workers' Dance League, the New Dance Group School in New York, took up nonobjectivism and existentialism. Developed especially by Merce Cunningham, this tendency paved the way for the minimalist and conceptualist dance of the next generation. As dance shrank from real human problems, its audience shrank with it. Modern dance was "no longer a revolutionary emancipating principle," wrote John Martin, but rather "an academic tyranny as binding as that of the traditional ballet against which it originally rebelled."

Exceptions to the rightward trend took unexpected forms that didn't fit any of the existing styles of American radicalism. Perhaps the most innovative and imaginative dancer of the post-1940 years, Chicago-based Sybil Shearer, defied all existing values with the insouciant extremism of a William Blake or a John Muir; baffled critics could not decide whether she represented a return to the simplicity and naturalness of Isadora Duncan or a plunge into the troubled waters of surrealism.

Another nonconformist was Californian Bella Lewitzky, who had been born in Job Harriman's utopian socialist Llano del Rio colony in the Mojave Desert, and was a member of the Los Angeles New Dance League in the 1930s. Her refusal to testify before HUAC in 1951 ("I'm a dancer, not a singer," she quipped) provoked a barrage of obscene and threatening phone-calls, but she remained a familiar sight at protest meetings and on picket lines. In dance as in life, revolt and freedom have always been her favorite themes, as in "Tierra y Libertad" (1941, choreographed by Lester Horton), "Warsaw Ghetto" (1949) and "Leyendas de Mexico" (1953, based on the Indians' struggle against the conquistadores), danced in an extravagantly antirealistic idiom that had nothing in common with the agitprop of earlier years.

Esther Junger, a student of Bird Larson's who in 1935 had scandalized Boston as the star dancer and choreographer of the Theater Guild's Communist comedy Parade, was yet another dancer who bravely resisted the downhill slide of modern dance from poetry to prose. One of the most singular personages of the modern movement, she was for a time choreographer for the Ringling Brothers/Barnum & Bailey Circus. Her dances inspired by jazz, wild animals, Gauguin's paintings, and the lore of indigenous cultures added something new and unsettling to a dance scene increasingly dominated by the predictable.

Black modern dance also challenged the prevalent academicism and Cold War disengagement. Independent of the main currents of the modern movement, Chicago-born Katherine Dunham and Pearl Primus of Trinidad, both with doctorates in anthropology, developed a powerful dance idiom rooted in Afro-Caribbean folklore. Dunham, director of the Chicago WPA Dance Project's Negro Unit and later of the New York Labor Stage, also was choreographer for several Hollywood films devoted to black Americana, including Stormy Weather and Cabin in the Sky. Primus, widely regarded as the world's foremost authority on African dance, choreographed several Negro spirituals. In recent years the Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians has featured several innovative dancers in its celebrations of "Great Black Music."

A modest resurgence of radical dance accompanied the social ferment of the 1960s. The Living Theater of Julian Beck and Judith Malina drew more or less equally on Antonin Artaud's dance-based "Theater of Cruelty" and anarchist-pacifist-Industrial Workers of the World traditions to produce the Left's most influential dance-theater of those years. Expressive movement has also been central to Peter Schumann's Bread and Puppet Theater. Agitprop resurfaced primarily in mime, most effectively in the popular San Francisco Mime Troupe. A student of Le-witzky's, surrealist Alice Farley, one of the few contemporary dancers to champion the cause of social revolution, has performed extraordinary stilt-dances in New York anti-war parades. At the close of the century dance radicalism survived in widely scattered individuals and companies such as these, isolated in the outermost margins of the dance/theater world. But its heritage was a vital one, and always capable of renewal.

[See also Duncan, Isadora; Fraina, Louis C.; Political Theater, 1960s-1980s.]

FURTHER READING

- Farley, Alice. Surrealist Dance. Chicago: World Surrealist Exhibition/Black Swan Press, 1976.
- King, Eleanor. Transformation: The Humphrey-Weidman Era. Brooklyn: Dance Horizons, 1978.
- Lloyd, Margaret. The Borzoi Book of Modern Dance. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1949.
- Martin, John. America Dancing. New York: Dodger, 1936.
- Taub, Debra. "Dance and the Transformation of the World." In Surrealism and Its Popular Accomplices, edited by Franklin Rosemont. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1980.

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

MODERN QUARTERLY AND MODERN MONTHLY. Published from 1923 until its editor's death in 1940, the magazine that appeared variously as the Modern Quarterly and the Modern Monthly was the unique expression of contemporary Left intellectual culture in search of "revolutionary culturism." Its editor, V. F. Calverton (1901-1940), embodied the spirit of the magazine: eclectic, generous-spirited, self-divided between Left politics and Left methodology.

Born George Goetz in Baltimore, Calverton had been successively a semiprofessional baseball player, Johns Hopkins student, and high school teacher. A little too young for the old Socialist Party's glory days and too personally distant for the political split and the formation of American Communism, he came to the Left not with proselytization or "mass action" but rather with intellectual reconsiderations in mind. Earlier, much more widely read publications had appealed mainly to intellectuals, but not by intent.

Depression era cover of the Modern Monthly.

Calverton set out to reach his own class with a message.

The message centered around a radical synthesis of the existing social sciences. History, anthropology, sociology, psychology, and, above all, literary criticism had a potentially radical, if by no means necessarily socialist, content. Combined, they could make up a "science of society" to whose scrutiny capitalism would seem a barbaric, outmoded social order. Calverton himself, and to a lesser degree his long-time collaborator, Samuel Schmalhausen, gave this argument its most forceful renditions. But a number of outstanding social scientists, such as Harry Elmer Barnes and Arthur Calhoun, drew close.

Two facets particularly highlighted the project. Calverton and Schmalhausen, known informally among their extended circle as the "sex boys," continued the 1910s feminist dialogue (virtually abandoned by the rest of the Left afterward) with historical materialism. No better example of "the modern" could be found than woman's march toward emancipation through participation in the work force and her increasing demands for sexual equality. Each step forward (the two thinkers anticipated no backward steps) further emancipated the race. Second, an understanding of literary modernism would show the casting off of American intellectuals' "Puritan" hang-over in favor of realism and radical commitment. With that commitment, Calverton argued in his major work, The Liberation of American Literature (1932), would come a recognition of proletarian themes and subjects—that is, the long-awaited socialist cultural imperative. In addition to these themes, the Modern Quarterly was especially notable for its embrace of black cultural questions and independent black intellectuals.

Calverton's (and the journal's) ill fortune was to be caught up in the Left's political crosscurrents of the time. He could not accept the discipline of the Communist Party—which would have meant the loss of his editorial freedom, if not the journal itself—and he could find no other movement more appropriate for his project. Early on, Calverton divided his own writing fairly between Socialist and Communist press, wooed by both. In its ultrasectarian phase, roughly 1929–1933, the Communist Party (under pressure, evidently, from Comintern officials who sought to eradicate all potential competition) published severe attacks on Calverton's efforts and character. His attempt to mediate the differences came to no end, partly because he insisted on his right to publish ex-Communist dissenters (such as Max Eastman and Bertram Wolfe) by this time viewed as dangerous heretics.

Calverton's 1933 decision to publish his magazine monthly (Modern Monthly) coincided with an upswing of Left political energies and notable intellectual dissent from the Communist movement. Relentless lecturer, party-giver, intellectual promoter (he took a New York City apartment early on, and made his living partly as a literary agent), he became still more famous as popularizer. F. Scott Fitzgerald called him a "modern Lecky." Meanwhile other Left formations, principally socialist and Trotskyist, either flagged in intellectual energies or devoted them entirely to building the "vanguard party." In any case, the consolidation of the New Deal both recuperated a sector of intellectuals formerly sympathetic to Calverton, and made possible the Communist Party's Popular Front surge.

Amid the Depression, Calverton's envisioned "revolutionary culturalism" had already lost ground to neo-traditional Marxist economism. By 1936 or so, his effort to create an intellectuals' alternative milieu to that of the Communist Party had been outdated by the Party's own antifascist intellectual appeal. Ironically, Calverton had himself begun a movement toward a more pragmatic socialism, with the Hegelian philosophical backdrop of Marxism sheared away. After 1937, his journal reduced again to a quarterly schedule (and sometimes not even that), and Calverton's compatriot Schmalhausen gone, the project seemingly reduced itself to Calverton's own voice. Rather than the social-scientific confidence of the magazine's early days, Calverton increasingly evidenced an interest in the idealistic, utopian origins of the modern socialist movement. His Where Angels Fear to Tread (1940) was to have been the first of a multivolume treatment of that subject.

Like another independent journal of importance, Oscar Ameringer's American Guardian, the Modern Quarterly nearly expired from readers' (and writers') rejection of the editorial refusal to support the coming world war. Calverton was, in that sense, an old-fashioned socialist to the last. He died from a complication of exhaustion in 1940, leaving a legacy of independent radicalism. Not until Dwight Macdonald's Politics magazine would such a journal hold fast to its anticapitalism, refusing to become apologist for Cold War policies and for liberal capitalism.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Literary Criticism; New Masses.]

FURTHER READING

Aaron, Daniel. Writers on the Left. New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1961.

Calverton, V. F., Collection. New York Public Library.

Gnizi, Halma. "V. F. Calverton, Independent Radical." Ph.D. diss., City University of New York, 1968.

Wilcox, Leonard. V. F. Calverton: Radical in the American Grain. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1992.

—PAUL BUHLE

MODICUT THEATER. The first Yiddish puppet theater in America, the Modicut Theater was created in New York's Jewish left-wing milieu in 1925 by immigrant artists/writers/poets/performers/activists Zuni Maud and Yosl Cutler. The two met in the offices of the Groysser Kundes, a popular left-wing Yiddish satire magazine where they worked as cartoonists. They also contributed cartoons and feuilletons to Morgen Freiheit, Signal, Hammer, and other left publications. Working as set painters for Maurice Schwartz's Yiddish Art Theater, the two came up with the idea for a Yiddish marionette theater. Their first theater was initially housed in an old children's clothing factory in which cutting tables and some machinery were left about for effect. Quite successful, their shows were at first mostly folkloric, anticlerical comedies but quickly became more politically oriented while retaining a folksy and comic edge. The puppets were grotesques and their sets tended toward the surreal. The anticlerical, antiboss, antilandlord themes of their shows appealed to thousands of disaffected workers on New York's Lower East Side and in Jewish working communities throughout the United States. After achieving significant fame in the United States, Modicut toured Europe during the winter of 1929–1930, performing shows in Western and Eastern Europe, where they were well received critically and by audiences. They were invited to tour the Soviet Union during the winter of 1931–1932. The act split up in 1933, though each continued to perform on his own.

Cutler, a member of Proletpen, became a beloved writer/illustrator of the Yiddish Left before his death in an auto accident in 1935 while on tour for the Frayhayt. Maud contributed cartoons and essays to Morgen Freiheit, Daily Worker, New Masses and other Left journals until his death in 1956.

FURTHER READING

Niger, S., and J. Shatsky, eds. Leksikon fun der nayer yidisher literatur. New York: Alveltlekhn yidishn kultur-kongres, 1956–1981.

Zilbertsvayg, Z., ed. Leksikon fun yidishn teater. New York: Farlag Elisheva, 1931–1969.

—EDWARD PORTNOY

MOLOTOV-RIBBENTROP PACT. See Hitler-Stalin Pact.

MONTHLY REVIEW. Subtitled "An Independent Socialist Magazine," Monthly Review is known worldwide within the Left as a key source of intellectual support for Third World liberation movements; as a point of origin of much of modern Marxian political economy; and as representing the most irrepressible and independent-minded version of Marxism to be found anywhere in the United States during the post-World War II era. Monthly Review emerged at the dawn of the anticommunist hysteria of the McCarthy era and soon became a major bulwark for a Left threatened by political repression. The magazine first appeared in May 1949 under the joint editorship of historian Leo Huberman and economist Paul Sweezy. Financial backing was provided by literary critic F. O. Matthiessen, who offered $5,000 a year for three years. Albert Einstein wrote an article for the opening issue.

Monthly Review's editors each brought a wealth of experience to the magazine. Leo Huberman (1903–1968) was chairman of the Department of Social Science, New College, Columbia University, from 1938 to 1939. In 1940 he became labor editor of PM, and in 1941 a columnist for U.S. Week. From 1942 to 1945 he was director of public relations and education for the National Maritime Union; in 1946–1947 editor of the pamphlet division of Reynal and Hitchcock. His two most prominent books were We, the People (1932) and Man's Worldly Goods (1936). Paul Sweezy (b. 1910) taught economics at Harvard and worked for various New Deal agencies from 1934 to 1942. During World War II he served with the Office of Strategic Services in England, France, and Germany. Among his early works was The Theory of Capitalist Development (1942). Harry Magdoff (b. 1913), who, following Huberman's death, joined Sweezy as coeditor of Monthly Review, was hired in 1936 by the Works Progress Administration's National Research Project. He later worked for the Current Business Analysis Division of the Department of Commerce, where he oversaw the publication of the Survey of Current Business, and in 1946 was appointed special assistant to Secretary of Commerce Henry Wallace. During the 1950s Magdoff worked as a stockbroker and financial analyst. In 1959 he joined the publishing firm Russell and Russell.

From the first, Monthly Review was characterized by a nondoctrinaire approach to socialism that did not stop short of criticizing the Soviet Union and other postrevolutionary states, and by a willingness to let the analysis of concrete historical trends dominate over more abstract theory. Eager to reach a wide body of educated readers that included the previously unconvinced, the editors stressed readability, minimizing political and academic jargon. Nevertheless, Monthly Review—with a circulation that peaked at twelve thousand in the late 1970s and fell to eight thousand in the 1980s—was never intended to reach a mass audience. Addressed mainly to intellectuals and activists, the magazine found the most succinct characterization of its practice in the phrase "Better Smaller but Better." Adapted from the title of Lenin's final essay, this slogan was utilized by Paul Baran, professor of economics at Stanford and a close associate of the magazine, to sum up a strategy of putting ideological clarity first and foremost, at a time when the Left was so weak that a search for intellectual common ground with liberals would have meant the silencing of an independent socialist voice in the United States.

Although maintaining a critical distance from "actually existing socialism" as practiced in the Soviet Union, Monthly Review was sympathetic with the Socialist countries' efforts to curtail the logic of capitalism and implement national planning. It therefore constituted an intellectual political milieu for people moving away from the Communist Party and toward a more independent Marxist position. With the eruption of the Korean War, the coming of the Cuban Revolution, and the beginnings of U.S. intervention in Vietnam (the first article criticizing U.S. involvement in Indochina appeared in 1954), Monthly Review's main focus shifted from the internal dilemmas of American socialism to the role of U.S. imperialism. It thus gained the status of the Third World journal, and partly as a result exerted considerable influence over the direction of the New Left in the 1960s. Huberman and Sweezy were among the first analysts to recognize that the Cuban Revolution would take a socialist direction. For a time, Monthly Review identified broadly with the Maoist strategy and critique of Soviet practice. But with the failure of the Cultural Revolution it reverted to a more cautious assessment of post-revolutionary societies. Later, Monthly Review became a forum for the dialogue between Marxism and liberation theology.

In 1951 Monthly Review Press, the book-publishing arm of Monthly Review, was founded when it became clear that even such a celebrated author as I. F. Stone was unable to find a publisher for his book The Hidden History of the Korean War (1952). Monthly Review Press's publication of Baran's The Political Economy of Growth (1957) marked the beginning of Marxian dependency theory, concerned with the imperialist "development of underdevelopment" in Third World countries. Monopoly Capital (1966), by Baran and Sweezy, provided a systematic critique of a U.S. capitalist order that managed to stave off stag-nation only through economic waste and military spending. Other key works in the "Monthly Review School" include The Age of Imperialism (1969) by Magdoff, and Labor and Monopoly Capital (1974) by Harry Braverman—who was until his death in 1976 director of Monthly Review Press (a position now occupied by Christopher Phelps).

Monthly Review's influence over the more academically oriented Left has diminished in relation to the intellectual importance that it gained in the heyday of the New Left. Nevertheless, it remains a bastion for nonsectarian Marxist intellectuals with a leaning toward the Third World and a critical economic focus. For a time, foreign-language editions in Greek, Spanish, and Italian were published. In 1997, Ellen Meiskins Wood, a distinguished scholar, joined the editorial board, assuring an institutional succession.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Matthiessen, Francis Otto; New Left; Radical Economics.]

FURTHER READING

- Baran, Paul A. The Longer View. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1969.
- Foster, John Bellamy. The Theory of Monopoly Capitalism. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1986.
- Foster, John Bellamy. "Sweezy, Paul Marlor." In The New Palgrave Dictionary of Economics, vol. 4. New York: Stockton Press, 1987.
- Resnick, Stephen, and Richard Wolff. Rethinking Marxism: Essays for Harry Magdoff and Paul Sweezy. Brooklyn: Autonomedia, 1985.
- Sweezy, Paul M. "Interview." Monthly Review 38, no. 11 (April 1987).

—JOHN BELLAMY FOSTER

MOONEY-BILLINGS CASE. Thomas J. Mooney (1892–1942) was the central figure in the most notorious labor frame-up in the early half of the twentieth century. He and Warren K. Billings (1893–1972) served twenty-three years (1916–1939) in California prisons for the death of ten persons killed when a bomb exploded during the 1916 Preparedness Day Parade in San Francisco. Mooney's actual offense was that he had been de facto leader of the left wing of the California Federation of Labor and his activities had alarmed some of the most powerful forces in the state. One of his closest associates was Warren Billings.

Mooney had been raised in a Socialist family. At age fifteen, he won a contest sponsored by a Socialist magazine and as his prize enjoyed a free trip to a conference of the Second International in Switzerland. He would soon be an active national campaigner for Eugene V. Debs and an ardent left-wing Socialist. He became editor of the journal Revolt in 1912 and won fame as a militant writer and speaker. He did not fear association with anarchists and was not adverse to the doctrine of "propaganda of the deed." At one point he was charged with dynamiting the property of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company in San Francisco, but he was acquitted after three trials. By 1916 he was a dynamic force in San Francisco labor circles. His two major interests that year were opposition to U.S. participation in World War I and a drive to organize the car men of the United Railroads of San Francisco. The bitter unionizing drive, although unsuccessful, took up most of his energies that year as well as those of this wife, Rena, and Warren Billings.

Drawing from Theodore Dreiser's pamphlet Tom Mooney, 1930.

When the fatal bomb went off on 22 July, the Mooneys were blocks away, but both Tom and Rena, Warren K. Billings, Israel Weinberg, and Edward D. Noland were arrested for the deed. The common link was association with Tom Mooney. Billings, convicted previously for carrying dynamite on a passenger train, had a reputation for enjoying direct action. Weinberg was a jitney driver who occasionally chauffeured the Mooneys, and his son was a pupil of Rena Mooney, who earned a living as a music teacher. Nolan was a Mooney backer in the trade unions. Ultimately only Tom Mooney and Warren Billings were convicted, Mooney for first-degree murder and Billings for second-degree murder.

In less than a year, solid evidence began to surface that the testimony against Mooney and Billings had been perjured. Other evidence substantiated their own account of where they had been. One of the investigating bodies was the federal Wickersham Commission, composed mainly of conservatives. The commission concluded that the case's sole purpose was to put Mooney and Billings behind bars. Even the trial judge and jurors eventually made public statements that they had erred. National protests flooded the statehouse, including a plea for mercy from President Woodrow Wilson. Mooney's death sentence was commuted to life but no other relief was given. In the two decades that followed, Mooney and Billings came to be viewed as labor martyrs. Their plight remained a major concern of labor, civil libertarians, liberals, and radicals. But it was not until 1939 that Governor Culbert Olson released them. Mooney was officially pardoned at that time, but Billings would not be formally pardoned until 1961.

Mooney tried to resume his activities but his health was gone. Eighteen months after his release, Mooney was bedridden, and on 6 March 1942 he died in San Francisco at age fifty. Billings went to work as a watchmaker after his release. He avoided radical politics but became vice president of the Watchmakers Union.

FURTHER READING

- Frost, Richard H. The Mooney Case. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1968.
 Gentry, Curt. Frame-Up. New York: W. W. Norton, 1967.
 Hunt, Henry Thomas. The Case of Thomas J. Mooney and Warren K. Billings. New York: Da Capo Press, 1971.
 Ward, Esolv Ethan. The Gentle Dynamiter: A Biography of Tom Mooney. Palo Alto, Calif.: Ramparts, 1983.

OTHER RESOURCE

- Mooney, Tom. Film (available at Tamiment Library, New York University) consisting of Mooney giving a résumé of his case, 1936.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

MOORE, QUEEN MOTHER (1898–1997). Born on 27 July 1898 in New Iberia, Louisiana, Audley "Queen Mother" Moore was involved in both the Communist and black nationalist movements. While Audley only had three years of formal schooling, her education in southern folkways prepared her for a political life. After marrying at an early age into a black middle-class family, she promptly repudiated this background and joined Marcus Garvey's black nationalist movement in 1919. That same year, Queen Mother organized a massive demonstration of armed blacks to support Garvey's right to speak at Longshoreman's Hall in New Orleans. In the early twenties, Moore, as one of Garvey's most ardent supporters, migrated to New York City to work in the Garvey organization. Garvey's incarceration and subsequent deportation left her searching. In 1936 Moore joined the Communist Party. She was an active street agitator and orator, enjoining Harlemites to come to the aid of Ethiopia after its invasion by Italy. In 1938 she was the Party's candidate for state assembly from the Twenty-first District and in 1940 she ran for alderman from the Nineteenth Assembly District. In 1941 she was elected executive secretary of the Twenty-first District, the Harlem section of the Communist Party. By 1942 she had risen to become secretary of the New York State branch of the Party. In the late 1940s she, along with others, began to assert the Afro-American "national question" within the Party, after its suppression during the Earl Browder years. For this she was ignored, and she finally left the Party in 1950.

In the early 1950s, Queen Mother Moore's political activities took on a decidedly nationalistic bent. She and her sister Eloise, Mother Langley, and Dara Collins founded the Universal Association of Ethiopian Women, which protested the reign of lynch-law in the South. She led the support teams for Robert Williams, an advocate of armed self-defense, after his standoff with the authorities in Monroe County, North Carolina, in 1959. She also tutored the young Malcolm X and prodded Elijah Muhammad to call for a separate state for black Americans in the South. During the centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation in 1963, she established a Reparations Committee to advocate compensatory payment to descendants of slaves for their ancestors' forced labor and for subsequent social and economic injustice. Throughout the 1960s, Queen Mother Moore's presence became a catalyst for the new generation of "Black Power" advocates. In 1968 she was one of the critical forces involved in the declaration of the Republic of New Africa and initiated its statement of independence. Throughout the 1970s, she was actively engaged in support of nationalist political prisoners. During her long career of political activism, Queen Mother Moore fused black nationalism, socialism, and Pan-Africanism. She was mentor to many of the sixties and seventies generation of activists.

[See also Civil Rights Movement; Communist Party, USA.]

FURTHER READING

- Moore, Audley. Interviews. Oral History of the American Left, Tamiment Library, New York University.
 "Queen Mother Moore." The New Afrikan (Detroit), 18 December 1983.
 "Queen Mother Moore Receives Garvey Award." Burning Spear (San Francisco), January-March 1987.
 —MUHAMMAD AHMAD (MAX STANFORD)

MORGAN, LEWIS HENRY (1818–1881). Anthropology in the United States did not begin as an academic discipline but as a scholarly pastime of self-taught amateurs seeking a better understanding of the culture of the American Indians. Its founders included George Catlin, Major John Wesley Powell, Frank Hamilton Cushing and, most influential by far, Lewis Henry Morgan.

Born in Aurora, New York, Morgan graduated from Union College in 1840 and shortly afterward was admitted to the bar in Rochester, where he lived most of his life. Legal adviser to a railroad for many years, he was elected to the New York State Assembly in 1861 and to the State Senate in 1868, but the real focus of his life lay elsewhere. In his early manhood he became interested in "primitive" society, especially that of his Iroquois Indian neighbors. A chance encounter with a young Seneca, Ely S. Parker, in a bookstore in 1844 quickly led to meetings with other Indians and started Morgan on the research that would remain his consuming passion for the rest of his days. He was not only a student of Indian culture, but an admirer and defender of that culture; it was largely because of his instrumental role in defeating an effort to seize Seneca land for commercial use in 1847 that he was inducted into the tribe's Hawk Clan.

The Seneca and other tribes of the Iroquois Nation were the subject of Morgan's first book, League of the Ho-de-no-sau-nee, or Iroquois (1851), which was followed by three more important anthropological studies: Systems of Consanguinity and Affinity of the Human Family (1871), published by the Smithsonian Institution, Ancient Society (1877), and Houses and House-Life of the American Aborigines, published shortly before his death in 1881. His only nonanthropological book, The American Beaver and His Works (1868), was long recognized as the classic monograph on the subject and warmly praised by Charles Darwin; of special interest to modern readers are its lengthy discussion of animal intelligence and its affirmation of animal rights.

In his lifetime Morgan was one of the most respected scientific figures in the United States, and was by no means regarded as a radical. The evolutionary theory of property, the family, and government that he developed in his most famous and later most controversial book, Ancient Society, did, however, challenge the prevailing views on these matters, and some passages in the book's five-hundred-plus pages have a distinctly radical ring. His rhapsodic descriptions of primitive "communism in living," for example, and his highly critical estimate of property in civilization, which he concluded by arguing that "a mere property career is not the final destiny of mankind," and that "the next higher stage of society" would be "a revival, in a higher form, of the liberty, equality, and fraternity" of the ancient tribal cultures, suffice to confirm Leslie A. White's contention that Ancient Society was "revolutionary in import as well as evolutionary." But such passages did not prevent the book from receiving long and flattering reviews in such mainstream publications as the Atlantic Monthly, the Nation and the New York Times. If Morgan acquired a posthumous reputation as a radical, the credit (or blame) belongs to Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, who discerned the revolutionary implications of his theories and proclaimed them to the world.

In the winter of 1880–1881 Marx made an assiduous study of Ancient Society, evidently intending to devote a substantial work to it. The long illness that culminated in his death in 1883 made it impossible for him to complete this task, and his extensive notes were not published integrally until 1972. Engels's The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State (1884) drew on Marx's notes, but was essentially a summary and defense of Morgan's views. Recognized ever since as one of the Marxist classics, Engels's little book set the stage for the enduring socialist interest in Morgan, an interest soon multiplied by other popular works such as August Bebel's Woman and Socialism and Paul Lafargue's The Evolution of Property. In his book as well as in letters, Engels's praise for Morgan was boundless; indeed, he went so far as to credit him with the independent discovery of the materialist conception of history. Thus, with the possible exception of Benjamin Franklin, Morgan became the only American thinker universally recognized as an important influence on, and contributor to, the Marxism of Marx and Engels.

Well before the The Origin of the Family appeared in English translation, Morgan's work had an impact on the American movement. In an autobiographical sketch published shortly before his execution in 1887, Haymarket martyr August Spies cited Ancient Society as one of the three books that had influenced him most. In Daniel De Leon's Socialist Labor Party, Morgan's work was recognized as a canonical authority equal to the works of Marx and Engels themselves. Again and again De Leon referred to the "Morgan-Marxian materialist conception of history," or similar formulations, and in later years he boasted that the popularity of Ancient Society among American workers was the direct result of his party's educational efforts. Morgan was also boosted in the Socialist Party press; the Comrade, edited by John Spargo, offered subscribers copies of the Holt edition of Ancient Society.

Morgan's views reached a much larger readership when Charles H. Kerr's Chicago-based socialist publishing house brought out Ernest Untermann's translation of The Origin of the Family in 1902, and an inexpensive edition of Ancient Society five years later. Promoted in the socialist press as "required reading" for all class-conscious workers, these books were reviewed, summarized, and commented on at length by countless aspiring Marxist theorists over the next three decades. They were used as textbooks at Detroit's Proletarian University, the Work People's College of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in Duluth, and in socialist study-classes throughout North America. The Kerr edition of Ancient Society sold some four thousand copies in four years, was subsequently reprinted several times, and was still in print in the 1960s.

As Morgan's working-class readership grew, his reputation in academic circles declined sharply. For the socialists and Wobblies of the 1910s, as for the various later factions of Communists, academic disdain for Morgan was regarded almost as proof of his revolutionary correctness. In the Left press the dominant trends in American anthropology—especially the school of Franz Boas—were scornfully dismissed as bourgeois and pro-imperialist, and Morgan's views were defended against all comers. In 1925, for example, the IWW's Industrial Pioneer ran a lengthy three-part series titled "Was Morgan Wrong?" Responding to all the arguments of the "anti-Morgan" anthropologists, the author, Vern Smith, concluded that Morgan was, on all disputed points, emphatically right. In 1937 anthropologist Robert Lowie summed up the prevailing academic attitude toward Morgan in his History of Ethnological Theory, faulting Morgan's works for their alleged "mystical nonsense" and "fatal errors," though begrudgingly conceding him something of a bumbling pioneer's status. Fifteen years later William Z. Foster, in his History of the Communist Party, expressed the sentiment of a sizable segment of the American Left when he blithely hailed Ancient Society as "perhaps the most important book ever written in the Western Hemisphere."

Too often, in these polemics, radicals contented themselves with the simple assertion of Morgan's infallibility, quoting Engels as proof. But there was more than a little truth in their charges that academic anthropology was a deeply conservative discipline, and that the rejection of Morgan by Boas, Lowie, and others was motivated by something more than the disinterested pursuit of Science. Within the field of anthropology itself, in the 1930s, a few independent thinkers arose to challenge their colleagues' conventional wisdom on Morgan. Foremost among these was Leslie A. White, who devoted numerous journal articles to Morgan's vindication, and edited several volumes of his unpublished writings, most notably his Indian Journals, 1859–1862 (1959). Although he was Red-baited because of an early visit to Soviet Russia, White was not particularly interested in Marxism; he tended to avoid the political dimension of the debate on Morgan, and defended the latter's work on strictly scientific grounds.

The Charles H. Kerr Company's advertisement for Ancient Society emphasized that the book "points the way to a cleaner, freer, happier life for women," and it is remarkable how many of the best-informed and most militant defenders of Morgan have been women radicals. In a letter to Engels dated 9 June 1886, Florence Kelley noted that "a large section of the Suffrage Association in Iowa took for the subject of its discussions through the winter Morgan's works, especially his Ancient Society." In her first exposition of basic Marxist principles, the 1887 essay on "The Need of Theoretical Preparation for Philanthropic Work," addressed to young women entering the field of social work, Kelley strongly urged the reading both of Ancient Society and Engels's then-untranslated Origin of the Family. In Elizabeth Cady Stanton's autobiography, Eighty Years and More (1898), the venerable suffragist who became an avowed socialist in her last years signaled Morgan's work as "truth [that] cannot be questioned" on the subject of matriarchy. Lida Parce, author of Lesson Outlines in the Economic Interpretation of History (1908), drew heavily on Morgan in her Economic Determinism, an introduction to Marxism published by Charles H. Kerr in 1913.

Morgan's work proved to be of interest to soapbox agitators no less than to theorists. Kate Richards O'Hare, one of the Socialist party's most effective speakers and pamphleteers, outlined the theses of Ancient Society in detail in "The Tale of a Rib," an essay on the "woman question" published in the National Rip-Saw in 1916. Also based on Morgan's magnum opus was the popular series of Stories of the Cave People, by the ebullient Mary E. Marcy, in the International Socialist Review (1909–1916); published as an illustrated book in 1917, these tales were used in socialist children's classes through the late 1930s.

One of the most zealous and persistent proponents of Morgan was Communist Party activist Mary Inman, remembered today especially for her theories regarding housework as a form of slavery (i.e., unpaid labor). Her books, In Woman's Defense (1940) and others, as well as her militant monthly, Facts for Women, stressed that Ancient Society was a work "highly important to the woman's movement." Morgan's work was a central reference-point in Inman's long intra-party struggle for the creation of a Communist-led national women's organization—a struggle that eventually led her to break with the Communist Party. A few years later, in the early 1950s, Morgan and Engels's commentary figured prominently in a protracted and heated internal debate (on cosmetics, beauty, and the role of women in the revolutionary movement) between Evelyn Reed, Myra Tanner Weiss, and others in the Trotskyist Socialist Workers Party.

The 1960s and 1970s witnessed a notable revival of interest in Morgan on the part of socialist and feminist scholars and activists. Carl Resek's excellent bibliography, collections of Morgan's unpublished writings, and English translations of influential studies such as Emmanuel Terray's Marxism and "Primitive" Societies (1972) and Wilhelm Reich's The Invasion of Compulsory Sex-Morality (1971) provided essential material for a new approach to his many-sided achievements. To Eleanor Burke Leacock, a Marxist anthropologist active in the women's movement, we owe what is probably the most thoughtful and influential critical reassessment of Morgan in recent decades. Published originally as an introduction to a new edition of Ancient Society in 1964, and reprinted in her Myths of Male Dominance: Collected Articles on Women Cross-Culturally (1981), Leacock argued that Ancient Society, while not the unassailable gospel that some of its naive Left defenders have tried to pretend, nonetheless is a book with a "tremendous meaning for today." She concludes, "That the causes of our difficulties lie not in the nature of humanity, but in our social commitment to property, is the profoundly important message."

[See also Anthropology; Leacock, Eleanor Burke.]

FURTHER READING

- Krader, Lawrence, ed. The Ethnological Notebooks of Karl Marx. Assen, Netherlands: Van Gorcum, 1972.
 Resek, Carl. Lewis Henry Morgan: American Scholar. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960.
 Rosemont, Franklin. "Karl Marx and the Iroquois." Arse-nal/Surrealist Subversion 4. Chicago: Black Swan Press, 1989.
 White, Leslie A. "Morgan's Attitude toward Religion and Science." American Anthropologist 46, no. 2 (1944).

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

MOSCOW TRIALS. The series of trials that took place in Moscow in 1936–1938, in which virtually the entire surviving Bolshevik leadership of the October Revolution was charged with having made secret agreements with Hitler and the Mikado to destroy and dismember the Soviet Union, aroused a bitter controversy within the American Left. The trials occurred during the Great Depression, when the rapid industrialization of the Soviet Union contrasted with the millions of unemployed in the United States. The Nazis had marched into the Rhineland, threatening war, and Communist parties everywhere had ceased their previous ultra-Left denunciations of social democrats as "social fascists" in order to call for "popular fronts" between liberal capitalist parties and the parties of the Left. Under these circumstances, the Communist Party of the United States recruited most of a generation of rebellious youth and was a major force among intellectuals.

The Communists argued that the Soviet judiciary was part of a progressive social system that had brought great gains to the people and could not, therefore, be rotten. The Soviet Union was stronger than ever as a result of the trials. To question them was to break up the unity of the antifascist forces.

The Lovestoneites, the Communist Party faction under whose leadership the Trotskyists had been expelled only to be then expelled themselves by the William Z. Foster faction, at first defended the trials. When, however, Nikolai Bukharin, whose supporters the Lovestoneites were, became a defendant in the third trial, they reversed themselves and declared the trials to be frame-ups.

The Trotskyists called for a commission to investigate the justice of the treason charges against Trotsky. They argued that no evidence had been provided outside of the confessions, that it was preposterous to believe that the entire Bolshevik leadership except for one man consisted of traitors to the revolution, and that allegations in the confessions conflicted sharply with verified facts. The purpose of the trials, they said, was to consolidate the rule of an autocratic bureaucracy that had achieved supremacy as the result of the isolation of a backward country devastated by war and famine and subject to the pressures of its barbaric past and of imperialism's barbaric present. This bureaucracy was faithless to the ideals of the revolution, but the Soviet Union remained a "degenerated workers' state"—just as a trade union under the grip of a bureaucracy that permits no internal democracy and uses gangster methods against the rank and file remains an instrument of the workers even though the union needs to be utterly renovated to function truly as such.

Members of the anti-Stalinist Left who worked with George Novack and other Trotskyists on the Committee for the Defense of Leon Trotsky in setting up an International Commission of Inquiry headed by John Dewey included Max Eastman, James T. Farrell, Sidney Hook, Mary McCarthy, Norman Thomas, and Edmund Wilson. Freda Kirchwey, the editor of the Nation, was for a while a member of the committee but resigned from it under pressure from the Communists, who stated that the Nation was acting as the "organ of a counterrevolutionary band of conspirators and assassins."

The liberal fellow-travelers of the Communist Party published an "Open Letter to American Liberals" that urged them to have nothing to do with the Trotsky defense committee, accusing it of interfering in Soviet internal affairs and helping fascism. The eighty-eight signatories included Malcolm Cowley, Theodore Dreiser, Lillian Hellman, Rockwell Kent, Corliss Lamont, Max Lerner, Robert S. Lynd, Carey McWilliams, Dorothy Parker, Henry Roth, Paul Sweezy, and Nathanael West.

The Nation and the New Republic ostensibly suspended judgment on the trials but in reality were scarcely neutral in the controversy. Both gave as their opinion that, although the defendants might not have been guilty of some of the things they were charged with, they must have been guilty of "something." Both failed to give serious consideration to the findings of the Dewey Commission that led it to declare Trotsky "not guilty." The New Republic turned against John Dewey, who was one of its founders, so that he felt constrained to resign from its editorial board, of which he had been a member for twenty-five years.

In the years that followed, many of the members of the Communist Party, the Lovestoneites, and the Trotskyists and their respective peripheries gave up their radicalism. A minority turned conservative. Undoubtedly, the Hitler-Stalin Pact, the war, the post-war boom, the Cold War, and the Soviet repressions of the Hungarians and the Czechs had most to do with this, but the Moscow trials also had their delayed effect. Within two years after Khrushchev's report to the Twentieth Congress of the Russian Communist Party, in which he described the methods of Stalin's security apparatus in the vast purge that followed the trials—casting doubt by implication on the trials themselves—more than eighty-five percent of the American Communist Party abandoned it, reducing its membership from twenty-thousand-plus members to less than three thousand.

Fifty years after the first Moscow trial, a U.S. Moscow Trials Campaign Committee, headed by Paul Siegel, Ben Stone, and Marilyn Vogt-Downey, was formed to urge the Soviet government to exonerate the defendants of the Moscow trials. After this was done for all except Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov, it urged the exoneration of these two and the publication of the writings of the principal defendants. Part of an international effort that gained the signatures, among others, of ninety-seven representatives of socialist, labor, and radical parties in the parliaments of nineteen countries, it got the endorsement of more than 225 people of the American Left. Three of the signatories—A. B. Magil, Morris U. Schappes, and Paul M. Sweezy—had been active in support of the trials at the time; one—Mary McCarthy—had been active in opposition to the trials.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Partisan Review; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Deutscher, Isaac. The Prophet Outcast: Trotsky 1929–1940. New York: Oxford University Press, 1963.
- Shannon, David A. The Decline of American Communism. Chatham, N.J.: Chatham Bookseller, 1971.
- Wald, Alan M. James T. Farrell: The Revolutionary Socialist Years. New York: New York University Press, 1978.
- Wald, Alan M. The New York Intellectuals. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.
- Warren, Frank A., III. Liberals and Communism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1966.

—PAUL N. SIEGEL

MOST, JOHANN (1846–1906). A brilliant editor and orator, Johann Most was the leading social revolutionary and anarchist in America during the 1880s. Born in Bavaria, he began his public career as a Social Democrat, serving two terms in the German Reichstag, and was imprisoned in and expelled from both Austria and Germany for his socialist agitation. From London, Most launched his famous paper, Freiheit (1879), which he edited until his death. Most's growing extremism and uncompromising calls for violence soon led to a break with the Social Democrats, and Most moved steadily toward anarchism. Following a prison term in England, Most moved Freiheit to New York in 1882.

The principal author of the Pittsburgh Manifesto (1883), he invigorated the American social revolutionary movement until the Haymarket tragedy (1886). Believing violent revolution was necessary for the working class to liberate itself from capitalism, he denounced trade unions and electoral politics as futile delusions. Most's best-known pamphlet remains his terrorist handbook, The Science of Revolutionary Warfare (1885); his defense of violent tactics helped perpetuate the popular stereotype of anarchists as fanatical bomb-throwers. A powerful writer and speaker, Most was repeatedly pursued by the police and served three prison terms in New York City.

[See also Anarchism; Black International.]

FURTHER READING

- Avrich, Paul. The Haymarket Tragedy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Trautmann, Frederic. The Voice of Terror: A Biography of Johann Most. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1980.

—BLAINE MCKINLEY

MOTHER EARTH. Although often edited by others, the anarchist journal Mother Earth reflected the personality and view of Emma Goldman. She was not only the “mother” of the magazine but of the collective that sustained it. This group included Max Baginski, Hippolyte Havel, Harry Kelley, Leonard Abbott, and Alexander Berkman. One of the purposes of their endeavor was to reanimate an anarchist movement that had been on the defensive since the assassination of President McKinley by anarchist Leon Czołgosz. The intent of the collective was to blend social concerns with the arts, but in practice the arts were of secondary interest. Among many well-known contributors were Voltairine de Cleyre, Theodore Dreiser, Frank Harris, Arturo Giovannitti, and the Magón brothers. There were translations of all the leading European anarchist thinkers as well as passages from Nietzsche, Heine, Flaubert, and other European intellectuals. Cover artists included Man Ray and Robert Minor.

The magazine’s title was generated during a buggy ride in the country by Baginski and Goldman in February 1906. Thrilled to see the soil breaking free of the power of frost and green shoots poking for the sun, Goldman declared “Mother Earth” would be an ideal name for the magazine they were planning. The first issue of sixty-four pages appeared 10 March 1906. Circulating between three thousand and five thousand copies, Mother Earth continued publishing until 1917, when it was suppressed by the federal government. Goldman and Berkman then published Mother Earth Bulletin—to keep in touch “with friends”—until their deportation to Russia in 1919.

[See also Anarchism; Goldman, Emma.]

FURTHER READING

Wexler, Alice. Emma Goldman: An Intimate Life. New York: Pantheon, 1984.

Woodworth, Fred. Cover note to a facsimile edition of Mother Earth 2, no. 9 (November 1907), published by the Match, 1 May 1986.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

Cover illustration by Man Ray.

MOTHER JONES. See Ramparts.

MUMFORD, LEWIS (1895–1990). Long known as a towering figure in American architectural criticism and the history of urbanism and technology, Lewis Mumford is only now receiving recognition as a radical thinker whose commitment to local democracy and environmental values foreshadows much contemporary thinking among Greens and communitarians. During his long career as an independent writer and public intellectual, Mumford denounced capitalist industrialization for promoting a Promethean will-to-power at the expense of the natural and built environments. In dozens of books and hundreds of articles, Mumford sought to promote an alternative ethic that defined “self-fulfillment” in terms of civic participation, aesthetic experience, and the creation of human-scale settlements. Such interests made Mumford skeptical of Marxism, despite the parallels between his own romantic radicalism and the Hegelian currents in the Marxist tradition; instead, he turned to John Ruskin, William Morris, Ebenezer Howard, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Herman Melville, William James, Thorstein Veblen, and—above all—the Scottish regionalist Patrick Geddes for inspiration, as he sought to identify the prospects for a holistic "neo-technic" culture emerging out of the ashes of "paleo-technic" industrialism. After World War II, Mumford became an intransigent critic of the nuclear arms race and the centralized wartime state, whose roots he traced to the rise of an "authoritarian" technics that gutted human fellowship in the pursuit of limitless power and control. His last major books of social criticism, The City in History (1962) and the two-volume Myth of the Machine (1967, 1970), represent the culmination of his life's work and a resounding defense of the creative personality in the face of an authoritarian "Megamachine."

Mumford was born in New York as the illegitimate child of a German American housekeeper and grew up in a lower-middle-class milieu on Manhattan's Upper West Side. He attended City College and other New York universities part-time between 1912 and 1919, although he never obtained a degree. After completing military service in World War I, he joined the editorial board of the Dial and promoted, with Veblen and John Dewey, its program for postwar "social reconstruction." During the twenties, he emerged as a leading successor to the group of "Young Intellectuals" who had been associated with the Seven Arts in 1916–1917. In his earliest writings, Mumford adopted Van Wyck Brooks's view of American culture as divided between "highbrow" moralism and "low-brow" commercial practice and, with it, the Ruskin-Morris critique of the factory system and the industrial division of art and labor. Mumford likewise condemned the rise of "metropolitan" sprawl for the destruction of civic spaces and small-scale cities and championed regional planning as an alternative model of settlement. The geographical segregation of work, art, and residence into far-flung, separate locations was, for Mumford, the urban equivalent of the industrial dissolution of craft knowledge into assembly-line drudgery and managerial science. The Story of Utopias (1922) and The Golden Day (1926) are notable for their exploration of the utopian tradition in Europe and the United States and their attempt to locate historical precedents for a holistic reintegration of art and social practice.

During the mid-1930s, Mumford moved briefly into the orbit of the Popular Front as a member of the League of American Writers and the Congress of American Artists, quitting both over the Hitler-Stalin Pact. During most of that decade, he stressed how his vision of "basic communism" differed from Marxism. His pathbreaking Technics and Civilization (1934) and

The Culture of Cities (1938) brilliantly demonstrated how commercial and military motives had shaped the development of the city and modern technology since the demise of the "medieval synthesis." But these books substituted for political activism an emerging "neo-technic synthesis" grounded in social-scientific planning, biology, and human-relations techniques that seemed as elitist and sterile as the industrial civilization he condemned.

During the late 1930s, Mumford became an outspoken advocate of American military involvement in the war against European fascism. His reflections on that war led to a profound reorientation in his thinking. With Reinhold Niebuhr and Jacques Maritain, Mumford insisted that the rise of fascism exposed the moral shallowness of much of the Enlightenment tradition, including the social-scientific progressivism that had shaped much of his work in the thirties. Returning to the "tragic sense of life" that preoccupied him in his 1929 biography of Herman Melville, Mumford now argued in Faith for Living (1940) and The Condition of Man (1944) that a religiously grounded respect for human limits and frailty, and the solidaristic values he associated with the family and rural life, offered the best safeguards against the dreams of scientific mastery that had culminated in dictatorship and genocidal war. The death of Mumford's son, Geddes, in the war, and the American military's use of nuclear weapons against Japanese civilians, deepened Mumford's despair about the destructive consequences of the West's Promethean impulses. While Niebuhr and other pro-war liberals subsequently became critical supporters of American postwar foreign policy, Mumford denounced his country's reliance on nuclear weapons as proof that Hitler's morality had survived the defeat of Nazism to become the universal ethic of the twentieth century. For the rest of his life, he would remain a vocal opponent of U.S. foreign policy, writing essays and public letters to condemn the nuclear arms race and Lyndon Johnson's escalation of the war in Vietnam.

Despite their continuity with earlier themes in his work, Mumford's writings after the war constituted a form of self-criticism. Values for Survival (1946), The Conduct of Life (1951), and The Transformations of Man (1956) were works of moral philosophy that rejected much of the progressive tradition in which he was raised and advocated a "personalist" ethic closer to Dorothy Day and Jacques Ellul than to Dewey and Veblen. He repudiated much of the architectural modernism he once championed in his widely read columns for the New Yorker and savaged Robert Moses and other planners for sacrificing city neighborhoods to the automobile, urban renewal, and suburban tract housing. The City in History depicted the modern megalopolis as a "necropolis," with a tangle of highways replacing the urban public square. But Mumford was also seeking to understand the age-old historical forces that had led to the creation of weapons of mass destruction and inhuman bureaucratic systems of power in his own day. The Myth of the Machine ranged across the centuries to reconstruct a historic conflict between "democratic" and "authoritarian" technics, arguing that the roots of the military-industrial complex lay in the human "machines" of slave laborers commanded by Egyptian and Mesopotamian potentates in the ancient world. The bleak pessimism of Mumford's portrayal of "the Pentagon of power" led some readers to miss his effort to identify alternative technics, including women's handicrafts, that transformed the will-to-power into a will-to-creation and suppressed destructive aspirations to limitless mastery.

Always suspicious of a politics that aimed to capture the nation-state, Mumford moved from his early fantasies of expert planning by humanist-regionalists to a strategy of withdrawal into alternative communities. The latter perspective echoed his own removal, after 1939, from New York City to rural Amenia, New York, where he and his family lived a deliberately modest and ascetic life. Before his death in 1990, Mumford began to attract the attention of German Greens and other environmentalists. His critique of the technocratic tendencies in modern liberalism has likewise made him an attractive figure for many communarians, religious radicals, and feminists.

FURTHER READING

- Blake, Casey Nelson. Beloved Community: The Cultural Criticism of Randolph Bourne, Van Wyck Brooks, Waldo Frank, and Lewis Mumford. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.
- Hughes, Agatha C., and Thomas P. Hughes, eds. Lewis Mumford: Public Intellectual. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Lasch, Christopher. "Lewis Mumford and the Myth of the Machine." Salinagundi 49 (summer 1980).
- Miller, Donald L. Lewis Mumford: A Life. New York: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1989.

—CASEY NELSON BLAKE

MUNICIPAL SOCIALISM. The greatest gains for American radicals in municipal politics came during the ascendancy of the Socialist Party of America, 1910–1915. During these years the party was heavily committed to city elections and was rewarded by an impressive run of electoral successes across the country. Most Socialists understood the limitations of local government, but faced with the task of building a coordinated, nationwide political movement from the ground up, hoped to use municipal politics to build a grass-roots organization. Local campaigns, they felt, could expose exploitation in the neighborhoods, raise working-class political aspirations and confidence, and teach political methods and ideology. Experience at this level would prepare workers for state and national affairs.

In terms of organizational benefits, the party's successes in municipal politics help explain the rapid growth of the movement during the Progressive period. Conversely, the party's inability to consolidate these electoral gains—its failure to build stable grass-roots political organizations—was an important factor in the subsequent decline of the movement. The party entered its most difficult trials during and after World War I with an organization in shambles at the grass-roots level.

Municipal socialism drew upon a long tradition of organized working-class participation in city elections. Local politics, like union organizing, cooperative and utopian programs, and economic boycotts, was part of an evolving search for control at the workplace that spilled over into a drive to control neighborhoods. In the mid-1880s, scores of Knights of Labor assemblies embraced municipal politics through Labor and Workingmen's parties. The most notable results came in 1886. In New York City, "single-taxer" Henry George, running with strong labor backing, nearly defeated Democrat Abram Hewitt, and in Chicago the United Labor Party elected seven assemblymen and five judges. The Knights did not enter local politics with a larger revolutionary goal in mind, yet the similarities between their demands and those of the Socialists three decades later suggest the continuity in working-class republicanism expressed at the local level.

In 1898 Social-Democrat John C. Chase was elected mayor in Haverhill, Massachusetts, along with several Socialist aldermen and councilmen. Socialist Charles R. Coulter became mayor of Brockton a year later. Both candidates received strong union support but were subsequently defeated by fusion tickets composed of Republicans and Democrats. A decade later the Socialist Party claimed thirty-five minor municipal offices in eight states.

The party's first major victory came in 1910 in Milwaukee. Building on a history of labor politics, Social-Democrats ran a machinist, Robert Meister, for mayor in 1898 on a platform that included municipal control of public utilities, union labor and the eight-hour day for city work, relief for unemployed workers, heavier taxes for large corporations, and free legal and medical service for needy people. This would become standard Socialist fare across the country. Having secured the union labor vote, the Socialist appealed to liberal middle-class citizens, highlighting a 1903 scandal that involved both Republicans and Democrats. Under the firm hand of Austrian-born Victor Berger, Milwaukee Social-Democrats perfected a remarkable political machine, the most conspicuous feature being a "bundle brigade" that could canvass the entire city with literature in seven languages in a matter of hours.

In 1910 Milwaukee Socialists elected a mayor, Emil Seidel, seven aldermen-at-large, and sixteen councilmen. Two years later a fusion candidate defeated the Seidel administration, but in 1916 the Socialists returned to power and held office until 1940. Their success was partly due to adept handling of the city's diverse ethnic groups. Local Milwaukee's "formula"—a moderate, practical municipal program, close ties with unions, and solid organization—was copied by Socialist locals everywhere, even though many criticized the substance of Berger's reformist municipal program.

Across the nation in 1910–1911, Socialists elected more than four hundred officials, including twenty-eight mayors and village heads. The prominent victories were in Berkeley, California; Butte, Montana; Flint, Michigan; Granite City, Illinois; Coeur d'Alene, Idaho; Two Harbors, Minnesota; Manitowoc, Wisconsin; Schenectady, New York; Canton, Hamilton, Lima, and Lorain, Ohio; and Reading and New Castle, Pennsylvania. The bulk, however, were in smaller manufacturing, mining, railroad, and lake-shipment communities in the Midwest. Socialists won across a broad range of economic circumstances, but their political strength invariably lay in the factory districts and the "lower ends" of the cities. Their elected officials were likewise generally working people. By 1912 there were more than two thousand Socialists serving in public office.

In terms of gross numbers of victories, Socialist fortunes in city government, like the party's development as a whole, grew rapidly during the prewar years. But the party's strength in each particular city was far less constant than the national trends. Socialist administrations typically ended with Socialists forced out of office in the first or second election after their victory by a fusion of all nonsocialist parties. This local instability suggests weaknesses in the grass-roots movement.

While the Socialists succeeded in drawing support from working people, they failed to deal effectively with middle-class reformers, who were attracted to the party's immediate demands but repelled by the working-class bias the party showed once in office. Often general reform sentiment fragmented traditional party organizations, and the resulting multi-party elections allowed the Socialists to take office on a plurality based on their strength in working-class wards. The local became entangled in an unstable coalition only partly of its own making, composed of workers and frustrated middle-class voters. Once in power, the Socialists faced a difficult choice between moving to the left to consolidate their working-class support, or broadening their program to include general reform sentiment. Unappeased, middle-class voters gravitated to a fusion ticket endorsed by both major-party organizations and offering a "business-man's" administration with a clear middle-class appeal. Just as damaging were coalitions with middle-class reformers. More than a score of elected Socialist officials, including Schenectady Socialist mayor George R. Lunn, were expelled from the party for adopting middle-class reform issues once in office.

During the World War I, Socialists faced state repression, fusion-party opposition, and heightened intolerance. Although victories in smaller communities dropped off accordingly, the Socialist vote in larger cities increased. In New York City, Morris Hillquit came within a few thousand votes of victory in 1917, and six Socialist aldermen were elected. Socialists in Cleveland, Toledo, Dayton, Buffalo, and Chicago received between twenty and forty-four percent of the municipal vote, much of it coming from immigrant groups.

Postwar elections brought scattered victories in Wisconsin, Illinois, and Ohio. In Milwaukee, Daniel Hoan, first elected mayor in 1916, held together a coalition of union workers and liberal reformers through the 1930s. Hoan was defeated in 1940, but eight years later Frank Zeidler was elected as America's last old-style big-city Socialist mayor. Zeidler outlasted his Socialist Party base and weathered several controversies over his progressive stand on minority rights, slum clearance, and building inspection. He won a third term in 1956 and chose not to run in 1960.

The Socialist Party's other notable postwar municipal success came in Reading, Pennsylvania, a working-class city of around 100,000 that elected Socialist Henry J. Stump mayor in 1927. Campaigning against a tax proposal that overburdened working-class homeowners, Socialists promised to equalize property assessments and reduce spending. This limited-government platform, ironically, left the Socialist administration unprepared to deal with destitute workers during the Depression. In 1935 the Reading movement succumbed to a national party split between followers of Norman Thomas and the Old Guard. Although the Old Guard retained control of the local, it was unable to conduct effective campaigns and lost decisively in 1939. Stump was re-elected in 1943, but his campaign was largely personal.

Socialists in Bridgeport, Connecticut, led by perennial Socialist mayoral candidate Jasper McLevy, won office in 1933 after a series of bridge-contracting scandals tarred both major parties. Mayor McLevy, like Hoan and Stump, offered an efficient, responsible government, but nothing distinguished his administration as Socialist. The Connecticut state party censured the conservative administration in the late 1930s, but McLevy, enjoying wide appeal among liberals, continued in office until 1957.

The Socialist Party disintegrated as an independent political force between 1948 and 1960. In the late 1970s the political initiative was picked up by a variety of new progressive coalitions in cities like Cambridge, Massachusetts; Ann Arbor, Michigan; and Berkeley, Santa Cruz, and Santa Monica, California. Berkeley progressives won a number of seats on the rent board and city council in the early 1980s, as did Tom Hayden's Campaign for Economic Democracy in Santa Monica. Their concerns ranged from housing reform and rent control to city planning, minority representation, and energy use. The new leadership, drawn from middle-class backgrounds, demonstrated greater flexibility in building coalitions, but lacked the national organizational ties Socialists had formed earlier. Still, they retained the old radicals' faith in social control over economic development and shared a belief that municipal politics could yield tangible organizational benefits and at the same time redistribute, at least in small ways, community wealth through housing reform, improved social services, neighborhood preservation, and other socially responsible actions.

The best known of the new progressive municipal coalitions was ushered in by Bernard Sanders's nine-vote victory over a conservative Democratic incumbent in Burlington, Vermont, in 1981. Sanders, like socialists before him, immediately faced united Republican-Democratic opposition, and like his predecessors responded by taking the council fights into the neighborhoods. Sanders's support came from young professionals, the elderly, students, and working people—a mix that suggests the continuing viability of the old-line Socialist coalitions. Sanders's program, like those of the older Socialist administrations, stressed a concern for more efficient government, equalized tax burdens, improved services for low-income citizens, and popular access to the arts.

In 1983, Socialist Michael Rotkin was elected mayor of Santa Cruz, California. His coalition would dominate city government for well over a decade, promoting a host of progressive initiatives. Municipal socialism in the 1990s involved coalitions similar to that around Rotkin and frequently gained power in nonpartisan contests. The Green Party gained a majority on the city council of Arcata, California, and the New Party elected many local candidates in the Midwest, Mountain states, and Far West (sometimes endorsing left-leaning Democrats).

[See also British Americans; German Americans; Milwaukee; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Critchlow, Donald T., ed. Socialism in the Heartland: The Midwestern Experience, 1900-1925. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1986.
- Judd, Richard W. Socialist Cities: Explorations into the Grass Roots of American Socialism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.
- Kaltnick, Arnold. "Socialist Municipal Administration in Four American Cities: Milwaukee, Schenectady, New Castle, and Conneaut, Ohio." Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1982.

Stave, Bruce, ed. Socialism and the Cities. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1975.

—RICHARD JUDD

MURALS. The political and educational dimensions of murals have been utilized by government and ecclesiastic organizations since ancient times. With the Mexican mural renaissance of the 1920s, revolutionary and nationalistic components were added that have made murals an important ingredient in contemporary revolutionary culture. The U.S. mural movement was directly inspired by the three great Mexican muralists—Diego Rivera, David Alfaro Siqueiros, and José Clemente Orozco—particularly during their U.S. period of 1930–1934. The Mexican example was especially influential because it promised a means of transforming the best of European modernism (cubism, futurism, and expressionism) into a realistic, popular style that addressed social needs. Both Siqueiros and Rivera were active in the Mexican Communist Party while Orozco was a profoundly humanistic social critic. In creating visual symbolism for revolutionary Mexico each artist attacked capitalism, corruption, imperialism, and the church. Each had a strong, flamboyant personality that sparked controversy and drew attention to his murals and political views.

The American mural movement of the 1930s produced twenty-five hundred works in locations throughout the nation. Most of this work was done between 1933 and 1940 under the aegis of the Works Progress Administration (WPA) as a series of relief programs for artists. The commissions for post offices, schools, and public buildings were awarded through competitions sponsored by the WPA and the Section of Painting and Sculpture of the Treasury Department.

The strongest social and artistic murals were usually the efforts of left-wing artists who had worked directly with Rivera either in Mexico or the United States. These artists included Victor Arnautoff, George Biddle, Lucienne Bloch, Marianne Greenwood, Ben Shahn, Clifford Wight, and Hale Woodruff. One of the most controversial projects consisted of twenty-six murals directed by Arnautoff for Coit Tower in San Francisco. Murals by Arnautoff, Wight, and Bernard Zackheim were criticized for containing radical images such as that of a worker reading a book by Karl Marx. Only strong protests led by liberals and other artists saved the works from destruction. Another dispute was generated by Rockwell Kent's post office murals in Washington, D.C., which contained an appeal for Puerto Rican independence.

Mural by Mark Rogovin, Chicago, 1960s.

Some of the most artistically successful interpretations of the New Deal's respect of immigrants and workers were rendered by Ben Shahn in murals for the Roosevelt Community Center in New Jersey and the Bronx post office. His design for a mural on the "Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti," exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art in 1932, was finally executed as a mosaic at Syracuse University in 1967. A list of murals with notable social comment would span the nation and would have themes as varied as Lucienne Bloch's Childhood at the Women's House of Detention (Rikers Island, New York) and Anton Refregier's California history series for the Rincon Annex of the San Francisco post office.

With the advent of the Cold War, socially relevant art became suspect in the United States and the dominant style shifted to abstract expressionism. Many WPA murals were either intentionally destroyed or neglected. The Rivera tradition of socially concerned art survived only in the work of black artists such as Hale Woodruff, Charles White, and John Biggers, who painted murals for churches and schools in the South. William Walker, an artist who helped launch the contemporary mural movement, came out of this tradition.

The new mural movement became visible in 1967 when William Walker helped produce the "Wall of respect," painted on a condemned building in Chicago's black ghetto. This collection of images of black heroes and black struggles was painted by twenty-one black artists shortly after the assassination of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr. Ebony magazine celebrated the wall with a cover story. Other walls of respect and related murals soon began to appear in ethnic and "hippie" communities throughout the nation.

By 1970 four large murals that epitomized the political activism of diverse neighborhoods had been painted on the sides of Chicago buildings by William Walker, Eugene Eda, Mark Rogovin, and John Weber. Walker's "Peace and Salvation Wall of Understanding" at Cabrini Homes was painted after two white policemen were shot by snipers and an entire housing project was held hostage by police until the suspects surrendered. Eda's "Wall of Meditation" featured Egyptian and Black Panther warriors with portraits of Malcolm X and Martin Luther King in a dramatic style reminiscent of Orozco. Rogovin used a flat Siqueiros-like image of resistance to urban renewal in "Protect the People's Homes," and Weber, working in a neighborhood filled with racial tension, painted a "Wall of Choices." That same year Ray Patlan added a new aspect to the mural movement by evoking Mexican American history and the struggle of farm workers in murals for the Salón de la Raza at Casa Aztlán in the Pilsen district of Chicago.

Unlike their American predecessors, the murals of the 1960s were undertaken without direct government support. They were community-based and mainly located on the exterior walls of buildings in humble neighborhoods. The creation of murals was often part of a neighborhood struggle, involving active support by community organizations and residents who sometimes participated in the painting. The effect of a mural on local problems like housing, gang warfare, and vandalism become one measure of its success.

Many early muralists were university-trained minority artists who returned to paint for their people as part of the political movement for ethnic pride. These walls often inspired local residents to begin painting and become mural artists. Methods for community projects in which nonartist community residents worked with muralist were developed by groups like Cityarts Workshop in New York. Some projects were painted by youth gang members in Los Angeles to celebrate peace treaties and commemorate dead members. Collective murals were also created by such diverse groups as Artes Guadalupanos de Aztlan (Sante Fe), Mujeres Muralistas (San Francisco), and Peoples Painters (Piscataway, New Jersey). These nonelitist group efforts embodied the philosophy of the counterculture and feminist movements and were an important innovation.

Every style from abstraction to underground-comix images was employed for social murals in the early days of the new movement. In much the same way that the New Left rejected the Old Left, the new muralists, for the most part, rejected the 1930s muralists, especially much of the work done under the WPA. But the influence of the Mexican muralists, especially Siqueiros, remained strong. A number of the new muralists went to Mexico to meet the "master" and study his compositions firsthand. Others, especially in the Chicano movement of the Southwest, simply adapted Siqueiros's ideas from films and photographs.

By the mid-1970s government began to see community murals as a means of revitalizing downtown areas, preventing graffiti, and providing constructive experiences for youth. Regular funding became available through the National Endowment for the Arts, local art councils, corporations, foundations, and youth employment programs. Artistic groups, community centers, and galleries that had formed in the early 1970s became established institutions. In Chicago, a center for political murals, there were three major groups: the Chicago Mural Group, led by John Weber, the Public Art Workshop, led by Mark Rogovin, and Movimiento Artístico Chicano (MARCH), led by Jose Gonzales and Marcos Raya. New York's Cityarts Workshop became a model for community-participation projects while the Chicano movement in California was mainly organized around community art centers such as Galleria de la Raza (San Francisco), Centro Cultural de la Raza (San Diego), RCAF (Sacramento), and Mechicano Art Center, Goetz Gallery, and SPARC (all in Los Angeles).

A national murals network was established at a conference held in New York City in 1976. A second national conference was held two years later in Chicago with representatives from Mexico, England, and France, where similar mural movements had developed. These organizational contacts were buttressed by Community Murals, a newsletter begun in the Bay Area in 1978 that soon became a quarterly magazine. The prestige of the muralist movement was further enhanced by two books issued by major publishing houses in the mid-1970s, Toward a People's Art and the Mural Manual.

When President Carter expanded the federal job-training program to include artists in 1978, mural programs were begun in smaller cities in addition to established programs in Los Angeles, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Cleveland, and Baltimore. Although the program was ended by Reagan's election in 1980, it introduced many new artists to mural work. Increasingly, however, government money began to be spent for murals and other public art devoid of social content.

With the ebbing of the protest movements begun in the 1960s there was less demand by community sponsors for issue-oriented murals and more emphasis on permanence, localism, and esthetics. Nonetheless, some sponsorship of political murals continued. Works showing new techniques included a "Song of Unity" mural created in 1978 for Berkeley's La Pena cultural center in memory of the Chilean composer and singer Victor Jara, whose hands had been cut off before he was executed by the Chilean junta that overthrew Allende. This work combined ceramic, paint, and modified papier-mâché techniques to create a three-dimensional surface. A free-standing mural, thirty-three feet by forty-five feet, dealing with the struggle of Central Americans for self-determination was completed by Leo Tanguma of Denver in 1985, and in 1986 a coalition of Bay Area mural artists created a free-standing steel-and-epoxy mural sculpture to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.

California emerged as the undisputed home of the largest and most unusual mural projects. Chicano Park, an ongoing project begun in 1970, has created more than thirty painted freeway pillars on once-disputed land under the Coronado Bay Bridge in San Diego. In Los Angeles by 1980, there were more than a thousand murals. The Estrada Courts Housing Project of East Los Angeles had become the most densely muralized public housing in the world with more than ninety murals, many with nationalistic and political themes. Los Angeles could also claim the longest mural in the world—a half-mile-long "Great Wall" that portrays the history of minorities from the beginning of time through the 1950s. It was painted over four summers beginning in 1976 by 215 youths supervised by thirty artists under the direction of Judy Baca.

The conservative policies of the Reagan years set off a new wave of art activism in the 1980s. The massive 1982 antinuclear march in New York organized visual and performing artists into support groups for the first time since the Vietnam War era. Similar national activity was stimulated by the 1984 Artists Call against Intervention in Central America. Nonfunded group projects again became common. In Chicago John Weber organized the World War III project, in which each artist painted one section of a long wall with his or her own anti-war images. In 1984 a coalition of Bay Area muralists put twenty-eight murals on both sides of one of the original Mission District mural sites with images relating to intervention in Central America. Artmakers, a new community mural group in New York City, created the "La Lucha Continua/The Struggle Continues" murals on the Lower East Side in 1985. This thirty-artist project, created under the direction of Eva Cockcroft, placed twenty-six murals dealing with intervention in Central America, apartheid in South Africa, gentrification, and police brutality on four buildings around an empty lot to create a political art park. And in 1988 foreign artists joined U.S. artists in creating a pantheon of international revolutionary heroes on the wall of the New York City building housing Pathfinder Press, the publishing arm of the Socialist Workers Party.

From the mid-1980s onward, Brushfire Studios (later renamed the Labor Art and Mural Project), guided by Mike Alewitz, led a newer mural movement focused on labor causes. Murals were created for Local P-9, Pittstown, Decatur, and other strikers as well as a mural in the Ukraine to commemorate the Chernobyl disaster. Alewitz directed the formation of the Cultural Workers and Artists Caucus of the Labor Party in 1996, which included support from prominent personalities such as Martin Sheen and Brett Butler.

[See also Gellert, Hugo; Rivera, Diego.]

FURTHER READING

- Barnett, Alan W. Community Murals: The People's Art. New York: Cornwall Books, 1984.
- Cockcroft, Eva, John Weber, and James Cockcroft. Toward a People's Art: The Contemporary Mural Movement. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1997.
- O'Connor, Francis V., ed. Art for the Millions. Greenwich, Conn.: New York Graphic Society, 1973.
- Rodriguez, Antonio. A History of Mexican Mural Painting. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1969.
- Rogovin, Mark, Marie Burton, and Holly Highfill. Mural Manual. Edited by Tim Drescher. Boston: Beacon Press, 1975.

—EVA COCKCROFT

MUSTE, A. J. (1885–1967). A leader of the labor Left of the late 1920s and early 1930s, A. J. Muste also assumed a key role in the pacifist Left of the 1940s–1960s. Unusual for a major figure of the divided and contentious twentieth-century American Left, Muste was highly regarded by many outside his own circle, in part because of his personality and approach. As his co-worker Sidney Lens recounted, Muste "never—absolutely never—deliberately denigrated another person. . . . He argued with political adversaries ranging from traditional conservatives to Stalinists, but no one ever walked away from such an 'argument' feeling hurt or demeaned." Muste was also one of a very few radicals of his era whose long career included neither a pro-Soviet nor a Cold War anticommunist phase.

Born Abraham Johannes Muste in the Netherlands and brought to the United States as a child, Muste grew up in what he later called an "exceedingly orthodox" Calvinist milieu in western Michigan. Though he labored in a furniture factory alongside his father as a child, Muste trained for the Dutch Reformed ministry. A second divinity course at Union Theological Seminary in New York exposed him to the Social Gospel and to a group of classmates and future co-workers including William Fincke, John Nevin Sayre, and Norman Thomas. Though Muste was the only one of the four from a working-class and immigrant background, all were gifted seminar-ians drawn to urban parish work and soon after to the anti-war Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR). For Muste and these others, opposition to the First World War ended his short career as a pastor.

Muste's relatively short but noteworthy years in the labor movement began with his leadership of the sixteen-week Lawrence, Massachusetts, textile strike of early 1919, a victory resulting in the attainment of the forty-four-hour week for the Lawrence workers and the formation of the independent Amalgamated Textile Workers of America (ATWA). Throughout the 1920s Muste worked to unify the small and fractious unions in the New England textile industry. Meanwhile, after two years as general secretary of the ATWA, he became the first chairman of the faculty at Brookwood Labor College (Katonah, New York) and a central figure in the flourishing workers' education movement of the period. At Brookwood Muste succeeded in gaining the trust of nonradical officers of the Machinists, United Textile Workers, and other unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (AFL), but when he began to write critiques of union-management cooperation schemes and calls for more aggressive organization, Muste and Brookwood were singled out for censure by AFL president William Green.

Disdaining the harsh and polemical Communist denunciations of AFL "misleadership," Muste instead worked to rally critical unionists into the Conference for Progressive Labor Action (CPLA), established shortly before the onset of the Great Depression. Early 1930s conditions drew Muste, like many other radical intellectuals, to Marxist politics and industrial unionism. The most notable contribution of the "Musteite" American Workers Party (successor to the CPLA) was the Toledo Auto-Lite strike, a key pre-Congress of Industrial Organizations victory. However, after a brief sojourn in the Trotskyist movement, Muste abruptly returned to pacifism in 1936.

As executive director of the FOR in the 1940s, Muste defended World War II conscientious objectors and sponsored the founding and early work of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). His most remarkable period, however, came after his retirement from the FOR in 1953. In his seventies and early eighties, Muste succeeded in legitimizing antinuclear civil disobedience, conciliating disparate Left elements, and launching a mass movement against the war in Vietnam. He himself took part in widely publicized civil-disobedience actions such as in 1959, when he "hoisted his frail frame over a four-and-one-half-foot-high fence" (in the words of biographer Jo Ann Robinson) at Omaha's intercontinental ballistic missile base.

In 1956-1957, Muste cofounded the anti-war monthly Liberation, which served as an important forum for radical views during the New Left period. With less success, he organized the American Forum for Socialist Education, an attempt to regroup socialists, pacifists, and dissident Communists into a new Left at the beginning of the post-Stalin, post-McCarthy years. A decade later, past eighty, Muste led peace missions to South Vietnam in April 1966 and North Vietnam in January 1967.

[See also Pacifism; Peace Movements; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READINGS

- Hentoff, Nat, ed. The Essays of A. J. Muste. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1967.
- Isserman, Maurice. If I Had a Hammer: The Death of the Old Left and the Birth of the New Left. New York: Basic Books, 1987.
- Lens, Sidney. Unrepentant Radical: An American Activist's Account of Five Turbulent Decades. Boston: Beacon Press, 1980.
- Robinson, Jo Ann O. Abraham Went Out: A Biography of A. J. Muste. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1981.

—JON BLOOM

NADIR, MOSHE. See Yiddish Left.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE AGAINST RACIST AND POLITICAL REPRESSION. See Davis, Angela.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY CIVIL LIBERTIES COMMITTEE. The purpose behind the launching of the National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee (NECLC) in 1951 was to fill the void left by existing civil liberties groups that were unwilling or unable to provide vigorous and able defense for targets of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC), the McCarthy Senate Committee, and the Smith Act. The six founders were all noted civil libertarians: theologian Dr. Paul Lehmann, journalist I. F. Stone, retired banker James Imbrie, sociologist and civil rights activist E. Franklin Frazier, professor Henry Pratt Fairchild, and political scientist H. H. Wilson. The first director was Clark Foreman, a well-known New Dealer and antisegregationist. Under this leadership the NECLC played a major role in the successful drive to eliminate HUAC-type investigations, to overturn the Smith Act convictions, and to end travel restrictions on dissidents.

With the rise of the civil rights movement, the NECLC became involved in various and often unpopular court cases and provided legal assistance to some of the most militant civil rights organizations. During the Vietnam War period, the NECLC joined in early efforts to have the war declared illegal, and it supported many forms of opposition to the war, giving special attention to the rights of members of the armed forces and draftees.

The NECLC and the newer NECLC Foundation remained vigorous in the 1970s and 1980s. A major focus of work was to abolish or severely curtail government surveillance of citizens, whether the agency involved was the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, or a local "Red Squad."

The NECLC was one of the first organizations to call for and campaign for the impeachment of Richard Nixon. While continuing its efforts in the traditional civil rights areas, the NECLC also put considerable energy into preventing the deportation of political refugees to dictatorships in the Caribbean area and Central America.

A list of prominent individuals and organizations given legal defense by the NECLC would include: Alger Hiss, the National Lawyers Guild, Dr. Benjamin Spock, Dr. Corliss Lamont, the United Farm Workers, Dr. Daniel Ellsberg, and Teamsters for Democracy. Leading NECLC personalities for many years have been Leonard Boudin (general counsel, 1954–1989), Dr. Corliss Lamont (chairperson, 1965–1997), and Edith Tiger (assistant director, 1953–1969; director, 1970–1998). Early in 1998, Edith Tiger announced that the NECLC would merge with the Center for Constitutional Rights and cease to exist as an independent entity.

FURTHER READING

National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, Report, 1971–80.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

NATIONAL GUARDIAN/GUARDIAN. The longest-lived and most prestigious of the postwar radical newspapers, the National Guardian (renamed the Guardian in 1967) was founded in 1948 by a triumvirate of James Aronson (executive editor), Cedric Belfrage (editor), and John McManus (managing editor). The immediate objective was to provide a dissenting voice from the Cold War policies then being fixed in place by the government of the United States. A broader goal was to revive the most militant aspects of the New Deal.

The natural political locus for such an undertaking was the orbit of the Progressive Party, and the editors tried to obtain party funding for their paper.

Although this did not come about, most of the original Guardian readers were supporters of the party, and the paper was able to build its circulation by participating in the mass movement associated with it. The debut issue of 18 October 1948 headlined an article written exclusively for the paper by Henry Wallace and a contribution from Norman Mailer, already famous as author of The Naked and the Dead, and a Progressive Party supporter.

At the state level the Guardian was aligned with the American Labor Party. Congressman Vito Marcantonio was an enthusiastic Guardian supporter and John McManus ran for governor on the American Labor Party ticket in 1950 and 1954. In 1958 the Guardian backed the Independent-Socialist ticket, which had McManus as its candidate for governor, Annette Rubinstein for lieutenant-governor, and Corliss Lamont for senator. The McManus vote fell from its 1950 high of 208,000 to 35,000. With the demise of the third parties, Belfrage lamented that the Guardian was a journalistic tail without any political dog to wag.

The survival of the newspaper was mainly due to its professional quality. The Guardian staff was an amalgam of seasoned journalists and political activists. Aronson, for example, had worked for the New York Post, Herald-Tribune, and Times; and McManus had worked for Time, PM, and the Times. McManus had been past president of the Newspaper Guild of New York and Aronson had edited Frontpage, the Guild organ. Belfrage had an equally impressive background that included a stint in Hollywood writing for a wire service. Over the years he would also write or edit a dozen books. Other Guardian staff members had worked for Esquire, the Brooklyn Eagle, PM, the New York Post, the New Republic, Time, and other well-known publications. The impressive corps of foreign correspondents included Agnes Smedley, Anna Louise Strong, and Wilfred Burchett.

The issues the paper addressed in its first years would continually reappear in new forms. Opposition to the Cold War rendered the Guardian virtually the sole public voice opposing the Korean War. A decade later the Guardian was among the first publications to go into active opposition to the war in Vietnam, and as American involvement grew, the on-the-scene dispatches of Wilfred Burchett, sometimes written behind communist lines, became must reading for anyone interested in the conflict. The Guardian supported national liberation movements whenever they appeared, focusing mostly on Africa in the 1950s, Southeast Asia in the 1960s to mid-1970s, and Latin America thereafter.

Civil rights was another area given considerable space. In the 1950s this involved aggressive reporting on the "Trenton Six," the murder of Emmett Till, and the execution of William Green. Combined with the paper's support of African liberation movements, this work forged a strong working relationship with individuals such as Paul Robeson and W. E. B. Du Bois. In the 1960s the paper supported the views of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the later positions of Malcolm X, and the Black Panther Party. It also fought against the frame-up of activists such as Angela Davis. During the 1980s the Guardian worked to build the multiracial Rainbow Coalition.

A third area of intense concern was defense of political prisoners. The Guardian actively defended the Communist Party leadership charged under the Smith Act, Alger Hiss, the "Hollywood Ten," Harry Bridges, Anne and Carl Braden, Corliss Lamont, and Willard Uphaus. In time it would also have to defend close supporters such as Robeson, Du Bois, Marcantonio, and the Reverend Claude Williams, a minister defrocked by the Presbyterian Church for his radical views. Each of the Guardian editors would also be called before a number of committees. One unhappy result was that rather than languish in prison awaiting a hearing before the Supreme Court, the British-born Belfrage accepted a deportation order in 1955. He was named editor-in-exile and filed stories with datelines from around the world, including nations forbidden to American citizens.

The most historic defense was of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg. At a time when the Communist Party and the Daily Worker would not cover the case, the Guardian published a William A. Reuben story that sparked what would become an international defense effort. Reuben, who continued to be an important writer on the Hiss case as well, first took the Rosenberg story to I. F. Stone, then an editor of the Compass, who turned it down. The Guardian role was so vital that after the Rosenbergs were executed, Aronson was named a trustee of the fund established for their children.

The Guardian maintained friendly but problematic relations with the Communist Party. A major area of difference was the Guardian's rejection of the Party's view that independent political parties were futile and that radicals should work within the Democratic Party. The Guardian held exactly the opposite view. In spite of the failures of third parties in the 1950s, the Guardian took part in a party-building movement in the 1970s and in the 1980s used its influence within the Rainbow Coalition to keep that movement as independent of the Democratic party as possible.

In the area of foreign affairs, the Guardian refused to be a clone of Soviet policies. It was supportive of Yugoslavia's break from the Soviet orbit and carried on principled coverage of the purges in Eastern Europe and the Hungarian Revolt of 1956. Most important, the editors allowed debate on such subjects to rage in the letters columns. In the winter of 1948–1949 when Anna Louise Strong was denounced by the Soviet Union as a spy, the Guardian defended her, continued to publish her, and helped initiate the six-year campaign that ultimately led to the accusation's being dropped.

Within a few years of its launching, the Guardian hit its peak circulation of seventy-five thousand. Support of the Rosenbergs, opposition to the Korean conflict, and the repressive atmosphere of the times caused a rapid falloff in readers. In the year the paper took up the Rosenberg defense, circulation fell from fifty-five thousand to just over twenty thousand. Nonetheless, the paper survived as radical movements began to stir in the late 1950s better times seemed in the offing.

Despite the death of McManus in 1961, the Guardian supported the emerging civil rights, anti-war, and the New Left movements with as much energy as ever. The paper also published Mark Lane's landmark ten thousand-word "A Brief for Lee Harvey Oswald," the first in-depth reporting to challenge the "lone gunman" theory of the assassination of John F. Kennedy. Such efforts, however did not catch the rising tide of radicalism, and circulation remained at just under thirty thousand. Many newcomers to the Guardian staff felt the paper was out of touch with the temper and needs of the new era. Individuals later grouped around Irwin Silber, the Guardian's cultural editor and a former editor of Sing Out!, proposed that the paper provide the New Left movement with direct ideological leadership. Aronson resisted, feeling a newspaper could not substitute for a political party. Internal tensions grew and in April 1967 Aronson and Belfrage decided to resign.

The ensuing reorganization gave the staff working control of the production process and ownership shares. The paper's name was shortened and Jack Smith was elected editor, a post he held until 1981. Under Smith's tenure the paper experienced many swings in format and orientation. As the New Left collapsed, one tendency on the staff wished to transform the paper into a Marxist-Leninist publication while other tendencies wanted to strengthen the reportage tradition or move to the more anarchistic and nonhierarchical forms of the underground press. A schism in 1970 led one group to create the Liberated Guardian, a newspaper whose life span was soon cut short by a subsequent schism-within-the-schism. The parent Guardian almost folded as well, its circulation dipping to fourteen thousand.

For a large part of the decade that followed, the Guardian was a core element in an effort to create a new left-wing party based on Marxist-Leninist principles and the experiences of the Chinese Revolution. The paper began to carry as much editorial and essay material as straight reporting. When the party-building effort failed, partly as a result of changes in China, the Guardian struggled to return to its traditional functions. In the 1980s it examined all existing socialist revolutions in a respectful but questioning manner, and it allowed significant editorial space for nonstaff movement activists to express their views, even when those views did not fit the Guardian editorial perspective. The Aronson-Belfrage-McManus tradition was underscored in a big thirty-fifth-anniversary supplement. Circulation fluctuated between twenty thousand and thirty thousand, waxing and waning with the mass movements the paper reported on and for. While still highly respected in radical circles, the Guardian did not regain the prestige of the National Guardian years, which had been greatly diminished in the 1970s.

On the fortieth anniversary of its founding, the Guardian could boast of a remarkable consistency. Unlike In These Times, the only other independent radical weekly with a national readership, the Guardian remained committed to radical alternatives to the two-party electoral system. Strong advocacy of the rights of women and sexual minorities had been melded with its traditional support of civil rights, working-class, anti-war, and national liberation movements. The joy of a fortieth-anniversary banquet planned to underscore the continuity of the paper's politics was sapped when a seventy-three-year-old James Aronson died from a long struggle with cancer just a few days before the celebration.

The memorial services for Aronson illuminated his continuing involvement with quality journalism. After leaving the Guardian he had been a teacher of journalism at universities in New York and Beijing, had taken part in symposiums on journalism, had written for professional journals, and had been a consultant for journalism departments in Chinese universities. He had also written three important books on American mass media: The Press and the Cold War, Deadline for the Media, and Something to Guard, a history of the Guardian coauthored with Belfrage. After his death, an Aronson award for investigative journalism was established by Hunter College of the City University of New York.

Despite a temporary lift from the fortieth anniversary events, the Guardian continued to face crucial circulation and financial problems. Many in its first generation of readers, the most reliable financial supporters of the newspaper, were literally dying off, and replacement generations had not stepped forth to take their place. The paper also continued to favor a rhetorical and editorial style that did not fit comfortably with what remained of the Left movement and its closest allies. In 1992, after a failed appeal for funds and falling circulation, the Guardian closed its doors without so much as a farewell issue.

[See also Chicago Star; Communist Party, USA; Maoism; Progressive Party, 1948; Regroupment.]

FURTHER READING

Aronson, James, The Press and the Cold War. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1970.

Aronson, James. Deadline for the Media: Today's Challenges to Press, TV, and Radio. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1972.

Belfrage, Cedric, and James Aronson. Something to Guard: The Stormy Life of the National Guardian, 1948-1967. New York: Columbia University Press, 1978.

Bennett, Jonathan A., "James Aronson, Guardian Founder, Is Dead at 73," and Cedric Belfrage, "A Personal Farewell to a Rare Friend and Journalist." Guardian, 2 November, 1988.

The Guardian. Thirty-fifth anniversary supplement. December 14, 1983.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

NATIONAL LAWYERS GUILD. In 1936 a New Deal Democrat and a Communist Party lawyer from an affluent family called together long-time trial and research lawyers in the International Labor Defense, International Juridical Association, and American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born; general counsels of the established American Federation of Labor and the unions affiliated with the new Congress of Industrial Organizations; law professors; members of the Lawyers Security League (who had gotten jobs with the Works Progress Administration until they could find paying work); government officials; and state court judges. In 1937 they founded the National Lawyers Guild, a progressive and racially integrated alternative to the anti-New Deal all-white American Bar Association.

The Guild's constitution enshrined the pledge to work so that "human rights would be regarded as more sacred than property rights." A handful of the most active and progressive lawyers for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and women lawyers joined traditional lawyers who supported Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal and his need to reform the Supreme Court. The new organization consisted of lawyers who worked effectively to draft labor and social security legislation and then helped draft and administer regulations to enforce the new laws. The Guild immediately addressed the bread-and-butter issues of how to make a living representing indigent criminal defendants and the difficulty black lawyers had in renting appropriate office space in major cities.

East Coast labor and Left attorneys led the Guild until Robert Kenny served as president before being elected attorney general of California. Guild leaders were active in the American Labor Party, the left wing of the Democratic Party, the Progressive Party of Henry Wallace, and the Communist Party. During World War II, many Guild lawyers served in the armed forces and government jobs. Others began to expand traditional law to represent working-class and indigent criminal defendants as public defenders and to seek money damages for personal injuries suffered by clients in accidents and from defective products. Guild work for formation of the United Nations led to Guild participation in the International Association of Democratic Lawyers and to some Guild lawyers moving into international law.

In 1939-1940 and again during the Cold War/McCarthy era, government and labor lawyers had to resign their membership to continue their employment, and students could not join for fear of being rejected for admission to practice law. Private practitioners had to decide whether to represent clients called before the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) and the McCarthy Senate Committee and similar state bodies and thus risk the loss of other paying clients, or to play it safe by leaving the Guild and concentrating on less controversial work. The membership of four thousand lawyers dwindled to five hundred, who used creative legal analysis to trounce the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and other agencies.

The Guild sued the attorney general when he threatened to place the organization on his list of "subversive organizations," and it vigorously defended members called before HUAC and state bar "character committees" or cited for contempt for inspired representation of left-wing clients. The attorney general dropped his threat in 1957, and the Guild began to regroup.

In 1963 a group of young white and black lawyers in Detroit who had not been hit by McCarthyism wanted to change the programmatic emphasis of the Guild. The new leadership formed the Guild Committee to Assist Southern Lawyers, which played a leading role in struggles in Mississippi and throughout the South, while older Guild members fought a brilliant strategic battle to win support for the then radical idea of Individual Retirement Accounts for self-employed lawyers and others.

In 1968 a sharp confrontation developed over the direction of the organization, one in which New Left and anti-Vietnam War activists from California and New York were ranged against members of the Old Left. The New Left victory marked a decline in passing resolutions on legislation and filing friend-of-the-court briefs and the beginning of participation in mass actions and direct Guild representation of clients and organizations. Old Left members remained, and some also founded the Center for Constitutional Rights, the Lawyers Committee on Nuclear Policy, and the Meiklejohn Civil Liberties Institute.

As the century came to a close, the Guild continued its commitment to putting human rights before property rights through the work of thirty national committees and projects in one hundred lawyer chapters in fifty states and the District of Columbia. The Economic Rights Task Force emphasized a Campaign for Economic Justice and worked on labor/welfare summits with union and welfare rights leaders. One hundred law student chapters provided interns for California Summer and work on Guild national committees and publications as well as with lawyer chapters. The National Immigration Project provided technical assistance to community groups and practitioners, sponsored substantive work groups, and published treatises. The Sugar Law Center for Economic Justice worked out of Detroit to ensure the enforcement of the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act and to fight against environmental racism and for corporate responsibility to live up to commitments made to cities to get tax relief.

[See also Communist Party, USA; International Labor Defense; King, Carol Weiss; McCarthyism.]

FURTHER READING

Emerson, Thomas I. Young Lawyers for the New Deal: An Insider's Memoir of the Roosevelt Years. Savage, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield, 1991.

Ginger, Ann Fagan. The Relevant Lawyers. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1972.

Ginger, Ann Fagan. Carol Weiss King: Human Rights Lawyer, 1895-1952. Niwot: University Press of Colorado, 1993.

Ginger, Ann Fagan, and Eugene M. Tobin, eds. The National Lawyers Guild: From Roosevelt through Reagan. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1987.

Katz, Richard N., comp. The National Lawyers Guild: An Inventory of Records, 1936-1976, an Index to Periodicals, 1937-1979. Berkeley, Calif.: Meiklejohn Civil Liberties Institute, 1980.

Kinoy, Arthur. Rights on Trial. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1983.

National Lawyers Guild Archives, 1936-present, at the Meiklejohn Civil Liberties Institute, Berkeley, Calif., and 1936-1986, at the Tamiment Institute, New York University.

National Lawyers Guild Quarterly (1937-1940), Lawyers Guild Review (1940-1960), Law in Transition (1961-1963), Lawyers Guild Practitioner (1965-present). Complete files available at the Meiklejohn Civil Liberties Institute, Berkeley, Calif.

National Lawyers Guild v. Brownell, Attorney General Archives, including files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation on Guild members and the Guild, Tamiment Institute Library, New York University.

Rabinowitz, Victor. Unrepentant Leftist: A Lawyer's Memoir. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1996.

—ANN FAGAN GINGER

NATIONAL MARITIME UNION. From the time of its founding in 1937 until it purged its left wing in the late 1940s the National Maritime Union (NMU) was one of the most radical labor unions in the United States. It was described in its prime (by one of the NMU's founders, Robert McElroy) as a "militant, class-conscious, racially integrated, rank-and-file controlled, revolutionary union of the seamen and waterfront workers."

The NMU demonstrably lived up to that combative reputation in its early years. Sit-down strikes were called at sailing time—occasionally involving every ship in port—in order to put pressure on individual shipping lines. A pioneer in integrating the East Coast shipping industry, the NMU fought and won the right of black seamen to work at every job on the ship—previously, blacks had been restricted to working in the stewards' department. These gains were contested not only by shipping companies, and individual officers aboard the ships, but by some of the union members themselves, as well as the local authorities in many of the southern ports where NMU ships docked.

Rank-and-file democracy was a fiercely cherished ideal of the NMU, which had come into existence in reaction to an undemocratic, racket-ridden predecessor, the International Seamen's Union. NMU members had the right to address union membership meetings, and access to the letters column of an unusually literate union newspaper, the NMU Pilot. Efforts were made to involve all members in union affairs. Union meetings were mandatory—one couldn't ship out without proof of attendance, and every ship's crew elected a representative to attend biannual conventions. Contract negotiations were watchdogged by rank-and-file oversight committees—and every union member had the right to demand an impromptu union meeting, right in the shipping hall, when and if violations of the union constitution occurred.

Internationalism was another NMU hallmark. The union was philosophically committed to lending assistance to working-class struggles all over the world, a rare quality among American trade unions. Honoring longshore picket lines in foreign ports was one example of this. A more spectacular example is the heroic role the NMU played during World War II, carrying supplies to Russia, Europe, and the Far East. (Merchant marine casualties were higher, proportionally, than casualties in the U.S. Army, Navy, and Air Force.)

An NMU "leadership school" was established to teach new members a theory of imperialism and colonialism to place in context the exploitation they were seeing in South American and foreign ports. NMU crews even conducted a sit-down strike in Saigon harbor, in 1945, to protest U.S. shipment of war supplies to the French during their phase of the Vietnam War.

The Communist Party was the moving force behind the union for most of its early history. A "concentration unit," to organize marine workers, was formed in 1928, evolving into the Marine Workers Industrial Union in 1930, which, in turn, was liquidated in 1935 in order to "bore from within" the American Federation of Labor's International Seamen's Union, the shell from which the NMU emerged. Depression-era shipping was so slow and East Coast seamen so atomized that many founding members say the NMU could not have been organized without Party discipline.

The Communist Party's strategy for the labor movement as a whole, however, may ultimately have been the union's undoing. The union's proud boast of rank-and-file democracy did not extend to Trotskyists and Wobblies. Excessive rigidity on the part of the overwhelmingly Communist leadership of the union (more than three-fourths of the top union officers by 1947, promoting such unpopular issues as noncooperation with the Marshall Plan) caused a backlash that resulted in a clean sweep out of office of all officials affiliated with the Communist Party.

In 1948–1949, NMU president Joseph Curran, having broken with the Left, and backed up by phalanxes of New York City policemen, volunteer muscle from Mike Quill's newly purged Transport Workers Union, and goons recruited from far-flung ports (Phil Murray, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, provided funding) proceeded to expel from the union virtually all the founding members who had been in any way radical. The purge was completed in 1950, at the time of the Korean War, when the U.S. Coast Guard declared hundreds of Communists, ex-Communists, and many who were simply principled trade unionists "national security risks" and took away their seamen's papers.

The union drifted in the 1950s into "pork-chop" unionism, and degenerated badly in the 1960s—with money scandals, inflated salaries for union officials, and every pretense of rank-and-file democracy stripped away. Down from a wartime peak of over 100,000 members, the NMU in the 1980s had less than fifteen thousand members and a fraction of that many jobs. The NMU merged with the Marine Engineers Benevolent Association in 1988.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Irish Americans.]

FURTHER READING

- Boyer, Richard. The Dark Ship. Boston: Little, Brown, 1947.
- Kempton, Murray. Part of Our Time: Some Monuments and Ruins of the Thirties. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1955.
- Nelson, Bruce. Workers on the Waterfront: Seamen, Longshoremen and Unionism in the 1930s. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.

—JOE DOYLE

NATIONAL MINERS UNION. Founded in Pittsburgh in September 1928, the National Miners Union, or NMU (1928–1933), was an outgrowth of a new direction in trade unionism charted by the Communist Party. In this so-called Third Period, the Party called for the establishment of revolutionary unions that would challenge existing unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The NMU's first president was John Watt of Illinois, but the real power was wielded by the union's secretary, a Party functionary, and by Party officials in New York. The NMU's program included the following: resistance to wage cuts; a six-hour day; unemployment relief and insurance; use of checkweighmen; rejection of the dues checkoff; abolition of company stores, company towns, and payment in scrip; organization of blacks; industrial unionism; formation of a labor party; and complete emancipation from capitalism.

In its brief existence the NMU waged several strikes, the most notable being in Illinois in 1929, in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio in 1931, and in eastern Kentucky in 1931–1932. None of these strikes succeeded. The failures owed in part to the sometimes violent opposition of mine owners and government officials, in part to the presence of rival unions such as the United Mine Workers, but also to the limitations of the NMU itself. Strikes were called without adequate preparation. Financial reserves were insufficient to sustain prolonged holdouts. There were too few organizers in the field, especially ones who had a solid base in the communities being organized. While enrolling several thousand miners during the height of strike waves, the NMU proved unable to retain their allegiance. Individual members demonstrated great courage in the face of constant repression, thereby calling attention to the brutality of coal operators and their allies. But such favorable publicity as they received could not offset the forces arrayed against them and their own inherent weaknesses. By 1933 Party leaders had decided to end the effort at dual unionism and return to the goal of unifying all miners in one large organization.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Trade Union Unity League; United Mine Workers.]

FURTHER READING

- Draper, Theodore. "The Communists and the Miners, 1928–33." Dissent 19 (spring 1972).
- Hevener, John W. Which Side Are You On? The Harlan County Coal Miners, 1931–1939. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1978.
- Wickersham, Edward D. "Opposition to the International Officers of the United Mine Workers of America, 1919–1933." Ph.D. diss., Cornell University, 1951.

—RALPH STONE

NATIONAL NEGRO CONGRESS. The key Popular front entity centered on black rights, and for a few years a powerful force in selected areas, the National Negro Congress (NNC) demonstrated both the strength and the weaknesses of the Communist approach to the "Negro question."

The League of Struggle for Negro Rights, succeeding in 1930 the earlier American Negro Labor Congress, sought with little success to infuse revolutionary and proto-nationalist themes into contemporary black discontent. With the Popular Front signal to work in broader organizations, the League dissolved in 1935. Communists took a positive but cautious public role in the NNC, which grew out of the 1935 Howard University Conference on the Status of the Negro in the New Deal, led by Ralph Bunche and John P. Davis. Independent of the Communist Party but not unfriendly to it, the NNC formation in 1936 of a broad reform movement brought together the entire spectrum of Afro-American life except separatist black nationalists and hard-bitten anticommunists. A. Philip Randolph, often hostile to the Communist Party in the past, served as titular leader, defending the right of individual blacks to become Communists if they chose to do so.

In tandem with the Scottsboro and Herndon defense movements, the NNC offered the Party a new, powerful constituency in selected areas. For the first time, the Party entered wide-scale formal or informal relations with black churches and fraternal and cultural organizations. The NNC also successfully lobbied black public opinion for support of the industrial union movement as different from its racist labor predecessors. In Harlem and on Chicago's South Side, Communists black and white shifted the character of their public status from that of virtual outsiders to one of neighborhood club-members throwing their energies into the NNC for such demands as an end to discrimination, more relief for the unemployed, and the abolition of lynching and police brutality. In this atmosphere, Party discipline eased, and Communist affiliation became more casual, for intellectuals and artists perhaps even more than for workers.

Harlemites certainly occupied the most visible section of the NNC. There, the organization embraced some of the most prominent cultural figures in the community, along with many other supporters. But in Chicago the Left depended on black support more than in any other center of mass activity. This strength dated to the early 1930s unemployed movements and rent-strike campaigns that had prompted severe police violence and high-lighted the public Communist role. The Midwest Daily Record, the least financially successful and most short-lived of the three Communist dailies, found its métier in support of the Chicago NNC's activities and, outside the ethnic pockets of strength, its most loyal readership in the South Side ghetto.

The Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939 exposed the weakness of Communist influence within the black community and all but destroyed the NNC. Party leaders' dramatically shifting positions and focus upon foreign policy at a time of extreme black hardship alienated many erstwhile followers and allies. Black conservatives and socialists seized the opportunity for an offensive against Communism. Prominent public non-Communist but friendly figures such as Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., denounced the Communists as supine followers of Moscow positions. The alienation of A. Philip Randolph from the NNC (by now under investigation by the Dies Committee), following a closer open identification of the NNC and Communist positions, spelled virtual doom to old levels of NNC prestige. After the 1940 convention, where his objections to NNC changes were rejected, Randolph denounced the Russian leadership and its American supporters. John P. Davis, succeeding Randolph as president, sought with only limited success to maintain NNC visibility in the black community at large.

Black Communist activity quickly shifted to other fronts. In New York, this shift had considerable success through a variety of cultural and political activities. The NNC remained, although less prominently so than hitherto, a locus of struggle against discrimination in the workplace and in public life. In Chicago and many other places, NNC and black public support of Communism did not substantially survive World War II. The Cold War left the NNC a remnant of earlier days, destined to be replaced by the National Negro Labor Council, itself victim not of Communist mishaps but of the climate of McCarthyism and the purge of the Left from the labor movement.

[See also American Negro Labor Congress; Haywood, Harry; National Negro Labor Council; Randolph, A. Philip.]

FURTHER READING

Klehr, Harvey. The Heyday of American Communism. New York: Basic Books, 1984.

Naison, Mark. Communists in Harlem during the Depression. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1983.

—PAUL BUHLE

NATIONAL NEGRO LABOR COUNCIL. On 27 October 1951, at a convention that took place in Cincinnati, Ohio, the National Negro Labor Council (NNLC) was established. The delegates, most of whom were black and one-third of whom were women, had gathered from across the country and included, among others, factory workers, teachers, and office workers. As one scholar of black labor put it: "They are continuing a tradition established more than a hundred years before in the National Negro Convention of pre-Civil War America, and especially in the Colored National Labor Union, founded four years after the war."

A year earlier, nine hundred delegates had met in Chicago at the National Labor Conference for Negro Rights to discuss a range of problems affecting black workers, such as racial discrimination in hiring and apprenticeship training programs and job upgrading. Most delegates felt that black workers could not depend on traditional black civil rights organizations or predominantly white labor unions, such as the United Auto Workers. Within a year after this conference, a special committee set up twenty-three Negro Labor Councils in major industrial cities and launched a campaign to include a model Fair Employment Practices (FEP) clause into union contracts.

Almost from the beginning traditional white labor leaders attacked these efforts of black workers as "communistically inspired" and "dual unionism." Walter Reuther was a major instigator in this campaign. In spite of these attacks, local Negro Labor Councils played leading roles in supporting the struggles of black workers. For example, the Negro Labor Council in Washington, D.C., contributed to the improved work conditions of black workers in the Bureau of Engraving; the Detroit council started a petition drive for a citywide referendum for a municipal FEP organization opposed by the Reuther leadership. The petition drive failed, but the impetus behind it contributed to the founding of the NNLC in Cincinnati.

Black delegates at the founding convention sent a clear message to white labor leaders: "We wish to say . . . that the day has ended when white trade union leaders or white leaders in any organizations may presume to tell Negroes on what basis they shall come together to fight for their rights."

The "Statement of Principles and Program of Action" adopted by the convention stated that economic and social equality for blacks was attainable only if black workers and their white allies united to protect black Americans from the forces that denied them "full citizenship."

The first elected officers of the NNLC were: William R. Hood, president; Coleman Young, executive secretary; Ernest Thompson, director of organizations; and Octavia Hawkins, treasurer.

The NNLC had two major goals: To "break the patterns of job discrimination against blacks in American industry and to use the trade union base to move the trade unions and our white allies within it into the liberation struggle for black people, with a primary concentration on economic issues as the key."

For the next five years the NNLC struggled against overwhelming odds—including red-baiting—in championing the cause of black workers. The NNLC helped black workers obtain clerical and administrative jobs in Sears, Roebuck stores, office jobs at the Ford Motor Company, executive positions in banks and hotels, and jobs as streetcar motormen and conductors in cities, baseball players in Detroit, dairy-truck drivers in New York, production-line workers in breweries in Brooklyn, and as airline pilots and stewaresses. The most impressive NNLC accomplishment in their campaign for black jobs occurred in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1954, when the local NNLC orchestrated a broad-based community movement to obtain training for local black workers in preparation for the opening of a new General Electric plant.

The NNLC received little support from established labor leaders. The NNLC's president, William R. Hood, had a long history of criticizing the leadership of the United Auto Workers for its failure to support the upgrading of black autoworkers and to appoint a black vice-president to the international executive board. Walter Reuther's election to the presidency of the Congress of Industrial Organizations in 1952 destroyed all possibility of cooperation between the two labor organizations.

By 1956, the NNLC's days were numbered. The organization was called before the Subversive Activities Control Board of the House Committee on Un-American Activities to defend itself against charges of being a "Communist-front organization." Burdened with defense costs, the NNLC leadership had no choice but to vote to dissolve the organization.

[See also Communist Party, USA.]

FURTHER READING

Thomas, Richard W. "Blacks and the CIO." In Working for Democracy: American Workers from the Revolution to the Present, edited by Paul Buhle and Alan Dawley. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1985.

—R. W. THOMAS

NATIONAL STUDENT LEAGUE. See Student Movements, 1930s.

NATIONAL TEXTILE WORKERS. See Textile Workers Unions.

NATIONAL UNION OF MARINE COOKS AND STEWARDS. Chartered by the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) in 1937, following the breakup of the American Federation of Labor's International Seamen's Union, the National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards (MCS) was one of the smallest CIO unions (claiming around eight thousand members). It was organized along trade rather than industrial lines and centered on the West Coast. It stood to the left within the CIO, usually following the lead of its larger West Coast ally, the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU).

Communist Party members and sympathizers took prominent roles in the MCS, and played leading roles in breaking down the racial barriers that had characterized West Coast affiliates of the International Seamen's Union. By 1950, nearly half of MCS members were black and another fifth or sixth were from other ethnic minority groups. MCS president Hugh Bryson campaigned actively for Henry Wallace in 1948 and helped organize the Independent Progressive Party in California.

The CIO expelled the MCS in 1950 as Communist-dominated. Bryson signed the Taft-Hartley non-Communist affidavit but was charged with perjury and imprisoned. The American Federation of Labor's Seafarers International Union began raids on the MCS membership; the ILWU tried to take the MCS under its wing and to challenge the Seafarers International Union but lost through a National Labor Relations Board ruling. Simultaneously, a federal screening program kept Party activists from working aboard ships. Some MCS members found a new home in the ILWU, including future ILWU president James Herman.

[See also Communist Party, USA; International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.]

FURTHER READING

Nelson, Bruce. Workers on the Waterfront: Seamen, Longshoremen, and Unionism in the 1930s. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.

National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards Records. Bancroft Library, University of California, Berkeley.

—ROBERT W. CHERNY

NATIONAL UNION OF TEXTILE WORKERS. See Textile Workers Unions.

NATIONAL WOMEN'S COMMISSION. Preceded in 1922 by a Women's Department, the National Women's Commission was formed by the Communist Party, USA, in the early 1930s to coordinate agitational and trade union work among women. In 1933 the U.S. Communist Party estimated that women constituted about sixteen percent of its membership of twenty thousand; by decade's end, when the Popular Front was in full swing, the Party claimed that women represented nearly forty percent of the total. To address and enlarge this constituency, the Women's Commission invited representatives from local Communist Party organizations throughout the country. Its policies and programs appeared in its official organ, Working Woman, and in its Popular Front magazine, Woman Today.

Directed in the 1930s first by Anna Damon and later by Margaret Cowl, the Women's Commission interpreted its Third Period role as counteracting the appeal of "bourgeois" feminism, especially the Equal Rights Amendment. Much of its work centered in support for working women and recruitment drives around International Women's Day. During the Popular Front, the Women's Commission played greater attention to housewives. By the late 1930s, the Daily Worker ran a "Household Corner" column that offered advice to housewives on family finances and health matters. Around the same time and in a few cities, the Communist Party introduced special local organizations to focus agitational work on these issues. These women's organizations involved mainly housewives in community affairs, and they campaigned for improvements in social services and especially for better schools. Antifacism also rallied women, who raised considerable funds to support the Spanish Loyalists.

During the Popular Front the concerns of mothers and children played an important role in the activities of the Women's Commission. Using the Soviet model of maternal protection, American Communists demanded a similar "Mother's Bill of Rights" that would establish in the United States free birth-control clinics, day-care centers, maternal insurance, and an extensive program of social services to assist working mothers.

In 1936 the Women's Commission joined several mainstream women's groups opposed to the Equal Rights Amendment to sponsor an alternative program known as the "Women's Charter." Drafted by Mary Anderson of the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor and social worker Mary Van Kleeck, the Women's Charter advocated equal opportunity for women in all areas of economic, political, and social life as well as protective legislation, including special wages-and-hours laws and maternal insurance.

The Women's Commission's participation in the short-lived Women's Charter movement reflected its relatively open Popular Front policy toward middle-class women and mainstream organizations. Director Cowl wrote that "while the Party places central importance on the role played by working-class women, it does not ignore the importance of other sectors of the women's movement. . . ." Such previously maligned groups as the Women's Trade Union League and the Young Women's Christian Association now gained a legitimacy in the Party press for their efforts in behalf of working women. The Hitler-Stalin Pact, however, closed this chapter in its history, and the Party leadership dismantled the Women's Commission in 1940.

The Communist Party reestablished its Women's Commission in 1945, and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn served as its chair until 1953. The role of women in civil rights and in peace movements became its central focus in the postwar period. During the early 1950s the Women's Commission sponsored a woman's page in the Sunday Worker, edited by Peggy Dennis and written on alternative weeks by Dennis and the Women's Commission's secretary, Claudia Jones.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley; Jones, Claudia; Working Woman/Woman Today.]

FURTHER READING

- Cowl, Margaret. "Women's Struggle for Equality." Political Affairs 53 (May 1974).
 Shaffer, Robert. "Women and the Communist Party, USA, 1930-1940." Socialist Review 9 (May-June 1979).
 Ware, Susan. Holding Their Own: American Women in the 1930s. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.

—MARI JO BUHLE

NATURE FRIENDS OF AMERICA. Founded at the turn of the century in Germany by socialists and trade unionists to preserve wildlife and to provide workers with an affordable outdoor recreational organization, Nature Friends spread to America by 1910, when a U.S. branch was formed by German and Austrian immigrants in the New York area. By 1930 a facility of nearly 150 acres, including a clubhouse and hiking trails, was established at Camp Midvale, which served as a hub for Nature Friends' activities on the East Coast. Nowhere did the Nature Friends receive more attention and support than in the New Yorker Volkszeitung and among its aging supporters. For many of these comrades and others—mostly skilled workers sympathetic to socialist ideas—hiking in nature offered an escape from the old industrial class conflict to a broader vision of socialist transformation. Nature-lore, rarely seen in Marxist analysis, provided an essentially ecological perspective.

By 1940, Nature Friends' camps sprang up in California, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Connecticut, with a wider variety of members. Most held progressive sympathies, and only those of "fascist convictions" were excluded by statute. Thus hikers raised funds for such causes as the "Scottsboro Boys," the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, the Committee to Release the Rosenbergs, and the civil rights movement. Placed on the attorney general's list of "subversive organizations" in 1947, Nature Friends saw its members severely harassed, and as a result individual camps disaffiliated. Camp Midvale itself was given to the Ethical Culture Society in 1968 in the hopes that it would be preserved as an ecological retreat. The California Nature Friends remain an outdoor organization with no overt political activities or associations.

[See also German Americans; New Yorker Volkszeitung; Radical Environmentalism.]

FURTHER READING

- Nature Friends Collection. Tamiment Library, New York University.

OTHER RESOURCE

- Lanset, Andy. "Camp Midvale: An Oral History." Created for radio broadcast, 1988. Archived, with interviews of Nature Friends veterans, at the Oral History of the American Left, Tamiment Library, New York University.

—ANDY LANSET

NATURISM. As elements of the radicalized 1970s youth culture set out to liberate their naturally sensuous bodies and adventurous minds from inappropriate but hegemonically imposed clothing, "free beach groups" emerged to defend enclaves of nudism on sea and lake shores from Austin, San Diego, Vancouver, and Minneapolis to Cape Cod and Miami. They coordinated only after 1975 by means of the annual Free Beaches Sun, a free national news tabloid, and a small annual summit meeting in California, both projects created by Lee Baxandall, who affiliated the groups in 1980 by starting the Naturist Society of Oshkosh, Wisconsin.

Baxandall, an Oshkosh native, was an editor of Studies on the Left in Madison and New York from 1959 to 1967; wrote for and about theater; and advocated, sometimes translating, the playwrights Bertolt Brecht and Peter Weiss and the authors Wilhelm Reich, Stefan Morawski, and Georg Lukács. Active from 1968 on the "free beach" of Cape Cod, in 1975–1976 he organized dramatic in-the-nude challenges of a National Seashore nudity ban, in this way forestalling an intended systemwide proscription.

The first national radically-oriented organization in the history of North American nudity, the Nativist Society delivers its magazine Nude and Natural (1989)—successor to Clothed with the Sun (1981–1989)—to some twenty thousand members and to bookstores. Between 1980 and 1995, 265,000 copies of the Nativist Society's World Guide were sold as well. Its Nativist Action Committee, created in 1990, educates growing cadres for lobbying and legal action as the religious Right spreads acute body shame in pursuit of its political agenda.

In an earlier America, Benjamin Franklin extolled what he called "air bathing," and President John Q. Adams swam nude daily from the banks of the Potomac River. Outdoor nakedness was exemplified by Henry Thoreau, Walt Whitman, and Thomas Eakins. Influential anarchists defended nude bathing in the Agitator, a magazine they published from the Home colony, founded in 1896 on Washington's Puget Sound. And, indeed, "skinny-dipping" was widely practiced in a frugal and individualistic rural America. Later, the radicals Floyd Dell, Max Eastman, John Reed, Louise Bryant, Eugene O'Neill, Dwight Macdonald, and Roger Baldwin (founder of the American Civil Liberties Union) all praised and enjoyed nude beaches as havens of joyous paganism.

The New Gymnosophy (1927), the earliest American book on a better-theorized and -organized European nudism, was written by Columbia University Ph.D. Maurice Parmelee, a leftist sociology professor and world federalist. In 1942, denounced by Chairman Martin Dies of the House Committee on Un-American Activities for allegedly undermining America through nudism, Parmelee was fired from his federal war board post. In 1952 Parmelee sought to launch an American Gymnosophical Society; when it failed, his far-reaching ideas regarding nudism had no more chance to take hold.

While domiciled in Germany during much of the 1920s, Parmelee was inspired by its Nacktkultur health movement, which had arisen in response to urban squalor bred of heartless industrial capitalism. This socialist and proletarian Verband Volksgesundheits, led in Berlin and other cities by Adolf Koch, offered to workers and unemployed families the salubrious, liberating experience of unclad mixed-gender gymnastics and outings to greenbelt beaches, communal bathing facilities, and family sex education in recuperation of dismal sunless lives in crowded slums. When the Nazis came to power, however, all nudism was banned in Germany. The following year, 1934, the middle-class Reichsband für Freikörperkultur was resurrected as a Nazi affiliate, its orientation Aryan, gymnastic, and anti-Koch.

In Soviet Russia a naked culture developed mostly within the Proletcult, taking guidance from Koch's example and writings, until all proletarian culture was ended by the Stalin regime. In France, England, and the United States, meanwhile, radical-Left social nudist values were diluted and usually ignored. The business development of nudist clubs after 1952 of what had earlier been mostly a cooperative movement served also to lower members' proactivity. Only an elite culture, presented in the name of nude antiquity (the French gymnosophie of Marcel Kiénné de Mongeot), or a sociable but politically devalorized nudism—tolerated only as a putative "safe outlet for social deviancy"—would have had standing in living memory to influence subsequent culture, were it not for Koch's many successes, culminated by a celebratory international gathering in November 1929 with a public performance of Nacktkultur in the huge Volksbühne theater.

The questioning of civilization's arbitrary social codes is inherent in perceiving natural nakedness—and nudists of all political stripes assert this populism while pointing to an absence of social distinctions while naked. College youth of the 1970s also reacted against clothing codes in the course of reinvigorating a radical culture that had been sapped by the mid-century's hot and cold wars. A ruling class, they agreed, dominates popular culture more by the manipulation of hegemonic symbols than by any power of ideas. They saw the disempowerment of populist instincts as in part due to mandated concealment of the egalitarian body: alienated from nature and costumed, individuals are divided and pitted one against another in defense of their incommensurate rags of self-esteem.

The radical content that abides in nudism—better, naturism—is perhaps conveyed by the International Naturist Federation in its 1974 definition: “Naturism is a way of life in harmony with nature characterized by the practice of communal nudity, with the intention of encouraging self-respect, respect for others and for the environment.”

If mostly ignored by populists, labor unions, and parties as well as by communist class-struggle theory, naturists believe they also provide a radical dimension of remedy to capitalist-consumerist authoritarian society. Moreover, they point out that Karl Marx's 1844 Manuscripts describe an alienation of man from nature as well as in society, while Frederick Engels's Condition of the Working Class in England portrays the very hell of urbanized family life from which the early nudist movement sprang.

FURTHER READING

Andritzky/Rautenberg. “Wir sind nackt und nennen uns du”: Eine Geschichte der Freikörperkultur. Giessen, Germany: Anabas Verlag, 1989.

Clapham/Constable. As Nature Intended. Los Angeles: Elysium Growth Press, 1986.

Naturist Society. Lee Baxandall's World Guide to Nude Beaches and Resorts. 4th rev. ed. Oshkosh, Wis.: Naturist Society, 1995.

—LEE BAXANDALL

NEARING, SCOTT (1883–1983). The only American radical to be a major figure in the anti-war socialist movement of the 1910s and the alternative-cultural movement of the 1970s and the 1980s, Scott Nearing was born into a privileged family in Morris Run, Pennsylvania, where he grew up in an environment of conspicuous class differences. For forty years his grandfather, Winfield Scott Nearing, ruled Morris Run as superintendent of the coal-mining company town. “Czar Nearing,” as he was called, broke strikes by evicting workers. Nearing's mother came from a well-to-do banker's family in New Jersey and his father, Louis, operated the Morris Run produce store.

Nearing responded enthusiastically to the social-consciousness doctrines of his mentor Simon Patten, a professor at the Wharton School of Business of the University of Pennsylvania. Patten's guiding principle was that teachers should be “on the firing line of progress.” Nearing earned a doctorate in 1909 and taught economics at the Wharton School for nine years. He was fired in 1915 by the university trustees for his outspoken views against child labor; many of the trustees owned manufacturing plants that hired children. His case became nationally celebrated as a major university assault on academic freedom.

In 1917 Nearing was again fired for his political views, this time by the University of Toledo for his outspoken opposition to U.S. preparedness for World War I. Nearing became a prominent figure in the anti-war movement. He characterized war as “organized destruction and mass murder.” In 1918, after the American Socialist Society published his forty-four-page pamphlet The Great Madness, the U.S. government indicted him for treason. Nearing delivered such an eloquent defense at his trial (6–19 February 1919) that he was acquitted, the only major pacifist to escape prison.

A member of the Socialist Party from 1917 to 1922, Nearing ran unsuccessfully on the Socialist ticket against Fiorello La Guardia for the Congressional seat in New York's Fourteenth District. In 1927 he joined the Communist Party but left it two years later when officials in Moscow refused approval of the publication of his book The Twilight of Empire. He was sufficiently important for the Party to publicly expel him on 8 January 1930 in an announcement published in the Daily Worker.

The previous year, Nearing had met Helen Knothe of Ridgewood, New Jersey. He had been separated for five years from his first wife, Nellie Seeds. Helen and Scott bought a farm in Jamaica, Vermont, in 1932 under the assumption that it was better to be poor in the country than in the city. They refurbished the farm and turned it into a showcase organic farmstead and maple sugar orchard. They also wrote exhaustively about their commitment to vegetarianism, organic farming, and a simple lifestyle. The Nearings moved to Harborside Maine, in 1951, partly to escape ski development in Vermont. Three years later they published their most widely read book, Living the Good Life. It was reprinted in 1970 and remains a guide for millions of people disenchanted with capitalistic materialism, modern urban life, degradation of natural resources, and the chemicalization of food.

By the 1970s, Scott Nearing had become a living legend among a new generation devoted to personal health and environmental issues, but he had also retained links with his earlier activism. He traveled, lectured, and wrote extensively. In addition to hundreds of newspaper and journal articles, including his "World Events" column in the Monthly Review (1953–1972), he authored more than fifty books and monographs.

Over the years his respect and hope for civilization dimmed, one reason that led him to a self-sufficient homesteading life in rural New England. Nonetheless, he continued to work as an independent radical for a united world based on a federation of nations. He also became an international spokesperson for the view that vegetarianism and organic farming were essential to solve global food, health, and environmental problems. Two years after he appeared as a "witness" in the film Reds about his friend and colleague John Reed, Scott Nearing died at home at the age of one hundred.

After Scott Nearing's death, Helen Nearing (1904–1995) continued to live in the Maine farmhouse they had built out of natural materials. She also continued to promote the back-to-the-land and vegetarian movements to which they had dedicated so much of their lives. Among her new books was Leaving and Living the Good Life, an account of their final years together with considerable biographical material on their entire lives. Upon her death the Nearing home became the Good Life Center, a non-profit institution for education and retreats.

[See also Radical Environmentalism.]

FURTHER READING

- Nearing, Scott. The Conscience of a Radical. Harborside, Maine: Social Science Institute, 1965.
 Nearing, Scott. The Making of a Radical: A Political Biography. New York: Harper and Row, 1972.
 Saltmarsh, John A. Scott Nearing: An Intellectual Biography. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1991.
 Sherman, Steve, ed. A Scott Nearing Reader: The Good Life in Bad Times. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1989.

—STEVE SHERMAN

NEF, WALTER T. (1882–c. 1960). Widely regarded by his fellow members of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) as one of the greatest of all Wobblly organizers, Walter Nef was the original guiding spirit of the IWW's large agricultural workers' union. Apart from the fact that he was of German-Swiss background, nothing seems to be known of his pre-IWW life. He took part in the union's Spokane free-speech fight in 1909–1910 and later organized for the IWW in the lumber industry as well as in construction, mining, and long-shore.

At the IWW Agricultural Workers Organization (AWO) founding convention in Kansas City, Missouri, in April 1915, Nef was elected general secretary-treasurer and immediately spearheaded an aggressive and innovative organizing campaign. Indeed, much of what became recognized as distinctively Wobblly organizing technique was Nef's creation. Mobile AWO "job delegates" followed the harvest, organizing migratory workers right on the job and taking advantage of the ripening crops to enforce union demands. Starting with nine members, the AWO had signed up some eighteen thousand by the end of 1916, making it the largest of the IWW's constituent industrial unions. So great was the IWW's power and prestige among the migratory "wage-slaves" that, according to the testimony of countless old-timers, it was virtually impossible to ride the freight-trains out West unless one had an IWW "red card."

The immense and sudden success of Nef's AWO was, in fact, a major reason for the U.S. government's relentless persecution of the IWW during and after the First World War. It is not surprising, therefore, that in 1918, when he was a leader of the large IWW local in Philadelphia, Nef was one of 101 Wobblies convicted and sentenced to Leavenworth Penitentiary for obstructing the war effort.

Released from prison by the end of 1923, Nef did not resume his activity in the IWW. Nothing is known of his life during the next couple of decades, though IWW historian Fred Thompson recalled that Nef, regarding the industrial union structure as inherently revolutionary, tried for a time to organize an industrial union movement without the IWW's revolutionary rhetoric. In the 1940s Nef discovered Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward and Equality and recognized in them the theoretical basis of the ideas that had animated his whole adult life. He at once commenced publication of his own Bellamyist Equalitarian Bulletin, which he continued to produce, at first in San Francisco and later in Los Angeles, until his death in the late 1950s or early 1960s. The exact date of his death has not been determined, but the reference books that state he died in the 1930s are in error.

FURTHER READING

- McGuckin, Henry E. Memoirs of a Wobbly. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1987.
 Nef, Walter T. "Job Control in the Harvest Fields." International Socialist Review 17 (September 1916).

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

Industrial Workers of the World pamphlet illustration by Ralph Chaplin ("Bingo"), c. 1915.

NEW ALLIANCE PARTY. See Psychology.

NEW AMERICAN MOVEMENT. Founded in 1971 to provide an alternative New Left organization in the wake of the collapse of Students for a Democratic Society in 1969, the New American Movement (NAM) was envisioned by its original organizers as a broad-based "mass organization" that would "overcome the errors of the New Left"—which they identified as including antileadership, glorification of the Third World, and inadequate sensitivity to the interests and needs of American workers. At the founding convention in Davenport, Iowa, in November 1971, many former New Leftists, upset at their perceived defeats in light of the dissolution of Students for a Democratic Society and mass defections toward the McGovern campaign for the Democratic nomination for the presidency, argued that NAM was in no position to reach out to American workers, and that it was more important to have an organization that looked inward, spent time defining its politics, and then later moved outward. This position prevailed, and NAM became an organization for former New Leftists, with a national office aimed primarily at serving self-defining local chapters. The local chapters were involved in a variety of locally oriented organizing projects—including building opposition to the continuation of the Vietnam War until 1975, opposing rate hikes for local utilities, opposing nuclear power plants, and opposing nuclear armaments.

NAM cadre were activists in many local struggles, and by the late 1970s NAM saw itself primarily as providing education and political sophistication to these other struggles, rather than as aiming to be the leadership organization itself. From the start, NAM emphasized two ideas that it said had not been adequately integrated into the thinking of the New Left: (1) the importance of socialism as the only possible basis for reconstructing American society, and (2) the centrality of feminism as a core approach that must be integrated into all political work.

NAM emerged in a period of general decline in the Left in the 1970s and did not see itself as capable of attempting to stem that decline. It had no organizational ambitions to become well known outside the Left, and its growth was largely confined to areas with high concentrations of former New Leftists. At its height, NAM did not exceed fifteen hundred members. Yet its spirited internal debates had some influence on the larger protest movements of the late seventies and early eighties.

Meanwhile, Michael Harrington's Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee (DSOC), occupying very similar ground on most theoretical questions, was gaining many more members—largely because of its strong national organizational focus, its commitment to national leadership, and its orientation toward using the media effectively. In 1982 NAM merged with DSOC to form one organization—the Democratic Socialists of America—though only after an intense internal debate within NAM in which some of the organization's activists quit on the grounds that they feared the new organization would be more "elitist" and less sensitive to feminist issues than NAM had been. Many who supported the merger argued that DSOC's commitment to national leadership and organization were precisely what NAM needed, that NAM had in many ways repeated the fierce antileadership tendencies of the New Left, that NAM had never reached out beyond the immediate constituency of former New Leftists, and that NAM had reacted to the collapse of Left consciousness in the seventies in a passive way rather than providing either strategic or organizational alternatives.

[See also New Left; Socialist Party.]

—MICHAEL LERNER

NEW INTERNATIONAL. Founded by an early incarnation of the Socialist Workers Party as an "organ of revolutionary Marxism," the New International

The New INTERNATIONAL

MAY • 1945

NOTES OF THE MONTH

END OF THE EUROPEAN WAR

THE LESSON OF GERMANY

By J. R. Johnson

World Trade Union Conference

By Albert Gettes

HISTORICAL IMAGE OF NAPOLEON

By James T. Farrell

BURNHAM'S HEIR TO LENIN

By Ernest Lund

SINGLE COPY 20c

ONE YEAR $1.50

Trotskyist theoretical publication of 1945.

(1934–1958) was throughout its existence an authoritative expression of U.S. Trotskyist opinion. Leon Trotsky, during his lifetime and after, figured prominently in its pages, as did a host of outstanding U.S. and European intellectuals including George Novack, James T. Farrell, Max Shachtman, Irving Howe, James Burnham, C. L. R. James, Dwight Macdonald, Hal Draper, and Ernest Mandel. Trotsky likened the New International to "the great masons of the future: Marx, Engels, Lenin." In Reflections of a Neoconservative, Irving Kristol recalls that the New International taught him critical analytic thought.

The New International became the house journal of the Workers Party in April 1940, with its editors Shachtman and Burnham in the forefront of the new Trotskyist organization. (Leaders of the orthodox Socialist Workers Party alleged that the Workers Party had misappropriated the publication.) After 1940, the New International advanced the slogan, "For the Third Camp!" (i.e., the "submerged, smoldering, working masses of the world," as against the first camp, Western capitalism, and against the second, Soviet "bureaucratic collectivism"). As compared with the Socialist Workers Party's new Fourth International (1940–1956), the New International was bolder, brasher, and in later years less certain of itself and of Trotskyism. The New International ceased publication when Shachtman's group abandoned vanguard party-building by entering the Socialist Party.

[See also Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

Howe, Irving. A Margin of Hope: An Intellectual Autobiography. New York: Harcourt, Brace Jovanovich, 1982.

Wald, Alan. The New York Intellectuals: The Rise and Decline of the Anti-Stalinist Left from the 1930s to the 1980s. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

—KENT WORCESTER

NEW LEFT. Based initially on the experience of the civil rights movement, the polyglot radicalism known as the "New Left" centered its influence on the major private and state campuses and in communities heavily influenced by campus radicalism and/or youth culture. Its politics, definitely outside the norms of communist, socialist, or other past "Left" movements, stressed human rights and visions of cultural change over the familiar Left struggles of labor and the promise of egalitarian industrial progress. At high tide, in 1969–1970, the New Left numbered 150,000 or more steady participants, and a supportive milieu of millions. Unable to expand its popular support beyond young people, it could not, however, attain its goal of revolutionizing campus life by effecting the disengagement of colleges and universities from the military-industrial complex and the commitment of campus resources to social transformation; nor could it reverse a decades-old process of bipartisan coalition around the commitments of the military-industrial complex. Severely pressed by government infiltration and a massive propaganda campaign, the New Left collapsed into fragments of competing sects and a disillusioned, inactive former following.

The final significance of these developments in the history of the Left has yet to be understood. Clearly, however, the New Left managed to dramatize a wide spectrum of issues, from counterinsurgency wars to environmental damage, which have grown from flagrant cases of oppression into evident threats to the survival of the planet. No other constituency of similar size and importance has arisen to replace the New Left, either in the name of resurrected Old Left organizations and ideas or of another, newer Left.

Important surviving Old Left individuals and institutions played an avuncular role in the beginnings of the New Left. McCarthyism's net, refined by Cold War-oriented college administrators and senior professors, missed relatively little in its search for victims. Not only were jobs lost, but intellectual careers were destroyed and warnings provided against dissent that defied the Cold War consensus. But schools such as the University of Wisconsin, which refused to install loyalty oaths, became meccas for dissenters of all kinds. More important, as McCarthyism eased in the later 1950s, a small-scale renewal of campus activism quickly reappeared, promising greater things. In larger cities or community-campus centers of various Old Lefts, such as Berkeley, California, certain bookstores or cafes provided hangouts where political conversations had never ceased and where bohemian tastes could be indulged. Eating cooperatives and other such institutions carried over from previous generations likewise offered practical networks for political integration.

The "New Left" sobriquet itself came directly out of contemporary British experience, where the emergence of the "Ban the Bomb" Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, and the breakaway of distinguished Marxist intellectuals from the British Communist Party, marked activist and intellectual components. "New Left Clubs" sprang up on British campuses, and two journals, the New Reasoner and Universities and Left Review merged in 1960 into the New Left Review, intended to be the intellectual expression of the New Left Clubs. In the United States, the magazine American Socialist, formed by a group of activists who had broken from the Socialist Workers Party, took up the cause for an American counterpart.

At this early date, little could be accomplished nationally of an openly New Left character. However, at the local level, sympathy for southern civil rights efforts merged with the political-intellectual evolution of former Labor Youth League members, such as Richard Flacks, who went independent after the Russian invasion of Hungary. These Labor Youth League "graduates" had a sophistication in Marxist ideas far beyond those of other radicalized intellectuals, and they had a burning desire to reestablish a radical critique independent of the old Stalin–Trotsky–Social Democracy debates. They also had a strong interest in cultural matters. They played an especially important role in the formation of local "folk music" groups on the campuses in the later 1950s, in the earliest antimilitarist campus manifestations ("antimilitary balls," posed against the "military balls" of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps that were then in vogue), and in the avant-garde cultural/theatrical movements of the time. From their presence can be traced the audacious Fair Play for Cuba Committees and the formation of Studies on the Left (1959–1967) at the University of Wisconsin, the first sustained intellectual journal calling for a new movement.

If these tendencies touched only a handful of campuses, and a brief Ban the Bomb movement of 1960–1961 affected only a few more, they still helped to shape the early 1960s liberal-radical drift. The new Students for a Democratic Society's (SDS) Port Huron Statement (1962), reflecting experience in the civil rights movement and the tones of English New Left manifestoes, was drafted by Catholic moralist Tom Hayden, but bore the stamp of some Marxist sophistication. It appealed for student awareness and for political activity against the dominant ideologies of the Cold War age.

This fresh perspective had a solid basis in the facts of changing campus life. The omnipresent college and university expansion suddenly made the "student," by the early 1960s, a significant demographic segment of the population. The pervasive alienation from bureaucratized U.S. society, well documented in the 1950s, had found its first critics in the faculties, and soon would find its militant opponents among the students. But SDS—lineal successor to the Intercollegiate Socialist Society of the 1910s and the subsequent Student League for Industrial Democracy—lacked the opportunity and perhaps also the inclination to turn the key. For a few years more, campus restiveness remained locked into local, often symbolic issues from dormitory food to censorship.

In a negative sense, the failure of any national Left organization to establish during these years the kind of campus bases suited to seize the Left political hegemony, also proved decisive. The Young Socialist Alliance, which narrowed from an early attempt at coalition to a strict youth component of the Socialist Workers Party, had only very scattered support. The Communist-led W. E. B. Du Bois Clubs, only founded in 1965 and even less influential outside the West Coast, reflected in their late appearance and their party-line character the slow and troubled reemergence of the Communist Party from the 1950s repression and internal divisions. The Young People's Socialist League, drifting and faction-ridden, had neither the capacity nor motive for organizing students against Cold War policies. The localism and anti-institutionalism of the nascent New Left reflected an instinctive rejection of these alternatives, a rejection of all the efforts of political authorities committed to one kind of bureaucracy or another.

Meanwhile, as SDS turned to community projects in lieu of campus organizing, it sought to carry out a distinctly New Left program. Like other activists operating independently, SDSers aimed at the very poor rather than at the fabled proletariat. Its Education and Research Action Program and especially the Newark Community Union Project and Chicago Jobs or Income Now of 1963–1965 highlighted the effort to alert the poor to their own potential power as the southern civil rights movement had done with considerable success. Here, the phrase "participatory democracy," meaning an advance beyond the parliamentary democracy of electing representatives to office, was coined at the University of Michigan. Of major localistic mobilizations, however, perhaps only the welfare rights movement, with its discrete constituency and demands, succeeded in terms of community coalition-building among the poor. The Northern Student Movement, essentially a campus support group for southern struggles, had more success with enrolling dedicated reformers to help the less fortunate elsewhere to free themselves.

A small but sometime influential kernel of self-avowed revolutionaries had meanwhile emerged in Third World-oriented causes of the early 1960s, principally in support of Cuba against the United States and of China against the Soviet Union. In a few years, veterans of these causes, and younger devotees, would enter New Left movements with great impact, positive and negative. The heroic struggles of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) gave radical anti-racism a rallying center, while the self-distancing of liberals from SNCC demonstrated for many of the untrustworthiness of Democratic Party politicians. Here and there, a precocious student radicalism emerged. The Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, march in Detroit attracted more than 100,000 and set off high school strikes and political currents within the city in which white youth joined blacks urging drastic changes in society. Another early indication of national campus interest in more radical views was the rousing campus reception given black nationalist Malcolm X just prior to his 1965 assassination. Yet only rarely could students see social change as coming through their own actions. But they responded with notable warmth to the promise (or threat) of African American challenges to the American status quo. In this respect, they further distanced themselves from virtually the entire Old Left spectrum, whose leaders had articulated for decades the promise of racial integration and peaceful change through coalitions with liberal and centrist Democrats.

The Berkeley, California, free speech movement of 1964, ostensibly nonpolitical, was the first major campus movement to actually succeed in shutting down a prestigious institution. By pitting students of all kinds against the bureaucratic institution of the university, the free speech movement drew the most radical lessons of the civil rights movement and applied them to campus life at large. Shocking many liberal academics with the directness of their demands, which is to say their insistence upon making their own decisions rather than deferring to authority, Berkeley students raised the level of New Left dialogue to a national plane. Hereafter, campus politics took a new direction and a new importance.

The escalating U.S. invasion of Vietnam, from 1965 onward, placed students in direct conflict with the civilian authorities who implemented the guiding military-industrial demands made upon the universities. Confronted with selective service and its implications, many young people on campus and off came to see the contemporary uprisings of blacks in Harlem, Watts, and Detroit as movements aimed at the same opponent.

The selective service system also played a large role in this alienation. Its class and race bias notoriously favored college students in general. But many who graduated, and more who dropped out, found themselves in uniforms, if rarely on the front lines of jungle warfare. Fear stirred specific resentments, moreover, in a generational sense. Old men (political and military leaders) sent young men to die and condemned young women as well as their mothers to suffer the fears and threats of loss. The older generations, seemingly loyal to the imperatives of imperial war as the price of consumer society, appeared in the eyes of the young as corrupted by age and by power. The forces of age and death seemed, then, counterposed to the forces of life, epitomized in the young. In supporting Lyndon Johnson against Barry Goldwater for the 1964 presidential election, New Leftists (notably, SDS) for the last time assumed a stance on the respectable left edge of liberalism. From 1965 to 1967, with the spreading protest against the Vietnam War, ever larger demonstrations confronted civil authorities and offered right-wing (but also liberal, Cold War) demagoguery a convenient target.

The 1965 Bay Area Vietnam Day Committee arranged one of the largest of the early protests aimed at halting the war process or at least constraining active conscription. It was characteristically free of any particular organizational domination, although local SDS, the Young Socialist Alliance, and others participated. That same year, a national demonstration in Washington, D.C., saw radical civil rights, students, and veteran Left leaders denounce the war and trace its origins to the social system. Once again, this demonstration notably lacked any overarching organizational affiliation or ideological inclination.

As SDS began to attract more campus anti-war activists, a national "teach-in" movement on many campuses lifted faculty members to the apex of their influence on the burgeoning protest. By making protest respectable, the teach-ins gave anti-war students and their supporters new national visibility. A handful of varied intellectuals, including Noam Chomsky, Herbert Marcuse, and Staughton Lynd, acquired a national constituency for their speeches, their social theories, and their personalities as campus firebrands. The teaching of Frantz Fanon's Wretched of the Earth, Paul Goodman's Growing Up Absurd, and Marcuse's One-Dimensional Man added intellectual ballast to New Left activism.

In another sense, however, the teach-ins were the last episode in which dialogue served as the major component of New Left activity. Soon, words by themselves would be considered insufficient. SDS, joined by many local groups, coalitions, and spontaneous formations, would become the chief political beneficiary of the new radical enthusiasm.

Unlike the free speech movement, whose tenets became embedded in student movements but whose goals became lost amid other protests, the Vietnam protest spread to most liberal schools and major universities. The media remained, for the most part, locked into the prestige schools such as Columbia. Often scarcely noticed beyond the local scene, the more traditionally conservative campuses such as the average southern black campus (which had hitherto relied on upper-class white tolerance to restrain local whites' violence against black students) and state schools of the South and Southwest, began to take up the issues. By 1969–1970, some of the most violent and sustained campus confrontations were taking place in exactly these locations, where authorities responded bluntly with force and students understandably lacked confidence in supposed administrative reforms.

At some point between 1966 and 1969, the popular sentiment on many and perhaps most major campuses turned decisively against the war and against the government determined to prosecute it. Dozens and then hundreds of “underground newspapers”—local tabloids made possible by a technological revolution in the use of newsprint—effectively dramatized the issues and put rebellious intellectual concepts into cultural form. Their combined readership certainly reached the millions. In effect, these sheets (and toned down in rhetoric, often the campus daily, too) created an alternative information system to the hostile reports of the commercial dailies and news-weeklies. They were, like the campus Committees to End the War in Vietnam (frequently a jousting arena for local Trotskyists and Communists) at least as important as SDS chapters in mobilizing discontent.

Material optimism, the sexualization of leisure, and the introduction of “recreational” drugs each also had an important role. The youth of the 1960s had not known economic depression, and the vast majority had not experienced anything resembling a hard personal upward climb to the middle classes. In their society of peers, leisure had largely taken the place of an earlier generation’s long hours of work, and since the early 1960s, had been flooded with the programmed sexualization (at steadily younger ages) of advertising aimed at the “youth market” for consumer goods. Moreover, birth control technologies had drastically improved: if the 1950s coed already wore blue jeans and discreetly engaged in sexual relations prior to marriage, her 1960s equivalent could talk openly about orgasms. The popularization of marijuana and LSD produced less emotional addiction than a loosening of the grip that advanced industrial society, with its project of material “progress,” had upon the visions and dreams of the young. Seen through the lenses of LSD experience, the prospect of an executive career appeared less alluring than it had at any time in modern U.S. society. Drug guru Timothy Leary, Yippie Abbie Hoffman, and even the legacy of the Beat generation writers (continually publicized by traveling poet Allen Ginsberg) found new audiences. Asked in a poll what they most sought in life, a majority of students answered “self-fulfillment,” and put material success well down the list. Only a minority believed money meant happiness, and fewer still that opting out meant dire poverty.

Not surprisingly, then, the militant Stop the Draft Week of October 1967 coincided with a year of “be-ins” and a generalized spread of “Youth Culture” from San Francisco’s Haight-Ashbury section to little Haight-Ashburys adjoining many campus towns. The two constituencies did not necessarily coincide. Yet politicians in large numbers also smoked marijuana, and “hippies” notoriously appeared in large numbers at political demonstrations. The two types joined in rejecting the view of “democracy” as being limited to the two-party system and of wage or salaried labor as being a worthy personal goal. On the local level, massive political meetings seemed more freewheeling, more leaderless, more spontaneous in generating networks of practical activity, than at any time afterward.

Students who participated in these activities often found themselves simultaneously engaged in militant protests against university functions, and in hard study (and/or classroom participation) that professors would later recall as the most intense in their lengthy careers. Paradoxically, during those semesters frequently interrupted by protest and strike, an eagerness for real learning was widely observed. Classes or professors deemed especially “relevant” (and these might range from U.S. history to black or women’s studies to “California culture”) drew droves of devoted listeners beyond official enrollment and intense classroom discussions in which students themselves prompted Socratic methods. “Free Universities” with extra classes off campus, in a wide range of subjects, took in the same and other students outside normal class hours. In this sense, the New Left proved, if not as book-oriented as its predecessors on the Left, far more intellectually motivated than generally considered at the time.

Perhaps for that very reason, the tensions within the campus community now flared as never previously. Those professors openly hostile to student movements—complaining bitterly at what Edward Shils called “temporizing, halfhearted authority” (i.e., an unwillingness to use more severe repressive measures against protesters earlier and more systematically), themselves often taking the disciplinary action of flunking anti-war students—suffered the most from the obloquy. Even more than conservative regulars, self-pronounced liberals who had become attached to the dream of U.S. military victory in Southeast Asia, or who craved revenge against students who now ridiculed their pompousness, seemed most indignant about student uprisings and most public with appeals for repression. Many more faculty members found themselves immensely stimulated if also troubled. Those junior faculty most sympathetic to intellectual integrity and political aims of the students suffered real, if inconsistent, firings, political discrimination, and other penalties over the next few years. Several outstanding careers—such as that of black-history scholar Robert Starobin, a 1971 suicide—ended tragically.

The New Left suffered its own deep internal difficulties at the moment of its triumphs. Students, on strike against some particular outrage (such as police beatings of students who sat-in against recruiters for Dow Chemical, maker of napalm used in Vietnam), found administrators obdurate on matters of university policy and most professors unchanged if not unshaken by events. Structural reforms envisioned to encompass students in a democratized university could not be implemented. Strikes, even supported by teaching assistants, tended to peter out after a few days or a week. Unlike a labor strike that withholds necessary muscle-power and reduces profits, a student strike depends upon publicity, that is, embarrassment of the administration. Students returned to classes feeling some sense of triumph (often, amnesty was granted to those committing any but violent acts) but also a continuing frustration. That frustration, especially keen in the minds of political groups on campus, brought ever more frantic visions of America's approaching social transformation.

Years of "hot summers" in the streets of major cities, the 1968 assassination of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., and the hostile response of lawful authorities to even peaceful protest heightened the frustration. Clearly, the empowered section of American society desired no major changes, and was perfectly willing to endorse the use of military fire-power, public deceit, conspiracy, invasion of privacy, and even plans for mass detention (drawn up by William Rehnquist, later chief justice of the Supreme Court) in order to restore order.

In this circumstance, the practical absence of blacks in large numbers from most campuses mattered less than the symbolic and historical role blacks occupied in U.S. society at large. Black students recruited to campuses in unprecedented numbers as a result of student and urban protests felt deeply ambivalent at their heritage of discrimination and their present opportunity for personal advancement. Many black students tended to resolve this ambivalence with extreme appeals to black nationalism and demands on administrations, occasionally backed up with threats of force. White students felt somewhat in awe of a people seemingly involved in an insurrection, but to a greater degree they felt guilty toward blacks regarding America's past sins and a present reality that included poverty and vast overconcentration on Vietnam's front lines. SDS ideology swerved from Left-liberal to Leninist in order to express opposition to American capitalism and solidarity with the Third World and with black revolutionary movements in the United States.

At times, these feelings inspired race-related student strikes whose main issues and leadership involved internal campus conflicts and personalities only secondarily. In perhaps the outstanding case, the San Francisco State strike of 1968–1969, activists' demands also reflected the views of the most militant minority students and faculty. The ferocity of response to such demands (the obdurate president of the college, linguist Sessue Hayakawa, gained fame and senatorial election as the Ronald Reagan of administrators) induced protracted conflict.

Student feelings of rage and helplessness were redoubled by the continuing escalation of the Vietnam War, and by the frustration at the political resilience of the two-party system. President Lyndon Johnson, repeatedly increasing troop strength and promising the "light at the end of the tunnel," dramatically raised the nightly "body count" of killed, as reported on network news. The Vietnamese Tet Offensive, which further bruised the U.S. military's reputation, made continuation of the bloodbath appear hopeless and slightly mad. The unsuccessful peace-candidacy of Senator Eugene McCarthy followed by the assassination of Robert Kennedy ensured the Democratic Party nomination for Senator Hubert Humphrey, a noted liberal Cold Warrior. The "Battle of Chicago," in which Mayor Richard Daley's police violently defended a locked Democratic Party convention from hordes of anti-war demonstrators, worked to the advantage of Richard Nixon and his student-baiting future vice president, Spiro T. Agnew. Against these later-indicted figures, students felt rage and revulsion, but also powerlessness and futility. Indeed, the election of Hubert Humphrey might well have brought a further escalation of the war out of an ideological unwillingness to accept U.S. defeat as Nixon finally did.

The Cambodia bombing of 1970 stirred the last and biggest student uprising of all, highlighted by the authorities' killing of students at Jackson State College and Kent State University. Strikes spread almost universally on campuses. At the same time, student anger seemed impotent and often turned toward "trashing" (throwing rocks at) nearby windows, toward heavier or more continual use of drugs, and toward sexual promiscuity in the place of sexual emancipation. SDS, almost fanatically nonideological and decentralist in 1967, had by 1969 divided between opposing Maoist factions by this time claiming rather than representing most campus activists. Stirred by rage, a minority of erstwhile student activists turned to attempted acts of sabotage, almost uniformly unsuccessful and trivial in effect compared with the U.S. brutality dramatized in the My Lai massacre. These efforts by some student radicals, however, permitted variegated opponents of the New Left, liberal and conservative, to lock arms in denouncing the movement at large and (where acts had been committed) to unleash and legitimize a pattern of police provocations, disruptions, grand jury intimidations, and related actions. As later demonstrated in Freedom of Information Act inquiries, only at the height of the Cold War, or in the 1919–1921 wake of the Russian Revolution, had government harassment been so widespread or so flagrantly in violation of constitutional rights.

The collapse of other contemporary movements framed the eclipse of the New Left. SNCC, for example, merged in 1970 with the Black Panther Party, and both disappeared in defeat, disillusionment, and political confusion. The League of Revolutionary Black Workers, which had for a moment offered a serious threat to United Auto Workers leadership, likewise dissipated. Other, more hopeful outcomes of the New Left could still be glimpsed. In Mexican American and Asian American communities, young radicals served as community spokespeople. On campuses where activity had begun late, fresh signs of rebellion could be found. In general, however, the "burnout" had become evident and, for a generation of student activists, final.

Only the appearance of the women's liberation movement (and to a lesser extent, the gay movement) brightened a dark picture of campus activism. As a political tendency, this movement was primarily cultural—more concerned with the "sexual politics" of process and everyday life than with presidential elections—but as a cultural movement deeply "political" through its demands upon society. As banners of the women's and gay liberation movements appeared at the last major demonstrations, and as consciousness-raising groups, in a sense taking the place of political meetings, now confronted male Left leaders, already fumbling, over their handling of the "woman question," an inner purpose of the 1960s student movement had been nearly realized. But this development had been, tragically, too late to count for much in the great upheavals.

The legacy of the New Left was certainly the most curious of any social movement in the twentieth century. It was regarded neither as hopelessly old-fashioned and insufficiently revolutionary (as most Communists regarded the old Socialist Party) nor as terribly compromised by support of a foreign tyranny (as the New Left often regarded the 1920s–1940s Communist Party). Instead, the New Left became a part of American folklore. The evident disappearance of a revolutionary option in the United States, Europe, and the developing world gave the New Left years, even for former participants, an almost dream-like quality.

Liberals had much to do with this near-instant suppression of memory. The Democratic Party, in its brief leftward turn under George McGovern, distanced itself as much as possible from campus protests and ghetto uprisings. The search for a moderate coalition in the Carter years and beyond redoubled the need for such distance, so that future president Clinton was presented as an opponent of the war who could never have been a wild-eyed New Leftist.

[See also Armed Struggle, 1960s–1970s; Beats and the New Left; Black Panther Party; Chomsky, Noam; Civil Rights Movement; Gay/Lesbian Liberation Movement; GI Coffee House Movement; Hoffman, Abbie; Liberation News Service; New Left Literature; Newsreel and Post-New Left Radical Filmmaking; Pacifism; Peace Movements; Political Theater, 1960s–1980s; Popular Culture; Students for a Democratic Society; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Underground Press; Women's Liberation; Yippies.]

FURTHER READING

- Fraser, Ronald, et al., eds. 1968: A Student Generation in Revolt. New York: Pantheon, 1988.
- Gitlin, Todd. The Sixties: Years of Hope, Days of Rage. New York: Bantam Books, 1987.
- Peck, Abe. Uncovering the Sixties: The Life and Times of the Underground Press. New York: Pantheon, 1985.
- Sale, Kirkpatrick. SDS. New York: Random House, 1973.

—PAUL BUHLE

NEW LEFT LITERATURE. The New Left culture of the 1960s did not generate a distinctive literary movement of the kind associated with previous radical movements in the United States. No one work, political organization, geographic location, aesthetic style, or political theme provided a common reference point. Literary people associated with the New Left generally followed individual goals and were more likely to be involved with other writers in feminist, racial, language, or sexual movements than with writers who shared their specific political ideology. In contrast to a parallel phenomenon among radical filmmakers, the diffusion of radical writers tended to subordinate the Left message as such into broader perspectives demanding cultural egalitarianism and equal access of specific constituencies to political and economic power.

While lacking a coherent literary component, the New Left did not lack for creative energy. A common circumstance, in fact, was that many activists wrote poetry or short fiction in addition to doing political and academic work. During the time of the struggle against the war in Vietnam, thousands of poems using radical rhetoric were directed against U.S. policies. This work appeared in the underground press, was read at rallies, and inched its way into literary journals. During Angry Arts Week of 1967 and for some time thereafter, scores of poets in New York City used flatbed trucks to publicly read from at busy intersections throughout the five boroughs. No single voice captured the radical movement as Bob Dylan's songs had at one time, but the totality of the poems had considerable impact. Outstanding anti-war poems from all sectors of the literary world were collected by Walter Lowenfels in Where Is Vietnam? (1967). Radical contributors included Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Will Inman, Jack Lindeman, Clarence Major, Tom McGrath, Al Katzman, Dan Georgakas, Denis Knight, Sidney Bernard, Walter Lowenfels, and Leslie Woolf Hedley.

New Left writers were acutely aware of the need for a journal on the model of the Masses, but their various attempts to create such an organ usually lasted only a few issues and barely got beyond immediate affinity groups. Some of these undertakings were Crawdaddy, TRA (Toward Revolutionary Art), 100 Flowers, Insurgent, Treason, Weapon, Chalk Circle, Black Mask, the Unrealist, Sez, and Left Curve. Few political journals had literary sections although poems occasionally appeared in the Minority of One and Radical America. The Guardian, however, ceased publishing poetry in the 1960s and fiction had to find a place in the few literary journals, like Minnesota Review, that were open to radical work. More common than creative work in Left cultural publications were critiques of dominant culture, particularly mass media, a tendency that also dominated the journals of the 1970s and 1980s such as Cultural Correspondence and Zeta. Despite the difficulties of publication, radicals continued to produce an amazing amount of poetry. Todd Gitlin edited an impressive collection in The Campfires of the Resistance (1971). Radicals were also included in such textbooks as The Now Voices (1971), edited by Angelo Carli and Theodore Kilman, and The City Today (1978), edited by George L. Groman.

The single most influential Left literary enterprise was El Corno Emplumado, edited by Margaret Randall in Mexico City. Randall had been involved with the abstract expressionists of the 1950s and had close contacts with exiled Spanish loyalists. She began her bilingual journal after moving to Mexico in the 1960s. What distinguished El Corno was that it mingled the best of the new Latin American authors, many of whom were active revolutionaries, with American writers of various dissident movements. Randall's criteria were literary but her journal provided a rare cross-cultural writer-to-writer link. The magazine suspended publication in 1969 when Randall received governmental death threats for supporting the rebellion of Mexican students.

Randall tried to return to her native United States but was denied entry because she had given up her citizenship to marry a Mexican writer. Randall was forced to seek asylum in Cuba and in the years that followed she became a New Left Anna Louise Strong, writing of the revolutionary process in Cuba, Vietnam, and Nicaragua with an emphasis on the role of women. She continued to write her own poetry and was a major translator of Spanish-language writers. She was able to return to the United States in the early 1980s but soon became embroiled with the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which wanted to expel her under the provisions of the McCarran-Walter Act. Randall became a major cause célèbre for the radical and feminist movements, and finally had her citizenship reaffirmed in 1989. Her poetry, her nonfiction, and the contents of El Corno were cited by the government as proofs of her subversive intentions. Randall, in fact, had become increasingly involved with the women's movement and her poetry was more personal than political. Her most political writing is found in the collection Part of the Solution (1973).

Randall's interfacing with other movements was quite typical of the times and could be applied to radicals as diverse as Susan Sherman, Diane Di Prima, Pedro Pietri, Vincent Ferrini, Etheridge Knight, and Amiri Baraka. Susan Sherman was identified with the women's movement and gay rights, but her Ikon magazine took on hard-core political issues such as apartheid in South Africa and she was an editor of the radical poetry anthology Only Humans with Songs to Sing (1969). Di Prima had roots in the Beat movement but was best known for her "Revolutionary Poems" cycle, which were a fixture in the 1960s underground press. Pietri was associated with the Puerto Rican movement but wrote in English with such a strong class perspective that Monthly Review Press published his Puerto Rican Obituary (1973). Vincent Ferrini pursued ethnic and regional themes related to his home base of Gloucester, Massachusetts, in poetry that he consciously set up as a Left alternative to Gloucester's avant-garde poet laureate, Charles Olson.

Etheridge Knight began publishing poetry while in prison and radicals helped secure his release. Like many prison writers, he linked black crime with capitalism and was representative of the prison writers' movement, which enjoyed Left support. Amiri Baraka had originally won literary fame with plays published under his given name of LeRoi Jones and was loosely associated with the Beats. He later moved into a black nationalist period and was associated with cultural radicals such as Larry Neal. Still later he declared himself a Marxist. Other black writers moved in and around the Left in similar fashion. Among the best known were Sonia Sanchez, Don Lee, Julius Lester, Ishmael Reed, and Clarence Major.

Novels directly about the radical movement were abundant in the 1960s-1970s, but they only occasionally addressed the New Left. A major exception was Max Crawford's The Bad Communist (1979), which looked at the cult of "direct action" and at Maoism in a California group focused on black prisoners. Marge Piercy contributed several works related to political movements. Going Down Fast (1969), a story of urban renewal reflecting participatory-democracy ideas of Students for a Democratic Society, was followed with Dance the Eagle to Sleep (1970), a novel set in the near future in which an unsuccessful armed rebellion by New Left types is underway, and the science-fiction Woman on the Edge of Time (1976). Vida (1979) treated the direct action, Weatherman-like minimovement emerging from the disappointments of the New Left. Several other Piercy novels, such as Small Changes (1973), Braided Lives (1982), and Gone to Soldier (1987) touched upon radical movements in passing.

A different body of literature sought to recapture the traditions of the Old Left and relate them in some manner to the New Left. Helen Yglesias's How She Died (1972) treated the devastating effect of the Cold War on the cancer-stricken daughter of a famous jailed Communist, her New Left-age housekeeper nurse, and her Old Left mentor. K. B. Gilden's Between the Hills and the Sea (1971) analyzed the Cold War in a blue-collar Connecticut town, where the approaching victory of the anticommunist factions of the Congress of Industrial Organizations leaves little surviving but personal determination. Harvey Swados's Standing Fast (1970) focused mainly on a fictionalized version of the Workers Party and the later fate of its activists and sympathizers, down to the tragic murder in Harlem of the most idealistic of their children. Swados's Celebrations (1980) showed a New Left-style militant stripping away the accumulated respectability of an aging former radical and bringing the old man (actually his biological father) back toward the fray. Clancy Sigal's Going Away (1962), the earliest and perhaps best of the genre, is an on-the-road novel in which the writer crisscrosses America visiting comrades with various reactions to the Khrushchev revelations and the invasion of Hungary. The novel ends with the writer expatriating to England, the path of the author in real life.

A literary device in many radical novels was to have a character who belonged to the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) symbolize unblemished American dissent. More rare were accounts of IWW struggles such as Robert Houston's Bisbee '17 (1979) and Thomas Churchill's Centralia Death March (1980). The misfortunes of a Communist-oriented trade union were the subject of Leonard Kriegel's Quitting Time (1982). The interaction between immigrant and working-class oppression was a more popular theme. Illegal Mexican immigrants are dealt with in Eugene Nelson's Bracero (1973), Chinese railroad workers in Moonfoong Leong's Number One Son (1975), and Hispanic migrant workers in Raymond Barrio's The Plum Plum Pickers (1972). This was a continuation of a tradition found in earlier works such as Toshio Mori's Yokohama, California (1949), a novel about working-class Japanese Americans. Alienation rather than revolution was the theme of most books about the working class. Truman Nelson's The Torture of Mothers (1975) dealt with racism in Harlem, Chuck Wachtel's Joe the Engineer (1983) with blue-collar workers, John O. Killens's 'Sippi (1967) with civil rights activists, Toni Cade Bambara's The Salt Eaters (1981) with health workers, Denise Giardina's Storming Heaven (1987) with coal miners, and Henry Noyes's Hand over Fist (1980) with Sicilians and blacks in Chicago's forty-second Ward.

Socialists often wrote books in which the Left view was part of the fiction's structure and assumptions rather than a focus of direct discourse. Sol Yurick's The Bag (1968) and The Warriors (1965) dealt with lumpen street gangs in such a fashion. A film version of The Warriors got a controversial homage from the influential film critic Pauline Kael and the publicity led to most of Yurick's fiction being released in paperback for a mass audience. Ernie Brill's I Looked over Jordan and Other Stories (1980) dealt with health-care problems with a similar strategy and one story was excerpted for a television play by Ossie Davis and Ruby Dee. John A. Williams included a devastating critique of the Central Intelligence Agency in his The Man Who Cried I Am (1967) and celebrated blacks who had fought in the Abraham Lincoln Brigade in his Captain Blackman (1972). Meredith Tax favorably featured radical Jews in her immigrant epics Rivington Street (1982) and Union Square (1988). Tax wrote a nonfiction account of women garment workers in The Rising of the Women: Feminist Solidarity and Class Conflict, 1880-1917 (1980). Brill had been on the staff of TRA and worked in the Congress of Racial Equality and the Progressive Labor Party. Williams served as a fiction adviser for Monthly Review Press and Yurick spoke often at Marxist forums in New York City.

Science fiction, or what might be called historical fantasy, became, for the first time since the 1910s, a major mode of Left and protest expression in the 1960s-1970s. Along with Marge Piercy's Woman on the Edge of Time, this genre saw Ursula K. Le Guin, daughter of noted anthropologist Alfred Kroeber, write several novels analyzing the destructiveness of militarized Western (especially American) culture and seeking out alternatives. The Word for World Is Forest (1969) was a thinly disguised allegorical comment on the war in Vietnam, with dreamy creatures brutalized and turned into revolutionary warriors by a galactic invasion from the Earth. The Dispossessed (1971) posed the collective effort of planetary anarchism in conditions of scarcity against the rich but corrupt American-like planetary authoritarianism. Philip K. Dick wrote a series of novels about spreading authoritarianism, declining ecological conditions, and the manipulation of the drug culture to make protest and revolt increasingly difficult. The Three Stigmata of Palmer Eldritch (1965) and A Scanner Darkly (1977) were his most convincing efforts. Ishmael Reed, before abandoning Left ideas entirely for black nationalism, penned the remarkable Free-Lance Pallbearers (1967), a savage satire of Lyndon Johnson's anti-poverty program; Yellow Back Radio Broke Down (1969), a caricature of the western novel, with anti-realist black and lesbian heroes; and Mumbo Jumbo (1972), an imaginative novel about the making of Western civilization and the subversion of it in the 1920s by black culture in the United States. By the later 1970s, this entire phase of Leftish literature had passed.

Another populist blending of art and politics is found in the work of Edward Abbey, a philosophical anarchist and radical environmentalist. His Monkey Wrench Gang (1976) combined his major passions by having environmentalists use violent direct action in an all-out effort against developers and other "defilers" of the West. The novel sold half a million copies and made him a cult hero. His Brave Cowboy became a 1962 Kirk Douglas western, Lonely Are the Brave, and a 1981 TV movie, Fire on the Mountain. Abbey's essays were unrelenting in their condemnation of capitalist ethics and economics. Shortly before his death in 1989, Abbey became strongly identified with the Earth First! movement.

Ultimately the energies that had been generated by the New Left were absorbed by dominant culture and other movements. Specific writers gained a measure of influence and even best-seller status but were usually not politically identified as radicals by the general public. The radical movement itself, highly focused on critical analysis of mass media and capitalist cultural hegemony, devoted few of its limited resources to literary endeavors or promotion of radical authors.

[See also Beats and the New Left; Political Theater, 1960s–1980s; Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s; Science Fiction and Fantasy; Swados, Harvey; Underground Press.]

FURTHER READING

Baxandall, Lee, ed. Radical Perspectives in the Arts. Baltimore: Pelican Books Original, 1972.

Buhle, Paul, ed. Popular Culture in America. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1987.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

NEW LEFT NOTES. See Students for a Democratic Society.

NEWMAN, PAULINE M. (1888?–1986). The first salaried organizer for the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU), Pauline M. Newman campaigned actively for woman suffrage under the auspices of the Socialist Party. She emigrated from Lithuania and within months of her arrival in New York City in 1901 began to work in the garment industry. During the 1909 shirtwaist makers' strike, Newman emerged as a talented speaker and organizer. Although she joined the Women's Trade Union League and remained a member until its demise in 1955, Newman identified foremost with the Jewish labor movement. After the shirtwaist makers' strike of 1909, she left the factory to organize women workers into the ILGWU in New England and the Midwest and played leading roles in strikes in Cleveland, Philadelphia, and Kalamazoo.

In 1908 Newman joined the whistle-stop presidential campaign of Eugene Debs, and later ran for Congress on the New York Socialist Party ticket. During the 1915 New York "Votes for Women" campaign, Newman served as a full-time organizer for the Party and toured the state by automobile.

Newman took an active role in the workers' education movement. As early as 1915 she worked with ILGWU Local 25 in establishing a broad educational network of Unity Centers. During the 1920s Newman joined the board of directors of the Bryn Mawr Summer School for Women Workers. She served as an adviser to the U.S. Department of Labor during the 1930s and 1940s. Newman directed the educational programs of the ILGWU's health center—of which she was a founder—from 1924 until shortly before her death.

[See also International Ladies Garment Workers Union; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Dye, Nancy Schrom. As Equals and as Sisters: Feminism, Unionism, and the Women's Trade Union League of New York. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1980.

Wertheimer, Barbara Meyer. We Were There: The Story of Working Women in America. New York: Pantheon, 1977.

—MARI JO BUHLE

NEW MASSES. Following in the direct line of the Masses (1911–1917) and the Liberator (1918–1924), the New Masses began in May 1926 and ran as a monthly through September 1933, when it was revamped to reappear, on 2 January 1934, as a weekly. While the early editors of this "revolutionary magazine of art and literature" were holdovers from the period of "lyrical radicalism" of the 1910s and early 1920s, increasingly in the late 1920s, as contributing editors like Max Eastman and Floyd Dell drifted away, the New Masses was being run by writers like Mike Gold and Joseph Freeman, who argued for stronger revolutionary positions and closer ties to the Soviet Union. In 1930 the International Union of Revolutionary Writers, meeting in Kharkov, urged the magazine to become "in every respect the cultural organ of the class-conscious workers and revolutionary intellectuals of this country," and the editors eagerly accepted this challenge. Gold's campaign for proletarian literature in the late 1920s and early 1930s helped bridge the gap between art and politics that had existed in the earlier Masses-Liberator tradition, and when, after 1930, increasing numbers of bourgeois artists and writers moved left under the multiple pressures of the Depression, they discovered a loud and colorful journal with fairly advanced Marxist ideas about both literature and politics.

From 1934 through the end of the decade, during the period of the Popular Front, the weekly New Masses enjoyed its peak popularity. (Circulation for the last issue of the monthly in September 1933 was six thousand; the "4th Quarterly Issue" of 1 January 1935, one of a series of literary supplements that appeared after Granville Hicks was named literary editor of the weekly, had a printing of twenty-five thousand.) In this period, the New Masses was a visually exciting journal (drawing on the graphic skills of William Gropper, Reginald Marsh, and Hugo Gellert, among others) that was at the dynamic center of the literary-political Left in the 1930s. The magazine published many talented writers in this period—not only established authors like Ernest Hemingway ("Who Murdered the Vets?" 1935), Erskine Caldwell, Theodore Dreiser, and Langston Hughes, but newer writers such as Richard Wright, James Agee, Albert Maltz, and Jack Conroy. The New Masses sponsored some of the decade's most important literary organizations (the John Reed Clubs in the early thirties, the first American Writers and Artists Congresses in 1935), provoked some of its most controversial literary discussions (on proletarian literature and Marxist literary criticism), and published some of the best radical literature to come out of the thirties (the reportage of Meridel Le Sueur, John L. Spivak, Josephine Herbst, and Agnes Smedley). Stressing sectarian and domestic issues in the first half of the decade, after the opening of the Popular Front the magazine tended to focus more and more on the Spanish Civil War and the growing international fascist threat and became much more conciliatory toward liberals and other journals.

While it continued after the Nazi-Soviet Pact, from 1941 through 1947, as a weekly, the journal's political and literary positions were much narrower and its influence greatly diminished. In March 1948, the magazine reappeared as the merged Masses and Mainstream to run until 1956, under the editorship of Samuel Sillen and Milton Howard. While its influence clearly waned after 1941, in its overall twenty-two-year history, from 1926 to 1948, the New Masses must still be considered the dominant radical literary journal in the second quarter of the twentieth century.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Conroy, Jack; Gellert, Hugo; Gold, Michael; Mainstream; McKenney, Ruth; Moscow Trials; Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s; Smedley, Agnes; Wright, Richard.]

FURTHER READING

- Fitzgerald, Richard. "New Masses: New York, 1926–1948." In The American Radical Press, 1880–1960, edited by Joseph R. Conlin, vol. 2. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1974.
- Klein, Marcus. Foreigners: The Making of American Literature, 1900–1940. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.
- North, Joseph, ed. New Masses: An Anthology of the Rebel Thirties. New York: International Publishers, 1969.
- Peck, David. "'The Tradition of American Revolutionary Literature': The Monthly New Masses, 1926–1933." Science and Society 42 (winter 1978–1979).

—DAVID PECK

NEW POLITICS provides in-depth coverage of international and domestic issues from a radical, democratic viewpoint. While the range of topics discussed in any given issue varies widely, the journal has a number of characteristic preoccupations, such as the politics of race and class, the legacy of Stalinism, the role of intellectuals, and the prospects for political change at home and abroad.

The origins of New Politics can be traced back to New York intellectual life in the 1930s and 1940s. The journal's coeditors, Julius and Phyllis Jacobson, became active in socialist politics in the 1930s and helped launch New Politics as a broad forum for discussion and debate in the early 1960s. From the outset the journal has been marked by its support for democratic movements and its critical stance toward the Communist bloc. At the same time, the journal has provided an outlet for a diverse range of leftist and radical perspectives. In recent years a number of feminist and environmental voices have been added to the mix.

The first issue of New Politics appeared in the fall of 1961. In an opening statement, the editors set forth their reasons for starting the magazine: "Our journal is sponsored by socialists and radicals of widely differing opinions. Thus, heterogeneity of opinion in its pages will be sought after. However, the sole criterion of editorial selection will be neither conformity nor heterogeneity, but rather the ability of articles to stimulate thought and debate, or to contribute in some way to thinking out acute questions of politics and theory."

The contents of the first issue reflected these general editorial principles. The issue included articles on American labor, the early Marx, Hannah Arendt, and the civil rights movement by Sidney Lens, Michael Harrington, Lionel Abel, and Tom Kahn respectively. A highlight was a four-way exchange over the nature of Castroism. The first issue also featured a debate between Julius Jacobson and Joseph Clark on the prospects for change in the Soviet Union. Some readers may have been surprised to come across a serious investigation into "the politics of zen," written by Henry Braun, a veteran of the Korean War. But the article fit nicely into the overall package, not only because it condemned pseudo-mystical conformism but because it was written with an eye to what was happening in the world at large.

In the early years the journal was produced by an editorial board whose members included Phyllis and Julius Jacobson, George Rawick, Robert Alexander, and Hal Draper. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s New Politics offered insightful commentary on major topical issues—from race relations and Vietnam to labor politics and the New Left—as well as essays on intellectuals, books, cinema, and social theory. Contributors to the journal in this period of heightened social unrest included Burton Hall, Herbert Hill, Julius Jacobson, Phyllis Jacobson, Paul Mattick, Norman Thomas, Harvey Swados, and William Appleman Williams. Hal Draper's "In Defense of the 'New Radicals'" (1965) and the "Open Letter to the Party" (1966), written by the dissident Polish leftists Jacek Kuron and Karol Modzelewski, were especially noteworthy. Over the years the journal published a number of articles by Soviet-bloc critics of "actually existing socialism," as well as contributions from Western Europe and Latin America.

A total of forty-five issues of New Politics were published from 1961 to 1978. In 1973, Transaction Books published two New Politics readers: Autocracy and Insurgency in Organized Labor (edited by Burton H. Hall) and Communist Myth and Soviet Reality (edited by Julius Jacobson). In addition, Julius Jacobson edited The Negro and the American Labor Movement for Anchor Books in 1968.

Despite these achievements, it became increasingly difficult to keep the magazine going during the late 1970s, in large measure due to the demoralization that developed in the wake of the collapse of the anti-war movement. As Phyllis Jacobson later explained, "We were affected by the fact that the anti-war movement fell apart. We realized our time was up in the late 1970s when we couldn't get people to write. It was not a question of being hostile to the journal, but rather a lack of interest, reflecting the increasing apathy and demoralization afflicting the political left."

Detecting a modest revival in interest in left-wing themes, the Jacobsons relaunched the journal in 1986 as a biannual publication averaging two hundred pages per issue. During the hiatus the Jacobsons coedited a book, Socialist Perspectives (1983), which served as a kind of trial run for the new series.

The new series has returned to many of the themes that engaged the old series, such as labor politics, democratic movements, and the failings of Communism. At the same time, the journal has moved in new directions, with a greater emphasis on new forms of political involvement and expression. Regular contributors now include Hanna Behrend, Elaine Bernard, Paul Buhle, Barry Finger, S. A. Longstaff, Michael Löwy, David Roediger, Jennifer Scarlott, Stephen Steinberg, and Reginald Wilson. Recent issues have explored such issues as the war in Bosnia, gender politics, the politics of nationalism, turmoil in the Middle East, the prospects for post-Communist societies, the state of the labor movement, black intellectuals in conflict, and the shift to the right in the United States. The journal continues to feature debates on significant political topics as well as essays and reviews.

FURTHER READING

"The Legacy of the Workers Party, 1940-1949." Published transcript of a conference sponsored by the Oral History of the American Left project of New York University's Tamiment Library, held 6-7 May 1983.

—KENT WORCESTER

NEWSREEL AND POST-NEW LEFT RADICAL FILMMAKING. The first indication that a radical film revival might be imminent in the United States was Emile De Antonio's Point of Order (1964), a documentary using collage techniques to depict the McCarthy-Army hearings. The film not only challenged the Right politically but did so in an innovative film style. Point of Order had no spoken narrative, forcing viewers to arrive at their judgments without any directorial coaching on how to interpret the images presented. Variations on this style, particularly the often awkward avoidance of an unseen narrator, would be characteristic of the radical cinema of the 1970s and 1980s. De Antonio, who was personally close to the abstract expressionist painters of the 1950s, would continue to put his political perspectives into controversial forms. His work includes Year of the Pig (1968), a minihistory of post-World War II revolution in Vietnam; Millhouse: A White Comedy (1971), a critique of Richard Nixon; Underground (1976), a clandestine interview with the Weatherpeople; and In the King of Prussia (1982), a narrative concerning the Catholic anti-war movement associated with the Berrigan brothers.

Film poster, 1979.

The new movement got off to an official start in December 1967 when a group of filmmakers met in New York to launch Newsreel. The new organization sought to record the major events of the time from the point of view of radical dissenters. Films were to be made quickly and put to immediate use by the movement the films also sought to document. Within a year or so of its inception Newsreel had made nearly twenty films of varying lengths and had arranged for films made in Cuba and Vietnam to be distributed under its own auspices or that of allied groups. A dozen Newsreel groups were set up outside of New York, the most important being located in San Francisco, Washington, D.C., Boston, Los Angeles, and Ann Arbor. While aware of their precursors, the Newsreel founders were inclined to anarchistic forms of organization and were generally unsympathetic to the Communist Party, which they judged to be too timid. Black Panther (1968) and Columbia Revolt (1968) were early Newsreel successes and provided something of a financial base for new projects.

A flickering Newsreel logo whose movements were synchronized to the sound of machine-gun fire began each film. Hand-held cameras, grainy film stock, and bold editing gave the films a battlefield urgency. Indicative of Newsreel's total rejection of dominant culture was its ten-minute Garbage (1968). Made during a New York City garbage strike, the film shows radicals dumping their refuse in Lincoln Center, the cultural showcase of the "empire city." Other films addressed every issue of the New Left in the same disrespectful but often jovial manner. The blend of aesthetic and political innovation embodied the defiant and experimental nature of the New Left. Newsreel also attempted fiction films but most were received unenthusiastically by activists and critics.

By the early 1970s Newsreel began to be caught up in the general crisis of the movement. An all-male and all-white leadership that had indulged in marathon decision-making sessions was now challenged by women and nonwhites. These forces demanded a greater voice in Newsreel councils and greater access to equipment. Concurrent with this dissatisfaction was the phenomenon of many Newsreel members drifting away to pursue independent career objectives. The formal Newsreel membership of some threescore evaporated so swiftly that a reorganization conference was held in 1973. The continuing membership was almost entirely of Latin, Asian, or African ancestry. Most were women and none had been Newsreel founders. The new direction being undertaken was codified by a name change to Third World Newsreel.

In addition to making its own films, Third World Newsreel distributed films made by other radicals, kept the Newsreel library in circulation, and imported foreign films. Titles such as The Steelmakers (1968) from North Korea and The Red Detachment of Women (1968) from Mao's China as well as most of the original Newsreel films have been kept in constant distribution for more than fifteen years. Training sessions aimed at women, the disabled, the aged, and nonwhites were among many efforts to cinematically empower groups usually not associated with filmmaking. Closely allied with this effort were campaigns to create film audiences in nonwhite communities. This often led to the making of films in blunt and confrontational styles that did not always appeal to critics. The skills of the Third World Newsreel, however, were being constantly honed and were most obvious in Chris Choy and Renee Tajima's Who Killed Vincent Chin? (1988). The film, which deals with race and class violence in Detroit, Michigan, got highly favorable commentary from the entire film community and was nominated for the 1988 Academy Award for best picture in the documentary category.

San Francisco Newsreel proved to be another survivor. Its first film, Black Panther, was Newsreel's most widely screened film, but the collective soon moved to taking on economic and sexual issues as its major concern. Eventually the group changed its name to California Newsreel and under that name its best-known work is Controlling Interest: The World of Multinationals (1976). Like Third World Newsreel, it continued to distribute radical films made by others and after more than two decades of existence ended the 1980s as an extremely viable and well-respected production company.

The durability of California Newsreel and Third World Newsreel was typical of other filmmaking collectives, many with Newsreel veterans among their members, that sprang up after the demise of the original Newsreel. Concentrated in urban centers throughout the United States, the radical filmmakers took on gender, ethnic, radical, cultural, foreign policy, and sexual topics in what became a multiplicity of submovements, each of which was as prolific as the original Newsreel. The first post-Newsreel phase was marked by the emergence of a feminist film movement. This in turn was followed by movements that focused on Asian Americans, gay liberation, the environment, and Latin America. Characteristic of all the movements was the prominent role played by women. Whatever the specific topic at hand, women as producers, directors, exhibitors, and distributors took on the full range of creative responsibilities that had once been informally restricted to males. In many submovements such as films dealing with the role of the United States in Latin America, radical women dominated the field.

Among the various subgenres developed, one was of particular significance to the Left. This was the attempt to "recover" the history of American radicalism from mass-media distortions or silence. Such films include Union Maids (1976), With Babies and Banners (1978), The Wobblies (1979), Free Voice of Labor: The Jewish Anarchists (1980), Seeing Red (1986), The Good Fight (1984), and A Crime to Fit the Punishment (1984). These feature-length documentaries were augmented by scores of shorter films about individual radicals, specific strikes, or regional organizations. The films tended to be generous in their assessment of the roles radicals had played in past struggles. Their purpose, which was largely realized, was to reestablish radical dissent as an honorable and worthwhile American tradition.

Closely related to the recovery films were films about organized labor and films about foreign affairs. The radicalism in the labor films tended to be implied rather than overt but was unmistakable. Harlan County, U.S.A. (1976) focused on Appalachian coal miners, The Life and Times of Rosie the Riveter (1980) on black and white women in the defense industries of World War II, Miles of Smiles (1982) on black Pullman car porters, and Northern Lights (1979) on the Non-Partisan League of North Dakota. The foreign-affairs films were unrelenting in their criticism of U.S. motives and allies but less specific in their evaluation of various reformist and revolutionary movements. The topic of Latin America was of such interest that entire film libraries came into existence around specific nations such as Cuba, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and El Salvador. Deborah Shaffer's Witness to War: An American Doctor in El Salvador (1985) won an Academy Award in the documentary category, and films such as El Norte (1985) and When the Mountains Tremble (1986) were able to gain significant public visibility.

Radicals remained dissatisfied that their films did not get the same distribution as Hollywood-made films but in comparison to the 1930s, they were far more successful in reaching a general audience and in having an impact on the wider film community. In spite of the fact that most radical films were documentaries and that documentaries traditionally do not do well in theatrical distribution, some radical documentaries got theatrical releases and a few, like Atomic Cafe (1982), did quite well. More common were screenings on public television, during conferences, in classrooms, and at festivals. Radical films received more than their share of prizes at various competitions at home and abroad, and they were increasingly among the Academy Award nominees and winners. At least one radical film came to be a given at the prestigious New York Film Festival and got national exposure through reviews in mainstream media, including the New York Times, Variety, and the Village Voice.

Concerns about form and other esthetic problems were as intense as political convictions. American filmmakers did not write extensively about their craft but they made frequent appearances at seminars and gave substantive interviews. Radicals were also extremely active in self-distribution, exhibition, and networking. As a result a liberal/radical sensibility became the norm throughout the independent film community and even extended to some degree into the avant-garde. A new tendency that began to emerge in the 1980s was the mixing of fiction and nonfiction in the same film, a format boldly probed in Far from Poland (1984), a film assessing the Solidarity movement in Poland.

Radical filmmakers were buttressed by a vigorous critical community. The two most important periodicals were Cineaste (founded 1967) and Jump Cut (founded 1973). Cineaste was the self-declared champion of the new movement and by the end of the 1980s enjoyed a worldwide reputation for excellence and was among the highest-circulation film journals in the United States. The more theoretically inclined Jump Cut was more directed to filmmakers than film viewers and had a strong commitment to gay films and radical video. Both magazines provided extensive coverage of Third World cinema with an emphasis on Latin America.

Cineaste and Jump Cut did not stand alone, and their contributors were not isolated from the larger critical community. An associate editor of Cineaste became the editor of American Film, the organ of the American Film Institute, and later was an editor of Premiere, a major commercial publication. Writers who published with Cineaste, Jump Cut, and a half-dozen smaller journals also published in Variety, Film Comment, and the New York Times. Film critics for the Guardian and In These Times had similar access. Film associations and film departments were frequently headed by radicals, and commercial and university presses regularly issued books by radical critics who were often on the cutting edge of film scholarship. Radicals were also extremely active in the editing and publishing of standard reference materials in the field.

The vision of an alternative filmmaking, film distribution, and film exhibition network that was part of the 1960s' Newsreel perspective never fully came to pass, but a strong radical presence in those areas was established in the period from the time of Newsreel's founding to the end of the 1980s. Individual films had moved from one distributor to another and filmmakers had moved into various production organizations, but almost all the radical films made since the 1960s were easily available in the 1980s. In addition to self-distributing collectives such as New Day and the Pacific Street Collective, radical films were available through firms like Cinema Guild, Icarus/First Run, and Kino. Exhibition spaces were still the weakest link. Most were connected to universities or specialty film houses but there were a handful of community groups such as Philadelphia's Neighborhood Film Project. Organizations like Media Network, Women Make Movies, and Global Village provided a wide range of reference and technical services.

By the 1980s many of the movement's filmmakers, critics, and publications had achieved national and even international reputations. Although the cassette revolution had brought new challenges in the educational market and funding had been squeezed during the Reagan era, the radicals had not only survived but had achieved a measure of influence and in some areas leadership in their professions.

Although the sense of being part of a movement had largely faded by the 1990s, individuals rooted in the New Left tradition retained their ideological perspectives even as more of them got increasing exposure in mainstream venues. On national public television Danny Schecter produced quality programs on South African issues and Marc Weiss was a main force in the P.O.V. series, which featured cutting-edge political documentaries. Chris Choy of Third World Newsreel received a 1989 Academy Award nomination for her Who Killed Vincent Chin? and in the mid-1990s took an important administrative position in the prestigious film school of New York University. Michael Moore scored a surprise box-office hit with Roger and Me (1989), a blistering assault on General Motors. Shortly thereafter he brought his brand of humor to an innovative personal-journalism format presented on various national television networks. Barbara Kopple explored the traumatic Local P-9 strike against Hormel in her independent project American Dream (1989) and then made a challenging study of Mike Tyson, the boxing champion convicted of rape, for network television. In 1996 she directed an episode of Law and Order, one of NBC's leading series. Numerous other filmmakers, exhibitors, writers, and distributors showed similar staying power. Thus, the film movement launched in the 1960s ultimately proved to be one of the most resilient and enduring legacies of the New Left.

[See also League of Revolutionary Black Workers; New Left; Radical Filmmaking, 1930s.]

FURTHER READING

- Blackaby, Linda, Dan Georgakas, and Barbara Margolis. In Focus: A Guide to Using Films. New York: Zoetrope, 1980.
- Cineaste, 5, no. 4 (1973). Special issue: Radical American Film.
- Crowdus, Gary. Editorial. Cineaste 16, nos. 1 and 2 (1987).
- Georgakas, Dan. "Malpractice in the Radical American Documentary." Cineaste 16, nos. 1 and 2 (1987).
- Peyton, Patricia, ed. Reel Change: A Guide to Social Issue Films. San Francisco: Film Fund, 1979.
- Waugh, Thomas, ed. "Show Us Life": Towards a History and Aesthetics of the Committed Documentary. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1984.
- Zheutlin, Barbara, coordinator. "The Art and Politics of the Documentary: A Symposium of Filmmakers," Cineaste 11, no. 3 (1981).

—DAN GEORGAKAS

NEW YORK CALL. See Socialist Party.

NEW YORKER VOLKSZEITUNG. The daily New Yorker Volkszeitung (NYVZ) was first published on 28 January 1878 by the Socialist Cooperative Publishing Association of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP). It sold fifty-five hundred copies at the beginning and continuously increased its circulation to between seventeen thousand and twenty-three thousand copies. Economic pressures forced it to close down in 1932; shortly thereafter the weekly Neue Volkszeitung appeared as successor. The founding of the NYVZ was closely related to the intensification of the class struggle and organizational achievements of the labor movement. A year after the 1875 consolidation of the Eisenacher and Lasallean wings of German social democracy into one party, the united Workingmen's Party was established, soon to become the SLP. German workers and emigrant socialists were active in the new party and were soon joined by the exiles from the newly enacted Bismarckian antisocialist laws. The NYVZ—jointly with the English-language the People (since 1891), later the Worker—became the main organ of the SLP. It was supplemented by a Sunday edition (Sonntagsblatt) and a weekly edition (Vorwärts). Editors were Alexander Jonas (1878–1889), Sergei Schewitsch (1890), Julius Grunzig (1890–1891), Hermann Schlüter (1891–1919), Ludwig Lore (1919–1931), and Siegfried Lipschitz (1931–1932).

Though active in the sometimes acrimonious debates of different SLP wings and outspoken against anarchist tendencies, the daily succeeded in surviving all party splits and sometimes assumed the position of mediator. The paper published German, American, and German-American news as well as international reports. It was the official organ of numerous workers' clubs, mutual aid societies, and unions (ninety-two in 1903). Its cultural pages reprinted classical authors of world literature from Maxim Gorky to Rudyard Kipling to Frank Norris. It published Plechanov, Liebknecht, Kerr, Zetkin, and Trotsky. Women received scant attention until—significantly—a separate women's page was added. The NYVZ was banned from Germany under the antisocialist law (though regularly read by Berlin police authorities). U.S. governmental repression during World War I remained limited through the NYVZ opposed the war, probably because of its outspoken stand against the German monarch.

[See also German Americans; Lore, Ludwig; Socialist Labor Party; Sozial-Revolutionäre Clubs.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Paul, "Ludwig Lore and the New Yorker Volkszeitung," and Dirk Hoerder, "The New Yorker Volkszeitung." In The German-American Radical Press, edited by James Dankey, Ken Fones-Wolf, and Elliot Shore. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990.

—DIRK HOERDER

1919 STRIKE WAVE. In 1919 about twenty percent of the nation's workers participated in the largest strike wave in U.S. history. Millions of workers were emboldened by tight wartime labor markets, increased personal savings, and ample union strike funds accumulated during World War I's full-employment economy. Wartime promises by President Woodrow Wilson of a new era of democracy in labor relations as a reward for workers' wartime sacrifices (which included forced purchase of Liberty bonds) also encouraged workers to militant action, as did the sense of change throughout the world created by the Russian Revolution and strikes and revolutionary uprisings in Germany, Hungary, and England. Striking workers in the United States wanted higher wages and shorter hours. They sought to protect unions' wartime gains against a widespread employer union-busting drive and to establish new, independent (not company financed and controlled) trade unions in many industries. Many of the strikes were led by radical activists of one kind or another, especially in newly organized unions, or at the local and regional level.

The year began with a January strike of New York City tugboat workers. In February thousands of textile workers in Lawrence, Massachusetts, and New Jersey's silk factories walked out. Between 6 and 11 February, Seattle's transportation, service, and craft workers, including Japanese barbers and restaurant workers, came out in a general strike to support the city's shipyard workers' strike for equitable pay increases, especially for lower-paid workers. During the strike, workers established many cooperative enterprises for distributing consumer goods to the public. Although the strike was beaten by the threat of the deployment of federal troops and the declaration of martial law, Seattle radicals like Anna Louise Strong were heartened because the "vast majority [of Seattle workers] had struck to express solidarity. And they succeeded beyond their expectations."

In May a bitter strike by electrical workers in Toledo, Ohio, led to the deployment of federal troops to prevent what the New York Times claimed was an impending union takeover of the city. August saw intense strikes by railroad shopmen in Chicago, subway workers in New York City, and a threat by the national unions representing the operating employees of the railroads to launch a political strike if Congress did not approve the Plumb Plan to nationalize the railroads. California's railroads were paralyzed by a sympathy strike in support of urban streetcar operators' strikes.

September began with the nation's first police strike, as Boston's finest walked out to resist union-busting by the city's police commissioner. On 22 September the great steel strike began. William Z. Foster, a syndicalist who had parted with the Industrial Workers of the World because he favored "boring from within" mainstream labor unions by a class-conscious "militant minority," was the head of the steelworkers' organizing committee, which was created by the American Federation of Labor. Many striking steelworkers believed victory would inaugurate a new era.

Socialist steelworkers expected more. In October sixty thousand metalworkers in the San Francisco Bay area walked out. The nation's coal miners struck in November. During the coal strike many railroad switchmen staged brief sympathy strikes to prevent the transport of "scab" coal.

Throughout the nation, employers and government officials were alarmed by worker militancy, which gave rise to the view, expressed so succinctly by an Arizona mine manager, that "with Bolshevism increasing every minute all over the world, how can we expect to escape?" Consequently, the U.S. Army was used to break the Toledo electrical workers' strike, the steel strike, and the coal strike (soldiers actually were mining coal in December in some mines). Threats of navy intervention forestalled strikes by longshoremen and shortened strikes by tugboat operators. The National Guard was deployed to crush the Boston police strike, and during the steel strike various police forces—including the Pennsylvania State Police, the infamous "Cossacks"—brutally assaulted strikers on picket lines, in their homes, and at peaceful assemblies in meeting halls. The counter-offensive against unions and militant union leaders continued in the 1920s, as the Palmer Raids, vigilante action by businessmen, the revived Ku Klux Klan, the courts, and the military power of the state combined to roll back virtually all the gains unionized American workers had made during the World War I era. But to radicals like William Z. Foster and Anna Louise Strong, the learning experience of the bold efforts of class-conscious workers was more important than the end of the strike wave and the decline of the labor movement. As Strong wrote, "A Great Change is coming over the face of the world . . . which will go deep into the very sources of our lives, to bring joy and freedom in place of heaviness and fear. . . . [O]ur General Strike was one very definite step towards it."

[See also General Strike; Strong, Anna Louise.]

FURTHER READING

- Brecher, Jeremy. Strike! San Francisco: Straight Arrow Press, 1972.
- David Saposs Papers. State Historical Society of Wisconsin, Madison.

Tom Mooney Scrapbooks. Bancroft Library, University of California, Berkeley.

Strong, Anna Louise. The Seattle General Strike. Seattle: Seattle Union Record Publishing Co., 1919.

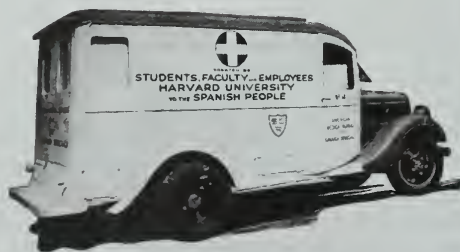

—ROBERT ASHER

NORTH AMERICAN COMMITTEE TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY. Of those Americans who actively demonstrated concern about the needs of the Spanish people during their civil war, the great majority expressed their sympathy and admiration for the Republic. They participated in and contributed to a number of Left-influenced humanitarian organizations, the largest of which was the North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy. It was organized in October 1936, chaired by Bishop Francis J. McConnell. Its secretary was the Reverend Herman F. Reissig and it quickly became an umbrella organization with which a number of specialized organizations affiliated.

Two of the most important affiliates were the American Friends of Spanish Democracy, headed by Bishop Robert L. Paddock, whose major concern was Ambulance donated by students, faculty, and employees of Harvard University.

All American College Ambulance Fleet for Spain

FACULTY and STUDENTS COMMITTEE
FOR MEDICAL AID TO Loyalist SPAIN

MEDICAL BUREAU TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY
301 Fourth Avenue New York, N. Y.

organizing protests aimed at changing the course of Washington's policy toward Spain; and the other was the popular Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy, headed by Walter B. Cannon of the Harvard Medical School.

The list of sponsors looks like a Who's Who of the time—with scores of representatives from the arts, sciences, and the professions. The committee was supported by the Socialist and Communist parties as well as by liberals prominent in all walks of life. Never before had so many Americans been so stirred and activated by an event abroad in which the nation was not directly involved.

There were about 150 chapters nationwide raising funds and organizing support for the beleaguered Spanish Republic. In the twenty-one months after its inception, the North American Committee raised more than $1 million (with 1930s purchasing power) in cash and in kind. Hundreds of tons of food, clothing, and medical supplies had been collected; Americans sent to Spain 175 ambulances and motor vehicles; eight hospitals were maintained with personnel of 125 American doctors and nurses; and ten homes housing more than six hundred children were established.

All this was accomplished (through special committees such as musicians, trade unions, youth, Hollywood, university faculty, and so on) by means of a variety of functions: fairs, picnics, concerts, lectures, mass meetings—two at Madison Square Garden in New York—dances, concerts, film showings, house parties, street collections, gala benefits with scores of stars of stage and screen (many of whom were subsequently harassed by the infamous House Committee on Un-American Activities) and tours of Spanish delegations. Pamphlets and brochures in the tens of thousands were printed and distributed. Special drives were initiated for funds to aid wounded Americans returning from the battlefields. Not long after the end of the war, most of these humanitarian organizations dissolved, to be replaced by organizations whose aim was to raise funds for the relief of Spanish exiles.

[See also Abraham Lincoln Brigade.]

FURTHER READING

David McKelvey White Archives and the Rare Book Division, New York Public Library.

—ALBERT PRAGO

NORTH AMERICAN CONGRESS ON LATIN AMERICA.

Founded in 1966 by church and academic people as a response to the 1965 U.S. invasion of the Dominican Republic and as an expression of New Left protest, the North American Congress on Latin America (NACLA) has been chiefly known for its magazine, NACLA Report on the Americas, although its staff has organized and participated in Latin American solidarity organizations and has undertaken seminars, forums, public speaking tours, and other educational activities. Based in New York City, NACLA has been defined from the start by a concern for the relationship of intellectual work to Left political activism. Using an academic methodology influenced by Marxism but emphasizing empirical data, NACLA has sought to produce information for the progressive community that demythologizes U.S. political and economic institutions that perpetuate exploitation in Latin America and the Caribbean.

NACLA has contributed to a broader comprehension of U.S. imperialism, and of the nature and complexities of Latin American and Caribbean liberation struggles. Important articles and studies it has produced include a number on the Allende period in Chile and its aftermath; the U.S. defense and intelligence establishments; the globalization of U.S. capitalism and the new international division of labor; revolution and U.S. counterinsurgency in Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala. NACLA's example has also encouraged the development of information centers within the church, labor, peace, and solidarity communities.

Over the years, NACLA has gradually shifted away from in-house research and analysis to commissioning and publishing original outside work in its Reports. NACLA staff have been able to identify individuals and institutions involved in current cutting-edge research and analysis, all over the Americas, whatever the issue. In line with changes taking place in the region, NACLA has also widened its focus to include phenomena such as neoliberalism, immigration, U.S. Latinos, indigenous peoples, the environment, democratization, and changes in public policy. To broaden its reach, NACLA recently institutionalized its editorial board into a genuinely expert, participatory, and consultative body involved in the planning and assigning of research. NACLA's subscriber base currently stands at six thousand, and overall circulation at about eight thousand.

[See also Latin American Studies.]

—ROBERT ARMSTRONG

NORWEGIAN AMERICANS. Norwegian immigrants who flocked to the United States in the middle and later nineteenth century took a somewhat less prominent role than Danes and Swedes in urban districts such as Chicago, where a Scandinavian Socialist Federation, and later a Scandinavian Communist Federation, were centered and published their various organs. Norwegians were more prominent in the farmer-labor politics of Minnesota and the Dakotas of the 1910s–1920s. The legends of Marcus Thrane, Norwegian founder of Scandinavian socialism (and for a short time a prominent leader of Chicago socialists), and of playwright Henrik Ibsen lived on in the minds of new generations.

The waves of immigrants after World War I were not as politically oriented as their predecessors, but the Depression of the 1930s impoverished them terribly. By 1930–1931, a Scandinavian Workers Club was founded in Brooklyn, New York, and a socialistic newspaper, Ny Tid, published in the Swedish, Danish, and Norwegian languages. The leading figures were mostly self-trained intellectuals. Along with the press, Norwegian socialists provided a lively chorus, a classical orchestra, gymnastics facilities, and a clubhouse atmosphere for their unemployed supporters. For several years, a school and recreation club were maintained on Staten Island. Some of the most ardent activists enrolled in the Abraham Lincoln Brigade and were killed in Spain. After a final phase of activity, notably in the peace movement as the Norwegian Labor Club, the group dissolved.

—OLUFSON HAUGE, translated and transcribed by EINAR M. S. BREDLAND

NOVEL, RADICAL, 1870–1930. See Radical Novel, 1870–1930.

NOVICK, PAYSAXH (1891–1989). During his forty-nine years of service (1939–1988) as editor of the Left-wing Yiddish newspaper the Morgen Freiheit, Paysakh (Paul) Novick was the most prominent leader and spokesman of the Yiddish-language Left-progressive movement in the United States. Novick was born in Brest-Litovsk, Russia, and in his teens turned away from a religious upbringing to join the youth wing of the Bund, the Jewish socialist party in czarist Russia. When he came to the United States in 1913 he was already a Bundist newspaper veteran. In New York he worked for the Yiddish socialist daily paper, the Forverts (Jewish Daily Forward), contributed to other Yiddish periodicals, and became an activist in the Jewish Socialist Federation. He returned to Russia in 1917, where he edited or wrote for Bundist newspapers in Warsaw, Kiev, Vilna, and Minsk.

When Novick returned to New York in 1921 he was a sympathizer of the Soviet government. He joined forces with Moissaye J. Olgin and other pro-Soviet Left-wingers to detach the Jewish Socialist Federation from the Socialist Party, after which they joined the above-ground organization of the underground Communist Party. On 2 April 1922, Olgin, Novick, and other Jewish socialists and radicals launched a new Yiddish daily newspaper, the Freiheit (Freedom; later renamed Morgen Freiheit, or Morning Freedom). Olgin and Shakhno Epstein were the newspaper's first coeditors and Novick the city editor. From the start the Freiheit was pro-Soviet and pro-Communist but not an official party organ. The Freiheit's political stance, its championship of literary Yiddish, and its brash, polemical style attracted to it some of the foremost younger Yiddish poets and writers in America as well as a readership that was younger and more working class than that of other Yiddish newspapers. The Freiheit inspired and helped to build a network of Yiddish cultural organizations and institutions. It also exerted a militant influence among the unions of the needle trades, among others. By the 1930s the paper's readership was said to be approximately forty to fifty thousand. Never self-sustaining, it was supported financially by the generous annual contributions of its readers.

Novick became the Morgen Freiheit's editor after Olgin's death on 22 November 1939 and remained editor until the paper's demise on 11 September 1988. Though the Freiheit was supportive of the Communist Party, in practice it kept a certain distance from the Party's assimilationist stand on Jewish and especially Yiddish cultural questions. More pronounced tensions with the Party surfaced as a result of the famous February 1956 address by the then Soviet leader, Nikita Khrushchev. The resulting crisis of conscience grew as reports verified that up to four hundred Yiddish cultural workers had earlier been arrested on trumped-up charges, that there were many deaths, and that twenty-four leading literary figures had been executed in August 1952. In this turbulent atmosphere and under Novick's guidance the Freiheit changed itself into an independent, democratic socialist newspaper.

In June 1967, Freiheit defied the leadership of the Communist Party on the assessment of the Six-Day Arab-Israeli War, Novick insisting that it was defensive on Israel's part. For defying Party discipline on this issue and for criticizing anti-Semitic acts and propaganda in the Soviet Union, Novick was expelled from the Communist Party in April 1973, an act which did not affect his popular support.

Novick was himself one of the most prolific writers in the world of Yiddish journalism. Counting his years as assistant to Olgin, he also enjoyed its longest editorial career. He wrote almost all the daily editorials for the Freiheit during his editorship, a weekly political review article, a chatty column ("Day In, Day Out") three times a week, and other items under various names. Into old age, he was known for his fluency, his literary allusions, and his wit. He was also for decades a popular lecturer for left-wing Jewish audiences in the United States and abroad; his visits were often used to raise needed funds for the Freiheit. Novick died less than a year after his newspaper folded and a few months before his ninety-eighth birthday.

[See also Olgin, Moissaye J.; Yiddish Left.]

FURTHER READING

Novick, Paul. The Character and Aims of the Morning Freiheit. New York: Morning Freiheit, 1962.

Novick, Paul. The National and Jewish Question in the Light of Reality. New York: Morning Freiheit, 1970.

—SID RESNICK

NOWAK, STANLEY (b. 1903). Born into a peasant family in Austrian Poland, Stanley Nowak migrated to the Back-of-the-Yards section of Chicago in 1913. Radicalized by the Palmer Raids and by packinghouse strikes, he became a left-wing journalist and speaker in the late 1920s and 1930s and a member of the Proletarian Party. Relocated to Detroit, Nowak turned United Auto Workers organizer, working primarily with Polish and other East European workers. He pioneered the use of ethnic radio programs as an organizing tool.

Elected to the Michigan State Senate (1939–1948), Nowak helped found and became an organizer for the American Slav Congress during World War II. From these positions, he exerted great and, among Poles, almost uniquely powerful influence on the Left. Close to the Communist Party, he never officially joined. The government indicted him under the McCarran-Walter Act in preparing his deportation, but the order was overturned in court in 1957. The same year, he became editor of the Left Polish-language paper Głos Ludowy (People's Voice), holding that post until 1984. His wife, Margaret Collingwood Nowak, shared these activities and was especially active in the Progressive Party.

[See also American Slav Congress; Polish Americans.]

FURTHER READING

Nowak, Margaret C. Two Who Were There. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1989.

—THADDEUS RADZIŁOWSKI

NYKINO. See Radical Filmmaking, 1930s.

OAKLAND GENERAL STRIKE OF 1946. The last of five citywide general strikes by U.S. workers in 1946, the Oakland strike grew out of a walkout by about a thousand members of the Department Store and Specialty Clerks Union Local 1265 against two downtown department stores. The action eventually paralyzed production for almost four days.

Non-union truckers from Los Angeles tried to cross union picket lines at Hastings' Department Store in Oakland early on Monday Morning, 2 December 1946. Strikers tried to block driveways in front of the store, but a squad of Oakland police officers escorted the trucks past the picket lines.

The Alameda County Labor Council of the American Federation of Labor officially endorsed a general strike to begin Tuesday morning, 3 December, a day after most workers walked off the job on their own. Eventually more than ten thousand joined in the general work stoppage. By Monday evening groups of workers began closing virtually all of the businesses in the city except for pharmacies and grocery stores. Strikers allowed anyone to leave the downtown area, but they allowed only workers with union cards to enter it. A carnival mood prevailed among the strikers as they allowed taverns to remain open, but dragged jukeboxes outside into the street.

Twenty thousand workers attended a mass meeting on Tuesday night at the Oakland Auditorium, while thousands of others waited outside in the rain, listening to the proceedings on loudspeakers. Representatives from 142 unions voiced support for the retail clerks' strike demands and went on record against police intervention in the strike.

During the next thirty-six hours, workers took diverse actions to enforce their control over the city. They formed patrols to prevent looting, monitored grocery store sales to prevent hoarding, and imposed price controls to prevent price gouging. Five thousand strikers massed in front of the struck department stores and celebrated their control over the downtown area.

Newspaper editorials condemned the strike as "unrestrained" and "juvenile," while Oakland's mayor called the work stoppage an example of mob rule. International Brotherhood of Teamsters national president Dave Beck condemned the strike as "nothing but a revolution," and ordered his members to get back to work. Oakland's Teamsters remained out.

On Thursday morning, 5 December, the city manager reached an agreement with Labor Council officials to end the standoff. The city pledged to refrain from using police officers to shepherd strikebreakers across picket lines, while labor leaders pledged to end the general strike. Dissident rank-and-file strikers protested against the agreement because they felt it did nothing to help the striking clerks win their initial demands, but after sporadic picketing and demonstrating on Thursday and Friday the strike finally came to a close.

Besides paralyzing production in the Oakland area for almost four days, the strike's 100,000 worker participants forced the city police department to assume a more neutral stance in labor-management disputes and they gained a greater sense of the community of interests binding them together. In the aftermath of the strike, four pro-labor candidates won election to the Oakland City Council. In addition, the general strike contributed to the nationwide militancy characterizing American workplaces in 1946 and 1947 as the country witnessed the largest wave of strikes in its history.

[See also General Strike.]

FURTHER READING

Lipsitz, George. Class and Culture in Cold War America: A Rainbow at Midnight. New York: Praeger, 1981.

—GEORGE LIPSITZ

OCTOBER LEAGUE. See Maoism.

ODETS, CLIFFORD (1906–1963). The most successful Left playwright of the 1930s, Clifford Odets was born to Lithuanian Jewish parents and raised in New York City. Abandoning high school in his third year, Clifford dreamed of becoming a poet. He did not turn to the theater until 1928, when he began acting with the Theatre Guild and was inspired by the work of John Howard Lawson. In 1933, Odets began writing plays, his first—Awake and Sing!—produced by the Group Theatre in 1935. That same year he wrote in three days his one-act play Waiting for Lefty, which won the New York Theatre League contest and brought him to the attention of the theater public. Widely performed as Left theater (sometimes by local union groups) across the United States in the next several years, this labor play (with its actors chanting “STRIKE, STRIKE, STRIKE!” at the conclusion) took its inspiration from a New York taxi strike of 1934.

Odets joined the Communist Party in 1935 and visited Cuba to study the political situation there. He was arrested by the authorities as a Communist. Returning to the United States, he finished three works that would be hits in 1936: Till the Day I Die, Awake and Sing!, and Paradise Lost. Almost single-handedly, Odets made radical theater a paying concern in New York City, and a prime medium for political expression. He also began work in Hollywood, where he could earn $2,500 a week. His first filmed script, The General Died at Dawn (1936), prompted the oft-quoted barb, “Odets, where is thy sting?”

Driven by his need for public acclaim and simultaneously haunted by self-doubts at the cost of his success, Odets returned to Broadway with Golden Boy (1937) and Rocket to the Moon (1938). Both were critical and popular hits. For the first time, a playwright had brought the Jewish experience to the English-language American stage. Audiences were moved by a rich household vernacular that was permeated with a stark assessment of capitalism’s ravages upon the spirit, and no less with a lyrical yearning for a better world. Critics consider these his finest works.

But Odets increasingly felt a sense of futility and self-betrayal in his work, with Hollywood as a metaphor of corruption. In 1952 he appeared as a friendly witness for the House Un-American Activities Committee. This destroyed his credibility as a radical, and on his deathbed Odets swore that it had ruined his later life. Evidently, Odets needed Left culture for personal self-worth and as an artistic well-spring. Harold Clurman described Odets’s work as a confession of personal anguish “at sharing those values in our civilization that he despised.” One of his last serious plays, The Big Knife (1949), featured a protagonist who had gone from idealism to cynicism, desperation, and finally suicide. The only play to be produced after his testimony, The Flowering Peach, was a folksy retelling of the Noah’s Ark legend.

[See also Hollywood Blacklist; Lardner, Ring, Jr.]

FURTHER READING

- Brenman-Gibson, Margaret. Clifford Odets: American Playwright. New York: Atheneum, 1982.
 Miller, Gabriel, ed. Critical Essays on Clifford Odets. New York: Macmillan, 1991.
 Murray, Edward. Clifford Odets: The Thirties and After. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1968.
 Williams, Jay. Stage Left. New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1974.

—NORMA JENCKES

OEHLER, HUGO (1903–1983). An important figure in the Communist party in the 1920s, Hugo Oehler was especially esteemed by his comrades for his successful efforts as trade union organizer of textile workers in the Deep South and mine workers in Colorado. He was the Party’s district organizer in Kansas when he declared himself a Trotskyist in 1930 and joined the U.S. section of the International Left Opposition.

Elected a year later to the National Committee of the U.S. Trotskyists’ group, the Communist League of America, Oehler for several years played a key role in the American Trotskyist movement, and was a frequent contributor to its paper, the Militant. In 1932 he was sent on a tour of Germany to warn the working class of the impending dangers of Nazism and the ineffectiveness of Communist and social-democratic strategies against it. The following year, back in New York, he helped direct the large hotel-workers’ strike, and in 1934 he organized the unemployed as part of the famous strike of the Minneapolis Teamsters.

At an international conference of Trotskyists in October 1934 Oehler spoke against the so-called French Turn—that is, the entry of Trotskyists into the supposedly leftward-moving social-democratic parties. A year later he and nearly a third of his fellow Trotskyists were expelled from the U.S. Trotskyist group for their opposition to this strategy. Oehler and some two hundred other expellees went on to form the Chicago-based Revolutionary Workers League (RWL; often called “Oehlerites” by its opponents), whose official publication was the Fighting Worker, supplemented by an occasional Spanish-language paper, Claridad Proletaria.

Early in 1937 Oehler went to revolutionary Spain as representative of the RWL and wrote extensively of his experiences there. He took part in the workers' revolt against provocations of the "popular front" police in Barcelona in May 1937, and his pamphlet Barricades in Barcelona is one of the most valuable first-hand accounts of those events that marked a turning point in the Spanish Revolution. After the Barcelona revolt was crushed, Oehler was arrested, held incommunicado for a month and accused of "spying," but was finally allowed to leave the country.

Oehler continued to head the RWL until he moved to Denver in 1941, when leadership of the group was assumed for several years by Sidney Lens; the RWL disappeared in the 1950s. Increasingly aloof from practical politics, Oehler devoted the last decades of his life to an elaborate project for a scientific philosophy based on his own rather eccentric conception of materialist dialectics.

[See also Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

Lens, Sidney. Unrepentant Radical. Boston: Beacon Press, 1983.

Revolutionary History 34 (summer 1988).

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

OFF OUR BACKS. Dubbed by some "the New York Times of the women's movement," off our backs (oob) has been an indispensable guide to anyone interested in understanding the evolution of the women's liberation movement over the past three decades. Oob was founded in early 1970 by veteran New Leftist and Guardian correspondent Marilyn Webb and Marlene Wickes, after Webb, weary of what she described as the Guardian's "consistent blackout on feminist news," broached the idea of publishing a women's news journal.

When oob began publishing, women's liberationists were typically divided into two camps—Left feminists who believed that women's oppression was largely a function of capitalism and should be fought within the larger radical movement, and radical feminists who believed that it resulted from male supremacy and that its eradication required a separate and autonomous women's movement. Initially, oob articulated the former position. Thus, the editorial in its inaugural issue called on women to "oppose and destroy the system that fortifies the supremacy of men while exploiting the mass for the profit of the few." And in an effort to distinguish itself from radical feminism, the staff emphasized that "our position is not antimen but prowomen."

Cover of a 1971 issue of off our backs.

Eager to distinguish itself from liberal feminism as well, the staff made it clear that it took its inspiration from Third World revolutionary women, not Betty Friedan. The paper was filled with glowing reports about women's situations in Vietnam, Cuba, and China, where, if oob was to be believed, sexism was rapidly becoming a thing of the past. But the paper was not dogmatically attached to the politico position; within its first year of publication it printed several articles excoriating the male-dominated movement for continued sexism.

As the Left disintegrated and as the women's movement flourished, oobers, like other Left feminists, began to move toward radical feminism. Between 1973 and 1978 oob printed some of the most incisive radical feminist writing to be found anywhere. Nor did oob repudiate the Left in this period, for, like many radical feminists, its writers believed that radical feminism entailed an expansion rather than a rejection of the Left. Over the years this perspective has receded, as oob, reflecting changes within the movement as a whole, has moved closer to cultural feminism—a strand of feminism that among other things believes that feminism and the Left are inevitably antagonistic.

[See also Socialist Feminism; Women's Liberation.]

FURTHER READING

Echols, Alice. Daring to Be Bad: A History of the Radical Feminist Movement in America, 1967–75. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1989.

Willis, Ellen. "Radical Feminism and Feminist Radicalism." In The Sixties without Apology, edited by Sohnya Sayres, Anders Stephanson, Stanley Aronowitz, and Fredric Jameson. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1984.

—ALICE ECHOLS

O'HARE, KATE RICHARDS (1876–1948). One of the most popular socialist speakers during the so-called golden era of the Socialist Party of America prior to World War I, Kate Richards O'Hare traveled constantly on behalf of the party for almost two decades, held party posts, ran as a candidate for public offices, wrote for movement newspapers, and was a fixture at party conventions. During World War I, O'Hare was convicted under the Espionage Act for an anti-war speech and served time in the Missouri State Penitentiary.

Born in Ottawa County in central Kansas to homesteaders, Carrie Kathleen Richards and her family were forced off the land during the agricultural depression of the 1880s. They relocated to Kansas City, Missouri, and she soon completed her education and began to teach school. She abandoned teaching after only one term, and worked in the machine shop that her father operated, becoming one of the first women to join the International Order of Machinists. At this time, Richards was drawn to religion and to the temperance movement, as were many young women in the late nineteenth century. She considered becoming a missionary for the Disciples of Christ, but instead worked at the Florence Crittenton Mission, one of a chain of missions located in skid rows of major cities that tried to rehabilitate prostitutes and alcoholics. But Richards, already somewhat receptive to social criticisms of the existing economic order through her father's influence, gradually decided that rescue work was no panacea for society's ills. She attended a lecture by "Mother" Mary Harris Jones, met socialist publisher J. A. Wayland, and converted to socialism. Richards then enrolled in a school for socialist organizers in Girard, Kansas, where she married a fellow student, Francis Patrick O'Hare of Saint Louis, in 1902. The couple undertook an organizing tour for the party as their honeymoon, establishing a pattern for the O'Hares and their brood of four children according to which family life was shaped by the pace of party activities.

Kate O'Hare developed a following in the Socialist Party through her columns and features in the Appeal to Reason, Wilshire's, the Socialist Woman, and other periodicals. Also gaining a reputation for her public speaking, she was especially in demand on the Socialist summer encampment circuit in the Plains states and the Southwest, where she addressed thousands annually. The O'Hares, after briefly trying homesteading in the territory of Oklahoma, settled in Kansas City, Kansas, in 1909. A year later, Kate O'Hare ran on the Socialist ticket for the U.S. House of Representatives. In 1911, the O'Hares settled permanently in Saint Louis when Kate and Frank joined the staff of the National Rip-Saw, an agrarian socialist monthly.

By then O'Hare was one of the acknowledged leaders of the Socialist Party. Already a member of the National Executive Committee and the Woman's National Committee as well as the party's representative to the International Socialist Bureau, she became the first woman to run for the U.S. Senate when the Missouri state branch of the party nominated her in 1916, the same year that she was a candidate to be the party's vice presidential nominee. As a party leader, O'Hare's views placed her within the dominant revisionist wing, even though she had an unearned reputation as a leftist. Her personal closeness to Eugene V. Debs led right-wing leaders Morris Hillquit and Victor L. Berger, who were contemptuous of her as a woman and a westerner, to consider her a left-winger. Nevertheless, O'Hare agreed with them on policy, believing that electoral politics, worker education, and reform measures would culminate in the inevitable transformation of the capitalist system into a socialist commonwealth. She developed a wide definition of the oppressed, as she tried to reach out not only to the urban proletariat but to other exploited groups of workers as well. She was a key figure in prodding the party to adopt an agricultural program, one which sidestepped the issue of collectivization. Almost alone among the leadership, O'Hare was sensitive to the exploitation of women workers in their various roles—as factory workers but also as housewives, farmers, and even prostitutes. While she did not define herself as a feminist, she cooperated with middle-class suffragists despite party policy but always argued that emancipation for women, as for men, could only be realized through socialism. She was one of the few party members to endorse, if cautiously, the legality of divorce, birth control, and abortion. At the same time, her specific goal for women in the forthcoming cooperative society was that they be free to follow what she considered their natural inclination, to be full-time wives and mothers.

During World War I, O'Hare was a tireless speaker and columnist against American intervention. She chaired the party committee that wrote an anti-war statement at an emergency convention in April 1917. Continuing to condemn the war despite curtailments of the right of free speech, O'Hare was indicted in North Dakota in July 1917 for an anti-war speech that she had delivered dozens of times. She was found guilty by an unsympathetic jury under the Espionage Act and sentenced to five years in prison by a judge who was an avowed foe of socialism. During her imprisonment, she sought to study prison conditions and to write case studies of her fellow inmates, but her notes were confiscated by prison authorities. Her stay, however, led her to expand her definition of the oppressed to include prisoners, and it changed the focus of her work to penal reform. O'Hare was released after fourteen months when President Woodrow Wilson commuted her sentence in May 1920. Thereafter, she worked for amnesty for Debs and other political prisoners, an end to prison contract labor, and worker education, founding Commonwealth College in Arkansas. She never renounced her commitment to social democracy, but the decline of the Socialist Party as well as her hostility to the Soviet Union ended the socialist phase of her life.

In 1928, she and Frank O'Hare were divorced, and she married Charles C. Cunningham, a businessman and engineer, and lived in California. Less active than earlier, she nevertheless held a position in Upton Sinclair's End Poverty in California campaign, worked on the staff of Wisconsin Progressive congressional representative Thomas R. Amlie in 1937–1938, and was appointed to the staff of the director of the California Department of Penology, where she worked to improve living conditions at San Quentin Penitentiary. Still active addressing groups locally on civic issues, she died on 10 January 1948 in Benicia, California.

FURTHER READING

- Basen, Neil K. "Kate Richards O'Hare: The 'First Lady' of American Socialism, 1901–1917." Labor History 21 (spring 1980).
- Foner, Philip S., and Sally M. Miller, eds. Kate Richards O'Hare: Selected Writings and Speeches. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.
- Miller, Sally M. From Prairie to Prison: The Life of Social Activist Kate Richards O'Hare. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1993.

—SALLY M. MILLER

OLGIN, MOISSAYE J. (1878–1939). Yiddish writer and journalist and editor of several Yiddish socialist publications in Russia and the United States, Moissaye J. Olgin served as editor of the Yiddish Communist daily newspaper in New York, Freiheit, later Morgen Freiheit, from its founding in April 1922. Olgin (family name Moishe Yankl Novomeisky) was born in a small town near Kiev, Ukraine. In 1900 he became a student at Kiev University and was expelled after two years for revolutionary activity. Later, in Vilna (now Vilnius), he became an activist in the Bund, the underground Jewish social-democratic party in Russia. During the 1905 revolution he wrote all the public statements issued by the Bundist leadership and was dubbed the Bund's "golden pen." Following the failure of the revolution he devoted much time to Yiddish education for workers and prepared two Yiddish grammar texts. Beginning in 1910 he studied German literature at Heidelberg University. He arrived in New York in 1915 and became a contributor to the Jewish Daily Forward and other Yiddish socialist periodicals. Olgin also studied at Columbia University. His doctoral thesis was issued in book form in 1918 under the title The Soul of the Russian Revolution. He spurned offers to accept a teaching appointment at a few American universities, preferring to work with the Yiddish socialist movement.

After the Bolshevik Revolution (November 1917) Olgin became the leader of the pro-Communist faction in the Jewish Federation of the Socialist Party and in 1921 brought it into the Communist Party. Under Olgin's editorship, the Freiheit attracted some of the most popular Yiddish writers and poets of the period.

Though Olgin shared the Stalinist viewpoint of the American Communists, he was quick to take advantage of the Party's turn to its Popular Front position in the mid-1930s, when a less rigid sectarian outlook was promoted. In this period Olgin proposed united-front action within the Jewish community against anti-Semitism and fascism and to seek the cooperation of Zionists and even bourgeois spokesmen in this effort. He also expressed appreciation for American democracy in an essay entitled "I Love America," which irritated Party hard-liners.

In his last years Olgin became more involved with Yiddish cultural problems. At the World Yiddish Cultural Congress held in Paris in 1937 he delivered the main report, in which he developed a program for the Yiddish secular and progressive cultural movement.

Olgin was also a noted translator in several languages and was among the first translators of Lenin's works into English. He translated a number of important fictional works of European and American writers into Yiddish. During the 1920s and 1930s Olgin was an authoritative and much-beloved figure in the Yiddish Left. The procession at his funeral in Manhattan on 27 November 1939 attracted more than 100,000.

[See also Yiddish Left.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Paul. "Jews and American Communism: The Cultural Question." Radical History Review 23 (spring 1980).

—SID RESNICK

OLSEN, TILLIE (b. 1913). Few American women authors of recent years have underscored the integral connections between feminist politics and working-class realities more forcefully than Tillie Olsen. She has largely come to symbolize the deep-rooted societal and cultural obstacles faced by women who create. In nearly everything she has written since the 1930s, Olsen reveals the fundamental conviction that women throughout history have suffered silencing hardships and neglect in their struggles for self-expression. Her career spans more than half of the twentieth century, making Olsen a key figure in the development of a feminist movement concerned with gender, race, and class oppression. Olsen's own life experiences reflect this development.

Olsen was born Tillie Lerner in 1913 in Omaha, Nebraska, the second of seven children. Her parents were Jewish immigrants who fled Russia in 1905 after the failed rebellion. Her father worked at menial jobs while he pursued political activism as state secretary of the Nebraska Socialist Party. The family could not support itself, and Olsen left high school after the eleventh grade to work. When she was seventeen, she joined the Young Communist League (YCL), the youth organization of the American Communist Party.

The economic crisis of 1929 and the decision to join the YCL appear crucial in the young author's life. The YCL sent Olsen to Kansas City, where she was arrested for her participation in organizing a packinghouse strike. These experiences led Olsen to begin a novel about a migrant worker family, the unfinished novel Yonnondio: From the Thirties.

In 1934 the twenty-one-year-old Olsen published all she would publish during the 1930s. This included two poems, two journalistic accounts (notably "The Strike," a first-hand account of the San Francisco general strike), and a brief excerpt from her novel-in-progress. After that, there were no publications from Olsen for the next twenty-two years.

It was only in 1956, when the short story "I Stand Here Ironing" appeared, that Olsen's writing career resumed. "In the twenty years I bore and reared my children," Olsen writes, "[I] usually had to work on a paid job as well, [and] the simplest circumstances for creation did not exist." Finally, with the assistance of a creative-writing fellowship to Stanford University in 1955, Olsen again turned to fiction writing. In 1961 she published her collection of short stories Tell Me a Riddle, and the title story won the O. Henry Award as the best story of 1961.

This success was followed by a Radcliffe Institute Fellowship (1962–1964), which allowed Olsen to begin her second book, Silences. With this nonfiction work, Olsen explored the special difficulties experienced by women who create. These writings quickly became an inspirational point of departure for many in the emerging women's movement.

In the 1970s Olsen published her unfinished novel, Yonnondio: From the Thirties (1974), Silences (1978), and a long afterword, "A Biographical Interpretation," to a forgotten nineteenth-century novel, Life in the Iron Mills, by Rebecca Harding Davis (1861, reprinted 1972).

In later years, Olsen maintained her political identity mainly as an educator and leader within the women's movement, and through numerous benefit readings for a variety of progressive causes. In addition, Olsen put together Mother to Daughter, Daughter to Mother: A Day Book and Reader (1984) as well as an introduction for Mothers and Daughters (1987), a photography book on this same theme. This work continued Olsen's lifelong commitment to women's studies, and her dedication to "discovering" neglected aspects of women's cultural history.

[See also Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s; Young Communist League.]

FURTHER READING

Coiner, Constance. Better Red: The Writing and Resistance of Tillie Olsen and Meridel Le Sueur. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Tillie Olsen Archive. Berg Collection, New York Public Library.

Orr, Elaine Neil. Tillie Olsen and a Feminist Spiritual Vision. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1987.

Roberts, Nora R. Three Radical Women Writers; Class and Gender in Meridel le Sueur, Tillie Olsen, and Josephine Herbst. New York: Garland Publishing, 1996.

Staub, Michael. "The Struggle for 'Selfness' through Speech in Olsen's Yonnonidio: From the Thirties," Studies in American Fiction 16, no. 3 (autumn 1988).

—MICHAEL STAUB

OVINGTON, MARY WHITE (1885–1951).

Known primarily for her part in forming the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1909, Mary White Ovington was a lifelong socialist and strong advocate of women's rights. Born in Brooklyn to well-to-do abolitionist parents, she attended Harvard Annex (later Radcliffe College) for two years. From 1896 to 1903 she expanded her education as head worker at the Greenpoint Settlement in Brooklyn. In 1904 she joined the staff of Greenwich House Settlement and worked mainly with black children. She also began research on the conditions of blacks in Manhattan, a project that resulted in a major publication, Half a Man: The Status of the Negro in New York (1911).

Ovington joined the Socialist Party in 1905. She wrote for several Left journals, such as the New Review, and frequently for the party press on matters of racial injustice. While an ardent suffragist and pacifist who opposed U.S. entry into World War I, Ovington worked mainly to improve racial relations in the United States. She joined several uplift organizations, including the National League for the Protection of Colored Women. Beginning in 1914 she chaired the NAACP organization for nearly two decades and weathered many political storms, including factional battles of integration, economic radicalism, and Pan-Africanism.

A prolific writer as well as tireless lecturer, Ovington wrote her autobiography, The Walls Came Tumbling Down (1947), which focused on her activities within the NAACP. She also wrote antiracist stories for children and a novel, The Shadow (1920).

[See also Greenwich Village.]

FURTHER READING

Kellogg, Charles Flint. NAACP, A History of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 1909–1920.

Vol. 1. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967. Mary White Ovington Papers. Wayne State University.

Wedin, Carolyn. Mary White Ovington and the Founding of the NAACP. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1997.

—MARI JO BUHLE

PACIFICA FOUNDATION. Incorporated in 1946, Pacifica put its first radio program on the air on 15 April 1949. The enterprise was primarily the work of Lewis Hill (1919–1957), who envisioned a radio station that was not compromised by advertisers or ratings. His specific political orientation had been taking shape for a decade. In 1937, while studying at Stanford University, he had become attracted to the ideas of the Quakers and had become a pacifist. When drafted into the armed forces in 1941 he registered as a conscientious objector and served in the Civilian Public Service Projects. Following the war he worked as a White House and Senate correspondent for a Washington radio station, but he found attempts to do honest journalism were undercut by commercial concerns. Hill then returned to California with the intent of starting a new kind of radio station.

Drawing upon the radical traditions of the Bay Area, Hill proposed a station that would draw all of its income from listeners and whose programs would thus be dependent upon their pleasure, a form of media direct democracy. The foundation's name reflected rejection of the Cold War and desire for a non-violent planet. The founding Pacifica station was KPFA of Berkeley, and early supporters and personnel were centered on professors at the nearby University of California campus. Launched in the same period as the National Guardian and the Monthly Review, KPFA had a strong First Amendment and generally libertarian orientation. Hill had been an officer in the local American Civil Liberties Union, and Pacifica supporters were steadfast opponents of McCarthyism in all its forms.

From the start, Pacifica ignored the conventions of the dominant culture. The music of such black-listed performers as Pete Seeger and Paul Robeson was heard often. Commentary was offered by a wide range of new and old dissident voices, including Alan Watts, Kenneth Rexroth, and the young Pauline Kael. Lawrence Ferlinghetti, destined to play a major role in the Beat Generation and underground press movements, has written that when he first arrived in San Francisco in 1951, the station was the center of intellectual life. Although Hill committed suicide in 1957, the station was able to survive and in 1958 it won a prestigious Peabody Award for public service.

A second station, Los Angeles' KPFK, was added in 1959. That same year a third station came into being under a peculiar circumstance. Louis Schweitzer, an eccentric New York millionaire, was so impressed with Pacifica's programming that he "gave" his WBA station, right in the middle of the New York City FM dial, to the foundation. The station was renamed WBAI and went on the air early in 1960. During the 1970s, KPFT was founded in Houston and WPFW in Washington, D.C. While still excluding all advertising and dependent for survival on listener contributors, the stations had begun to take donation from educational trusts and other charitable institutions.

The New York City station was to be one of the major cultural institutions of the 1960s, going on the air just as the counterculture and New Left were taking root. The station would provide dramatic coverage of every facet of opposition to the war in Vietnam and the civil rights movement. During the 1970s considerable time would be allotted to feminist and gay liberation programs. During the 1980s the political focus would turn to Latin America and Iran with a number of key programs syndicated to stations outside the Pacifica network. News programs whose time slot was "as long as needed," call-in shows, and multi-hour segments reflecting a particular and usually highly individualist style were just a few of Pacifica's innovations. The stations also featured a wide range of musical programming that was without precedent and untenable on any other kind of economic base.

Pacifica drew the ire of the Right from its onset and was constantly assailed as "Communist-inspired." License renewals have been held up time and again on a variety of pretexts. An early flashpoint was a two-hour interview first aired on WBAI in 1962 with Jack Levin, a former agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, who offered an insider's critique of how J. Edgar Hoover ran the Bureau as a despot and intimidated elected officials. The program led to a subpoena for foundation officials to appear before the Senate Internal Security Committee. The foundation's license was again threatened in 1970. This time the issue was obscene language. Variety, the quintessential nonpolitical show-biz journal, commented at the time that Pacifica's real indiscretion was its vigorous opposition to the war in Vietnam.

The Houston station was bombed twice (1970 and 1971) and threats were made against the Los Angeles station. The Houston bombings kept the station off the air for a time, but Pacifica's integrity had won it considerable mainstream admiration. The Houston Post offered a reward of $1,500 for information leading to the arrest of those responsible for the bombing. Of even greater import, the Post, CBS, the National Association of Broadcasters, the Houston Chronicle, Broadcasting magazine, and the Saturday Review all extended support when Pacific stations come under attack.

Private and governmental attacks have continued, but despite the always tenuous financial realities, the Pacifica stations have survived. Moreover, many aspects of Pacifica programming have been widely emulated. Pacifica-like stations first sprang up in the 1970s in cities such as Seattle, Saint Louis, and San Francisco. The development of National Public Radio (NPR) was influenced by Pacifica concepts, and Pacifica alumni have been prominent not only at NPR but at various commercial stations. Community-access television and non-commercial radio stations of all kinds also reflect the views pioneered by Lewis Hill and the Pacifica founders in the late 1940s.

Celebrating its fortieth year of continuing programming in 1989, Pacifica boasted that it had covered all major events from the Army-McCarthy hearings through the Iran-contra scandal, often offering gavel-to-gavel coverage of hearings and on-the-spot full-time coverage of major demonstrations, parades, and rallies. The foundation offered 30,000 tapes for use by other stations and the public, and its new programs, augmented by those of independent producers, were being heard on a large number of stations throughout the United States, Canada, and various other nations. One of Pacifica's projects for the 1990s was to restore seven thousand tapes from the 1950s and 1960s and make them available to the general public.

These and other projects ran into trouble in the late 1990s, when disputes arose between the foundation's national executive board and leaders of the affiliates over the nature of Pacifica's mission. The national board wanted to move programming in the less political direction being followed by NPR. Some of the affiliates, particularly WBAI in New York, pointed out that NPR was moving rightward in response to pressure from conservatives in Congress who controlled their funding. They argued that to follow the same path was a betrayal of Pacifica's origins. They continued to program in their customary fashion while complex battles over funding and control continued.

[See also Beat Generation and the New Left; Pacifism; Underground Press.]

FURTHER READING

- Armstrong, David. A Trumpet to Arms: Alternative Media in America. Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher, 1981.
 Aronson, James. Deadline for the Media: Today's Challenges to Press, TV and Radio. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1972.
 Monaco, James. Media Culture. New York: Delta, 1978.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

PACIFISM. A rich worldview that developed from a range of sources, secular and religious, pacifism has the single unifying theme that violence is rejected as a means of resolving social conflict. Uniquely among major radical perspectives, it is "Eastern" as well as "Western" and in that sense among the most thoroughly internationalist. Pacifists differ on whether they might use violence in extreme personal situations such as rape or murder, but agree upon the rejection of violence during civil wars, revolutions, or conflict between nation-states. Whether articulated via Gandhi's Hinduism, Tolstoy's Christianity, or in the secular humanism of the socialist and anarchist movements, pacifism has always emphasized the role of the individual sense of morality against any organized ideology of violence.

Because of their opposition to the state, pacifists have not generally fitted into Marxist-Leninist organizations, but rather allied themselves as loose caucuses within socialist or social-democratic movements. While building some distinct institutions, often at the edges of socialist or liberal religious movements, they have largely acted as individuals upon a wide spectrum of available arenas.

Pacifist influence developed slowly in the modern Left. Although "nonresistant" agitation flourished in reform circles of the 1830s–1850s, pacifists played little apparent role in the immigrant-dominated U.S. socialist movements of the post-Civil War period. Nor did they revive significantly within the new Socialist party until the nation plunged into war. Widespread anti-war sentiments often took on a semi-pacifist flavoring within the Socialist Party at large, and took organizational form in the Fellowship of Reconciliation and its socialistic magazine, the World Tomorrow. Largely Protestant and middle class, a circle of prominent pacifists became increasingly prominent in a reduced Socialist Party, especially with the ascendance of Norman Thomas, himself a nearly devout pacifist, to party leadership.

During the Depression, pacifist sentiments fairly swept many college campuses. Asserting a U.S. version of the Oxford Pledge (refusal to “fight for King and Country”), undergraduates expressed their fear of the coming war in strikes, marches, and conventions. The threat of world fascism and the predominance of the antipacifist Communist Party during the later 1930s eclipsed these moods, although Norman Thomas and a badly diminished Socialist Party remained pacifistically anti-war until the Japanese invasion of Pearl Harbor. Thereafter, many pacifists did alternative service in mental hospitals (ending the infamous “locked wards”) or did time in jail.

Public revulsion at atomic weapons and the devastation of war generally prompted a sharp rise of pacifist sentiments after the war. Pacifists pioneered public radio, an idea germinated during prison terms, by establishing station KPFA-FM in Berkeley, a station that promoted pacifist views and served as a model for other subsequent community-based stations. Likewise, pacifists played an active role in the publication of critical magazines (especially Dwight Macdonald’s Politics magazine) and many poetry or avant-garde artistic publications, especially in the Bay Area. Out of fundamentally anarcho-pacifist concerns, Lawrence Ferlinghetti’s City Lights Bookstore and its famous poetry series (introducing, among others, anarcho-pacifist Allen Ginsberg) became a major cultural resource of the 1950s–1960s.

The civil rights movement buoyed up the prestige of Gandhi’s work and the value of nonviolence, especially in the face of racist attacks. The Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.’s, acceptance and articulation of pacifist philosophy, especially in the face of collapse by existing Left ideologies, provided a new opening for pacifism. The Congress of Racial Equality, founded by veterans of the Fellowship of Reconciliation (a tax refusal and direct action group), helped launch the civil disobedience tactics challenging segregation in public facilities. The participation of pacifists such as Bayard Rustin in Dr. King’s (and other civil rights) campaigns, not greatly noted at the time outside pacifist circles, added to the long-run significance of the civil rights years.

Meanwhile, a socialist pacifism of sorts had taken various forms. A small group of World War II prison veterans, including Dave Dellinger, Jim Peck, and Ralph DiGia, founded the Committee for Nonviolent Revolution in 1946 with a program that included the nonviolent seizure of the means of production by workers. This small group merged two years later with Peacemakers, a radical pacifist group which A. J. Muste had helped establish and which was moving toward a “Third Camp” position—rejecting the political leadership of the United States and Soviet Union—on the Cold War.

These activists forged a powerful new means of expression in 1956, when, with special support from the War Resisters League (WRL), they set up Liberation magazine. At a time of extreme political conformity, Liberation found wide acceptance among a proto-New Left, in part by linking the old notions of anti-monopoly and anti-imperialist republicanism with the decentralist and nonhierarchical themes of the new generation. Liberation continued to publish until 1977, involving most of the major national writers around the New Left and establishing a presence far beyond the pacifist community. Among its regular contributors were Paul Goodman, Barbara Deming, Staughton Lynd, and David Dellinger. WIN magazine, with a smaller but more intensely pacifist following in the 1960s–1970s, became in effect a journalistic “Workshop in Nonviolence” (hence its name) for its founding WRL and a somewhat more general peace publication during later years.

During the 1960s pacifism had an enormous impact upon American political and social movements, ranging from the nonviolent campaigns of Martin Luther King to the organization of farm workers by César Chávez. Pacifist organizations such as the WRL experienced their highest membership levels, as WRL itself led the first draft card burnings and attempted direct action “closings” of army induction centers. Radical pacifists played a central role in the anti-war coalitions, frequently mediating conflicts among other elements and setting the tone of events. Following U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam, pacifist organizations inevitably declined, but continued to exert an influence on the Left. Such varied movements as attempted disruption of missile sites, boycotts against war toys, Greenpeace invasion of nuclear test sites, and nonviolent protests by the homeless carried forward crucial elements of pacifism's historical premises. The end of the Cold War was almost irrelevant to the pacifist project, as there was no diminution of bloody regional conflicts. Aggravating this reality for Americans was that the role of the United States as the world's largest supplier of arms grew rather than diminished.

[See also Civil Rights Movement; Dellinger, David; Macdonald, Dwight; Peace Movements; Rustin, Bayard; World Tomorrow.]

FURTHER READING

- Alonson, Harriet H. The Women's Peace Union and the Outlawry of War, 1921-1942. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Chatfield, Charles. For Peace and Justice: Pacifism in America, 1914-1941. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1971.
- Early, Frances H. A World without War: How U.S. Feminists and Pacifists Resisted World War I. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1997.
- Foster, Carrie. The Women and the Warriors: The U.S. Section of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, 1915-1946. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1995.
- Lynn, Susan. Progressive Women in Conservative Times: Racial Justice, Peace, and Feminism, 1945-1960s. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1993.
- Swarthmore College Peace Collection, Swarthmore, Pa.
- Tracy, James. Direct Action: Radical Pacifism from the Union Eight to the Chicago Seven. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Wittner, Lawrence. Rebels against War: The American Peace Movement, 1933-1983. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1984.

—DAVID MCREYNOLDS and PAUL BUHLE

PACKINGHOUSE WORKERS. The United Packinghouse, Food and Allied Workers (UPWA) remained one of the few International unions within the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) in which an acknowledged left-wing presence played a significant role within the political and ideological life of the organization. What has been called a Center-Left coalition maintained itself as the leading force within the organization from its inception as the Packinghouse Workers Organizing Committee (PWOC) in October 1937 until the merger of UPWA and the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen in 1968. At its peak, the union had approximately 150,000 members in the United States, Canada, and Puerto Rico.

While the Center was clearly the dominant partner throughout the history of the union, the Left contributed much of the energy and ideological support behind the progressive policies and aggressive bargaining posture advocated by International president Ralph Helstein. Helstein led the union from 1946 to 1968. His administration declined to participate in the "red purge" program within the CIO and took public positions on economic and political issues with which the CIO leadership was not altogether comfortable.

In 1953 the UPWA executive board issued a position paper, "The Road Ahead," which called for an end to the Korean War; for an end to congressional witch-hunts; for recognition of mainland China; and for a transformation of the American buildup of arms into "a bold program of schools, power projects, housing and hospitals instead of bombers and destroyers." The lengthy manifesto was given display treatment in the union's newspaper and several thousand reprints were distributed widely.

Beginning in 1945, the UPWA executive board set up special procedures for dealing with cases involving racial discrimination, and in 1953 it began to hold an annual Conference on Antidiscrimination and Women's Activities. The intent was to focus on its own nationwide effort behind an aggressive program of "affirmative action" to open up employment and promotion opportunities to minority workers in all of its bargaining units. "Women's Activities" referred to the greater involvement of women members in the life and leadership of the organization at all levels, and to special concern for female-specific plant issues. Through these programs, segregated locker rooms, even drinking fountains then customary in southern plants, were completely abolished. The union also took its program into the communities, both North and South. UPWA was an early supporter of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. The Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., addressed the union's 1957 conference, at which he was presented with a check for $11,000 from the UPWA Fund for Democracy.

The union's economic program was characterized by a militant posture and a skillful leadership at the bargaining table, based on an informed membership which was involved as a participant in the decision-making process at all levels. As a matter of policy, the setting of bargaining goals began with a round of membership meetings at the local level at which plant issues were discussed. The next step was a national conference at which local union delegates representing all the employers in the industry agreed on common objectives. All local unions were entitled to participate in their own companywide bargaining sessions. Accordingly, a sophisticated and involved membership brought wages and working conditions in the meat-packing industry from one of the most despised to one of the most desirable.

The ability of the UPWA to operate as a mainstream union with a strong and acknowledged Left element rested on three main factors:

1. Capable Left leaders, who were well identified as such, had made a decisive contribution to the organizing campaigns that had surmounted red-baiting attacks in several key centers; hence significant sections of the union membership had, early on, been inoculated against this form of criticism from the "outside."

2. The meat-packing workers had a strong sense of identity, infused with a strong midwestern and rural populism that found radicalism not too unacceptable. Depression-troubled Iowa farmers had forcibly prevented farm foreclosure sales and dumped milk trucks only a few years before the PWOC was formed.

3. The Left leaders within the UPWA handled themselves tactfully, so that the socialist-oriented Canadians, the "populist" midwesterners, and the Communist-influenced sections in certain metropolitan areas could maintain a mutually respectful working relationship, which allowed President Helstein to chart a course of forward positions on social issues while building an enviable wage and benefit structure for workers in the industry.

[See also Industrial Unionism.]

FURTHER READING

Halpern, Rick. Down on the Killing Floor. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1997.

Horowitz, Roger. Negro and White, Unite and Fight! Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1997.

—LESLIE F. OREAR

PAINE, THOMAS (1737–1809). Revolutionary pamphleteer and democratic thinker, Thomas Paine contributed directly to the making of the American Revolution, the politics of the French Revolution, and the formation of the English labor movement in the Industrial Revolution. To this day, Paine's words are drawn upon for political inspiration and his legacy is claimed by American and British political actors left and right.

English-born, Paine was the son of a Quaker and staymaker from whom he learned the craft of corset-making and the Friends' dissenting and egalitarian traditions. As a young man, Paine worked as an artisan, a privateer, a preacher, and an excise officer. He also developed an interest in politics and science. However, dogged by personal tragedy and business failures, he emigrated to America in 1774.

Settling in Philadelphia, Paine was soon engaged as editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine. This brought him to the attention of several of the leading radicals of the Continental Congress who persuaded him to write on the question of American independence. In January 1776, Paine published Common Sense, in which he called upon Americans to make their rebellion into a revolution entailing not just a break with Britain but a struggle against the tyranny of hereditary privilege and for a democratic republic. He wrote clearly and directly, speaking not only to colonial elites but just as much to farmers and the (white) working classes, especially artisans and mechanics. Common Sense sold almost 150,000 copies (for which Paine refused any royalties).

During the ensuing years, Paine served in a variety of capacities. However, his major contribution was a series of pamphlets collectively known as The American Crisis (1776–1783). Intended to rally and maintain Americans' commitment to the Revolution, the very first paper commenced with words which continue to resonate: "These are the times that try men's souls. . . ."

Following the revolutionary years Paine continued to write. But increasingly he applied himself to scientific and technical matters, which instigated a return to Europe. Yet he was soon involved again in radical politics. In response to Edmund Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790), he authored The Rights of Man (1791–1792), in which he defended the right of all peoples in every generation to reconstruct their polities in favor of liberty, equality, and democracy.

Prosecuted by English authorities, Paine took refuge in France, where he was elected to the National Convention but was later jailed for opposing the execution of the king. While imprisoned he wrote The Age of Reason (1794), a radical critique of organized religion (with Christianity the principal target) that was to serve as a primer for nineteenth-century free-thinkers, and, after his release, Agrarian Justice (1795), wherein he laid the groundwork for a social-democratic vision of the welfare state.

In 1802 Paine returned to America, where he was all but ignored for his denunciation of organized religion. On his death he was buried on his farm north of New York, but a decade later the English radical William Cobbett arranged for his remains to be returned to England. His coffin was lost en route.

FURTHER READING

Foner, Eric. Tom Paine and Revolutionary America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Hawke, David Freeman. Paine. New York: Harper and Row, 1974.

Keane, John. Tom Paine: A Political Life. Boston: Little, Brown, 1995.

Foot, Michael, and Isaac Kramnick, eds. The Thomas Paine Reader. New York: Viking Penguin, 1987.

—HARVEY J. KAYE

PARKER, DOROTHY (1898–1967). For all of her adult life, Dorothy Parker was involved with leftist political causes, ranging from antiracism to antifascism to the struggle against the Cold War assault on civil liberties. Her efforts in the 1920s, when she was at the outset of her creative life, focused on political prisoners. In 1927 she was arrested in Boston for leading a protest march against the impending execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. She spent the twelve days before the execution raising money for a full-page appeal in the New York Times. Years later, while in Europe, she devoted energies to support for the imprisoned Tom Mooney and the defense of the Scottsboro defendants.

A highly skilled reviewer, short story writer, and essayist, Parker moved to Hollywood in 1933 to collaborate with her new husband, screenwriter Alan Campbell. Although they earned fifteen screen credits, including an Academy Award, she found the work pretentious. Parker began to devote increasing energy to the Hollywood Anti-Nazi League and the Screen Writers Guild, prompting Samuel Goldwyn to refuse to renew her contract. After traveling to Spain, she wrote an essay for the New Masses and wrote several short stories about Spain. She also chaired the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee. With Helen Keller and Carl Sandburg, she organized the project Rescue Ship to transport Loyalist veterans held in French detention camps to asylum in Mexico. She also headed the Spanish Children's Relief.

Divorced in 1945, unsuccessful in an adaptation of several Broadway plays, and drinking heavily, she roused herself to fearlessly support victims of the blacklist. At dinners and rallies for organizations such as the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, the Jefferson School, and the Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, she was always a feature attraction. Remarried to Alan Campbell in 1956 but still blacklisted, she returned to Hollywood to work on a Marilyn Monroe project that failed to materialize. She lived in difficult economic circumstances until a fatal heart attack in 1967. In her will, Dorothy Parker left her small estate and her copyrights to Martin Luther King, Jr.

—ANNETTE T. RUBINSTEIN

PARLOR SOCIALISTS. From about 1905 until the start of World War I, the press and public labeled as "parlor socialists" young men with old money who supported the ending of capitalism and creation of a collectivist society. After graduating college, these individuals gravitated to social settlement houses in the New York and Chicago slums, voted for municipal ownership, and became inspired by revolutionaries in Russia, Fabian Socialists in Great Britain, and Eugene Debs in the United States. By 1906 a number of these young reformers joined the five-year-old Socialist Party and several of them with the most visible wealth were dubbed "millionaire socialists."

New York City's Greenwich Village became their playground. Some set up cooperative living quarters at the "A Club" at 3 Fifth Avenue just off Washington Square. They met at the "X-Club" to discuss socialism with muckrakers, novelists, university professors, and assorted reformers. Some helped create and finance the Intercollegiate Socialist Society to "awaken an interest in Socialism among the educated men and women of the country." Many were midwives to the birth of the Rand School of Social Science.

The parlor socialists were a politically heterogeneous group. While William La Monte and English Walling supported syndicalism, Robert Hunter, A. M. Simons, and John Spargo advocated a labor party. Leroy Scott and Ernest Poole spoke mainly through their proletarian novels. Some never officially joined the Socialist Party, or like Joseph Patterson of Chicago, retained membership only briefly. But by 1910, the group had become so newsworthy that former president Theodore Roosevelt thundered in Outlook magazine: "parlor socialists and the like . . . deserve scant consideration at the hands of honest and clean-living men and women."

After 1910, Walling, Hunter, Spargo, Simons, La Monte, Scott, Poole, J. G. Phelps Stokes, Howard Brubaker, Robert Brueres, and others withdrew from active participation in the Socialist Party. A new generation, exposed to the Intercollegiate Socialist Society on college campuses, gravitated to Greenwich Village. Joining with the Industrial Workers of the World, these newcomers, most notably Harvard-educated John Reed, in 1913 staged a pageant at Madison Square Garden depicting the Paterson, New Jersey, silk workers' strike. Mabel Dodge's parlor at 23 Fifth Avenue became the new center for sociable socialists, Wobblies, and others. Max Eastman revamped the Masses magazine, which acted as a mouthpiece for the artistic Left. The reorganized and relocated Liberal Club offered another outpost for unorthodox ideas. More eclectic radicals than party loyalists, few of the new generation became active in the Socialist Party, but all had unconventional beliefs and lifestyles that the public branded as parlor socialist.

The European war and the Bolshevik Revolution changed everything. Many of the parlor socialists who had been inactive since 1910 created the Social Democratic League, which supported the war and opposed the Socialist Party's pacifist stance. Reed, Eastman, and others who opposed the war became targets of the government's attempt to silence dissent. The Greenwich Village playgrounds and parlors closed, casualties of the political wartime turn to the right and the different social agenda of postwar New York City's bohemia.

FURTHER READING

- Jones, Ellis O. "The Parlor Socialists." International Socialist Review 8 (October 1908).
 Reynolds, Robert D., Jr. "The Millionaire Socialists: J. G. Phelps Stokes and His Circle of Friends." Ph.D. diss., University of South Carolina, 1974.

—ROBERT D. REYNOLDS, JR.

PARSONS, ALBERT (1848–1887). Born in Alabama and orphaned as a youth, Albert Parsons went from fighting in the Confederate army to dying on the scaffold as America's leading native-born revolutionary labor leader. He apprenticed as a printer to his brother, who was working in Texas, and followed him into service as a Rebel soldier during the Civil War.

After the war, Parsons was thoroughly radicalized by racial and class conflict, by vigilante violence and state terror. A Radical Republican in Reconstruction Texas, Parsons edited the Waco Spectator and fought for black civil rights. He later described the radical movement as a "labor party" for blacks in the state. Parsons, who took a bullet in the leg from white racists for his radical activism, married Lucy Gathings, a woman of black, Indian, and Mexican ancestry, in about 1872. The couple moved to Chicago in late 1873.

In Chicago, Parsons worked as a printer before being blacklisted for his leading role in the 1877 mass strike in the city—a strike whose bloody suppression profoundly influenced him. He was a leading member of the Knights of Labor, Typographical Union No. 16, the Council Trades and Labor Unions, and the Socialist Labor Party in the late 1870s and early 1880s, and he lobbied for the National Eight-Hour Association in Washington, D.C. When Parsons joined the International Working People's Association (IWPA) in 1883, he had already drawn conclusions as to the difficulties associated with electoral politics and the dangers of state-sponsored and employer-initiated violence against the labor movement. In the IWPA he more systematically preached anarchism and self-defense but he never lost his emphasis on trade unionism as the basis for a new society.

[See also Anarchism; Black International; Haymarket Incident; Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Avrich, Paul. The Haymarket Tragedy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.
 Parsons, Albert R. The Life of Albert R. Parsons. Chicago: Lucy E. Parsons, 1889.
 Roediger, David, and Franklin Rosemont, eds. Haymarket Scrapbook. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1986.

—DAVID ROEDIGER

PARSONS, LUCY (1853–1942). A woman of color and a working-class revolutionary, Lucy Parsons spent her life struggling for the rights of the poor, unemployed, homeless, women, children, and minority groups, and for a future society based on free association of labor organizations. Born in Texas, possibly a slave, she met Albert Richard Parsons, a militant advocate of the rights of freed people, around 1870, and they moved to Chicago in 1873. In 1877 Albert was blacklisted from the printing trade, and Lucy assumed household financial responsibility by opening a dress shop. She began writing about tramps, disabled veterans of the Civil War, and working women for the Socialist in 1878. She soon gave birth to two children.

She joined the anarchistic International Working People's Association (IWPA) in 1883 and the Knights of Labor the following year. In 1884 the IWPA began to publish the weekly Alarm in Chicago, with Albert as editor and Lucy a frequent contributor. Her most famous piece was "To Tramps," which advocated propaganda "by the deed" against the rich. On 28 April 1885, she and Lizzie Holmes headed the anarchists' march on the new Board of Trade; on Thanksgiving of that year, Lucy Parsons led the poor people's march down Prairie Avenue, ringing the bells at the homes of the rich.

With other anarchists, she began organizing for the 1 May 1886 general strike for the eight-hour day, concentrating her efforts on sewing women. On 1 May, she and Albert led eighty thousand workers and supporters up Michigan Avenue. Three days later a labor rally at Haymarket Square was the occasion of a fatal bombing incident. Police charged that radical activists were responsible.

As her comrades were rounded up after the 4 May bombing, Lucy began organizing the Haymarket defense. After eight defendants, including Albert, were found guilty of murder, she traveled to many states, pleading her comrades' innocence to the charges, but defending their revolutionary goals. By February 1887, she had given forty-three speeches in seventeen states. When Albert was executed in November of that year, Lucy became a widow with a cause to carry on.

Publisher of the short-lived paper Freedom (1892), which attacked the racist lynchings and peonage of blacks, and a member of Eugene Debs's Social Democracy, she was also a founding member of the Industrial Workers of the World and publisher of the Liberator (1905–1906), to which she contributed a series on famous women. In her role as traveling orator, Parsons reemerged in public notoriety in a 1914 San Francisco demonstration of the homeless and at the head of a 1915 demonstration of the Chicago unemployed and homeless (Jane Addams paid her bail). She took up the cause of Tom Mooney and other imprisoned activists and in 1927 was elected to the national executive committee of the International Labor Defense, a Communist Party front dedicated to defending political prisoners. After years of association with the Communist Party, she joined in 1939. In 1941, in one of her last public appearances, she addressed strikers at International Harvester, formerly McCormick Reaper, where the events leading up to Haymarket had begun. Lucy Parsons died in a fire in her home on 7 March 1942; her personal papers and books were seized by authorities from her gutted home.

FURTHER READING

Ashbaugh, Carolyn. Lucy Parsons: American Revolutionary. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1976.

—CAROLYN ASHBAUGH

PARTICIPATORY DEMOCRACY. The phrase participatory democracy first gained currency—as an ideal, and as a rallying slogan of the Left—in the 1960s. Throughout the decade, the term was widely used in the United States by partisans of the New Left, both to suggest the kind of good society they wished ultimately to create, and the political means they deemed appropriate for working toward that end. Although participatory democracy was the property of no single party, it was perhaps most closely identified with Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). It was SDS, in its Port Huron Statement of 1962, that first proposed participatory democracy as the focus of a distinctively new, and distinctively American, Left: "We seek the establishment of a democracy of individual participation, governed by two central aims: that the individual share in those social decisions determining the quality and direction of his life; that Society be organized to encourage independence in men and provide the media for their common participation."

The chief architect of the Port Huron Statement, Tom Hayden, borrowed the phrase itself from his teacher and mentor at the University of Michigan, Arnold Kaufman. In his 1960 essay "Participatory Democracy and Human Nature," Kaufman had argued that active participation in a democracy—in contrast to mere voting—was justified by the way in which it developed the "human powers of thought, feeling, and action." Like such predecessors as John Dewey and Alexis de Tocqueville, Kaufman believed that it was active participation, above all, that enabled citizens to use properly their political rights, including the right to vote.

Although Kaufman was present at the Port Huron conference in 1962—and although Tom Hayden shared Kaufman's faith in the moral and educational benefits of political action—participatory democracy quickly assumed a life of its own as a catchword of the New Left. For some, the phrase was a way of circumventing the tacit American taboo against frankly advocating socialism; assuming that true democracy was incompatible with capitalism, they tended to interpret participatory democracy above all as an implicit call for workers' control of industry.

Soon enough, yet another sense of participatory democracy took hold. By 1964, some within SDS, in an effort to probe the limits in practice of their democratic ideal, began to experiment among themselves with rule-by-consensus, using techniques learned from pacifist activists and religious groups like the Quakers. A growing number of young radicals, stressing face-to-face interaction and sincere mutual counsel, understood participatory democracy to be incompatible not only with capitalism, but also within conventional electioneering: representative democracy was increasingly regarded as a manipulative and hypocritical sham.

For several years, the New Left's experiments in democracy attracted thousands of converts. At the same time, this surge of democratic idealism created an organizational conundrum for SDS that first became acute in 1965, and went unresolved for the rest of the organization's life. By 1965, student sentiment against the war in Vietnam had begun to crystallize; after organizing the first major demonstration against the war in Washington, D.C., in April 1965, SDS, virtually overnight, became an influential national group with a mass constituency. Unfortunately, it was unclear how rule-by-consensus—and the dissolution of representative institutions—could be reconciled with leadership of the burgeoning anti-war movement, which seemed to cry out for some kind of disciplined, accountable, traditionally structured mass organization. Debate raged in SDS over whether and how the organization might avoid becoming another illustration of sociologist Robert Michels' famous "iron law of oligarchy." Was participatory democracy compatible with voting and the maintenance of representative institutions? Or did it require abolishing such institutions and relying instead on the exemplary élan of collective direct action and the endless meetings that were the embodiment of rule-by-consensus?

These and a host of similar questions were never adequately resolved by SDS or, for that matter, by the New Left as a whole. The resulting confusion was one, though by no means the most important, reason that the movement, large and powerful though it had briefly been, collapsed with such surprising abruptness in the early 1970s.

In the years since, some veterans have come to regard the failed democratic experiments of the 1960s with romantic nostalgia. Other have dug in for the unglamorous work of creating politically effective citizen-action groups at the grass roots, patiently working with poor and middle-class constituents, and addressing a variety of interests, from women's rights to the quality of the environment. Meanwhile, intellectuals, usually writing for readers in the universities, have debated the institutional devices that might make something like participatory democracy into a cogent political goal in a modern industrial state. These debates, and the citizen-action groups that made them seem of practical moment, constituted one of the chief legacies of the New Left—and one of the few systematic alternatives to the oligarchical trends in American political life made apparent in the Watergate and Iran-contra scandals.

[See also New Left; Students for a Democratic Society.]

FURTHER READING

- Benello, C. George, and Dimitrios Roussopoulos, eds. The Case for Participatory Democracy. New York: Grossman, 1972.
- Kaufman, Arnold. "Participatory Democracy and Human Nature." In Nomos III: Responsibility, edited by Carl J. Friedrich. New York: Liberal Arts Press, 1960.
- Mansbridge, Jane. Beyond Adversary Democracy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.
- Miller, James. Democracy Is in the Streets: From Port Huron to the Siege of Chicago. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

—JAMES MILLER

PARTISAN REVIEW. Born in the world of thirties radicalism, the Partisan Review (PR) began in 1934 under the sponsorship of the New York John Reed

Club, one of the Left literary groups organized to foster the work of proletarian writers—those aiming to combine literary imagination and class-consciousness. Founded by two young radical critics—Philip Rahv and William Phillips—PR announced that it would “concentrate on creative and critical literature, but . . . shall maintain a definite viewpoint—that of the revolutionary working class. . . . The defense of the Soviet Union is one of our principal tasks.” While PR continued to trumpet the potential and the successes of proletarian art, the editors began to harbor doubts about the quality of much proletarian literature and, especially, the role of intellectuals and critics within the radical-art movement. In 1936 they suspended publication of the magazine.

The “new” PR reappeared in 1937, with four additional editors—F. W. Dupee, Dwight Macdonald, George L. K. Morris, and Mary McCarthy—and a new independent editorial position. The period between its rebirth and Pearl Harbor remains the magazine’s most fruitful as a Left journal. Splits in the Left created an intellectual vacuum that PR occupied. A great number of important nonaligned leftist writers came to the magazine, including Edmund Wilson, Wallace Stevens, Lionel Trilling, Sidney Hook, and James T. Farrell. In addition, promising writers debuted there: Delmore Schwartz, Saul Bellow, John Berryman, and Elizabeth Bishop among them.

PR also sought to revive the literary reputations of modernist writers, bringing them into a new conception of radical art, a “revolutionary modernism.” A radical “sensibility” was just as important as explicit political consciousness. Rahv found that while “reactionary in its abstract content,” Dostoyevsky’s work was nonetheless “radical in sensibility and subversive in performance.” For art critic Clement Greenberg, the avant-garde became a driving radical force in the contemporary world. Middlebrow culture, including proletarian literature, helped perpetuate capitalism. The avant-garde could move the world toward socialism.

This new cultural position corrected the perceived faulty relationship between writer and critic within proletarian art. The critic was now the essential analyst for sifting through literary works and identifying the radicalizing insights of numerous writers—alive and dead, radical and conservative; Kafka and Eliot, as well as Dreiser and Malraux.

PR stayed out of the Popular Front and was aligned with, but never formally allied to, the Trotskyists. When the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939 destroyed the Popular Front, the editors reiterated their position of supporting a “third force,” radical and uncompromised. In 1941 Macdonald and Greenberg published an essay disassociating themselves from American war efforts, seeing them ending with capitalism strengthened. Rahv, however, attacked this “morally absolutist” position and, revising his earlier thinking, called for support of American actions.

The war debate split the PR editorial board, leading to Macdonald’s resignation. By 1945, new intellectual concerns moved the magazine and its contributors: a renewed focus on American culture; newly emerging considerations of Freud, Sartre, and Jewish culture; and the emergence of a liberal anti-communist position to replace the radical anti-Stalinist arguments of the later 1930s. New editors, including Schwartz and William Barrett, joined as well.

During the 1950s, PR became one of the leading journals of postwar culture. The famous symposium “Our Country and Our Culture” demonstrated a new harmonious relationship between American society and the once-radical, now liberal intellectuals. Phillips served on the board of the anticommunist American Committee for Cultural Freedom.

In the 1960s, PR moved to Rutgers University. Rahv, in Boston, grew increasingly alienated from PR. While Phillips exhibited interest in the counterculture, Rahv disdained it. He resigned in 1969. Staying as editor, Phillips oversaw the magazine’s transfer to Boston University in the 1970s and its move back to the political center and, in recent times, toward neo-conservatism.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Dissent; Farrell, James T.; Hook, Sidney; Howe, Irving; John Reed Clubs; Schapiro, Meyer.]

FURTHER READING

- Bloom, Alexander. Prodigal Sons: The New York Intellectuals and Their World. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Cooney, Terry A. The Rise of the New York Intellectuals: Partisan Review and Its Circle. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1986.
- Gilbert, James B. Writers and Partisans: A History of Literary Radicalism in America. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1969.
- Phillips, William. A Partisan View: Five Decades of the Literary Life. New York: Stein and Day, 1983.
- Wald, Alan M. The New York Intellectuals: The Rise and Decline of the Anti-Stalinist Left from the 1930s to the 1980s. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

—ALEXANDER BLOOM

PARTY ORGANIZER. Very much like its Socialist Party predecessor, the Party Builder (1911–1914), the Communist Party Organizer was intended not as a general-circulation tabloid but rather a nuts-and-bolts organizing bulletin for the dedicated activist. Like the Party Builder, it frequently found itself in the conceptual trap of exhortation and confidence-building to the detriment of realistic tactical appraisal and useful lines of action. Relative to the rhetorical level of the public Communist press, on the other hand, the Party Organizer remained sober and thoughtful.

Published from 1927, the Party Organizer aimed its efforts at the efficiency of organization. Instructions on the ways and means of holding meetings, getting out pertinent leaflets, starting local grievance-oriented labor groups, and above all raising money and selling Party literature, could all be found in abundance. Not even from these straightforward aims, however, could inner Party conflicts be entirely excluded: one chief goal in further integrating the activists into the movement was to lessen the influence of the officially dissolved (but informally still influential) foreign-language groups. But in the Party Organizer, one also found collective self-criticisms unthinkable for public consumption.

By the early 1930s, such emphases as work in small industrial towns, and among blacks, suggested the diaspora of especially young Party activists from the ethnic city neighborhoods to the outlands and even physically dangerous districts. Soon after, the general shift of the Communist Party into the industrial union movement reemphasized a basic tension in the paper and in the organization: how to maintain a parity of movement building and party building. Clearly, by the later 1930s, the former had been achieved at the expense of the latter, and local contributors understandably bewailed the lag in Daily Worker or Party-pamphlet distribution even at times of high industrial mobilization. The compromise formula arrived at, to emphasize both simultaneously (mass work for the masses, and selective literature and recruitment for the promising minority), exhausted activists and actually propelled many union officeholders away from Party meetings that took up too much of their precious organizing (or rest) time. The fluctuation of Party membership, a subject of continual scrutiny (but not successful resolution of the problems), weighed heavily even as membership grew toward its peacetime peak of sixty-five thousand. For a nation with a working class the size of America's, this seemed undeniably small.

The dissolution of the Party Organizer in 1937, sometimes later regretted by Party veterans, followed the logic of the Popular Front. The Party fractions within unions had competed with the larger Left blocs controlled by progressive union leaders themselves, and had become the source of complaint from some of the Party's most prestigious allies. On the other hand, without the fractions and the Party Organizer, the Communists had nowhere to retreat beyond the decline and ultimate collapse of its public labor and political leadership. As the Party ceased to be the Bolshevik organization of old, it lost the need for the Party Organizer, but never found an adequate substitute.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Daily Worker.]

FURTHER READING

Alperin, Robert Jay. "Organization in the Communist Party, USA, 1931–1938." Ph.D. diss., Northwestern University, 1959.

—PAUL BUHLE

PASSAIC TEXTILE STRIKE OF 1926. Begun in January 1926 against a ten-percent wage cut at the Botany Company, the Passaic, New Jersey, textile strike lasted for an entire year and tied up all six of the woolen and worsted mills and a number of other textile mills in the area. At its peak, more than twenty thousand workers were involved in this momentous action, during which mass picketing was used so extensively and so effectively that the Forstmann and Huffman Company, which had not slashed wages, was forced to close down.

Though Passaic's work force was primarily composed of Slavic workers, a group of Hungarian employees at the Botany mill sparked the walkout and supplied much of the internal leadership. Most notably, the Passaic strike became the first mass walkout in the United States to be led by the Communist Party. Since the strike came at a time when the Party (over the objections of dissidents) still hoped to work within the American Federation of Labor (AFL), strikers joined a United Front Committee, which disclaimed any intention of being a dual union. Albert Weisbord, a Party member who had only recently graduated from Harvard Law School, directed the strike and earned tremendous admiration from textile workers who dubbed him "Jecusko," meaning "Little Jesus."

Linocut by Ned Hilton, c. 1935.

As in the Sacco and Vanzetti defense effort, liberals and radicals cooperated in giving support to the Passaic strikers. Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Rabbi Stephen Wise, Norman Thomas, Mother Bloor, and many others spoke in Passaic; unions such as the Amalgamated Clothing Workers and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers made contributions; Representative Victor Berger and Senator Robert La Follette, Jr., called for congressional investigations; and the American Civil Liberties Union provided legal defense. The strike received national publicity and the various Passaic Relief Committees raised over $500,000. In Passaic itself, the Communist Party took the lead. Party members organized the numerous mass demonstrations, arranged legal and medical help for those who suffered arrests and beatings, held special meetings for women workers, published a weekly newspaper, and produced a motion picture about the strike.

Weisbord hoped to spread the strike to the neighboring city of Paterson and to Lawrence, Massachusetts, but he failed to accomplish this goal. Despite this disappointment, strikers remained firm through the summer. At this point, the Communist Party, uncertain about how to handle the Passaic situation, decided to hand the strike over to an AFL union, the United Textile Workers (UTW). The UTW assumed direction of the work stoppage on the condition that Weisbord be removed from the leadership. After the UTW took over in September 1926, relief funds dried up and the strikers' morale began to drop. Nevertheless, the strike dragged on until the UTW negotiated separate settlements between November 1926 and February 1927. Though the strikers had succeeded in stopping the cuts, they failed to gain union recognition, which had been their primary goal. Tensions between the UTW and Passaic workers persisted until 1928, when the UTW expelled the Passaic local for having supported the Communist-led New Bedford, Massachusetts, textile strike of that year.

Coming in the midst of "Coolidge prosperity," the Passaic textile strike revived the Left's hopes that a militant labor movement could once again emerge. From the Communist Party's perspective, the strike showed the folly of trying to reform the AFL and gave ammunition to those who favored a dual union strategy. In this sense, the strike served as a preview of other textile battles in New England and in the South between 1928 and 1932.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Textile Workers Unions; Trade Union Unity League.]

FURTHER READING

- Goldberg, David J. A Tale of Three Cities: Labor Protest and Organization in Paterson, Passaic, and Lawrence, 1916–1921. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1989.
- Murphy, Paul L., ed. The Passaic Textile Strike of 1926. Belmont Calif.: Wadsworth, 1974.
- Siegel, Morton. "The Passaic Textile Strike of 1926." Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 1952.
- Weisbord, Albert. Passaic Reviewed. San Francisco: Germinal Press, 1976.
- Weisbord, Vera Buch. A Radical Life. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1977.

—DAVID J. GOLDBERG

PATERSON, NEW JERSEY, ANARCHISM.

On 15 July 1895, an Italian-language anarchist newspaper, La Questione Sociale, was launched in Paterson, New Jersey. Sponsored by an affinity group called the Right to Existence, it found its readers and constituents largely among skilled silk weavers and dyers brought to the Paterson mills as cheap labor. While anarchists (many of German and French-Canadian origin) were active in the "Silk City" before 1895—in particular in the strike of 1894—it was the Italian group whose activities inaugurated the period of greatest anarchist influence in Paterson.

The influence of Errico Malatesta, the distinguished protégé of Mikhail Bakunin, was decisive in the formation of the paper. He had previously founded two other papers of the same name, in Florence (1883–1884) and Buenos Aires (1885).

In 1895, exiled by governmental responses to the attentats of individualist anarchists (like Sante Caserio's assassination of French president Carnot), a small group of anarchist émigrés met in London, among them Malatesta and his friend Pietro Gori—a twenty-nine-year-old lawyer, playwright, poet, and orator who had achieved distinction in the legal defense of anarchists in Italy.

At this time, Francesco Saverio Merlino, editor of Il Grido degli Oppressi, published from Bleeker Street, Manhattan, invited Gori to New York on a speaking tour. Malatesta urged him to accept. Once there, Merlino, Gori, and Pedro Esteve—the Catalan anarchist printer, intellectual, and friend of Malatesta from the days of the Barcelona uprising of 1892—resolved to launch the Paterson paper. Esteve, who combined editorial skill with technical ability, provided important supportive links to other ethnic communities, like the Yiddish—through Emma Goldman.

Gori's speaking tour to Italian communities ranging from Barre, Vermont, to San Francisco, and the articles he contributed to the new journal as editor in chief, along with the managing editorship of Esteve, put La Questione Sociale on a sound basis with a circulation of about three thousand by 1896. Max Nettlau, writing in 1924, ranked it, along with L'Anarchie of Paris and Freedom of London, as among the seventeen most influential anarchist newspapers in the world by 1900.

The Right to Existence group in Paterson was composed of approximately a hundred anarchists, who were predominantly of the Bakuninist-Malatesta "communal anarchist" tradition. Rejecting the authoritarianism of government and the state, they nevertheless accepted the possibility of communal organization on a voluntary, consensual basis if organized "from the ground up." They were called the "organizzatori" as opposed to anarchists of the extreme "Max Stirner" type who were termed "antiorganizzatori."

As organizzatori, they worked actively to foster a class-conscious worker's union movement in Paterson whose aims would ultimately be revolutionary. One of their leaders was Antonio Guabello, who led a successful strike of the Industrial Workers of the World against the Victoria Silk Mill in 1905. Ernestina Cravella, a bilingual worker in the Paragon Mill, served as their spokesperson to the English-speaking press. A multilingual Tyrolean, Francis Widmar, served as the group's business manager and fundraiser.

In contrast to the situation with local socialist organizations, women like Cravella played an active role in the leadership of the group. Esteve's companion, Maria Roda, for example, a friend of Emma Goldman and a feminist, was effective in fostering propaganda groups among millworkers—many of whom were women—as early as 1897. She linked these efforts with those of Louise Reville in Paris (1900), who formed an international group around the periodical Feminist Action.

The group's educational efforts included public meetings featuring such speakers as John Turner of Britain, Johann Most, Emma Goldman, and Peter Kropotkin himself (17 November 1897). Writers like Kropotkin and Elisé Reclus contributed articles. The group founded a press that published Italian-language editions of anarchist classics—along with original work by Malatesta and other distinguished Italians.

All of this was thrown into turmoil by the events that occurred after Gori's resignation due to illness in 1896. The successor chosen in 1898 to succeed him as editor in chief was Guiseppe Ciancabilla, a twenty-eight-year-old writer of brilliance who had personally been recruited to anarchism by Malatesta in Ancona, Italy. But Malatesta—by 1898 imprisoned on the island of Lampedusa—and the group did not realize that Ciancabilla, while in Parisian exile, had gravitated to an extreme individualist position—assuming the nom de plume of "Atomo."

As editor, he found himself diametrically opposed to the group and to the dismayed Esteve. An ideological war filled the pages of La Questione Sociale through the summer of 1899. Control was dramatically recaptured by the group, however, when Malatesta effected a daring escape from Lampedusa on 9 May 1899 and appeared in Paterson to confront Ciancabilla personally. Ousted from the editorship, Ciancabilla moved his office to West Hoboken (now Union City), where he gathered his supporters and started to publish L'Aurora, an individualist paper. One of these supporters was Gaetano Bresci, weaver in Paterson, but resident in West Hoboken. Bresci was to travel back to Italy in 1900 where, on 29 July, he would assassinate King Umberto.

By that time, Malatesta had returned to Europe, having placed the paper in the hands of Esteve. When the storm of reprisals broke on anarchists everywhere in the aftermath, the Right to Existence group, as the most articulate, visible, and well-established organization in the region, bore the brunt of hostile Establishment action. Ciancabilla moved west, where he died as the editor of the individualist newspaper La Protesta Humana, on 11 September 1904, at age thirty-three.

Weathering the storm, the group resolved to emphasize American workers' issues, giving less coverage to events in Europe. A disastrous winter in 1901–1902, in which fire and flood contributed to destitution in the millworkers' neighborhoods, led to mill closings and layoffs at the very time that living conditions became most desperate. The silk-dyers' strike of 1902 was the result, with the group deeply involved with the Italian workers.

Meanwhile Luigi Galleani had been recruited as editor in chief of La Questione Sociale. A Genoese lawyer, forty-one, recently escaped from the penal island of Pantelleria, he spoke French and Italian with equal fluency. And the strike committee had to organize itself by language: Italian, German, Dutch, French, and English being widely spoken by the strikers. Anarchists were strongest among the Italian- and German-speaking groups.

As the strike dragged on from April to July of 1902, the moderate leadership of Paul Breen and James McGrath of the American Federation of Labor failed to cope effectively with management's strategy of subcontracting dyeing operations to nonstriking mills in Pennsylvania. The Paterson weavers failed to join the strike. These factors proved fatal. The dyers were ready to grasp at straws by mid-June.

It was at this point that Galleani combined forces with two anarchist colleagues who came upon the strike-ridden Paterson scene: Rudolph Grossman, an Austrian, and William McQueen, a Scotch disciple of William Morris. The three—covering the languages spoken by the strikers—addressed a meeting of eight thousand on 17 June. The subject: an exhortation to promote a general strike.

The speeches were fiery—especially Galleani's—and the frustrated and anguished strikers burst out of the meeting, violently damaging mill property. People were injured by pistol and shotgun fire—including Galleani. Martial law was declared in the city from 21 June to 2 July. The strike was smashed, the union fragmented. First Galleani, then Grossman fled to avoid prosecution. McQueen remained to face charges of inciting to riot. Convicted, he languished in prison until 1907 when, pardoned over Theodore Roosevelt's objections, he returned to England, health shattered, to die in 1909.

It took Esteve three years to restore the paper to solvency after the 1902 fiasco. Finally, it went under for the last time in March 1908—a victim of the anti-"red" campaign of that year. President Roosevelt and reform Republican mayor McBride cooperated to remove the paper's mailing privileges—under obscenity statutes!

The high-water mark of anarchism in the city had passed. By the time of the Great Silk Strike of 1913—the apogee of the Industrial Workers of the World—the socialist movement was in the ascendancy, and had absorbed many of the erstwhile members of the Right to Existence group.

[See also Anarchism; Galleani, Luigi; Italian Americans; Paterson Strike of 1913; Textile Workers Unions.]

FURTHER READING

Carey, George W. "The Vessel, the Deed and the Idea: Anarchists in Paterson, 1895–1908." Antipode 10–11 (1979).

—GEORGE W. CAREY

PATERSON STRIKE OF 1913. A major struggle in the history of the American Left occurred when twenty-five thousand striking silk workers shut down the three hundred silk mills and dye houses in Paterson, New Jersey, for almost five months of 1913. From the beginning, the strikers focused on issues of workers' control. During the strike, they successfully overcame differences of nationality, craft, and gender; their democratic self-organization served as a school in self-management.

Unlike most textile strikes, including the 1912 strike in Lawrence, Massachusetts, the Paterson strike did not begin as a defensive battle against a wage cut. The broad-silk weavers called the strike on 25 February as a way of blocking an increase in loom assignments from two to four. As skilled workers, broad-silk weavers had fought since the 1880s for control over the rate of production. Responding to their strike call, the ribbon weavers and unskilled dyers' helpers joined the 1913 strike, making it the biggest in Paterson history.

Strike poster, 1913.

TURNING ON THE LIGHT IN PATERSON

Many of the silk workers had brought militant traditions of struggle with them from European textile centers; in Paterson they had welded their traditions together. The Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) organizers whom they invited to help them in 1913—Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Carlo Tresca, and Bill Haywood—added some traditions of their own. Flynn held successful weekly meetings for women only. With IWW encouragement, Italian and Jewish women like Carrie Golzio and Hannah Silverman joined the traditional local leadership of male weavers (Adolph Lessig, Louis Magnet, Evald Koettgen). IWW organizers stressed that the active role played by rank-and-file silk strikers in the management of their strike was training for the democratic management of industry and society. This revolutionary vision of workers' control reached its fullest expression in the "Pageant of the Paterson Strike" performed by over a thousand workers in Madison Square Garden on 7 June. The event was conceived by John Reed and supported by the IWW, the Socialist Party, Greenwich Village intellectuals, and a social circle associated with heiress Mabel Dodge.

Despite the pageant, the strikers were eventually defeated. Although they had shut down Paterson, beaten off an attempt by the American Federation of Labor to undercut the strike, and nonviolently overcome a police offensive against them, they had been unable to extend the strike to annexes of the Paterson mills in Pennsylvania. Paterson manufacturers, victorious but frightened, held back the four-loom system for another decade. Strike supporters were torn apart as a result of the defeat, and the IWW never recovered in the East. Historical interpretations have been dominated by Flynn's version, which blamed the defeat on the Socialists, the Villagers, the ribbon weavers, the pageant, and (in effect) Haywood. The creative implications of the Paterson strike, for the Left, remain largely unexplored.

[See also Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley; Industrial Workers of the World; Italian Americans; Masses; Reed, John; Socialist Party; Tresca, Carlo.]

FURTHER READING

- Golin, Steve. The Fragile Bridge: Paterson Silk Strike, 1913. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1988.
- Kornbluh, Joyce L., ed. Rebel Voices: An I.W.W. Anthology. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1964.
- Scranton, Philip B., ed. Silk City: Studies on the Paterson Silk Industry, 1860–1940. Newark: New Jersey Historical Society, 1985.
- Tripp, Anne Huber. The I.W.W. and the Paterson Silk Strike of 1913. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

—STEVE GOLIN

PATTERSON, LOUISE THOMPSON (b. 1901).

As an educator, supporter of black culture, early civil rights activist in Harlem, and member of the Communist Party, Louise Thompson created an indispensable bridge between black artists and Popular Front cultural politics. Born in Chicago but raised in several predominantly white, often racist communities in the West, she settled with her family in Oakland, California, in 1919. Although she earned a degree in economics from the University of California at Berkeley in 1923, racism limited her career opportunities and she eventually made her way back to the Midwest, where she briefly initiated graduate work at the University of Chicago. Giving up school, as well as a lucrative position at a black-owned Chicago firm, Thompson headed south to take a teaching job in Pine Bluff, Arkansas, in 1925, and a year later accepted a faculty position at Hampton Institute in Virginia. Because she openly supported a student strike at Hampton in 1927, the administration pressured her to resign, after which she headed to New York to accept an Urban League fellowship to study at the New York School for Social Work.

Unimpressed with social-work paternalism as a means to improve the lives of poor blacks, she discontinued her education in 1930 and turned to New York's Congregational Educational Society (CES), a liberal organization interested in the problems of race relations and labor. Simultaneously, she became a prominent figure in black cultural circles, serving as editorial secretary for Langston Hughes and Zora Neale Hurston, and offering her spacious apartment as a meeting place for black artists and intellectuals. Her involvement in social problems and cultural politics, compounded by the Depression, the Scottsboro case, and the growing strength of the Communist Party in Harlem, radicalized Thompson. She and sculptor Augusta Savage formed a left-wing social club called the Vanguard, out of which developed a branch of the Friends of the Soviet Union (FOSU). Soon thereafter Thompson attended classes at the Workers' School, moving deeper into the Party's inner circle.

As secretary of the Harlem chapter of FOSU, she became principal organizer of a group of black artists invited to the Soviet Union in 1932 to make a film about Afro-American life. Although the project was abandoned, she returned to New York with a deeper appreciation of socialism and a greater affinity for Communist politics. In 1933 she left CES and served as assistant national secretary of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, through which she was officially asked to join the Communist Party. A year later she accepted a full-time position in the International Workers Order (IWO) and continued to organize cultural and political events on behalf of the Party in Harlem and elsewhere (including Alabama, where in 1934 she spent a night in a Birmingham jail). As black artists joined the Works Progress Administration in the late 1930s, Thompson was a critical liaison linking black popular culture and Harlem's literati with Communist Popular Front politics. In 1938, for example, she and Langston Hughes organized the IWO-sponsored "Harlem Suitcase Theatre," which performed a number of works by black playwrights.

In 1940 Louise Thompson married longtime friend and veteran Party leader William L. Patterson—who more than a decade earlier had suggested she read Marx and look seriously at events in the Soviet Union. Soon afterward she joined "Pat" in Chicago and continued her work nationally and locally. Among other things, she served as national recording secretary of the IWO and helped establish a black community center on Chicago's South Side. Following World War II she was among the founders and leading activists of the Civil Rights Congress (CRC), and in the 1950s joined such luminaries as Charlotta Bass, Shirley Graham, and Alice Childress in forming the Sojourners for Truth and Justice, a black women's auxiliary of the CRC.

[See also Civil Rights Congress; Communist Party, USA; Hughes, Langston; Patterson, William L.]

FURTHER READING

Horne, Gerald. Communist Front?: The Civil Rights Congress, 1946–1956. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1988.

Naison, Mark. Communists in Harlem during the Depression. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1983.

Patterson, Louise. Interview by Ruth Prago, 16 November 1981 (transcribed). Oral History of the American Left, Tamiment Library, New York University.

Patterson, William L. The Man Who Cried Genocide: An Autobiography. New York: International Publishers, 1971.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes: I, Too, Sing America. Vol. 1, 1902–1941. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

—ROBIN D. G. KELLEY

PATTERSON, WILLIAM L. (1891–1980). One of the most prominent African-American Left leaders, William L. Patterson made his name as a legal defender of minority rights, Communist journalist, and teacher. Born in San Francisco, the son of a mother who had been born into slavery in Virginia and of a father from St. Vincent, West Indies, Patterson attended the University of California (suspended for a time for refusing participation in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps) and went on to receive a law degree from Hastings College in 1919. After an attempt to emigrate to Liberia, he moved to New York as a practicing lawyer.

Patterson first became prominent as an African American defender of Sacco and Vanzetti in the 1920s, and was arrested several times on picket lines. Soon a leader of the International Labor Defense (ILD), he abandoned his youthful conviction that the salvation of the African American people lay in returning to Africa, and joined the Communist Party in 1927.

Returning to New York City after the Sacco-Vanzetti defense work in Boston had ended, Patterson plunged into the Harlem Renaissance. Paul Robeson and Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois were among his closest associates. During this period he made the first of his many visits to the Soviet Union, where he attended the University of the Toiling People of the Far East until 1931.

Back in the United States during the 1930s, Patterson became Party organizer for Pittsburgh and Harlem, then returned to legal defense as his mainstay. As executive secretary of the ILD, he played a central role in the seventeen-year defense of the "Scottsboro Boys." By 1938 he relocated to Chicago, becoming an associate editor of the Midwest Daily Record and a party organizer for the city's heavily African-American South Side.

Patterson returned to national prominence at the end of the 1940s as national executive secretary of the Civil Rights Congress. In 1951 he led a Paris delegation to the United Nations, while Paul Robeson led a delegation in New York, to charge the U.S. government, under the 1948 United Nations resolution, with officially sanctioning genocidal treatment of African Americans. During this period, he also became a prominent advocate for the integration of a professional baseball, and met with team owners and the commissioner of baseball to urge that step. In 1958, Patterson became editor of the Sunday Worker, and remained a prolific journalist and political leader until his death.

[See also Civil Rights Congress; Communist Party, USA; International Labor Defense; Patterson, Louise Thompson; Sacco-Vanzetti Case.]

FURTHER READING

Horne, Gerald. Communist Front?: The Civil Rights Congress, 1946-1956. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1988.

"Humanity's Finest Son." Daily World, 15 March 1980.

Patterson, William L. The Man Who Cried Genocide: An Autobiography. New York: International Publishers, 1971.

—MAURICE JACKSON

PEACE MOVEMENTS. A product of U.S. radicalism long before the appearance of the modern Left, peace movements have intersected with that Left in a continually changing pattern. Sometimes, Left organizations and, especially, leading Left figures have reshaped peace efforts. Far more often, mass-based peace activities have reshaped the prospects of the Left.

Peace activities began in the early nineteenth century, an outgrowth of religious and utopian sentiments rooted in a contemporary perfectionism. During the rich social movements of the 1840s-1850s, peace figured regularly with woman's rights, abolitionism, and temperance as a subject of public discussion. The Civil War wreaked havoc upon popular faith in mediation and nonresistance, but organizations such as the American Peace Union revived afterward, and with them a respectable sentiment for benevolent internationalism.

Neither the immigrant- nor native-based Left, however, had much interaction with these movements beyond a few individuals (mostly prominent women reformers such as Frances Willard) until the U.S. imperial expansion of the 1890s. Anti-imperialism (so described for the first time) drew upon a circle of distinguished intellectuals centered in Boston, many of them likewise touched by Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward and by an imported version of British Fabian Socialism. Ernest H. Crosby (1856-1907), a Tolstoyan socialist, was the most prolific of radical agitators on war, with many essays, three volumes of poetry, and a satirical novel, Captain Jinks, Hero (1902), to his credit. His assault, in particular, upon the U.S. invasion of the Philippines and Cuba, was a literary high-point of Left anti-war (and anti-racist) sentiment for decades to come. Political socialists, for their part, were generally content to denounce the U.S. actions (a prominent section of Jewish socialists, led by Abraham Cahan, endorsed the U.S. invasion of Cuba as a return slap at the Spain of the Inquisition) as the inevitable fruit of capitalism.

"Federal Death Note" leaflet issued by anti-war protesters, 1970.

The Socialist Party raised the question of prospective world war almost to an obsessive level after 1910. Socialists intuited, correctly, that the ideological sources of their support would be corrupted by pseudo-patriotic militarization and that opponents of war would be fiercely repressed. They tapped into an indigenous isolationist sentiment and an educated pacifist constituency in putting forward arguments before and during World War I. Divided, ultimately defeated and crushed, they had by 1919 nevertheless conducted the most important radical anti-war movement until the 1960s.

To be sure, socialists were caught off guard by the endorsement of war bills by their European comrades. They had believed, naively, that socialist parliamentarians would never agree to armed conflict, and that rank-and-file socialists would not fight the wars. Still, they regained a sense of political balance by conducting vigorous propaganda against the "preparedness" craze symbolically led by former president Theodore Roosevelt. Socialists reacted as if to a dress rehearsal of world war when, confronted with the U.S. invasion of Mexico, they bitterly attacked the imperialistic motives and bloody practices of the invaders—to the chagrin of conservatives who called for their repression.

In 1916 journalist Allan Benson won the party's presidential nomination on the strength of a propagandistic anti-war series in the Appeal to Reason. Woodrow Wilson's own campaign claim, "He Kept Us Out of War," dealt Benson and the Socialist Party a severe setback. However, in March 1917 an emergency convention in Saint Louis reaffirmed absolute opposition, including "continuous, active, and public" agitation against conscription. For the first time, significant numbers of intellectuals and trade union leaders defected from the party in favor of Woodrow Wilson and Samuel Gompers. A handful of former socialists went so far as to join government propaganda agencies and semivigilante "loyalty legions." A section of the Left, particularly those drawn to the Bolshevik Revolution later that year, argued that the "Saint Louis Manifesto" was insufficiently militant, too pacifistic, or even pro-German.

As the only important social movement opposed to the war, the Socialist Party became a focus for activity. Petitions, marches, and street speaking were especially successful where socialists had long-standing political support: specific ethnic neighborhoods or districts (Scandinavian or German, Jewish, and many Eastern European) and a scattering of predominantly native-born areas with high labor or agrarian radicalism (Seattle and sections of Oklahoma). The Espionage Act of 1917 enabled the government to move against socialist publications and individuals, crippling the movement of native-born socialists too exposed and geographically dispersed to evade repression. Many immigrant socialists, on the other hand, found new support in their communities (and also new demands for specific policies suited to the national constituency's aspirations for their particular homeland).

Until riven by Communist and anticommunist factions, the party often did quite well in local elections, sometimes winning but more often raising vote totals over previous years. In New York City, Morris Hillquit ran an especially strong race for mayor on an anti-war platform. New rounds of indictments, along with the organizational schism of 1919, dashed Socialist hopes of rising to major-party status on the anti-war position.

But socialists also joined with pacifists and liberals in a number of other important peace movements. The most popular by far, the People's Council of America for Peace and Democracy formed in 1917 as a coalition of labor-farmer, Left, and pacifist forces. Among its prominent participants, Sidney Hillman and members of his fast-growing, left-leaning Amalgamated Clothing Workers offered a new chapter to what would later be called "popular front" activities. Among other groups, the Women's Peace Party (later the U.S. branch of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom), the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and the National Civil Liberties Bureau (later the American Civil Liberties Union) all had active socialists in their leaderships and ranks.

Younger pacifists, usually religiously trained intellectuals, became socialists as they engaged in militant anti-war work. Kirby Page, Devere Allen, Norman Thomas, and A. J. Muste among many others found common ground in the magazine the World Tomorrow and in conscientious objection to war. The Socialist Party supported conscientious objectors even as it paid a heavy price for resisting war-patriotism. When the party had dwindled, by the middle 1920s, to flagging support among older ethnics and college-trained intellectuals, that tradition gave it a special attraction otherwise absent. Within branches of the Young Men's Christian Association and liberal churches, the by-then widespread public disillusionment with war-making found institutional support. In the Fellowship of Reconciliation, where many of these individuals found a political home, socialist inclinations predominated, though without forcing opinions upon the liberal-religious following. The example of Mahatma Gandhi and his philosophy, popularized by the World Tomorrow, impressed many as a useful counterpart to socialism or antidote to the socialist philosophy's class-war sentiment.

The Communist Party in the period up to the middle 1930s added a note of militant anti-imperialism, a view hardly popular outside the Party's ranks but explained regularly in publications. More than the Socialists—due to particular Russian fears—Communists campaigned about the war danger in the Far East provoked by Japan's first moves against Nationalist China. Sometimes Communists, Socialists, and religious activists could join together, as in the public protest to the U.S. invasion of Nicaragua in 1926. More often, in these years, Communist sectarianism erected barriers against cooperation with such strident anti-war spokespersons as Socialist leader Norman Thomas.

During the middle to later 1930s, Communist- and Socialist-oriented student movements led massive campus demonstrations avowing nonparticipation in any future U.S. war. At some colleges and universities, such as the University of Wisconsin, administrators broadly shared student sentiments (or adroitly co-opted them), declaring "Peace Assembly" days. At others, students faced punishment and expulsion for their activities. The most formidable difficulty of the combined American Student Union was, however, internal. Communists (and many students of particular ethnic backgrounds with relatives threatened by Nazism) favored some kind of "collective security"; Socialists, with strong if short-lived support in mainstream religious institutions, leaned toward pacifism and a leftist isolationism.

The same strains limited the appeal of an otherwise exceptionally strong Communist-led group, the American League against War and Fascism, with spotty but sometimes ardent support from ethnic and religious groupings, and with a student affiliate overlapping the American Student Union. At crucial moments, such as the Italian invasion of Ethiopia or the Spanish Civil War, pacifism and principles of noninvolvement seemed to give way. The Socialist Party itself, seriously diminished by the withdrawal of older ethnic groups, exerted less political pressure as it grew more militantly opposed to war. Such important independent peace leaders as A. J. Muste, the emerging public face of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, operated almost outside the existing Left networks.

The Hitler-Stalin Pact provoked a complex division on peace issues. Among unpolitical, American-born trade unionists, instinctively isolationist, support of Communist policies probably reached an apex. Among most liberal (and especially Jewish) intellectuals, support fell drastically. Socialists, led by Norman Thomas, joined a Keep America Out of War Congress, quickly eclipsed however by the conservative-led America First Committee. Trotskyists, for the first time active in anti-war propaganda, conducted a lively campaign among blacks and workers against America's involvement.

Far more than in World War I, U.S. entry (and the German invasion of Russia) brought wholesale government repression of peace activities. Exceptions remained. While Communists in almost every case supported mobilization as a priority over labor or individual rights, the Socialist Party (like the now-small Industrial Workers of the World) supported the conscientious objectors, who individually and collectively grew more important in several prisons as military conflict wore on. The Workers Party faction of the Trotskyist movement, although primarily economic in its appeal to industrial war workers, put forward a militant refusal to accept the logic of war as defined by the major powers. An "Imperialist War fought under democratic slogans," the conflict permitted the growth of the leviathan state and the preparation for future, even worse wars—so ran the shrewd logic of this position. Toward the end of the war and shortly afterward, spokespersons for this position, such as Dwight Macdonald and his Politics magazine, appeared increasingly prominent.

Until the height of the McCarthy years, the most visible peace campaigning could be found in the Progressive Party milieu. A significant bloc of New Deal supporters at first reflected the Cold War confrontationism of the Truman administration and its international equation of "freedom" with freedom of American commerce. Many ethnics, especially Greeks, southern Slavs, and Chinese, viewed the fate of the homeland as entrusted to Communist-linked coalitions opposed to now-U.S.-backed collaborators with fascism. Henry Wallace, Franklin Roosevelt's third-term vice president, seemingly moved to the left to meet these views, and his challenge to Truman appeared to gain wide public reception. His campaign for the presidency in 1948 was waged on the issue of the Cold War, but in a political climate of increasingly successful Red Scare tactics and the removal of Communist labor leaders from the mainstream of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (or their defection to the Truman camp, with the same broad political results). What remained of the Left in 1949 hitched itself to the peace issue, carrying this perspective into the unpopular Korean War, but could not break out of Cold War isolation. At any rate, and in the face of growing revelations about Eastern Europe and Russia under Stalin's rule, "peace" lost much ground as a credible Left issue, especially among anticommunist socialists.

Pacifists, strongly tinged with anarchist sentiments, exerted considerable influence within this relative vacuum. Imprisoned by the hundreds during World War II, they had forged new links in the years afterward, especially on the East and West coasts. Pacifica Radio, in the Bay Area, brought together anarcho-pacifists with a friendly milieu of progressives. A series of literary-political publications, mostly from the West Coast but including Dwight Macdonald's Politics, initiated a new wave of cultural expression culminating in the more pacifist-minded works of the Beat Generation. In later years, poet-publisher-bookstore owner Lawrence Ferlinghetti would play an important role as an impresario of peace sentiments among rebellious bohemians. Meanwhile, groups of former prisoners of conscience formed a number of new peace groups including the Committee for Nonviolent Action and Peacemakers. Early and late they and such allies as the Catholic Worker group dramatized their sentiments with demonstrations at atomic weapons facilities.

The civil rights movement, with its seeming proof of nonviolence's efficacy and public appeal, provided the spark to turn a small and sometimes ingrown tendency into a major movement. Meanwhile, the virtual collapse of the Communist Party with its hegemony over peace issues made possible anarcho-pacifists' breakthrough as Left peace leaders. The U.S. nuclear tests in the Pacific had alerted the public, for the first time, to the "fallout" issue. The pacifist Fellowship of Reconciliation circulated a petition against testing, with Norman Thomas and Lewis Mumford among the signers.

Meanwhile, peace had begun to gain a respectability unimaginable at the height of the Cold War. The Albert Einstein-Bertrand Russell appeal of July 1955 united prominent scientists worldwide to call for measures of survival. Peace research among social scientists, with pacifist Kenneth Boulding as its leading figure, heralded the formation of many institutes and research organizations, some with radical pacifist connections. That same year, the National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (it was the suggestion of social-democratic psychologist Erich Fromm to call it SANE for short) formed and published its first of many advertisements in the New York Times, calling for an end to nuclear testing. By 1958, SANE could claim more than a hundred chapters and some twenty-five thousand members, ranging from distinguished liberals to socialists. While the Committee for Nonviolent Action pressed direct action, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom and the Fellowship of Reconciliation arranged press conferences and academic conventions, gathered signatures, and located an interested public.

Popular direct action such as the resistance of two thousand New Yorkers in 1960 to the annual civil defense drill matched spreading campus actions. The Student Peace Union, founded in 1959 (and staffed at the national office level, to a large extent, by members of the Young People's Socialist League), announced a position independent of the two power blocs, conducting marches and rallies, and gathering signatures. Local progressive student groups, the leaderships of which included future New Left luminaries, echoed the call. The folk music revival, dating from the late 1950s and operating mostly on campuses, added considerable cultural ballast to stentorian peacenik exhortations. Mainstreamed in Bob Dylan's early work, it rapidly achieved cult status among youthful self-styled nonconformists.

At an intellectual level, Liberation magazine, founded in 1957, brought pacifist positions and a broad spectrum of non-Marxist, Left perspectives—from utopianism to critiques of Cold War culture—into the mainstream of a vaguely reorganizing Left. Anarcho-pacifist intellectuals such as David Dellinger and Paul Goodman helped create the image of the post-Leninist radical thinker, just as dedicated as previous Old Left cadre but also more playful and existential.

The "Ban the Bomb" peace movement, buoyed by a sense of détente, fell short of influencing national policy and, over the 1960s, lost many of its early ties to liberalism. In 1960 congressional critics of SANE, then at the height of its influence, had challenged it to demonstrate its anticommunist purity. SANE did so by dropping Left staff members and changing membership rules to weed out "totalitarians." A "peace delegation" grew in Congress, meanwhile, but only incrementally. The experience of the civil rights movement—largely unprotected by Kennedy officials in the South from the threats of the organized Right—once more proved instructive.

Ratification of the 1963 Test Ban Treaty, ending for the moment nuclear tests in the atmosphere, eclipsed the peace movement. But the Vietnam War soon gave it new energy. Led by radical pacifists and Socialist Party veterans including Norman Thomas, the first anti-Vietnam War protest took place in New York City in 1964. Lyndon Johnson's rapid escalation of the war revived activity on campus. By April 1965, Students for a Democratic Society led a Washington, D.C. rally of twenty thousand, the largest peace manifestation in that city's history at that point. The Vietnam Day Committee in Berkeley, growing out of the free speech movement, rallied nearly half that number.

From the standpoint of the traditional Left, a period of deep isolation rather suddenly eased. The campus teach-in movement of 1965 not only ridiculed official views but also brought hitherto unpopular views, and publications, to the attention of students by the tens of thousands. Two coalitions, in bringing together radical pacifists with Communists, Trotskyists, and Socialists, marked an unprecedented unity in the name of common anti-war cause (and party opportunity). The National Coordinating Committee to End the War in Vietnam promoted a low-level renewal of the factional conflict that pitted Left against Left, this time tactically—the Communists (not large in number, but connected and influential) putting forward the demand for U.S.-Vietnamese negotiations, and the Trotskyists (generally more active in local events) the demand for immediate withdrawal. Proliferation of anti-war demonstrations and sentiment tended to resolve this conflict in favor of a New Left style closer to Trotskyist positions but distant from the associated Leninist internal decision-making. On the other hand, the New York Fifth Avenue Parade Committee was founded in 1965 as a coalition of groups among which Communists and Trotskyists (along with the radical pacifists) were the most prominent, and it worked generally in accord over the next eventful years.

The sudden swelling of the peace movement and radicalization of its participants, especially visible on the campuses, created, more than any other influence, the largest U.S. radical movement since the 1930s. Far more than in the mid-1930s or the brief anti-Cold War tendency of the late 1940s, "peace" indeed tended to be equated with social transformation. Twenty years of Cold War military buildup had forged a vast infrastructure—economic, political, and military—that yielded to careful analysis the essential meaning of the current system. The inclusion of well-paid, white industrial workers (especially those working in war production) and the exclusion of minorities from the benefits of the consumer society seemingly validated the view of a radicalism joined to the "counterculture" on one side and to "Black Power" militants on the other.

The further escalation of the war tended to shunt aside pacifism. The assassination of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., in 1968 removed the single leader who—increasingly close to articulating a sort of Christian Socialism—could have made peace sentiments the dominating spirit of the moment. Robert Kennedy's death, and the fiasco of the Chicago Democratic Convention's nominating Cold War hardliner Hubert Humphrey against a backdrop of police-and-peace-demonstrator street battles, meanwhile closed off the liberal option.

And yet the peace demonstration remained the dominant form of the social movement, anti-war propaganda the dominant form of radical education. A succession of coalitions and events then preoccupied Left agitators. Decisions about tactics (ranging from whether to allow public draft-card burning to whether placards should be regulated) became at times overinflated symbols of differences, at other times the careful calculations for reaching an ever-broader public. The Spring Mobilization Committee of 1967, assembled at a time when U.S. troop involvement in Vietnam numbered nearly a half-million, itself rallied a half-million demonstrators (including 400,000 in New York City), the largest march of its kind ever held in the United States, and one marked by tens of thousands from Harlem's all-black contingent. A handful of traditionally progressive unions (mostly locals such as District 65 of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, but also the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and the United Electrical Workers) lent support, but the crowds were mostly students and young people. Later coalitions and marches largely followed these lines, even while greater numbers of unionists were joined by Vietnam veteran GIs and others who, better than students, presented a "mainstream" anti-war picture to the media. Women Strike for Peace, a grass-roots organization with a background in the Old Left, perhaps exemplified the merger of peace and traditional women's issues.

Not surprisingly, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, local "Red Squads," and for a time the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) undertook the most massive campaign of anti-Left intervention since the McCarthy Era. Enormous energy was devoted, from roughly 1965 to the early 1970s, to collecting information on campus and community dissidents through informants, mail checks, phone taps (often blatantly illegal), and photographs of crowds. Between various law-enforcement and intelligence-gathering agencies, files upon perhaps a million and a half Americans were assembled. Agents of various kinds operated with virtually unchecked freedom to infiltrate and disrupt organizations, often through provocateurs' insistence upon an ultra-Left, especially violent, response to government outrages. Police violence accelerated against black radicals in 1967–1970, making peace-oriented strategies for change increasingly unpalatable. To this government intervention, in no small degree, could be traced the precipitation of factional clashes and internecine warfare which devastated the New Left. Armed government assaults against peace demonstrators, most notoriously at Kent State University in 1970, had far more public emotional impact but less destructive influence upon the Left.

To old-line pacifist groups and sections of the Old Left went the laurels of staying with the peace movement after the war began to wind down. Major New Left groups (most prominently Students for a Democratic Society) fragmented and all but disappeared in any organizational sense. Later court cases would reveal an especially massive government campaign against the Socialist Workers Party, involving hundreds of agents, office break-ins, and other "dirty tricks" (the phrase coined in the 1970s for the Watergate burglary). But like the Communist Party, USA, whose longtime allies in various movements also had a stronger influence in the wake of New Left collapse, the Trotskyist mainstream could withstand political shocks with considerable tenacity. In the last few years before U.S. withdrawal, such new initiatives as the Indochina Peace Campaign of Jane Fonda and Tom Hayden highlighted the increasingly orchestrated character of the protest.

Even before U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam, some outlines of the future radical peace movement could be discerned. The failure of Alliance for Progress programs and the CIA-arranged overthrow of Salvador Allende of Chile with the wave of bloody suppression following that event swept in considerable sections of the Chilean Catholic clergy and turned Latin American Catholics in large numbers toward the left. Their sympathizers, sometimes strategically located within the U.S. Catholic Church, eased away from long-standing Cold War positions to criticism of the existing regimes and of Washington's blatant manipulations. The covert and overt U.S. support of "death squads" in Latin America provided American religious radicals with their first important radical martyrs since Martin Luther King, Jr. The Salvadorean killing of three American nuns and the assassination of Archbishop Romero stirred especially wide criticism and launched a peace initiative with radical overtones.

The participation of many ministers, priests, and laypersons in the sanctuary movement—and U.S. government persecution of them—dramatized the changing situation for peace tendencies. A majority of Americans queried regularly registered opposition to U.S. intervention. Despite generational and other difficulties, wide and varied sections of the U.S. Left managed to play an important role in the anti-contra aid and other support campaigns. At the local level, nominally nonpolitical movements, such as Sister Cities, had taken the place, more or less, of the 1920s Soviet Russia Relief campaign, or the ethnic Left working class support for homeland survival. Specific campaigns, such as Witness for Peace, brought thousands of Americans to view firsthand the toll taken by American-directed intervention. "Peace" as a cry for justice had revived, in a remarkable diversity of American milieux, an almost vanished sense of internationalism. The reality of Latin American Catholicism meanwhile virtually banished aggressive atheism as a public Left trait and seemingly legitimized a religious radicalism of diverse qualities.

The Nuclear Freeze movement, peaking in 1981–1982, had similarly popular credentials and ambiguous radical connections. Representing a rejuvenation of the mainstream type of protest characteristic of the 1960s, the Freeze touched communities large and small with the hope of disarmament and brought more than a million people into Manhattan's streets in June 1982. The largest U.S. demonstration of any kind to that point, it drew upon wide circles of respectables, most notably in the religious and entertainment communities. Perhaps most spectacularly among the protest's wide-ranging participants, Left community arts and protest arts tendencies such as New York's Political Arts Documentation/Distribution expressed a graphics creativity for peace not seen since the 1930s, if ever. Like the early "Ban the Bomb" movement, however, the Freeze did not succeed in influencing national political policy and fell into disarray. By the mid-1980s, it had been all but captured and then robbed of meaning by centrist Democratic politicians. The merging of SANE and Freeze in 1986 also exemplified the victory of professionalism over grass-roots enthusiasm within Left-connected anti-war work—at least for the time being.

After the Freeze, small group acts of collective disobedience and large-scale protests against U.S. policy in Latin America marked the peace movement. Sustained peace "encampments" sometimes highlighted New Age-influenced feminist tendencies related to gender essentialism and directed against the patriarchal world order. Meanwhile, Leftish electoral bids, notably Jesse Jackson's 1988 presidential nomination run, espoused peace and disarmament issues. At the fringes of mass movements, but increasingly important in the 1990s, Jewish radicals (and liberals) of many varieties joined to urge Middle East negotiations and peaceful acceptance of Palestinian self-identity rather than escalating violence and territorial expropriations.

[See also Beats and the New Left; Civil Rights Movement; Dellinger, David; Macdonald, Dwight; Pacifism; Rustin, Bayard; Thomas, Norman.]

FURTHER READING

- Chatfield, Charles. For Peace and Justice: Pacifism in America, 1914–1941. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1971.
- DeBenedetti, Charles. An American Ordeal: The Antiwar Movement of the Vietnam Era. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1990.
- Gosse, Van. "'The North American Front': Central American Solidarity in the Reagan Era," and John Trinkl, "Struggles for Disarmament in the USA." In Reshaping the American Left: Popular Struggles in the 1980s, edited by Mike Davis and Michael Sprinker. London: Verso, 1989.
- Halsted, Fred. Out Now! A Participant's Account of the American Movement against the Vietnam War. New York: Monad Press, 1978.
- Hogan, J. Michael. The Nuclear Freeze Campaign. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1994.
- Powers, Roger S., and William B. Vogeley, eds. Protest, Power and Change: An Encyclopedia of Nonviolent Action from ACT-UP to Women's Suffrage. New York: Garland Publishing, 1997.
- Swarthmore College Peace Collection, Swarthmore, Pa.
- Wittner, Lawrence. Rebels against War: The American Peace Movement, 1933–1983. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1984.

—PAUL BUHLE

PEEKSKILL RIOTS. When the Harlem chapter of the Civil Rights Congress announced in July 1949 that Paul Robeson would headline a benefit concert for them that August in Peekskill, New York, the Junior Chamber of Commerce of the city vehemently condemned the concert as Communist inspired and called for demonstrations to stop it. The concert, actually scheduled for Lakeland Acres, a few miles north of Peekskill, was to be the fourth in an annual series of Robeson concerts given at various sites in the vicinity.

But the 27 August concert never occurred. With Cold War hysteria, anticommunism, and racial hatred fanned to a fever pitch, veterans' forces and vigilantes—brandishing billy clubs, brass knuckles, and rocks—brutally assaulted a group of women and children who had arrived early for the concert. A display of books and pamphlets was burned, cars were overturned, and only after thirteen people were seriously injured did the police intervene. Robeson never made it to the picnic grounds.

Deeply angered by the incident, the black community held a large public meeting at Harlem's Golden Gate Ballroom and let it be known that "Harlem will fight back." Later, to an overflow crowd outside the Golden Gate, Communist leader Benjamin J. Davis Jr., declared, "Let them touch a hair of Paul Robeson's head and they'll pay a price they never calculated." Another concert was planned and Robeson agreed to participate.

More than twenty thousand people attended the 4 September concert and Robeson, guarded by a phalanx of trade unionists, performed magnificently. When the concert ended, the riot began. For several miles along the roads leading from the grounds, concertgoers were forced to run a gauntlet of veterans and vigilantes who pelted them with rocks and hurled large stones through the windshields of their cars and buses. At least 140 persons were injured and innumerable cars were wrecked.

In the wake of the violence there was widespread outrage. More than three hundred people went to Albany to meet with the governor and to voice their indignation. But Governor Thomas Dewey gave them no hearing, blaming the "Communist groups" for provoking the incident. Robeson and twenty-six other plaintiffs filed a civil suit for over $2 million against Westchester County and two veterans' groups. After three years of litigation, the federal court dismissed the case and all charges against the defendants.

As Dr. Charles Wright noted in his summary of the riots: "The Peekskill affair accelerated many events that were already in progress and made many others possible that seemed only probable before. . . . Republican Senator Joseph R. McCarthy of Wisconsin was already testing the anticommunist line with which he would strangle the nation with brief and terrifying success." Author Howard Fast considers the riots the violent prelude to the anticommunism and racism that would mark the fifties—it was "the first great open manifestation of American fascism."

[See also McCarthyism; Robeson, Paul Leroy.]

FURTHER READING

- Fast, Howard. Peekskill, U.S.A.: A Personal Experience. New York: Civil Rights Congress, 1951.
- Shapiro, Herbert. White Violence and Black Response: From Reconstruction to Montgomery. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1988.
- Wright, Dr. Charles. "Paul Robeson at Peekskill." In Paul Robeson: The Great Forerunner, by the editors of Freedomways. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1965.

—HERB BOYD

PELTIER, LEONARD (b. 1944). During the 1980s Leonard Peltier, an Ojibwa-Sioux political activist associated with the American Indian Movement (AIM), became the most prominent political prisoner in the United States. Efforts on his behalf forged a wide coalition of radical, liberal, civil rights, and ethnic groups in much the way the defense of Tom Mooney had earlier in the century.

Peltier had become politically active in his early twenties. Inspired by the Native American occupation of Alcatraz Island, he was among a group of fourteen Native Americans who occupied Fort Lawton outside Seattle in an effort to assert Indian claims to abandoned federal property. Shortly after the occupation ended, Peltier went to the AIM office in Denver, where he met Vernon Bellecourt and dedicated himself to the fight for Indian rights and cultural renewal, making the fight against alcoholism one of his priorities. In 1972 he participated in the Trail of Broken Treaties, a march starting on the West Coast and ending in Washington, D.C., with a trashing of the offices of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Peltier then went to the Pine Ridge Reservation, where AIM had established a major organizing effort.

On 26 June 1975, two agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation were killed at Pine Ridge in a shootout still clouded in controversy. The Bureau has always maintained the Native Americans began the armed conflict and the Native Americans have always maintained they were acting in self-defense. Four men were charged with the slayings. One was released on the basis of weak evidence, and two others were formally acquitted on the basis that they had shot in self-defense. The fourth, Leonard Peltier, fled to Canada and was not tried until his return a year later. He was convicted of aiding and abetting in the death of two federal agents.

AIM immediately charged that the trial had been a frame-up with some of the key evidence manufactured. Later, Peltier defense committees would maintain that evidence favorable to Peltier had been withheld. While Peltier was experiencing a bitter time in prison, including three years of solitary confinement at the federal penitentiary in Marion, Illinois, his supporters mounted a clemency campaign. This effort coincided with the decline of the New Left, but Peltier's supporters persevered.

After more than a decade of work, The Peltier defense committee targeted 1993, the United Nations Year of Indigenous People, as the time for maximum effort. The goal was to generate at least a million signatures on letters, petitions, and resolutions urging clemency. Important human rights organizations such as Amnesty International and the National Association of Christians and Jews lent their support. Desmond Tutu of South Africa and the archbishop of Canterbury also urged clemency. The Human Rights Commission in Spain went so far as to honor Peltier for "defending the historical and cultural rights of his people against the genocide of his race." A long segment on Peltier's plight appeared on 60 Minutes, a CBS television program that is consistently one of the ten most watched weekly programs, and Hollywood actor/filmmaker Robert Redford produced and narrated Incident at Oglala, a documentary highly favorable to Peltier.

The massive 1993 effort brought Peltier considerable public visibility, but his release was not forthcoming. As the century drew to a close, he remained the nation's most celebrated "prisoner of conscience."

FURTHER READING

Messerschmidt, Jim. The Trial of Leonard Peltier. Boston: South End Press, 1983; revised with new afterword, 1989.
 Peltier, Leonard. "War against the American Nation." In It Did Happen Here: Recollections of Political Repression in America, edited by Bud Shultz and Ruth Shultz. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

PEOPLE'S DAILY WORLD. See Daily Worker.

PEOPLE'S WORLD. From its first issue on 1 January 1938 until its last on 31 May 1986, the People's World (known popularly as the PW) reported labor and radical news to a milieu within and beyond the Communist Party of the West Coast. Succeeding the more narrow Western Worker, the PW brought together Communists from California, Oregon, and Washington in a united front of sorts with progressive unionists, especially of the longshore and seafaring trades, and with prominent liberal supporters from Los Angeles to Seattle. Early on, the paper came to be known for its lively style, fashioned by Daily Worker veteran Al Richmond, and dramatized by the extremely popular columnist Mike Quin. A reflection of the West Coast Communist movement—less restricted to insular ethnic milieus and more integral to multiracial milieus than its East Coast equivalent—the PW achieved an easy acceptability in union and intellectual circles rare for radicals after 1920. In its years as a daily (1939–1949), it had a circulation in the tens of thousands.

The PW suffered, like the rest of the Communist movement, from McCarthyism and from internal woes of the 1950s–1960s. It succeeded to an extraordinary extent in maintaining (or reestablishing) ties after the worst of the repression, reemerging with prestigious supporters especially among movements for racial equality. More than any other Communist publication, certainly, the PW effected an accommodation with the changing political moods of the 1960s. Progressive Democratic Party candidates for local Bay Area and congressional offices, some of them elected, found in the PW a valuable source of support, and reciprocated in public gestures.

In 1968 editor Al Richmond left the PW after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. Veteran black journalist Carl Bloice took the editorial reins, and the PW continued to provide important coverage of current events (most notably, César Chávez's United Farm Workers crusade, as seen by reporter Sam Kushner). The "united front" character of the paper diminished, however, and the Communist Party remained virtually alone in its support and staffing of the paper. In 1986 the PW merged with the Daily World to form the People's Daily World, which, despite retention of several prominent PW writers, more nearly resembled the New York than the California version of Left journalism.

[See also California; Communist Party, USA; Daily Worker.]

FURTHER READING

Richmond, Al. A Long View From the Left. Boston: Beacon Press, 1971.

—PAUL RICHARDS

PESOTTA, ROSE (1896–1965). A lifelong anarchist, Rose Pesotta (originally Peisotaya) served as the only woman on the general executive board of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU) from 1933 to 1944. Frustrated by the male-dominated leadership, Pesotta poured her energies into her role as general organizer and worked directly and creatively among the 300,000 members, eighty-five percent of whom were women.

Pesotta was born in the Ukraine, where her parents supported the resistance movement against the czarist government. In 1913 she decided to follow her older sister to the Goldene Mdeeni, the American Land of Gold, and, like thousands of other Jewish teenage women, joined the ranks of New York's shirtwaist makers. Pesotta joined Local 25, which had emerged from the strike of 1909–1910 as the vital center of the ILGWU, and participated in its innovative educational and recreational programs at Unity House in the nearby Pocono Mountains. By the early 1920s Pesotta had been elected to Local 25's executive board. In 1922 she attended Bryn Mawr College's summer school for working women, and a year later she applied to Brookwood Labor College (Katonah, New York). From these experiences, Pesotta firmed her commitment to the principles of workers' education and applied her lessons directly in her organizing efforts.

Pesotta became active in the Sacco-Vanzetti defense case in 1922 and was arrested in a demonstration protesting their execution in 1927. During this period she was also involved in the International Anarchist Group in New York and attended anarchist conferences throughout the 1920s. Between 1925 and 1929 she served as general secretary of the publication Road to Freedom and wrote for the journal until it folded in 1932. Like her friend Emma Goldman, she remained a staunch anticommunist until her death.

The New Deal sanction of collective bargaining inaugurated a decade of trade union organizing for Pesotta. She conducted organizing campaigns in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Puerto Rico, Seattle, Atlantic City, Milwaukee, and Buffalo. In 1937, during the sit-down strikes, she left the garment industry to organize the women's auxiliaries of rubber workers in Akron, Ohio, and auto workers in Flint, Michigan. She returned to her own union in the late 1930s to head very difficult campaigns in Montreal, Cleveland, Boston, and the Mohawk Valley of New York.

Pesotta worked closely with local women leaders in the ILGWU and seemed to possess a remarkable ability to speak to many ethnic groups. Her sincere respect for their labor and her regard for needlework as a craft rather than an unskilled trade undoubtedly provided a bridge between them. When she quit the itinerant life of the organizer, she returned quite happily, it seems, to her trade. She wrote Bread upon the Waters (1945), memoirs of her years with the ILGWU, and another autobiography, Days of Our Lives (1958).

[See also Anarchism; International Ladies Garment Workers Union; Sacco-Vanzetti Case.]

FURTHER READING

Kessler-Harris, Alice. "Organizing the Unorganizable: Three Jewish Women and Their Union." In Class, Sex, and the Woman Worker, edited by Milton Cantor and Bruce Laurie. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1977.

Leeder, Elaine. The Gentle General: Rose Pesotta, Anarchist and Labor Organizer. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.

Pesotta, Rose. Papers. New York Public Library.

Schofield, Ann. Introduction to Bread upon the Waters, by Rose Pesotta. Ithaca, N.Y.: ILR Press, 1987.

—MARI JO BUHLE

PETERSEN, ARNOLD (1885–1976). Born in Denmark, Arnold Petersen was the dominant figure of the (American) Socialist Labor Party after Daniel De Leon. He joined the party in 1908 and served as its national secretary from February 1914 until his resignation in May 1969.

He was completely devoted to De Leon's program and wrote numerous pamphlets about De Leon and De Leonism. Trained as an accountant, he assumed his post with the party in a state of near-bankruptcy and was largely responsible for its relative stability for many years. He opposed unity with the Socialist Party, and during his tenure the Socialist Labor Party refused to work with other groups, characterizing them as reformist. He was also opposed to violence, contending that revolutionary change could occur peaceably in the United States through electoral victory and support from a revolutionary union.

Critics contended that he acted undemocratically and was hostile toward new tactics. Under his administration, there were numerous splits and expulsions. Yet the party's membership shrank mainly from attrition by aging.

[See also Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

Girard, Frank, and Ben Perry. The Socialist Labor Party, 1876–1991: A Short History. Philadelphia: Livra Books, 1991.

"A Political Rebel Looks Back to '08." New York Times, 8 March 1964.

—BEN PERRY

PHILOSOPHY. The importation of Marxism to the United States through the immigrant socialist press brought philosophy into Left discussions in the 1870s–1890s. Editors, joined by lecturers and autodidact workers, succeeded in introducing a radical philosophical and political outlook, at least to their constituents, into a terrain dominated by rationalism, empiricism, utopianism, and, soon, pragmatism and logical empiricism. In effect, they prepared socialist thought for further development in later decades.

Before 1920, Marxism proper was not, however, the overpowering influence that it would become for radicals under communism's Left hegemony. Before the 1880s, radical German American intellectuals provided their constituents with a mixture of ideas drawing upon German romanticism and free-thought, anarchist, and socialist doctrines. On the one hand, they, like other ethnic socialists, were dedicated to disproving theology with "scientific" examination of natural and social conditions. On the other hand, they espoused a militant idealism of the eternal struggle for justice, now realized in the proletarian struggle. At the high point of German influence, the middle 1880s, "natural rights" arguments against all class societies tended to dominate revolutionary socialist discourse. Marxist materialism ruled in the disappointing aftermath, but never without reservations being voiced.

Jewish socialists and anarchists conducted a spirited philosophical debate on many of these points in their Yiddish-language newspapers and journals. A deep strain of anti-Marxist philosophy persisted especially among Jewish anarchists, whose greatest intellectual figure, Rudolf Rocker, devoted his chief talents to a disproof of historical materialism. Jewish socialists in many varieties (but notably socialist-Zionists) transmuted historic Jewish doctrines of suffering and redemption into messianic versions of materialist socialism. As with the German Americans, what little could be discerned about Marxist philosophy, through Capital and other works, did not suffice and had to be supplemented with other ideas at hand.

With the coming of English-language socialism, Marxism was infused with scientific analogies, notably in the widespread use of Engels's Socialism, Utopian and Scientific. Daniel De Leon preached this doctrine with special fervor, and Walter Thomas Mills's widely used socialist textbook, The Struggle for Existence (1901), became a Socialist Party study-group standard for the further simplification of Engels's notions. Nevertheless, Anti-Dühring achieved its first translation at the hands of Austin Lewis, who criticized Engels's notions of dialectics as reductive and inadequate. The Charles H. Kerr Company and its popular monthly, the International Socialist Review, militantly promoted as revolutionary favorites of the hour philosophers Joseph Dietzgen and Antonio Labriola: the first as articulator of a dialectical materialism that ordinary people could embrace in their daily lives; the second as continuator of the Hegelian tradition within Marxism.

With Debsian Socialism's disintegration, a spirited eclecticism passed. More important, the leadership of Communists coincided, in the 1920s–1930s, with a significant diminution of the autodidact tradition. Lenin's and Stalin's works, particularly the former's Materialism and Empirio-Criticism, came to be considered Marxist philosophy par excellence just as the habits of self-learning fell to film, radio, and popular culture with the general disappearance of a diverse Left press. Philosophical rumination, once the domain of the self-taught intellectual, became a party science. Howard Selsam's What Is Philosophy? (1932), widely read by Communist-leaning intellectuals of the 1930s, epitomized the shift.

Sidney Hook's Towards the Understanding of Karl Marx (1933) and From Hegel to Marx (1935) reintroduced once-familiar themes of mechanical materialism's limitations, but added an interpretation of historical materialism as experimental naturalism, part of Hook's effort to reclaim the active revolutionary project from fatalism. He also introduced, in passing, the theme of praxis and alienation within the still-unknown "young Marx." Shifting his ground rightward, gradually at first, Hook tried to combine Marxism with Deweyan pragmatism, and then abandoned anticapitalism entirely during the 1940s. Max Eastman's pamphlet The Last Stand of Dialectical Materialism (1935) was the outstanding popular (or vulgar) version of the challenge. James Burnham, cofounder of the Left-philosophical journal Symposium in the early 1930s, closed out the era with a blistering attack upon dialectics as a hindrance to Trotskyism (which he would, in turn, renounce a few years later, en route to conservatism). The Popular Front-oriented Science and Society, meanwhile, attempted, without great success, to maintain the faith in Russian-style socialism's scientific claims. After 1950, Science and Society went its own way politically with a variety of Marxist-influenced philosophical contributions.

Trotskyist circles of the 1930s–1940s provided a particularly heated intellectual forum for the reinter-pretation of Marxist philosophy. Attacking all currents of Deweyism, former Dewey student George Novack and James G. Wright sought to uphold Trotsky's views. C. L. R. James, Raya Dunayevskaya, Grace Lee, and their "Johnson-Forest Tendency" struck off in new directions, fostering the rethinking of Marxism in the light of Hegel. Their translation and mimeographed publications from Marx's 1844 Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts highlighted the recuperation of the young Marx that would mean so much to the coming New Left generation.

Few could have foreseen that the Frankfurt School's writings would become so influential. Although the group had produced (or encouraged) both Erich Fromm and Herbert Marcuse, it remained relatively obscure. Philosophy proper had no wide New Left following in the 1960s, even among those who admired Marcuse's One Dimensional Man enough to attempt his more difficult Reason and Revolution. For cerebral activists, the New Left Review offered an ongoing discussion of Continental trends, heavily influenced by Trotskyism and, during the late 1960s, by structuralism. Through this avenue Louis Althusser gained a degree of currency on American campuses. Before 1970 only specialists and a relative handful of enthusiasts were familiar with the writings of such major figures of critical theory as Theodor Adorno, Max Horkheimer, or Walter Benjamin. But these quasi-Marxist thinkers would play a large role in redefining post-Marxist philosophical approaches after the collapse of the New Left.

A revived Hegelianism reached a younger generation of mostly academic readers via Telos, the sole philosophical journal attached to the New Left, and the unique proponent of radicalized phenomenology (principally via the Italian philosopher Enzo Paci and his Eastern European counterparts) en route to a Middle European mélange of radicalism and neoliberalism. Radical America reintroduced C. L. R. James as champion of a dialectics liberated from Stalinism and intellectual neocolonialism.

A rising interest in Marxism within the universities from the 1960s onward prompted a Left philosophical revival just as the New Left proper disappeared. While a linguistic-oriented analytic philosophy was still hegemonic, universities began hiring more Marxist philosophers who taught Marxist-oriented courses, and major university presses began publishing numerous books on Marxist theory. Marxist philosophy itself underwent dramatic changes. In addition to German currents of a mostly Hegelian Marxism, other imports (from France in particular) were transmuted in attempts to synthesize Marxism with such theories as structuralism, poststructuralism, and deconstruction. By the later 1970s, an "analytic Marxism" flourished as an effort to apply techniques of Anglo-American philosophy and game theory to a critical analysis of Marxism. At the same time, feminists proposed a synthesis of Marxism and feminism, while liberation theologians proposed a parallel synthesis of Marxist philosophy with biblical readings and hermeneutics. Fresh attempts to demolish Marxism came from many directions, most notably from the "New French Philosophers" and poststructuralists such as Jean Baudrillard. None of these efforts led toward fresh synthesis. Indeed, the later 1980s and the collapse of the Soviet bloc seemed to consolidate a shift away from the Marxist philosophical project.

The 1990s saw a return, in a variety of muted forms, of versions of Marxism. The Radical Philosophy Association, founded in the 1980s, flourished under the heavy influence of identity politics and sponsored meetings in Cuba and Latin America. The Sartre Society of North American and Socialist Feminist Philosophers in Action pursued, respectively, the dialogue between existential philosophy and Marxism and the promotion of feminist thought. Cornel West argued in several widely-read books for a reinstatement of socialist ethics with a certain stress on racial issues. Younger philosophers, such as Lewis R. Gordon, worked out of more clearly revolutionary paradigms, seeking to recuperate the efforts of Frantz Fanon and others to capture the tragedy and possibility of the modern condition.

[See also Dunayevskaya, Raya; Hook, Sidney; James, C. L. R.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Paul. Marxism in the United States. London: Verso, 1991.

Gordon, Lewis R., ed. Fanon: A Critical Reader. London: Blackwell, 1996.

—STEVEN BEST, PAUL BUHLE, and DOUGLAS KELLNER

PHOTOGRAPHY. American photography has been enhanced by contributions from photographers who were committed to leftist causes and from those who, although not particularly politically active, contributed work of political significance. In the early days of American photography contributions were made to progressive causes by people who were not especially politically Left in their lives or work. An example of this is the work of Jacob Riis, who documented the inadequate living conditions of New York City's poor. Although he was much more involved with writing and political reform work than with photography, Riis's photographs, which he used in lantern slide-shows and in his book How the Other Half Lives: Studies among the Tenements of New York (1890), contributed to the improvement of the housing laws in New York City.

Lewis Hine very consciously used the camera for political purposes. In his 1909 speech "Social Photography: How the Camera May Help in the Social Uplift," he argued that photography was an important weapon in the fight against social injustice. He felt that the condensed meaning in a photograph and the belief most people have in the honesty of the medium made photographs powerful "levers." He felt that "the picture is a symbol that brings one immediately into close touch with reality. . . . In fact, it is often more effective than the reality would have been, because, in the picture, the nonessential and conflicting interests have been eliminated. The picture is the language of all nationalities and all ages." Working as the staff photographer for the National Child Labor Committee, he used photography to document the miserable working conditions that children were forced to endure. He was also known for his moving photographs of immigrants, his documentary work on life in Pittsburgh, and his inspiring photographs of workers, particularly his series on the construction of the Empire State Building.

An important documentary project with serious political implications was that done by the Farm Security Administration photographers under the direction of Roy E. Stryker. Although there is debate about the extent to which this work was put to overly reformist uses, there is no disagreement about what an extraordinary achievement it was. The photographers in this federal project—John Collier, Jack Delano, Walker Evans, Theo Jung, Dorothea Lange, Russell Lee, Carl Mydans, Arthur Rothstein, Ben Shahn, and Marion Post Walcott—were very successful in portraying and documenting the lives of the people suffering the terrible deprivations brought on or exacerbated by the Depression, particularly in rural areas. Their photographs of the conditions that poor and working-class people lived in helped motivate people to work for social justice or at least to have some sympathy for people suffering from the deteriorating economic situation. Certainly their work resulted in a huge archive of photographs that illuminate a part of life in the thirties.

A very different philosophy motivated the Photo League, which was founded by Sid Grossman and Sol Libsohn in 1936. It grew out of the radical Film and Photo League, and the people who founded it and many who joined it later shared the belief that photography could and should be used to further the struggle for peace, freedom, and justice. In the late thirties the Photo League was known for its documentary projects and its school, which taught photography to many who would go on to be excellent photographers. Its programs of exhibitions and lecture series attracted some of the most important photographers in the world, including Ansel Adams, Berenice Abbott, Margaret Bourke-White, Manuel Alvarez Bravo, Henri Cartier-Bresson, Harold Corsini, Morris Engel, Robert Frank, Lewis Hine (whose work they saved for posterity), Leo Hurwitz, Jerome Liebling, Elizabeth McCausland, Jack Manning, Lisette Model, Paul Strand, Roy Stryker, Weegee, Dan Weiner, and Edward Weston. Many of these people also lectured to the students at the school and contributed to Photo Notes, a newsletter that contained articles, reprints from other newspapers and magazines, book reviews, and analyses of exhibitions.

The work that came out of the Photo League was important and impressive. Documentary projects that were completed and shown included Sid Grossman and Sol Libsohn's Chelsea Document and Walter Rosenblum's Pitt Street. The Feature Group, led by Aaron Siskind, produced a number of important projects such as Portrait of a Tenement (1936), Dead End: The Bowery (1937–1938), Park Avenue: North and South (1937), and The Catholic Worker Movement: St. Joseph's Home (1939–1940). Their most famous and most successful project was The Harlem Document, which was undertaken to be a book. Much of this work was exhibited and published in magazines, and some of it was exhibited in New York City in 1988.

The League succeeded in supporting a socially oriented, humanistic photography that documented the complexity and contradictions of American society in the thirties and forties. Unfortunately, the organization was a victim of the Red Scare after World War II. Harassed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and listed by the U.S. attorney general as a Communist-front group in 1947, the League closed its doors in 1951. Many of its old members maintained their social commitments and continued to document life as they saw it. A new generation of photographers and critics rediscovered their work in the 1980s and made it available to the public.

In the postwar years there were photographers who consciously worked to use photography for socially useful purposes, but there were no successful attempts to organize anything like the League. One of the new photographers was Milton Rogovin, who began working in 1958 on what he called "the forgotten ones." His photographs of gospel services and of workers in Buffalo show a strong political consciousness. In the 1980s, he worked on a documentary project on the life of coal miners. He photographed miners in Chile, Appalachia, France, Scotland, Spain, and China.

In the sixties there were many photographers who attempted to document the movements to change the country and for a few years in the late sixties and early seventies Liberation News Service attempted to set up an alternative photo service that could provide the many countercultural newspapers and magazines with relevant and useful photographs. But it died with the atrophy of the movements that supported it.

In the years that followed, there were few successful attempts to organize photographers politically or for photographers to work together in politically oriented groups. Occasionally a photographer succeeded in getting politically motivated work out into the world, but it was rare and frequently the audience was very limited. During the Vietnam War, a number of photographs were published that had an effect on the North American public. Malcolm Browne's 1963 photograph of a Buddhist monk burning himself to death in protest against the corrupt Diem regime, Eddie Adams's photograph of the Saigon police chief shooting a prisoner in the head, Nick Ut's photograph of a naked child, Kim Phuc, running down a road after a napalm attack, and Ron Haebler's famous photograph from the My Lai massacre all had political repercussions though the photographers described themselves as not taking political stands.

Eugene Smith also was not a political activist nor does his writing show a high degree of political consciousness, though he did join the Photo League after World War II and served as its president. His politics could probably be described as liberal or humanistic. Yet he produced one of the few good political books in the seventies. An important photojournalist who worked with Life, he went with his wife, Aileen, to the small Japanese city of Minimata. The people who lived in the fishing villages near Minimata were suffering in great numbers from mercury poisoning from the wastes being dumped into the Shiranui Sea by the Chelso Chemical Company. For years, Smith photographed the results of this environmental disaster. He not only photographed the dumping of the chemicals but the tragic results of the chemical companies' utter disregard for the lives of their workers and neighbors. He photographed the deformities and diseases that resulted and the terrible pain they brought to the people of Minimata. He also photographed the struggle to bring the company to account, including the demonstrations, the violence of the company guards, and finally the court trials that resulted. In the process of the struggle, he was badly beaten by the guards and sustained injuries to his head that affected his eye.

In 1986 progressive photographers and graphic artists in New York set up Impact Visuals, a cooperative whose purpose was to provide alternative media with affordable visual images regarding issues of political importance. The cooperative quickly grew to two hundred members throughout the nation and established contacts with like-minded organizations in other nations. It continues to focus on the radical, community-use, nonprofit, and issue-oriented press, but has gradually begun to serve the commercial press at commercial rates as a means of subsidizing low-cost service to its primary constituency. In this sense Impact Visuals was a renewed effort in the tradition pioneered by the Photo League and Liberation News Service.

In the post-Vietnam era a new generation of photographers whose political consciousness could be traced to the civil rights, anti-Vietnam War, and countercultural movements began to produce photographic work with a decidedly political orientation. Among those who worked on labor problems were Fred Lonidier (health and police repression), Earl Dotter (factory and agricultural workers), George Cohen (health workers), Builder Levy (miners), Ken Light (migrants, undocumented workers, prisoners), and Allan Sekula (worker boundaries in advanced capital societies). Dealing critically with American foreign policy were Susan Meiselas (Nicaragua, El Salvador, the Kurds), Dona DeCesare (Salvadoran refugees), and Steven Cagen (Nicaragua, El Salvador, Cuba). Taking on various aspects of racism were Diane Neumaier (sexism and racism), Pat Ward Williams (the MOVE community in Philadelphia), Mel Rosenthal (South Bronx and Puerto Rico), Connie Hatch (gentrification in California), Roland Freeman (African American Life in the South), and Ricky Flores (South Bronx and Latino culture). Still other topics were taken on by Lisa Lewenz (nuclear energy and Nazi history), Donna Ann McAdams (the AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power and gentrification of New York's Lower East Side), and Carrie Mae Weems (political change in the light of race, class, and gender).

It seems clear that the amazingly rapid rise of electronic and digital photography has begun a revolution that will change totally the way people think about photography. With the new technology photographs can be changed easily and seamlessly, and in the digital world there are no originals to inspect. Major magazines and newspapers have bought extraordinarily expensive computer and image delivery systems capable of manipulating images. Photography departments are investing millions of dollars in computer and digital equipment to teach students how to work in digitalized imagery. Examples of reconfigured images abound. Photographs, including ones used as cover pictures of magazines and books, have been substantially altered to satisfy the desires of editors. As this technology becomes more available and more well known, photography's power to bear witness and be accepted as evidence will be increasingly compromised. There is already great concern about the ethical and political implications of this new technology. It is being called the information or communications revolution. If it turns out to be a revolution we must ask who will be the new rulers and what will be its costs.

[See also Liberation News Service; Radical Film-making, 1930s.]

FURTHER READING

- Rosenblum, Naomi. A World History of Photography. New York: Abbeville Press, 1989.
- Rosler, Martha. Three Works. Halifax: Press of the Nova Scotia School of Art and Design, 1981.
- Sekula, Allan. Photography against the Grain: Essays and Photoworks, 1973–1983. Edited by Benjamin Buchloh. Halifax: Press of the Nova Scotia School of Art and Design, 1981.

Trachtenberg, Alan. Classic Essays on Photography. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1980.

Wallis, Brian, ed. Art after Modernism: Rethinking Representation. Boston: David Godine, 1984.

—MEL ROSENTHAL

PIETIST COMMUNES IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The colonial territory chartered to William Penn by the English crown in 1681 added a unique chapter to the history of utopian communes in early America. From 1694, with the millenarians on the Wissahickon Creek (Philadelphia) led by Johannes Kelpius, to the passing of patriarch George Rapp at the communist town of Economy (near Pittsburgh) in 1847, this era demonstrated the unusual socioeconomic power of mystical Pietism within German-speaking settler populations.

Penn himself catalyzed the Pietist exodus from the Rhineland to Pennsylvania. His missionary visit to continental Europe in the early 1680s gathered few converts to his own Quaker belief; however, it acquainted persecuted religionists with his refuge of tolerance, inspiring formation of the Frankfurt Land Company. The resulting emigration led to several successful experiments in voluntary communism that interested Europe for decades and earned praise from Karl Marx's collaborator, Friedrich Engels, himself of German Pietist background.

Four important communities and charismatic leaders have been emphasized by students of Radical Pietism in Pennsylvania: the Society of the Woman in the Wilderness (1694–1748), led by scholar Johannes Kelpius (1673–1708); the Ephrata Cloister community (1734–1796), founded and led by Johann Conrad Beissel (1690–1768), a baker; the Moravian community at Bethlehem (1741–1762), under Count Ludwig Zinzendorf (1700–1760), German-Austrian nobleman and ecclesiastical heir of Comenius and Huss; and the Harmony Society (1805–1905), founded and led by weaver George Rapp (1757–1847). Harmony moved briefly to Indiana, but sold its lands there to English communitarian Robert Owen and returned to Pennsylvania.

These societies grew from a movement of spiritual renewal, Pietism, which swept Protestant Europe in the seventeenth century and blended with a separatist variant, Philadelphianism. Both were strongly chiliastic and pacifist. Radical Pietists were driven by the hope of re-creating the original form of the Christian church described in Acts, thus inaugurating the return of Jesus Christ. This meant embracing community of goods as well as celibacy (marriage by lot in the Moravian case). It also meant a preoccupation with religious experience of an archaic and mystical form—not just prayer, fasting, inspiration, and prophecy, but theosophy and hermetic speculations of all kinds, including androgyny. These separatists turned from Luther's text to a new mystical version of Holy Scripture, the Berleburg Bible. Apparently their attitude owed more to that Bible and the works of Jacob Boehme than to Philipp Spener and August Francke, the historical originators of Pietism.

The societies were not linked organizationally, despite unifying efforts by Zinzendorf. Each group developed its own character and culture, and each, despite its withdrawal from society at large, influenced the surrounding community. Kelpius's group settled on the banks of the Wissahickon Creek near Germantown and became legendary for an intense mystical apocalypticism. Ephrata developed a strong communal economy and a reputation for poetry and choral music whose themes emphasized the community's role as the center of a new post-apocalyptic world. It also became an important frontier center for printing. (Ironically, the unbound pages of an Ephrata edition of the pacifist Martyr's Mirror were confiscated by the Continental army for use as gun wadding.) The Moravian settlement at Bethlehem had an early communistic phase accented by optimistic spirituality; however, its chief enterprise was missionary work among Native Americans. Its musical legacy to colonial America was unusually rich. From the standpoint of economic power, the Harmony Society in western Pennsylvania was the most impressive. Its town at Economy on the Ohio River became a complete self-sustaining commonwealth with advanced features for the early nineteenth century. It progressed from agriculture and small-scale crafts to mills, foundries, and outside investments in modern industries, including railroads and oil. All along, Father Rapp tended his alchemical furnaces and mystical speculations.

Following Rapp's death in 1847, disputes broke out between potential heirs over the legal character and fate of the society. Historically the question was moot, because celibacy (and Christ's failure to arrive) had already sealed the fate of the Pietist communes in Pennsylvania. These societies rightfully belong to the prehistory of the modern Left, however, as is evidenced by the Harmonists' manifesto, Thoughts on the Destiny of Man (1824): "the whole human race shall become united, by the sacred bond of mutual interest, and brother affection" (italics added). Theirs was an essentially magical-religious attempt to evade the encroaching world of the Industrial Revolution that later social radicals would have to confront with material means. Yet, powerfully bound by their millenarian ideas, Pietists were able to create a society in which economic communism was seen as a necessary adjunct to spiritual processes, thus anticipating liberation theology.

[See also Lippard, George.]

FURTHER READING

- Alderfer, E. G. The Ephrata Commune: An Early American Counterculture. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1985.
- Arndt, Karl J. R. George Rapp's Harmony Society, 1785–1847. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1965.
- Carpenter, Delburn. The Radical Pietists: Celibate Communal Societies Established in the United States before 1820. New York: AMS Press, 1975.
- Ernst, James E. Ephrata: A History. Allentown: Pennsylvania German Folklore Society, 1963.
- Stoeffler, F. Ernest, ed. Continental Pietism and Early American Christianity. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1976.

—JOSEPH JABLONSKI

PM. In June 1940, when the achievements of the New Deal and the Congress of Industrial Organizations were part of an immediate political experience, PM was launched to give New York City a daily newspaper that would "crusade for those who improve constructively the way men live together" and would "attack those who push other people around." The venture was made possible by Marshall Field III, the Chicago millionaire who was eccentric enough to think a newspaper should not be impartial in matters of economic and social struggle. Ralph Ingersoll resigned as publisher of Life to become editor and 11,000 people applied for the 150 available jobs. Although PM would average 165,000 daily circulation, the financial break-even point was 225,000. PM was sold in 1948 and renamed the Star, which ceased publication a year later. The Daily Compass tried to carry on the PM-Star tradition thereafter, but it, too, quickly expired.

Throughout its existence, PM was frequently rebaited for employing politically radical reporters, including known members of the Communist Party. The charge that the paper was Communist-dominated was strongly reinforced when James Wechsler resigned a PM staff job in 1946. In articles and public appearances Wechsler charged that the Communist faction had intimidated the editors and other reporters on PM to such a degree that news stories were distorted and competent staff people felt compelled to leave. Among the evidence he cited for his view was that PM had been highly supportive of the Soviet Union. Wechsler's judgements were recycled in many early accounts of PM's history.

Succeeding historians without any personal involvement with PM, particularly Anya Schiffrin, have established a different analysis. The Communists and their allies had fought hard for control of the Newspaper Guild at PM, and the resulting acrimony may have been construed by some other staff members as an attempted editorial coup. Domination of the Guild unit, which, after all, was through an elective process, had been interpreted as domination of PM itself.

Schiffrin has shown that PM had a consistent Left-liberal policy. It often opposed the Communist Party line, editorially sparred with the Daily Worker and New Masses, scoffed at zigzags in the Communist Party line, and downplayed or totally ignored many activities of the Party and its front organizations. A more fundamental problem for PM than radicals had been that Ingersoll, who had a clear vision for the publication, had left his post to fight in World War II. John R. Lewis, his replacement, did not have Ingersoll's skills. Production problems made PM the most expensive of all the New York City dailies and chronic mismanagement resulted in PM's usually being the last paper to hit the stands. Adding to the price/lateness problem was that rivals had persuaded many newsdealers not to carry the paper at all or to display it poorly.

An underlying financial stress was that Field had decided that PM would carry no advertising, a policy that was not altered until the paper was near collapse. While altruistic, the no-advertising policy not only deprived the paper of needed income but of a feature the general public found positive, if not essential. PM was an aesthetic challenge to readers as well. The size and number of photos, the use of colored paper, the nature of some features, the general layout and topography, the early use of staples for binding, and other stylistic aspects were highly influenced by news-weekly formats. These innovations seem to have alienated rather than excited readers, who were also put off by the erratic quality of some of the reporting and the unorthodox editorial perspective. As James Aronson commented some years later, what may have been most remarkable about PM was that it survived for as long as it did.

The ultimate collapse of PM was a product of the changing political tides. From the mid-1930s to the early 1940s liberals had found it natural to think of radicals as having a legitimate and creative role in American society. PM's founders believed a postwar movement to the left was inevitable and would be enriched by a newspaper that, free from the pressure of advertisers, could expose injustice fearlessly. The end of the war brought a much different era than had been anticipated. That Wechsler, a member of the Young Communist League from 1934 to 1937, was prominent in attacking PM is reflective of changing liberal attitudes. Wechsler would become a founder of the liberal Americans for Democratic Action in 1947, and by the early 1950s he had established himself as a respectable anti-communist who opposed McCarthyism on the grounds it was the wrong method for attacking a movement all Americans should regard as genuinely evil.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Hawes, Elizabeth; National Guardian.]

FURTHER READING

- Aronson, James. The Press and the Cold War. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1970.
- Belfrage, Cedric and James Aronson. Something to Guard: The Stormy Life of the National Guardian, 1948-1967. New York: Columbia University Press, 1978.
- Milkman, Paul. PM. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Schiffrin, Anya. "We are against People Who Push Other People Around: A Study of the Newspaper PM." M.A. thesis, Reed College, 1984. Available at Tamiment Library, New York University.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

POETRY, 1870-1930. In the era of printed literature's greatest media importance, poetry occupied a Left status and a popular readership that have almost steadily diminished since. The proliferation of the local press, in English and non-English languages, found and also created an expanding radical audience, in many cases among a first literate generation. Poets occupied an important, sometimes central role in delivering the battle cry of the Left, mourning the tragedy of impoverishment and servitude, and intoning the eternal song of freedom.

English-language American radical poetry had several distinct origins. From Philip Freneau to William Cullen Bryant to John Greenleaf Whittier, many poets have mixed democratic aspirations with melancholy, as if the highest political ideals were themselves transitory or unrealizable in American life. This sentiment found its overwhelming popular and radical expression in the reform agitations of the 1830s-1850s, touched both by utopian socialism and by a growing sense of dread. Militant women, at the center of agitational and popular literary energy, expressed themselves freely in a radical, "spiritualistic," frequently antiracist vein. Some of their leading political figures, such as writer-agitator Elizabeth Oakes Smith, doubled as important popular poets. Indeed, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," a major creative expression of the Civil War written by reformer Julia Ward Howe, can be seen as a foremost result of this ferment. Intimately related modes of versifying continued well into the early twentieth century, sometimes achieving form in protofeminism, sometimes in sentimental reflection on the sorrows of the oppressed, sometimes in bold anticipations of the "Good Time Coming" under socialism. Pro-woman suffrage publications, before and after the Civil War, offered much space to poets conjuring woman's role in the new, purified society ahead. Often, the various themes of gender-consciousness, individuation, and a spiritualistic (or proto-surrealist) anticipation of bourgeois standards overwhelmed were mixed together. Thus the extraordinarily popular semiradical poet Ella Wheeler Wilcox, influenced by both gender consciousness and political events, could write, against the background of urban unrest, of her own emotions as being "like Communists," who "hate king Reason for being Royal" and would "fire his castle and burn him there."

A second current, at some points interrelated, stemmed from the venerable labor song-poem and the reformist currents of the English-speaking autodidact (generally skilled) laborer. From the early nineteenth century, in poetry written for music or for publication on special occasions, artisans had sought to distinguish themselves as a virtuous, hard-working, unique sector of American society proud to be performing their tasks without aspiring to wealth or fame. During the rise of national unions and their presses, especially in the post-Civil War period, many more writers made themselves heard. Profoundly influenced by Robert Burns, Shelley, Byron, and Swinburne, they were also enthusiastic about popular poetry—such as "Man with a Hoe," by Edwin Markham (himself an editor of Poe's published works)—that expressed the endurance and bubbling rage of the downtrodden.

Some of these currents flowed directly into the English-language socialist movement of the 1890s. Hard-pressed to maintain their status in the recession, and increasingly convinced that their America had been stolen away, such poets turned to a millenarianism that crystallized around the image of railroad leader Eugene V. Debs. Six years later, even James Whitcomb Riley wrote verse for Debs's first presidential campaign. And a "proletarian literature" of republican pride and dignity found its way into the far-flung socialist press. Meanwhile, many poets had rallied to the Bellamy nationalist movement. The New Nation and other Bellamyist periodicals published radical verse by Charlotte Perkins Gilman (collected in her contemporary volume In This Our World and used popularly by soapbox speakers for almost two generations), by Stuart Merrill (who was soon to become an important figure of Stéphane Mallarmé's symbolist movement in France) and Voltairine de Cleyre, who by the turn of the century had become America's best-known anarchist poet.

Yet a third current can be found in Walt Whitman's legacy of free expression, the vision of the open road, and love unfettered by law. Whitman's literary executor and for decades his reputation's chief publicist, Horace Traubel (1858-1919), was for many socialists and their sympathizers (including Traubel's own intimate admirers, among them Don Marquis, Helen Keller, Jack London, and Debs himself) the apex of this inspiration.

Traubel's Conservator, the premier socialist literary journal, 1890-1919, carried on the business of Whitman popularization through annual meetings and a steady stream of essays. It also sought to reconcile Whitman with William Morris, Debs, and the literary-political developments of the day as the completion of Whitman's vision, "the singer ascendant beyond and become a prophet" voicing the "soul of the workman" as the key reconstructive force of the civilization. In Traubel's own poetry, socialism ("the first glow of the earthly paradise which will yet be in the complete possession of man") called out for fulfillment.

In the more popular socialist press, these three themes of sentimental-mystical reformism, republican virtue, and socialist predestination mixed willy-nilly. Some of the most beloved writers worked at the strictly agitational level with humor or pathos. H. M. Tichenor, a popular columnist for the National Rip-Saw (and editor of his own socialistic free-thought monthly, the Melting Pot) wrote an ironic brand of poetry without formal stanzas. Farther west, in the "red Oklahoma" where Socialist Party influence reached its highest national level, former Populist agitator Tad Cumbie wrote the well-circulated New Songs of Freedom for the socialist audiences to sing.

The poetry of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) struck a new note by its pointed indifference to other work ethic, and by abandonment of the sentimental feminine themes of simple virtue. Wobbly poets sounded the tone, in the lumber camps, hobo "jungles," and agricultural fields, that the society that submerged its inhabitants deserved no respect or loyalty. Instead of the tearful laments and good-natured hopefulness of earlier craft-oriented labor poets, Wobblies sang defiantly of workers' revenge in such apocalyptic lyrics as Covington Hall's "Us Hoboes and Dreamers" and Ralph Chaplin's "When the Leaves Come Out," a paean to class war that Mary Marcy declared was the most popular poem ever published in the International Socialist Review.

Wobbly poets also reestablished the primacy of satirical verse, as in Richard Brazier's devastating parody of the bourgeois-celebratory anthem of the World's Fair, "Meet Me In St. Looie." Often prefiguring what would later be called "black humor," satire was also the hallmark of the Wobbly songs of Joe Hill and T-Bone Slim, as well as of Laura Tane's verse portrayals of "women's work."

Arturo Giovannitti, one of the most renowned American poets of the day, editor of IWW-publicizing Il Proletario and agitator-hero of the Lawrence, Massachusetts, "Bread and Roses" strike, contributed his famous verse, "The Walker," from his Massachusetts prison cell. (The IWW quickly and frequently thereafter issued it as a booklet.)

In the pages of the Masses, its successor the Liberator, and a handful of other semibohemian publications linked to radicalism, a new aesthetic began to take hold. Here, what passed for high-aesthetic poetry, always thought to possess transcendent powers, gained a new playfulness and (to a lesser degree) a modernist free-form. It acquired a dignity in and of its own sake, in the writings of a Claude McKay, Max Eastman, or John Reed, better known for other work.

Most noticeably, it took on a more strident, avowedly feminist eagerness for a female sexuality scarcely imagined in sentimental poetry. May Days, Genevieve Taggard's 1925 anthology, marked by her perceptive introduction, best presents this aspect as well as the larger drift of radical poetry in the era.

The quasi-modernism of the "Chicago" or Midwestern School, and the intended realism of Carl Sandburg among others, proved the major final note for the English-language socialist poetry aesthetic. Successors to an older bohemianism, Chicago realists both iconoclastic and socialistic sought to confront the dirt, chaos, and rampant exploitation in the modern metropolis with unflinching collective self-recognition. Carl Sandburg, the most active socialist of the major poets, offered hymns to industrial reality, with occasional side-glances of sympathy toward radical opponents. Lyricist Vachel Lindsay's "Why I Vote the Socialist Ticket" probably overstated his enthusiasm for socialism, but not his repugnance at American smugness or his veneration for the real American heroes (foremost, Lincoln) now turned into convenient symbols of reactionary ideals. More aggressively innovative expressions of a liberatory modernism—such as Mina Loy's exuberant feminist futurism/dadaism, Samuel Greenberg's Lower East Side surrealism, and Lew Sarrett's wild evocations of the ecological consciousness of Native Americans—remained isolated from the broad Left, and found few followers in the classically oriented English-language literary milieu.

Disparate and inchoate as any fixed trend, socialist poetry disappeared almost as swiftly after 1920 as the publications that had made it available to great numbers of readers. Its main currents belonged to milieus vanishing from the center of American culture. Perhaps Genevieve Taggard's final anthology, Long View (1942), best suggests how poorly this mode stood up to the treatment of such later themes as Russia, the Spanish Civil War, and the "Negro people." Individual socialist poets continued to produce some excellent work—Lola Ridge is perhaps the brightest example from the 1920s—but rather as late blooms of a fading tradition than as bards of a living and growing movement. Thus Marcus Graham's outstanding 350-page Anthology of Revolutionary Poetry (1929) proved to be a tribute to past glory, not a harbinging of things to come.

[See also de Cleyre, Voltairine; Giovannitti, Arturo; Liberator; Masses; McKay, Claude; Radical Poetry, 1930s–1960s; Sandburg, Carl.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and the American Left: A Guide to Sources. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1983.

Duffey, Bernard. The Chicago Renaissance in American Letters: A Critical History. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1956.

—PAUL BUHLE

POETRY, RADICAL, 1930s–1960s. See Radical Poetry, 1930s–1960s.

POLISH AMERICANS. In the mid-1880s émigré intellectuals from Poland established the first Polish socialist societies in the United States. They soon formed several dozen Polish locals of the Socialist Labor Party, which attracted immigrant craftsmen and industrial workers from the Prussian partition, many of whom had had previous contact with socialists in Europe and German anarchists in America. By 1900 experienced organizers from Russian Poland created the Związek Socjalistów Polskich (Polish Socialist Alliance), which supported the left wing of the Polish independence movement aiming to reunite Polish territories absorbed into the Russian, Prussian, and Austrian empires.

In 1908 the alliance split into a minority that supported Józef Piłsudski's faction in Europe (dedicated to building a secret military organization and terrorist actions against czarist authority) and a majority that stressed mass education and cooperation with the labor movement. The majority faction formed itself into the Polish Section of the Socialist Party and published the Dziennik Ludowy (People's Daily) at its Chicago headquarters. The most important constituency for both groups came from literate semi-skilled and skilled workers with some urban experience before emigration, especially those from the Russian-dominated partition. Many were recruited through the popular education programs of the People's University run by the Polish Section and by leftist activists among miners in the Pennsylvania anthracite region and textile workers in New England. By 1914 the combined membership of both factions was about ten thousand. Polish socialists achieved wider influence by holding key positions and organizing locals in the Polish National Alliance, the leading secular fraternal, the Związek Młodzieży Polskiej (Young Men's Alliance), and the Związek Sokołów (Falcons).

In 1912 both factions agreed to back Piłsudski in the coming war to force the demand for a democratic Polish state onto the international diplomatic agenda; a Left coalition dominated the Komitet Obrony Narodowej (Committee for National Defense), created to raise funds and volunteers from America for the Legions. By 1916 most of the Polish Section was expelled from the anti-war Socialist Party. Once the United States entered the war and supported the formation of a Polish army in France, the Polish Left became further isolated—failing to convince the majority of Polish Americans that the new army was a tool of Roman Dmowski's right-wing National Democratic Party. The committee also had problems explaining to U.S. military intelligence the anticzarist nature of Piłsudski's alliance with Germany. In the meantime, a handful of anti-war Poles, tied to Rosa Luxemburg's Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania, took over the shell of the Polish Section of the Socialist Party and eventually formed the Polish Bureau of the Communist Party of the United States. In the 1920s the bulk of the old Polish Left, having lost a great deal of its credibility (with Polish Americans and with the American Socialist Party) during the war, concentrated on the more exciting task of building the socialist movement in the new Polish state.

In the 1930s "Billy" Gebert and other members of the Polish Bureau played a leading role in organizing second-generation Polish Americans in the auto, steel, and meat-packing industries into the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Their paper, the Głos Ludowy (People's Voice), was published in Detroit into the 1970s. Leo Krzycki (chair of the Socialist Party's national executive committee and vice president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America on loan to the Congress of Industrial Organizations from 1936) and Stanley Nowak were also key labor organizers who emerged from the Polish Left during this period. Nowak had a large popular following and was elected several times to the Michigan State Assembly.

In 1942 Gebert, Krzycki, Nowak, and Oskar Lange (the University of Chicago economist) helped found the American Slav Congress, which supported Roosevelt's wartime alliance with the Soviet Union. As in World War I, positions taken by the organized Polish American Left on foreign affairs alienated the majority of Polish Americans—this was especially true after the Yalta agreement of 1945.

[See also American Slav Congress.]

FURTHER READING

- Brożek, Andrzej. Polish Americans, 1854–1939. Warsaw: Interpress, 1985.
- Frančić, Mirosław. Komitet Obrony Narodowej w Ameryce, 1912–1918. Wrocław: Ossolineum, 1983.
- Gebert, Bolesław. Z Tykocina za Ocean. Warsaw: Czytelnik, 1982.
- Groniowski, Krzysztof. "Socjalistyczna Emigracja Polska w USA." Z Pola Walki, no. 1 (1977).
- Nowak, Margaret Collingwood. Two Who Were There. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1990.
- Pamiętniki Emigrantów, Stany Zjednoczone*. Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1977.
- Wieczerszak, Joseph. "Bishop Francis Hodur and the Socialists." Polish American Studies 40 (fall 1983).

—MARY CYGAN

POLITICAL DEPORTATIONS. Since 1903, federal officials have used political deportations to punish individuals, promote ideological purity, and disrupt social protest. Targeting affiliations and behavior legal for citizens, these expulsions fit a framework crafted in 1890s Chinese exclusion cases in which the Supreme Court ruled that since deportation was not "punishment for crime," deportees had no right to jury trials and no protection against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, unreasonable searches, or double jeopardy.

For a century after the 1798 Alien Act expired, the United States had no provisions for deporting radicals. In 1903, after native-born Leon Czołgosz assassinated President McKinley, Congress made those who came with anarchist beliefs and who had lived in the United States fewer than three years liable to deportation. Because of the law's time limits and narrow focus, only a handful of leftists were deported before World War I. Driven by wartime intolerance and a desire to destroy the Industrial Workers of the World, in 1917 and 1918 Congress removed the time limits and made belief in the violent overthrow of the government or the unlawful destruction of property and membership in or financial contributions to groups advocating such behavior grounds for deportation.

These changes made deportations a key weapon in the postwar Red Scare. Unable to move effectively against citizens, the Justice Department worked closely with the Labor Department's Immigration Bureau. On 7 November 1919, they launched violent raids against the Union of Russian Workers. Within seven weeks, at least 235 radicals were hustled aboard the SS Buford bound for Europe. Besides members of the Union of Russian Workers, these deportees included anarchists Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman.

On 2 January 1920, mass arrests swept up approximately six thousand victims. The prompt release of nearly two thousand citizens made it clear that deportation was a weapon of convenience against otherwise legal activity. Labor Department officials disrupted this "deportations delirium," ordering the deportation of Communist Party but not Communist Labor Party members. Assistant Secretary of Labor Louis Post, who reviewed individual cases, insisted that if the standard had been personal beliefs, not party membership, he would have deported only a "canoe load."

By the mid-twenties, Red Scare cases had worked through the system, resulting in approximately a thousand political deportations. From 1925 to 1930, sixteen radicals were expelled explicitly for their politics. The drop-off reflected reduced activism plus the Soviet Union's refusal to accept deportees. Still, the late twenties showed a continuity in deportation policy. The Immigration Bureau rolled back due process reforms implemented after the Palmer Raids. During the 1928 New Bedford textile strike, city officials unsuccessfully urged the deportation of Communist activists. Similar requests would play a major role in 1930s' deportations.

With the Depression, Secretary of Labor William Doak aggressively pursued noncitizen radicals. Lacking Justice Department assistance, the Immigration Bureau relied on local immigration inspectors, who often used preliminary interviews without legal representation and warrantless searches. Most cases involved individuals or small groups brought to the inspectors' attention during Left-led protests. Deportees included journalists and unemployed activists. Labor activists were a prime target, and Trade Union Unity League membership became grounds for deportation.

The Immigration Bureau tried to punish radicals by deporting them to repressive homelands rather than permitting departure to a third country.

Political deportations became less of a priority after 1933. The dissolution of the Trade Union Unity League and increased activism by the American Federation of Labor shielded leftists somewhat. Federal officials canceled a few expulsions, at times to avoid court challenges. But expulsions continued, with most of the decade's 254 political deportations occurring during 1933–1939. Several noncitizens arrested during the 1934 West Coast longshore strike were deported. German-born leftists continued to face deportation, although by the late 1930s some were allowed to seek refuge in Mexico. By 1938, the government had begun its two-decade campaign against Harry Bridges.

The International Labor Defense aggressively supported these deportees, but immigration officials' broad discretion and the Supreme Court's reluctance to grant habeas corpus writs in political cases hamstrung efforts to block deportations. The International Labor Defense had more luck helping deportees avoid being sent to right-wing regimes.

During the late 1940s, foreign-born radicals became targets of Cold War policies. With the Immigration and Naturalization Service now part of the Justice Department, these efforts became more coordinated. By the mid-1950s, hundreds were entangled in the deportation mechanism. Most were longtime residents; some had come to the United States as infants; nearly all had lived in the country more than twenty years. Some were Communist leaders; others had left the Communist Party twenty years earlier. In several cases, immigration officials resurrected deportation warrants canceled in the 1930s. Although the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries refused to accept deportees, natives of these countries spent years battling the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Immigration officials harassed those caught in their web by denying bail or imposing onerous bail conditions. Although overruled by judges, these bail policies drained resources and wore down those involved. The government also attacked the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, the deportees' leading defender. Although the number of political deportees was much fewer than during the Red Scare, the Cold War offensive imposed terrible hardships on those threatened with expulsion and intimidated thousands more.

The changing composition of the American Left made these cases the last major deportation drive against domestic radical organizations. Since then, political deportations have had a different emphasis. Employers have used the Immigration and Naturalization Service to disrupt union organizing campaigns involving undocumented immigrants. During the 1980s, the Central American solidarity movement fought the deportation of those fleeing U.S.-backed death-squad regimes, eventually winning temporary refugee status for Salvadorans. But the Los Angeles Eight case involving Palestinians called attention to continued efforts to mute dissent by punishing immigrants for beliefs and associations legal for citizens and underscored deportation policy's long-standing disregard for civil liberties.

[See also American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born; King, Carol Weiss; Red Scare.]

FURTHER READING

- Caute, David. The Great Fear: The Anti-Communist Purge under Truman and Eisenhower. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1978.
- Ginger, Ann Fagan. Carol Weiss King: Human Rights Lawyer, 1895–1952. Niwot: University Press of Colorado, 1993.
- Ginger, Ann Fagan. "Political Deportations: 1944–1954." Science and Society 19, no. 2 (1955).
- Ginger, Ann Fagan. "Political Deportations in the United States: A Study in the Enforcement Procedures, 1919–1952." Lawyers Guild Review 14, no. 3 (1954).
- Post, Louis F. Deportations Delirium of Nineteen-Twenty: A Personal Narrative of an Historic Official Experience. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1923.
- Preston, William. Aliens and Dissenters: Federal Suppression of Radicals, 1903–1933. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1963.

—DEXTER ARNOLD

POLITICAL STUDIES. The fate of Left scholarship in political studies has been closely linked to wider social struggles. From the Second World War until the 1960s, with some exceptions, the field was thoroughly conservative in the United States. Most political scientists believed the political system to be fully open and democratic: all groups able to participate freely; government broadly responsive to all interests, not especially committed to any; and there were no deep or cumulative inequalities. Class, gender, and racial cleavages were barely mentioned. Although political scientists noted the low level of public participation by the poor, they took this acquiescence as evidence of apathy and of satisfaction with the system.

The civil rights and anti-war movements of the 1960s stimulated a wave of Left research, mostly outside political science. C. Wright Mills, G. William Domhoff, Seymour Melman, Frances Fox Piven, and Richard A. Cloward, among others, nevertheless addressed political questions. As Marxist critics later noted, many of these scholars accepted, however, the pluralist theoretical framework by focusing on groups rather than classes, and government institutions rather than the state. Their scholarship, while critical, had not been informed by a socialist vision.

By the 1970s, a second wave of scholarship—this time heavily influenced by European Marxism—shifted focus from government to the state, a move later accepted throughout the political science discipline. The term state signifies that the political and social order do not cohere naturally but are structured by an agency whose primary activity is to reproduce the existing system. The new focus also included examining how the functioning of American capitalism forged class inequalities within the United States and abroad, as well as dictated (and distorted) political priorities.

Initially, scholars assumed that reproduction of a capitalist economy was quite straightforward. A leading example was Ralph Miliband, a British theorist, who argued in The State in Capitalist Society that there was a close link between the economic and political elites within capitalist societies; indeed, at their higher reaches the two groups are close to being one. Soon, however, a number of scholars heavily influenced by Marxism emphasized the difficulties in reproducing liberal democracy. James O'Connor's The Fiscal Crisis of the State and various essays by Samuel Bowles and Herbert Gintis highlighted the uneasy relationship between capitalist production and democratic political institutions. They argued that the state in capitalist democracies is responsible to two constituencies: it obtains its legitimacy from electoral majorities and, in order to gain widespread support, must distribute material and other benefits on a broad basis. The state is also dependent upon capitalists, however, to assure economic growth and prosperity, and in order to gain their cooperation must pursue probusiness policies that conflict with the interests of the majority. The state's attempt to placate both groups simultaneously provides a key to understanding politics in the United States and other capitalist democracies. Many Left scholars therefore studied the ways in which Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party organized a cross-class alliance that effectively contained class conflict for several decades after the Second World War. Progrowth "Keynesian coalitions," in which limited struggles for distribution of the fruits of capitalist growth replaced struggles over the legitimacy of capitalism itself, were found throughout the Western world but especially in the United States, where the absence of a major socialist party denied workers representation on a class basis in the political system.

Left scholars proved prescient in arguing that the state would be unable to contain class contradictions indefinitely. Their works provided tools for analyzing economic crisis and political instability of 1970s–1980s. They were less successful, however, at predicting the rise of the "populist" Right or in developing Left proposals to resolve the crisis. By the 1980s, a diffusion of Left themes within the broader political science discipline coincided with a decline of radical political scholarship.

[See also Mills, Charles Wright.]

FURTHER READING

Miliband, Ralph, et al. Socialist Register. London: Merlin Press, annual from 1965.

—MARK KESSELMAN

POLITICAL THEATER, 1960s–1980s. The 1960s counterculture inspired a political theater that was considerably different from that of the 1930s. Rather than preparing plays, actors, and playwrights to more or less "conquer" Broadway, the new theater, greatly influenced by Antonin Artaud and Bertolt Brecht, generally had disdain for conventional theatrical forms and physical settings. The new works were often revues and open-ended skits performed in other than theatrical settings. Many of the companies became communal troupes that traveled extensively. Scores of these companies existed throughout the United States and a few, such as the Living Theater, Bread and Puppet Theater, and the San Francisco Mime Troupe, had national and even international impact.

The single most influential of the new theater companies was the Living Theater, conceived in 1946 by anarchists Julian Beck and Judith Malina. Origin-nally presenting plays by well-known writers such as Racine, Auden, Cocteau, and Pirandello, the Living Theater slowly moved to introducing plays by new American playwrights, the most notable success being Jack Gelber's The Connection. Both Beck and Malina were regular participants in anti-war demonstrations and were occasionally fined and jailed. With the 1960s the Living Theater became a commune that created collective works designed to stimulate audiences to direct action. While remaining highly political in content, the collective's work was increasingly abstract in form. The Living Theater toured for long periods in Europe and Latin America, and members of the collective often split away to form their own groups. The Living Theater's most ambitious later works were Paradise Now and Frankenstein.

One of the most distinctive groups in the mass demonstrations of the 1960s was the Bread and Puppet Theater. Using puppets and masks ranging in size from hand-held objects to giant twenty-footers, the group, begun by Peter Schumann, specialized in outdoor events. First appearing at rallies protesting the war in Vietnam, the company was still active in the 1980s in events protesting the nuclear arms race and American interventions in Latin America.

Another 1960s group with staying power is the San Francisco Mime Troupe, which was started by Ronnie Davis in 1959 as a subdivision of the San Francisco Actors Workshop. The group originally played only in public parks. Through the years the troupe created works that could be played indoors and at other special settings. The style favored broad comedy: the loud voice, the typed character, the exaggerated gesture, audacious costumes, bold makeup, and easily followed stories. The troupe found comic hyperbole ideal for the conditions it satirized for a mass audience.

The Pageant Players of New York also chose to perform in public places in the 1960s, mainly in streets and laundromats. Their first play, Paper Tiger, was performed at an anti-war rally in 1965. It featured live music, exaggerated costumes, and no speaking roles. The group continued to perform on street corners, in parks, in lofts, inside laundromats, and occasionally in theaters throughout the New Left period. One of the group's hallmarks was its inclusion of live rock-and-roll music whenever possible.

Although New York generated the most theatrical activity, there were production groups in many cities. In Detroit, socialist Edith Carroll Cantor launched the Unstabled Coffeehouse, which presented plays on weekends, launched comedian Lily Tomlin on a career that would take her to national stardom, and spun off the Concept East, a black theater company run by Woodie King. One of the Unstabled productions was Sitdown '37, an original play presented to a United Auto Workers audience in Flint on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the sit-down strikes that unionized General Motors. Groups in other cities include the Firehouse Theater, set up in Minneapolis in 1965; the Caravan Theater of Boston, begun in 1965 under the sponsorship of the American Friends Service Committee; the Performance Group of Chicago, founded by Richard Schechner in 1967; and the Om Theater of Boston, begun by Julie Portman in 1966.

All of the groups were racially integrated, but there were also companies set up to showcase the writing, directing, and acting talents of nonwhites. While somewhat more conventional in their choice of plays and settings, these theaters remained innovative in comparison to the nonpolitical theater. Among the most important of the groups was the New York extension of Detroit's Concept East. Director Woodie King eventually became head of the Franklin Street Theater and was responsible for a number of Broadway productions. LeRoi Jones (soon to be Amiri Baraka) and Larry Neal set up black theater groups in Harlem and later in Newark, New Jersey. Playwright Ed Bullins, then minister of culture for the Black Panther Party, set up the Black Troupe in New York City in 1968. The company was short-lived, as had been Theater Black, formed in Cleveland in 1966.

The major non-English language theater of the period was El Teatro Campesino (the Farm Workers' Theater), a traveling company established in 1965 by Luis Miguel Valdez in Delano, California, as part of the lettuce boycott campaign orchestrated by the United Farm Workers union led by César Chávez. The productions were primarily aimed at recruiting farm workers in labor camps and in small towns. Plays were also produced for supporters of the union who lived in major cities.

A Spanish connection was also integral to the Gut Theater of East Harlem, which grew out of Enrique Vargas's 1967 work with street gangs. The teenagers created plays based on their own life experiences and in opposition to the war in Vietnam. Much of the work was slapstick in style. One thirty-minute production, The Bench, dealt with a Puerto Rican family freshly arrived in New York. The Drama Group of Mobilization for Youth on New York's Lower East Side dealt with similar themes in a like manner.

The single most performed play of the time was Barbara Garson's MacBird, a satire on the war in Vietnam. Garson first comprehended the power of public performance during massive rallies in San Francisco. Like many 1960s authors, Garson pursued various forms of writing. In addition to subsequent plays for adults and children, she also wrote nonfiction about office workers.

Among those who practiced more traditional forms of political theater was Buffalo-based Emmuel J. Fried. In the 1930s he had worked in New York with Clifford Odets, Elia Kazan, and other militants in a subsection of the Group Theater. He had also taken dancing lessons from Martha Graham. Throughout the 1940s and 1950s, Fried was a labor organizer, an activity that brought him to the attention of the House Un-American Activities Committee. He then turned to writing a series of labor plays that have been performed by alternative theaters in most major U.S. cities. His best-known works are The Dodo Bird and Drop Hammer.

As the radical movement began to wane in the 1970s, many theatrical groups collapsed or began to perform indoors. New groups sprang up to attempt the establishment of permanent radical theaters in major cities. One of the most successful for a time was the Labor Theater, created by Chuck Portz and Bette Craig. The group staged plays about the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), Jack London, black outlaws, and labor education programs. The theater also shaped a feminist revue, I Just Wanted Someone to Know, written by Bette Craig and IWW historian Joyce Kornbluh.

A trend that accelerated in the 1980s was that radical directors, actors, and writers began to find employment in conventional radio, film, and television. They did not see this as a retreat from their old ideals so much as an accommodation to a new political climate and another means of trying to reach a mass audience. A handful of groups continued in the non-traditional vein. In addition to groups already cited, Heart of the Beast, a theatrical company in Minneapolis, became the focal point of the May Day parades revived in the Twin Cities in 1974. Combining socialist, environmental, and pagan themes, the parades wind through residential areas before culminating at a public park for a day of outdoor festivities. Until her death in 1996, radical author Meridel

Le Sueur acted as grand marshal. Upwards of ten thousand people participate annually.

Hardly any of the companies formed in the 1960s and 1970s survived into the 1990s. The major exception was the Bread and Puppet group, which continued to appear at political events of all kinds. More commonly, individuals who had been involved in the movement became associated with more conventional theater and media projects. For example, a number of actors who had performed in the Labor Theater productions became prominent in television or film, the most famous being Bruce Willis.

FURTHER READING

Craig, Bette, and Joyce Kornbluh. I Just Wanted Someone to Know. Introduction by Barbara Mayer Wertheimer. New York: Smyrna Press, 1981.

Radical Theatre Repertory, 1968–1969. New York: Radical Theater Repertory, 1970.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

POPULAR CULTURE. An important if little understood element of the Left experience in the United States during the last hundred years, popular culture can be defined, quite simply, as culture that is consumed by large numbers of people, "largeness" being relative to activity and milieu. The term itself has been used to describe everything from the cheap novels promoting the virtues of the work ethic that proliferated following the Civil War to the words, phrases, and jingles that enter common parlance via television commercials today. The term should be distinguished from folk culture, which refers specifically to nonliterate culture that is laterally bartered by members of a preindustrial society, and from mass culture, which is a term of opprobrium used to describe cultural items that are tailored by an economic elite to sell the greatest number of units without regard to aesthetic sacrifice.

During the late nineteenth century, American socialist movements consolidated their power in immigrant communities by offering Left alternatives to the dominant Anglocentric culture. Quasi-religious forms, including martyrology, holiday feasting, liturgical music, and iconography assumed revolutionary identities in linguistically and religiously isolated communities struggling to maintain familiar customs against the pressures of hegemonic assimilation. The group or workers' picnic, reputedly launched by German American freethinkers to circumvent blue laws that closed public houses on Sundays and thus further restricted the precious little free-time allowed by sixty-hour work weeks, brought together families, neighbors, and co-workers in an environment that allowed for beer drinking and general camaraderie, but also often included political speeches or even didactic theatrical pageants. The establishment of ethnic "social clubs" for entertainment, education, and the promotion of organized sports can be seen as institutionalizations of "picnic" culture. The social club phenomenon persists among recently arrived immigrant groups today.

By the turn of the century, radical immigrant movements increasingly expressed themselves in the press. Virtually every ethnic group of size developed at least one inexpensive, widely distributed organ that brought together Old World cultural themes with immediate political, social, and economic causes. Daily newspapers served not only as conduits for news and editorial opinion, but as the cultural patrons of local poets, cartoonists, and fiction writers. Many papers translated popular European and American novelists into the languages of their constituencies. In some ethnic subcultures, notably Italian (but also Finnish), the mockery of religious institutions and personalities provided a mirror alternative to official culture; catechisms were a favored form of parody. In some cases, this kind of ethnic political activism survived into the radio age. In New York, the Yiddish-language radio station was identified by the call letters WEVD (for "Eugene V. Debs").

Mainstream commercial popular culture, which posed a threat to ethnic identity, appeared as a Janus-faced symbol to many immigrants. On the one hand, it was a threatening vessel of characteristically racist xenophobia. But at the same time, an appreciation of popular songs, films, books, plays, and other works seemed essential to finding one's place in the New World. Charlie Chaplin, greatly loved by the immigrant masses, suggested the universal and progressive possibilities of the cinema and of popular culture in general.

Native-born American radicals generally took a much less eclectic approach to popular culture, tending to focus their energies on literary forms. Walt Whitman, in Democratic Vistas (1871), stressed the point that the existence of any democracy is absolutely dependent upon the vitality of its popular culture; that is, the medium by which ideas are circulated and discussed among the masses of citizens.

But even Whitman used the term "divine literatus" to describe the ideal artist of such a culture. Abolitionists could proudly claim Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin in this respect. Christian utopian socialists, woman suffragists, and agrarian protest movements all produced popular and would-be popular literary works, as did leftist strains of spiritualism and temperance.

Native-born labor traditions, rooted in the republican prerogatives of the skilled worker, fostered the translation of popular songs into socialistic poems, which appeared widely in labor publications. James Whitcomb Riley, the "Hoosier Poet" whose works attracted a vast audience, brought the central themes of republican virtue together with piety in a lyric for the 1900 presidential campaign of his intimate friend:

An' there's 'Gene Debs, a man 'at stands
An' jist holds up in his two hands
The kindest heart that ever beat
Betwixt here an' the judgment seat.

But in neither the immigrant nor the native-born encounters with popular culture did the concept of culture as the location of mass consciousness—as the expression of a yearning for a better life—emerge on any theoretical or ideological basis. In Europe, quite the opposite was true. Such theoretical argumentation about the role of popular culture in revolutionary consciousness pervaded the prison notebooks of Antonio Gramsci and the theater of Bertolt Brecht. The writings of T. W. Adorno, Max Horkheimer, Herbert Marcuse, and other members of the Frankfurt School group would bring these issues to bear in America only after World War II.

Direct leftist involvement in mainstream American popular culture reached its apogee during the Popular Front era of the mid- and late 1930s. During this period a wide variety of political progressives helped promote a genuine appreciation of Afro-American music (specifically, the blues) and of liberal and Left-leaning elements in film (such as the Warner Brothers films of social conscience). Even sports heroes, such as Joe Louis, were enshrined as Cincinnatus figures. A hostile reaction to the acceptance of these popular forms by highbrow Left intellectuals galvanized in the pages of the Partisan Review. The masses, according to this bookish analysis, needed to be uplifted to the great (i.e., European) works, not patronized with such capitalist consumer schlock as un-tutored music, Hollywood movies, and professional sports. Clement Greenberg's 1930 essay "Avant-garde and Kitsch" rejected the American popular cultural imagination as a nightmare of degradation.

Twenty years later, Dissent's unremitting hostility toward popular culture reaffirmed that nothing essential had changed the minds of the now highly prestigious liberal-socialist intelligentsia. Among the popular arts, film alone had been allowed to graduate from "degradation" status into the arena of sympathetic discussion, largely because a new bête noire, television, had lifted it out of the cultural basement. Dwight Macdonald, who in 1953 had claimed that it was structurally impossible for Hollywood to produce a worthwhile film, actually became a film critic before the end of the decade. The surrealist-minded film critic Parker Tyler, who shared Macdonald's Trotskyist leanings, was perhaps the single exception to this condescending view (see especially The Hollywood Hallucination).

One of the arenas of popular culture where the Left, particularly Communists, played a dynamic role was in Hollywood. Communist leaders had few clear ideas about what film might do. They demanded little more of their several hundred movie industry members than financial contributions. Thus, left-wing writers, directors, and actors had to devise their own methods through discussions among themselves on how to influence films to the degree that was possible within the studio system. Until the 1930s, relatively few opportunities emerged, even though a handful of left-wingers had already written some of Hollywood's classic crime, horror, and humor films. The rise of Hitler, the emergence of an antifascist climate, and World War II gave the Popular Front milieu increasing means to experiment within the limits of studio guidelines. Adding to the intellectual environment was the founding of the Hollywood Quarterly in 1946. Until its purging in 1949–1950, the magazine, in effect, served as the theoretical publication of the film industry's Popular Front.

Across the full spectrum of genres, from "B" comedies and westerns to social realist noirs to children's films, the influence of left-wing scriptwriters was often buried in hack formulas or too subtle for easy detection. Nonetheless, dozens of writers, a few directors, and lyricists made notable contributions to films seen during their time at neighborhood theaters and widely available since on television or as video rentals. Leftists made significant contributions to more than nine hundred Hollywood films. A short list of left-wing scriptwriters and their best-remembered films, including a handful after the blacklist had been lifted, would include: Ben Barzman (The Boy with Green Hair, Back to Bataan, and Give Us This Day), Leonardo Bercovici (The Bishop's Wife), Walter Bernstein (The Molly Maguires and The Front), John Bright (Public Enemy, He Done Her Wrong, and Back Door to Heaven), Hugo Butler (Lassie Come Home and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe), Edward Chodorov (Mayor of Hell and The Hucksters), Howard Dimsdale (National Velvet), Guy Endore (The Devil Doll and Sinbad), Francis Faragoh (Little Caesar and My Friend Flicka), Carl Foreman (High Noon), Paul Jarrico (Tom, Dick and Harry), Gordon Kahn (Buy Me This Town), Howard Koch (Casablanca and Mission to Moscow), Alfred Lewis Levitt (The Boy with Green Hair and The Monkey's Uncle), Ben Maddow (Intruder in the Dust and Asphalt Jungle), Mortimer Offner (Sylvia Scarlett and Alice Adams), Maurice Rapf (Song of the South and Cinderella), Marguerite Roberts (Dragon Seed and True Grit), Waldo Salt (Shopworn Angel, Midnight Cowboy, and Coming Home), Donald Ogden Stewart (The Philadelphia Story and Kitty Foyle), Frank Tarloff (School for Scoundrels and Father Goose), John Wexley (Angels with Dirty Faces and The Roaring Twenties), and the writing team of Robert Lees and Fred Rinaldo (Abbott and Costello hits Buck Privates, Hold That Ghost, Wistful Widow of Wagon Gap, Abbott and Costello Meet Frankenstein, and others). A similar list of directors and their best-known work would include: John Berry (He Ran All the Way and Claudine), Jules Dassin (Naked City and Never on Sunday), Joseph Losey (A Doll's House and The Romantic Englishwoman), Abraham Polonsky (Force of Evil), and Martin Ritt (Norma Rae).

Party members could rightly claim (though they rarely did) that the commercial rise of "folk music," black and white, from the 1940s to the 1960s, owed much to them. Similarly, the Party could take some credit for the introduction to the public at large of black artists and of Afro-American cultural themes. Various film directors dated their political sensitivities to specific Communist-linked movements, especially to the early Screen Actors Guild. During the years of the blacklist, such attachments were suspended or secreted. But rarely, even at times of great optimism and openness (such as during the years immediately following World War II) did these personal engagements translate into theoretical explorations of the popular culture issue. Sidney Finkelstein's Jazz:

A People's Culture (1949), with its clumsy aesthetic formulae, marks what must pass for a high point relative to the low level of theoretical discussion.

Ironically, the popular culture explosion of the postwar era contained many events that proved to be of radical character, though these were rarely recognized as such as they happened. Bebop, an immediate precursor of rock and roll, touched off a black-white youth rebellion whose importance to the civil rights movement remains underestimated. Major league baseball was at long last integrated. Beat Generation poetry and fiction revived the Whitmanian dream of rediscovering, through the celebration of common experience, what Allen Ginsberg called "the lost America of love." The satires of Mad struck back at the monochromaticism of television. All of these phenomena, occurring in a virtual vacuum of Left interpretation under the upturned noses of the high-brow intellectuals, contributed greatly to the education of the baby-boom generation (i.e., the social rebels and war resisters of the sixties).

It was not until the late sixties, with the mammoth entertainment industrial complex now firmly established as a factor in the lives of virtually all Americans, that popular culture finally began to win recognition as a fertile field for interpretive study. Even avant-garde creative expression—nonnarrative painting and film, guerrilla theater, acid-rock music, mimeo-press poetry—tapped popular cultural icons for subject matter. "Pop art," as practiced by Andy Warhol and Robert Rauschenberg, for example, was not so much popular art as it was art that offered a critique of popular culture.

Blacklisting, which had been instituted during the birth of television and had thus had a particularly traumatic effect on that medium's development, was finally eclipsed during the early 1970s by the purchasing power of anti-war, antiracist, and profeminist baby boomers. Ring Lardner, Jr.'s *M*A*S*H* was adapted by Larry Gelbart for television into the form of the much maligned medium's most maligned genre: situation comedy. It became one of TV's greatest commercial successes. Norman Lear, a sitcom auteur whose didactic dramatic style smacked of Popular Front theater, dominated the ratings during the seventies with a string of politically liberal sitcoms, including All in the Family, Maude, and Good Times.

Rock and roll, whose very existence was a remarkable historical convergence of black rhythm and blues with poor white southern music, carried an intrinsic progressive polity that peaked during the Vietnam War. The always explicit messages of sexual freedom were joined by calls for draft resistance, racial harmony, and ecological perseverance. Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young, for example, put out a string of national hits—"Chicago", "Ohio," "Woodstock"—that can be seen as a series of virtually instantaneous analytical responses to the immediate issues of the day. With the end of the draft and the war, the rock establishment soon ossified into a formulaic corporate entity. Even so, the emergence of reggae, of Bruce Springsteen, and, to a lesser degree, of punk and politicized Afro-pop, all rowed against the otherwise politically apathetic current of the post-Vietnam period, thus underlining the continuing vitality of rebellious culture during an increasingly conservative era.

Theoretical discussion of popular culture has not kept pace with the expansion of interpretive belletristic writing on the subject that emerged during the 1980s in publications such as the Village Voice and small-circulation "fanzines" devoted to individual arts, especially film. The margins of popular culture criticism contained only a sprinkling of Althusserian or Frankfurtite abstraction here, or an occasional disquisition on the revolutionary virtues of a rock and roll band there. This situation is likely to change, however, because of increasing academic activity in the field. As the political children of the sixties gain tenure in the professoriate, the academic legitimacy of popular culture study continues to grow. Though some institutions, notably Bowling Green State University in Ohio, have attempted to formalize popular culture study into a discipline, such work is more often carried out as a subject area in any of a half dozen or more departments and programs, including American studies, semiotics, sociology, anthropology, and in some places, even history or English. Theoretical fermentation and methodological argument is just beginning to result. Feminist analysis was the first radical strain of popular culture criticism to have made anything like a broad impact on academic thinking.

In Popular Culture and High Culture, sociologist Herbert Gans makes the point that all people of all classes have aesthetic preferences and yearnings, a point not conceded by conservative critics from José Ortega y Gasset to Hilton Kramer. The general premise underpinning the entire enterprise of popular culture study is an intrinsically progressive and optimistic one: that culture has been and can become more inclusive and democratic.

[See also Dissent; Folk Music; Guthrie, Woody; Hollywood Left; Lardner, Ring, Jr.; Lawson, John Howard; Marcuse, Herbert; Partisan Review; Spiritualism; Surrealism.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Paul, ed. Popular Culture in America. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1987.
- Marc, David. Demographic Vistas: Television in American Culture. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1984.
- Marc, David. Comic Visions: Television Comedy and American Culture. London: Unwin and Hyman, 1989.
- McGilligan, Patrick, and Paul Buhle, eds. Tender Comrades: A Backstory of the Hollywood Blacklist. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.

—DAVID MARC

POPULAR FICTION. Why do radical writers produce so much popular literature with "tough-guy" characters, murder-mystery plots, and action-adventure themes? One explanation stems from the Left's long association with muckraking, the literature of exposure, and the tradition of literary naturalism. Typified by Upton Sinclair's The Jungle (1906), Jack London's Martin Eden (1909), Theodore Dreiser's An American Tragedy (1925) and Agnes Smedley's Daughter of Earth (1929), many radical novels of the first decades of the twentieth century starkly reveal the injustices of society and show how laws are biased in favor of the rich. With the onset of the Great Depression, writers promoting a hard-boiled literary sensibility in some of their fiction moved onto center stage as a major component of proletarian and revolutionary literature. Radical critics hailed Mike Gold's Jews without Money (1930), populated with many gangster characters, and James T. Farrell's Young Lonigan (1932), featuring an aspiring "tough-guy" protagonist. At the end of the decade, Richard Wright's Native Son (1940), which incorporated features of both tough-guy slum stories and detective mysteries, achieved best-seller status. Yet there is an ironic dimension to the work of Farrell and Wright that should not be missed; both of their protagonists, Studs Lonigan and Bigger Thomas, take their images of the tough guy from the mass culture that glorifies gangsters. Such delusions heighten their antisocial individualism and undermine potential ties to a community of collective struggle, which is the only foundation for social transformation. Thus the Marxist use of tough-guy motifs is not a capitulation to mass-culture gimmicks but a gesture toward the dereification of such mystifications.

Equal in importance to this joining of a hard-boiled view of society as a ferocious jungle with the class-war politics of Depression-era radicals is an economic fact of life: thrillers and mysteries were a mainstay of pulp magazines that usually paid writers by the word. Some leftists began simply by selling action tales to the pulps, usually under pseudonyms, but soon progressed to producing novels that exploited features of the genre while offering an implicitly Marxist critique of the society.

The poet Kenneth Fearing (1902–1961) wrote regularly for the pulps in the 1930s under the name "Kirk Wolff." After a moderately successful social novel of white-collar workers called The Hospital (1939), Fearing penned Dagger of the Mind (1941), a mystery thriller about a murder in a writers' colony. Then he attempted a futuristic tale about an aborted revolution, Clark Gifford's Body (1942), before his most successful mystery, The Big Clock (1946), which was turned into a 1948 film noir starring Ray Milland. Fearing's last three novels—The Loneliest Girl in the World (1951), The Generous Heart (1954), and The Crozart Story (1960)—focus variously on the audio engineering industry, fund-raising, and public relations.

This blurring of popular forms that grew out of the experience with pulps with the radical social critique of more "serious" fiction is similar to the experiences of other pro-Communist writers. Meridel Le Sueur (1900–1996) contributed to pulp magazines to support herself in the 1930s as did the poet Tom McGrath (1916–1990).

On the other hand, there were writers whose primary work remained in the hard-boiled genres. Walter Snow (1905–1973), active in the Communist Party at various times in the 1920s and 1930s, wrote prolifically for pulp and mystery magazines while he reported for the Daily Worker and coedited the proletarian magazine Anvil in the early 1930s. After he turned against the Party in the McCarthy era, he published an anti-Communist suspense mystery called The Golden Nightmare (1952).

Jean Karsavina (1908–1989), a lifelong Communist, contributed regularly to the pulps even as she published two left-wing books for young people with International Publishers, Reunion in Poland (1945) and Tree by the Waters (1948). Later she translated Tolstoy and wrote opera librettos while she edited Soviet Review and Problems of Soviet Literature from 1958 to 1965, and Reprints from the Soviet Press from 1965 until her death. In 1974 she published a major novel of her childhood, White Eagle, Dark Skies, which received a prize from the Jewish Book Council.

Some of Karsavina's unsigned pulp fiction for True Story magazine was written in collaboration with Hope Hale (b. 1903), a Communist Party member of that time who married Robert Gorham Davis, a New Masses critic under the pen name "Obed Brooks." As Hope Hale Davis she later published The Dark Way to the Plaza (1968), a collection of stories she had written for magazines such as Ladies' Home Journal and Town and Country, and in 1994 she published Great Day Coming: A Memoir of the 1930s.

In the 1930s Karsavina was married for a while to another Communist pulp writer, William Lindsay Gresham (1909–1962), who was also a folk singer, veteran of the Spanish Civil War, and aficionado of carnival culture. In 1942 Gresham married then Communist poet and novelist Joy Davidman (1915–1960), and a few years later he achieved prominence with a gruesome thriller of carnival life, Nightmare Alley (1946), which was quickly made into a motion picture. That year, Gresham and Davidman underwent religious conversions, both renouncing Communism completely. In 1949, Gresham published a second novel, about a tuberculosis sanatorium, Limbo Tower. After a brief attraction to Christianity, he became an enthusiast of Dianetics and Zen Buddhism. Davidman, in contrast, became an admirer of British Christian intellectual C. S. Lewis, whom she would eventually marry.

Gresham continued to publish in popular magazines. Many of his sensational articles on carnival lore were collected in Monster Midway (1953), and he produced books on body-building as well as a mass-market biography, Houdini, the Man Who Walked Through Walls (1960). Suffering from throat cancer, contracted as a result of a liquid he swallowed as part of a fire-eating act he frequently performed, Gresham committed suicide at the Dixie Hotel in New York City, a hangout for carnival people.

A radical writer who evolved from action pulps to more traditional fiction is James Norman Schmidt (1912–1983). Schmidt was in Spain both as a journalist and as a soldier in the International Brigades. Moving to Chicago in 1939, he served as sports editor for the Midwest Daily Record and briefly joined the Communist Party. Following harassment by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Schmidt moved to Mexico, where he remained until 1965. Under the pen name "James Norman" he had published action thrillers such as Little Bosses (1934), Murder Chop Chop (1941), An Inch of Time (1942), and The Nightwalkers (1946). In the late 1940s his pulp magazine fiction featured a heroic protagonist returning to Spain to bring out prisoners of the fascists. In 1960 he published The Fell of Dark, a novel about the fall of Valencia in 1939, and he subsequently produced other novels as well as books about Mexican history and traveling in Mexico.

A Communist who switched from more canonical left-wing writing to action pulps out of financial need is Paul William Ryan (1906–1947). He began writing as "Mike Quin" for the Partisan, organ of the Hollywood chapter of the John Reed Clubs, and then as a columnist and roving reporter for the Western Worker, predecessor of the West coast Communist newspaper People's World. Ryan was also active in the 1934 and 1936–1937 maritime strikes, and researched the history of the maritime as well as the cotton growing industries while employed by the Federal Writers' Project of the Works Progress Administration. He wrote frequently for the Waterfront Worker and the Dispatcher, publication of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.

In 1940 a collection of his poems, columns, and reportage was published by the People's World as Dangerous Thoughts, followed by More Dangerous Thoughts (1941). From 1943 to 1945, he hosted a radio show, "CIO Reporter on the Air." As "Robert Finnegan," Ryan published three successful murder mysteries, The Lying Ladies (1946), The Bandaged Nude (1946), and, posthumously, Many a Monster (1948). All concern Dan Banion, an ex-soldier turned newspaper reporter who is frequently at odds with the police in his investigations. The novels skillfully depict the postwar atmosphere and were translated into French, in which language they have been reprinted and attracted a following among critics devoted to the school of "hard-boiled dicks." Following Ryan's death at age forty-one from cancer, a memorial volume, On the Drumhead: A Selection from the Writing of Mike Quin (1948), appeared, as well as his history of the West Coast maritime struggles of the 1930s, The Big Strike (1949).

A second contribution of Left writers to mystery, thriller, and adventure fiction comes from those whose primary commitment was always to this genre. While the Left press occasionally railed against the commercialism of such fiction, hard-boiled mysteries and thrillers were given legitimacy on the Left after the mid-1930s by the pro-Communist Dashiell Hammett (1894–1961). Another committed pro-Communist writer with origins in the same Black Mask magazine school as Hammett was William Rollins (1898–1950). His early books include two mystery novels, Midnight Treasure (1929) and, under the pen name "O'Connor Stacy," Murder at Cypress Hall (1933). His major left-wing contribution, The Shadow Before (1934), takes features of the 1929 Gastonia textile strike and sets them in New England. A Spanish Civil War novel, The Wall of Men (1938), was hailed by Richard Wright in an 8 March 1938 New Masses review as "the beginning of a popular mass pulp fiction in America, a brand of which can be read with pleasure by workers, without the danger of their becoming duped or misled." Rollins produced one more mystery novel, The Ring and the Lamp (1947), before his death at age fifty-two.

Among the most remarkable Jewish "tough-guy" writers on the Left was Ben Appel (1907–1977). He grew up in the gangster-ridden Hell's Kitchen area on the West Side of Manhattan and started writing poetry and fiction for the little magazines in the late 1920s. During the 1930s and early 1940s he was a non-Party sympathizer of Communism, and afterwards remained a liberal, although he sometimes identified himself as "utopian." The major achievement of his early years was the "Brain Guy" trilogy, consisting of Brain Guy (1934), The Power House (1939), and The Dark Stain (1943). This narrative of almost 500,000 words traces the evolution of college-educated Bill Trent as he emerges in the Depression as a gang leader, strike-breaker, and, finally, a full-blown fascist who promotes white supremacy and seeks to foment a Harlem race riot.

Among Appel's twenty-five works of action-oriented fiction are many others with explicit political themes. Runaround (1937) treats political corruption in New York, while But Not Yet Slain (1948) concerns the Washington, D.C., bureaucracy following President Roosevelt's death. Fortress in the Rice (1951) and Plunder (1952) are harsh critiques of the United States occupation of the Philippines, where Appel worked for U.S. High Commissioner Paul V. McNutt in the mid-1940s. Labor novels include The Raw Edge (1958) and A Big Man, a Fast Man (1961), while gangster novels include Life and Death of a Tough Guy (1973) and Hell's Kitchen (1977). The versatile Appel also published a classic documentary narrative, The People Talk (1940); a historical novel of two families before World War I, A Time of Fortune (1963); and numerous juveniles, travel books, and popular histories and biographies.

Vera Caspary (1899–1989) was a major popular writer of mysteries and romances whose actual political views were not known to her audience until she narrated a rather tame version of her 1930s Communist Party activities in her autobiography, The Secrets of Grown-Ups (1979). Earlier she had fictionalized some of her radical experiences in a novel, The Rosecrest Cell (1967). Her reputation, however, rests on being a skillful suspense writer who excelled at showing personalities under stress due to fear or as a consequence of a police investigation. For many, her career seemed to begin with Laura (1943), which features a police investigator who falls in love with a murder victim. In Bedelia (1945), The Murder in the Stork Club (1946), Stranger Than Truth (1947), Thelma (1952), False Face (1954), Evvie (1954), The Husband (1957), and many others, Caspary usually employs multiple points of view and often features a character dominated by one particular emotion.

In an earlier phase of her career, Caspary had produced novels with more explicit social themes. Her first, The White Girl (1929), is the story of a light-skinned southern African-American woman who moves to Chicago, where she passes for white. Thicker Than Water (1932) is an "insider's" narrative of the assimilation of a Jewish family as orthodoxy fades and materialism becomes dominant. The Dreamers (1975) traces the lives of three women from the late 1920s to the 1970s. Two of Caspary's plays were written with talented Communist writers, Geraniums in My Window (1934) with Samuel Ornitz, and Laura (1947) with George Sklar. Among her many screenplays, I Can Get It for You Wholesale (1951) was written in collaboration with Communist screenwriter Abraham Polonsky. Laura also was made into a film.

James Benét (b. 1914), the son of poet William Rose Benét and the nephew of poet Stephen Vincent Benét, went to Spain in 1936, where he served in the International Brigades, rising to officer's rank. Returning to New York, he was employed by the Soviet news agency TASS for the following seven years. Next he tried to earn a living writing thrillers such as A Private Killing (1949) and The Knife Behind You (1950) before accepting work as a copyeditor at the San Francisco Chronicle. Benét pleaded the Fifth Amendment when subpoenaed to appear before the House Un-American Activities Committee in 1953, but the managing editor of the Chronicle resisted pressure from the Federal Bureau of Investigation to fire him.

Another action-oriented writer with Communist sympathies for much of his career is Sam Ross (b. Samuel Rosen, 1912). He grew up in Chicago, majoring in journalism at Northwestern University, where he was also an outstanding swimmer. In the mid-1930s he was in New York City, where he worked as a sportswriter for the Daily Worker. He was briefly in the Communist Party but did not resume membership when he returned to Chicago to work for the Federal Writers' Project. Nevertheless, he became part of the circle of pro-Communist writers there and would identify with the Party into the early 1950s.

At the time of World War II, Ross served in the merchant marine. Upon his return he published a best-selling thriller, He Ran All the Way Home (1947). This is a gripping tale of a murderer holding a family hostage that Ross adapted for a film version starring John Garfield. He next book was Someday Boy (1948), about growing up in the tough West Side of Chicago, and The Sidewalks Are Free (1950), an outstanding autobiographical novel of a young boy in a Jewish immigrant family. This book was reissued under the title Melov's Legacy in 1977.

During the 1950s Ross contributed episodes to television shows such as Naked City, Ben Casey, Rawhide, and Mannix. In the same years he produced a long series of sometimes racy action adventures, many appearing in mass market paperback: Port Unknown (1951), This, Too, Is Love (1953), You Belong to Me (1955), The Tight Corner (1956), The Hustlers (1956), Ready for the Tiger (1964), Hang-Up (1968), The Fortune Machine (1970), The Golden Box (1971), and Solomon's Palace (1973). In 1979 Ross returned to the subject of his youth, this time re-creating experiences of his twenties, in Windy City.

Robert Carse (1902–1971), who spent seven years as a professional seaman in the U.S. merchant marine, was for forty years a prolific writer of tales of adventures at sea and nonfiction books about ships, as well as juvenile novels and historical works. During the late 1930s he was friendly to the Communist Party and was active in the League of American Writers as a teacher in its New York Writers School and member of its Exiled Writers Committee. One of his popular adventure novels, Drums of Empire (1959), treats a renegade white man who joins the Haitian Revolution on the side of Toussaint L'Ouverture.

Other adventure novels by Carse include Horizon (1927), Siren Song (1930), Pacific (1932), Heart's Desire (1934), Deep Six (1946), From the Sea to the Jungle (1951), The Beckoning Waters (1953), and Great Circle (1956). Carse received a combat bar with star citation for convoy duty to the Soviet Union during World War II, and drew upon his experiences for a highly praised nonfiction work, A Cold Corner of Hell: The Story of the Murmansk Convoys, 1941–1945 (1969).

The pro-Communist writer who was most consistently involved in the suspense genre, and who may have had the greatest success in the field, was Leonard S. Zinberg (1911–1968). "Len" Zinberg started to use the pseudonym "Ed Lacy" for all his novels and "Steve April" for short stories during the Cold War era. He was born in upstate New York and lived in Manhattan after he was ten. In the early 1930s, he traveled around the United States and worked at odd jobs before he started appearing in mass market and Communist publications such as New Masses under the name "Len Zinberg." In 1940 he published Walk Hard—Talk Loud, about an African American boxer in love with a black Communist activist. This was produced as a play in 1944 by the American Negro Theater Company in Harlem, with a script by Abram Hill, an African American veteran of the Federal Theater Project. During World War II, Zinberg served as a correspondent for Yank magazine and won a Twentieth Century Fox Film Literary Fellowship award for an unpublished manuscript. Afterwards, Zinberg was active in the Communist-led Committee for the Arts, Sciences and Professions, which supported Henry Wallace's Progressive Party campaign, and he published two more novels as Zinberg, including a radical one about the 1930s Left called Hold with the Hares (1948). With the publication of the paperback crime novel The Woman Aroused in 1951, Zinberg was reborn under the name Ed Lacy to protect himself from blacklisting and harassment. Never again, during the next two decades, did he refer to his earlier career or novels in autobiographical statements or in book jacket information. This double identity was not even known to most of his left-wing friends from the literary workshops and discussion groups hosted by editors of the Communist journal Masses and Mainstream that he attended throughout the 1950s. Zinberg was married to an African American writer, Esther, who was employed as a secretary by the Yiddish Communist newspaper Freiheit, and the decision of this interracial couple to adopt was another reason to guard his professional name from linkage to his political past.

In the 1950s and 1960s Zinberg became distinguished among mystery writers for his use of African American characters as protagonists, including two series characters, Moore and Hayes. A third series character is Dave Wintino, featured in the Lead with Your Left (1957) and Double Trouble (1965). Wintino is Italian American and Jewish American, and has a black partner.

Radical politics are pervasive in the Lacy novels. Sin in Their Blood (1952), his second novel as Lacy, depicts a right-wing organization blackmailing African Americans who are trying to "pass," and Go for the Body (1954) tells of the interracial marriage of a black boxer who lives in exile due to U.S. racism. Breathe No More, My Lady (1958) depicts a radical professor who was blacklisted, now boxing professionally for a living. Sleep in Thunder (1964) treats racism against Puerto Ricans, and The Napalm Bugle (1968) attacks the U.S. government. Zinberg also published hundreds of uncollected short stories in mystery, pulp, and popular magazines.

Robert M. Coates (1897–1973) was a novelist, short story writer, and art critic who became famous for his ability to depict horror in an ordinary setting, particularly in Wisteria Cottage: A Novel of Criminal Impulse (1948) and in his short stories. Although all mention of Coates's politics is erased from extent biographical materials and the memoirs of his literary friends, Coates was associated with the Communist Left from the early 1930s into the early 1940s. A writer for the New Masses, Coates signed the call to the 1935 and 1941 American Writers Congresses and contributed to publications and committees of the League of American Writers. Coates was also one of five individuals who solicited names to defend the verdicts of the Moscow purge trials in 1938, and he was among the signers of the 1939 open letter denying that the Soviet Union was a dictatorship.

An expatriate in the 1920s, Coates obtained a job on the New Yorker at the end of the decade through his friend James Thurber. Over the years he contributed more than one hundred short stories and rose to become an editor. Many of these are collected in All the Year Round (1943), The Hour after Westerly (1957), Accident at the Inn and Other Stories (1957), and

The Man Just Ahead of You (1964). His first novel, The Eater of Darkness (1929), is a Dada-influenced burlesque of mystery novels. In 1930 he published a social history of the early nineteenth century, The Outlaw Years, and in 1933 a novel about life in the 1920s, Yesterday's Burdens. Other novels include The Bitter Season (1946) and The Farther Shore (1955).

Jim Thompson (1906–1977), today regarded as the dean of suspense writers, developed his literary sensibility in the 1930s, when he was much influenced by the revolutionary Left. A member first of the Industrial Workers of the World, he was recruited in the mid-1930s to the Communist Party (using the Party name "Robert Dillon") in Oklahoma. The man who won him over to Communism, William Cunningham (1901–1967), was himself author of a successful gangster novel, Pretty Boy (1936).

Thompson served for a time as director of the Oklahoma Federal Writers' Project while he started writing for pulp and mystery magazines. His first two novels, Now and on Earth (1942) and Heed the Thunder (1946), were intended to be radical literature, the first even carrying endorsements from leftists Richard Wright and Millen Brand. However, he was by then growing disaffected from the Party, although he continued to call himself a socialist and his later writings exhibit social criticisms that some scholars have characterized as anarchist. These include Nothing More than Murder (1949), The Killer Inside Me (1952), A Swell-Looking Babe (1954), A Hell of a Woman (1954), After Dark, My Sweet (1955), The Kill-Off (1957), The Grifters (1963), Pop. 1280 (1964), Ironside (1967), and King Blood (1973).

Most contributions to mystery, thriller, and action fiction by other leftists and one-time leftists are more episodic. Marjorie Fischer (1903–1961), a leading activist in and official of the League of American Writers from 1935 until the Hitler-Stalin Pact, published an anti-Nazi spy thriller in 1944 called Embarrassment of Riches. Haakon Chevalier (1901–1985), a Berkeley professor of French and translator of André Malraux, published a political mystery novel about the struggles of farm workers called For Us the Living (1949). The next year Chevalier fled to Europe in the face of accusations that he had approached Dr. Robert Oppenheimer for information about atomic energy on behalf of the Soviet Union.

Roy Huggins (b. 1914) considered himself a Marxist after graduating from the University of California at Los Angeles in 1939. Although he was not a Communist, he believed he was denied a graduate fellowship on those grounds; he subsequently joined the Party in 1940. Unhappy with the Party position on World War II, he soon quit, but when Party policy changed he decided to give it a second chance and rejoined in 1943. In 1946, Huggins published the hard-boiled mystery The Double Take, but he was also beginning a career as a screenwriter, and as a consequence he was transferred to the Hollywood Party branch. Soon after, he concluded he was no longer a Marxist and again resigned. That same year he published Too Late for Tears (1947), and then Lovely Lady, Pity Me (1949). In 1951, Huggins gave friendly testimony before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, naming a large number of writers as Party members. In 1958 Huggins published 77 Sunset Strip, based partly on stories that appeared in the late 1940s and early 1950s.

Lawrence Treat (b. Lawrence Goldstone, 1903) is considered the "father" of the police procedural novel. He began publishing in the late 1930s and was active in the League of American Writers into the early 1940s. Since then he has published nearly twenty novels, usually featuring series characters Jub Freeman and Mitch Taylor.

Morton Wolson (b. ?), a veteran of the International Brigades, periodically wrote detective fiction of the hard-boiled school for Dime Detective, Detective Tales, Detective Fiction Weekly, and Ellery Queen Mystery Magazine. In 1988 he published a book-length thriller, The Nightmare Blond.

Ken Crossen (b. 1910), prolific in both mystery and science fiction, was a teacher of classes in detective and adventure fiction at the New York Writers School of the League of American Writers in 1941. His novel Year of Consent (1954) attacks the witch-hunt.

Guy Endore (1900–1970), best known for his horror classic Werewolf of Paris (1933) and his best-selling King of Paris (1956), was a Communist Party member from the mid-1930s into the early 1950s. He published two intellectual mysteries dealing with psychoanalysis and linguistics, Methinks the Lady (1945) and Detour at Night (1959).

Eliot Paul (1891–1958) was an expatriate writer in the 1920s associated with transition magazine, founded in Paris in 1927. Between 1931 and 1936 he lived on the Spanish island of Ibiza, and his book about his experiences, The Life and Death of a Spanish Town (1937), was a contribution to the antifascist literature of the Spanish Civil War. For the rest of the 1930s he showed some sympathy for activities led by the Communist Left. He visited Spain to show support for the Republican forces, collaborated with the League of American Writers, and wrote The Stars and Stripes Forever (1939), a strike novel that was militantly in favor of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Around the same time, Paul launched a series of nine humorous action mysteries featuring series character Homer Evans, such as The Mysterious Mickey Finn (1939), Hugger-Mugger in the Louvre (1940), and Murder on the Left Bank (1951). Paul is also known for his stirring memoir, The Last Time I Saw Paris (1942).

Margaret Larkin (1900–1967) came from the West to New York City in the 1920s, where she began her writing career as a poet and folk singer. In 1926 she published the one-act drama El Cristo, and in 1929 she published articles in both the Nation and New Masses about the songs of Ella May Wiggins, the martyred balladeer of the Gastonia textile strikers. In 1931 she published Singing Cowboy: A Book of Western Songs, and soon after, when she started working for the Theater Union, she met the writer Albert Maltz, to whom she was married from 1937 to 1964. In 1952, while Maltz was blacklisted from Hollywood, the couple was in Mexico and Larkin was traveling on a Mexican Airlines plane when a bomb exploded in the baggage compartment. The pilot managed to land the plane safely and an investigation disclosed that a popular Mexican singer had insured the lives of seven passengers, arranging for the explosion so that he could collect. Larkin turned the events and the trial into a successful nonfiction murder drama called Seven Shares in a Gold Mine (1959).

Edwin Lanham (1904–1979) was another Paris expatriate who became radicalized in the 1930s. He was active in the League of American Writers and wrote a radical novel about tenant farmers' union organizing, The Stricklands (1939). Among his many later novels were a plethora of mysteries and thrillers such as Slug It Slay (1946), Politics Is Murder (1947), One Murder Too Many (1952), Death of a Corinthian (1953), Death in the Wind (1955), Murder on My Street (1958), Double Jeopardy (1959), Passage to Danger (1962), No Hiding Place (1962), and Six Black Camels (1963).

The Fast brothers, Howard (b. 1914) and Julius (b. 1919) are both radicals who wrote a significant number of mysteries. Howard Fast is primarily a historical novelist and was associated with the Communist Party from 1943 to 1956. His first suspense novel, Fallen Angel (1951), was published under the pen name "Walter Ericson." A second suspense novel, The Winston Affair, about a court martial, appeared in 1959, and thereafter Fast began issuing a series of entertaining adventure novels about women under the name E. V. Cunningham, including Sylvia (1960), Phyllis (1962), Alice (1963), Shirley (1964), Lydia (1965), Penelope (1965), Helen (1966), Margie (1966), Sally (1967), Samantha (1967), Cynthia (1967), and Millie (1973).

Under the same pen name, Fast launched a series of mysteries featuring a Japanese American police detective in Los Angeles, Masao Masuto, a Zen Buddhist and karate expert. These include The Case of the One-Penny Orange (1977), The Case of the Russian Diplomat (1978), The Case of the Poisoned Eclairs (1979), and The Case of the Kidnapped Angel (1982). Other thrillers include The Hunter and the Trap (1967), The Wabash Factor (1986), and many stories in the science fiction genre.

Julius Fast, an independent radical who, after military service from 1943 to 1946, identified with the literary milieu around the Communist Party, produced a steady stream of detective and crime novels for the next decade. His first, Watchful at Night (1945), was published when he was still a staff sergeant. Soon after came Bright Face of Danger (1946), Walk in Shadow (1947), A Model for Murder (1956), Street of Fear (1958), and after a hiatus, The League of Grey-Eyed Women (1969). Fast also published popularizations of scientific studies about weight loss, smoking, and sexuality, achieving best-seller status with his 1970 work Body Language.

Chester Himes (1909–1984), who was influenced by the Communist Party in the late 1930s and 1940s, attempted to launch his career with radical novels. Unable to sustain himself financially, from exile in Europe he began producing a series of novels about two Harlem detectives that includes The Real Cool Killers (1959), All Shot Up (1960), Cotton Comes to Harlem (1965), The Heat's On (1966), Blind Man with a Pistol (1969), A Case of Rape (1980), and the posthumous Plan B (1994).

Edwin Rolfe (1909–1954) was a Communist Party member who served in Spain and published four books of poetry. In 1946 he coauthored a mystery novel called The Glass Room (1946).

William Ash (b. 1917), who was born in Texas but has lived in England since his military service in World War II, is an independent radical who has shown sympathy for Maoism and the Communist Party of Albania. An occasional contributor to Monthly Review, he is the author of Marxism and Moral Concepts (1964). His political adventure novels about Latin America include Ride a Paper Tiger (1968) and Take-Off (1969).

While pro-Communist politics have been the dominant trend among left-wing writers of thrillers, there are noteworthy contributions by writers attracted to other radical outlooks and by some left-wing liberals who were close to the organized Left at certain moments. Rex Stout, for example, was a founding editor of the radical New Masses in 1926, but resigned when he concluded that the Communists wielded too much influence. In the mid-1930s, Stout became active in the League of American Writers, but pulled out again for similar reasons in 1938. Although he was strongly anti-Communist after that time, he published a novel attacking the role of the Federal Bureau of Investigation during the McCarthy era, The Doorbell Rang (1965).

Bruno Fischer (b. 1908) was an editor of the Socialist Call, a member of the League of American Writers in the mid-1930s, and identified himself as a socialist throughout his life. He began his career as a pulp writer under the name "Russell Gray," specializing in horror and then moving on to detective fiction. He published hundreds of short stories and, starting in 1939, several dozen novels.

Miriam Allen deFord (1888–1975) was a socialist who was a correspondent for the left-wing Federated Press from 1921 to 1956. She also worked as an editor on the Federal Writers' Project and was a correspondent for Labor's Daily in California. DeFord is most highly regarded for her contributions to Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, which number nearly thirty stories, many of which are collected in The Theme is Murder (1967) and Elsewhere, Elsewhere, Elsewhere (1971). She also wrote crime documentaries and numerous political pamphlets that came out under the imprint of Haldeman-Julius in Girard, Kansas.

Eliot Asinof (b. 1919) began as a professional baseball player but started writing after World War II. Some of his books feature explicitly political themes, such as People versus Blutch: Black Men and White Law in Bedford-Stuyvesant (1970) and Craig and Joan: Two Lives for Peace (1971). Asinof's mysteries and action novels, often with a sports theme, include Man on Spikes (1955), The Bedfellow (1968), The Name of the Game Is Murder (1968), and The Fox Is Crazy, Too (1976).

August Derleth (1904–1971) contributed to the left journals Anvil and New Writers and was a member of the League of American Writers in the late 1930s. Among his many mystery novels are a series featuring Judge Peck that includes Murder Stalks the Wakeley Family (1934), The Seven Who Waited (1943), and Death by Design (1953).

Several unusual novels of Bernard Wolfe (1915–1985), who was a Trotskyist in the 1930s, are action thrillers. In Deep (1957) is especially noteworthy for its political themes. His last novel, Logan's Gone (1974), is an action mystery set in the radical political and countercultural milieu of southern California.

Anthony Boucher (1911–1968), a Catholic and liberal Democrat, taught mystery writing at the Communist-led California Labor School in the 1940s. Boucher was a prolific editor and critic, and a selection of his fiction writings appeared in 1983 as Exeunt Murderers: The Best Mystery Stories of Anthony Boucher.

Since the rise of the New Left with its counterculture and the development of new social movements in the 1970s, the mystery and thriller genres have remained attractive to literary radicals. Examples of such writing in recent years include Roger Simon's The Big Fix (1973), about a 1960s activist turned private eye; Gordon DeMarco's October Heat (1979), a murder mystery set at the time of the 1934 longshore strike; John Shannon's Broken Codes (1986), a thriller about the Central Intelligence Agency; Katherine V. Forrest's The Beverly Malibu (1989), which features a lesbian detective trying to solve the murder of a man who had been a "friendly witness" during the investigation of Hollywood; and Walter Mosley's A Red Death (1991), about his African American series character, Easy Rawlins, and a Jewish Communist union organizer in Los Angeles during the witch-hunt years.

[See also Algren, Nelson; Beats and the New Left; Dos Passos, John; Farrell, James T.; Fast, Howard; Hammett, Dashiell; Hansberry, Lorraine; Hicks, Granville; Lawson, John Howard; Le Sueur, Meridel; London, Jack; Macdonald, Dwight; Mainstream; Masses; McGrath, Tom; McKenney, Ruth; New Left Literature; New Masses, Odets, Clifford; Olsen, Tillie; Ornitz, Samuel; Radical Novel, 1870–1930; Science Fiction and Fantasy; Sinclair, Upton.

FURTHER READING

Folsom, Franklin. Days of Anger, Days of Hope: A Memoir of the League of American Writers, 1937–1942. Niwot: University Press of Colorado, 1994.

Lewis, Jon E., ed. Red Handed: From the Anarchists to the Hard-Boiled. London: Allison and Busby, 1989.

Madden, David, ed. Tough Guy Writers of the Thirties. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1968.

Wald, Alan M. Writing from the Left: New Essays on Radical Culture and Politics. London: Verso, 1994.

—ALAN WALD

POPULAR FRONT. The Seventh Congress of the Communist International, held in Moscow in the summer of 1935, crystallized the line of the Popular Front, although the Comintern and several of its constituent parties had—since the victory of Nazism in Germany and the threat posed in other countries—

Patriotic images and rhetoric common to Popular Front graphics.

1779

1939

"A SONG ABOUT AMERICA"

A Musical Play by Hoffman Hays

MONDAY • JANUARY 23rd
LENIN MEMORIAL
MADISON SQ. GARDEN

Speakers

WILLIAM Z. FOSTER • JAMES W. FORD
ELIZABETH GURLEY FLYNN
ISRAEL AMTER

Auspices

NEW YORK STATE COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY
Admission $1.65, $1.10, 65¢, 25¢
Tickets at Workers Book Store, 50 East 13th St.

already been moving in that direction. The general line of antifascism, defense and extension of the bourgeois democratic system, and collective security against the fascist powers derived from the basic concept that a bourgeois democratic regime was substantially different from a bourgeois fascist one and that fascism itself was not inevitable. Such an outlook was of course considered applicable also to the United States.

The Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) was present at the congress in the speeches not only of the national leaders Earl Browder and William Z. Foster (the former was elected to the congress's presiding committee) but also those of Sam Darcy from California; Gil Green of the youth movement; Benjamin Careathers, a black leader in Pittsburgh active with the unemployed; and Martha Stone, from the Williamsburg area of New York, surely one of the few women present. Due to its Eurocentrism the congress dealt very schematically with the United States despite its leading role in world capitalism and its vigorous presence in the Far East. Nonetheless, the main speech of Comintern secretary Dimitrov stated clearly that a victory of fascism in the United States would profoundly modify the entire international situation since this country was in a different category from "Hungary, Finland, Bulgaria, and Latvia." He indicated a farmer-labor party as the specific form of the mass antifascist Popular Front in the States. It would have a program against the banks, the trusts, the monopolies, and the principal enemies of the people; would struggle for real social legislation, land reform in the South for black and white sharecroppers, abolition of farm debts, and legal equality for blacks; and it would defend the interests of small shopkeepers, artisans, and professionals. For his part, Browder spoke of the absorption by the Communist Party (CP) of the country's revolutionary traditions, but he especially concentrated on the relationship between the government, the conflicts within the capitalist class, and the fascist threat. If Browder criticized President Franklin Roosevelt's demagoguery and affirmed that his policy had worsened the conditions of the working class, Foster went much further, declaring that the politics of the president gave an impetus to fascism. Directly in opposition to this, Dimitrov, in his concluding speech, gave a decisive push to the evolution of CP policy when he affirmed that it would be a sign of schematism to state that the New Deal was a clear form of the evolution of the bourgeoisie toward fascism; rather, it was the most reactionary forces of monopoly capital now attacking Roosevelt who were stimulating and organizing the fascist threat. Thus was official sanction given by the Comintern for critical support by American Communists of Roosevelt.

For the CPUSA and other communist parties, the Popular Front can be dated from this Congress till the pact between Germany and the Soviet Union in 1939 and the beginning of the war in Europe. In reality, its roots go back further, and the policy itself would be picked up again during the war and the alliance with the Soviet Union and would not disappear even during the Cold War, when the CP would continue to put forward, although in a somewhat different form, a Popular Front strategy of alliances.

Since Browder had assumed dominance in the Party in the beginning of the thirties, the CPUSA had moved away from its sectarianism and toward the masses and an integration into the U.S. political system. Its participation in the strike wave of 1934-1935 and in the development of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), its attempt to follow a United Front policy—unity at the base but also with non-Communist organizations—on issues like antifascism and defense of the rights of blacks and the unemployed, as well as its support at the beginning of 1935 for a labor party, can all be legitimately considered steps on this path before the Seventh Congress of the Comintern, even though many of them were probably taken only after consultation with Moscow. Browder himself became the Party's outstanding spokesman and symbol of its Popular Front positions. His desire to enter into the mainstream was naturally aided by the evolution of the Comintern—especially after the Seventh Congress—but also by a noticeable shift in the positions of the New Deal in early 1935. All of this allowed for the encounter—hesitant and polemical at first, more directly supportive as the thirties advanced—of the CPUSA with Roosevelt and the Democratic Party. With respect to the earlier United Front position, the Seventh Congress and the Popular Front line permitted greater flexibility and less concentration on convincing allies of specific Communist positions.

The Farmer-Labor Party and the general political realignment it would have provoked remained for the Communists the main objective until 1938, when its impossibility, due to the lack of interest of both Roosevelt and the CIO, was no longer deniable. Browder then transformed the Popular Front line into what was called the Democratic Front, stating that the regrouping in any case was already taking place with all the progressive forces in Roosevelt's camp, and implying that this had in some way transformed the president's party. The Communist slogan for this Democratic Front was "Jobs, Security, Democracy, Peace" and most programmatic elements remained constant: a battle against the domestic fascist threat; extending political democracy and the rights of the working class and raising its material standards; isolation of the fascist powers through collective security; and an alliance with the Soviet Union. As the New Deal ran out of steam in 1937–1938, the CP found itself the main force insisting on the Roosevelt coalition's progressive nature. In order to continue to pursue a Popular Front policy, the CP was increasingly forced to reduce its content. If Roosevelt was continually criticized for his hesitations, therefore, ever more attention was paid to what was considered the antifascist nature of his foreign policy.

Despite the absence of a fundamental realignment in the American political scene, the CP did achieve, through this policy, links with many progressive forces, including elements high and low within the Roosevelt administration. Unlike the Popular Front situation in France and Spain, the CPUSA assumed no governmental responsibility and achieved no formal alliance with any other group. Nor was there unity with the Socialist Party, which, moving toward neutralism and influenced by the Trotskyists, grew increasingly hostile to the Soviet Union and opposed to the New Deal in the name of socialism. The CP, however, was extremely active in many Popular Front organizations—some but not all of which it created—among intellectuals, blacks, and the unemployed. The CIO itself was in a sense a Popular Front organization. Particularly important was the umbrella group the American League for Peace and Democracy. All the groups fought for extending the typical New Deal domestic programs and worked for international solidarity in support of those forces—in Spain, Germany, Italy, and China—which were battling against fascism. On a local level—in Washington, Minnesota, Wisconsin, New York, but also in the South as well as in many cities of the industrial Midwest—the Party became an important force in politics and the orientation of the masses as it persistently extended its contacts. In these various organizations, many liberals and progressives were impressed by the dedication and capabilities of the CP militants and freely and openly associated with Communists for common causes. In this sense, the Popular Front must be seen as a policy independent of those linked to the Comintern.

The enormous transformation in the CP line from the years immediately before the proclamation of the Popular Front through the end of the thirties could not but bring gradual, ever deeper changes in Party ideology and organizational structure. Fascism came to be seen no longer—as during the first New Deal—as a threat directly within the government but now as something that came from without, from the leading circles of finance and monopoly capital and from abroad. American revolutionary traditions were defined in an ever broader and less radical way. Party internal education increasingly concentrated on learning about New Deal politics and functioning in trade unions rather than on traditional Marxism-Leninism and the history of Russian Bolshevism. Militant atheism was no longer in vogue, as the CP reached out to all religious groups, especially the Catholics essential for work among the industrial working class. Work in immigrant organizations was reevaluated—had not Dimitrov spoken about being a good Communist and a good Bulgarian?—also for its importance in pressing for an antifascist foreign policy. Most significant, the Popular Front in the United States, as in other countries, now meant that the Communists were without a theory of transition, of how their efforts were in some way related to the final goal of socialism, an objective that became as distant historically as the Soviet Union was geographically.

Organizational structure changed markedly as emphasis shifted from the factory and the streets to the electoral arena. Party districts and sections were redesigned to conform to the divisions of electoral districts. Factory units lost importance and shop papers declined. Communist trade union factions were officially abolished. In general, less was required of militants, as the party tried to function like a "normal" American political grouping. Activity in one of the many Popular Front organizations was now considered in part a substitute for Party activity. All these ideological and organizational developments were evidently steps in the direction of Browder's line after Teheran—a projected class peace within the United States together with the momentous decision to dissolve the Party and form a "political association"— although it is not clear that "necessarily" the transformations of the thirties had to arrive at this conclusion.

The Popular Front policy did lead to a general extension of Party influence: membership rose from ten thousand at the beginning of the thirties to sixty-five thousand at its end, as militants were increasingly American and English-speaking (children of immigrants or having themselves immigrated when very young). Jews came to be increasingly present also due to recruitment from the middle strata. And despite turnover, especially high among blacks, the Party was able to claim a genuine working-class base. Perhaps more important than an increase of membership was the greater acceptability of the Party as it became integrated into the mass New Deal mentality.

Despite these successes, some in the Party were concerned about the CP losing its specific physiognomy. The Foster-Browder contrast was present in only a slightly veiled form much before the dramatic 1944–1945 events in the Party. If the Comintern rejected such preoccupations as sectarian, there was, however, much discussion among leaders and cadres about the problem of "hiding the face of the Party"—that is, situations where Communists, although generally known as such but evidently concerned about endangering acquired positions, neither made a point of their Party membership nor put forward, if they existed, CP positions different from those of the organizations in which they operated. Thus in some trade unions during the Popular Front, CP membership came to be concentrated more among the leadership and the functionaries than the base. Certainly not all legal and semilegal restrictions against Communists had been lifted, but it is probable that such behavior ultimately worked to the disadvantage of CP militants who could be denounced as "subversive" and "clandestine."

The Popular Front policy of the CP may have been positive for the United States, through its strengthening of the elements of progressive democracy present in the New Deal and its opposition to fascist tendencies present in the country. If such a line did not aid in understanding the position of the United States as an imperial power that blocked the development of vast areas of the globe, it did undoubtedly help prepare the country ideologically for its participation in an antifascist war. Evaluating the policy for the Party itself is more complex: the CP advanced in membership and acceptability, but the terrain of this advance would prove to be, during the liberal-McCarthy repression, very shaky indeed.

[See also Anticommunism; Browder, Earl; Communist Party, USA; New Masses; Popular Culture.]

FURTHER READING

- Klehr, Harvey. The Heyday of American Communism: The Depression Decade. New York: Basic Books, 1984.
- Stephenson, Anders. "The CPUSA Conception of the Rooseveltian State, 1933–1939." Radical History Review, no. 24 (fall 1980).
- Sylvers, Malcolm. "Party Organizer and American Communist Mentality in the 1930s." Storia Nordamericana 2 (1985).
- Sylvers, Malcolm. "The Communist International and the CPUSA: Channels for Influence, Political Consequences, Historiographical Discussion." In The Communist International and Its National Sections 1919–1943, edited by Jürgen Rojahn. Bern and New York: Peter Lang, 1996.

—MALCOLM SYLVERS

PORTUGUESE AMERICANS. Although few in overall numbers, Portuguese American radicals exerted a significant effect on economic and political life in southeastern New England, especially within the textile unions. They reached the apex of their influence just after World War II and declined sharply thereafter.

Before 1924, a quarter-million Portuguese immigrants came to the United States. More than eighty percent came from the islands: the Azores, Madeira, and Cape Verde, which were overcrowded and exhausted peasant economies. These immigrants settled mainly in two areas: California, where they became farm workers and then landowners, and New Bedford and Fall River, Massachusetts, where they formed a majority of the textile workers. As with most other immigrant groups, the Left community was concentrated among the industrial workers, and their leaders came from the more industrialized areas in the homeland; in this case, the Left was concentrated around Fall River and New Bedford and its leaders were from the mainland, especially from Lisbon.

The Portuguese Left in the United States was strongest between World War I and the immediate post-World War II years. The U.S. movement was influenced by politics in Portugal: the alternating Right and Left governments during and after World War I and the dictatorship of Antonio Salazar, who ruled from 1928 to 1968. Many progressive labor leaders came to the United States during the 1920s and played a major role in the 1928 textile strike.

For six months in 1928, thirty thousand New Bedford textile workers struck in the only organized opposition against the general wage cuts in New England during the late 1920s. The backbone of the strike was the Portuguese workers who followed the leadership of the Communist Party and other socialist groups. Their goals were progressive, tactics were militant, and organization was democratic. A number of the young Portuguese workers—including Augusto Pinto (who was deported to Portugal soon after the strike, and who died under mysterious conditions en route to prison in Cape Verde), Eula Figueiredo (also later deported), and Joe Figueiredo—emerged from the strike as leaders of the Left. Despite impressive community support during the strike's early days, it was lost because of general economic conditions, the antagonism of the established, conservative craft unions toward the newer, more progressive industrial unions, and red-baiting tactics by the mill owners through the newspapers, courts, and government.

The Great Depression immediately followed the strike, and the Portuguese leadership, as with other national groups, split into a Left, which participated in the National Textile Workers Union (NTWU), and a Right, which joined the United Textile Workers (UTW). The two groups united and competed for leadership when the NTWU merged into the UTW in 1934. In the late 1930s and early 1940s, the Textile Workers Union of America (TWUA) under the Congress of Industrial Organizations organized the mills in the area. While the top leaders were the more conservative labor leaders from Fall River, the rank-and-file leaders were Portuguese workers active in the 1928 strike.

The showdown came in 1947 over the anticommunist affidavit provision in the Taft-Hartley Act. The leadership of the TWUA favored signing, but the Left ran opposing slates in many of the mills and won a few key elections. The top leaders of the national union, seeking a compromise, agreed to replace the anticommunist director of the joint board with a more progressive leader in return for tacit acceptance of the provision. This was the high point of the Left's influence in the TWUA.

While most of the activity of the Portuguese Left was in the labor movement during the 1930s and 1940s, they also did community and political organizing. Just after the 1928 strike, Joe Figueiredo and others formed a Portuguese Alliance of two hundred to five hundred members, which during the Depression fought evictions, demanded and received food and clothing from government agencies, and organized support for the antifascist forces in Spain. Following World War II, Figueiredo and other Communist Party members within the alliance had a weekly radio program in Fall River. The program continued through 1948 despite the Federal Bureau of Investigation's putting pressure on the station manager to cancel it.

The fall during the anticommunist era was rapid and relentless. As with other immigrant groups, the chief weapon used was fear of deportation. Eula Figueiredo, long a leader of the Portuguese Left, was arrested in 1950, harassed for many years, and finally deported as an undesirable alien in 1953 under the McCarran-Walter Act. This had a chilling effect on the Portuguese community.

Recently, fueled by the new immigration since 1965, the Left has revived somewhat within this generally conservative ethnic group. Portuguese fishermen and boat owners, whose leaders had been union organizers in opposition to Salazar, organized an effective tie-up against the fish buyers in 1980, although a fishermen's strike in 1986 against boat owners split the community.

[See also Antifascism; Communist Party, USA; Popular Front.]

FURTHER READING

- Aaronson, Roberta Hazen, and Daniel Georgianna. "Here We Come—Thousands Strong." Spinner 2 (1982).
 Georgianna, Daniel, and Roberta Hazen Aaronson. The Strike of '28'. New Bedford, Mass.: Spinner Publications, 1993.
 Pap, Leo. The Portuguese-Americans. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1981.

—DANIEL GEORGIANNA

POYNTZ, JULIET STUART (1886–1937?). A leading left-wing feminist labor educator in the 1910s and 1920s, Juliet Stuart Poyntz vanished mysteriously in the late 1930s. Born on 25 November 1886 into a lawyer's family in Omaha, Nebraska, she went on to earn degrees from Barnard College and Columbia University, attend the University of Oxford and the London School of Economics, and find employment as a lecturer in history at Columbia University from 1910 to 1913.

After joining the Socialist Party in 1909, she began to shift into reform work and ultimately the labor Left. She held positions, in succession, with the U.S. Immigration Commission, the American Association for Labor Legislation, the Rand School of Social Science, the lecture apparatus of the Socialist Party, and the educational arm of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU), a branch of which she founded in 1915 and directed until 1919.

In this latter capacity, she became a powerful feminist-inflected Socialist voice for women workers and a pioneering figure in labor education and cooperation efforts such as the ILGWU's Unity House, Unity Center, and Workers' University. Her career demonstrated uncommon dexterity. She could with equanimity write existentialist feminist tracts about the challenge of leisure for working women and vie for power with the male heads of the ILGWU and the fledgling Communist Party. In the words of an ILGWU contemporary, she "was a gifted and striking personality . . . a rare combination of charm and force."

By the mid-1920s, when the Communist party's Third Period sectarianism made her place in the ILGWU untenable, Poyntz shifted to a more exclusive Party focus. Thereafter, the trail grows faint. Several sources maintain that she went to work for the Soviet government underground in the United States in the mid-1930s, and therefore dropped out of open political activity. A longtime friend, the anarchist Carlo Tresca, reported that after expressing disenchantment with this work in June of 1937, Poyntz disappeared abruptly. Tresca believed that she was abducted and murdered by a Soviet agent; efforts by the Federal Bureau of Investigation to find out what happened to her yielded no clear answers. Her body was never found, and her life story has never been written.

FURTHER READING

- American Labor Who's Who*. New York: Hanford Press, 1925.
- Draper, Theodore. American Communism and Soviet Russia (1960). New York: Random House, 1986.
- Federal Bureau of Investigation File 100-206603.
- Johnpoll, Bernard K., and Harvey Klehr, eds. Biographical Dictionary of the American Left. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1986.
- MacLean, Nancy. "The Culture of Resistance: Female Institution Building in the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, 1905-1925." Michigan Occasional Papers in Women's Studies, no. 21 (winter 1982).

Tresca, Carlo. "Where is Juliet Stuart Poyntz?" Modern Monthly 10 (March 1938).

—NANCY MACLEAN

PRE-PARTY FORMATIONS. Under Leninist doctrine a vanguard party is necessary to make a successful revolution, but that party cannot be instantly born out of the proletarian brow. Various publishing groups, militant unions, special-interest movements, ethnic federations, and other social forces must become active before a vanguard party is possible. The groups that eventually fuse into the vanguard party are called pre-party formations. From their ranks come the creators of the vanguard party, and their leaders will form the initial central committee.

During the 1970s there was a concerted effort by many radical groups with roots in the 1960s to create a new Marxist-Leninist party in the United States. As these efforts floundered, various components of the pre-party movement each declared themselves to be the vanguard party and named a central committee. None of the groups was able to rally a significant following, and each was denounced by the other pre-party groups as a premature formation. By the 1980s, the new parties had ceased to exist or had dwindled to the size of sects. Half a century before this unsuccessful movement, various groups previously linked to the Socialist Party and the Industrial Workers of the World had struggled with various organizational forms until the Communist Party was created. In retrospect, these can be seen as successful pre-party formations.

[See also Vanguard Party.]

—DAN GEORGAKAS

PROFESSIONAL AND ACADEMIC JOURNALS, RADICAL. See Radical Professional and Academic Journals.

PROGRESSIVE. A term employed by the Left (among others) with widely varied meanings, "progressive" has mainly signified, since the middle 1940s, those left-of-center and vigorously opposed to the agenda of Cold War liberalism. The ambiguity of meaning can be traced to the early 1910s and the emergence of the Progressive (or municipal reform) movement into a national force of consequence. The Progressive Party, mostly the creation of a reform-minded White Anglo-Saxon Protestant middle-class, chose as presidential nominee the imperialist bully Theodore Roosevelt rather than Wisconsin's Progressive Party leader, Robert M. La Follette. The Progressive Party failed nationally, and at the state level broke apart in wartime, when La Follette heroically opposed American intervention (Roosevelt, in his last years, continued to advocate military solutions). La Follette transformed Progressivism when he rallied an ethnic, worker, and farmer constituency in place of the middle class that had deserted him. But a section of Roosevelt supporters (including former socialists) moved in the other direction with the creation of the New Republic in 1914, which advocated war participation as a bridge to greater national control of economic and social resources.

The resurrection of the Progressive Party in 1924, mainly as a vehicle for Robert La Follette's campaign for the presidency, underlined the most radical definition given the term "progressive." Although La Follette himself insisted that describing him as socialist was a case of confusing "a chestnut horse and a horse chestnut," the Socialist Party hurled itself into the campaign, while Communists later regretted their sectarian nonparticipation. During the same years, the Committee for Progressive Political Action also sought to create a sustained farmer-labor movement on principles (such as opposition to monopoly) that most socialists could endorse as a transition toward a cooperative society. The Committee for Progressive Labor Action, led by A. J. Muste, essentially evolved into a socialist movement, the American Workers Party, in the Depression.

Failure of a national movement to materialize lent the term "progressive" a midwestern or western connotation, without resolving many basic ambiguities (such as the xenophobia and racism of many self-avowed "progressive" political leaders in the West, especially California). Liberal Republicans in particular—fiscally conservative in many ways but personally libertarian and firmly opposed to eastern-based corporations' monopoly powers—could distinguish themselves as "progressive" rather than Democratic Party-style "liberal." From a Left standpoint, that differentiation was underlined when many self-avowed progressives (including the La Follettes) took a relatively isolationist position in the later 1930s, and Wisconsin's Progressive Party all but dissolved. In the world of scholarship, "Progressive History," most closely associated with the public intellectual Charles Beard, also seemingly pointed toward an isolationist-minded opposition to the growth of the national state.

The use of the term revived in the early years of the Cold War for two related reasons. Cold War liberals, determined to jettison Communist supporters from their organizations, had begun to consolidate their ranks during World War II, with the Union for Democratic Action (later, Americans for Democratic Action) excluding and excoriating Communists. Former vice president and secretary of agriculture Henry Wallace, widely known as a charismatic "progressive," firmly took up the cudgels against the Cold War camp. Responding to his own expulsion from the cabinet by Harry Truman for his opposition to the new president's aggressive foreign policy ambitions, Wallace addressed an October 1946 meeting in Los Angeles (sponsored by, among others, the Progressive American Federation of Labor Committee for Political and Legislative Action), declaring that "more than ever before I am a progressive," meaning a true inheritor of the New Deal mantle.

Commentators widely blamed voter apathy in the 1946 elections on Truman's sharp turn to the right on domestic as well as foreign policy. In November 1946, Henry Wallace became editor of the New Republic, in order to urge "progressive" policies upon the Democratic Party (or perhaps, as many committees of the Congress of Industrial Organizations urged, to prepare for a third party). A call for a national organization of progressives had brought three hundred participants together in September, urging a broad platform of reforms. Although this led to no organization, it was advance notice to the merger of the New Dealish Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts and the Sciences and Professions with the National Citizens Political Action Committee into the Progressive Citizens of America at the end of 1946. Henry Wallace and Fiorello La Guardia addressed the founding convention.

As the ranks of liberals split into two warring camps, "progressive" became synonymous with "Communist sympathizer" (to anti-communists) and with "unreserved New Dealer" (to progressives). The Progressive Citizens of America established three divisions, each with its prominent intellectual figures: Youth; Women's; and Arts, Science, and Professions. Of these, the Arts, Science, and Professions attracted the most interest, no doubt because of its entertainment celebrities, José Ferrer and Lillian Hellman among many others. Its public events, with such figures as Frank Sinatra participating, proved that "progressivism" had wide support despite the virulent campaign against Wallace and détente by the commercial press and most Democratic and Republican Party regulars.

Henry Wallace's worldwide tours and the publicity leading up to the 1948 presidential campaign underlined the distinction between "liberal" and "progressive," even though neither Left, Center, nor near-Right would concede either term to opponents. Glen Taylor, former factory worker and a cowboy congressman from Idaho, joining Wallace's fight against Trumanism, symbolized the Plains States connection, playing his banjo and singing with his sons on the lecture trail.

The down-home image did little, however, to bring votes to the overwhelmingly red-baited Wallace and Taylor. More than half their national vote of 1,157,140 came from New York State, under the American Labor Party standard. Outside the East, "progressivism" had been quashed or its erstwhile proponents (such as George McGovern, who abandoned the Progressive Party after attending its first convention) began to distance the word from its 1948 connotations. Only the Progressive, formerly La Follette's, managed to survive as a progressive institution, and that due to the Jewish intellectual Morris Rubin, who managed to create a nationwide audience for the now-monthly magazine.

In the East, "progressivism" also faced difficult times. The New Republic, abandoning Wallace in the last months of the presidential campaign, had made a choice similar to that made in World War I, for military-linked nationalism as gatekeeper for domestic reform. The Nation, which did not support Wallace but nevertheless, under the editorship of Freda Kirchwey, opposed the Cold War, sought to redefine "liberal." The National Guardian, which emerged out of the Wallace campaign, became de facto the standard-bearer of a "progressivism" newborn.

This newer "progressivism" could be seen in Popular Front veterans who had never been comfortable with open Communist identification (or, perhaps, Communist Party membership either), but who largely shared Popular Front perspectives. Many erstwhile readers of the Daily Worker indeed went over to the Guardian for their own self-protection from potential harassment. But as the Communist leadership inclined toward a near-suicidal prediction of potentially imminent fascism, "progressive" came to indicate an alternative identity to Cold War liberal or Communist.

For those in that identity, ending the Cold War remained the major priority. But Marxism was no longer avowed as the single key to a scientific solution to poverty and exploitation. Nor was climactic class-struggle anticipated in America, even though unions (especially independent Left unions such as the United Electrical Workers) received enthusiastic support. A rather more vague, if no less heartfelt, emphasis on New Dealish measures, and a hope for the evolution of postcapitalist societies, merged into a vision of "progress" in the atomic age. Support for Third World revolutions that encompassed support for the non-aligned movement and for the People's Republic of China again set progressives off somewhat from an orthodox Soviet-style perspective. In some ways, although without saying so explicitly, progressives had, far more than the Communist Party, recapitulated the religious-based anti-imperialism of the 1920s–1940s, substituting a concept of morality for specific theism.

Tactically, such "progressives" sought to maintain a third-party presence, despite general Communist inclinations toward a submergence in the Democratic Party. Radical New York City congressman Vito Marcantonio, running his last campaign against Communist advice, became the hero of such independent progressives. In 1958 New York progressives (identified, as well, by their connections with Monthly Review magazine and with Corliss Lamont's Emergency Civil Liberties Committee) sought to reestablish a radical party through cooperation with the Trotskyists, something almost unthinkable for Communist regulars. In general, the Guardian maintained a sort of milieu—largely but not entirely limited to eastern cities, Chicago, and a few California sites—for such like-minded people. Its relationship with the Communist Party proper remained ambiguous, in no small measure because individual Communists shared the progressive perspective while remaining in Party ranks. Very likely, a Communist Party turn toward polycentrism and internal democracy, as attempted by Daily Worker "revisionists" in 1956, would have re-created Communism very largely in the progressive image.

By the middle 1960s, the surfacing of the term "radical" (long thought to be politically ambiguous, as well as a dangerous identification) submerged "progressive" nomenclature. The Guardian itself shortly became "an independent radical news-weekly." Only the Progressive magazine, and the remnants of an older generation, held on to the familiar title. Despite—or perhaps because of—the similarity of campaign rhetoric and even personalities, the Democratic Party reformers of 1972 avoided the titles of 1948.

The collapse of the New Left and the lurch of American politics to the right not only restored "progressive" terminology but gave it new meaning. In the most obvious and important example, the environmental movement placed itself within the oldest of progressive traditions, Theodore Roosevelt's conservationism. On the intellectual front, the Nation became the de facto national organ for progressive thought, and its regular contributors occasionally appeared on national news-media programs dedicated to current events. More subtly, former New Left labor activists and their allies working within existing unions identified themselves in the generally forgotten cloak of "labor progressives." Generally speaking, what "progressivism" in foreign policy meant was a return to the anti-imperial standard of Robert M. La Follette.

[See also Agrarian Radicalism; Progressive Party.]

FURTHER READING

Lader, Lawrence. Power on the Left. New York: W. W. Norton, 1979.

MacDougall, Curtis D. Gideon's Army. 3 vols. New York: Marzani and Munsell, 1965.

—PAUL BUHLE

PROGRESSIVE LABOR PARTY. See Maoism.

PROGRESSIVE MINERS OF AMERICA. The formation of the Progressive Miners of America (PMA) in Gillespie, Illinois, on 2 September 1932 came in response to attempts by United Mine Workers of America (UMWA) president John L. Lewis to control Illinois UMWA District 12. The Illinois miners had a long tradition of autonomy and radicalism. Following World War I, the southern Illinois mining area was a center of Labor Party and "Free Tom Mooney" sentiment, and in 1924 Robert La Follette's Progressive presidential campaign ran strongly in the Illinois mining counties. Many Illinois miners also believed that UMWA president Lewis was pursuing the mine owners' interests and not theirs.

The PMA was initially a left-wing organization. Its leadership and its journal, the Progressive Miner, urged members to vote for working-class candidates, and speakers such as Norman Thomas came to local union halls. In counties with a PMA majority, the Socialist Party obtained a higher vote than in those areas loyal to the UMWA.

In mid-1933, however, a split developed within the PMA leadership. Less radical leaders were satisfied with their success in five Illinois counties, while left-wingers believed the PMA needed to be national in scope. A number of radical officials were ousted, beginning with the editor of the Progressive Miner, Gerry Allard. Radicals again gained control of the union for a short time in 1935, but were soon defeated. Thereafter the PMA became known for its red-baiting, antiforeign, and anti-Semitic pronouncements.

At this point, the more radical of the PMA founders believed dramatic action was necessary against those PMA leaders who had discarded the union's founding principles. Such an opportunity came in 1937. In response to coal company's acceleration of mechanization of its mines, radicals began a nine-day sitdown strike inside a mine. The action was timed to coincide with a meeting of officials of the PMA and the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in Chicago to discuss affiliation. The strikers hoped to prevent affiliation, but were unsuccessful. The AFL assumed control and appointed the PMA president and secretary-treasurer, thereby destroying one of the primary reasons for the establishment of the PMA, the right of district autonomy.

Between 1938 and 1946, the Progressive Miners of America-AFL paralleled the much larger United Mine Workers-Congress of Industrial Organizations. However, when John L. Lewis brought the UMWA back into the AFL in 1946, the PMA became independent and remained so into the start of the 1990s, when it claimed only a few thousand members.

[See also Thomas, Norman; United Mine Workers.]

FURTHER READING

Booth, Stephane Elise. "A Coal Mining Activist in the Fields of Southern Illinois, 1932-1938." In Proceedings of the Second Annual Illinois History Symposium. Springfield: Illinois State Historical Society, 1982.

- Booth, Stephane Elise. "The Relationship between Radicalism and Ethnicity in Southern Illinois Coal Fields, 1870-1940." Ph.D. diss., Illinois State University, 1983.
- Hicken, Victor. "Mine Union Radicalism in Macoupin and Montgomery Counties." Western Illinois Regional Studies 3 (fall 1980).
- Hudson, Harriet D. The Progressive Mine Workers of America. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1952.
- Jensen, Prosser Daniel. "Coal Towns in Egypt: Portrait of an Illinois Mining Region, 1890-1930." Ph.D. diss., Northwestern University, 1973.

—STEPHANE BOOTH

PROGRESSIVE PARTY, 1948. The last major expression of the Popular Front politics of the New Deal period, the Progressive Party was founded in 1948 to oppose the Truman administration's Cold War policies and the domestic anticommunist, anti-labor, and anti-civil liberties campaigns that accompanied those policies. Former vice president Henry Wallace, who had embodied Left New Deal political values for millions by his wartime advocacy of a "Century of the Common Man," based on prolabor and anti-monopoly policies in the United States, and U.S.-Soviet cooperation through the United Nations to internationalize New Deal reforms, was the presidential candidate of the party. The Communist Party and its activists in the Congress of Industrial Organizations and other mass movements served as the Progressive Party's leading grass-roots organizing force, joining with non-communists to try to organize mass opposition to the Cold War and to save both the substance and the style of the labor- and social-welfare-oriented New Deal politics that had given the Left in the 1930s and 1940s its greatest influence in U.S. history.

Centering on the presidential election, the Progressive Party had hoped to draw millions of working-class and minority voters away from the Democrats, and early polls showed Wallace getting as many as eight million votes (party strategists saw four million as necessary for a successful campaign). However, Truman's shift to a Left New Deal election strategy (deemphasizing the Cold War, identifying with a strong civil rights plank in the Democratic Party platform, and calling for national health insurance, protection for small farmers, proconsumer price controls, and repeal of the anti-trade union Taft-Hartley Act) combined with massive bipartisan red-baiting against the Progressives to doom their efforts. Wallace ultimately polled 1,157,140 votes, 2.4 percent of the total ballots cast. The Progressive Party lived on after 1948 in an atmosphere of mounting repression, running San Francisco labor lawyer Vincent Hallinan and Charlotta Bass, a black activist, for president and vice president on an anti-Korean War platform in 1952 before it finally went out of existence. Hallinan garnered only 140,000 votes.

However, it was never a real national force after the 1948 campaign, in which its failure to win over significant numbers of New Deal coalition voters from the Democrats served as a signal to right-wing forces in the Congress of Industrial Organizations to purge Communist-led Left unions, and as a signal to the Truman administration and the conservative coalition in Congress to broaden and deepen their anticommunist campaign. This campaign included trials of the Communist Party national leadership and the Hiss and Rosenberg political "espionage" trials, and was followed by the enactment of the McCarran Internal Security Act of 1950. This act established the Subversive Activities Control Board and made provisions for the establishment of political concentration camps.

Internationally, the Progressive Party's political failure removed a domestic deterrent to the broadening of the Truman administration's Cold War interventionism into the formation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in 1949, the building of the hydrogen bomb after the Soviets developed an atomic bomb in 1949, and the involvement of U.S. troops in the Korean War (1950-1953). Internally, its defeat encouraged many in the New Deal coalition to either follow the redefinition of New Deal politics into Cold War terms represented by the organizations like the Americans for Democratic Action, politicians like Senator Hubert Humphrey, and political intellectuals like Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., or to retreat from political activism in disillusionment, struggling to map out private space and expand personal freedom in new academic or artistic subcultures.

Without underestimating the short-term significance of its defeat, it is important to remember that many stands pioneered by the Progressive Party campaign in 1948 would be vindicated in later struggles. Henry Wallace's challenge of segregation in southern campaign meetings, the party's emphasis on women's rights and commitment to functional representation for minorities and women in its organization and conventions, and its calls for direct meetings between the U.S. president and the Soviet premier to settle

Cold War conflicts (all of which were condemned at the time as extreme or subversive) were harbingers of later civil rights, women's rights, and peace struggles (in which Progressive Party supporters sometimes played important roles).

Also, the Progressive Party's attacks on the alliance of Wall Street and the Pentagon was a harbinger of subsequent critiques of a military-industrial complex and a permanent war economy. Finally, as the rise of Senator Joe McCarthy and the subsequent effects of Cold War interventionism in Vietnam and other parts of the world showed, the Party's stand against a "bipartisan" anticommunist national policy as leading to reaction and war was borne out.

[See also Communist Party, USA; McCarthyism; National Guardian; Robeson, Paul Leroy.]

FURTHER READING

MacDougall, Curtis. Gideon's Army. 3 vols. New York: Marzani and Munsell, 1965.

Markowitz, Norman D. The Rise and Fall of the People's Century: Henry A. Wallace and American Liberalism, 1941–1948. New York: Free Press, 1973.

Schmidt, Karl M. Henry A. Wallace: Quixotic Crusade, 1948. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1960.

—NORMAN MARKOWITZ

PROLETARIAN AND RADICAL WRITERS, 1930s–1940s. Proletarian writing emerged in the 1930s in association with the Communist movement and was characterized by fervent class consciousness. Working-class characters rather than upper- or middle-class characters were the major focus of interest, the vernacular was the preferred language, and concerns about racial, ethnic, and sexual exploitation were often blended with class issues. A few works directly addressed the experiences of radical activists, but most had themes that were derived from nineteenth-century literature. Among these were coming-of-age and on-the-road novels.

The proletarian movement is usually written of as an American form of the socialist realism advocated by Soviet theorists. While that connection exists, American writers drew on deep national roots. The two most celebrated American stylists of the previous century, Mark Twain and Walt Whitman, had been champions of the vernacular and had written about working-class America. Even such a symbol-rich work as Moby-Dick had the characteristic American concern for the work process. Precedents for socially committed literature that sought to change society were set by abolitionist poets such as John Greenleaf Whittier and novels such as Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin. Best-selling socialist authors such as Jack London, Edward Bellamy, and Upton Sinclair had further developed the political novel. Given this tradition, proletarian writers did not feel they were breaking with the American past but fulfilling its egalitarian vision.

Many of the new writers were of the class they wrote about or directly involved in working-class movements. This allowed them to write from "the inside" and bring their readers directly into the mills, homes, and streets of working America. Only a few of the writers were actual members of the Communist Party, but the Party was their political focus. Many were affiliated with various cultural groups such as the John Reed Clubs or the League of American Writers or met in informal groups like the radical screenwriters who gathered in the back room of Larry Edmund's bookshop in Hollywood. Radical writers often worked in projects sponsored by the New Deal and in trade unions. They worked in different genres simultaneously and published in Communist newspapers or in radical magazines such as the Anvil, New Masses, New Theater, New Theatre and Film, and Partisan Review. While some theorists tried to differentiate the proletarian writer as a specific literary species, the distinction between radical writing in general and specifically proletarian writing remained vague, observed more often in theory than practice. The prestige of the cultural publications of the Communist Party was so high that some of the nation's best-known writers published in them or helped raise funds for them. Such writers included William Saroyan, Ernest Hemingway, Erskine Caldwell, Dorothy Parker, James Agee, and Archibald MacLeish.

A considerable amount of proletarian writing amounted to a class-modified coming-of-age genre. Thomas Bell's Out of this Furnace (1941), for example, followed a Slavic steelworker family through titanic duels between Carnegie Steel and the millworkers of Pittsburgh. This novel also dealt with working-class marital relationships, a theme Bell addressed more directly in All Brides are Beautiful (1936) and Till I Come Back to You (1943). Another of his novels, There Comes a Time (1946), dealt with organizing white-collar bank employees.

Two other well-received novels in a similar vein were Pietro Di Donato's Christ in Concrete (1939) and Jack Conroy's The Disinherited (1933). Di Donato's novel, one of the few to describe the price paid in building the great American cities, centers on a thirteen-year-old Italian boy who takes his father's place as a bricklayer after the father is buried alive in a construction accident. Conroy's book, written in the jaunty style found in all of his work, follows the life of a young miner seeking work during the Great Depression. Even better known than these works were James T. Farrell's Studs Lonigan trilogy (1932-1934), about the working Irish of Chicago, and Mike Gold's Jews without Money (1930), about the Yiddish culture of New York's Lower East Side. Changes within an entire family, rather than just an individual, were the concern of Josephine Herbst in a trilogy consisting of The Rope of Gold (1939), Pity Is Not Enough (1933), and The Executioner Waits (1934). Feminist concerns are coequal with economic themes in Meridel Le Sueur's short story collection Salute to Spring (1940). Like other proletarian authors, Le Sueur often made a connection between poverty and subsequent criminal behavior, and in her prose style sought to bring a lyrical quality to the vernacular idioms of her humble characters.

Proletarian on-the-road or down-and-out novels were less popular in their time, but have developed something of a cult following with the passage of years. Best remembered now is Waiting for Nothing (1935) by Tom Kromer. Written partially while Kromer lived in flophouses, hobo jungles, missions, and freight cars, the novel harrowingly illustrates the day-to-day life of the unemployed and homeless during the Great Depression. Edward Dahlberg's Bottom Dogs (1930) is another highly respected novel with a similar approach. Worthy of attention for their literary worth as well as their proletarian perspectives are Edward Newhouse's You Can't Sleep Here (a New York Hooverville is the setting, 1934), Nelson Algren's Somebody in Boots (the tribulations of a young Texan, 1935), and William Attaway's Let Me Breathe Thunder (two migrant laborers ride the rails, 1939). A more surreal and picaresque approach is found in Kenneth Patchen's The Journal of Albion Moonlight (1941).

Many radical writers brought the reader directly into the factory and fields and then out into the union halls and picket lines. Land of Plenty (1934), by Robert Cantwell, re-creates a savage lumber strike in the Pacific Northwest; The Foundry (1934), by Albert Halper, presents an in-depth evocation of the assembly-line process; and To Make My Bread (1932), by Grace Lumpkin, tackles the legendary Gastonia textile strike. Chester Himes wove racial concerns into two remarkable workplace novels; If He Hollers, Let Him Go (1945) concerns the frame-up of a militant African American shipyard worker during World War II, and Lonely Crusade (1947) centers on how racism and anticommunism within the labor movement affect a radical African American organizer. Another blend of racial and workplace themes is found in William Attaway's Blood on the Forge (1941), a tale of three brothers from the black South and their interactions with Slavic workers in a steel plant near Pittsburgh. Blood on the Forge was one of the few American novels of its time to directly relate human exploitation to capitalist exploitation of natural resources. In the late 1980s the novel was reissued as part of the Monthly Review Press's Voices of Resistance series, which features outstanding political novels from around the world. Yet another 1930s' novel that addressed racial themes was Grace Lumpkin's The Sign of Cain (1935).

The most controversial proletarian novels featured the radical organizer, usually identified as a Communist, as their central character. In addition to work already cited, this focus is found in Jake Home (1943), by Ruth McKenney, the story of how a Pennsylvania miner evolves into a Communist activist; This Is Your Day (1937), by Edward Newhouse, a vivid rendering of the daily life of a young Communist organizing rural workers; and Underground Stream (1940), by Albert Maltz, a poignant account of the kidnapping and murder of a Communist auto-union organizer by a fictional Michigan group modeled on Michigan's fascistic Black Legion. Maltz would become one of the "Hollywood Ten" and was involved in important public debates on the role of the writer in the Communist movement. His other novels include The Cross and the Arrow (a German foundry worker defies the Nazis, 1944), The Journey of Simon McKeever (an aged pipefitter fights for dignity, 1949), A Long Day in a Short Life (racial discrimination in a federal prison, 1957), and A Tale of One January (World War II refugees, 1966).

Variety of theme and style was also a hallmark of the proletarian poets. John Beecher wrote often of southern areas where radicalism had never been a strong tradition. Sterling A. Brown did brilliant work within the ballad form, while Kenneth Fearing and Walter Lowenfels applied modern techniques to traditional radical themes. Lowenfels, who had been an intimate of Henry Miller in Paris, eventually took a twenty-year hiatus from writing to edit a labor paper, but he returned to literary work in the 1960s. At that time he became a link to New Left writers by editing anthologies of politically engaged poetry. The most widely read of these was Where is Vietnam? (1967).

Perhaps the most ambitious of all the radical poets was Thomas McGrath. His Letters to an Imaginary Friend is no less than a radical equivalent to the Cantos of Ezra Pound or the Paterson of William Carlos Williams. Stretching from the 1930s to the 1980s, the novelistic poem combines fact and fantasy in a blend of style meant to render a universal statement on the human condition through the actuality of the American experience. McGrath's use of the dialogue poem, the "found" poem, snatches of lyrics from popular songs, and other techniques were characteristic of the experimental spirit of most of the radical poets.

Stylistic innovation also concerned prose writers such as Nathanael West and John Dos Passos. Using techniques found in surrealism and expressionism, West savaged mass media and the Horatio Alger myth in four short novels (Miss Lonelyhearts, 1933; The Day of the Locust, 1939; A Cool Million, 1934; The Dream Life of Balso Snell, 1931) that were highly praised by both avant-garde and political critics. John Dos Passos employed Joycean techniques in his epic U.S.A. trilogy (The 42nd Parallel, 1930; 1919, 1932; The Big Money, 1936), generally regarded as the best single radical novel of the period and a major American literary achievement. Dos Passos was highly influenced by the Industrial Workers of the World, and his caution regarding the authoritarianism of the Communist Party led him to adopt increasingly rightist positions, particularly after World War II. In U.S.A. he created a form that used a journalistic narrative as a base around which was entwined stream-of-consciousness sections, evocations of newspaper headlines and popular songs, poetic portraits of political radicals and reactionaries, and complete short stories, sometimes rendered in an impressionistic style.

Classification of proletarian writing by rigid stylistic, thematic, or chronological criteria is highly misleading as so much of the work is too complex for facile definitions. Zora Neale Hurston's Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937); Richard Wright's first two books, Uncle Tom's Children (1938) and Native Son (1940); and Meridel Le Sueur's various short stories exemplify this difficulty. Even the subgenre of the antimilitary novel produced highly complex works. Outstanding among these was Johnny Got His Gun (1939), by Dalton Trumbo, who decries the brutality of war by adopting the viewpoint of a "basket case," a soldier who has lost all his limbs in battle. Mixed themes are also found in Truman Nelson's The Sin of the Prophet (an homage to abolitionist Theodore Parker, 1952), Harriet Arnow's The Dollmaker (the migration of a hillbilly family to Detroit, 1954), and Budd Schulberg's What Makes Sammy Run? (the organizing of the Screen Writers Guild, 1941). Some of these were not published until the 1950s and some became the basis for motion pictures or television programs made even later, indications that the impact of the proletarian tradition did not collapse entirely with the end of the 1930s or even the 1940s.

Some of the writers who came to the United States as refugees from the Nazi threat in Europe became part of the radical current. The most successful of these was Stefan Heym, a refugee from Germany who began to write in English. His best-selling The Crusaders (1948) dealt with the American army fighting in the European theater as if it were a capitalist venture. One of the novel's features is that individuals who appear to be major characters keep getting killed off, as in a real war, yet are replaced by a new cast of characters who re-create class positions in a manner that seems realistic, if not inevitable. During the McCarthy era, Heym wrote Goldsborough (1954), a novel of oppressed miners who turn to radical solutions. This was to be the last book he wrote in the United States. Distraught by the rise of McCarthyism, Heym followed the example of Brecht and repatriated to East Berlin, where he forged an uneasy record of writing novels critical of the system from a decidedly Marxist perspective.

An expatriate often overlooked in accounts of American radical writers is the elusive B. Traven, who successfully hid his true identity and national origins for decades. His rationale for doing so was to place all attention on his work, which proved to have enormous popular as well as critical appeal. Most of his novels deal with exploited Indian peasants in Mexico and the horrible working conditions in the jungle lumber camps: The Government (1931), The Carreta (1935), March to the Monteria (1933), Rebellion of the Hanged (1938), The General of the Jungle (1940). He also wrote about wandering American Wobblies in Mexico (The Cotton Pickers, 1929), stranded merchant seamen (The Death Ship, 1934), American fortune hunters (The Treasure of the Sierra Madre, 1927), and American imperialists (The White Rose, 1935).

During the war years, the emphasis on class conflict and opposition to militarism, which had been dominant radical themes, gave way to a perceived need to foster national unity in the war against fascism. With the end of the conflict, the old themes were not easily resurrected. The dubious role Communists were acting out in Eastern Europe and a growing awareness of the repressive nature of the Stalinist regime moved many writers away from former commitments, some adopting an openly critical view of the Soviet system, either from a Right or Left perspective. McCarthyism accelerated the ideological disarray. Outright blacklists, as was the case with Hollywood screenwriters, were rare, but graylists were not. Radical editors were driven out of publishing houses, grants were not awarded radical writers, book clubs rarely adopted radical books, radical critics lost their jobs in the review media, and radical professors were ejected from universities. The cultural institutions of the Communist Party collapsed and attempts to create new radical book clubs or literary magazines were unsuccessful.

Writers with radical roots often quit their literary work in despair, but some persevered and a few prospered despite the new political climate. Authors such as Ruth McKenney, William Motley, Irwin Shaw, Alfred Hayes, and Howard Fast would find success with work that lacked the old radical bite. Others like Richard Wright and Nelson Algren would move with new intellectual tides of dissent. Wright became identified with the Third World perspective and Algren forged links with the French existentialists and the small-press movement in America while writing novels about drugs, the destitute, and boxers that found a popular audience. A number of the blacklisted Hollywood screenwriters found work as television writers for the series You Are There and a few eventually resumed Hollywood careers and scripted important films such as Spartacus (1960) and *M*A*S*H* (1970). Tom McGrath stayed viable through regional associations and the alternative press while African Americans such as Langston Hughes and Claude McKay became more identified with racial consciousness rather than class consciousness, a perception they sometimes encouraged. Meridel Le Sueur would fall into anonymity until her work was revived by the woman's movement of the late 1960s, which related to her feminism more than to her socialism. Writers like James T. Farrell who continued to write in the old mold were usually dismissed by reviewers as being out-of-date. A significant rightward drift was also evident. John Dos Passos's Mid-Century (1960) was as conservative as U.S.A. had been radical. Budd Schulberg was typical of former radicals who became concerned with unions and revolutions that had gone wrong (longshoremen in Waterfront, 1955; teamsters in Everything That Moves, 1980; and Cuba in Sanctuary V, 1969).

Most crippling to any radical continuum was that no new wave of leftist writers emerged from the experiences of the war years. For a moment Norman Mailer seemed to be an exception. His Naked and the Dead (1948) dealt with an American military that flirted with fascism and his Barbary Shore (1951) featured Trotskyists. Mailer worked for the Progressive Party, was involved with the National Guardian, and helped finance the Village Voice; but his career moved toward ever more sensationalist and individualistic themes, his liberalism often containing elements usually associated with the Right. James Jones, another best-selling new author, included a wonderful homage to the Industrial Workers of the World in From Here to Eternity (1951), a sequence dropped from the film version. His work, however, had only dim notions of class conflict that were often enmeshed within a military system with its own set of particulars.

Intellectual disfavor of radical literature became the norm in universities when political scientists declared an end to ideology and English professors adopted a "New Criticism" that devalued writing that was politically committed. Despite the resilience of individual authors and some new standard-bearers in the 1960s, the literary movement that had blossomed in the 1930s was more or less spent by the early 1950s. The next literary rebellion with radical overtones would be that of the Beat writers. Their movement would be more cultural than political, and their hostility to all forms of authoritarianism would extend beyond Stalin to Lenin and Marx.

[See also Algren, Nelson; American Writers Congress; Anvil and New Anvil; Conroy, Jack; Dos Passos, John; Farrell, James T.; Fast, Howard; Gold, Michael; Goodman, Paul; Herbst, Josephine; John Reed Clubs; Le Sueur, Meridel; Mainstream; McGrath, Tom; McKenney, Ruth; New Masses; Olsen, Tillie; Partisan Review; Smedley, Agnes; Wright, Richard.]

FURTHER READINGS

- Brown, Sterling A., Arthur P. Davis, and Ulysses Lee, eds. The Negro Caravan. New York: Citadel, 1941.
- Conroy, Jack, and Curt Johnson, eds. Writers in Revolt: The Anvil Anthology, 1933-1940. New York: Lawrence Hill, 1973.
- Maltz, Albert. "What Shall We Ask of Writers?" New Masses 12 February 1946. Responses in New Masses by Howard Fast (26 February 1946), Joseph North (26 February 1946), John Howard Lawson (19 March 1946), and William Z. Foster (23 April 1946). Responses in the Daily Worker by Mike Gold (12 and 23 February 1946) and Samuel Sillen (11-16 February 1946).
- Nekola, Charlotte, and Paula Rabinowitz, eds. Writing Red: An Anthology of American Women Writers, 1930-1940. New York: Feminist Press, 1987.
- North, Joseph, ed., with introduction by Maxwell Geismar. New Masses: An Anthology of the Rebel Thirties. New York: International Publishers, 1969.
- Salzman, Jack, with Barry Wallenstein, eds. Years of Protest: A Collection of American Writing of the 1930s. New York: Pegasus, 1967.
- Swados, Harvey, ed. The American Writer and the Great Depression. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1966.
- Wald, Alan M. Writing from the Left: New Essays on Radical Culture and Politics. London: Verso, 1994.

—ERNIE BRILL and DAN GEORGAKAS

PROLETARIAN PARTY. The direct descendant of the Socialist Party (SP) of Michigan, and especially of the large left-wing group around the Proletarian University in Detroit, the Proletarian Party (PP) was headed by shoe-salesman John Keracher and machinist Dennis Batt. One of the most militantly Marxist groups in the national SP, and a vehement supporter of the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, the Michigan party was the first of many left-wing groups expelled (in May 1919) by the SP national leadership. At an emergency meeting of the expelled party in June, a resolution was passed calling for a new revolutionary party to be formed in Chicago on 1 September, and on that date Keracher, Batt, and others from the "Michigan group," together with supporters from other states, took part in founding the Communist Party (CP).

Fundamental disagreements, however, soon made it impossible for the "Michigan group" to remain in the new party. Keracher, Batt, and their comrades were almost the only founders of American Communism who did not believe that proletarian revolution was imminent in the United States. Active trade-unionists—Batt was a central figure in the Detroit Federation of Labor—they opposed the CP's "underground" and antielectoral orientation as well as its dual unionism. They were also critical of the CP's organization as a loose "federation of federations," and called for a centralized, disciplined party. In January 1920, after CPers tried unsuccessfully to take over the Proletarian University by force, the CP leadership charged Keracher and the others with "Menshevism" and expelled them. Six months later, in June, the expelled members and several newcomers founded the PP.

Several thousand workers took out cards in the PP over the years (non-wage-earners were prohibited from joining by the party constitution), but its membership seems to have peaked at around five hundred in the late 1920s. Although locals were formed in at least thirty-eight cities, from New York to San Francisco, its stronghold remained the industrial Midwest, especially Detroit, Flint, Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo, and Rochester. In addition to Keracher and Batt, its leading figures included Carl and Sarraine Berreitter, Christ Jelset, Charles M. O'Brien, Al Renner, Anna Tomasek, Mary Ertz Will, Al Wysocki, and cartoonist Harvey Breitmeyer.

Masthead, c. 1930.

The PP sent a delegate to the third congress of the Communist International (CI) in June 1921, and at its next convention declared its total agreement with the CI and resolved to continue the PP "until the CI is represented in America by a real Communist Party." Despite efforts by CI officials to convince the PP to reenter the "official" CP, the Proletarians stubbornly pursued their own course nationally while uncritically supporting the Third International line on world politics. Not until the mid-1930s, when Keracher and his friends opposed the Popular Front—in the United States as well as in Europe, but above all in Spain during the Revolution—did the PP challenge the authority of the CP of the Soviet Union on international affairs. But then they turned around and endorsed the Hitler-Stalin Pact and supported the Soviet Union position on World War II.

Largest of the Communist opposition groups for some fifteen years, the PP was the perennial prey of other oppositionists. German-born Marxist economist Paul Mattick was expelled for factionalism in 1931, and the following year a small group of his supporters left the PP to help him form the short-lived United Workers Party. Several PPersons joined the Trotskyists; a few became Lovestoneites; a very few—notably Oakley C. Johnson, Stanley Nowak, and Harry M. Wicks—joined or became associated with the CP.

Notwithstanding the PP's vociferous assertions of its Leninist orthodoxy, PP Marxism remained that of the left wing of the SP during World War I—a naturalistic Marxism that owed more to Engels than to Marx, as far from the Neo-Hegelianism of the Frankfurt School as from the "diamat" of Moscow, and deeply influenced by Charles Darwin. Lewis Henry Morgan, and Joseph Dietzgen. Essentially a socialist educational group rather than a revolutionary political party—its activity consisted almost exclusively of study classes, forums, lectures, and soapboxing—the PP proved to be a good caretaker for Charles H. Kerr's old socialist publishing co-op, which Keracher and other PPersons ran from 1928 till the party's demise in 1971.

For a few years during the Great Depression, the alumni of the Proletarian University enjoyed an activist phase that had a real impact on the broader working-class movement. PPersons were active in the Briggs Auto Body strike in Detroit, 1933, and later helped lead sit-downs in Flint and elsewhere. In the early days of the United Auto Workers, PP street speakers expounded the ABC's of Marxism to larger and more receptive crowds than ever. And for a small group, the PP provided the United Auto Workers with a disproportionately large number of its best organizers, some of whom—such as Emil Mazey and Frank Marquart—became important leaders of the new union. Many other PPersons eventually became top officers of other unions—Carl Berreitter of the International Typographical Union, Al Renner of the Restaurant Workers, Samuel Meyers of the Retail Clerks, and many others noted for their militant and often innovative union-organizing strategies.

In all but a few cases, however, the PPersons who became union leaders did not remain in the PP. Like all revolutionary sects, the PP suffered a high turnover rate. By 1940 it was no longer a large sect but a small one, and it grew smaller year by year until 1971, when national secretary Al Wysocki, who for some time had taken care of the party's day-to-day chores, died after a long illness. None of the handful of surviving party stalwarts, all of them in their sixties and seventies, came forward to fill the breach. The PP never merged with any other party, never admitted defeat, never disbanded. Independent to the end, it just faded away.

[See also Keracher, John.]

FURTHER READING

- Keracher, John. "Ten Years of Communism in America." The Proletarian (Chicago), September 1929, November 1929, February 1930, March–April 1930.
- Marquart, Frank. An Auto Worker's Journal: The UAW from Crusade to One-Party Union. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1975.
- Ruff, Allen. "A Path Not Taken: The Proletarian Party and the Early History of Communism in the United States." In Culture, Gender, Race and U.S. Labor History, edited by Ronald C. Kent et al. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993.

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

PROLETARIO. Founded in 1896 in Pittsburgh by a group of Italian immigrants belonging to the Socialist Labor Party of Pennsylvania, Il Proletario became during much of its twenty-five-year existence the most important periodical of the Italian American Left. The paper might have died in its infancy had it not been for the important personal involvement of some leading Italian socialist émigrés such as Dino Rondani and Giacinto Menotti Serrati. When in 1902 the latter founded the Federazione Socialista Italiana del Nord America (FSI), Il Proletario became its official organ, and up until the FSI dissolved itself into the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in 1921, the newspaper's existence became intimately tied to the organizational and ideological vicissitudes of the FSI.

Seldom enjoying a stable financial backing, and having often to rely on ad hoc fundraising campaigns, Il Proletario managed to survive one financial crisis after another, thus fulfilling its essential role as a source of information for Italian American activists and as a forum for political debate. The newspaper's existence was also marked by a shifting political orientation largely due to the constant change of editors and to the different political conjunctures both in the United States and in Italy. Thus, for instance, under Carlo Tresca's editorship Il Proletario became a vehicle for the promotion of industrial unionism and of IWW objectives, whereas under Edmondo Rossoni's brief editorship, in 1915, the paper favored Italy's intervention in the war, a position strongly advocated by the revolutionary syndicalist movement in Italy.

The political repression following U.S. intervention in World War I forced Il Proletario to suspend publication. The paper sought to circumvent the government's ban by reappearing under different names until it was allowed to resume publication in early 1920. When in 1921 the FSI was absorbed by the IWW, Il Proletario's existence came to an end, as the paper was transformed into an official IWW organ under the name the Italian Weekly of the Industrial Workers of the World.

[See also Giovannitti, Arturo; Industrial Workers of the World; Italian Americans.]

FURTHER READING

Cartosio, Bruno, "Italian Workers and Their Press in the United States, 1900–1920," and Elisabetta Vezzosi, "Class, Ethnicity, and Acculturation in Il Proletario: The WWI Years." In The Press of Labor Migrants in Europe and North America, 1880s to 1930s, edited by Christiane Harzig and Dirk Hoerder. Bremen: University of Bremen, 1985.

—BRUNO RAMIREZ

PROLETPEN. Yiddish left-wing poets, prolifically active in the United States for more than three generations beginning in the early 1890s, were almost by definition working-class bards. But the Yiddish section of the Communist movement made special efforts to encourage and channel the activities of their own "proletarian poets." Around them grew one of the most intense and widely read literary movements in the history of the American Left.

Early in 1924, about thirty Communist supporters formed the Young Worker-Writers' Union, limiting membership to "those who recognized the class struggle." They viewed themselves as heirs of the "Sweatshop Poets" (Morris Winchevsky, Morris Rosenfeld, David Edelshtat, and Joseph Bovshover) whose politics and aesthetics had been challenged by the aestheticist "yunge" (young ones) in the 1910s. Their journal, Yung-Kuzhie (Young Smithy, 1924–1925) attacked "art for art's sake" and promoted the unity of revolutionary writers everywhere. Leading members also took part in a short-lived trilingual journal (English/Yiddish/Russian), Spartacus, inspired by an international conference of writers in Moscow.

The same writers took part in a wider, non-Party but sympathetic cultural movement of Workers Clubs, begun in 1920, with fifty branches and about five thousand members. Together, these clubs and the Union published Yugnt (Youth, 1926–1927), suspended along with Yung-Kuzhie after the appearance of Der Hammer (The Hammer), an official Communist Yiddish monthly of politics and culture. A colorful and in some ways superior counterpart to the English-language New Masses, Der Hammer carried lively journalism, original poetry and fiction, and illustrations by such leading left-wing artists as Louis Lozowick.

Meanwhile, a new Proletarian Writers Group was organized by about thirty of these young writers, taking the name "Union Square" to emphasize their revolutionary nature—revolutionary activity centered around Union Square—and their enmity toward the forces clustered on East Broadway. This group lasted only eight months but made a splash in the Yiddish Left with a collective criticism of editor Moissaye Olgin for coveting bourgeois "stars" in his widely read Yiddish communist Morgen Freiheit. Olgin, under pressure, admitted his error and outlined a revolutionary program for a new Freiheit Writers Union.

After the August 1929 Arab uprising in Palestine, which the Freiheit supported against British imperialism "and its Zionist lackeys," a ferocious assault was launched on the Freiheit from within the Jewish community. Offices were attacked, vendors beaten up, copies burned, advertisers pressured to withdraw, and writers expelled from the Yiddish writers union. Four of the Freiheit's most distinguished contributors, including famed poet and playwright H. Leivick, quickly resigned from the paper. But messages of support poured in from writers' groups throughout the United States and abroad. At the first and most historic gathering, Olgin and fifty-four belletrists launched the Proletpen. They pronounced as their slogans: "With our faces toward Today! With our faces toward the working-class! With our faces toward America!" An opposition movement led by H. Leivick, declaring devotion to the ideals of the 1917 Revolution but Yiddishist and individualist in art, lasted less than a year.

The Proletpen played an electrifying role. Sending "brigades" of writers to read at workers' gatherings in Depression America, they quickly issued Union Square, a 340-page anthology, and the Red Cock, a journal of humor and satire (in conjunction with the Proletpen Ball, which became an annual event), also providing the literary material for the Funk (Spark), Yiddish monthly of the International Workers Order, and for the publications of ICOR, dedicated to Jewish colonization in Biro-Bidjan. By 1930–1931, Olgin himself contributed to Der Hammer a series of essays evaluating each Proletpen writer, and a general report he would present to the Soviet Yiddish writers on his upcoming trip. Links between Proletpen and the Soviet Yiddish writers tightened, with Russian critical studies and an entire issue of the prestigious Russian-Yiddish Farmest (Challenge) devoted to the Proletpen. Due no doubt to the commonality of culture and language, these American leftists enjoyed perhaps the most intimate contact of any intellectuals with their Soviet counterparts.

Proletpen's monthly Signal (The Signal) flourished from 1933 to 1937, when the group formally gave way to a much broader international organization, YKUF (Yiddishe Kultur Farband) with its journal Yiddishe Kultur. The new worldwide Popular Front against fascism appealed to many hitherto alienated Yiddish writers, although the groundwork of a vastly successful 1937 Paris Yiddish congress was undercut by the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939. Indeed, the most famed Proletpen figure, brilliant satirist and poet Moshe Nadir, expressed disgust and withdrew into bitter isolation. YKUF nevertheless has remained a key force in the continuing Yiddishist literary outpouring, with hundreds of cultural events and dozens of high-quality poetry collections, works of fiction, autobiographies, and children's books. Yiddishe Kultur, edited first by Nakhman Maisel and later by Itche Goldberg, continues today as a banner publication of Yiddish literature and cultural criticism.

Ironically, only a few years after the Soviet Yiddish leaders, poet Itzhak Feffer and actor Solomon Mikhoels, were feted in giant wartime rallies across the United States and other surviving Yiddish centers, they fell victim, along with many others, to Stalin's savage attacks on Jewish culture. Reaching middle and then old age, former Proletpen militants looked back with pride at the dynamism and seriousness of their youth and at their intimate rapport with a large readership, but with shame at having excoriated less radical writers while censoring themselves and one another in the name of ideological purity. As their use of Yiddish and their attention to form ripened, they and the surviving Left Yiddish literature at large continued to owe much to the movements of an earlier age, despite all the tragedies and contradictions.

FURTHER READING

- Fenster, B. "From 'Yung-Kuzhie' to 'Signal.'" Signal, February 1936.
 Green, Ber. "Ten Years of Proletarian Literary History." Signal, August 1936.
 Kurtz, Aaron. "The 'Proletpen.'" Der Funk, February 1931.
 Pomerantz, Alexander. Proletpen. Kiev: Ukrainisher Vishshaf-lechter Akademie, 1935.

—AARON KRAMER

PSYCHIATRY AND PSYCHOLOGY. Leftists have had a long, sometimes contentious relationship with psychiatry and psychology, which they have encountered as both professions and theories of human behavior. Before World War I, psychology was one of the sciences that socialists used to create a vision of postcapitalist humanity and an effective rhetoric of social change. Touring rural Oklahoma in 1907, for example, Oscar Ameringer had a colleague hypnotize members of the audience to simulate the false consciousness of workers under capitalism. Fortunately, Ameringer explained, the program of the Socialist party (SP) offered a "socialist snap of the fingers" to awaken and radicalize the masses. In New York City, the more urbane writers of the Masses and New Review celebrated the liberating force of "the primitive"—which they found in new trends in psychology, anthropology, and the arts.

At the end of the 1920s, psychology had almost disappeared from leftist discourse as the SP disintegrated and the U.S. Communist party (CPUSA) entered its sectarian Third Period. Militant socialists associated with the Brookwood School, however, continued to look to psychology for an alternative to the pessimistic economism of the leadership of the American Federation of Labor. They read articles on personality by Prynce (aka Prince) Hopkins, a "red millionaire" who studied psychology in Europe, helped found Labor Age, served on its board, and kept it afloat financially. Within the communist movement, only V. F. Calverton persisted in efforts toward a Marx-Freud synthesis that had begun in the New Masses in 1926–1927.

By the mid-1930s the politics of the psyche was again a subject debated within the Left. To many leaders of the CP, discussions of psychology were a distraction from the class struggle. Psychiatry, likewise, was judged a profession promoting superstition, anticommunism, and conformity to oppressive social relations. In December 1934 this assessment was validated by the psychiatric confinement of Jane Emery Newton, publicized nationally by the Hearst press. The daughter of a socially prominent family in Grand Rapids, Michigan, Jane Emery moved to Chicago in 1929, where she radicalized and married Herbert Newton, an African American activist on the CPUSA's Central Committee. During a routine court appearance Jane's family background was discovered; she was certified insane by a forensic psychiatrist and committed to Cook County Psychopathic Hospital.

Offsetting this image of the psychiatrist as a tool of capitalism were the many young clinicians who were Marxists. Together with radicalized academic psychologists, these young professionals soon supplanted bohemians and sexual libertarians as psychological authorities and activists within the communist movement. In Popular Front caucuses within various professions, they and their supporters debated the social content of competing schools of psychology and tried to interest their colleagues in antifascist causes. The Social Worker Discussion Clubs and Psychologists League published Social Work Today and the Psychologists League Journal, respectively; held forums on psychotherapy and personality theory; and campaigned for government programs to hire unemployed scientists and clinicians. In medicine, the Medical Bureau of the Daily Worker devoted much of its newspaper column and monthly magazine (Health and Hygiene) to psychiatric topics. Among its leaders was the psychoanalytic psychiatrist Frankwood Williams, whom the New Masses hailed as a model antifascist professional.

Within broader Popular Front institutions, psychology had visibility and influence far beyond its importance to Marx and Lenin. When, for example, the CPUSA organized the Pen and Hammer Clubs as a multidisciplinary successor to the John Reed Clubs, psychology was second only to economics as a topic for forums, articles, and study groups. A psychologist, Solomon Diamond, was a founder and leader of Pen and Hammer, becoming the research director and national officer of its repackaged successor, the National Research League. When the Marxist journal Science and Society was founded in 1936, psychology was the scientific discipline best represented on the editorial board; combined with psychiatry it became the subject most extensively covered. Early contributors and supporters of the journal included the prominent young psychologists Solomon Asch, J. F. Brown, and Gregory Razran.

During the period of the Hitler-Stalin Pact, Communist-initiated caucuses such as the Psychologists League suffered internal splits, lost members, and eventually dissolved. Longer lasting has been the Left-liberal Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues (SPSSI), best known for its members' providing the social psychology brief for the plaintiffs in Brown v. Board of Education. SPSSI was formed in 1936 by members of the SP, New America (a Deweyist-Marxist group), and former Christian socialists to sensitize the American Psychological Association to the issue of psychologists' unemployment. Initially radical in its perspective, SPSSI pioneered the idea of social science research on war, class conflict, and racism. Distrusting the mass media, it mounted its own exhibit on the irrationality of war and laissez-faire capitalism at the 1939 New York World's Fair. Among the early leaders of SPSSI was George W. Hartmann, a pacifist, perennial SP candidate for office, and chairman of the wartime group Peace Now.

In the early 1940s, the CPUSA's "Workers' Schools" added courses in psychology and psychiatry, reflecting the Party's interest in recruiting white-collar and middle-class members. When Workers' Schools became "Peoples' Schools" in the mid-1940s, psychology courses were among their most popular offerings, with liberal psychotherapists and academics recruited as teachers. The faculty of the California Labor School was perhaps the most eclectic, exemplified by Cavendish Moxon—a British émigré who had been psychoanalyzed by Otto Rank and who was a popular therapist for Communists in the San Francisco Bay area. Contrary to the stereotype of the CPUSA sympathizer as intellectually compliant, Moxon used the purge of Earl Browder as an occasion for chiding the Party's National Committee for its neglect of psychology. What it failed to see, he wrote to the New Masses, was that Browder was a "self-willed individualist" who elicited "over-submissiveness" in Party members and who should have undergone psychotherapy "as a condition for continuing to hold his job."

In addition to teaching, psychologists and psychiatrists assumed more than their share of administrative duties in Party schools; in Boston, for example, both the director (Harrison Harley) and the associate director of the Samuel Adams School of Social Studies were psychologists. By 1949, the Peoples' Schools experiments in combining Marxism with psychology ended when government repression closed all but those in New York and San Francisco. Responding to the Cold War by turning inward, the CPUSA purged all Western psychology from these remaining schools, either abolishing psychology as a subject or replacing it with Soviet paeans to Ivan Pavlov.

In 1950 the Party launched an antipsychological witch-hunt within its ranks, attacking the loyalty and reliability of anyone "contaminated by" Freudian ideas. The hundreds of members who were undergoing psychotherapy were told to quit either the Party or their treatment, causing many Communists to spend years suffering from unnecessary psychological distress. Until 1956 the CPUSA campaigned relentlessly in its press against psychotherapy and non-Soviet psychology. It isolated itself from scores of independent Marxists in medicine and psychology, such as Alfred Blazer, who wrote a popular mental health column for the Daily Compass titled "What's YOUR Problem?"

Despite the Party's anti-Freud campaign, many clinicians and academics remained loyal to the communist movement. Some quarreled in Science and Society over which psychoanalytic concepts should be retained, while others such as Communist social worker Bertha Reynolds vainly submitted defenses of psychotherapy to the Party's press. One group, led by the psychoanalyst Bernard Robbins, established a psychiatric day hospital in Flushing, Queens, to apply Marxist ideas to the treatment of seriously disturbed patients. The practice of psychotherapy also gave some academics close to the Party a second career, free from government harassment and university blacklists. These included the formerly anti-Freudian experimental psychologists Bernard Riess and Ralph Gundlach, and the literature professors Harry Slochower and Edwin Berry Burgum.

Meanwhile, a few anti-Stalinist Marxists spent the postwar years attempting to link psychoanalysis to political change and social issues. Paul Goodman, for example, praised the revolutionary essence of both Freud and Reich to the readers of Politics, while critiquing Freud's political naïveté and Reich's "Rousseauian" faith in the unfettered instinctual life.

In the Vietnam War era, leftist caucuses were again formed in psychology and related fields, including Psychologists for a Democratic Society, Psychologists for Social Action, and Behaviorists for Social Action (Marxist-Leninist Skinnerians). More visible to the public was the Radical Therapy Collective, publisher of the antipsychiatric Radical Therapist. By the late 1970s, leftist critiques of modern capitalism were informed by revisionist histories of IQ testing; most prominent was The Science and Politics of I.Q., written by the formerly blacklisted psychologist Leon Kamin.

Within the remnants of the Marxist and neo-Marxist Left, psychology has taken on new meanings in recent decades. In a few small groups, the distinction between psychological theory and political practice has been intentionally breached, as socializing and controlling the membership have become explicitly psychopolitical procedures. The best-known example of this has been the applied psychology developed in the mid-1970s in Lyndon La Rouché's National Caucus of Labor Committees. To keep his own cadre under control and free of moral pollution, La Rouché applied techniques of psychological coercion usually associated with religious cults and modern police states. In the 1980s, La Rouché's former colleague Fred Newman became known for recruiting patients from his Institute for Social Therapy into an affiliated organization, the New Alliance party, which twice ran a developmental psychologist for president of the United States.

A final expression of idiosyncratic Marxism combined with authoritarian control and personality reorganization has been a handful of psychotherapeutic sects organized by former activists in the communist movement. One was founded in New York City by Saul B. Cohen (aka Saul Newton), a charismatic former Communist social worker and member of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, who developed his own interpretation of Harry Stack Sullivan's psychiatric theories.

More successful has been the Communities for Re-Evaluation Counseling. Established in a number of U.S. cities and abroad, this group was founded in Seattle by Harvey Jackins, a labor organizer who became a self-taught therapist in 1950—following an anti-communist purge of the labor movement in the Northwest. In contrast to leaders of other psychopolitical sects, Jackins neither calls his therapy "Marxist" nor cites explicitly Marxist principles in his many books and pamphlets. His overall strategy is nonetheless an amalgam of individual psychotherapy and class struggle politics. Combining the optimistic bombast of 1950s Lysenkoism and nineteenth-century Spencerian evolutionism, Jackins has proclaimed his group to be "engaged in probably the most fundamental change" in the history of humanity, putting it on "the very leading edge of the tendency toward order and meaning in the universe."

FURTHER READING

- Finison, Lorenz J. "The Psychological Insurgency, 1936–1945." Journal of Social Issues 42 (1986).
- Harris, Benjamin. "Don't Be Unconscious, Join Our Ranks': Psychology, Politics and Communist Education." Re-thinking Marxism 6, no. 1 (1993).
- Harris, Benjamin. "Psychology and Marxist Politics in America." In Psychology and Society: Radical Theory and Practice, edited by Ian Parker and Russell Spears. London: Pluto Press, 1996.
- Harris, Benjamin. "Junius Flagg Brown"; "George Wilfred Hartmann"; "Goodman Barbor Watson." In American National Biography, edited by John A. Garraty. New York: Oxford University Press, in press.
- Harris, Benjamin, Rhoda Unger, and Ross Stagner, eds. "Fifty Years of the Psychology of Social Issues." Journal of Social Issues 42, no. 1 (1986).

—BENJAMIN HARRIS

PSYCHOANALYSIS. The Left movement in the United States never wholly welcomed psychoanalysis, although the bohemian Marxists of the Masses and early feminists were intrigued by its possibilities. Most U.S. psychoanalysts rejected leftist ideas outright, and it was only in the writings of Wilhelm Reich and Herbert Marcuse that a more thorough integration of Marx and Freud was attempted.

The first lengthy popular treatments of Freudian ideas were written by leftists, the Masses editors Max Eastman and Floyd Dell. Dell, especially, continued to write of psychoanalysis in the Masses and later the Liberator, and the influence of Freud on Eastman is clearly visible in his Marx, Lenin, and the Science of Revolution. Edmund Wilson remarked that he had first learned of psychoanalysis through Eastman's popular treatment in Everybody's Magazine in 1915. Dell satirized the contradictions he felt in trying to unite both Freudian and Marxist ideas in "A Psycho-Analytic Confession" in the Liberator for April 1920.

Freudian and Marxist ideas often mixed and clashed in the salon of Mabel Dodge, where a special evening was devoted to Freud's teachings, just as another night drew Big Bill Haywood, Emma Goldman, and others in a debate on the Industrial Workers of the World. Other participants in the bohemian Left current who were influenced by psychoanalytic ideas were Randolph Bourne, Isadora Duncan, and Rose Pastor Stokes (in the free-motherhood campaign), and Malcolm Cowley, Kenneth Burke, and Matthew Josephson. But the most outspoken and serious radical to welcome the ideas of Freud was Emma Goldman. Emma Goldman attended lectures by Freud in Vienna (1895) as well as at the famous Clark University conference (1909), and she invoked Freudian teachings for their liberating effect on female sexuality.

Still, radical Freudianism was a hybrid for which the U.S. medical establishment had only disdain and dislike, while many on the Left felt the same distaste for Freudianism. The exclusion of lay analysts from the world of psychoanalytic education, the conservatism of the medical establishment, and the specialized nature of medical education served to limit the number of new psychoanalysts who would have the same broad cultural and political backgrounds as their earlier, European counterparts.

Those aspects of psychoanalysis that could be understood as having radical significance were often obscured. Thus, the respected Freud and the Americans, by Nathan G. Hale, details the popularizations carried out by Dell and Eastman without ever mentioning that they were leftists or connected with the Masses and the Liberator. Meanwhile, early socialists like John Spargo used a superficial "Freudian" character typology to characterize the communists as "hysterics."

Other radical voices spoke out against psychoanalysis: Upton Sinclair had never trusted psychoanalysis, and he revealed in a letter to his associate that he had never known it to work. Sidney Hook, in a debate with Max Eastman, called it "the crassest violation of scientific method," and he insisted elsewhere that Freud could never serve Marx's materialism, while Christopher Caudwell agreed with other U.S. and U.K. Marxists that "Freudism can attain to no psychology beyond bourgeois psychology."

But the radical press was not entirely negative. The popularizer of psychoanalysis, Andre Tridon, had earlier written a book on the Industrial Workers of the World, while one member of the latter organization, known only by his card number, wrote about psychoanalysis in the Industrial Worker for 15 January 1921. The militant New Majority, the journal of the Chicago Federation of Labor, commented favorably on psychoanalysis with some regularity, and the Eastman/Hook debate mentioned above was carried in V. F. Calverton's the Modern Quarterly.

Trotsky had commented favorably on Freud's ideas; Philip Rahv and William Phillips began to read Freud seriously at the time their Partisan Review severed its connections with the Stalinist Left, and their journal was as open to "Freudo-Marxists" like Nicolas Calas ("On Revolutionary Sadism") as it was to Trotsky's writings. Joseph Freeman, who broke with Stalinism at approximately that time, wrote of how a single sentence of Freud's provided the major and decisive inspiration for his life's work as a writer, although he also noted that the psychoanalytic turn in the writings of the Left bohemians was often the opening of the door for their reentry into bourgeois society.

The desire to understand the mechanisms of the transmission and internalization of repressive institutions reached a high point in the writings of Wilhelm Reich, who arrived in the United States in 1939. While his descent into biological mysticism is well known, his studies The Mass Psychology of Fascism and Dialectical Materialism and Psychoanalysis are of great interest. Reich had been a pioneer of sexual education in Europe, and he continued to petition Congress in the United States for the sexual rights of the young. He envisioned the possibility of a nonrepressive society, and he thought that psychoanalysis could lift the veil of repression that stood between humanity and sexual freedom, which he conceived of in genital and orgasmic terms.

Russell Jacoby has documented an episode in the history of the U.S. Freudian Marxism that shares the fate of Reich's ideas, insofar as their actual propagation failed in the United States. Otto Fenichel was one of a number of European analysts who had participated in leftist movements in Europe before their forced emigration and their arrival in the United States—some associates of Fenichel ended up in England and others in other parts of Europe. Along with Edith Jacobson, Annie Reich, and others, he conducted a secret Rundbrief, or circular letter, designed to preserve the radical notions of psychoanalysis they had brought from Europe, when Wilhelm Reich and others had shared their interests. The German exile community on the West Coast maintained a spirited intellectual life, with cross-fertilization from Frankfurt School members Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer, and from J. Robert Oppenheimer and others, but in the end, the secrecy of the Rundbrief, the fear the analysts had of losing their immigration status, the dispersion of the original group because of Hitler's conquests and the conservatism of the U.S. medical establishment (and its opposition to lay analysis) combined ultimately to hide the radical import of their work.

Freud himself wrote pessimistically about Marxism and materialism, but in a late letter he noted that he had just learned that Marx and Engels did not deny "the influence of ideas and super-ego factors" and that this knowledge invalidated the contrast "between Marxism and psychoanalysis which I had thought to exist." The gap in Freud's teachings left by this remark was filled especially by the work of Herbert Marcuse.

His Eros and Civilization may be the most influential Marxist interpretation of Freud in the United States, but it is undeniable that Reich provided a similar inspiration. Marcuse outlined the principles by which a nonrepressive society could come into being, and like Reich he emphasized the dominance of the pleasure principle. Unlike Reich, however, he opposed the latter's idea of an uninhibited genitality with his notion of the libidized body, which borrowed inspiration from Geza Roheim and Sandor Ferenczi. His theory of surplus repression as the psychic residue of dominance and his notion of the critical role of fantasy both played a significant part in the orientation of Left movements of the 1960s and early 1970s.

In Psychoanalysis and Feminism, Juliet Mitchell has emphasized the importance of psychoanalysis as a critique of patriarchy for Marxist feminists, and in doing so, she has rehabilitated the unconscious as a dynamic principle of mental functioning, and sexuality as the axis around which this principle revolves. Further, the writings of Mitchell, Jacqueline Rose, and others expose the essentially sociological outlook of Neo-Freudian feminists who still trace the source of capitalism and patriarchal rule to primarily external events.

But it is precisely the ideas that society is internal and that the family is the locus for the maintenance of repressive social and psychological structures that has separated the Marxist Freudians from the Neo-Freudians who have seen society acting on the individual from the outside instead of from the inside, and who have denied the importance of unconscious mechanisms of internalization. The Marxists also take issue with the psychotherapeutic emphasis often given to Freudian teachings: "Psychoanalysis is a theory of an unfree society that necessitates psychoanalysis as a therapy," Russell Jacoby has written, and the Marxist Freudian impulse insists that the radical import of Freudianism disappears when the theory is collapsed by the therapy.

In the 1990s, a new contradiction appeared in the episodic history of psychoanalysis and the Left. Psychoanalysis came under severe attack from numerous sources, both for its theory of repression and for its lack of therapeutic success, the latter itself a matter of much dispute. But simultaneously, its reputation with leftist academics in women's studies, literature, and cultural studies in general rose largely due to the application of the theories of French analyst Jacques Lacan.

[See also Liberator; Marcuse, Herbert; Masses; Modern Quarterly; Modern Monthly; Partisan Review.]

FURTHER READING

- Frosh, Stephen. The Politics of Psychoanalysis. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1987.
- Hale, Nathan G. Freud and the Americans: The Beginnings of Psychoanalysis in the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Jacoby, Russell. The Repression of Psychoanalysis: Otto Fenichel and the Political Freudians. New York: Basic Books, 1983.
- Robinson, Paul. The Freudian Left. New York: Harper and Row, 1969.

—PAUL GARON

PUBLIC SECTOR UNIONS. During the 1960s and 1970s government unions gained collective-bargaining rights for a majority of city, state, and federal workers. This remarkable turnaround in public-sector unionism was based in part on Left-influenced precursor unions of the 1930s. With the assistance of organizers from the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), many with ties to the Communist Party, government workers joined unions in unprecedented numbers during the Great Depression. The largest of these unions was the State, County, and Municipal Workers of America (SCMWA; not to be confused with its American Federation of Labor (AFL) rival, the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, or AFSCME). Headed by Abram Flaxer, SCMWA was strongest among New York City welfare workers, hospital workers, and laborers. Elsewhere Communist Party-influenced unions signed up other disfranchised groups, including blacks in the Panama Canal Zone, part-time mail deliverers (in the Postal Workers of America), temporary teachers (in the Teachers Union), and New Deal federal workers (in the United Federal Workers of America). SCMWA and the United Federal Workers combined in 1946 to form the United Public Workers (UPW), claiming more than 100,000 members.

Yet, unlike steel, auto, and rubber-worker unions, none of the CIO public-sector unions gained collective-bargaining rights. Only the Transit Workers Union (TWU) of New York City, organized on the then-privately owned transit system, later signed contracts for public employees when the bus and subway lines were purchased by the city. Communists and other Left sympathizers, who were instrumental in forming the union, were excluded from union leadership as part of the 1948 recognition agreement between TWU president Michael Quill and New York City mayor William O'Dwyer.

In a few isolated cases, strong CIO organizing drives forced city managements to recognize AFL unions as preferable alternatives. In Philadelphia, a 1939 strike was ended by calling in an AFSCME local not involved in the strike to negotiate its conclusion. Thereafter, AFSCME was the sole representative for most Philadelphia employees. In New York City, when a 1941 TWU-financed SCMWA organizing drive succeeded in signing up twenty-five percent of the sanitation department, Mayor Fiorello La Guardia ignored calls for a representation election. Instead he pointed out SCMWA's Communist ties and recognized an AFSCME local specifically created for the purpose. Following a similar pattern, Cincinnati officials granted exclusive bargaining rights to an AFSCME district council in 1960 in order to preempt a potentially powerful United Mine Worker organizing drive.

Otherwise public-sector unions generally, and the UPW in particular, collapsed during the early 1950s. One reason was new state legislation forcing public unions to disavow the right to strike. In doing so, the UPW found it difficult to differentiate its approach from less militant AFL rivals.

Anticommunism finally destroyed the UPW. Co-ordinated efforts by government officials and CIO leaders caused thousands of accused Communists to lose their jobs. In 1950 the UPW was expelled from the CIO. And in 1951 Flaxer was sentenced to prison for refusing to turn over membership lists to the U.S. Senate Internal Security Subcommittee (the verdict was overturned seven years later by the Supreme Court). By 1952 the UPW was out of business.

During the 1950s UPW organizers were hired by AFSCME split-offs now affiliated with the Teamsters. The New York City AFSCME locals, led by Jerry Wurf, a Norman Thomas-influenced socialist, protested these appointments. But a more successful strategy for Wurf, one that eventually defeated the Teamsters in key elections and enabled Wurf to take over the national union, was affiliation with the civil rights movement. James Farmer and other black leaders worked as District Council 37 organizers in New York, helping to link AFSCME with the growing civil rights movement as well as with historically strong black unions. In 1969 AFSCME signed the first citywide contract, significantly improving pay and in-service upgrading opportunities for its primarily black and female membership. These organizing successes were repeated in other cities; the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., was in Memphis to support an AFSCME sanitation strike when he was assassinated in 1968.

The most important independent Left union during the 1960s was New York City's Social Service Employees Union (SSEU). Founded by former UPW members in 1961, SSEU displaced AFSCME as the representative for social workers in 1964. Strong rank-and-file participation and cooperation with the welfare rights movement enabled the union to win unprecedented pay increases, improved caseloads, and, most controversially, higher grants for welfare recipients. SSEU became less effective after 1967, when collective-bargaining rules undercut the power of independent unions. Consequently, in 1971 SSEU rejoined AFSCME.

SSEU served as a model for the Chicago Independent Union of Public Aid Employees (IUPAE), a split-off from the Building Service International Union. Even though IUPAE won sole bargaining rights after a 1966 strike, the union was unable to gain support from welfare recipients and failed to win contract approval by the Cook County Board of Commissioners.

In New York City, SSEU success prompted Left factions in other unions to press for strikes; by 1971, transit workers, teachers, sanitation workers, firefighters, police, and, on the federal level, postal workers, had gone on strike, often serving as a model for militancy in other cities. However, racial conflict (in particular the Ocean Hill-Brownsville school board dispute) and the 1975 fiscal crisis diminished the influence of Left caucuses within New York's public-sector unions.

On the national level, public-sector unions remained on the left wing of the labor movement. AFSCME, in particular, had a strong democratic socialist influence among its staff; the union was an early opponent of the Vietnam War and had been in the forefront of the struggle for comparable worth pay for women.

During the 1980s and 1990s, public sector unions continued to grow at a time when private sector unions were losing membership. By 1996 public sector unions constituted over one-third of total U.S. union membership. Nonetheless, the future of public sector unions remained uncertain. Reductions in government spending cut into public employment and increasingly conservative state legislatures threatened a rollback in public sector collective bargaining rights.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Teachers Union.]

FURTHER READING

- Bellush, Jewel, and Bernard Bellush. Union Power and New York. New York: Praeger, 1984.
- Jones, Ralph T. "City Employee Unions in New York and Chicago." Ph.D. diss., Harvard University, 1972.
- Maier, Mark H. City Unions: Managing Discontent in New York City. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1987.
- Spero, Sterling. Government as Employer. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1972.

—MARK MAIER

PUERTO RICANS. The interaction between the status of Puerto Ricans as an oppressed minority in the continental United States and Puerto Rico's semi-colonial status has guaranteed that from its inception until the present day the Left has found a presence in the Puerto Rican community. Until the postwar migration, the number of Puerto Rican-born people in the continental United States was limited, numbering only 1,513 in 1910, 11,811 in 1920, and 52,774 in 1930. Migration from Puerto Rico slowed to a trickle during the Great Depression and then was halted during the war years by the cessation of almost all civilian shipping to and from Puerto Rico.

In 1940, eighty-eight percent of the Puerto Ricans lived in New York City and of this number the majority lived in El Barrio. This community expanded from its original center around East 110th and 111th Streets between Park and Madison Avenues in the East Harlem section of Manhattan before World War I until 1950, when it occupied the area bounded by Third and Fifth Avenues from East 96th to 125th Streets. El Barrio not only contained the largest number of Puerto Ricans but also housed the institutions, churches, cultural centers, political clubs, and shopping that attracted Puerto Ricans from throughout the city.

The establishment of an airplane route from San Juan to New York City and the attraction of the postwar economic boom encouraged a vast migration. Between 1946 and 1964 fully one-third of Puerto Rico's population moved to the continental United States. In 1980 two million Puerto Ricans lived in the continental United States while three million lived in Puerto Rico. The Puerto Rican community spread well beyond El Barrio and New York City so that in 1980 slightly less than fifty percent of the Puerto Rican community resided there. Puerto Ricans are the second largest Hispanic group in the United States, constituting one-sixth of the Hispanic population.

El Barrio grew within Jewish East Harlem, a great center of Socialist Party politics. Before World War I, La Escuela Francisco Ferrer y Guardia (Francisco Ferrer School), a community center serving Hispanics influenced by anarchist ideas, flourished. In 1918 the first Puerto Rican section of the Socialist Party appeared. Shortly afterward the Asociación Nacionalista came into existence. Founded in 1927, El Centro Obrero Español (Spanish Workers Center) became a major center of Communist Party (CP) influence in the community. El Centro sponsored a newspaper, La Vida Obrera (Worker's Life), and took part in successful labor organizing campaigns. El Barrio enthusiastically supported the presidential candidacy of Robert La Follette in 1924 and was also an integral part of the coalition that elected Fiorello La Guardia East Harlem's congressperson from 1922 to 1932.

Vito Marcantonio's candidacy for Congress from East Harlem in 1934 opened a new phase in El Barrio's political life. The most successful radical politician in the United States, Marcantonio embraced the cause of Puerto Rico and the Puerto Rican people as his own. In June 1936 Marcantonio submitted a bill calling for "genuine independence [for Puerto Rico and the declaration of] responsibility of the United States for the disastrous state of the economy of Puerto Rico and the abysmal poverty of the people." In August he visited the island and became engaged as co-attorney for Don Pedro Albizu Campos and six other members of the Nationalist Party, who had been arrested for conspiracy to overthrow the U.S. government. Marcantonio's insistence that the Puerto Ricans were "the most exploited victims of a most devastating imperialism" resonated with El Barrio's deepest feelings. Marcantonio served as de facto congressperson for Puerto Rico until his defeat in 1950. In El Barrio he attended to the everyday needs of his constituents and fought against their vilification in the press. They in turn became an essential part of his electoral coalition—for example, providing sixty-six percent of their vote for Marcantonio even when he was defeated in 1950.

Although it would be impossible to overlook Marcantonio's involvement, leftism in El Barrio existed independently of the radical congressman. After all, it had predated his arrival on scene. When in 1936 the people of El Barrio had the opportunity to vote for Marcantonio on the ticket of the All People's Party, a Left party associated with the CP, fifty-seven percent of his vote was registered on that line. One of El Barrio's election districts gave twenty-four percent of its vote to José Santiago, the CP's candidate for state assemblyman, and he received somewhat lower yet impressive votes from El Barrio in general. That same year El Barrio's vote for Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Herbert H. Lehman on the American Labor Party (ALP) line closely approximated the city-wide ALP vote, 8.6 percent, a percentage not matched in any other non-Jewish area.

In 1937 Oscar García Rivera, the Republican-ALP candidate for state assemblyperson for a district including El Barrio, won a special election, thus becoming the first Puerto Rican elected official in the continental United States. In 1938 he won the same office by running solely on the ALP line. El Barrio provided Israel Amter, the CP's at-large candidate for the city council, his third highest vote of any Manhattan assembly district. In the same election Lehman received two to three times as many votes on the ALP line than his citywide average of fifteen percent, and Marcantonio swept El Barrio, receiving three ALP votes for every Republican vote. Nearly thirty percent of El Barrio's voters pulled the ALP lever to vote for Roosevelt in 1940 and in 1941 a majority voted for La Guardia on the ALP line.

After a decrease in El Barrio's support for the ALP during the early war years, the community resumed voting for this Left party in unprecedented numbers. For example, in 1944 in the Ninth Election District in the heart of El Barrio, Roosevelt received 649 votes (322 on the Democratic and 301 on the ALP lines) and Wendell Willkie received eight votes. Most striking was its support for the entire ALP slate. In 1948 almost two-thirds of its voters supported Marcantonio, running solely on the ALP line, and approximately fifty percent voted for Manuel Medina, the ALP's candidate for state assemblyman. Most significant, Henry Wallace carried El Barrio. In two election districts he received over fifty percent of the vote. In all, he carried all eight of El Barrio's election districts, which represented twenty-seven percent of the election districts he carried in the entire United States.

Despite intensifying political repression, El Barrio continued voting ALP. In 1949, when Marcantonio ran as the ALP mayoral candidate, he carried El Barrio with two-thirds of the vote. Now running for city council, Medina won seventy-three percent of the vote in some El Barrio election districts. In 1950 El Barrio cast over sixty percent of its vote for the only congressman to vote against the Korean War and support the right of the CP to a legal existence. Citywide, the ALP candidate for Senate, W. E. B. Du Bois, received 6.5 percent of the vote; in El Barrio he received approximately forty-five percent. In those few elections the ALP contested before its demise in 1954, its totals in El Barrio were always greatly above those elsewhere in the city. It was only in El Barrio, including areas outside Marcantonio's district, that the ALP became the major party.

During this entire period the Left had a felt presence in El Barrio. There were frequent street meetings and demonstrations. One study published in 1938 noted that political "parades and demonstrations . . .

have become almost a part of the life of the colony." Many left-wing organizations had headquarters in El Barrio—ALP clubs, organizations advocating independence for Puerto Rico, Workers Alliance headquarters, a CP club, and as many as six Spanish-speaking lodges of the International Workers Order. Jesus Colón, the leader of the Spanish-language section of the International Workers Order, as a youth had migrated from Puerto Rico to New York City, where he became a CP leader and journalist. The relative weakness of the Catholic Church and other potential competing organizations gave even greater prominence to the leftist organizations. Their work was amplified by the widespread circulation of leftist Spanish-language press: a daily, La Voz (The Voice), from 1937 to 1939; Los Pueblos Hispánicos (Hispanic Peoples), a weekly founded in 1944; and a succeeding weekly, Liberación, which emblazoned on its masthead "Por la libertad de España, Puerto Rico, y demás países oprimidos"—"For the liberty of Spain, Puerto Rico, and other oppressed nations."

The Puerto Rican community was composed of recent immigrants who maintained an unprecedented closeness to the land of their birth. This was largely a byproduct of their holding American citizenship, which allowed for travel unimpeded by legal constraints. The influence of island politics predisposed many of these immigrants to leftist parties. The Socialist Party had gained great prominence in Puerto Rico. Although it drifted far to the right, it popularized trade unionism and in some general form class politics. In the late thirties, the rise of the Left populist People's Democratic Party—with its slogan "Bread, Land, Freedom"—had great impact on the Puerto Rican community. Furthermore, the Nationalist Party's weakness in numbers masked its great influence.

Because the United States was the ruling country, Puerto Rican nationalism has been inextricably tied to left-wing currents. In support of a nationalist uprising on the island an attempt was made on President Truman's life on 1 November 1950 by Nationalist Party members Griselio Torresola (who died of gunshot wounds) and Oscar Collazo. On 2 March 1954, Lolita Lebrón, Rafael Cancel Miranda, Andrés Figueroa Cordero, and Irving Flores Rodríguez unfurled the flag of Puerto Rico, shouted "Que viva Puerto Rico Libre" and fired into the chamber of the House of Representatives. The four Nationalists had bought one-way tickets to Washington, D.C. At their trial Lebrón explained: "I came to die not to kill." These Nationalist actions became justifications for intensified police surveillance of progressive political activity of all kinds within the Puerto Rican community. Later campaigns to free these imprisoned Nationalists contributed to reassembling a Left contingent among Puerto Ricans.

The reappearance of the Puerto Rican Left, however, emerged from an unexpected quarter. In 1967 a Puerto Rican street gang in Chicago under the leadership of José "Cha Cha" Jiménez became politicized. Closely modeling itself after the Black Panthers, the Young Lords started a breakfast program for schoolchildren. The following year it occupied a church where first a day-care center then later a health clinic were founded. Highly visible direct-action tactics gave the Young Lords much publicity and inspired the organization of other chapters.

The New York City Young Lords, which grew out of a radical study group, La Sociedad Albizu Campos, followed closely the pattern of the Chicago group. Perhaps because of the highly educated nature of the New York leadership, however, differences increased between the Chicago and New York City organizations. In 1970 the New York City group officially constituted themselves as the Young Lords Party. The Young Lords were for the most part not born on the island. Many spoke English as their first language and reflected the increasingly non-island-born contingent of the Puerto Rican population, which had grown by 1970 to forty-three percent. The Young Lords' generalized radical philosophy—Maoist in style, pro-Cuban, but not openly hostile to the Soviet Union—met with widespread response among the second-generation Puerto Ricans. The ghetto poor responded to the Young Lords—many of whom were high school and college students—when they marched through their communities chanting "Despierta, Boriqua, Defiende Lo Tuyo" (Arise, Boriqua, Defend What Is Yours). By 1972, the Young Lords Party had changed its name to the Organization of Puerto Rican Revolutionary Workers and had become openly Maoist. It soon exhausted itself in competition with the socialist El Comité and other leftist groups for hegemony among radicalized student and community sectors of the Puerto Rican people.

The formation of the Pro-Independence Movement in 1959 met with a relatively weak response. Its successor, the Puerto Rican Socialist Party (PSP), founded in 1971, for some time united significant numbers of island and mainland Puerto Ricans in the same organization. Although largely composed of intellectuals, the PSP had a base in Puerto Rico's trade union movement. Significantly, it produced Claridad (Clarity), a weekly paper whose excellence, especially in cultural areas, has given it a wide and lasting audience. However, the PSP's insistence that Puerto Ricans both in the United States and in Puerto Rico were part of the same nation put it at odds with the rest of the Left, which recognized Puerto Rico as a nation and the Puerto Ricans in the United States as an oppressed national minority. By the end of the decade, however, difficulties of creating a political agenda encompassing the needs of both sectors of the Puerto Rican people precipitated a decline in the PSP.

All elements of the Puerto Rican Left combined to defend a threatened closure of Hostos Community College during the New York City financial crisis of 1975–1976. Founded in 1968 as the bilingual unit of City University and located in the South Bronx, Hostos had become of enormous symbolic significance to Puerto Ricans and the wider Latino community. The college was named after Eugenio María de Hostos (1839–1903), a famed Puerto Rican educator, writer, and independentista. The threat of closure generated committees to save Hostos that launched traditional and direct-action campaigns to keep the school open. These efforts culminated in an occupation of Hostos and a march of thousands from El Barrio to the headquarters of the city's Financial Control Board. The board rescinded its motion of closure and since that time has faced constant community pressure to improve facilities and services at Hostos.

Puerto Rican immigration has been overwhelmingly of rural and urban working people with few representatives of the owning or intellectual elites. Puerto Ricans remain the poorest of all Latino groups and have an average annual income less than half that of non-Latino groups. Puerto Ricans also suffer from an unemployment rate double that of white America and have the lowest rate of home ownership of any ethnic group. In the late 1990s almost a third of all Puerto Ricans were below federal poverty standards. The community remained politically divided between those who wish to retain the present commonwealth relationship and advocates of either statehood or independence. Uniting all sectors in the late 1980s, however, was opposition to the growing movement to make English the official language of the United States, an effort Puerto Ricans interpreted as an insult and threat to their indigenous culture.

The 1990s saw the emergence of left-wing Puerto Ricans to prominence in local literary, media, and labor circles. Despite its name, the Nuyorican Poet's Cafe on New York's Lower East Side became one of the city's premier literary performance venues, featuring writers of every ethnic background. A number of former leading members of the Young Lords Party became prominent commentators on the local affiliates of national television networks and wrote for major newspapers such as the Daily News. On the national level Ray Suarez hosted a provocative current events program on National Public Radio. Perhaps the most significant Puerto Rican impact was in labor. Most important of the new leaders was socialist Dennis Rivera, president of Local 1199, newly recognized as an independent entity in the mid-1990s by both the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations and the New York Central Labor Council. Under Rivera's leadership, Local 1199 recouped its radical heritage with an ambitious program of mass education, organizing, and electoral action.

[See also American Labor Party; International Workers Order; Local 1199, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union; Marcantonio, Vito; Young Lords Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Meyer, Gerald. Vito Marcantonio: Radical Politician. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.
- Moore, Joan, and Harry Pachon. Hispanics in the United States. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1985.
- Vega, Bernardo. Memorias de Bernardo Vega: Contribución a la historia de la comunidad puertorriqueña en Nueva York. Río Piedras, P.R.: Ediciones Huracán, 1977.

—GERALD MEYER

PULLMAN STRIKE. See Debs, Eugene V.

QUILL, MIKE (1905–1966). One of the most colorful personalities in twentieth-century American labor history, Michael J. Quill was chief organizer and longtime president (1936–1966) of the Transport Workers Union of America. Born into an ardently nationalist family in the west of Ireland, Quill emerged from the war of independence with England and the subsequent civil war (Quill fought with Irish Republican Army [IRA] forces against the partition of Ireland) with a fine war record. This made him persona non grata in the Irish Free State but very welcome in nationalist circles in New York, where he immigrated in 1926. Quill joined the Clan na Gael, the American affiliate of the IRA, and after a series of odd jobs went to work in the New York subways in 1926. The New York transit workers, at the time, were more than seventy percent foreign (mostly Irish) born.

When Irish socialist James Gralton was deported from Ireland to the United States in 1933, Quill resumed work begun the year before organizing Irish Workers Clubs in New York. He was among the Clan na Gael subway workers whom Gralton tutored in socialism and the writings of James Connolly, Ireland's premier socialist theoretician. Connolly's critique of the 1907 Yonkers, New York, trolleyman's strike, in particular, became a blueprint for the embryonic Transport Workers Union.

A nucleus of Clan na Gael members began actively organizing subway workers in 1934, at the same time the Communist Party of the United States (CP) was attempting independently to organize New York transit workers. After being refused support for their organizing drive by the major Irish American fraternal organizations—even though Quill was a well-known figure in New York Irish circles, as a popular emcee for Irish ceili dances—Quill and his Clan na Gael colleagues sought help from the CP. The Party provided salaries, organizers, legal support, an editor, and the wherewithal to start a union newspaper.

The twelve- to fourteen-hour split shifts, meanwhile, and the seven-day work week required of transit workers, provided New York subway workers ample incentive to join the union. Imposing IRA discipline on union organizers, Quill outflanked the employers' elaborate industrial espionage network. (It was estimated at the time that every fifth employee earned an extra dollar a week by reporting back to the company office on coworkers' activities.)

In 1937 and 1938, union-recognition elections were won decisively by the TWU, which affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). Quill, meantime, had become a New York celebrity. He was elected to the city council, representing the Bronx, in 1937 (and reelected in 1943 and 1945). He made regular broadcasts from the city-owned radio station, WNYC. The newspapers baited him as "Red Mike," while finding him eminently quotable. (An affectionately sarcastic spoof of Quill's career, "The Shamrock and the Sickle," was the main event at the annual New York City Press Club Dinner in 1946.)

In 1948 Quill, who may or may not have ever officially been a member of the CP, broke with Party policy irrevocably over two issues. He insisted on supporting (in accord with CIO policy) Truman, rather than Wallace, for president in 1948, and he refused to oppose a proposed nickel increase in the subway fare (which was slotted to fund, among other things, a healthy increase in transit workers' wages).

Quill's top officials in the union were privately divided over the wisdom of the CP position on these issues, but publicly condemned Quill, who retaliated by deposing them from office. For several years Quill engaged in red-baiting, and then quietly readmitted to the TWU a number of the Communists he had expelled, who had been instrumental in founding the union.

In 1966, after engaging in decades of ritual, much-publicized battles with respective New York City mayors as contract negotiations came down to the wire—always settling at the last minute without a strike—Quill led New York's transit workers out on strike. The strike began fifteen minutes into Mayor John Lindsay's new administration, lasted thirteen days, and won a fifteen-percent pay increase. Quill, characteristically, fed the press corps a barrage of quotable quotes, capped by his memorable: "May the Judge drop dead in his black robes." Jailed in the course of the strike, Quill, who had been ailing, collapsed in his jail cell and was dramatically rushed to the hospital. He died three weeks later.

[See also American Labor Party; Communist Party, USA; Irish Americans.]

FURTHER READING

Cronin, Sean. "James Connolly and the Transport Workers Union of America: The Ideological Links with Mike Quill and His Associates." Dublin: Labour History Workshop, 1983.

Freeman, Joshua. In Transit: The Transport Workers Union in New York City, 1933-1966. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Quill, Shirley. Mike Quill, Himself. Greenwich, Conn.: Devin Adair, 1985.

Transport Workers Union of America. Moving Ahead: The TWU at Fifty. New York: TWU, 1984.

Whittemore, L. H. The Man Who Ran the Subways. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1968.

—JOE DOYLE

QUIN, MIKE (1906-1947). In his fourteen-year career as a labor journalist, magazine writer, novelist, radio commentator, and pamphleteer, Mike Quin endeared himself to Communist Party members and sympathizers through his witty commentary and incisive analysis. Averaging more than a million words a year, Quin's numerous poems, short stories, and reportage appeared in the Partisan, New Masses, Western Worker, People's World, and Daily Worker.

Born Paul William Ryan, Quin was the son of an Irish American salesman and a seamstress. Quitting school at age fifteen, he worked a series of odd jobs in San Francisco until going to sea at age nineteen. As a merchant seaman, Quin was apparently introduced to Marxism. He left the merchant marine in 1929 and affiliated with the Hollywood John Reed Club. He joined the Communist Party in 1933 and became a member of the editorial board of the Partisan, using the pseudonym Michael Quin. His first Party publication was And We Are Millions. Quin returned to San Francisco in the early 1930s and joined the staff of the Western Worker. There he aligned himself with the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, writing for its newspaper, the Dispatcher.

In 1938, Quin became public relations director for the California Congress of Industrial Organizations and in 1941 became its wartime "Reporter on the Air," writing the radio program Facts to Fight Fascism. In this same year, he gained national attention for his pamphlet The Yanks Are Not Coming, for which influential gossip columnist Walter Winchell marked him "the most dangerous man in America."

In the last years of his life, Quin wrote three detective novels under the name Robert Finnegan. In 1947 he was diagnosed as having cancer and died on 14 August. A memorial service, presided over by Harry Bridges, attracted more than five hundred mourners for San Francisco's "beloved rebel."

FURTHER READING

Quin, Mike. On the Drumhead: A Selection from the Writing of Mike Quin; A Memorial Volume. Edited with an introduction by Harry Carlisle. San Francisco: Pacific Publishing Foundation, 1948.

Watson, Morris. "Beloved Rebel." Dispatcher, 22 August 1947.

—DOLLY E. RAUH

RADICAL ABOLITIONISTS. Seeking to transform one of the structural bases of U.S. society, to abolish a form of property encoded in the Constitution, and to overthrow the ruling class of the South, whose political and economic power locally and on the national level rested on the ownership of human beings, radical abolitionists differed from those abolitionists who believed that ending slavery could be accomplished without changing the basic character of American society. Three characteristics of the radicals were "immediatism," the belief in the equality of the races, and the assumption that the abolition of slavery would open the doors to further social transformation. Radical abolitionists also created a language of social protests grounded in the relationship between personal commitment and social criticism that would resonate through much of succeeding American radicalism.

Many abolitionists came to antislavery from the experience of Second Great Awakening evangelical Protestantism. This religious culture emphasized the personal responsibility of each individual to reject sin. Thus, slavery survived not only due to the power of the slaveowners but also to the moral complicity of all. The demand that individuals and political entities separate themselves from the slave system was a call for political change and personal redemption. This kind of connection between the personal and the political entered the American radical tradition through abolitionism and would be a dynamic element of such post-World War II movements as the civil rights struggles of the King era and the revived feminist movement of the 1970s.

Radical abolitionism was most closely associated with the career of William Lloyd Garrison, founder and editor of the Liberator. Prior to the launching of the Liberator in 1838, most white abolitionists believed that slavery should be ended slowly through gradual manumission with colonization or returning of slaves to Africa or the West Indies. Garrison, who had been a journalist on the procolonization newspaper the Genius of Universal Emancipation, came to believe that nothing less than the immediate end of slavery was acceptable. Abolitionist belief in full political and social equality was expressed in the interracialism of private life among abolitionists as well as their common political activities.

While immediatist abolitionists knew that the struggle to abolish slavery might take a long time despite its urgent necessity, they believed that accepting anything less represented a basic compromise on the ideal of racial equality. Divisions among the radical abolitionists arose primarily between those like John Brown, who advocated slave insurrections and those who thought pacifist means were essential for what was a moral crusade. All of the immediatists believed that the freed slaves must become full citizens of the Republic. Consequently, radical abolitionism was especially attractive to African American militants. Black radicals, in turn, need to be distinguished from proponents of slave insurrection, as they were committed to the effort to create the conditions for the ending of slavery by legislative and moral means. Like Garrison, Douglass, for one, did not endorse John Brown's tactics.

Relations between immediatists and African American militants as such were often tainted by paternalism. Nonetheless, African Americans were staunch supporters of the Liberator. Boston's black community provided Garrison with an armed guard to protect him from assault by antiabolitionists. It also supported the work of the Underground Railroad, later led the fight for the creation of black military units during the Civil War, demanded that black soldiers receive the same pay as other soldiers, and after the war supported full voting rights and radical reconstruction of the South.

The struggle to abolish slavery became a framework that led to critiques of other forms of injustice. Concerns such as women's rights, peace, penal reform, and temperance were seen by radical abolitionists as related to the moral struggle against slavery. Given the leading role played by many women in the struggle, women's rights was a natural attraction. Indeed, the formal founding of the women's rights movement at the Seneca Falls Convention of 1848 came directly out of the antislavery movement, particularly in relation to the issue of the role women should play in antislavery agitation. Sarah and Angelina Grimké, Theodore Dwight Weld, Sojourner Truth, Frederick Douglass, Wendell Phillips, as well as Garrison himself were strong advocates of women's rights.

The issue of economic inequality, which was to animate much of the post-Civil War movement, was neglected by most abolitionists. Nonetheless, there was significant support for abolitionism among German American immigrants filled with the idealism of the failed democratic revolution in their homeland and among Yankee shoemakers in Lynn, Massachusetts, who were already charting a course of labor reform. Wendell Phillips and other abolitionists moved into labor struggles after the Civil War. The call for an end to wage slavery had considerable rhetorical bite.

[See also Reconstruction; Thoreau, Henry David; Ward, Cyrenus Osborne.]

FURTHER READING

- Duberman, Martin. Anti-Slavery Vanguard. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1965.
- Hinton, Richard J. John Brown and His Men (1894). New York: Arno Press, 1968.
- Kraditor, Aileen S. Means and Ends in American Abolitionism. New York: Pantheon, 1969.
- Lerner, Gerda. The Grimké Sisters of South Carolina. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1967.
- Perry, Lewis. Radical Abolitionism: Anarchy and the Government of God in Anti-Slavery Thought. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1973.
- Platt, Benjamin. Theodore Weld. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1950.
- Quarles, Benjamin. Black Abolitionists. New York: Oxford University Press, 1969.
- Walters, Ronald. The Anti-Slavery Appeal. New York: W.W. Norton, 1978.

—PAUL MISHLER

RADICAL AMERICA. See American Studies.

RADICAL ECONOMICS. When Paul Baran, author of The Political Economy of Growth (1957) and professor of economics at Stanford University, died of a heart attack in the spring of 1964, he was virtually the only U.S. Marxist economist in the post-Mc-Carthy academy. As one friend of Baran's wrote at the time, "Paul Baran's death . . . almost completely closes the door of the professed open society whose establishment apparently cannot find it possible to tolerate in academia or elsewhere any other acknowledged Marxist theoretician."

Just four years after Baran's death, a group of radical economists, many of whom were graduate students at the time, met following the Democratic convention of 1968 and formed the Union for Radical Political Economics (URPE). By the next year the group was distributing to its national membership the Review of Radical Political Economics, a journal dedicated to "the development of radical political economic analysis of society and assist[ing] individuals and groups working for radical change in American Society." In the wake of the Vietnam War, the civil rights movement, and later the second wave of feminism and the collapse of the postwar boom, the membership of URPE grew to fifteen hundred, and retained more than a thousand members in the 1980s to become both the oldest and largest disciplinary group of leftists in the academy.

The first task that radical economists set for themselves was to define their relationship to the neo-classical economic paradigm they had rejected. They challenged the neoclassical contention that capitalism is "the best of all possible worlds" and attempted to articulate a socialist alternative. The radical paradigm, based loosely on a class analysis and Marx's method of historical materialism, identified capitalism as a fundamentally irrational system at the root of a wide array of social ills that ranged from inequality and alienation to racism, sexism, and imperialism. The difference between the two paradigms was immediately recognizable, and the work of radical economists was systematically excluded from the leading journals of the economics profession. This exclusion united Left economists who found it increasingly difficult to "pass" as traditional.

The second task for radical economists was to determine their relationship to traditional Marxism. Reading groups on Capital acquainted radical economists with traditional Marxism and European Marxist traditions, and the Monthly Review, then edited by Paul Sweezy and Leo Huberman, acquainted them with American Marxism outside the academy.

By the mid-1970s, radical political economy had produced a vast and sprawling literature that addressed a variety of topics that included, among others: (1) theories of economic segmentation and poverty, (2) studies of the labor process, (3) economic crisis theory, (4) inquiries into imperialism and dependency, (5) studies of patriarchy and gender and capitalism, (6) contributions to the theory of state, and (7) an investigation of the elements of the method of Marxism and the labor theory of value.

With onset of stagflation in the mid-1970s and "the end of prosperity," radical economists turned to investigating the cause of the "economic crisis." URPE published four "crisis readers" between 1975 and 1987. These readers offered no uniform perspective on the crisis but rather a variety of articles describing the dimensions and causes of the crisis.

More formal inquiries into economic crises dropped their theoretical anchor in either the reworking of Marx's labor theory of value developed by the Monthly Review school in the 1950s and 1960s or more directly in the labor theory of value and Marx's Capital. Monopoly Capital (1966), by Paul Baran and Paul Sweezy, provided the basis of the Monthly Review perspective that identified a tendency toward stagnation brought about by monopoly pricing and a lack of demand as the chief law of motion of the postwar U.S. economy. In the 1970s and 1980s Sweezy and Harry Magdoff added a detailed analysis of the mechanisms that monopoly capitalism had at its disposal to attempt to counteract stagnation: wasteful state spending, militarism, and an explosion of corporate, consumer, and government debt.

The competing analysis of "late capitalism" relied more formally on the labor theory of value and located the cause of the crisis not in a lack of demand but in an endangered profitability at the point of production brought about by a lack of "surplus value" and rising capital costs (or the supply side of the economy). For these thinkers, the laws of motion of capitalism described a dynamic but unstable system. These more orthodox theorists argued that Keynesian demand-management policies and state action might temporarily arrest this pattern, but were unable to alter the fundamental character of the crisis of a falling rate of profit.

While the economic crisis debate remained unresolved in the 1980s, other radical economists turned to "rethinking Marxism" and questioning the usefulness of the labor theory of value. Some published obituaries of this theory, labeling it an "embarrassment." Some, inspired by the work of Althusser and Poulantzas, challenged on a more basic level the methodology of Marxism. They argued for a "non-essentialist," or nondeterminist, examination of the structural aspects of capitalism and for a careful delineation of class and nonclass phenomena. Still others applied the mathematical techniques of traditional economics to develop an analytical Marxism that revolves around a reworking of the concept of exploitation divorced from the labor theory of value.

At the same time, North American (and European) Marxist economists launched a study of the social regulation of the capitalist economy. In the United States, these writers identified the social structures of accumulation that supported the "long wave" of expansion called the postwar boom and described the breakdown of those structures in the 1970s and 1980s.

Another group of radical economists, undeterred by these criticisms, devoted their time to compiling a body of empirical work based on Marxian theoretical categories and continued to investigate the cause of economic crises.

U.S. attempts to develop a Marxist theory of the state met with mixed success. Radical economists, however, were able to categorize theories of the state (as either instrumentalist, structuralist, or Hegelian) and to distinguish the legitimization and accumulation effects of state policies. In the 1980s this literature documented the class-war budgets of the Reagan administration and its attack on the welfare state.

More successful was the extension of Marxist perspectives into both the study of the labor process and the segmentation of the labor market. The former was initiated with the question "What do bosses do?" and ultimately produced a direct application of Marx's own theory of the labor process to the degradation of work in the twentieth century, perhaps best encapsulated in Harry Braverman's Labor and Monopoly Capital (1974). Later Richard Edwards's Contested Terrain linked the labor process to economic segmentation. Earlier literature had shown how the labor market enforced inequality based on class, racial, and gender differences through a dual labor market that dispensed more privileged jobs through a dominant primary sector and a subordinate secondary sector that handed out poorly paid jobs that offered irregular employment with little chance of advancement.

The same debates that revolved around Marxist crisis theory found their way into literature on imperialism and dependency. This literature forced the recognition of capitalism as a system of accumulation on a world scale and the understanding that the development of the center had produced the underdevelopment of the periphery. At the same time, however, it spawned a series of debates around the nature of the unequal exchange between the center and periphery, the legitimacy of dependency theory, and the nature of Third World social formations.

Perhaps the most profound influence on radical economics and the most serious challenge to the class analytics of Marxist theory came from the study of patriarchy and gender. Initially derived, in part, from Engels's The Origins of the Family, Private Property, and the State, this literature examined both the origins of the oppression of women and the likely course of their liberation. Other early writings attempted to fit the study of the role of women in domestic labor and the reproduction of labor power into the traditional Marxist categories. But the initial uniting of Marxism and feminism produced what Heidi Hartmann and Amy Bridges aptly labeled an "unhappy marriage." Focusing on the family as the locus of gender and class, this new socialist-feminist literature studied not only women's role in the reproduction of capitalism and socialism but also women in the labor market, women's role in the process of Third World development, minority women, and women and socialism. The analysis of gender forced Marxists to broaden their focus on the production of commodities to include also the reproduction of capitalist relations through the family in the private sphere and to regard gender oppression with a centrality that rivaled that of class exploitation.

At the same time that the discipline of political economy was being formalized and rendered academic, radical economists developed a popular political economy dedicated to serving radical movements. The first and perhaps most successful attempt to make this connection was Dollars and Sense magazine, which offered "interpretations of current economic events from a socialist perspective." Established in 1973, the magazine gained a readership that grew to about eight thousand by the late 1980s. Later in the 1970s, another group of radical economists formed the Center for Popular Economics, which brought labor activists and other progressives together over the summer for courses in political economy.

[See also Baran, Paul; Monthly Review.]

FURTHER READING

Attewell, Paul. Radical Political Economy since the Sixties: A Sociology of Knowledge. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1984.

Gintis, Herbert. "The Reemergence of Marxian Economics in America." In The Left Academy: Marxist Scholarship on American Campuses, edited by Bertell Ollman and Edward Vernoff. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1982.

Raffish, Rebecca T., and Don L. Ducks. "Red Ink: The First Ten Years of Dollars and Sense." Dollars and Sense (November 1984).

Resnick, Stephen, and Richard Wolff. Rethinking Marxism: Essays for Harry Magdoff and Paul Sweezy. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Autonomedia, 1985.

Sweezy, Paul, and Leo Huberman. "Paul Baran (1910–1964): A Collective Portrait." Monthly Review 16, no. 11 (March 1965).

—JOHN A. MILLER

RADICAL ENVIRONMENTALISM. A direct descendant of the older conservation movement, contemporary environmentalism became conscious of itself as traditional conservationist goals were redefined and expanded in the course of large-scale public-health and workplace-safety struggles in the early 1960s. A specifically left-wing environmentalism—generally known as radical environmentalism or the "ecology movement," influenced by the late sixties New Left, counterculture, and radical American Indian and women's liberation movements—came into prominence in the mid-1970s and early in the next decade was recognized as an important force in the movement.

Emblem of the Earth First! movement, 1980s.

Conservationism could count an impressive number of poets, artists, and philosophers among its ancestors—including Henry David Thoreau, George Perkins Marsh, and painters John James Audubon, Thomas Cole, and George Catlin—but its beginnings as an organized movement can be credited above all to the indefatigable efforts of the “Yosemite Prophet,” John Muir (1838–1914). Born in Scotland, Muir grew up in rural Wisconsin and lived most of his later life in California, much of it in the mountains. A highly original thinker as well as one of America’s most inspired and popular writers on nature—his books include A Thousand Mile Walk to the Gulf, Travels in Alaska, and The Mountains of California—he led the successful struggle to protect the Yosemite Valley against mining, lumbering, and other exploitation by having it officially declared a national park in 1889. Three years later he helped cofound the Sierra Club and was elected its first president, an office he held for the rest of his life.

Though influenced to some extent by the esthetic socialism of John Ruskin and the single-tax theories of Henry George, Muir’s writings elaborated an indictment of industrial civilization that was almost wholly his own, based on his prolonged and profound experience of the American wilderness. Many of his most revolutionary pronouncements appeared in his journals and remained unpublished until long after his death—those, for example, touching on his rejection of Christianity (because of its supercilious disdain for nature), his militant antianthropocentrism, and his scorn for capitalism, which he called “the gobble-gobble school of economics”—but these fugitive jottings show that Muir was far more radical than the conservation movement he did so much to found. Not too surprisingly, these uncompromising private musings proved to be a powerful inspiration to later radical wilderness activists, especially since the mid-1970s.

In Muir’s view, the human experience of the natural beauty of wilderness was the decisive key to solving the ills of society; he regarded mountains and forests as sacred places of freedom, where alone people could learn not only the truths of nature writ large, but also the truth of their own nature, so suppressed and disfigured by the artifices of an acquisitive, exploitative civilization. “Pollution, defilement, squalor,” he wrote, “are words that never would have been created had man lived conformably to Nature.” The “hope of the world,” he was sure, lies in “the great, fresh, unblighted, unredeemed wilderness [where] the galling harness of civilization drops off, and the wounds heal ere we are aware.”

The “Muir tradition” of radical conservation—maintained through the years by small bands of devoted amateurs, ardent with the love of wildlife and wilderness for their own sake, independent of human use—contrasts starkly with the conservative, professionalized, much larger and better known wing of the movement, typified by Gifford Pinchot, founder of the U.S. Forest Service and associate of Theodore Roosevelt. Pinchot’s concern was not the wonders of nature but the scientific “management of resources.” For him, a forest was “a manufacturing plant for the production of wood.” The goal of conservation, as he conceived it, was not to save wildlife or wilderness, as such, but rather to save these crops, or commodities—that is precisely how he saw them—for future exploitation. While Muir boldly challenged anthropocentrism and affirmed the equality of species (he championed especially those animals most feared and hated by modern society, such as wolves and grizzly bears), Pinchot upheld the Western world’s traditional notion that man is the “lord of creation” ordained by God to exercise stewardship over the planet and the creatures God made for his use. The task of conservationists, Pinchot argued, was to limit destructive excesses committed by overly rapacious, unscientific industrialists.

The glaring disparity between the two wings of the movement was not perceived by the broad public, and adherents of Muir and Pinchot were able to work together on many issues. The fact that both wings consisted almost entirely of white native-born Anglo-Saxon Protestant males made the movement as a whole vulnerable to the charge of “elitism” frequently leveled at it by opponents on the Right as well as the Left. In John Muir’s last great and unsuccessful crusade, to prevent the damming of California’s beautiful Hetch Hetchy Valley, Pinchot took an emphatically pro-dam stand, but even the minor concessions he was willing to make to the Muir forces were too much for Texas congressman Martin Dies, who denounced Pinchot as a “radical.” (In the 1930s and 1940s, Dies would head a congressional committee notorious for its persecution of socialists and pro-labor radicals.) Notwithstanding Pinchot’s demagogic, populist-tinged motto, The Greatest Good for the Greatest Number, his overall view reflected a conservative eastern mugwump Republicanism. After the collapse of the short-lived "Bull Moose" party, Pinchot's closeness to Theodore Roosevelt—who himself, as president, enjoyed a largely undeserved reputation as a champion of conservation—bound the movement to the Republican Party to such an extent that it was not until the New Deal that the Democrats attracted any conservationist following.

Prior to the 1930s, a number of Left writers had attempted to develop a specifically socialist conservationism, or at least a socialist approach to the questions conservationism raised. As early as the 1890s Edward Bellamy, especially in his weekly, the New Nation, and in his last book, Equality (1897), laid bare the links between the triple exploitation of nature, women, and labor, positing a socialist utopia in which humankind and nature were no longer at odds, and in which the massive restoration of wilderness was a central element. Ernest Thompson Seton, Bellamy-influenced socialist author of best-selling natural-history books for children; "single-taxer" and outdoorsman Dan Beard; Chicago socialist muckraker William Kent, an abolitionist's son and associate of Jane Addams's Hull House; and anarchist novelist, J. William Lloyd—to cite four very different figures, widely separated by ideology and temperament—also gave voice to a radical dimension in the conservationist cause, a voice heeded by many in the pre-World War I years, which witnessed the rise of a widespread "back to the land" movement.

The Marxist wing of the socialist movement in those years gave scant attention to this whole question, inhibited as its protagonists were by well-established social-democratic traditions supporting increased productivity and technological progress at all costs. But there were some notable exceptions. Articles urging forest preservation and other conservationist subjects could be found in the popular socialist monthly Wilshire's and elsewhere in the Socialist Party press. Even more significant, International Socialist Review editor Algie M. Simons translated a treatise of radical ecology, Germes of Mind in Plants, by Austrian biologist Raoul Francé, illustrated by Ralph Chaplin—who, a few years later, would be a leading poet-artist-editor of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW)—and published in 1905 by Charles H. Kerr's socialist cooperative in Chicago. This book, which has gone through numerous printings and has remained in print ever since, included a militant preface in which Simons avowed that it was because he was "both a socialist and a nature lover" that he translated it. Kerr also published The Universal Kinship and other works by socialist and vegetarian J. Howard Moore, whose conception of "earth-life as a single process . . . every part related and akin to every other part" and whose recognition that "all beings are ends [and] no creatures are means" made him an important precursor of the environmental ethics of the 1990s.

Conservation issues, however, remained tangential to the broad socialist movement, and not until the 1970s did such concerns figure significantly in any Left party platform. Ironically, the mainstream Marxists—the Socialist Labor Party, Socialist Party, Communist Party, and Trotskyists—notwithstanding their voluble opposition to business-union bureaucrats and "robber barons," shared the latter's reified view of wildlife and wilderness to an astonishing degree. It was among the heterodox and libertarian Left, the anarchist movement, and above all the IWW that elements of a radical conservationism developed most freely in earlier years.

The Wobblies, in fact, often exceeded the limits of conservationism as such and took up the whole gamut of questions later subsumed under the heading "radical environmentalism." The IWW press featured articles protesting the devastation of forests by the lumber industry—"strong conservational action" was demanded by IWW Lumber Workers' Industrial Union 120—but also provided its readers with information on the problem of noise in American cities, on the use of poisons in manufacture (in hatmaking, for example), and other texts on capitalism's destruction and pollution of the planet.

The IWW in its heyday was largely a union of the foreign-born, which may help explain its environmentalist tendency. While upper-class conservationists not infrequently blamed recent immigrants for "ruining" the American landscape, evidence suggests that the adoration of "Mother Nature" expressed, for example, by Italian immigrant anarchist martyr Nicola Sacco in his prison letters, reflected an attitude by no means uncommon among foreign-born radicals. Indeed, immigrant radicals, whose regular activities included picnics in the country and long hikes in the woods, tended to be much more conservation-conscious than their native-born comrades.

However tenuous the links between the socialist and conservation movements, the fact remains that they rose to prominence together during the 1910s and faded together in the 1920s. Significantly, the next major resurgence of militancy within the conservation movement itself—the formation of the Wilderness Society in 1935—was spearheaded by two longtime socialists: Benton MacKaye and Robert Marshall.

MacKaye (1880–1975) was a Connecticut Yankee, the son of actor/playwright Steele MacKaye (who had been a friend of Thoreau's), and a classmate of John Reed's at Harvard, where he went on to teach forestry for a few years before going to work for the U.S. Forest Service. An associate of Oscar Ameringer, "the Mark Twain of American Socialism," MacKaye joined the Socialist Party in the heyday of Eugene Debs.

The much younger Bob Marshall (1901–1939), of New York, joined the much smaller Socialist Party of Norman Thomas, but was even more outspokenly radical than MacKaye, and considered himself a Marxist. Son of a founder/leader of the American Jewish Committee, Marshall, who had a Ph.D. from Johns Hopkins, was one of the first non-WASPs prominent in conservation. Passionately attracted since childhood to "blank places on the map," he was a zealous mountain-climber and an eloquent defender of everything wild against the ravages of capitalist "development." Finding the United States to be "a civilization remote from nature, artificial, dominated by the exploitation of man by man," he affirmed the essential unity of working-class socialism—"production for use and not for profit"—and "the freedom of the wilderness." His best-selling Arctic Village (1933) recounted a year's sojourn in a small community in the mountains of Alaska, two hundred miles north of Fairbanks, where he found "the most complete liberty one can imagine" and "the happiest folk I had ever encountered." In The People's Forests, the first major work of socialist conservationism in the United States, also published in 1933, he called for the socialization of wilderness to assure its protection from the insatiable greed of private industry.

MacKaye and Marshall were two of the four men who conceived the Wilderness Society, and it was they who drew up its "Platform," proclaiming that "the time has come, with the brutalizing pressure of a spreading metropolitan civilization, to recognize the wilderness environment as a serious human need rather than a luxury and a plaything." The first real fusion of socialism and the Muir tradition, the society immediately attracted the most radical-minded conservationists in the country, including Aldo Leopold, whose classic Sand County Almanac (1949) would become the most influential conservationist text since Muir. (Although he was generally regarded as "apolitical" by his friends and commentators, it is notable that Leopold voted for Norman Thomas throughout the 1930s and 1940s.) Deliberately restricting its membership to unequivocal supporters of wilderness for wilderness's sake—"We want no straddlers," Marshall insisted—the Wilderness Society, and its journal, the Living Wilderness, represented the most radical wing of the conservation movement well into the 1970s.

Meanwhile, the radical insurgency of the Depression years affected older conservation groups as well, including the group widely regarded as the oldest: the Audubon Association, which, though its history had in fact been discontinuous, liked to trace its origins back to an earlier New York-based Audubon Society formed in 1886. Feminist Rosalie Edge, a one-time suffragist who became the foremost woman in conservation, led a spirited revolt against the association's corrupt leadership, who had, among other things, rented the group's Louisiana bird sanctuary to hunters and trappers. Largely as a result of her prolonged efforts, assisted by civil libertarian Roger Baldwin, a member of the association's board of directors, the association was substantially reorganized in the mid-1930s. (In 1940 it changed its name to the National Audubon Society.)

President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal incorporated elements of conservation, provided jobs for conservationists, and did much to establish conservation as a respectable mainstream current. However, as with all movements for social betterment, conservation invariably declines during wartime, and the movement lapsed into quiescence in the first half of the 1940s. The 1945 publication of Lizzie Marsh Wolfe's Pulitzer Prize-winning biography of John Muir, Son of the Wilderness, which led to new editions and collections of Muir's own writings, inspired a notable revival, but not for another decade and a half would a conservation-oriented mass movement emerge, for the first time, in the United States. Rachel Carson's best-selling Silent Spring (1962), an exposé of the lethal dangers of pesticides, especially DDT, by a marine zoologist who had been one of the first women to hold an important position in the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, provoked enormous controversy in the mass media and prompted a vast number of related studies—on smog, asbestos poisoning, black-lung disease, cancer-producing substances in food, and so on. Never before had so broad a public been confronted by such urgent life-and-death questions of health in a specifically conservationist context. Out of the widespread agitation sparked by Carson's book, bolstered by the already large opposition to nuclear weapons-testing, the environmental movement was born.

From Upton Sinclair and Mary Marcy in the early 1900s to Linus Pauling and Barry Commoner half a century later, socialists had been leading spokespersons of public-health issues, but their efforts had not led to any broad-based ongoing organizations focused on such concerns. In the absence of such a grass-roots movement, the groundswell of popular protest aroused by Silent Spring found organizational expression in the existing conservation groups, which were willing to fill the breach. Of course these groups were themselves changed in the process: they grew larger, their outlook broadened and, at least for a time, they tended to become more action-oriented. By implementing the aggressive strategies of David Brower, for example, the Sierra Club, which, during most of its existence, was a narrowly West Coast mountaineering group with a membership of 2,000 or 3,000, became a major social force, national in scope, with a membership of well over 100,000 by 1970 and nearly a half-million in the next decade. Wilderness preservation remained its prime focus, but its perspectives were enlarged to include the entire environment, the whole planet; together with the popular wilderness photo-albums by Ansel Adams and Elliot Porter, Sierra Club books took up the problems of overpopulation, air pollution, and nuclear power.

Central to the transformation of old-time conservationism into contemporary environmentalism was the concept of ecology, the science of the interrelations of the various components of the natural world. The word had been coined by German biologist Ernst Haeckel in the 1860s, popularized (albeit in a restricted sociological sense) by Robert E. Park and the "Chicago School" of sociology in the 1920s, and used in its current sense by Aldo Leopold and Robert Marshall in the 1920s and 1930s, but did not enter everyday usage until the 1960s, when the emerging environmental movement made it one of its watchwords and even a battle cry.

The new movement's vociferous opposition to what its spokespersons called "corporate greed," and its strong links to the antinuclear and antiwar movements, gave the impression that environmentalism was solidly on the Left. But in fact the alliance between social radicals and environmentalists began uneasily, with considerable mistrust on both sides. Old and New Left ideologists frequently accused environmentalism of being a "bourgeois" fad to divert public attention from other, supposedly more fundamental issues; for many, this charge seemed to be confirmed by President Richard Nixon's adoption of environmentalist rhetoric and his administration's support of "Earth Day" in 1970, a one-shot day of nationwide environment-related events largely sponsored by Coca-Cola and other multinational corporations that in fact had long-standing anticonservationist policies. Many environmentalists in turn found the Left quarrelsome, sectarian, and indifferent to wildlife/wilderness concerns. Nonetheless, many radicals recognized the revolutionary implications of the ecological critique, and many more environmentalists perceived that the enemies of their movement and of the environment itself were the traditional enemies of the Left. In the larger milieu beyond groups and factions—in the widespread if short-lived "underground" press, for example, and the broad "counterculture"—the New Left and the new environmentalism mingled and to a great extent fused.

All through the 1970s, as professionalization and bureaucratization diluted much of the militancy and impact of the 1960s environmentalist upsurge and steered the movement's energies toward conventional electoral politics and lobbying, new and more radical revivals of the Muir tradition began to emerge. Pointing out that more wilderness was destroyed in the decade following the passage of the 1964 Wilderness Act than in the preceding five decades, and that most of the funds collected by the established environmental groups went to the advertising agencies that conducted their fund-raising drives, younger eco-radicals developed a new and specifically environmentalist activism that increasingly expressed itself in civil disobedience and direct action. Even before the end of the 1960s ecotage (i.e., sabotage of equipment or property owned by industrial destroyers/polluters of the environment) was recognized as a major problem by industry trade-journals; many tens of thousands of rural billboards were destroyed, for example, by "ecoteurs" who regarded such advertising as a hideous disfigurement of the landscape. For several years the daring exploits of a Chicago-area masked man known only as the Fox repeatedly made headlines nationwide, as when he invaded the executive headquarters of U.S. Steel and poured on the office rug buckets of the same dangerous chemical waste the corporation was dumping into Lake Michigan. Greenpeace, founded in 1971, attained worldwide renown almost overnight as a result of its bold, brave interventions in defense of whales, dolphins, seals, and other species endangered by commercial exploitation. Such dramatic actions fired the imaginations of a broad public and contributed mightily to the development of a new surge, and a new "style," of environmental radicalism from the mid-seventies on.

Activist first and foremost, the new radical environmentalism appreciably expanded and deepened conservationist theory. Muir, Thoreau, Bob Marshall, Aldo Leopold, and David Brower remained the brightest stars in the new movement's philosophical firmament, but the younger generation also found much to be learned in the works of a wide range of social critics not previously regarded from a conservationist perspective. Many loose ends of American radicalism—including strands of utopianism, anarchism, feminism, the IWW, and heterodox Marxism—have been picked up and developed by proponents of radical ecology. Ralph Borsodi's and Lewis Mumford's critiques of technology and urbanism, dating from the 1920s and 1930s, challenged the centralist assumptions of classical liberalism and Marxism, and stimulated a growing interest in decentralist solutions to social problems. This direction was also pursued, in his later years, by longtime socialist Scott Nearing, who linked his decentralist vision to vegetarianism and a new back-to-the-land movement, as well as by a former Trotskyist, Murray Bookchin, in several works relating ecology to anarchism, starting in the 1960s. Frederick Turner's Beyond Geography: The Western Spirit against the Wilderness, Roderick Nash's Wilderness and the American Mind, Gary Snyder's The Old Ways, Ursula Le Guin's ecotopian novel Always Coming Home, and the works of Paul Shepard, Peter Matthiessen, Bill Devall, and the Canadian Farley Mowat are only a few of the most influential contributions to radical environmentalist theory.

Perhaps the most representative of the new radical environmentalist groups, and certainly the purest contemporary expression of the Muir tradition, is the movement known as Earth First! (the exclamation point is an essential part of its name), whose motto is No Compromise in Defense of Mother Earth! Founded in the Southwest in 1980, by the end of the decade it had locals all over the United States as well as in many other countries, and had become by far the largest and most influential specifically radical environmentalist group in U.S. history. Not content with demanding the preservation of all existing wilderness, Earth First! calls for the vast re-creation of wilderness. Its avowedly extremist orientation and tactics—hammering spikes into trees, for example, as an "immunization against logging"—have sparked heated controversies in the environmental movement and broad Left. Like the old IWW that it has repeatedly acknowledged as its major "philosophical forbear," Earth First!'s decentralized ranks include an impressive number of poets, artists, cartoonists, songwriters, and musicians—its Li'l Green Song Book, like its ecotage manual, Ecodefense, has gone through many editions—and its direct actions tend to be guerrilla theater strongly marked by humor. Earth First! has also been influenced by Kropotkinian anarchism, by anarchist-inclined novelist Edward Abbey, whose ecotage novel The Monkey Wrench Gang (1976) provided the movement with much of its original style, and more recently by the theories of "Deep Ecology" advanced by Norwegian writer Arne Naess, author of studies on Spinoza and Gandhi.

Ideological diversity remains a hallmark not only of Earth First! but of the whole spectrum of radical environmentalism. New Left, IWW, anarchist, feminist, and even Marxist influences are discernible and, indeed, openly avowed, but so are the very different influences of Taoism, Zen Buddhism, and indigenous (so-called primitive) cultures, as well as a radical poets' countertradition extending from William Blake and Emily Brontë to Robinson Jeffers and Philip Lamantia. These latter influences have helped inspire radical ecology's deepening critique of the values and institutions of Western civilization, which in turn has been a growing influence on social radical thought in recent years, resulting in any number of ideological hybrids. Radical environmentalism today includes many distinct currents—it is a long way from the pragmatic Citizens' Clearing House for Hazardous Waste to Keith Lampe's visionary Green Hippie—and such tendencies as bioregionalism, ecofeminism, deep ecology, and antitechnological neoprimitivism, which only a decade ago appeared esoteric, now claim a substantial number of adherents. Notable, too, is the growing trend toward the involvement of organized labor in environmental struggles; the United Farm Workers union, for example, has been in the forefront of antipesticide agitation.

The continuing and, indeed, worsening problems of acid rain, pollution, the greenhouse effect, overpopulation, toxic waste disposal, nuclear power, rain-forest destruction, extinction of plant and animal species, and other calamities suffice to assure the vitality and growth of radical environmentalism in the coming years. Efforts to import the ideology and style of the European "Green" movement to American shores have thus far met with small success, but cross-pollination between radical ecology and the more traditional forms of American radicalism will doubtless continue, and it does not require a prophet to predict that ecological concerns will be central to the new New Left of the future.

[See also Animal Rights; Nature Friends of America; Peace Movements.]

FURTHER READING

- Devall, Bill. Simple in Means, Rich in Ends: Practicing Deep Ecology. Salt Lake City: Peregrine Smith, 1988.
- Foreman, Dave, and Bill Haywood, eds. Ecodefense: A Field Guide to Monkeywrenching. Tucson: Ned Ludd Books, 1987.
- Fox, Stephen. The American Conservation Movement: John Muir and His Legacy. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1986.
- "Radical Environmentalism." Special issue of Industrial Worker (May 1988).

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

RADICAL FILMMAKING, 1930s. One of the imperatives of the Communist movement as it began to address the problems of the 1930s was to create mass media that would faithfully render its views and experiences. The first major step in this direction was the formation of the Workers' Film and Photo League (FPL) on 11 December 1930. The FPL, an affiliate of the Communist-linked Workers International Relief, absorbed a number of media-oriented groups previously organized by the Communist Party (CP). Its primary agenda was to create motion pictures and still photographs that would advance the cause of the American working class. An adjunct to this mandate was the distribution of radical films made abroad and activities that carried out a radical critique of the Hollywood system.

A score of FPL personalities would remain at the core of radical filmmaking, distribution, and criticism for decades. Among them were Leo Seltzer, David Platt, Leo Hurwitz, and Tom Brandon. The FPL alumni have never been forthcoming about the relationship of their organization to the CP proper, but no one could have been involved with the FPL without realizing the CP was its guardian angel.

The focus of FPL film production was the creation of newsreels. Low production cost and the ability to convey a feeling of immediacy made newsreels an ideal tool for a movement entering its most dynamic decade. FPL members used hand-held cameras with great daring and often plunged into the midst of mass demonstrations to develop a visual style that was a kind of proletarian cinéma vérité. The most renowned cameraperson was Leo Seltzer, who had a canny way of infiltrating police lines and other adversaries to catch demonstrators approaching class enemies head-on. The work was so all-consuming that the FPL core had virtually no other social, political, or artistic life. Cadre like Seltzer often took up residence in FPL offices.

A point of pride with the FPL was that its newsreels were far more honest in presenting events than were those of its commercial rivals. One problem with this claim was that some scenes were staged for FPL cameras and some sequences appear in more than one film, so that a demonstration in city X may be shown as having occurred in city Y. Such "cheating" was mainly a matter of economics and in large measure the FPL did, in fact, capture the tenor of the Communist-led class movements of the era.

The FPL had some two dozen branches with a peak membership of nearly one hundred, but only the Detroit, Chicago, Los Angeles, and New York units made films. New York, the creative hub where most of the films were edited and released, also dispatched units to areas of the nation that did not have FPL branches. The scope of FPL interest was wide. Some representative titles are: National Hunger March, Harlem Sketches, The Ford Massacre, Chicago May Day, Sheriffed, Workers on the Waterfront, Hillsboro Relief Scandal. About a dozen newsreels still exist in part or in whole and are available in major film archives.

The photographic component of the organization mainly sold still photos to the radical press. In addition to full-time photographers, a number of filmmakers were active in the unit. After the film division dissolved in the mid-1930s, the Photo League would continue to function and lasted until 1951, when it fell victim to McCarthyism. Among its distinguished members was Lewis Hine, who joined late in his career.

The FPL was enthralled by the film theories of Soviet filmmakers. Film Front, the FPL Bulletin, and Experimental Cinema, journals issued by the FPL or to which its members contributed, published translations of and commentary on the writings of Dziga Vertov and Sergei Eisenstein. The screening of Soviet films such as Battleship Potemkin often led to spirited theoretical debates. The dominant FPL view was that the montage theory of Eisenstein was as revolutionary as Marx's dialectic. Among the most innovative FPL initiatives was the establishment of the Harry Alan Potamkin Film School in 1933. This was named after a radical film critic who had died the previous year from a stroke at the age of thirty-one. The school had an enrollment of fifty and there was considerable interaction with the New Dance League and the New Theater League. Such appreciation of film as a major art form was farsighted in a time when film was not so viewed by universities and museums.

Direct action against Hollywood films was as important to the FPL as theory. Boycotts were organized against Black Fury, a Warner Brothers film about corrupt unions, and against No Greater Glory, a Columbia film glorifying the military. FPL's own screenings took issue with the Hollywood vision of America by frequently pairing a newsreel about the hardships of working-class America with a feature film celebrating social advances in the Soviet Union.

Except for screenings (1932–1933) at New York City's Acme Theater, the FPL was never able to regularize commercial sales. Distribution was primarily through a political circuit controlled by the CP. This network included CP meetings, front groups, labor unions, and outdoor screenings in neighborhoods. Two FPL films had the distinction of being used to win court cases involving demonstrations against the police. The FPL deficit had to be covered with funds from Workers International Relief, rental income from foreign films, and donations.

Tensions had always existed within the FPL between individuals like Seltzer, who prized the newsreel form, and those like Hurwitz, who wanted to make fiction films and more complex documentaries. As the CP line shifted to the Popular Front concept, Party publications took FPL films to task for being too humorless, too confrontational, and too crude.

The New Film Alliance was created to take over the distribution of foreign films and other activities previously entrusted to the FPL. The schism within FPL ranks led to the formation of Nykino by members who wanted to go beyond the newsreel form. A final blow came with the demise of the German-based Workers' International Relief. Although some films released in 1936 and 1937 had begun as FPL projects, by late 1935 the organization had ceased to exist.

Nykino would function for two years before restructuring itself as Frontier Films (FF). During this brief existence Nykino would engender intense theoretical interchanges and produce some interesting films. The filmmakers affiliated with Nykino had particularly close relationships with CP theater groups and hoped to have an impact on cinema comparable to the impact writers like Clifford Odets were having on theater.

The most celebrated Nykino work is Pie in the Sky, a fourteen-minute satire starring Elia Kazan and Elman Koolish. What there is of a plot involves two tramps in a junkyard mocking all middle-class values. The film has considerable verve, with the tramps taking on organized religion in a manner not seen since the Industrial Workers of the World assaults on the Salvation Army. The zany irreverence of the film is in the same spirit as that which marked the early films of the Newsreel collective some three decades later. But Pie in the Sky was the exception among Nykino efforts.

More typical of Nykino was The World Today, a left-wing version of The March of Time format. The World Today had its debut on 22 September 1936 in New York City. It was soon packaged with other films and sent to the ten districts of the CP to be used in electoral work. Included in the program was a filmed speech by Earl Browder, a labor cartoon from the Daily Worker, and Millions of Us, a labor film made independently in Hollywood by American Labor Films.

Two other Nykino films that got some distributions were Sunnyside and Black Legion. The former aimed to build the alliance of classes by showing middle-class homeowners fighting evictions while the latter dealt with the Michigan-based secret society that preached and practiced violence against Communists, Jews, blacks, Catholics, and trade unionists. As with most Nykino works, no print of Black Legion has survived.

The incorporation of FF in 1937 launched the most vigorous work of the decade. FF would produce four major documentaries and one fiction film: Heart of Spain (1937, 30 min.), China Strikes Back (1937, 24 min.), Return to Life (1938, 45 min.), People of the Cumberland (1938, 24 min.), and Native Land (1942, 120 min.). The organization also made United Action Means Victory (1940, 40 min.) in cooperation with the film department of the United Auto Workers and two films on transportation and ecology made for hire. The hard core of FF consisted of Leo Hurwitz, Paul Strand, Ben Maddow, Sidney Meyers, and Lionel Berman. Among those working on at least one film were Ralph Steiner, Henri Cartier-Bresson, Willard Van Dyke, Earl Robinson, Paul Robeson, Marc Blitzstein, Erskine Caldwell, and Elia Kazan. No women played a major role in any of the productions.

Heart of Spain and Return to Life, films about the Spanish Civil War, and China Strikes Back, a film featuring the first footage from Maoist Yenan, reflect the FF policy of subordinating any advocacy of socialism to the needs of the Popular Front. The tone is that of good guys versus bad guys with the Communist-supported side being the good guys. People of the Cumberland likewise places union and community organizing into a nonthreatening context of folk art revival and mountain populism. Patriotic imagery such as the display of American flags is conspicuous. As a liberal film made by radicals, People of the Cumberland fails to express the zest of New Deal films such as Pare Lorentz's The Plow That Broke the Plains (1936) and The River (1937).

If FF documentaries did not reflect the ideas of Brecht, Stanislavski, Vertov, and Eisenstein, Native Land did. Its aim was to create a fiction-documentary poetic form never before seen in American film, a cinematic counterpart to the blend being offered by John Dos Passos in U.S.A. The direct inspiration for the film was Leo Huberman's The Labor Spy Racket (1937) and the revelations of the La Follette Civil Rights Committee (1936–1937). The film involved the cream of FF talent: codirection and editing by Hurwitz; codirection and cinematography by Strand; coscripting by Hurwitz, Maddow, and Strand; music by Blitzstein; singing narration by Robeson; and acting by Howard da Silva.

The tragedy of Native Land was that history would outpace its production process. The film sought to win popular support for workers by presenting them as victims of racism, greed, and police infiltration. These enemies of the working class were also seen as the groups that could become a fascist fifth column in the United States. As the film took shape, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, often using CP cadre as organizers, led millions of workers in often bloody and usually successful strikes for which the victim image was not appropriate. By the time the film was completed, however, the United States was at war and the CP opposed all strike activity in basic industry and any images that weakened patriotic fervor. Having already missed the moment of militant industrial unionism, Native Land was judged by the CP to contain images of oppression and class division that were far too strong for a nation at war.

Intended to have launched FF as a major feature film producer, Native Land became the organization's swan song. Although it was to earn a measure of fame later, Native Land was a financial and political bust. The FF personnel would continue to have individual careers, but the cooperative movement defined by the FPL, Nykino, and FF had become history. A quarter-century would pass before a new breed of radical filmmakers would attempt to do for their generation what their predecessors had done for the Communist Left of the 1930s.

[See also Hollywood Left; Photography; Union-Sponsored Radical Films.]

FURTHER READING

- Alexander, William. Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Callenback, Ernest. "Native Land." Film Quarterly 27, no. 1 (fall 1973).
- Campbell, Russell Drummond. Radical Cinema in the United States, 1932–1942: The Work of the Film and Photo League, Nykino and Frontier Films. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms International, 1981.
- Experimental Cinema, 1930–1934*. Reprint of complete editions with introduction by Dr. George Amberg. New York: Arno Press, 1969.
- Film Front*, December 1934–March 1935. Rochester, N.Y.: Visual Studies Workshop Reprint Book, 1977.
- Klein, Michael, and Jill Klein. "Native Land: An Interview with Leo Hurwitz." Cineaste 6, no. 3 (1974).
- Kline, Herbert, ed. New Theatre and Film, 1934–1937. Selections and commentary. Foreword by Arthur Knight. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1985.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

RADICAL FILMS, UNION-SPONSORED. See Union-Sponsored Radical Films.

RADICAL NOVEL, 1870-1930. From its emergence as a utopian evocation to its maturation as naturalist epic, the radical novel has expressed central themes of radicalism's "life of the mind." It has also, in its chaotic and shifting form, suggested the difficulty of American intellectuals' search for artistic method.

The radical novel had its tangled roots in the women's literature of the mid-nineteenth century. One side of the critique can be seen in the bizarre allegory The Salamander: A Legend (1848), by the prominent abolitionist lecturer Elizabeth Oakes Smith, predicting catastrophe for capitalism, portrayed as using science and technology in the feckless pursuit of profit. The other side is apparent in Caroline Chesebro's Isa: A Pilgrimage (1852), about a utopian-minded couple who share a vision of sexual egalitarianism and crusading reformism. During the last thirty years of the nineteenth century, these two sides each found vivid expression.

In the anticipation of moral degradation and disaster, Populist leader Ignatius Donnelly's Caesar's Column (1890) was by far the best-selling work, reaching perhaps a total of a half-million copies in the next quarter-century. Here, unchecked economic despotism leads to race suicide and to a vast debacle in which only a minority escape—to found a cooperative colony of settlers somewhere in Africa, with equal rights for women. Jack London's The Iron Heel (1911), almost a rewritten version of Caesar's Column with racial themes toned down and the urban class struggle seen more carefully, places endless conflict ahead. Socialist science-fiction writer George Allen England's trilogy Darkness and Dawn (1916), with a metaphorical treatment of World War I, portrays the total ruin of civilization through some mysterious events, leaving two protagonists to discover a colony where civilization is being reassembled with equal rights and economic egalitarianism.

More realistically intended studies generally portrayed the emerging division of classes in the United States, and sought some kind of resolution of class warfare through cooperative practices. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps's The Silent Partner (1871), the best known and probably most effective of these studies, offered a model in women's cross-class cooperation. Helen Campbell's Mrs. Herndon's Income (1886) brought an outright socialist into the equation as a sympathetic soul. Most other critics, despite their radical critique, could not go so far. Christian socialist Katherine Pearson Woods, whose Metzerott, Shoemaker (1889), suggested how unjust economic conditions, if not remedied, could lead to fanaticism and disaster. Her Mark of the Beast, published in an issue of Lippincott's in 1890, took a step further in endorsing Christian socialism (but not atheistic immigrant socialism) as the solution to the woes of the poor and as a moral correction to the excesses of the rich.

The numerous utopian novels of the period drew a more brilliant picture of socialism in operation. Only a few might be described as written by authors familiar with modern socialist principles. Marie Howland, an activist in the American wing of the First International, contributed Papa's Own Girl (1874), depicting life in a Fourierist "Social Palace." Henry Allen, a leading participant in the Saint Louis "Commune" briefly established by socialists during the 1877 railroad strike, for instance, wrote A Strange Voyage: A Revision of the Key of Industrial Cooperative Government; An Interesting and Instructive Description of Life on Planet Venus (1891). Mixing socialism and Swedenborgianism in an improbable plot—a man is invited by a beautiful alien to visit her socialistically organized home planet—it featured gold-lined toilet bowls among other technological innovations. Distributed by a short-lived socialist newspaper network, Strange Voyage had a minuscule success compared with that of Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward (1889), the most influential socialistic novel worldwide in the nineteenth century. Bellamy's depiction of contemporary poverty versus technological utopia not only inspired a political movement but actually made cooperative society seem possible to millions of Americans. His subsequent novel, Equality (1897), although analytically clearer in its critique of capitalism and depiction of women's life in a socialist society, failed to retain readers' interest in the continuing tale of Looking Backward's two romantic characters.

Realism, inspired by the grinding poverty of the 1890s and by such foreign models as Emile Zola, made a sudden literary appearance around the turn of the century. A mainstream critic was reported as saying that if Balzac had seen Pittsburgh, he would have exclaimed, "Give me a pen!" Actually, William Dean Howells's novel A Hazard of New Fortunes (1894) portrayed an urban setting seething with contradictions, while the short Yiddish fiction of the extended newspaper column (notably by Leon Kobrin) offered a close study of slum conditions. Upton Sinclair's The Jungle—serialized in the socialist Appeal to Reason and reprinted as a novel in 1906—demonstrated the power and the potential popularity of the genre. Sinclair's depiction of packinghouse life, and unsanitary conditions, had an impact from congressional committees to Socialist Party circles. Of Sinclair's other numerous books, King Coal (1917) approached the drama of working-class life, this time amid the Colorado coal strike of 1913-1914.

Not many other authors of labor novels approached Sinclair's popular achievement, but at least a few improved upon his often cardboard characterizations and his predictable plots. Arthur Bullard, later a prominent American diplomat, offered in Comrade Yetta (1913) a sometimes touching treatment of a young woman radical who helps organize a garment union local, joins the staff of a socialist daily newspaper, and meets the activist love of her life. Ernest Poole's The Harbor (1915), which reached the best-seller list of its time, carefully portrays the lives of stokers and dockers who carry along the protagonist in their mighty strike. Leroy Scott's The Walking Delegate (1907), virtually alone among labor novels, shows unionists at work in their daily affairs.

Novels of sexual exploitation retouched sentimentalism with socialist coloring and, in a climate of "white slave trade" revelations, briefly had a wide audience. Thus Estelle Baker's The Rose Door (1910), popular in socialist ranks, showed women of different classes seduced, deceived, and forced into prostitution. Reginald Kauffman's House of Bondage (1910), a nationwide best-seller, fell back upon the plot of the rural refugee trapped by a big-city procurer, but added new insight into the futility of escape from the clutches of business profit and government corruption. Theodore Dreiser's Sister Carrie (1903) projected the radical author forward, among his many socialist friends in particular (he allowed a section of his Idylls of the Poor to be published in the New York Call), as the true-life chronicler of the changing social conditions and mores that caused a "good" woman to act in ostensibly immoral ways.

Novels of personal emancipation, sexual and otherwise, turned this theme around to stress the awakening of women, especially, from the artificial moral restraints a Victorian society had placed upon them. The Chasm (1911) by George Cram Cook, converted to socialism and bohemianism by his boyhood friend Floyd Dell, shows a wealthy woman who chooses Marxism (represented by her father's socialist gardener) over Nietzscheanism (represented by her aristocratic husband). Her personal revolt permits the protagonist to choose the proper side. In Susan Glaspell's The Awakening (1911), greatly influenced by George Cram Cook, and in Florence Converse's The Children of Light (1912), these contradictions are solved less philosophically, as the female protagonists grow into a vision of socialism by extending their vision of sexual emancipation. Charlotte Teller's The Cage (1907) likewise interweaves class and gender struggles, but with the twist that the protagonist must educate her ethnic socialist husband to reject the principle of legal marriage as the only legitimate expression of love. In Hutchins Hapgood's Anarchist Woman (1909), the problem cannot be solved to the satisfaction of all when a slum woman freed from the limits of her background must finally abandon the anarchist-lover who sought in her development his own Pygmalion-like success.

Perhaps, as Hapgood intimated, individualism more than collectivity held the American future. The best-crafted radical novels of the age came to this rather pessimistic conclusion. Abraham Cahan's The Rise of David Levinsky (1917), almost a self-portrait of the successful American businessman who had lost his European soul, exemplifies the archetype. In Jack London's Martin Eden (1909), truly a proletarian novel and arguably a spiritual autobiography, neither literary success nor adoring women can ease the psychological pain of the talented proletarian, who can find no home in any existing social class and at last hurls himself into the sea. A young and socialistic Sherwood Anderson, in Marching Men (1919), renders the radical leader himself as a social-isolate Nietzschean giant who must decide for the masses. In another way, Upton Sinclair's Jimmie Higgins (1917)—a pacifist novel that shows the agonizing decline of a young, enthusiastic activist to army recruit and gibbering madman—has the same moral: socialist politics have failed and, at least in America, only individual credos (none too easy to live) remain. Even Mooncalf (1922), Floyd Dell's generally cheery bildungsroman, ends at the same essential perspective.

This sense of alienation had its echo in literary life. Only so long as the older socialist movement remained intact did an intellectual climate exist for common discussion of radical literature and publication of short stories, which served many potential novelists as the site of earliest reception for their work. In the first years of the century, The Comrade (1900-1905) connected Howells and a range of nineteenth-century literary-reformer types with the young socialist reader. A fairly small-circulation weekly, Horace Traubel's Conservator (1890–1919), offered close and sympathetic critiques of Jack London and a range of other writers devoted to Traubel's judgments. For a few years after 1910, the Coming Nation, the Masses, and to a lesser degree the Liberator continued this process, but with diminishing enthusiasm for collective hopes.

By the 1920s, a sense of dread and frequently a repugnance at the state of American life pervade the radical novel. In the Yiddish world, where the novel had only begun to appear and where radicalism remained the prime mood of litterateurs, Joseph Opatoshu's Hibru (1918) shows middle-class Jewish immigrants smug and arrogant about their material success. Samuel Ornitz's Haunch, Paunch, and Jowl (1922), although in English rather than Yiddish, is a similar portrayal of Jewish corruptions in America. David Pinski's The Generations of Noah Eden (English translation, 1922) shows the Americanized children of a pious and kindly immigrant manufacturer turn to nihilism and self-destruction. Opatoshu's stark novella "Lincherei" (Lynchers), published in a 1923 collection, Race, sought for the first time in Yiddish to etch the ugliest scenes in American life—hysterically happy southern whites roasting a black man alive for a sexual crime he did not commit. Among the established American writers, Upton Sinclair's Boston (1928) sketched out the trial and judicial murder of anarchists Sacco and Vanzetti.

In another sense, the defeat of the pre-1920 Left and the export of revolutionary hopes to Russia paralleled the exhaustion of Greenwich Village bohemia in favor of more exotic cultural scenes. Claude McKay's Home to Harlem (1929) offered this bohemia "at home," but only to blacks who would remain forever outsiders in America. Waldo Frank's semimystical novels similarly carried their protagonists outside the boundaries of existing American life. Even historical novels about the 1910s American Left, such as Elias Tobenkin's The Road (1922) or Max Eastman's Venture (1927), seemed to belong to some distant time and place.

This artistic perception posed considerable problems for the Left. The New Masses, fostered by Communist supporters, sought in its early years to maintain a balance between bohemian and Marxist sentiments, going over with both feet to a "proletarian literature" that had been demonstrated convincingly, in the form desired, perhaps only by New Masses editor Mike Gold himself, in Jews without Money (1930), the ultimate communist bildungsroman. The 1930s bought a temporary and partial fulfillment of this anticipation, but without removing the causes and deeper symptoms of the alienation and sense of unreality that marked the American radical author. Neither did the individual political commitments of literary giants—most prominently Theodore Dreiser, who would lead Left committees and add his name to Communist causes during the 1930s without ever firmly accepting the methods of Marxism or "proletarian literature"—alter the basic difficulty. The proper strategy of literary radicalism remained undetermined.

[See also Bellamy, Edward; Cahan, Abraham; Campbell, Helen Stuart; Frank, Waldo; Gold, Michael; Greenwich Village; Howells, William Dean; London, Jack; Masses; McKay, Claude; Poetry, 1870–1930; Popular Fiction; Radical Poetry, 1930s–1960s; Sandburg, Carl; Seven Arts; Sinclair, Upton; Vorse, Mary Heaton; Yiddish Left.]

FURTHER READING

- Aaron, Daniel. Writers on the Left. New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1961.
 Matthiessen, Francis O. Theodore Dreiser. New York: William Sloan Associates, 1951.
 Rideout, Walter B. The Radical Novel in the United States, 1900–1954. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1956.

—PAUL BUHLE

RADICAL POETRY, 1930s–1960s. Radical poetry associated with the organized Left during the first years of the Great Depression developed logically from predecessor efforts by diverse proletarian and left-wing bohemian writers. Several of the most influential Marxist-oriented poets of the 1930s can be found in publications of the 1920s such as the annual The American Caravan, the journal Blues, May-Days (1925), Poems of Justice (1929), and An Anthology of Revolutionary Poetry (1929).

The Great Depression's national and international political crises, combined with the dynamism of Communist Party–led publications and organizations, produced a unique cultural stamp. This was evidenced, first, in the revolutionary, proletarian poetry retrospectively embraced as well as freshly produced in the early 1930s, and, later, in the democratic and antifascist verse appearing under the auspices of the post-1935 Popular Front. Writers drawn to the organized Left exhibited significant coherency—even with diverse strains, the maturing of particular poets, and the appearance of newer trends—as long as they maintained their general socialist loyalties and continued to publish.

One element feeding into the creation of the Depression poetry tradition was the genre of workers' songs, ballads, and folk-culture. Romantic elements were often quite pronounced in this writing, some strains of which were native to the United States and others imported by class-conscious European immigrants. The first poetry in the Communist movement's Daily Worker and Young Worker was often in this vein, published with titles such as "The Red Dawn," "Song of Youth," "Freedom," and "Hail, Young Workers!" In 1927, a volume published by the Daily Worker called Poems for Workers gave a kind of semiofficial imprimatur to this approach.

This selection by Manuel Gómez (a Party name for Charles Francis Phillips, 1895-1989) presents mainly styles that are conventional and rarely difficult. Techniques of modernism, such as extreme fragmentation, dramatic word-surprises, and defamiliarization, are absent. Poets chosen by Gómez range from Ernest Jones (1819-1869), a Chartist leader, to Louis Untermeyer (1885-1977), a veteran radical from the days of the original Masses magazine, who supported himself as a jeweler and who later edited a number of influential poetry anthologies.

The numerous little magazines that blossomed in the years just after the stock market crash, many of which were associated with the Communist-led John Reed Clubs, show a greater tendency not only to blend proletarian didacticism with more sophisticated romantic motifs but also to increasingly acknowledge the presence of modernist modes and themes. The Rebel Poet (1931-1932), for example, organ of a loose network of writers that united anarchists, socialists, and pro-Communists under the banner "Art for Humanity's Sake," carried an obituary for the modernist expatriate suicide Harry Crosby (1898-1929), and included his work in the Rebel Poets Society's annual volumes, Unrest 1929 and Unrest 1930. On the other hand, more typical of the journal's publications were the witty doggerel verses by Communist Henry George Weiss (1898-1946).

In Communist Party circles, especially in New York, the influence of Michael Gold (born Itzok Isaac Granich; 1893-1967); was paramount. His 1924 poem "The Strange Funeral in Braddock" was frequently read, reprinted, and even set to different kinds of music in the early 1930s. A haunting work replete with macabre imagery, Gold's poem resembles a folk tale with medieval elements: dragons and ogres represent industrialism. Other poems by Gold are noteworthy for startling phrases such as "Poetry is the cruelist bunk" and "Hear the shriek of the killer babbitts" in his "Ode to Walt Witman" (1935).

Gold used his influence on the New Masses to publish worker-poets wherever possible, although he was not sectarian toward middle-class fellow-travelers. Occasionally Gold even promoted writers stylistically close to modernism. One of these was Herman Spector (1905-1959), whom Gold declared in 1933 to be the "raw material of New York Communism." Spector's "Nightowl" (1928) and "Night in New York" (1928) are rather tortured responses to T. S. Eliot.

Although Spector stopped publishing in the mid-1930s and eventually became a cabdriver, Bud Johns and Judith S. Clancy (Spector's daughter) assembled a remarkable collection of his work that was published in 1977 as Bastard in the Ragged Suit: Writings of, with Drawings by, Herman Spector.

Sol Funaroff (1911-1942), a somewhat younger Communist associated with Spector, presented a more direct, revolutionary "answer" to Eliot in "What the Thunder Said" (1932), in which he reproduces the speech of a revolutionary Russian worker to a crowd of other workers while a thunderstorm threatens. In 1938 Funaroff explained in Poetry magazine that modernist techniques allowed him "to form a dialectic image pattern which would enable me to present simultaneously sensuous, historical and philosophical relations within the poem." Funaroff, who sometimes used the names Charles Henry Newman, Stephen Foster, and Sil Vnarov, was the guiding spirit of the literary magazine Dynamo (1934-1936). The journal's manifesto declared that "the new generation of American poets is now ready to initiate a new 'renaissance' which in compact images and rhythms of poetry can utter the deeper, social and class meanings of the turbulent days around us." Funaroff's own collections are The Spider and the Clock (1938) and Exile from a Future Time: Posthumous Poems of Sol Funaroff (1943).

In 1933 Funaroff appeared with Spector and two other poets in We Gather Strength, the first of a series of landmark volumes that helped define the poetic tradition of the organized Left. The contributor who turned out to be most enduring is Edwin Rolfe (born Solomon Fishman; 1909–1954), whose Collected Poems inaugurated the University of Illinois “American Poetry Recovery Series” in 1993 under the editorship of Cary Nelson.

Rolfe’s critical statements tended to be functionalist politically. But his poetry often blended complexly a romanticism in the vein of Shelley and Whitman with a modernism lightly suggestive of Crane and Eliot, all mixed lyrically into the retelling of the events of his own life as a committed activist in the Communist Party and the International Brigades in Spain. To My Contemporaries appeared in 1936, First Love in 1951, and Permit Me Refuge in 1955.

The fourth poet in We Gather Strength was Joseph Kalar (1906–1972). A worker in saw and lumber mills during his most prolific years, Kalar, like Spector, ceased publishing at the time of the Popular Front. His work was collected and published by his son, in the volume Joseph A. Kalar: Poet of Protest (1985).

Kalar’s “Papermill” was just one of nearly sixty remarkable poems anthologized in a second and much larger landmark volume, the influential Proletarian Literature in the United States: An Anthology, issued by the Communist Party’s International Publishers in 1935. Other than Kalar and Jim Waters, an obscure worker-poet friend of Gold with a past in the Industrial Workers of the World, very few contributors could boast a proletarian background or occupation. Whatever some self-styled proletarian critics may have declaimed in their theories, proletarian poetry in practice meant literature compatible with the Marxist outlook and political orientation of the Communist movement.

The styles and sensibilities of several older contributors to the volume, like Gold, Maxwell Bodenheim (1893–1954), Orrick Johns (1887–1946), Alfred Kreymborg (1883–1966), and Genevieve Taggard (1894–1948), were largely formed before the Depression, but, in each case, the commitment to Communism was substantial. Gold, Taggard, and Kreymborg retained their revolutionary political outlook until their deaths. However, the alcoholic Bodenheim became focused on the struggle for economic survival in the years before he was murdered during the McCarthy era, and Johns evolved away from the Left before committing suicide at age fifty-nine.

Most contributors to Proletarian Literature were more or less at the start of their careers, but several were somewhat advanced in publishing. Horace Gregory (1898–1982) had already published Chelsea Rooming House (1930), A Wreath for Margery (1933), and No Retreat (1933). He soon published Chorus for Survival (1935) under the inspiration of the Left as well, but, by the end of the 1930s, he was by stages evolving into a bitter anti-Communist.

Also more established was Isidor Schneider (1896–1977), who published a volume of modern verse, The Temptation of Anthony and Other Poems, in 1928, and a Marxist collection, Comrade: Mister, in 1934. While Schneider continued to publish poems in the Communist press, he became better known for his radical novels From the Kingdom of Necessity (1935) and The Judas Time (1947), as well for as his prolific literary criticism in the New Masses. In the late 1940s he became discouraged with the literary Left, thereafter pursuing a private career of reading manuscripts and editing for publishers.

Stanley Burnshaw (b. 1906), a New Masses editor from 1933 to 1936 and a non-Party communist, had earlier published several privately-printed volumes of verse and a critical study, André Spire and His Poetry: Two Essays and Forty Translations (1933). His most impressive anticapitalist poems would appear in the 1936 collection The Iron Land: A Narrative, marked by a structural strategy of rhetorical questions and innovations. Shortly afterwards Burnshaw launched his own publishing house, the Dryden Press, remaining an armchair leftist. By the time he began writing again, in the mid-1940s, he was becoming disenchanted with Communism.

Norman Macleod (1906–1985), a revolutionary imagist from the West, published Horizons of Death in 1934 and would issue Thanksgiving before November in 1936. He was also an active editor of little magazines, including The Morada (1929–1930) and Front (1930–1931).

Robert Gessner (1907–1968), already the author of two books about Native American Indians, a nonfiction work called Massacre (1931) and the novel Broken Arrow (1933), published a thirty-page paean to international revolution called Upsurge (1933). Although he episodically contributed poems to the New Masses throughout the 1930s, Gessner turned increasingly to fiction and then launched a successful career in film studies at New York University.

Kenneth Fearing (1902–1961), author of Angel Arms (1929) and Poems (1935), was widely regarded as the outstanding revolutionary poet of his generation. In 1938, he published Dead Reckoning, and his first novel, The Hospital, a year later. He terminated his associations with the Communist movement at the time of the Hitler-Stalin Pact, thereafter promulgating his radical critique of capitalism in a series of fiction thrillers such as The Big Clock (1946) and The Crozart Story (1960). Later collections of his verse include Stranger at Coney Island (1949).

Alfred Hayes (1911–1985), born in England, was an autodidact versed in Baudelaire, Hopkins, and Heine, and a frequent contributor to Communist publications. His first volume of poetry, The Big Time, did not appear until 1944, when his political convictions had waned, and one of his most impressive, Welcome to the Castle, appeared in 1950. After World War II he became a successful novelist and screenplay writer.

Kenneth Patchen (1911–1972), closer to surrealism and anarchism than Communism, would soon publish Before the Brave (1936), First Will and Testament (1939), and The Teeth of the Lion. In 1941 he issued his revolutionary-pacifist, stream-of-consciousness masterpiece, The Journal of Albion Moonlight.

Muriel Rukeyser (1913–1980) treated social issues through modernist strategies and a metaphysical style. In 1935 she published Theory of Flight, followed by U.S. I (1938), A Turning Wind (1939), The Soul and Body of John Brown (1940), Wake Island (1942), Beast in View (1944), The Green Wave (1948), Orpheus (1949), Body of Waking (1958), Waterlily Fire (1962), The Speed of Darkness (1968), Breaking Open (1973), The Gates (1976), and Collected Poems (1979).

H. H. Lewis (1901–1985) proclaimed himself a devout Communist in works such as Red Renaissance (1930), Thinking of Russia (1932), Salvation (1934), and Road to Utterly: Poems Written by a Missouri Farmhand and Dedicated to Soviet Russia (1935). After the 1940s he lapsed into silence, isolation, and increasing eccentricity.

Ben Maddow (1909–1992) took the pen name David Wolff to keep his identity secret from employers, and published a small number of poems in Blues, Poetry, and the New Masses. In the mid-1930s Maddow began collaborating on radical films produced by Nykino and then Frontier Films. After World War II he launched a career in Hollywood, where he was blacklisted from 1952 to 1960.

James Neugass (1905–1949), from a wealthy New Orleans family, wrote poetry and worked at odd jobs in the 1930s until he volunteered for service as an ambulance driver with the International Brigades. Remaining close to the Communist movement through the 1940s, he drafted numerous unpublished novels until Rain of Ashes (1949), a harsh portrait of immediate relatives, was finally accepted just before his premature death.

William Pillin (1910–1985), born in Russia, was a poet and ceramic craftsman who also developed a special interest in music. Influenced by Rilke, García Lorca, and Neruda, he published Poems (1939), Theory of Silence (1949), Dance without Shoes (1956), Passage after Midnight (1958), Pavanne for a Fading Memory (1964), and Everything Falling (1971). Originally active in the John Reed Club of Chicago, he moved to the Southwest and then West, increasingly attracted to anarchism.

Don West (1906–1992) was a pro-Communist poet, Christian minister, and lifelong labor activist who helped found the Highlander Folk School. His books include Crab-Grass (1931), Between the Plow Handles (1932), Toil and Hunger (1940), Broadside to the Sun (1946), Clods of Southern Earth (1946), The Road Is Rocky (1951), O Mountaineers! (1974), and In a Land of Plenty (1982).

The last poet listed in Proletarian Literature in the United States was Richard Wright (1908–1960), who initiated his literary career as a poet in Communist and John Reed Club publications. The only other African American contributor to the entire volume was Langston Hughes (1902–1967).

Many other African American poets of the era also had associations with the organized Left. Wright's onetime friend Margaret Walker, author of For My People (1942), was pro-Communist when she launched her poetry career in the late 1930s, and remained generally influenced by Marxism.

African American poet Countee Cullen (1903–1946), a leading figure in the Harlem Renaissance, episodically showed sympathy for the Communist-led Left. His books include Color (1925), Copper Sun (1927), The Ballad of the Brown Girl (1927), The Black Christ (1929), and The Medea and Some Poems (1935).

Frank Marshall Davis (1905–1987) was close to the Communist Left, perhaps even a member in the 1940s. His collections include Black Man's Verse (1935), I Am the American Negro (1937), Through Sepia Eyes (1938), and 47th Street: Poems (1948).

The poetry of Gwendolyn Bennett (1902–1981) mostly appeared before 1935. In the 1940s she became an administrator of two Communist-led educational centers, first the Jefferson School for Social Science and then the George Washington Carver School in Harlem.

Sterling Brown (1901–1989) was championed by the Communist Left at the time he published Southern Road (1932). A professor at Howard University, he was a prominent figure in the Federal Writers Project and also wrote books about African American prose, poetry, and drama.

The poet Robert Hayden (1913–1981) was a member of the Communist-led John Reed Club of Detroit. Revolutionary sentiments are quite evident in his first book, Heart-Shape in the Dust (1940).

H. T. Tsiang (1899–1971), one of the more productive Asian American authors of imaginative literature in English of the interwar period, published Poems of the Chinese Revolution (1929); China Red (1931), an epistolary novel; The Hanging on Union Square (1935), an “American Epic” novel; And China Has Hands (1937), a novel of New York’s Chinatown; and China Marches On (1938), a three-act play.

Lynn Riggs (1899–1954), a poet and dramatist who was part Cherokee from Oklahoma, was active in the League of American Writers in the 1930s. In the 1940s he drew close to the Communist movement in Hollywood but was discouraged from joining due to his homosexuality.

A unique phenomenon that deserves attention is the relation of the small group of objectivist poets to the Communist Left. George Oppen (1908–1984) published Discrete Series in 1934, and thereafter became a Communist activist for two decades. He fled to Mexico in the McCarthy era, then resurfaced as a poet with The Materials (1962), This in Which (1965), Of Being Numerous (1968), Seascape (1973), Collected Poems (1975), and Primitive (1978).

Carl Rakosi (b. 1903) came to the United States from Germany in 1910 and worked as a social worker for much of his life under the legally adopted name Callman Rawley. Drawn to the Communist Party for several decades, he stopped writing poetry for twenty-five years. His works include Selected Poems (1941), Two Poems (1971), Ere-Voice (1971), Ex Cranium, and Night (1975).

Louis Zukofsky (1904–1978), also attracted to Communism, achieved recognition even later than the other objectivists. In the 1930s Zukofsky contributed to the New Masses and was on the Executive Committee of the League of American Writers. His books A 1-12 appeared in 1959, All the Collected Poems, 1923–1958, in 1965, and All the Collected Short Poems, 1956–1964, in 1965.

Not all the Left poets were associated with Communism. Carl Sandburg (1878–1967) remained an independent socialist. Mark Van Doren (1894–1972), William Rose Benét (1886–1950), and Stephen Vincent Benét (1899–1943) were liberals in sympathy with the Popular Front. Josephine Johnson (1910–1990) was a Pulitzer Prize-winning radical novelist who also published the poetry collection Year’s End (1937). She was briefly involved with John Reed Club members and the League of American Writers, but married a Trotskyist and became increasingly drawn to ecological and pacifist themes. Trotskyism, in fact, attracted several of the most talented poets, as well as some minor ones, such as Florence Becker (1895–1984), who was expelled from the League of American Writers for her politics in 1939.

The New Englander John Brooks Wheelwright (1897–1940), who may have been the preeminent revolutionary poet in the high modernist mode, was a member of the Trotskyist faction in the Socialist Party and a founder of the Socialist Workers Party in 1938. His collections Rock and Shell (1933), Mirrors of Venus (1938), and Political Self-Portrait (1940) trace the evolution of his political, cultural, and religious thought. The Collected Poems of John Wheelwright (1972) was published three decades after his death to considerable acclaim.

Delmore Schwartz (1913–1966) was more indirectly associated with Trotskyism through Partisan Review magazine. These were the years when he published In Dreams Begin Responsibilities (1938), Shenandoah (1941), and Genesis (1943).

Sherry Mangan (born John Joseph Sherry Mangan, 1904–1961), became a Trotskyist after publishing the novel Cinderella Married (1932) and the collection No Apology for Poetrie and Other Poems Written 1922–1931 (1934), and just before the long poem Salutation to Valediction (1938). During and after World War II he worked for the Fourth International in Europe and Latin America. A selection of his work appeared posthumously in Blackness of a White Night: Stories and Poems by Sherry Mangan (1987).

It would be difficult to find any poet of the 1930s and 1940s untouched by some degree of radical thought. However, the course of the radical poetry tradition associated with the midcentury rise and fall of the organized Left can be most accurately traced by the record of the leading publications of the Communist movement (New Masses, Daily Worker, People's World, International Literature, Mainstream, and Masses and Mainstream), as well as the scores of magazines that sprang up around Communist-led cultural organizations such as the John Reed Clubs, League of American Writers (especially Directions), Labor Poets of America (Sing America!), Contemporary Writers, Committee for the Arts, Sciences and Professions, and the Harlem Writers Club. Jewish Life (later Jewish Currents) and California Quarterly are useful sources as well.

The most influential writers tended to appear in anthologies, or special issues of journals, featuring mainly pro-Communist authors and fellow-travelers. In addition to We Gather Strength and Proletarian Literature in the United States, such collections include the "Social Poets Number" of Poetry, edited by Horace Gregory (May 1936); Salud! Poems and Sketches of Spain by American Writers, edited by Alan Calmer (1938); War Poems of the United Nations, sponsored by the League of American Writers and edited by Joy Davidman (1943); Seven Poets in Search of an Answer: A Poetic Symposium, edited by Thomas Yoseloff (1944); and The Rosenbergs: Poems of the United States, edited by Martha Millet (1957). Also influential were a substantial number of the mid-twentieth-century poets appearing in The Writing on the Wall: 108 American Poems of Protest, edited by Walter Lowenfels (1969), and On Freedom's Side: An Anthology of American Poems of Protest, edited by Aaron Kramer (1972).

Those Left poets most frequently featured in such places in the 1930s and 1940s include a range of writers, some of whose work eventually achieved considerable recognition and others of whose contributions dropped entirely from sight. One of the latter is Alexander F. Bergman (born Alexander Frankel; 1912–1941), a devoted young Communist whose writings were posthumously collected in They Look like Men (1944).

Millen Brand (1906–1980), most famous for his 1937 novel The Outward Room, was a leading activist in the League of American Writers and contributed poetry to the New Masses. Collections of his poems, which did not appear until later years, and include Dry Summer in Provence (1966), Local Lives (1975), and the posthumous volume Peace March (1980).

John Malcom Brinnin (b. 1916) was editor of the left-wing literary journals New Writers and Signatures in the 1930s. His published poetry volumes include

The Garden Is Political (1942), The Lincoln Lyrics (1942), No Arch, No Triumph (1945), The Sorrows of Cold Stone (1951), and Skin Diving in the Virgins (1970).

Joy Davidman (1915–1960) was a dedicated Communist who worked on the staff of the New Masses in the late 1930s and early 1940s. Her Letter to a Comrade (1939) won the Yale Younger Poets Series award. After World War II she underwent a religious conversion and eventually moved to England, where she married C. S. Lewis.

The African American poet and dramatist Owen Dodson (1914–1983) appeared in left-wing magazines during the 1940s. His early plays were antiracist and antifascist, and his first volume of poetry was Powerful Long Ladder (1946).

Vincent Ferrini (b. 1913), who sometimes published as Vincent Ferous, began his career with a series of proletarian verse such as No Smoke (1941), Injunction (1943), and Blood of the Tenement (1944). Although he remained on the Left, his style evolved in new directions as he published more than twenty-five books, one of the most important of which is Know Fish (1979).

Don Gordon (1902–1989), among the finest craftsmen of Left poetry, was a Communist blacklisted from the film industry where he worked as a reader in Hollywood studios. Remaining on the Left all his life, he published Statement (1943), Civilian Poems (1946), On the Ward (1977), Excavations (1979), and The Sea of Tranquility (1989).

Rolfe Humphries (1894–1969) worked as a Latin teacher while a leading activist in the League of American Writers and a pro-Communist in the late 1930s. Having published a volume of poems in 1928, Europa and Other Poems and Sonnets, Humphries coedited the pro-Republican collection . . . And Spain Sings (1937), translating about one-third of the poems in the volume from the Spanish. By 1940 he lost interest in Communism, although he translated García Lorca's Poet in New York (1940) and Aragon, Poet of the French Resistance (1945). Humphries's Collected Poems appeared in 1965, and Poets, Poetics and Politics: America's Literary Community Viewed from the Letters of Rolfe Humphries, 1910–1969, was published in 1992.

Stanley Kunitz (b. 1905), whose Intellectual Things appeared in 1930, was a member of the John Reed Club and active in the League of American Writers. His views remained generally anarchist as his style evolved from metaphysical to more natural speech in Passport to the War (1940), the Pulitzer Prize-winning Selected Poems (1958), The Testing Tree (1971), The Wellfleet Whale (1983), and Next-to-Last Things: New Poems and Essays (1985).

Ruth Lechlitner (1901–1989), a committed leftist active in the League of American Writers, was a poetry reviewer for the New York Herald Tribune Book Review for twenty-five years. Her collections include Tomorrow's Phoenix (1937), Only the Years (1944), The Shadow of the Hour (1956), and A Changing Season: Selected and New Poems, 1962–1972 (1973).

The poet and pioneer filmmaker Willard Maas (1911–1971) held membership in the Communist Party for a while and was author of Fire Testament (1935) and Concerning the Young (1938).

Archibald MacLeish (1892–1982), whose relations with Communism may be more significant than generally acknowledged, was a member of the Executive Committee of the League of American Writers 1935 and chaired a public session at its Second Congress. Panic (1935), a verse drama, and Public Speech (1936) clearly exhibit his support for collectivist social action.

Ettore Rella (1907?–1988) was born in Telluride, Colorado, of Italian and Albanian parents. He was associated with the Communist-led cultural milieu from the 1930s to the 1950s, and his books include Here and Now (1942), Spring Song on an Old Theme and Other Poems (1966), and The Scenery of the Play (1981).

Kenneth Rexroth (1905–1982) belonged to the Communist Party after he settled in San Francisco in the 1920s, and he was active in the John Reed Club in the early 1930s. He became increasingly disaffected from the Party during the decade, and his radicalism took on a more anarchist cast. Rexroth's books include In What Hour (1940), The Phoenix and the Tortoise (1944), and The Signature of All Things (1949).

Merrill Root (1895–1973), a friend of Rolfe Humphries, was pro-Communist in the 1930s but later turned sharply to the right and became poetry editor of the John Birch Society's American Opinion. His books include Lost Eden (1927), Bow of Burning Gold (1929), Dawn Is Forever (1938), and Before the Swallow Dares (1947).

Norman Rosten (1914–1995) was a poet, playwright, and novelist who worked for the Federal Theater and published frequently in the New Masses. His books include Return Again Traveler (1940), The Fourth Decade and Other Poems (1943), The Big Road (1946), Songs for Patricia (1951), The Plane and the Shadow (1953), and Thrive upon the Rock (1965). He was especially successful in the poetic dramas that he produced for radio in the 1940s.

Eli Siegel (1902–1978) was born in Dvinsk, Latvia, and came to the United States in 1905. Originally he was an associate of V. F. Calverton in founding Modern Quarterly, but drew closer to the Communist Party and was the mentor of the Labor Poets of America and Young Labor Poets in the late 1930s. Later on Siegel created the doctrine of "Aesthetic Realism," which he defined as "the seeing of the world, art and self as explaining each other: each is the aesthetic oneness of opposites." Although he began publishing individual poems in the 1920s, his books came out in the 1950s, including Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana (1957) and Hail, American Development (1958). He also published literary criticism about William Carlos Williams and Henry James.

John Varney (1888–1967) made several trips to the Soviet Union and spent a great deal of time in Europe in the 1920s. In addition to editing Exile from a Future Time: Posthumous Poems of Sol Funaroff (1943), Varney published many books of his own works: First Wounds: A Story in Five Chapters of Verse (1926), Sketches of Soviet Russia (1920), Sparrow Hawks (1950), Stalingrad, New Years (1943), Star Men, U.S.A. (1956), Spun Sequence (1960), and Poems for a Prose Age (1960).

Theodore Carl Wilson (published as T. C. Wilson; 1912–1950) was a protégé of Horace Gregory who held an equal interest in high modernist and proletarian poetry. Wilson coedited the spring 1935 issue of Bozart-Westminister Magazine with Ezra Pound, as well as contributed to New Masses.

The 1950s brought a distinctly new climate of aggressive political repression against which Left poetry frequently defined itself. The revolutionary writer who most directly resisted these reactionary times, Aaron Kramer (1921–1997), was a writer who fully embodied the traditions and trajectory of mid-twentieth century Left poetry. Born into a socialist cultural milieu that was also secularly Yiddish, Kramer was in junior high school when he announced himself a "people's poet" and began writing for the New Pioneer. From his college period and into the 1950s, Kramer tried to sustain and develop certain precise traditions of radical and romantic poetry that were becoming unfashionable, even on the Left. In addition to appearing in Seven Poets in Search of an Answer (1944), Kramer's early volumes include The Glass Mountain (1946), The Thunder of the Grass (1948), Thru Every Window! (1950), and Roll the Forbidden Drums (1954). He also published an important work of translation, The Poetry and Prose of Heinrich Heine (1948).

In the post-Holocaust years, Kramer came to write more explicitly on Jewish history and themes, but always regarded himself as Jewish in an internationalist context. His early volumes, however, show a much greater attraction to heroes and themes from African American history, as evidenced by Denmark Vesey (1952). In the 1940s, Kramer read with Langston Hughes, and in 1949 he was the only white member of the Harlem Writers Club. He was also the only white member on the board of Harlem Quarterly, and later he was one of the few white contributors to Freedomways.

In 1953 Kramer severed his associations with the Communist Party, becoming an independent revolutionary for the rest of his life. He completed a Ph.D. in English at New York University in 1966, and then published a number of scholarly books such as The Prophetic Tradition in American Poetry (1968) and Melville's Poetry: Toward the Enlarged Heart (1972). A Century of Yiddish Poetry (1989) established Kramer as the foremost translator in the field, and he subsequently devoted considerable effort to additional research into the lives of his subjects as well as new translations. His later books of poetry—Carousel Parkway (1980), The Burning Bush (1983), In Wicked Times (1983), and Indigo and Other Poems (1992)—focused more on experiences of everyday life, although often with a political and historical sensibility.

There are numerous other left-wing poets whose careers were launched during or profoundly shaped by the 1950s. They come from a variety of backgrounds and regions, and belong to several generations.

John Beecher (1904–1980) was born in Birmingham, Alabama. His collections include Report to the Stockholders and Other Poems (1962), To Live and Die in Dixie and Other Poems (1966), Hear the Wind Blow: Poems of Protest and Prophecy (1968), and Collected Poems, 1924–1974 (1974).

Olga Cabral (b. 1909), born in Port of Spain, Trinidad, British West Indies, was married to the Yiddish poet Aaron Kurtz (1891–1964). Her books include Cities and Deserts (1959), The Evaporated Man (1968), Tape Found in a Bottle (1971), The Darkness in My Pockets (1976), Occupied Country (1976).

Alvaro Cardona-Hine (b. 1926) came to the United States from San José, Costa Rica, and studied at the University of California at Los Angeles. He was a frequent contributor of poetry and reviews to both Masses and Mainstream and the National Guardian. His books include The Gathering Wave (1961), The Flesh of Utopia (1966), Menatash (1969), Agapito (1969), Words on Paper (1973), and The Half-Eaten Angel (1981).

The poet and translator Robert Friend (b. 1913), a Communist in his youth, emigrated to Israel in 1951. His books include Shadow of the Sun (1941), Now (1964), Salt Gifts (1964), and The Practice of Absence (1971). In recent years, Friend has identified himself as a gay poet.

Gene Frumkin (b. 1928) was born in New York and graduated from the University of California at Los Angeles. Frumkin was never a Communist but was closely associated with Tom McGrath, contributed to Masses and Mainstream, and was cofounder of the left-wing literary journal Coastlines in 1955, serving as poetry editor until 1958. His books include The Hawk and the Lizard (1953), The Orange Tree (1964), and The Rainbow Walker (1971).

George Hitchcock (b. 1914) was a longtime Communist who became editor of Kayak in 1964. His work is strongly influenced by surrealism and his books include Poems and Prints (1962), Tactics of Survival and Other Poems (1964), and The Dolphin with the Revolver in Its Teeth (1967).

A gay poet with a background, like Robert Friend's, in the Brooklyn College Left is Chester Kallman (1921–1975). Kallman was the companion of W. H. Auden for thirty-four years; in fact, they met at a 6 April 1939 gathering of the Communist-led League of American Writers. Kallman's poems were later published as Absent and Present (1963).

Audre Lorde (1934–1992), African American poet and a lesbian, was a member of the Communist youth group the Labor Youth League in the 1950s. Her books include The New York Head Shop and Museum (1974), Coal (1976), The Black Unicorn (1978), and Our Dead behind Us (1986).

Eve Merriam (1916–1992), closely associated with Communist organizations and publications in the late 1940s and early 1950s, became the highly successful author of adult and juvenile poetry. Her adult poetry includes Family Circle (1946), Tomorrow Morning (1953), Montgomery, Alabama, Money, Mississippi and Other Places (1957), The Double Bed: From the Feminine Side (1958), The Inner City Mother Goose (1969), and The Nixon Poems (1970). Her writing was sharply critical of sexism, as well as especially effective at combining witty wordplay with social commentary.

The early verse of Martha Millet (b. 1919) appeared in the Young Pioneer in the 1930s, and she later contributed to Masses and Mainstream. Her books are Thine Alabaster Cities (1952), a long dramatic poem, and Dangerous Jack: A Fantasy in Verse (1953).

A famous Beat gay poet, Harold Norse (b. 1916) records some of his Communist activities as a Brooklyn College student in Memoirs of a Bastard Angel: A Fifty-Year Literary and Erotic Odyssey (1989). His first collection of poetry, The Undersea Mountain, appeared in 1953.

Naomi Replansky (b. 1918) appeared in Communist and other publications in the 1940s. Aggressively championed by Thomas McGrath, she published Ring Song in 1952 and The Dangerous World in 1995.

The Communist poet most active in bringing the traditions of the Old Left into interaction with the burgeoning New Left of the 1960s was Walter Lowenfels (1897–1976). Starting in the mid-1950s he declared himself the heir of Walt Whitman and by the early 1960s was making an impact as an early advocate of multiculturalism and the scourge of literary anthologists who excluded African American poets.

Lowenfels was born in New York, the son of a successful wholesale dealer in butter. In 1926 he went to Paris, becoming friends with Michael Fraenkel, Anaïs Nin, and Henry Miller. He published in Transition and brought out a series of short books including Episodes and Epistles (1925), Finale of Seem: A Lyrical Narrative (1929), Apollinaire: An Elegy (1930), Elegy for D. H. Lawrence (1932), The Suicide (1934), and Some Deaths (1934). After returning to the United States and becoming radicalized, Lowenfels published Steel (1937), in which he applied techniques of his Paris period to events such as the Spanish Civil War and the drive by the Congress of Industrial Organizations to organize Little Steel.

In 1939, Lowenfels ended his career as a poet and briefly tried to support his family in the butter business. However, at age forty he reversed course and joined the Communist Party, remaining a member for the rest of his life. Starting in 1940, he worked for the Daily Worker in Philadelphia. In 1953, he was arrested, jailed, tried, and sentenced to two years in prison under the Smith Act. However, higher courts overturned the decision due to lack of evidence. In the meantime, at age fifty-four, Lowenfels returned to poetry, developing a writing style that seemed to embody a transcendentalist perspective on the world; his task became to decode the physical reality by reaching to what he called "Reality Prime."

Books of this latter period include Sonnets of Love and Liberty (1955), American Voices (1959), Some Deaths: Selected Poems, 1929–1962 (1964), To an Imaginary Daughter (1964), Land of Roseberries (1965), Translations from Scorpius (1966), We Are All Poets, Really (1967), Thou Shalt Not Overkill: Walter Lowenfels' Peace Poems (1968), The Portable Walter: From the Prose and Poetry of Walter Lowenfels (1968), Found Poems and Others (1972), and The Revolution Is to Be Human (1973). Perhaps Lowenfels's greatest impact was in his remarkable literary anthologies that managed to combine works of the older generations of Left poets with younger voices, especially writers of color. These include Poets of Today (1966), Where Is Vietnam?: American Poets Respond (1967), In a Time of Revolution: Poems from Our Third World (1969), The Writing on the Wall: 108 American Poems of Protest (1969), From the Belly of the Shark (1973), and For Neruda, for Chile: An International Anthology (1973).

Despite Lowenfels's efforts, the older tradition decisively fragmented and dispersed. This is due more to the collapse of an organized Left than a decline in the radical and revolutionary impulse among U.S. poets.

[See also Bulosan, Carlos; Gold, Michael; Hughes, Langston; John Reed Clubs; Mainstream; Masses; McGrath, Tom; McKay, Claude; New Left Literature; Poetry, 1870–1930; Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s; Radical Filmmaking, 1930s; Sandburg, Carl; Wright, Richard.]

FURTHER READING

- Folsom, Franklin. Days of Anger, Days of Hope: A Memoir of the League of American Writers, 1937–1942. Niwot: University Press of Colorado, 1944.
- Kalaidjian, Walter. American Culture between the Wars: Revisionary Modernism and Postmodern Critique. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.
- Nelson, Cary. Repression and Recovery: Modern American Poetry and the Politics of Cultural Memory. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989.
- Wald, Alan. The Revolutionary Imagination: The Poetry and Politics of John Wheelwright and Sherry Mangan. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1983.
- Wald, Alan. Writing from the Left. London: Verso, 1994.

—ALAN WALD

RADICAL PROFESSIONAL AND ACADEMIC JOURNALS. One of the most lasting expressions of the radicalism of the 1960s is the way in which almost every academic discipline, profession, and major labor and interest group created journals of opinion that voiced the spirit of dissent and social change that informed the movement. In contrast to underground newspapers, which flourished most at the height of the anti-war movement and then either disappeared or were transformed in some way, many of these journals survived, and by the late 1980s were celebrating their twentieth anniversaries with special issues. Science for the People, the Radical Teacher, the Insurgent Sociologist, Issues in Radical Therapy, the Conspiracy, Madness Network News, Sipapu, the Radical Philosopher's Newsjournal, and Radical History Review are just some of the titles that provided an antidote to the official organs of organized disciplines. Nourished by new insights gained from a resurgent Left, academics, professionals, and to a great extent their traditional target groups, students and "clients," designed the landscape of serious periodical literature.

Beginning its twentieth year, Science for the People (Boston), reflected on its history: "SftP has been a vehicle for antiwar analysis and activity since its inception. Conceived in the struggle against U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War by an organization then called SESP—Scientists and Engineers for Social and Political Action—SftP continues to challenge military applications of science and technology." Two aspects of the history of this journal apply to the history of most of these journals: first, the concept of scientists and engineers working together in spite of the traditional professional haughtiness of the pure scientist; second, the idea of connectedness—that "professional" life was not something separate and apart from the rest of one's life, that the consequences of one's work were a matter of personal moral and political responsibility.

The notion of a holistic approach to one's life may be the most common bond between these academic radicals. The sociologists put it this way: "Radical sociology is whatever radical sociologists do—whether activism, research, teaching, organizing—when, and only when, these activities are not divorced from one another." A newsletter put out by the Sociology Liberation Movement/Union of Radical Sociology at Berkeley, the Insurgent Sociologist called at first for a radical counterconvention to the 1969 meeting of the American Sociological Association. The Insurgent Sociologist quickly broadened its scope to issues outside of academic politics by proposing a five-part agenda: (1) aiding movements of welfare recipients; (2) exposing counterinsurgency research and power structures; (3) exposing and reforming the American sociological establishment; (4) defending teaching jobs of radicals; (5) struggling against bourgeois hegemony and orienting research to the needs of ongoing movements. Eventually the journal changed from a newsletter to a journal, shed its former activist stance, and changed its title to Critical Sociology (Department of Sociology, University of Oregon) in the spring of 1988.

As it has done for radicals in the United States for at least a century, the existence of a journal made real for many the existence of a movement. Those who studied religion and who came out of the experience of the Berkeley Free Church asserted that "existing institutions are insufficient to develop a new radical vision or meet the bankruptcy of our liberal society. Presently there does not exist in the United States a radical scholarly journal within the disciplines associated with religion. This explains, in part, why the religious Left remains unfocused and ineffectual." Radical Religion was founded in Berkeley in the winter of 1973, just after the radical philosophers of Boston put together the first issue of the Radical Philosophers' Newsjournal. The group behind the latter effort "all shared a clear sense of dissatisfaction both with present academic philosophy and with society at large." In common with many radical academics, the philosophers shared an interest in Marx, felt the irrelevancy of mainstream thought in their field—at the time, analytic philosophy—and hoped to make their discipline serve nonacademic purposes. Also in common with other such ventures, the journal served as the basis for discussion groups that sprang up around the country.

Historians in America participated in the movement of the 1960s with at least five major journals, with the last three still publishing in the late 1980s: Studies on the Left, Marxist Perspectives, Radical America, Socialist Revolution (now Socialist Review), and the Radical History Review. The Radical History Review began, like the Insurgent Sociologist, as a newsletter, the MARHO Newsletter (Mid-Atlantic Radical Historians' Organization), first published in 1973 in New York. The editors reflected on the change from an activist newsletter to a scholarly journal this way in 1977: "The growth of the Review reflects the emergence of a new generation of Marxist historians in the United States, politically awakened in the 1960s. . . . The collapse of the student based movement of the sixties, and the failure of its strategic vision, left many people on the Left in despair, but inspired in others a mood of introspection, a hunger to analyze the development of a society which seemed so unjust yet resistant to basic change." The review thus became the outlet for a critique of American society based in a Marxist framework. Socialist Revolution interested itself in more contemporary problems than the Radical History Review did, and also attracted a circle of Left academics beyond the historical profession. In many ways, it continued the work of Studies on the Left, which for seven years beginning in 1959 was the precursor of much New Left thought and whose editorial board members resurfaced in many other Left radical journals. According to an obituary written by one of the editors, "Studies made its contribution to the thinking of the new radicals in two areas. (1) It identified welfare state liberalism as the political ideology of the large corporation throughout this century, and, therefore, as the dominant political ideology in the United States. (2) It began the process of orienting socialist thought toward the problem of building a post-industrial socialism." Radical America, originally an outgrowth of the Radical Education Project of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), was centered in the history department at the University of Wisconsin, which nurtured many of the graduate students who continued to play an active role in Left academic life in the late 1980s. Originally subtitled "An SDS Journal of the History of American Radicalism," it, too, along with Socialist Review, broadened its editorial board to include nonhistorians, and it publishes a mix of contemporary and historical articles.

Radical professional journals in other academic disciplines tended to cluster around area studies, most notably among economists, anthropologists, and political scientists. NACLA: Report on the Americas was founded in 1966 as a newsletter, and began NACLA's Latin American and Empire Report in 1971 before taking its current form in the mid-seventies. Published by the North American Congress on Latin America, it consistently exposes North American involvement in the political and economic life of Latin America. MERIP Reports, the publication of the Middle East Research and Information Project, does the same for the Middle East, and the Bulletin of Concerned Asian Scholars for its area. Overall, these radical journals have succeeded in creating and redefining what is possible for academics in the United States, yet these journals and the people who work in them had more direct influence on the general intellectual debate in America than they have had in the world of practical politics.

[See also American Studies; Anthropology; European Studies; Latin American Studies; North American Congress on Latin America; Sociology.]

—ELLIOTT SHORE

RAILROAD STRIKE OF 1877. The first national strike wave with wide socialist participation, and the only occasion for a revolutionary municipal commune-style government, the 1877, "reign of the rabble" invited comparisons with the Paris Commune, still fresh in the public mind, and tested Left theories of labor insurrection. By and large, it found socialists too few in number and too little integrated into U.S. working-class life for a major, sustained reorientation.

Throughout the bitter depression of the 1870s, drastic reductions in wages had set off local labor insurgencies, frequently supported by the community at large, in particular those directed at unpopular railroad giants such as Jay Gould. Armies of unemployed rose to perhaps five million, with soup kitchens providing an inadequate sustenance in major cities. Unions, drastically reduced in strength, played no major role in rallying the discontented. Instead, the more or less spontaneous actions of railroad trainmen resisting repeated wage cuts—first of all in Martinsburg, West Virginia, 17 July, then spreading to Baltimore and Pittsburgh by 20 July—prompted committees of railroad workers, vaguely connected between cities, to coordinate public response.

In Baltimore and in Pittsburgh, local crowds rioted against the railroad barons by burning freight yards and seizing food and other commerce off the boxcars. In New York, Chicago, and in many other places, strikes spread from trade to trade, encompassing the labor organizations that existed. From railroad line to railroad line, as far west as San Francisco and neglecting only much of New England and the South, the action spread. Socialists provided public oratory, printed strike literature (more in German than in English), gathered the meager financial aid available, and urged strikers to draw the logical conclusions to their instinctive actions. After nearly a week of bloody battles with police and militia (often drawn, purposefully, from out of town), the upsurge generally receded.

The strike in Saint Louis and East Saint Louis followed a more complex course. The latter, together with Saint Louis an important national railroad center, had as its leading official a labor-supported mayor (and indeed, a former "Forty-Eighter" who had briefly involved himself in revolutionary conspiracy before arriving in America and into respectability) determined to keep the peace by turning over the policing of property to the strikers themselves. After a few days, strikers led by young women (possibly members of the Women's Branch of the Workingmen's Party, whose existence had been noted some months before) paraded under banners reading "We Want a Peaceful Revolution" and "We Are Not Slaves, Nor Ever Will Be." No effort was made until the end to challenge their supremacy in the small industrial town.

In Saint Louis proper, railroad strikers met under the auspices of the local Workingmen's Party, which included at least one veteran of the First International, a vigorous group of German Americans, and a handful of articulate American-born intellectuals. Spreading from trade to trade, the strike found its coordination at Workingmen's Party headquarters. Strikers and their sympathizers meanwhile marched by the thousands, convincing many among the wealthy classes that the insurrection had begun.

Socialists, at the head of the strike's executive committee, declared it to be general in the city. It was described by its outstanding scholar as "one of the first strikes anywhere in the world to paralyze a major industrial city; and without doubt . . . the first general strike of the modern, industrial labor movement in the United States." An especially important moment took place when black deckhands and firemen on steam barges joined the strike; socialists, themselves uneasy about the significance, clearly missed their major opportunity to join hands and make the most of what the New York Sun called a "novel feature of the times." Nevertheless, that same day, the red flag rose over many spots in the city. And the executive committee de facto replaced the regular political government for several days.

Revolutionary Saint Louis, in the vacuum of a nation successfully repressing the strike, could not survive politically. Regiments of the U.S. Army, freed by the corrupt "Compromise of 1877" from long-term duty in the South defending blacks, marched through Saint Louis and East Saint Louis, reestablishing bourgeois order. A general arrest of strike leaders followed, notwithstanding a virtual absence of looting or rioting on the lines of Pittsburgh (and notwithstanding frequent journalistic claims of "communist" intent to loot and burn civilization).

In Saint Louis, as in many other cities with German American blue-collar populations, the next few local elections saw a sharp rise of socialist fortunes and the establishment of an English-language socialist press. Both these successes were short-lived. Of the Saint Louis Commune's leaders, one went on to become the most noted analytic popularizer of socialism in the American nineteenth century: Laurence Gronlund, whose Cooperative Commonwealth (1884), with its Fabian-style argument for state socialism, influenced a precocious generation of American-born socialists. Another Saint Louis leader, Albert Currlin, assumed the editorship of the Chicago Arbeiter-Zeitung after the 1886 arrest of the entire staff.

[See also Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

Brecher, Jeremy. Strike! San Francisco: Straight Arrow Press, 1972.

Burbank, David. Reign of the Rabble: The St. Louis General Strike of 1877. New York: Augustus M. Kelley, 1966.

—PAUL BUHLE

RAMPARTS. The preeminent popular journal of the New Left era of the 1960s and early 1970s, Ramparts—although plagued with financial problems and a chaotic publishing history—nonetheless managed to print many of the most significant articles of the decade. Most notably, Ramparts exposed the Cold War and Vietnam War policies of the U.S. government—insights often sandwiched between colorful ads for Day-Glo posters or psychedelic music. The glossy paper, provocative covers, vivid graphics, and high-profile publicity efforts attracted the attention of the mainstream media, young people just being introduced to the Left, politicians afraid of the Left, and the core activists of Left movements.

Founded in 1962 as a liberal Catholic quarterly, the San Francisco Bay area-based magazine had four thousand subscribers in 1964. With the rise of the New Left and the editorship of young, brash, flamboyant, and publicity-seeking Warren Hinckle III, from 1965 to 1968 subscriptions to the now-monthly Ramparts soared to perhaps 250,000. Debts and bitterness among Ramparts' founders and financial backers also soared out of control. By 1969 paid circulation had fallen to 125,000, and slid gradually to fifty thousand when Ramparts folded in 1975.

The most influential Ramparts stories were often exposés. In one spectacular instance, the magazine uncovered ties between Michigan State University academics and South Vietnam's murderous Diem regime; in another it revealed the Central Intelligence Agency's covert funding of and influence on the National Student Association. Ramparts also carried many dramatic anti-war features, from Tom Hayden's and Noam Chomsky's essays to the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, masterful critique of U.S. foreign policy (he credited his own compulsion to go public on Vietnam to his viewing of Ramparts' photo essay about the war's effects on Vietnamese children), to exposure of U.S. intelligence connections with Southeast Asia's drug trade. The first English-language publisher of Che Guevara's diary from Bolivia, Ramparts also boosted the Black Panther Party, documented mistreatment of Native Americans, and focused attention on environmental dangers. While in its early days overwhelmingly "male" in style and substance, Ramparts began in 1969 to run major feminist features and, soon after, publicized gay liberation.

Ramparts' criticisms of Israeli occupation policies—while balanced by careful support of Israel's existence—provoked the withdrawal of major funder and later New Republic owner and aggressive Cold Warrior Martin Peretz. Other Ramparts figures shifting rightward included Eldridge Cleaver, David Horowitz (leading Ramparts figure for a few years), and Peter Collier. More typically, Robert Scheer, Andrew Kopkind, Alexander Cockburn, James Ridgeway, Derek Shearer, Edward Sorel, and others became leading progressive commentators elsewhere after the magazine's demise.

Financial supporter and editor Adam Hochschild—a leading figure in a split within Ramparts' inner circle—went on in 1976 to found Mother Jones magazine, which can be viewed as Ramparts' most enduring journalistic legacy. Also based in the Bay Area but self-consciously more mainstream and upscale, Mother Jones has also featured much dramatic exposé journalism on the environment and other issues. Another notable feature, rooted less in the Ramparts experience, has been the leading role of feminist intellectuals on its editorial board and among its writers. Its circulation has reached 200,000.

[See also New Left.]

FURTHER READING

Browning, Frank. "The Strange Journey of David Horowitz." Mother Jones 12 (May 1987).

Hinkle, Warren. If You Have a Lemon, Make Lemonade. New York: G.P. Putnam's Sons, 1974.

Ridgeway, James. "The Ramparts Story: . . . Um, Very Interesting." New York Times Magazine, 20 April 1969.

—ROBERT SHAFFER

RANDOLPH, A. PHILIP (1889–1979). The youngest son of an impoverished Florida preacher deeply involved in racial politics, Asa Philip Randolph became the most effective black trade unionist in the United States. In high school, he revealed his flair for political oratory as well as the impeccable dress and diction that led some to think he was a "Cambridge man." Introduced at home to the debates between W. E. B. Du Bois and Booker T. Washington, he publicly identified himself with Du Bois's vision of "the talented tenth," rejected the accommodationist policies associated with "the Tuskegee Machine," and declared himself a "racial radical" in favor of social equality. These views make Randolph's migration to Harlem in 1911, his rejection of the ministry, and his conversion to socialism seem inevitable. Still, he sympathized with Washington's down-to-earth, matter-of-fact approach to organization, his emphasis on industrial wages as a key to black development, and his separatist approach to achieving equality.

Although he wanted to act, Randolph had more theatrical success in the sectarian debates at City College of New York (1911–1917) and as a street orator in Harlem. He organized support for the strikers in Paterson, New Jersey, and Lawrence, Massachusetts, led black opposition to World War I (which Du Bois supported), and joined Marcus Garvey, whom he later opposed bitterly, in demands for the Versailles peace negotiations through the International League of Darker Peoples. Garnering twenty-five percent of the Harlem vote for Socialist Morris Hillquit in 1917, Randolph himself got 200,000 votes as the Socialist Party candidate for state comptroller in 1920. Dubbed "the black Lenin" and "the most dangerous black in America" by Attorney General Mitchell Palmer, Randolph was arrested for anti-war activism, but not prosecuted. He remained a pacifist throughout his life, though he advocated self-defense in response to the "red summer" race riots in 1919 and broke with the Socialist Party and the Non-Partisan League over their opposition to World War II.

With his partner, sociologist Chandler Owen, Randolph helped form a number of short-lived political, labor, and community organizations. Their most significant accomplishment was editing the Messenger, a magazine that alternately represented Harlem radicals (including Jamaican nationalists), the Harlem Renaissance (in the early twenties), and, finally, the Pullman porters. In its upbeat combination of culture with politics, its sympathies for the Industrial Workers of the World, its semiofficial status as an organ of the Socialist Party, and particularly its opposition to the war, the Messenger closely resembled the Liberator (later the New Masses), though the journals appear to have had little contact.

Because of the Socialist Party's inaction on the Negro problem, Randolph withdrew from the party in the early twenties. After a number of false starts with other unions, he accepted an invitation to organize the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters (BSCP) in 1925.

Fighting against Pullman's company union, widespread intimidation, and much of the black press, Randolph built a national organizing committee from current and former porters, including Ashley Totten in New York, Bennie Smith in Detroit, Milton P. Webster from Chicago, C. L. Dellums from Oakland, and E. J. Bradley of Saint Louis. His strategy was to use clandestine organizing and public and governmental pressure to force Pullman to recognize the union and improve working conditions, issues he felt were as important as wages.

When the BSCP failed to carry out a threatened strike in 1926, membership plummeted by almost ninety percent and, soon after, labor historians Sterling Spero and Abram Harris announced the union had collapsed. However, in 1935, largely due to New Deal labor legislation Randolph helped to write, the BSCP won the first nationwide election under the new Labor Relations Board, eight to one. Pullman signed its first union contract in 1937, reducing working hours from 400 to 240 a month, and union membership jumped to nearly fifteen thousand.

Randolph remained an independent socialist within and outside the official labor movement. Ironically, the American Federation of Labor recognized the BSCP only after the Pullman success. Gompers blamed blacks for union racism (a position echoed by Randolph's colleague Bayard Rustin in the 1960s); and the railway unions, so radical in other respects, steadfastly opposed including blacks. Randolph fought unsuccessfully against the color barriers in the American Federation of Labor throughout the thirties and, as late as 1961, he was personally censured by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (which included David Dubinsky, Joe Curran, and James Carey) for "causing the gap that has developed between organized labor and the Negro community." Randolph was a constant critic of Communist influence in the labor movement. Despite this, he headed several important United Front organizations, including the 1.2-million-member National Negro Congress.

Randolph's national prominence grew when, in response to his threat to bring 100,000 Negroes to Washington in 1941, Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802, ending segregation in defense industries. In 1947, this time by threatening a national campaign of civil disobedience against the draft, Randolph helped evoke Truman's Executive Order 9981, ending discrimination in the military.

As the elder statesman for an activist (and separatist) approach to civil rights during the sixties, Randolph was frequently asked to mediate disputes between warring factions. He helped bring the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., into the 1957 Prayer Pilgrimage to Washington, supported the Youth Marches for Integrated Schools (1957-1958) and helped, along with Rustin and the A. Philip Randolph Institute, to initiate and coordinate the 1963 March on Washington. Randolph (and the institute) were harshly criticized for supporting the United Federation of Teachers during the 1968 teachers' strike and for their negative views of the riots, black power, black capitalism, and black anti-Semitism. Despite this, however, Randolph remains the only American socialist to have achieved prominence in both the black and trade union communities.

[See also Civil Rights Movement; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Anderson, Jervis. A. Philip Randolph: A Biographical Portrait. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.
- Harris, William H. Keeping the Faith: A. Philip Randolph, Milton P. Webster, and the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, 1925-1937. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.

Pfeffer, Paula F. A. Philip Randolph: Pioneer of the Civil Rights Movement. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1996.

Wilson, Joseph F. Tearing Down the Color Bar: A Documentary History and Analysis of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.

—EVAN STARK

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE.

Founded in 1906, the Rand School of Social Science was the first major workers' school, and it survived the longest. (Ruskin College at Trenton, Missouri, had been founded in 1900 but failed shortly thereafter.) Initially begun as a workers' school under the leadership of the Socialist Party, the Rand School, although it continued to remain committed to a socialist philosophy of education, evolved into an adult-education institution whose offerings were similar to a number of other programs in the city. Its most distinguished administrator, Algernon Lee (1873–1954), a moderate Socialist and member of the New York City Board of Aldermen from 1918 to 1922, headed the school for more than forty years after 1909.

In 1901 a group of socialists including Morris Hillquit, Charles Beard, William Ghent, and George Herron had formed the American Socialist Society (ASS) for the express purpose of founding an institution of workers' education. Herron's mother-in-law, Carrie Sherfey Rand, a wealthy widow from Des Moines, Iowa, was a former abolitionist with radical views. Her bequest of the income from $200,000, amounting to $5,000 to $6,000 annually, made it possible to establish the Rand School.

The school opened in the fall of 1906 with ninety students on East Nineteenth Street in Manhattan. Over the next fifty years the school offered courses to working men and women on a variety of cultural and current topics and socialist theory. Teachers included the intellectual leaders of the socialist movement, social pragmatists from the working world and the trade union movement, and such distinguished luminaries as Scott Nearing, Charles Beard, James Harvey Robinson, Stephen Vincent Benét, Bertrand Russell, and John Dewey.

By 1917 the school had outgrown its quarters and purchased a six-story building off Union Square at 7 East Fifteenth Street vacated by the Young Women's Christian Association. The building had an auditorium and spacious classrooms, and its extra space was rented to sympathetic organizations. The "People's House," modeled after a center in Brussels, Belgium, was to become the cultural and educational center for the Socialist movement in New York. The school's educational offerings and programs included a six month full-time residential program, a two-year part-time program for employed workers, a summer session for out-of-townners, a correspondence course, and a labor research department, as well as a library, bookstore, gymnasium, and cafeteria. Courses in the period from 1906 to 1922 pertained to socialist theory, economics, American history, literature, and other traditional subjects.

The antiradical hysteria after World War I subjected the school to a series of police interference and mob attacks. In 1919 the New York State Legislature voted Senator Clayton Lusk (Lusk Committee) $50,000 to investigate "subversive activities." Earlier attacks had included an indictment under the Espionage Act of the ASS and Scott Nearing for his anti-war pamphlet The Great Madness, published by the Rand School. The Lusk Committee conducted a raid on the offices, confiscated property, and attempted to close the school by court-ordered injunction. Through a series of court cases the school was able to successfully counter the attacks. Meanwhile the 1919 split in the Socialist Party led to the disappearance of staff and lecturers sympathetic to the Russian Revolution, and the control of the school was left firmly in the hands of the right-wing Socialists. Government harassment disappeared when Al Smith came into gubernatorial office in 1922, and the school was never again subjected to outside interference.

The Rand School entered into a period of expanded course offerings and special educational programs, and student enrollment increased. The curriculum shifted from socialist instruction to a wide range of courses in the areas of trade union policies, education, home economics, music, art, Russian studies, peace education, propaganda and public opinion, psychology, public speaking, and social work. Although it increasingly catered to a large group whose interest was predominantly in liberal education, the administration of the school was committed to offering socialist theory.

Once the Rand trust funds were exhausted the school survived financially through various means, partly supported by the bookstore, Rand School Press, and donations from the Garland Fund and private sources. But the cost of operations perennially exceeded the school's assets. Bertha Howell Mailly, executive secretary from 1912 until her retirement in 1941, is credited with saving the school on many occasions by launching countless fund-raising campaigns, including bazaars, dances, and concerts. In 1919 Mailly visited Unity House, a resort owned by a local of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union in Bushkill, Pennsylvania. Learning of an adjacent tract of land for sale, she conceived the idea of extending the Rand School to a workers' summer school and camp. Camp Tamiment, named after an old Indian name for the area, grew to become commercially successful and from 1936 to 1956 provided backing to keep the school afloat. A large part of the camp's success was due to the fact that it had tax-exempt status based on its educational and cultural programs.

By the 1950s the government could no longer overlook what had become one of the largest, most modern, and most profitable resorts in the area. The camp decided that acquiring the title to the school's library would ensure a continued tax exemption. A five-year struggle ensued, during which time the camp systematically withdrew financial support from the school. In 1956 the People's Educational Camp Society (PECS) acquired title and full ownership of the Rand School and the Meyer London Memorial Library and Reading Room. It dissolved the school and integrated its educational and cultural activities into the Tamiment Institute. After several appeals, in February 1963 the PECS lost its tax case with the Internal Revenue Service. Camp Tamiment was sold, and the library, all that remained of the old Rand School, now renamed the Tamiment Institute Library, was given to New York University Libraries.

During the height of its success between 1910 and 1920, the Rand School enrolled approximately five thousand students annually. In 1946 thirteen thousand students attended classes and lectures, but shortly thereafter the school suffered a sharp decrease in both enrollment and course offerings.

What remains of the Rand School of significance for the Left is the library. Its extensive collections of socialist and trade union literature, pamphlets, newspapers and periodicals, manuscripts, iconography, and ephemera are open to all. Recent special projects include the Robert F. Wagner Labor Archives, which collects and inventories labor union records, and the Oral History of the American Left.

[See also Dewey, John; Hillquit, Morris; Socialist Party; Workers Schools.]

FURTHER READING

Cornell, Frederic. "A History of the Rand School of Social Science, 1906 to 1956." Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 1976.

Rand School of Social Sciences. Papers. Tamiment Institute Library, New York University.

Schwartz, Rachel Cutler. "The Rand School of Social Science, 1906-1924: A Study of Worker Education in the Socialist Era." Ph.D. diss., State University of New York at Buffalo, 1984.

Swanson, Dorothy. Guide to the Manuscript Collection of the Tamiment Library. New York: Garland, 1977.

Swanson, Dorothy. "The Tamiment Institute/Ben Josephson Library and Robert F. Wagner Labor Archive at New York University." Library Quarterly (April 1989).

—DOROTHY SWANSON

RAPP-COUDERT INQUIRY. Significant as a rehearsal for McCarthyism, the anticommunist Rapp-Coudert inquiry and purge of 1940-1941 was undertaken by the New York State Legislature at the time of the Nazi-Soviet Pact. This was not a period when significant numbers abandoned the American Communist Party but rather when alliances between liberals and Communists weakened, leaving Communists vulnerable to attack by several branches of the governmental apparatus. The target of Rapp-Coudert was the New York City schools, reputed to be hotbeds of leftist agitation. The upstate, antimetropolis component of this attack was personally represented by the small-town Genesee County politician Herbert Rapp. The sophisticated New York City component was represented by the well-connected Manhattan lawyer Frederic R. Coudert, Jr. The Coudert thrust prevailed: the schools were investigated and purged, but no assault was made on the school budgets, so that Communists were in effect sacrificial victims for school systems.

The inquiry into Communism at the high school and elementary school levels in New York City was postponed while the municipal colleges—Queens, Hunter, and Brooklyn colleges, and that locus classicus of collegiate radicalism of the 1930s, City College of New York (CCNY)—were slated to be the initial targets of investigation. Faculty and staff informers were found on all campuses, mostly disaffected former Communists, such as Brooklyn College English professor Bernard Grebanier and CCNY history instructor Martin Canning. On the basis of their testimony, the Rapp-Coudert Committee subpoenaed dozens of municipal college faculty members for private and then public hearings, the results of which made front-page news in the New York City dailies.

In a manner that would later become institutionalized in the postwar McCarthy period, the governmental authorities merely identified Communists, leaving the task of disciplining them to their employers—in this case the New York City Board of Higher Education (BHE). In BHE trials, the suspected Communists were charged with “conduct unbecoming a teacher” for hiding their political affiliation, although the BHE made it clear that they would also fire those who admitted Party membership. This happened in the case of CCNY Party leader and English instructor Morris Schappes, who also served a prison term for perjury. At CCNY more than a dozen faculty and staff members were dismissed, while at the other municipal colleges, smaller groups were fired.

The Rapp-Coudert inquiry was abruptly halted when the Germans invaded the Soviet Union in mid-1941, but after World War II the purge of Communists picked up where it had left off. During the 1950s several more accused Communists were dismissed or resigned at Brooklyn College, while the Feinberg Law brought high school and elementary school teachers into a similar position.

The Rapp-Coudert Committee left an enduring legacy. Its research became the foundation for many of the McCarthy-era purges. Several committee staff members and friendly witnesses, such as Robert Morris and Martin Canning, resurfaced in later federal anticommunist investigating committees, and the precedent of Rapp-Coudert became part of the American anticommunist tradition. In the early 1980s the municipal colleges formally apologized to the surviving dismissed teachers and staff members but offered no financial remuneration for the careers blighted by the Rapp-Coudert purge.

[See also Communist Party, USA; McCarthyism.]

FURTHER READING

Published and unpublished (the latter in New York State Archives, Albany) reports of the Rapp-Coudert Committee.

Board of Higher Education trial transcripts. Board of Higher Education Archives, New York City.

Chamberlain, Lawrence H. Loyalty and Legislative Action. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1951.

Gettleman, Marvin E. “Anti-Communist Purges on Campus.” In These Times, 10–16 March 1982.

Iversen, Robert W. Communists and the Schools. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1959.

Schrecker, Ellen W. No Ivory Tower: McCarthyism and the Universities. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

—MARV GETTLEMAN

REALIGNMENT. While various political currents on the Left, including the Communist Party, have held similar strategies, the policy known as “realignment” came out of the Shachtmanite tendency and refers to making the Democratic Party, in effect, a European-style social democratic party. Like the Socialist Workers Party, both the Workers Party (1940–1949) and the Independent Socialist League (1949–1958), led by Max Shachtman, had denounced the Democratic Party as a capitalist party and urged workers and minorities to form their own labor party. Reluctantly, however, the Shachtmanites began to realize that the labor movement, including its rank-and-file and minority members, identified the Democratic Party as their own. Shachtman and his followers did not change their assessment of the Democratic Party and believed that labor was mistaken in trusting mainstream moderate-to-liberal Democrats to represent its interests. But so long as labor—which the Independent Socialist League saw as the only mass movement capable of building a socialist society—allied itself with the Democratic Party, the small socialist movement had no choice but to aid the labor movement in attempting to make the Democratic Party truly its own. In this way, labor might form a de facto labor party within the Democratic Party, or if faced with a clear betrayal of workers’ interests, it might begin an independent working-class party of its own.

In 1958, when they entered the Socialist Party, the Shachtmanites began to promote the policy of realignment. They envisioned the fall of city machines through development of a mass labor movement and a welfare state. They identified a key political task in expelling the southern racists from the Democratic Party. Once these two goals were met—according to realignment theory—labor, minorities, and middle-class progressives could form a coalition to take control of the Democratic Party, with the labor movement at its center. This perspective eventually came to dominate virtually all remaining socialist groups. [See also Shachtman, Max; Workers Party.]

FURTHER READING

Isserman, Maurice. If I Had a Hammer: The Death of the Old Left and the Birth of the New Left. New York: Basic Books, 1987.

—DAVID HACKER

RECONSTRUCTION. One of the most controversial and misunderstood eras in American history, Reconstruction began during the Civil War and ended in 1877. Traditionally portrayed by historians and in popular culture as a time when vindictive Radical Republicans fastened black supremacy upon the defeated Confederacy, producing an orgy of corruption and misgovernment, Reconstruction has come to be viewed by scholars as a laudable experiment in interracial democracy. During Reconstruction, for the first time in American history, the national government assumed the responsibility for defining and protecting Americans' civil rights, blacks were recognized as American citizens, and black men were given the right to vote and hold office. These were revolutionary changes in the nature of American democracy. Yet at the same time, blacks' quest for economic autonomy, symbolized by their desire for ownership of land, proved unsuccessful.

The Confederacy's defeat in 1865 placed Reconstruction at the center of the national political agenda and inaugurated a complex political and social struggle over the reuniting of the nation and the degree of freedom to be enjoyed by the former slaves. To African Americans, freedom meant autonomy from white control in every aspect of their lives. Throughout Reconstruction, former slaves as well as those blacks who had been free before the Civil War reunited families separated under slavery, withdrew from white-controlled churches to create independent black congregations, established schools, and sought the economic independence associated with landownership. In addition, blacks organized political meetings demanding the right to vote and equality before the law. These efforts to breathe substantive meaning into the promise of freedom did much to shape the political agenda of Reconstruction.

Most southern whites sought to retain as much as possible of the old order. Planters desired, above all, the maintenance of a readily-controlled labor force, and few white southerners of any class were willing to recognize blacks as equal citizens. During the period of Presidential Reconstruction, inaugurated in 1865 by Andrew Johnson, the white South was given a free hand in shaping local affairs. The new southern governments responded by passing the Black Codes, which sought to force blacks back to work on the plantations and severely limited their civil rights and economic opportunities.

To the victorious North, these measures suggested that the white South did not accept the reality of emancipation. By 1866, northern Republicans had turned against Johnson's policies. Most vocal in opposition were the Radical Republicans, led by Charles Sumner, senator from Massachusetts, and Thaddeus Stevens, congressman from Pennsylvania, both longtime proponents of the rights of African Americans. Drawing their support largely from small entrepreneurs and farmers in the rural North, Radical Republicans had, before the war, been the most outspoken opponents of slavery's expansion. During the conflict they pressed for emancipation and the arming of black troops. Now, they insisted that without equality before the law for blacks and suffrage for black men, there could be no lasting Reconstruction. Some, like Stevens, went even further, proposing that land belonging to the planter class be confiscated by the federal government and distributed in forty-acre plots to families of former slaves and white Unionists. Only this, Stevens insisted, would break the planters' power and create the economic conditions for political democracy in the South. Stevens's plan won wide support among the former slaves. But even among Radical Republicans only a handful favored it. Most deemed political equality for blacks more important than landownership, and shrank from the precedent that would be set by seizing the property of one class to distribute it to another. More moderate Republicans believed that once guaranteed the right to compete equally as free laborers in the economic marketplace, resourceful and diligent blacks would be able to save money and acquire property on their own.

This lack of concern for the economic plight of the former slaves was shared by the northern labor movement, which experienced a major revival in these years. Few white workers in the North appreciated that the former slaves' struggles for economic autonomy and political equality formed an integral part of the "labor question" in post-Civil War America. Traditionally, unions had excluded black workers from membership, viewing blacks mainly as low-wage competitors for jobs. While welcoming emancipation, organized labor made few efforts to incorporate the freed people into unions and had little sympathy for the Republican Party, with which nearly all blacks identified.

The economic revolution envisioned by Stevens never came close to accomplishment. But in 1866 and 1867, the political revolution of Reconstruction proceeded apace. Over Johnson's veto, Congress enacted the Civil Rights Act of 1866, spelling out the rights all American citizens were to enjoy regardless of race. Then, it approved the Fourteenth Amendment, prohibiting the states from denying any citizen the equal protection of the laws. These measures marked a fundamental change in the American political system, establishing the federal government, not the states, as the arbiter and protector of the rights of American citizens, and for the first time incorporating into the Constitution the principle that all citizens should enjoy equal rights regardless of race. Finally, in 1867, Congress provided that new governments, based on manhood suffrage, be established in the South. Three years later, in the Fifteenth Amendment, the right to vote for blacks was extended to the entire nation. Although it left the door open to suffrage restrictions not explicitly based on race—literacy tests, property qualifications, poll taxes—the Fifteenth Amendment marked the culmination of four decades of agitation on behalf of the slave. As late as 1868, only eight northern states had allowed black men to vote. "Nothing in all history," exclaimed veteran abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison, equaled "this wonderful, quiet, sudden transformation of four millions of human beings from . . . the auction-block to the ballot-box."

Granting the vote to black men marked a major expansion of American democracy, a repudiation of the racial definition of citizenship that had prevailed before the Civil War. But the fact that the Fourteenth Amendment for the first time added the word "male" to the Constitution (in a clause providing that a state that barred any group of men from voting would lose part of its congressional representation), and the Fifteenth allowed continued disenfranchisement on the basis of sex, alienated many supporters of women's rights. So too did Radical Republicans' insistence that Reconstruction was the "Negro's hour" and that agitation for women's suffrage would injure the prospects of equal rights for blacks. The result was a bitter split in the women's rights movement. Feminist leaders like Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony now repudiated the abolitionist and Radical allies with whom they had worked closely before and during the war. On the other hand, Lucy Stone, Abigail Kelley, and most black feminists supported the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments as indispensable, if partial, steps toward securing the results of the Civil War. Out of this debate would come two rival national associations for women's suffrage, which would not unite until the 1890s.

The Reconstruction Act of 1867 inaugurated the period of Radical Reconstruction, during which the Republican Party came to power throughout the South. Blacks formed the overwhelming majority of the Republican electorate, their votes supplemented by white newcomers from the North (dubbed "carpetbaggers" by the political enemies) and native white southerners, mostly Unionist small farmers (reviled by critics as "scalawags"). For the first time in American history, blacks occupied political offices ranging from members of Congress to justice of the peace. The Reconstruction governments profoundly altered traditions of southern government. They established the region's first public school systems, outlawed racial discrimination in public transportation and accommodations, and sought to attract railroads and industry to the South. But activist government meant higher taxes, which alienated many white southerners. More importantly, the majority of southern whites could not accept the idea of former slaves voting and holding office. Increasingly, Reconstruction's opponents turned to violence to weaken and overthrow the new governments. As the North's commitment to equal rights waned in the 1870s, the prospect of renewed federal intervention became increasingly remote. By 1877, the last Republican governments in the South had been replaced by Democratic regimes committed to a restoration of white supremacy.

The collapse of Reconstruction deeply affected the future course of American development. The South long remained a bastion of one-party Democratic rule under the control of a reactionary elite who used the same violence and fraud that had helped defeat Reconstruction to stifle internal dissent. The federal government stood by indifferently as the southern states effectively nullified the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments and, beginning in the 1890s, stripped African Americans of the right to vote. By the turn of the century, southern blacks found themselves enmeshed in a complex system of oppression, each of whose components—segregation, economic inequality, political disempowerment, and the pervasive threat of violence—reinforced the others. Although the black institutions created or strengthened after the Civil War—the family, church, and schools—survived the end of Reconstruction, southern governments fell far behind the rest of the nation in meeting their public responsibilities. Long into the twentieth century, the South would remain the nation's foremost economic problem, a region of low wages, stunted economic development, and widespread poverty. Not until the 1960s would the nation again attempt to come to terms with the political and social agenda of Radical Reconstruction.

FURTHER READING

- DuBois, W. E. B. Black Reconstruction in America. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1935.
- Foner, Eric. Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.
- Montgomery, David. Beyond Equality: Labor and the Radical Republicans. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1967.
- Trefousse, Hans L. The Radical Republicans. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1969.

—ERIC FONER

RED DIAPER BABY. The term red diaper baby has been used to label children of communist or socialist parents. In the 1920s, children of southern California Communist Party members used the phrase to refer derisively to their peers who acted as if birthright alone, not activism or theoretical knowledge, provided revolutionary credentials. In the early years of the New Left, the term was used to identify those who followed the Old Left, particularly the Communist Party. In the mid-1960s, the right-wing John Birch Society published a list of "red diaper babies" who were entering the University of California at Berkeley. This attempt at intimidation failed; the students used the list to create a support network.

A series of annual conferences begun in 1982 provided the first public discussion and collectively generated documentation of the "red diaper" experience. By the mid-1980s, the phrase had begun to appear in mainstream media, primarily in reviews of books and films about the American Left.

From New Pioneer, October 1932.

Shared values, worldview, and childhood experiences form a core "red diaper" experience. For example, red diaper babies describe growing up with a sense of difference, both specialness and fear; feeling part of an international community and yet isolated from the mainstream of their own country. Imbued with the dignity of cooperation, many red diaper babies describe conflicts over upward mobility and continuing efforts to balance personal contentment with political effectiveness. As adults, red diaper babies may or may not be political activists. Within families, siblings often differ in type and degree of activism and impact of the "red diaper" experience on their lives.

[See also Yiddish Left.]

FURTHER READING

- Chernin, Kim. In My Mother's House. New Haven, Conn.: Ticknor and Fields, 1983.
- Gornick, Vivian. The Romance of American Communism. New York: Basic Books, 1977.
- Kaplan, Judy, and Linn Shapiro, eds. Red Diapers: Growing Up in the Communist Left. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998.
- Kimmage, Ann. An Un-American Childhood. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996.

Meeropol, Robert, and Michael Meeropol. We Are Your Sons: The Legacy of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg. 2d ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

—LINN SHAPIRO

RED SCARE. The Palmer Raids and the "Red Scare" of the World War I era marked the most brutal, if not necessarily the most extensive and intensive, government and private persecution of radicals in U.S. history. Radical opposition to the war, and specifically American entry into the conflict, precipitated or permitted a wide-ranging legal and extralegal vigilantism. In the process, repression of labor, the labor or radical press, immigrant social and cultural institutions, and a range of other dissenting elements spread in a pattern. The federal government's marshaling of opinion, igniting war hysteria, guided the outcome.

The Espionage Act, passed in 1917, set one precedent by identifying treason or disloyalty with any effort to stir distrust in the nation's military machine. The Sedition Act, passed the following year, added to the dossier of punishable activity a whole range of acts heretofore considered merely unpatriotic. Other measures, directed at aliens, added a new set of provisos to the existing legislation on exclusion (or more to the point, deportation) of any alien anarchist, essentially subjecting immigrant radicals to guilt by association.

In part, the repressive legislation was aimed specifically at the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), which had been careful to pose its main opposition to capitalism in general rather than to the war in particular. The eagerness of western businessmen and conservative interests to rid themselves of Wobbly influence precipitated the War Department directives of 1917 to local army officials to protect public utilities and repress active sedition. In Washington and Montana, troops raided Wobbly headquarters, broke up meetings, took members hostage without charges, patrolled freight cars for migrant activists, and watched local industry to prevent any labor agitation. By 1920–1921, the War Department had likewise intervened widely with federal troops in Arizona and Montana copper camps, notwithstanding the end of the war.

Meanwhile, in 1917 the government had raided IWW headquarters in Chicago and across the nation, confiscating organizational records, office equipment, even buttons, stickers, and leaflets, purportedly for the purpose of demonstrating Wobbly criminality under the Selective Service and Espionage Acts. Encouraging state officials to similar acts, the federal government in effect sponsored wide-scale arrests and long prison sentences in Minnesota, California, and other states.

Regulations adopted in 1918 permitting the postmaster to prevent delivery of a publication or incoming mail to dangerous individuals opened a field day for a different style of prosecution. At his discretion, Postmaster Albert S. Burleson first confiscated selected issues of many Socialist publications, and then suspended their second-class mailing permits on the basis of missed issues. Rural Socialist papers, almost entirely dependent upon the mails, suffered the most from this measure, not more than ten percent of the 1916 rural papers surviving by 1920. Their intellectual lifeline gone, most rural Socialist branches—with leaders facing potential indictment for anti-war agitation—folded. For those Socialist papers that survived, a heavy price had been paid. A number of the most prominent, such as the Appeal to Reason or the Jewish Daily Forward, had muted their positions on the war, or (in the case of the Appeal, renamed New Appeal) actually shifted to a pro-Wilson policy until the war's end.

The immigrant Left papers, which could reach most of their readers on a newsstand basis, survived the best. But even here, the government intervened with peculiar venom. The publications most fractious within the Left, bent on a sectarian course of dividing radical forces, often mysteriously survived the censor's efforts. Those inclined to unified action toward some particular goal, whether strike support or anti-war activism, often suffered the most intensive persecution, such as repeated raiding and destruction of presses, attempts to deport large numbers of followers, and jailings without benefit of habeas corpus. The ferociously anti-war Italian immigrant supporters of Luigi Galleani and his anarchist paper, Cronaca Sovversiva, were deported wholesale in perhaps the most intensive case of selective repression.

Other manifestations of police-state action multiplied. In a few recorded cases, the government and its vigilante allies resorted to murder. The vigilante lynching and castration of IWW organizer Frank Little was one such case. In another, following a series of explosions on Wall Street, Galleani's chief assistant, brought in for questioning by the New York authorities, reportedly leaped out a window to his death. Far more often, the government proposed long jail sentences on a variety of charges ranging from sedition to "criminal syndicalism." The mass trial of IWW activists in Chicago in 1917 was only the most spectacular of many cases intended to place the radical and labor movements on the defensive, preoccupied with fighting for members' freedom rather than social transformation. Socialists who had long enjoyed a relative freedom of speech and assembly at the local level found themselves unable to use public places or even their own halls for meetings. State conventions (as in South Dakota) were broken up by troopers, speakers were banned on such bizarre grounds as local health ordinances, and in a number of cases agitators were beaten, kidnapped, and tarred and feathered by vigilantes.

Continual government raids on offices, purportedly in search of "evidence," completed the strategy. Some newspapers were raided repeatedly, while most faced the crisis of physical damage as well as stolen mailing lists and other records. In some cases, as that of the monthly magazine International Socialist Review, the damage wrought by raiding officers made continuation virtually impossible, eclipsing several of America's most prestigious dissenting publications.

These highly dubious procedures also created an unprecedented category of "political prisoners," heretofore limited to a relative few linked (actually or spuriously) to such violent acts as the Los Angeles Times bombing, but now expanded to include hundreds of victims prosecuted for their beliefs. The most notorious of these convicted criminals, Eugene V. Debs, ran for president in 1920 from his federal prison cell.

The Palmer Raids, following real and/or orchestrated bomb threats in January 1920, and deportation of a few thousand radical aliens, climaxed the government show of force. In part frustrated legally in its effort to deport large numbers, in part eager to respond to the temptation offered by avowedly pro-Bolshevik radicals, the Justice Department under A. Mitchell Palmer and the vastly expanded Bureau of Investigation (its "alien radical" division run by the promising young functionary J. Edgar Hoover) ran roughshod over legal niceties. Hoover's division had sent hundreds of its agents into radical organizations, often posing as ultraradicals inciting factional warfare. Now it prepared a massive dragnet with the arrest of ten thousand persons. The manner of the raids—historically famous in legal circles for the virtual absence of due process, the indiscriminate grounds for arrest, brutality, threats, and extorted confessions—drew widespread complaints from Congress and the press.

The Immigration Act of 1920, written in large part to correct gaps in the legal persecution of Palmer Raid victims, made aliens punishable for the first time simply for possessing literature or indicating support and sympathy rather than for carrying out teachings in some specific fashion. This most extreme act would rarely be brought into use. With the war ended and most radical-led labor initiatives defeated, the political will faded. Criminal syndicalism laws, enacted mostly by states, addressed specific threats perceived to profitable production; along with the National Guard, reconstituted state by state on a peacetime basis with the encouragement of the federal government, states had all the forces they needed to continue a pattern of repression into the 1920s and beyond.

[See also Haymarket Incident; McCarthyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Murray, Robert K. Red Scare: A Study in National Hysteria, 1919–1920. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1955.
- Preston, William, Jr. Aliens and Dissenters: Federal Suppression of Radicals, 1903–1933. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1963.
- Weinstein, James. The Decline of Socialism in America, 1912–1925. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1967.

—PAUL BUHLE

REED, JOHN (1887–1920). Born in Portland, Oregon, John Reed had a privileged childhood and an even more privileged education in preparatory school and at Harvard. Generally regarded as a playboy, Reed did not join the Socialist Club, whose president was Walter Lippmann. He settled in New York in 1910, became a contributor to the Masses, and turned into a symbol of the new freedom as understood in Greenwich Village. In 1913 Reed visited the strike of silk workers in Paterson, New Jersey. Moved by what he saw, he helped organize the "Strike Pageant" in Madison Square Garden with Bill Haywood, leader of the Industrial Workers of the World. In 1914 he traveled with the guerrilla forces of Pancho Villa. Insurgent Mexico (1914) was impressionistic and patchily written, but it impressed contemporaries as a new and vivid kind of war reporting. When the war broke out in Europe, Reed denounced it as "The Traders' War."

He was sent to Europe in 1914 and 1915 for the Metropolitan, but his The War in Eastern Europe (1916) lacked the personal involvement of his first book. American entry into the war in 1917, and the revolution in Russia, transformed Reed's life. He arrived in Petrograd in time to witness the Bolshevik seizure of power in October. Although he spoke little Russian, Reed followed events closely and collected documents that he brought back to the United States in April 1918. He quickly wrote Ten Days That Shook the World (1919), the first major account of the revolution to appear in America.

In political life, he achieved far less distinction. In August 1919, Reed and other irregular delegates were expelled from the Socialist Party convention in Chicago. The two competing left-wing parties, the Communist Party and Reed's Communist Labor Party (CLP), eventually merged in 1920 into the United Communist Party. By then Reed had returned to Russia for the Second Congress of the Communist International (Comintern), where his opposition to Zinoviev on the question of trying to work within the American Federation of Labor was defeated. Guilty of the "infantile disorder" of left-wing communism, Reed passionately argued that the industrial unionism of the Industrial Workers of the World was the only viable model for revolutionary action in America. He contracted typhus at a conference in Baku and died, exhausted and frustrated, on 17 October 1920. He was buried in the wall of the Kremlin.

The publication of manuscript Comintern documents in 1995 by Harvey Klehr and others has raised again the question of Reed's role in the "clandestine funding" of Communist activities in the United States. It has been known for more than half a century that Reed carried gems and cash on his aborted attempts in February and March 1920 to return to America (the items of "value" were confiscated by the Finnish police). Reed was, of course, not the first American to be asked to deliver funds for Russian purposes to the United States. Carl Sandburg carried a check for $10,000 for Santeri Nuorteva at the Russian Soviet Government Information Bureau in New York, opened in April 1918. In the absence of diplomatic, legal, or banking relations, the use of sympathizing foreign nationals like Sandburg and Reed was an obvious alternative.

Klehr's document (a handwritten internal memo, undated) records two disbursements in 1919: in July "America Kotliarov" was given "value" estimated to be worth 209,000 rubles, followed by 500,000 rubles to Khavkin in September. Who was this money for? A likely recipient was the Russian Soviet Government Information Bureau itself, heavily raided under state of New York warrants on 12 June, with papers seized and its work brought to a standstill.

The decision to form a Communist Party in the United States was first proposed by the language federations in Noviy Mir on 7 July. Among the most prominent opponents of the language federations was John Reed, who argued against an immediate break with the Socialist Party.

On 22 January 1920 Reed was given "value" of 1,008,000 rubles. Other sources have indicated that Reed carried 102 "small diamonds." Klehr and colleagues cite an estimate from a Russian source that the jewels were worth $1.5 million. The inflated value of the gems persuades Klehr that "an enormous sum" was supplied to the tiny American Communist movement. Did Russia in 1919, the "Year of Isolation" and international blockade, have such sums at its casual command? It did not. According to E. H. Carr, "Soviet Russia enjoyed no credit; nor were there in the shattered condition of the Soviet economy goods or materials in any substantial quantity available to export. The Soviet Government was prepared to pay for desperately needed imports in gold. None of the great banks of the world would, however, at this time accept Soviet gold, on the plea that it had been confiscated from former owners who might some day make good their claim to it" (The Bolshevik Revolution [1953] vol. 3, p. 162).

At the end of January 1920 an unidentified "Anderson" received "value" worth 1,011,000 rubles, also intended for the United States. Reed was in Russia as the "international delegate" of the minority on the Left Wing National Council who had formed the CLP. (Reed was not elected to the National Executive of the CLP.) His role in Moscow was thus to win recognition for the CLP against the language federations-dominated Communist Party.

Reed certainly had friends and allies on the Executive Committee of the Comintern, as well as enemies. It is possible that the decision to use him as a courier, which occurred a month before the Comintern ordered the amalgamation of the two American Communist parties, may have reflected internal tensions within the Comintern about the chaotic situation on the American Left. It is quite possible that Reed was carrying money for the use of his CLP allies (money which might have sustained the Voice of Labor, which he edited with Jim Larkin) in their struggle against the language federations. It has also been suspected (but not proven) that Reed's true identity was betrayed to the Finns by elements within the Comintern who opposed the CLP. The obvious candidate was Zinoviev, who repeatedly clashed with Reed at the second Congress of the Comintern, which met at Petrograd and Moscow that summer. The interpretation of Klehr's document, in other words, is very much a matter for historical speculation.

[See also Greenwich Village; Liberator; Masses.]

FURTHER READING

Homberger, Eric. American Writers and Radical Politics, 1900–1939: Equivocal Commitments. London: Macmillan, 1986.

Homberger, Eric, with John Biggart, eds. John Reed and the Russian Revolution: Uncollected Articles, Letters and Speeches on Russia, 1917–1920. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.

Klehr, Harvey, John Earl Haynes, and Fridrikh Igorevich Firsov. The Secret World of American Communism. Russian documents translated by Timothy D. Sergay. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.

Rosenstone, Robert A. Romantic Revolutionary: A Biography of John Reed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1975.

—ERIC HOMBERGER

REED, JOHN, CLUBS. See John Reed Clubs.

REGROUPMENT. Following the Khrushchev revelations of 1956, several leaders of the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) concluded that former Communists and parts of the Communist Party periphery might be interested in exploring the ideas of Leon Trotsky and of the opposition to Stalinism that the SWP embodied. A reorganized and broader Left than any presently in existence, some disaffiliated radicals outside the SWP hoped, might take root. The result, "regroupment," took place on three fronts.

Major effort went into an electoral campaign by the Independent Socialist Party (ISP) in New York State in 1958, which allowed an unprecedented cooperation of Trotskyists and former supporters of the Popular and United fronts. The state ticket included Jack McManus, editor of the National Guardian, as gubernatorial candidate; Annette T. Rubinstein, longtime Marxist educator and political aide of radical New York City congressman Vito Marcantonio, for lieutenant-governor; and civil rights fighter Captain Hugh Mulzac, First Amendment defendant, for senator. Successful in gaining ballot status and in bringing together former adversaries, the ISP gained neither the permanent ballot status nor the widespread support required to continue.

A second effort, the formation of a new, independent socialist youth organization, took shape in the character of the Young Socialist Alliance (YSA). Intended to foster discussion among young people of various tendencies on issues of civil rights, electoral action, and the buildup of war threats in Indochina, it soon narrowed into an SWP junior organization.

The final test of regroupment came with the Cuban Revolution. The SWP devoted great effort and much of its limited resources to help a united front form around the Fair Play for Cuba Committee (FPCC). At first rather successful, especially on selected campuses, the FPCC suffered from factionalism within and from U.S. government pressure (following the Bay of Pigs invasion) from without.

Ultimately, regroupment efforts failed, as the New Left took its own shape largely independent of older organizations. However, in collaboration with the Marxist Educational Collective, Arthur Felberbaum (1935–1979), who had been active in the YSA regroupment effort, established in 1973 the New York Marxist School. The most memorable result of regroupment perspectives, the school continues as an open forum in both special event and classroom format for a variety of political tendencies on the Left, and fosters open discussion on issues of concern to the Left in general.

[See also Cuban Revolution; National Guardian/Guardian; Socialist Workers Party; Trotskyism.]

—NORA RUTH ROBERTS

REITZEL, ROBERT (1848–1898). Perhaps the most prestigious German American literary stylist of his age, Robert Reitzel was editor of Der arme Teufel (1884–1902), a German-language weekly devoted to culture, politics, and critique of religion that sympathized with anarchism. Reitzel became well known because of his campaign to save the lives of the Haymarket anarchists and for his fiery speech at their graveside.

Reitzel was born in the German revolutionary year, and his democratically inclined mother named him after the murdered "Forty-Eighter" revolutionary Robert Blum. Forced by his conservative father to study theology, the twenty-year-old Reitzel refused and found himself sent penniless to America. He wandered around begging and half-starved until a German minister took him in and gave him a place with a German church in Washington. Awakened by his readings of early socialist philosophy critical of religion, he quarreled with the church synod, founded a "free-thought congregation," and became an atheist, socialist, and soon a popular speaker among the German-speaking American Left. The halls were full when the charismatic Reitzel attacked religious fanaticism, Puritanism, militarism, nationalism, and anti-Semitism. As an advocate of free love and equality of the sexes, he foreshadowed the revolutionary sexual emancipation movements of the twentieth century, and he was also an early advocate of homosexual rights. This cultural revolutionary was a friend of the anarchists Johann Most, Benjamin Tucker, John Henry Mackay, and Alexander Berkman. He thought highest of Emma Goldman, who for her part was fascinated by his bohemian personality. Politically, Reitzel tended toward the social wing of anarchism, and his moral critique connected him to the individualistic anarchists, though he claimed independence from all political groups. He held a lifelong admiration for political assassins. For him, they were slayers of tyrants after the manner of German classicism, like Schiller's William Tell.

In the nineties, Reitzel's Der arme Teufel became an influential forum for European culture. On a trip to Europe, he met the German naturalists whose group, called "the young ones," had been expelled from the Social Democratic Party and who had gone over to Nietzsche's doctrine of the overman. Reitzel imported Nietzsche's Zarathustra cult into the United States, but he also gave space to critics of irrationalism. He died of tuberculosis of the bone, the illness that killed his favorite writer, Heinrich Heine.

[See also Anarchism; Haymarket Incident.]

FURTHER READING

Heider, Ulrike. Der arme Teufel: Robert Reitzel; Vom Vormärz zum Haymarket. Bühl-Moos: Elster Verlag, 1986.

—ULRIKE HEIDER, translated by
CAROL POORE

RENT STRIKES, NEW YORK CITY. One of the most important political expressions of women radicals and of interracial activism, rent strikes have intermittently provided the Left with a firm neighborhood base of popular support. Protests against miserable conditions and high rents extend back, at least, to mobilization on the Lower East Side against the sudden increase of rents by twenty to thirty percent in the early years of the century. In 1904 several hundred residents announced their refusal to pay, convoked mass meetings, and picketed homes of landlords. Working from the principles of labor solidarity, they formed tenant unions building to building and developed an intense agitation in the immediate neighborhoods. Soon, the male leadership of the United Hebrew Trades, Workmen's Circle, and other organizations formed the New York Rent Protective Association, which soon failed because of internal political differences. Nevertheless, tenants obtained considerable redress and a sense of empowerment. A 1908 rent strike, directly coordinated by a branch of the Socialist Party, spread from Manhattan to Brooklyn, Harlem, and Newark, as Jewish teamsters refused to move tenants forcibly from their apartments. Once more, however, no organization remained in place to defend gains made. Attacked in the commercial press for leading the second strike, the Socialists failed to incorporate a tenant strategy into their political arsenal.

William Gropper in New Masses, 1931, plays on prizes then given at many movie theaters.

Bank Night

During the war years, a slowdown in construction and a growing demand for apartments once more provoked a crisis in which socialists and predominantly Jewish unions helped build widespread organizations in the Bronx, Brooklyn, and Manhattan, forcing minor improvements or rescinded rent increases. Socialist efforts reached an especially high level in the Bronx and in Brownsville, both already radicalized by labor militance and by news from abroad. The Socialist Call provided much coverage, and the party offered not only its halls for rent-strike activity, but also some of its finest lawyers for fighting individual cases. Widespread hatred of "rent profiteers" raising their prices increased sympathy, if not necessarily voting totals, for the Socialists. The "Red Scare," the split and disintegration of the Socialist movement, and the legislative approval of rudimentary rent-control laws ultimately detached Socialist influence and dampened the mass activity required to bring effective laws and enforcement. Preoccupied with internal and shop struggles, the young Communist movement made little effort to recoup Socialist neighborhood losses.

Rent-strike activity returned with fervor, and became a specifically Communist issue, with the Depression. As early as 1928, black Communists had begun to protest the effects of the impending disappearance of legal protection for the residents of Harlem. The Harlem Tenants League, with Communist Richard Moore as president, conducted intense protests, accompanied by a series of journalistic exposés of real conditions in the Daily Worker. Handicapped by a shortage of Harlem members, Communists failed to pull off the Harlem-wide rent strike they hailed, but their agitation nevertheless stirred residents to consider the possibilities.

The economic crash introduced an element of desperation that Communists almost immediately seized upon as harbinger of revolutionary sentiment. The Left-led Unemployed Councils encouraged eviction resistance with wide success, helping hundreds of families in New York, Chicago, and elsewhere to move furniture back into apartments. Rent strikes, demanding more neighborhood discipline and entailing greater risks, at first began slowly. The Great Rent Strike War of 1932, opening in the Bronx near the Left-inhabited Allerton Avenue "Co-ops," pitted police against crowds of tenants seeking broad reductions in rent. Women, reputedly the most militant, led the hand-to-hand resistance against officers and horses, and more important, directed the apartment-by-apartment organization of renters. Landlords combined to crush these strikes, but the movement for rent reductions spread to Brownsville, Williamsburg, Borough Park, and other locations where East European Jews had gathered.

By late 1932 and 1933, a much-matured Communist cadre made rent strikes a component of the wider unemployed struggle. Here, most notably in Crotona Park, women's self-mobilization reached new levels and wide victories over landlords were scored. Major legal decisions made rent-resistance more dangerous, with even picketing ruled unlawful. Communists shifted the target, in part, to the home relief bureaus, where impoverished tenants sat-in until they received action (with actual redress made possible by federal funds to local government).

A movement of greater sophistication and less open Communist leadership engaged Harlem and Knickerbocker Village in the middle 1930s, and a citywide tenants council formed in 1936. Clearly a Popular Front mechanism, the council worked comfortably with liberals and abandoned revolutionary rhetoric. Adding affiliates, gaining sophisticated legal assistance, and carefully coordinating legal protest, the organization was held together mostly by unemployed professionals (and Communist militants) rather than slum dwellers. It successfully urged a limited rent-control law, which passed in 1939, but lacking financial resources, did not succeed in establishing a stable infrastructure for itself.

During World War II, tenant organizing gave way to war work and, for male cadre, to military service. Replaced by a United Tenants League, the citywide experiment nevertheless led to successfully pressuring the Office of Price Administration (OPA) into declaring wartime rent controls across New York. Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., popular minister with Communist leanings, organized a People's Committee with wide support in Harlem to this end. American Labor Party (ALP) clubs in many neighborhoods, following Vito Marcantonio's East Harlem Club example, created tenant clinics, generally staffed by women, for the same purpose. Ironically, OPA rulings badly weakened the United Tenants League by removing the center of action from the neighborhood as such to courts and government offices.

In the immediate aftermath of World War II, with labor conflict abounding, neighborhood actions frequently led by ALP clubs focused on the need to retain OPA guidelines. The Republican Congress, over considerable national protest, abolished most OPA ceilings and rent mobilizations proliferated, generally in such traditional Left-influenced neighborhoods as Williamsburg but especially in the Bronx. Marcantonio and the ALP, by embracing the issue and making it their own, also in many ways weakened its independent status—a matter of decisive importance when the Left turned its full attention to the 1948 Progressive Party campaign.

By 1949, both the Left and rent-agitation lost substantial ground. Prosperity and suburbanization removed cadre and eased the housing crisis. Communists already faced with McCarthyism and political demoralization lost their crucial roots in the Lower East Side and other working-class Jewish districts, a strength not made up in new black and Puerto Rican neighborhoods, where cadre remained relatively few. Flagging ALP clubs emphasized community service, and Communists still in the field urged antidiscrimination legislation and a Save Our Homes committee (directed by longtime Communist housing activist Elizabeth Barker), as liberals from the American Jewish Committee and other groups created their own, notably anticommunist, open-housing lobby.

The collapse of the existing Left did not diminish protest entirely. Neighborhood committees pitted themselves against Robert Moses's redevelopment plans (such as a four-lane highway through Washington Square), with the partial support of liberal housing experts such as Jane Jacobs, the Village Voice, and Eleanor Roosevelt. Radicalism resurfaced in such sites as Cooper Union, led in part by erstwhile social worker Staughton Lynd, and the Met Council, led by 1930s–1940s activist Jane Benedict.

Civil rights activity established a new political context for the Left. Former ALP Harlem activist Jesse Gray, master of the dramatic publicity event, organized a Harlem Tenants Council and Committee Council on Housing, with a dramatic strike (with little lasting organizational influence) in 1963. Gray sparked the Congress of Racial Equality and a series of radical-led neighborhood committees in various organizing drives. The overpowering strength of landlords—willing to abandon or torch their property rather than lose profits—proved insurmountable, and various government agencies operated to fill the gaps. As in other cities, subsequent efforts at tenants' unions had only limited success and offered little visibility for a badly declining Left. Perhaps the desperation of rioters in the Lower East Side of 1988, their placards showing upended cocktail glasses ("The Party's Over"—for yuppie neighborhood in-migrants), marked the latest phase of radicalism, militant but disorganized.

[See also American Labor Party; Communist Party, USA.]

FURTHER READING

Lawson, Ronald, ed. The Tenant Movement in New York City, 1904–1984. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1986.

—PAUL BUHLE and MARK NAISON

RESEARCH LIBRARIES AND READING ROOMS. With the increase of literacy in the United States during the late nineteenth century, the printed word became an increasingly important factor in class struggles. New printing technology and transportation links enabled the wide distribution of reading material. In the 1870s and 1880s, the Knights of Labor set up reading rooms. In the mid-1880s, Atlanta's Union Hall and Library Association served eight hundred people with its collection of over 350 newspapers. Many craft unions, following a guild tradition, maintained libraries of technical works for the use of members. Other worker organizations carried on the European socialist and anarchist practice of establishing People's Houses that usually contained reading rooms or libraries.

Several Left organizations also maintained reading rooms or resource centers. The most enduring of these is the Tamiment Institute/Ben Josephson Library, begun in 1906 as the library of the socialist Rand School of Social Science. From the outset the library was an important component of the school to which considerable resources were allocated in an effort to represent the diverse range of socialist thought. The library's primary audience, of course, was the Rand School student body, composed of Socialist Party members, working people, and immigrants, especially Eastern European Jews. The collection survived the 1919 raid of New York state senator Clayton R. Lusk's committee investigating the "subversive activities" of the Rand School, and the collection survived the school's ultimate demise in 1956. In 1963 the Tamiment Institute gave the library to New York University, where it has expanded its holdings to include the papers of many prominent radicals (Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Pete Cacchione, Daniel Bell, and Max Shachtman, to name but a few) and organizations spanning the entire spectrum of the Left. In 1977, in cooperation with the New York City Central Labor Council, New York University established the Robert F. Wagner Labor Archives to preserve the history of labor unions in New York City. By 1996 it served as repository to 130 labor organizations, some of them national in character, such as the Communications Workers of America, the Transport Workers Union, Actors Equity Association, and the Jewish Labor Committee. Tamiment also contains the Oral History of the American Left Collection, which consists of hundreds of hours of taped interviews with American radicals. In addition to these research activities, Tamiment serves as the editorial office of both the Radical History Review and Labor History.

Other Left/labor libraries originated as the collections of individuals. Charles Joseph Antoine Labadie (1850–1933), a Michigan printer, Knights of Labor organizer, and noted anarchist, donated his extensive library to the University of Michigan in 1911. His friend and fellow anarchist Agnes Inglis (1870–1952) made the care and development of the Labadie Collection her life's work when in 1924 she found his gift still resting in its shipping wrappers in the attic of the university's library. The collection is known for its in-depth documentation of the anarchist movement.

The Contemporary Social Action Collections began at the State Historical Society of Wisconsin in 1964, when graduate students who had worked in the southern freedom movement and were convinced of the importance of preserving its history began to collect civil rights materials. The collection has since expanded to include other 1960s activism and in 1974 dropped "contemporary" from its formal title to include older collections on radicalism such as Daniel De Leon's Socialist Labor Party papers and the Highlander Folk School archives.

The Southern California Library for Social Studies and Research in Los Angeles was founded in 1963 by Emil Freed to house material he had collected during a lifetime on the Left. An active member of the Communist Party, Freed amassed pamphlets, periodicals, and other documents from the various struggles in which he participated: the Unemployed Councils of the 1930s, the Hollywood studio strikes of the 1940s, and the Civil Rights Congress of the late 1940s and 1950s. (He had served as organizational director of the Los Angeles Civil Rights Congress.) In the 1950s Freed rescued the personal libraries of friends who, vulnerable to the repression of the Cold War, were on the verge of destroying their political books and pamphlets. Among significant holdings are materials pertaining to the Los Angeles "Red Squad"'s assault against the Wobblies on the San Pedro waterfront in the early 1920s; the legal files of Richard Gladstein and Robert W. Kenny, respectively lawyers for Harry Bridges and the Hollywood Ten; and a large collection of personal papers from composer Earl Robinson.

Labor archives have proliferated since World War II in academic institutions, many as research facilities serving labor and industrial relations programs. The Labor-Management Documentation Center of the Martin P. Catherwood Library at Cornell's New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations, renamed in the 1990s for prominent labor arbitrator Theodore Kheel, was founded in 1949. Among its important holdings are the archives of the International Workers Order and records documenting labor relations in the public sector and the transportation and garment industries, including Left-led unions such as the International Fur and Leather Workers, Drug and Hospital Workers, and the Teachers Union of New York.

The Archives of Labor and Urban Affairs at the Walter P. Reuther Library of Wayne State University, established in 1960, holds the records of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the Industrial Workers of the World, seven international unions (including the United Auto Workers and United Farm Workers), as well as numerous labor insurgent movements such as the Dodge Revolutionary Movement, Miners for Democracy, and Teamsters for a Democratic Union. Also housed in the Reuther Library are the personal papers of radicals such as Oscar Ameringer, John Beffel, Herman Benson, Carl Healer, Henry Krauss, Edward Livens, Harvey O'Connor, Mary Heaton Vorse, and many others.

Because first-wave immigrants to America have often been attracted to radical movements, ethnic collections usually contain materials that are of considerable value to researchers of the American Left. A good example of such a resource is the Immigration History Research Center of the University of Minnesota. The center has strong holdings regarding Finnish immigrants, a group that was among the most militant of those involved in the Industrial Workers of the World and the early Communist Party.

FURTHER READING

Leab, Daniel J., and Philip P. Mason, eds. Labor History Archives in the United States. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1992.

—DEBRA E. BERNHARDT

REVOLUTIONARY ACTION MOVEMENT.

See Armed Struggle.

REVOLUTIONARY COMMUNIST PARTY.

See Maoism.

RIVERA, DIEGO (1886–1957). Mexican Diego Rivera made a tremendous impact on the mural movement north of the Rio Grande through murals he created in the United States in the 1930s and the controversy and personal contacts they generated. The enduring controversies about his work and the nature of the work also made him an exemplary figure for the revived mural movement of the 1960s. Although his murals cover thousands of square feet in his native Mexico, Rivera is best remembered in the United States for a work he never completed—Man at the Crossroads, made for Rockefeller Center in New York City (1933). Originally intended as the artistic focal point of the vast office complex, the mural was covered with a canvas, then destroyed, when Rivera refused to remove a prominent and positive portrait of Lenin. The incident became and remains a major cause célèbre in the history of modern art.

The Rockefeller Center mural was not his first in the United States, nor was it to be his last. Rivera had done Allegory of California for the Luncheon Club of the Pacific Stock Exchange (1930). This was followed by the Making of a Fresco at the San Francisco Art Institute (1930); his major U.S. achievement, Detroit Industry, at the Detroit Institute of Arts (1933); a series of twenty-one fresco panels, Portrait of America, at the New Workers School in New York City (1933); and Pan-American Unity, at the City College of San Francisco (1940). The Detroit murals were threatened with destruction when first completed and again during the McCarthy era, but were saved by the intervention of the Ford family, which had commissioned the work. Only a few panels of the Portrait of America series remain, surviving in museum and private collections.

[See also Murals.]

FURTHER READING

Diego Rivera. Detroit: Detroit Institute of Arts, 1986.

Favela, Ramon. The Early Life and Times of Diego Rivera. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.

Wolfe, Bertram. The Fabulous Life of Diego Rivera. New York: Stein and Day, 1963.

—ERIC BREITBART

ROBESON, PAUL LEROY (1898–1976). The extraordinarily multitalented Paul Robeson was the first world-famous singer and actor to become a political activist during his peak performing years. Robeson's father, a runaway slave who became a minister in Princeton, New Jersey, exerted a strong influence on the young Robeson, instilling in him a quiet dignity, a love for African American culture, and an all-embracing humanism.

An outstanding scholar-athlete at Rutgers University from 1915 to 1919, Robeson went on to become one of the world's leading concert singers, stage actors, and film stars in the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s. During the period when he was based in London (1927–1939), his artistic growth led him to study world cultures and to support social and political movements. He sang concerts to benefit trade unions, especially the Welsh coal-miners' union, and he came to see the connection between the struggles of the British working class and those of the oppressed colonial peoples. Robeson was introduced to socialist ideas through his friendship with George Bernard Shaw and his acquaintanceship with several leaders of the British Labour Party. As a result, Robeson studied the classic Marxist writings and became attracted to the basic premises of communism.

In the early 1930s Robeson met many African students in London and developed a deep appreciation of the close links between the African and African-American cultures, learning several African languages. He also met Jawaharlal Pandit Nehru of India, with whom he formed a lasting friendship. Prompted by the desire to extend his artistic range, Robeson studied many other languages and cultures throughout the 1930s and 1940s, mastering Russian, Chinese, Hebrew, and most European languages. This focus on the centrality of culture went hand in hand with Robeson's increasing radicalism—a duality that continued for the remainder of his career.

Robeson responded to the rise of German fascism by becoming one of the world's leading antifascists. Invited to the Soviet Union in 1934 by Soviet filmmaker Sergei Eisenstein, Robeson was almost assaulted by Nazi storm troopers in Berlin as he changed trains on his way to Moscow. In the Soviet Union he was deeply impressed by the lack of racial prejudice and by flourishing diverse cultures in the Soviet republics. These experiences and the communist leadership of the worldwide antifascist and anti-colonialist struggles were the basis of his unwavering support for the Soviet people in their attempts to build socialism. The fact that Robeson viewed the Soviet Union and the world communist movement as reliable allies of the colonial liberation movements led him to form a close alliance with Communists despite his private misgivings about the Stalinist purges of 1936–1938 and his disagreement with the Communist Left's exaggerated emphasis on class priorities over “nationalist” priorities in the Third World.

In 1938 Robeson demonstrated his commitment to the fight against fascism by going to Spain to sing and speak in support of the Spanish Republic in its civil war against General Francisco Franco's fascist rebellion. The profound effect this experience had on Robeson's radicalization was reflected in his dramatic statement at that time: “The artist must elect to fight for freedom or for slavery. I have made my choice; I had no alternative.” By 1939, Robeson was a key figure symbolizing on a world scale the unity of the antifascist and anticolonial struggles.

In the fall of 1939 Robeson returned from England to the United States, where he continued his highly successful concert and theater career while simultaneously becoming a leader of the civil rights movement and a spokesman for left-wing causes. He was the first major performing artist to refuse to perform for segregated audiences and to lead voter registration campaigns in the Deep South. Robeson also played an important role in support of the union-organizing drive of the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the early 1940s, and in bringing black workers into the unions.

In 1946 Robeson challenged President Harry S. Truman's refusal to sponsor legislation against lynching by telling him that in the absence of federal protection blacks would exercise their right of armed self-defense. An opponent of the Cold War from its inception, Robeson attended a world peace conference in Paris in 1949 and expressed the view that black Americans should not fight an aggressive war against the Soviet Union on behalf of their own oppressors. In the wake of those remarks, the U.S. government and the media launched an attack of unprecedented ferocity against Robeson that lasted for nine years.

Robeson's passport was revoked in 1950 and was not restored until 1958. Inquiries under the Freedom of Information Act reveal that the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of State, and numerous other U.S. government agencies compiled tens of thousands of documents on Robeson and illegally harassed him over a period of more than twenty years. Robeson was also blacklisted in the entertainment industry and prevented from appearing in professional engagements until 1957. Despite this persecution, Robeson continued to sing and speak in black churches and in the halls of the few surviving left-wing trade unions. He also wrote a book title Here I Stand in collaboration with the black writer and journalist Lloyd L. Brown in which he outlined the program and strategy subsequently adopted by the civil rights movement and foretold the advent of the movement for economic justice.

During the anticommunist witch-hunts of the late 1940s and the 1950s, Robeson defended the rights of Communists and defied congressional committees when they compelled him to testify before them. Although he was not a member of the Communist Party, he refused on constitutional grounds to answer any questions concerning Party membership or affiliation.

Robeson remained publicly neutral concerning the Sino-Soviet rift that began in the late 1950s, maintaining his cordial relations with both countries, and expressed no opinion about Nikita Khrushchev's “secret speech” in 1956 denouncing Stalin's crimes. However, Robeson's political attitude on these issues was conveyed indirectly by his personal friendship with Khrushchev and his enthusiastic support of Khrushchev's domestic and foreign-policy reforms.

In 1958 Robeson's passport was restored on the basis of a Supreme Court decision, and he traveled abroad for five years to reestablish his artistic career. After a successful comeback, Robeson became ill with circulatory disease, and in 1963 he returned to the United States to retire. Contrary to the claims of the media, Robeson was not disillusioned or embittered. As he put it in 1973, three years before his death from a stroke: "Though ill health has compelled my retirement, you can be sure that in my heart I go on singing." Drawing upon lyrics he had made world famous, he continued, "'I must keep laughing instead of crying, I must keep fighting until I'm dying, and Ol' Man River, he just keeps rolling along.'"

FURTHER READING

Duberman, Martin. Paul Robeson. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1989.

Robeson, Paul. Here I Stand (1958). Boston: Beacon Press, 1972.

Robeson, Susan. The Whole World in His Hands. New York: Citadel Press, 1981.

—PAUL ROBESON, JR.

ROBINSON, EARL (1910–1991). In the late 1930s and 1940s, no composer was as successful as Earl Robinson in disseminating the values of the United Front to the American public. In songs such as "Joe Hill," "Abe Lincoln," and "The House I Live In," and in cantatas such as Ballad for Americans and The Lonesome Train, Robinson communicated his perception of America as a great multiethnic nation whose democratic promise had yet to be fulfilled. In these works, for which he is chiefly known, he drew on the revolutionary traditions of 1776 and the Civil War to make the idea of radical change an acceptable modern notion.

Born in Seattle, Robinson attended the University of Washington as a music major. He went to New York in 1934 and joined the Workers Laboratory Theater and the Composers Collective. He wrote revolutionary songs, and sang them to guitar accompaniment, in street-theater productions and on picket lines. He further studied composition with Aaron Copland and Hanns Eisler, adopting a straightforward folk-based style unencumbered by a surfeit of twentieth-century dissonance.

Robinson wrote the music to John Howard Lawson's play Processional (1938) and to Sing for Your Supper (1939), both Federal Theater Project productions. He based cantatas on the words of Carl Sandburg, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and William O. Douglas. In the 1940s he wrote film scores to A Walk in the Sun, The Roosevelt Story, and The House I Live In, which won an Academy Award. Blacklisted in the 1950s, he taught music at a New York high school. Other works for the stage include: Sandhog (1954), from a Theodore Dreiser story; One Foot in America (1962), based on two Yuri Suhl books; and David of Sassoun (1978), on Armenian legends. Individual songs that became popular were the antiracist "Free and Equal Blues," "Black and White," and "Hurry Sundown."

In the 1970s, Robinson adopted a New Age outlook, adding to his Old Left consciousness such new subjects as American Indians, ecology, reincarnation, gay liberation, and radical theology. To the Northwest Indians (1974), an orchestra piece with narration; Listen for the Dolphin (1981) and Song of Atlantis (1983), both stage works; and the cantatas A Natural Human, I Been Thinkin' about J. C., and A Concert for Francis (of the Saint Variety), all from the mid-1980s, exemplify these later concerns.

Though mostly drawn to composition with texts, Robinson also wrote concertos for banjo and piano, band pieces, and orchestral works. Either by himself or with vocal ensembles he recorded his own material and many American folk songs. As a one-man performer of his songs he became an almost legendary figure in Left and folk-music circles.

[See also Blitzstein, Marc; Composers Collective; Workers Laboratory Theater/Theater of Action.]

FURTHER READING

Denisoff, R. Serge. Great Day Coming: Folk Music and the American Left. Baltimore: Penguin, 1973.

"Earl Robinson." In The New Grove Dictionary of American Music. New York: Grove's Dictionaries of Music, 1986.

Lieberman, Robbie. People's Songs, American Communism, and the Politics of Culture, 1930–1950. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.

Robinson, Earl, with Eric A. Gordon. Ballad of an American. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 1998.

—ERIC A. GORDON

ROCHESTER, ANNA (1880–1966). The great-granddaughter of Colonel Nathaniel Rochester, founder of Rochester, New York, Anna Rochester became one of the leading Marxist scholars of the 1930s and 1940s. Under the auspices of the Labor Research Association (LRA), which she cofounded with life-partner Grace Hutchins and colleague Robert Dunn in 1927, Rochester wrote profusely on political theory, labor economics, and social welfare. The LRA published bulletins, pamphlets, reports, and books for use by labor unions. Rochester died in May 1966 at the age of eighty-six, having lived for over forty years with Hutchins in Greenwich Village.

Born in New York City in 1880 into a wealthy aristocratic family, she grew up in Englewood, New Jersey, and attended Bryn Mawr College in 1897. Rochester left Bryn Mawr after her sophomore year in order to care for her mother and went on to study music. She gave up a promising career as a pianist in order to work full-time in the field of economics and labor issues. In 1910, Rochester joined the Socialist Party, actively campaigning for Eugene Debs. By 1912 she had become a member of the executive board of the New Jersey Consumers' League and the New York Child Labor Committee. During this period she also represented the Englewood Woman's Club within the Department of Industrial Conditions and Social Welfare of the New Jersey State Federation of Women's Clubs. In connection with the successful campaign for a ten-hour working day for women, Rochester chaired the publicity committee of the New Jersey Consumers' League, writing the press articles that were sent out in connection with the campaign. Her first paid employment was with the National Child Labor Committee in 1912, where she again worked in publications, producing the Child Labor Bulletin, a quarterly publication. From 1915 to 1921, Rochester worked with the Children's Bureau as Julia Lathrop's private secretary and, later, as director of publications. Here and in her earlier positions she learned the skills for which she would later be so well known: researching, analyzing, writing, and editing numerous bulletins, reports, and books.

Rochester had strong religious leanings during her early career, believing in Christian advocacy for peace and social justice. She served on the executive committee of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, a Christian-pacifist organization, and, working with Devere Allen, became editor in chief of its widely circulated journal, the World Tomorrow. In 1926, however, Rochester traveled abroad with Grace Hutchins, visiting, among other places, China and the Soviet Union; upon her return, she broke formal ties with the Fellowship of Reconciliation. She was now convinced that the teachings of Marx, as developed by Lenin, offered the only scientific solution to the multiplying social and economic contradictions of capitalism. In 1927 Rochester joined the American Communist Party and cofounded the LRA, which became the institutional context for Rochester's and Hutchins's writing and political careers. Not so prominent within the Party as Hutchins, Rochester concentrated her energies on her scholarship. Her published texts include Labor and Coal (1931); Rulers of America: A Study of Finance Capital (1936); Why Farmers Are Poor (1940); Lenin on the Agrarian Question (1942); The Populist Movement in the U.S. (1943); Capitalism and Progress (1945), revised and updated as The Nature of Capitalism (1946); and American Capitalism, 1607-1800 (1949). Pamphlets of the 1930s included Profits and Wages, Wall Street, and Your Dollar under Roosevelt.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Hutchins, Grace.]

FURTHER READING

Hutchins, Grace. Papers. Knight Library, University of Oregon.

Labor Research Association Archives. Tamiment Library, New York University.

Rochester, Anna. Papers. Knight Library, University of Oregon.

—JANET LEE

ROCKER, RUDOLF (1873-1958). The leading anarchist intellectual of later decades in the immigrant milieu, and easily the most distinguished essayist in Yiddish anarchist circles, Rudolf Rocker was also the only gentile intellectual to become a leader of Jewish anarchists. Growing up an orphan in Mainz, Germany, he ran away from his Catholic orphanage several times, eventually to become an itinerant bookbinder. A self-educated anarchist, he became active in German circles and fled to Paris in 1892, just ahead of the police. From there he went on to London's East End, where he completed his transition to "Yiddish" intellectual, to serve the largest available anarchist audience. He joined Morris Winchevsky at the Arbeter Frait and eventually (after a brief and unsuccessful immigration to America in 1898) took over the paper as a center of working-class anarchist Jewish sentiment. Arrested in wartime, Rocker was forcibly returned to Germany, where in the Weimar years he wrote his major study, Nationalism and Culture. After Hitler's rise to power, Rocker and his wife, activist Milly Witcop, made their way to the United States.

He found anarchism faded but still holding on to its most treasured possession, the weekly Freie Arbeter Shtimme, which had had no notable intellectual leadership since the departure of Sh. Yanofsky to the mainstream labor press. Rocker suited the later phase of the Freie Arbeter Shtimme perfectly. It had moved from agitation to rumination, a mixture of historical introspection, anarchist interpretation of world events, and generalized free thought. He directed its last great public political effort, international relief to Spanish anarchists from the United States, with agitational tours and financial appeals. Rocker became the premier public figure known to outsiders (especially after the deaths of Emma Goldman and Carlo Tresca), the brilliant mind whose essays proved the veracity of anarchist analysis, the tireless speaker at banquets, and the lecturer whose road trips could bring large audiences to anarchist events.

Not surprisingly, remaining sections of Yiddish anarchists, often by this time affiliates of the Workmen's Circle, put their energies into the Rocker Publications Committee, founded in Los Angeles to make Rocker's work available. Perhaps no other section of the radical movement (not even the Communists with respect to Stalin nor the Trotskyist movement with respect to Trotsky) placed so much emphasis on the personality as well as ideas of its leader. He was, as English-language sympathizers observed, a last figure of the Enlightenment in his singular belief in freedom. His Pioneers of American Freedom (1949) hailed individualist anarchists and collectivists as part of a tradition of resistance against the tyrannies of the state and its overdetermining technological counterpart.

[See also Anarchism; Yiddish Left.]

FURTHER READING

- Konstan, P. [Ahme Thorn]. "Rudolf Rocker: Der Eybik Yunger Kempfer." Freie Arbeter Shtimme, 10 April 1953. (This anniversary issue features several other essays on Rocker.)
- Reichert, William O. Partisans of Freedom: A Study in American Anarchism. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green Popular Press, 1966.
- Rocker, Rudolf. In Shturem. London: London Group "Freie Arbetershtimme," 1952.

—PAUL BUHLE

ROSENBERG CASE. The Rosenberg-Sobell "atom spy" case is one of the most famous political trials in American history. The defendants were left-wingers, and in 1950, when they were arrested, the United States was already well into the period of Cold War anticommunist hysteria. Moreover, both the public and the establishment were still shaken by the recent news that the Soviet Union had tested its first atomic bomb, or A-bomb, ending the American monopoly. With the outbreak of the Korean War that summer, widespread civil defense preparations for a Soviet atomic bomb attack heightened fears.

On 2 February 1950, British physicist Klaus Fuchs, who had worked in America on the A-bomb project during World War II, was arrested in England as a Soviet spy. Fuchs confessed, said his Communist sympathies had motivated him, and received a fourteen-year sentence.

On 23 May, front-page headlines announced that Harry Gold, a thirty-nine-year-old Philadelphia chemist, had confessed to the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) he was Fuchs's American accomplice. On 16 June, David Greenglass, an ex-GI, was arrested for giving A-bomb data to Gold while stationed at Los Alamos during the war. Greenglass, a twenty-eight-year-old New York City machinist, was described as a former member of the Young Communist League.

Julius Rosenberg, brother-in-law of Greenglass and his former partner in a small Manhattan machine shop, was arrested on 17 July. Rosenberg, a thirty-two-year-old engineer who had been fired from a government job on allegations of Communist Party membership, ridiculed the spy charges and insisted on his innocence. On 11 August, Ethel Rosenberg, Julius's wife and David Greenglass's sister, was also arrested; she was said to have been "affiliated with Communist activities." Finally on 18 August Morton Sobell, a City College of New York (CCNY) classmate of Julius's, was arrested in Texas after, it later was disclosed, being kidnapped in Mexico City by Mexican secret police in collusion with FBI agents.

The trial of Julius Rosenberg, Ethel Rosenberg, and Morton Sobell for conspiracy to commit espionage opened 6 March 1951 in Manhattan's federal courthouse and lasted only fourteen trial days. In his opening statement, U.S. Attorney Irving Saypol told the jury: "Sobell and Julius Rosenberg, classmates together in college, dedicated themselves to the cause of Communism. . . . This love of Communism and the Soviet Union soon led them into a Soviet espionage ring." Saypol declared that through Ethel's brother, David Greenglass, the Rosenbergs had stolen "this one weapon that might well hold the key to the survival of this nation and means the peace of the world, the atomic bomb."

The principal prosecution witness, David Greenglass, who had pleaded guilty but remained unsentenced, was questioned by assistant prosecutor Roy M. Cohn. Corroborated by his wife, Ruth, who had not been indicted, David testified that in 1944 and 1945 he had prepared sketches and written information on the Los Alamos atom bomb project for Julius Rosenberg. In the key espionage episode of the trial, the Greenglasses related that Julius Rosenberg had cut a Jell-O box side in two and given one half to Ruth and that some months later Harry Gold had appeared at their Albuquerque apartment, identifying himself with the other half of the box and a password with the name "Julius." Gold claimed that he had obtained the password and box half from Anatoli Yakovlev, a former Soviet vice-consul who had left the United States years before. Another witness, Max Elitcher, a CCNY classmate of Julius's, said that over a four-year period the latter had tried, unsuccessfully, to recruit him as a spy and had mentioned that Sobell was "also helping." Elizabeth Bentley, a then widely known self-confessed spy, appeared as an "expert" witness on Communism and also told of phone calls from a man she knew only as "Julius." The Rosenbergs denied all spy charges and refused to discuss their political affiliations. Sobell did not testify but pleaded not guilty. All three were convicted.

Sentencing the Rosenbergs to death, Judge Irving R. Kaufman said their "conduct in putting into the hands of the Russians the A-bomb" had already caused "the Communist aggression in Korea, with the resultant casualties exceeding 50,000 and who knows but that millions more of innocent people may pay the price of your treason."

Sobell was sentenced to thirty years for alleged nonatomic espionage. David Greenglass received fifteen years. The mass media were monolithic in their unquestioning acceptance of the government's case. The Communist Daily Worker deplored the sentences, but the Party initially stayed aloof from the affair.

In August 1951 the National Guardian began a series of seven articles on the trial by William A. Reuben that posed the question: "Is This the Dreyfus Case of Cold-War America?" Soon after, the National Committee to Secure Justice in the Rosenberg Case was organized.

The committee published the trial record and many who read it noted aspects that aroused their doubts: References to the defendants' left-wing politics permeated the proceedings. The espionage evidence consisted of alleged conversations that were essentially irrefutable. No documentary proof of espionage was introduced. The case against Ethel rested on the claim that she urged Ruth to ask David for information and typed David's handwritten notes on the atom bomb. David, a machinist with no scientific training, was said by the judge to have provided information that had "altered the course of history." Max Elitcher testified under threat of a perjury indictment (for falsely denying membership under oath).

In the United States, clemency advocates were largely leftists, though some liberals lent important support. Both Albert Einstein and Harold Urey made public statements and twenty-three hundred clergy endorsed an appeal. Selections from the Rosenbergs' prison correspondence were published. Abroad, particularly in Western Europe, the campaign enlisted a wide spectrum of political opinion, with those requesting clemency ranging from Jean-Paul Sartre and Pablo Picasso to the pope and the president of France.

The Supreme Court declined to review the case and Judge Kaufman refused to modify his death sentence unless the Rosenbergs confessed and named others. On 9 January 1953, the Rosenbergs appealed to President Truman for clemency, insisting on their innocence. Truman did not act on the appeal and incoming President Eisenhower denied it.

In early June 1953, with the scheduled executions only weeks away, an emissary from Attorney General Herbert Brownell, Jr., visited the Rosenbergs and urged them to confess in return for clemency. They refused, calling their case "the most monstrous frame-up in the history of our country." Their attorney, Emanuel Bloch, filed an appeal claiming newly discovered evidence, but the courts denied it in record time. Rejecting Bloch's application for a stay by a vote of five to four, the Supreme Court recessed for the summer. But Justice William O. Douglas granted a stay based on a new legal point raised by an outside attorney, Fyke Farmer. Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson, at the request of the attorney general, ordered the vacationing Supreme Court justices to reconvene in an extraordinary special term. On 19 June the judges vacated the Douglas stay by a vote of six to three, and President Eisenhower denied a final clemency plea, declaring that "by immeasurably increasing the chances of atomic war, the Rosenbergs may have condemned to death tens of millions of innocent people all over the world." In Paris, London, and other major cities demonstrators protested; thousands gathered in Manhattan near Union Square. That evening, the Rosenbergs were executed in the Sing Sing electric chair.

The American Left did not permit the case to die. Sobell had been sent to the notorious Alcatraz Penitentiary in an effort to break him. With his wife, Helen Sobell, as its leader, a Committee to Secure Justice for Morton Sobell carried on a long campaign that gained worldwide support. Barred from the mass media, the Left fought the battle for public opinion by publishing its own books: William A. Reuben, The Atom Spy Hoax (Action Books, 1955); John Wexley, The Judgement of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg (Cameron and Kahn, 1955); Malcolm P. Sharp, with an introduction by Harold C. Urey, Was Justice Done? (Monthly Review Press, 1956). However, these books were ignored by mainstream reviewers.

A breakthrough in this wall of unofficial censorship came in 1965, when a book arguing that the Rosenbergs were innocent was issued by a major commercial publisher, Doubleday. Invitation to an Inquest, by Walter and Miriam Schneir, was widely reviewed and discussed in the mass media. The book charged that the FBI had forged a hotel card, misrepresented other evidence, and encouraged witnesses to create perjured testimony. It documented Harry Gold's background as a habitual liar and an accomplished fantasist. Major discoveries were pretrial statements and recorded interviews of Gold by his attorneys that contained numerous discrepancies from his Rosenberg trial testimony. Most important, the material showed that such key details as the Jell-O box and "Julius" password were missing from Gold's early account. Commented Newsweek: "The Rosenbergs lie in an unquiet grave."

Over the next few years, the case was the subject of a play, Inquest (1969–1970), by Donald Freed, and a TV documentary, "The Unquiet Death of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg," produced by Alvin H. Goldstein and published as a book (1975). Sobell, released in 1969 after serving more than eighteen years, wrote his account, On Doing Time (Scribner's, 1975).

In 1974 the sons of the Rosenbergs, Robert and Michael Meeropol (adoptive name), entered the fight to vindicate their parents and later authored a book, We Are Your Sons. Under the newly strengthened Freedom of Information Act, they requested FBI and other government files. Support came from the Fund for Open Information and Accountability (FOIA) and the National Committee to Reopen the Rosenberg Case (NCRRC). The ensuing suit, led by attorney Marshall Perlin, lasted more than a decade. At present, hundreds of thousands of pages of once-secret files have been released, though many are heavily censored and thousands more are still being withheld.

Findings: Judge Kaufman engaged in improper ex parte communications about the case with both prosecutors and the FBI; documents revealing this collusion appear in The Kaufman Papers (NCRRC). Ethel Rosenberg was arrested to "serve as a lever" to make Julius talk; the crucial typing evidence against her was concocted by David and Ruth Greenglass only a few days before the trial. The damning "Julius" password was created out of whole cloth at a prison meeting between Gold and David Greenglass arranged by the FBI seven months after their arrests.

On 23 June 1979, the New Republic ran a widely publicized piece, "The Hidden Rosenberg Case," by Sol Stern and Ronald Radosh, which asserted that "Julius was a spy" and "Ethel was framed." Subsequently, a book by Radosh and Joyce Milton, The Rosenberg File (Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1983), revised this split decision, alleging that Ethel was Julius's "accomplice." The book, which deplores the death penalty but is critical of the Rosenbergs themselves (they "were not admirable people"), concludes that Julius was "the coordinator of an extensive espionage operation." It was embraced as definitive by both conservative and liberal critics and even by one on the Left (James Weinstein, editor of In These Times).

But the conclusions of Radosh and Milton rest largely on their belief that Julius Rosenberg confessed his espionage exploits and named the members of his spy ring to a prison informer—a thief, pimp, and con man named Jerome Tartakow. Aside from the improbability of this premise, the book suffers from sloppy scholarship and numerous factual errors, according to historians who studied its documentation. In October 1983, when Radosh, Milton, and Stern and the Schneirs appeared in New York's Town Hall in a debate jointly sponsored by the Nation and the New Republic, the event received national mass media coverage.

As of the late 1980s, the court case against the Rosenbergs and Sobell had been discredited. Those who believed in guilt, however, looked beyond the trial to postulate a large Rosenberg spy ring. They cited as proof reports from the informer Tartakow; FBI hints of secret evidence; and "suspicious" incidents, especially the discovery that two friends of Julius's, Joel Barr and Alfred Sarant, lived and worked in the Soviet Union for decades under assumed names. Unresolved questions on both sides of the affair remain.

The end of the Cold War offered the possibility that some of these questions might finally be put to rest through the opening of Soviet and American intelligence archives. The most important such material made public to date has come from the U.S. National Security Agency, which in 1995 began releasing a collection of Soviet intelligence cables sent between the United States and the Moscow KGB center during World War II and subsequently decoded in a secret program called Venona. The first release of Venona documents included nearly everything available on the Rosenberg case or atomic espionage.

The messages (which are fragmentary and often designate people by cover names) implicate the American Communist Party in recruitment of members for espionage. They indicate that during World War II Julius Rosenberg, described as a Communist Party member, ran a Soviet spy ring composed of young fellow-Communists who provided technical data from their jobs in such fields as radar and aeronautics. Julius recruited Ruth Greenglass and, at his request, she asked her husband, David, to provide information on the A-bomb project at Los Alamos. David readily assented and, when home on furlough a few months later, he turned over "a handwritten plan of the layout" of Los Alamos and "facts known to him about the work and the personnel."

What happened next is not revealed by the Venona documents. None of the messages tell anything about the alleged Jell-O box meeting that was the heart of the prosecution's case. No cover name in Venona is definitively identified as Sobell. As for Ethel Rosenberg, a KGB message notes that she "knows about her husband's work" and is a Party member but makes clear that she is not herself a Soviet agent. This message was decoded long before Ethel's execution. Writing in the Nation, 14–21 August, 1995, the Schneirs offered the judgment that the Venona documents on the Rosenbergs are authentic. Others disagreed and expressed doubts in the letters column of the Nation 16 October, 1995.

The Venona documents also disclose that at least four scientists, one of whom was the physicist Klaus Fuchs, were supplying the Russians with detailed data on the A-bomb project. Compared to these informed sources, information passed by the army machinist Greenglass could only have been trivial. Thus, Venona confirms the appraisal of General Leslie R. Groves, wartime head of the A-bomb project, who testified ten months after the executions at the closed loyalty hearing for J. Robert Oppenheimer: "I think the data that went out in the case of the Rosenbergs was of minor value. I would never say that publicly. Again, that is something, while it is not a secret, I think should be kept very quiet because irrespective of the value of that in the over-all picture, the Rosenbergs deserved to hang. . . ." Groves's imprudent testimony was deleted from the published hearing transcript by the Atomic Energy Commission and remained secret for twenty-five years, until an FOIA lawsuit secured its release.

In the nineties, the Rosenberg case figured in works of both nonfiction and fiction, including TV documentaries, essays, novels, and the play Angels in America. The Rosenbergs's own prison writings, now published in a complete edition edited by Michael Meeropol (Garland, 1994), show them as remarkably courageous and politically committed people.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Federal Bureau of Investigation; Hiss Perjury Trials; McCarthyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Markowitz, Gerald E. "How Not to Write History: A Critique of Radosh and Milton's The Rosenberg File." Science and Society 48 (spring 1984).
- Meeropol, Robert, and Michael Meeropol. We Are Your Sons. 2d ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Pessen, Edward. "The Rosenberg Case Revisited: A Critical Essay on a Recent Scholarly Examination." New York History 65 (January 1984).
- Schneir, Walter, and Miriam Schneir. Invitation to an Inquest. With three new chapters. New York: Pantheon, 1983.
- Schneir, Walter, and Miriam Schneir. "The Other 'Julius': The Story the 'Red Spy Queen' Didn't Tell." Nation, 25 June 1983.
- "Were the Rosenbergs Framed?" Transcript of a public debate held 20 October 1983 at Town Hall, New York City (Nation Institute, print or tape).

—WALTER SCHNEIR and MIRIAM SCHNEIR

RUSKIN COLONY. A "cooperative village" first located in 1894 in Ruskin, Tennessee, near Tennessee City, the Ruskin Colony was one of the most highly publicized of the utopian communities of the 1890s and one of the centers of J. A. Wayland's socialist journalism empire. The colony was conceived by Wayland (1854–1912), an Indiana native who, after a successful career as proprietor of country newspapers in Indiana and Missouri and success in job printing and real estate speculation, became a socialist in Colorado in the 1880s.

Wayland then began a career as America's premier socialist journalist. He aspired to convince Americans of the advantages of socialism. His first socialist paper, the Coming Nation, was started at Greenburg, Indiana, in 1893 and grew quickly to twenty-five thousand subscribers. Wayland hit upon a scheme to prove to his fellow citizens the viability of socialism by using the paper as the main industry in a socialized town. He moved the paper and some of its employees to western Tennessee and accepted members who paid $500 to join the Ruskin Cooperative Association. Wayland wrangled with the cooperators and was thrown out after one year. The members took over operation of the paper, moved the colony to a better site several miles away, built some small cottage industries, and thrived for a while on the constant influx of new members and new capital. The Coming Nation was edited after Wayland by A. S. Edwards, then by Herbert Casson, and it and the Ruskin Colony started to fail in 1899. An attempt to save it was made by amalgamation with another group in a move to Ware County, Georgia, where the colony disbanded in 1901.

[See also Appeal to Reason; Utopianism.]

FURTHER READING

Broom, Isaac. The Last Days of the Ruskin Cooperative Association. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1902.

Shore, Elliott. Talkin' Socialism. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1988.

—ELLIOTT SHORE

RUSSIAN AMERICANS. Before the 1920s, the story of the Russian American Left in the United States is largely the story of the Russian Jewish Left in America. Especially before 1910, the vast majority of political organizations that purported to be run by and for Russians were in reality run by and for Russian Jewish immigrants, and the vast majority of those who contributed to and staffed the leftist Russian-language periodical publications in the United States were Russian Jews. Most political activity associated with the Russian Left occurred after 1881, when the mass immigration of Jews from the Russian Empire began.

The earliest Russian political activists in the United States, however, were not Jews. William Frey (born Vladimir Konstantinovich Geins) came to the United States in 1868 and spent some time trying to set up communal colonies in Kansas. Vladimir Stoleshnikov, a former follower of Russian radical Petr Tkachev, came in the late 1870s. And Sergei Schevitsch, a highly talented, multilingual nobleman, immigrated in the 1870s and became an editor for the New Yorker Volkszeitung. Both Frey and Schevitsch had connections with the Jewish agrarian Am Olam (Eternal People) movement, under whose auspices many Russian Jews, including Abraham Cahane, came to the United States. Contact between the Russian Jewish immigrants and these non-Jewish Russians was extensive in the early days of the Jewish labor movement.

The early political associations and the early publications of the Russian Jewish immigrants were designed to give the appearance of being exclusively Russian. The Russian Workingmen's Union (founded 1884), the Labor Lyceum (founded 1885), and the Russian Progressive Union (founded 1886) were all in reality Jewish labor organizations—with Russian names—whose leaders clung to the theories and practices of their recent revolutionary past in Russia. An organization called the Russian-Jewish Workingmen's Association (Rusisher-Idisher Arbayer Farayn in Yiddish) shows a transitional moment when Russian Jewish intellectuals began to recognize the Jewishness of their constituents.

The Russian leftist press in the era of Jewish mass immigration was almost exclusively Jewish but was guarded about revealing this fact. Its history, which is closely linked with the history of the Russian Left in America, can be divided into two phases.

The first phase, from 1889 to 1894, was dominated by three closely related conflicts, two of them political and one of them social. The first political conflict concerned the activism the Russian progressive press was advocating: was it intended to further the cause of the Russian narod (people), in whose name the Jewish intellectuals had struggled before they emigrated, or was it intended to further the cause of the American workers, including the masses of poor, uneducated Jews who had recently arrived from Russia? The second political conflict concerned the role of the revolutionary intelligentsia: were the intellectuals to play the role of a revolutionary vanguard leading the masses to political enlightenment and freedom, as Petr Lavrov, the theorist of Russian populism, had urged, or were they to stand back and allow the oppressed members of society (narod, workers) to revolt spontaneously? The social conflict concerned the ethnic identity of those who edited the Russian-language journals and newspapers: were they Jews, with the interests of their coreligionists at heart, or were they Russians, with either the interests of the Russian narod or the interests of non-Jewish Russian workers in America (of whom there were very few) at heart?

Znamia (The Banner, 1889–1890) was a perfect example. If one did not recognize the names of its editors and many of its contributors, one would take this for a purely Russian publication. Both Schevitsch and Stoleshnikov were involved at some point with Znamia. It published work not only by its “American” contributors (Michael Zametkin, Morris Hillquit, Philip Krantz, and others) but also by such Russian radicals as Pavel Akselrod (a Russian Jew who remained in Russia), Lavrov, and Nikolai Chernyshevsky (who died during the first year of Znamia’s short life). Apart from a few references to Jewish matters, everything about the paper served to remind the reader that the Russian revolutionary movement was at the center of things.

The story was much the same with other Russian-language leftist journals of this era. Progress (1891–1894), edited by Isaac Hourwich, was just as committed to the Russian revolutionary movement and just as heavily staffed by Jewish émigrés as Znamia had been. Other journals showed the same profile: Russkii Listok (Russian Leaflet, 1892) and Russkie Novosti (Russian News, 1893), both published by the highly Russified Jewish intellectual George M. Price; Spravochnyi Listok (Information Leaflet, 1892–1893) and Russko-Amerikanskii Vestnik (Russian-American Herald, 1893), both edited by I. Rozental’ and Mitia Gretschi; and Ezhegodnik (Annual, 1899), edited by Dr. Sergei Ingermann.

The Russian-language newspapers came into being at a time when the Jewish intellectual community in the United States was still wrestling with the conflict between socialism and anarchism. The publications in this first phase can all be described as socialist, rather than anarchist, but the socialism they represent is a peculiar mixture of the pre-Marxist radicalism the Jewish intellectuals had brought from Russia and a rudimentary Marxism most of them had first encountered in the United States. The programmatic editorial statement in the first issue of Znamia is filled with uncritically applied Marxist phrases, but the journal included in its pages plenty of material from the pre-Marxist days of the Russian revolutionary movement.

The second phase, from 1910 onwards, was more complicated than the first. Russian-language publications in this phase showed more concern with events in Russia than did publications of the first phase, but the reasons for this concern were different. In the earlier phase a combination of social snobbery and political naïveté had led the Jewish intellectuals to present themselves as Russians. But since then the Jewish labor movement in the United States had focused its attention on Jews and settled on Yiddish as its medium of discourse. In the new phase, then, Russian-language publications had little role to play in the American Jewish labor movement. Such publications sprang into existence specifically to address issues relating to Russia. Recent events had made these issues particularly pressing, so there was no lack of material. The revolution of 1905, for example, and the great political and social upheavals that followed it brought the Russian revolutionary struggle to a position on the world stage it had never occupied before.

Russian political organizations in the United States showed a greater variety of political orientations than they had in the previous period. There were Russian sections of the Socialist Party (founded 1901); after the Bolshevik-Menshevik split in Russia in 1903, there was a pro-Bolshevik party in America called the Federation of Russian Social Democratic Organizations of America; and there were anarchists and socialist revolutionaries.

One of the most active and influential Russian intellectuals in America in these years was Leo Deutsch (1855–1941), a Jewish socialist with an impressive record of activism and sixteen heroic years of Siberian penal servitude behind him. Though Deutsch devoted considerable effort to writing about the lives of Jewish revolutionaries, especially in the American Yiddish press, he was a cosmopolitan, which in his circles meant he was committed above all to the Russian—and ultimately international—revolutionary struggle, without special regard for Jews.

Deutsch was the founding editor of Novyi Mir (New World, 1911–1938), one of the most influential Russian-language publications in America. It boasted an extraordinary circulation of fourteen thousand in 1914. Leon Trotsky, who lived in the United States from January to May of 1917, was one of the émigré intellectuals who edited this journal. Novyi Mir supported the October Revolution in Russia and represented a Bolshevik point of view.

Deutsch's other paper was called Svobodnoe Slovo (The Free Word, 1915–1916). It was sponsored by the Russian Social-Democratic Party and devoted itself to attacking the czarist regime and promoting international Marxism. Since it was largely a theoretical publication, it lacked the public appeal of Novyi Mir and folded after a year. Many, but not all, of its collaborators were Russian Jews active in the American labor movement.

Most other Russian-language publications were short-lived. There was, for example, the largely anarchist Golos Truda (Voice of Labor, 1911–1917); Volia (Freedom, 1915), a socialist revolutionary organ to which Leo Deutsch contributed; Russko-Amerikanskii Rabochii (The Russian American Worker, 1908), sponsored by the Russian Social Democratic Organization in America. Finally, the Communist Russkii Golos (Russian Voice), which began publication in 1917, remained pro-Soviet for many years. It was still being published in the early 1990s.

FURTHER READING

- Hoerder, Dirk, ed. "Russians." In The Immigrant Labor Press in North America, 1840s–1970s: An Annotated Bibliography, vol. 2. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1987.
- Vil'chur, Mark Efimovich. Russkie v Amerike (The Russians in America). New York: First Russian Publishing Corporation in America, 1918.
- Price, George M. "The Russian Jews in America." Translated by Leo Shpall. Publication of the American Jewish Historical Society 48 (1958–1959).

—STEVEN CASSEDY

RUSTIN, BAYARD (1910–1987). A major African American civil rights leader who worked behind the scenes, primarily in managerial and counseling capacities, Bayard Rustin began his career as a radical exponent of nonviolent resistance to social injustice and war. But from the mid-1960s onward, he moved to increasingly conservative views. At the time of his death, for example, he was chairman of the Social Democrats USA, an anticommunist group primarily supported by conservative labor leaders, and he was executive committee chairman of Freedom House, a neoconservative institution. Rustin's major sinecure, however, was as cochair of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, a prestigious educational, civil rights, and labor organization.

Rustin was the son of West Indian immigrants and had close family members associated with the Quakers and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. After taking courses at universities but never receiving a degree, Rustin left his native Pennsylvania for New York City. Attracted by the antiracist activism of the Communist Party, he joined the Young Communist League (YCL) in 1936 and two years later he was a YCL organizer on the campus of City College of New York, where he took classes. His major concerns were racial segregation in the U.S. military and the anti-war movement. When the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union led the Communist Party to abandon its anti-war line and to desist agitating about segregation in the military, Rustin resigned from the YCL. He soon became a youth organizer for A. Philip Randolph's March on Washington.

Rustin's relationship with Randolph would be decisive over the long term, but he severely criticized Randolph when the march was called off following President Franklin Roosevelt's executive order banning racial discrimination in war production. Rustin now joined the staff of the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), through which he was to engage in active civil disobedience for more than a decade. In 1942 he was arrested by Tennessee police for refusing to move to the rear of a segregated interstate bus, and in 1943 he received a two-and-a-half-year term for draft resistance. While in prison in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, he honed his singing talents and learned to play guitar and lute. While a member of the YCL, he had helped support himself by singing in nightclubs and in the years to come his melodious singing would become familiar to many civil rights activists.

In April 1947 Rustin organized the Journey of Reconciliation, a FOR project to test the Supreme Court ruling prohibiting segregation on interstate buses. This was the first "Freedom Ride" and set the precedent for the more famous Freedom Rides of 1961. In Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Rustin was arrested and sent to work on a chain gang. His articles about that experience were a catalyst in the eventual abolition of that state's chain-gang system.

A year after the Freedom Ride, Rustin was working with A. Philip Randolph in the League of Nonviolent Civil Disobedience against Military Segregation. This addressed an old wound by attempting to pressure President Harry Truman to strictly enforce and then expand Franklin Delano Roosevelt's earlier executive order. That same year Rustin traveled to India, where his pacifism was enhanced by a first hand experience of the accomplishments and nuances of the Gandhian doctrine of nonviolent resistance. Yet another achievement was his role in creating the Committee to Support South African resistance, later to become the influential American Committee on Africa.

Rustin was named executive director of the War Resisters League in 1953. Two years later with the Reverend Glen Smiley of the FOR staff, Rustin became an adviser to the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., first during the Montgomery Bus Boycott and then in the launching of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). Rustin also served as organizer of King's successful legal defense when King was charged with income tax evasion. Their working relationship was temporarily suspended in 1960. The circumstances were that SCLC, in cooperation with A. Philip Randolph's forces, planned to disrupt the national conventions of both political parties. King was informed that if the preparations continued, Rustin's YCL membership and his homosexuality would be used to tar King's movement. King himself would be accused of having a homosexual relationship with his aide. Rustin voluntarily resigned before King came to a decision on what to do. The demonstrations were abandoned.

As the concept for a new March on Washington began to take shape in 1962, King again turned to Rustin. This time King and Randolph had the courage to resist red-baiting and homophobia. Rustin's organizational skills were instrumental in bringing more than a quarter-million people to the Lincoln Memorial on 28 August 1963. In a move that indicated future behavior, Rustin persuaded the administration to cooperate with a march it had originally opposed. Rustin considered this a triumph, but his critics felt he had allowed the protest to be co-opted.

In 1963 Rustin also became head of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, primarily funded by the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, and he used his position to advance the view that future African American progress was dependent on alliances with organized labor, churches, and liberals. He soon assailed the Black Power movement and other tendencies he felt fostered racial divisions. His search for coalitions led him to oppose nearly every tactic advanced by radicals, including King's Poor People's Campaign and affirmative action. In 1983 he would oppose the Jobless March on Washington.

Rustin's foreign policy views were even more conservative and contradictory. He condemned most national liberation movements because of their Russian or Chinese support and their violent means, but he did not condemn the American war in Vietnam. He vociferously demanded human rights reforms in the Soviet Union, but was an avid supporter of Israel, despite Israel's treatment of Palestinians, its invasion of Lebanon, and its military aid to the Union of South Africa. Detractors charged that Rustin had been consciously or unconsciously "bought off" by Cold War liberals. By the time of his death, his influence on activists concerned about American policies in Latin America and Asia and his influence on African American radicals was virtually nonexistent.

Judgement on his mixed political legacy was further complicated by sexual politics. Although his sexual orientation had been a political issue at a crucial time in his career, Rustin did not publicly acknowledge his homosexuality until the last year of his life. Gay activists sympathized with his decision to avoid the issue prior to the gay liberation movement but were disappointed that he did not openly embrace and assist their movement in the 1970s and 1980s.

[See also Civil Rights Movement; Pacifism; Randolph, A. Philip.]

FURTHER READING

- Boyd, Herb. "Bayard Rustin: A Mixed Legacy." Guardian, 9 September 1987.
- Rustin, Bayard. Down the Line: The Collected Writings of Bayard Rustin. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1971.
- Rustin, Bayard. Strategies for Freedom. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.
- Viorst, Milton. Fire in the Streets: America in the 1960s. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1979.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

RUTHENBERG, CHARLES E. (1882–1927). Socialist leader and a founder of the Communist movement, Charles E. Ruthenberg spent his early years in Cleveland, completing his schooling at age fourteen. Working in business, he became an expert bookkeeper and sales manager until signing on full-time with the Socialist Party in 1917. Ruthenberg first became enamored of the urban reformism of Tom Johnson's "individual initiative." Early in 1908, he borrowed Marx's Capital from the Cleveland Public Library; the next year he joined the Socialist Party, and by 1910 became recording secretary of the Cleveland central committee.

Ruthenberg first ran for governor in 1912, a year when Ohio led all other states in total Socialist votes. A delegate to the party's national convention at Indianapolis, he supported the Left on all controversial questions. He thereby became at once a pronounced master of organization and an ardent figure of the left wing. Bitterly opposing American entry into war, and remaining at the helm of political leadership, Ruthenberg became the "most arrested" radical figure of the nation. Taken by federal authorities for anti-war pronouncements in 1917, he was placed under arrest three years later under Ohio's criminal syndicalism laws, then seized by authorities in New York

Stae, and again by federal officials in Michigan in 1922.

Meantime, Ruthenberg had become a major convert to Leninism, a leading spirit in the division of the socialist movement, and the general secretary of the Communist Party, a position he held until his death. It would be fair to say that, as a major participant in the factional contests of the 1920s, Ruthenberg urgently sought to place the young Communist movement on solid organizational and political footing. He would have doubtless remained a foremost figure but for his sudden death in March 1927, of peritonitis. At Ruthenberg's request, his ashes were interred in the Kremlin wall.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Johnson, Oakley. The Day Is Coming: Life of Charles E. Ruthenberg. New York: International Publishers, 1957.

—ARTHUR ZIPSER

SACCO-VANZETTI CASE. At 3:00 P.M. on 15 April 1920, a paymaster and his guard were carrying a factory payroll of $15,776 through the main street of South Braintree, Massachusetts, a small industrial town south of Boston. Two men standing by a fence suddenly pulled out guns and fired on them. The gunmen snatched up the cash boxes dropped by the mortally wounded pair and jumped into a waiting automobile. The bandit gang, numbering four or five in all, sped away, eluding their pursuers. At first this brutal murder and robbery, not uncommon in post-World War I America, aroused only local interest.

Three weeks later, on the evening of 5 May 1920, two Italians, Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, fell into a police trap that had been set for a suspect in the Braintree crime. Although originally not under suspicion, both men were carrying guns at the time of their arrest and when questioned by the authorities they lied. As a result they were held and eventually indicted for the South Braintree crimes. Vanzetti was also charged with an earlier holdup attempt that had taken place on 24 December 1919 in the nearby town of Bridgewater. These events were to mark the beginning of twentieth-century America's most notorious political trial.

Contrary to the usual practice of Massachusetts courts, Vanzetti was tried first in the summer of 1920 on the lesser of the two charges, the failed Bridgewater robbery. Despite a strong alibi supported by many witnesses, Vanzetti was found guilty. Most of Vanzetti's witnesses were Italians who spoke English poorly, and their trial testimony, given largely in translation, failed to convince the American jury. Vanzetti's case had also been seriously damaged when he, for fear of revealing his radical activities, did not take the stand in his own defense.

For a first criminal offense in which no one was hurt, Vanzetti received a sentence that was much harsher than usual, ten to fifteen years. This signaled to the two men and their supporters a hostile bias on the part of the authorities that was political in nature and pointed to the need for a new defense strategy in the Braintree trial.

On the advice of the anarchist militant and editor Carlo Tresca, a new legal counsel was brought in—Fred H. Moore, the well-known socialist lawyer from the West. He had collaborated in many labor and Industrial Workers of the World trials and was especially noted for his important role in the celebrated Ettor-Giovannitti case, which came out of the 1912 Lawrence, Massachusetts, textile strike.

The arrest of Sacco and Vanzetti had coincided with the period of the most intense political repression in American history, the "Red Scare" of 1919–1920. The police trap they had fallen into had been set for a comrade of theirs, suspected primarily because he was a foreign-born radical. While neither Sacco nor Vanzetti had any previous criminal record, they were long recognized by the authorities and their communities as anarchist militants who had been extensively involved in labor strikes, political agitation, and anti-war propaganda and who had had several serious confrontations with the law. They were also known to be dedicated supporters of Luigi Galleani's Italian-language journal Cronaca Sovversiva, the most influential anarchist journal in America, feared by the authorities for its militancy and its acceptance of revolutionary violence. Cronaca, because of its uncompromising anti-war stance, had been forced to halt publication immediately upon the entry of the U.S. government into World War I in 1917; its editors were arrested and at war's end deported to Italy, in 1919. During this period the government's acts of repression, often illegal, were met in turn by the anarchists' attempts to incite social revolution, and at times by retaliatory violence; the authorities and Cronaca were pitted against each other in a bitter social struggle just short of open warfare. A former editor of Cronaca was strongly suspected of having blown himself up during an attentat on Attorney General Palmer's home in Washington, D.C., on 2 June 1919, an act that led Congress to vote funds for antiradical investigations and launched the career of J. Edgar Hoover as the director of the General Intelligence Division in the Department of Justice. The Sacco-Vanzetti case would become one of his first major responsibilities. In 1920, as the Italian anarchist movement was trying to regroup, Andrea Salsedo, a comrade of Sacco and Vanzetti, was detained and, while in custody of the Department of Justice, hurled to his death. On the night of their arrest, authorities found in Sacco's pocket a draft of a handbill for an anarchist meeting that featured Vanzetti as the main speaker. In this treacherous atmosphere, when initial questioning by the police focused on their radical activities and not on the specifics of the Braintree crime, the two men lied in response. These falsehoods created a "consciousness of guilt" in the minds of the authorities, but the implications of that phrase soon became a central issue in the Sacco-Vanzetti case: Did the lies of the two men signify criminal involvement in the Braintree murder and robbery, as the authorities claimed, or did they signify an understandable attempt to conceal their radicalism and protect their friends during a time of national hysteria concerning foreign-born radicals, as their supporters were to claim?

Their new lawyer, Moore, completely changed the nature of the legal strategy. He decided it was no longer possible to defend Sacco and Vanzetti solely against the criminal charges of murder and robbery. Instead he would have them frankly acknowledge their anarchism in court, try to establish that their arrest and prosecution stemmed from their radical activities, and dispute the prosecution's insistence that only hard, nonpolitical evidence had implicated the two men in common crimes. Moore would try to expose the prosecution's hidden motive: its desire to aid the federal and military authorities in suppressing the Italian anarchist movement to which Sacco and Vanzetti belonged.

Moore's defense of the two men soon became so openly and energetically political that its scope quickly transcended its local roots. He organized public meetings, solicited the support of labor unions, contacted international organizations, initiated new investigations, and distributed tens of thousands of defense pamphlets throughout the United States and the world. Much to the chagrin of some anarchist comrades, Moore would even enlist the aid of the Italian government in the defense of Sacco and Vanzetti, who were still, nominally at least, Italian citizens. Moore's aggressive strategy transformed a little-known case into an international cause célèbre.

After a hard-fought trial of six weeks, during which the themes of patriotism and radicalism were often sharply contrasted by the prosecution and the defense, the jury found Sacco and Vanzetti guilty of robbery and murder on 14 July 1921. This verdict marked, however, only the beginning of a lengthy legal struggle to save the two men. It extended until 1927, during which time the defense made many separate motions, appeals, and petitions to both state and federal courts in an attempt to gain a new trial.

Presented in these motions were evidence of perjury by prosecution witnesses, of illegal activities by the police and the federal authorities, a confession to the Braintree crimes by convicted bank robber Celestino Madeiros, and powerful evidence that identified the gang involved in the Braintree affair as the notorious Morelli Gang. All were ruled on and rejected by Judge Webster Thayer, the same judge who earlier had so severely sentenced Vanzetti. Judge Thayer would even rule on a motion accusing himself of judicial prejudice. His conduct—or misconduct—during the trials and the appeals became another of the controversial issues surrounding the case, but it, too, would prove insufficient to bring about a new trial.

From the beginning, Moore's strategy of politicizing the trial in tradition-bound Massachusetts had been controversial and confrontational. His manner of utilizing mass media was quite modern and effective, but it required enormous sums of money, which he spent too freely in the eyes of many of the anarchist comrades of Sacco and Vanzetti, who had to raise most of it painstakingly from working people, twenty-five and fifty cents at a time. Moore's efforts came to be questioned even by the two defendants, when he, contrary to anarchist ideals, offered a large reward to find the real criminals. As a result, in 1924 he was replaced by a respected Boston lawyer, William Thompson, who assumed control of the legal defense for the last three years of the case. Thompson, a Brahmin who wanted to defend the reputation of Massachusetts law as well as the two men, had no particular sympathy for the ideas of the two men, but he later came to admire them deeply as individuals.

Thompson's defense no longer emphasized the political, but these aspects of the case, once they had been set into motion, could not be stopped and continued to gain momentum. Throughout America liberals and well-meaning people of every sort, troubled and outraged by the injustice of the legal process, joined the more politically radical anarchists, socialists, and communists in protesting the verdict against Sacco and Vanzetti. Felix Frankfurter, then a law professor at Harvard, who did more than any individual to rally "respectable" opinion behind the two men, saw the case as a test of the rule of law itself. Ranged against the defenders of Sacco and Vanzetti were conservatives and patriots who wanted to defend the honor of American justice and to uphold law and order. Many of them came to see these protests as an attack upon the "American way of life" on behalf of two common criminals.

On 9 April 1927, after all recourse in the Massachusetts courts had failed, Sacco and Vanzetti were sentenced to death. By then the dignity and the words of the two men had turned them into powerful symbols of social justice for many throughout the world. Public agitation on their behalf by radicals, workers, immigrants, and Italians had become international in scope, and many demonstrations in the world's great cities—Paris, London, Mexico City, Buenos Aires—protested the unfairness of their trial. This great public pressure, combined with influential behind-the-scenes interventions, finally persuaded the governor of Massachusetts, Alvan T. Fuller, to consider the question of executive clemency for the two men. He appointed an advisory committee, the "Lowell Committee," so called because its most prominent member was A. Lawrence Lowell, president of Harvard University. The committee, in a decision that was notorious for its loose thinking, concluded that the trial and judicial process had been just "on the whole" and that clemency was not warranted. It only fueled controversy over the fate of the two men, and Harvard, because of Lowell's role, became stigmatized, in the words of one of its alumni, as "Hangman's House." "Not every wop has the switch to the electric chair thrown by the president of Harvard."

Sacco and Vanzetti were executed on 23 August 1927, a date that became a watershed in twentieth-century American history. It became the last of a long train of events that had driven any sense of utopian vision out of American life. The workings of American democracy now seemed to many Americans as flawed and unjust as many of the older societies of the world, no longer embodying any bright ideal, but once again serving the interests of the rich and the powerful. American intellectuals were powerfully moved by the case. In his epochal masterpiece, U.S.A.,

John Dos Passos raged in his Camera Eye, "All right you have won . . . America our nation has been beaten by strangers who have turned our language inside out . . . they have built the electric chair and hired the executioner to throw the switch . . . all right we are two nations . . .," while Edmund Wilson coolly observed that the Sacco-Vanzetti case "revealed the whole anatomy of American life with all its classes, professions, and points of view and all their relations, and it raised almost every fundamental question of our political and social system."

Up to the present, most writers have focused their attention on the legal, social, and cultural dimensions of the Sacco-Vanzetti case. The legal dimension, in particular, has been rather exhaustively considered, and its two major issues—the fairness of the trial and the innocence or guilt of the two men—still dominates most of the literature about the case.

Earlier opinion almost unanimously felt that the two men were innocent and had been unjustly executed, but later revisionist points of view emerged: some totally, if implausibly, defending the verdict as correct; others more plausibly arguing that, based on new ballistics tests and words by Carlo Tresca and Fred Moore, Sacco was guilty, Vanzetti innocent. No single account nor any ballistics test has been able to put all doubts about innocence or guilt completely to rest, despite the two most recent books that have claimed to have done so, while arriving at almost directly opposite conclusions.

Surprisingly, although the Sacco-Vanzetti case is considered the political case par excellence, few accounts have taken the politics of the two men—their anarchism—very seriously and fewer still are knowledgeable about it. As in all great political trials, the figures of Sacco and Vanzetti have been transformed into passionate symbols, symbols that are often rather facile and far from the truth—philosophical anarchists, common criminals, working-class martyrs, dirty wops, communist agitators, dago Christs, "the good shoemaker and the poor fishpeddler." They allow too easily the essence of the case to be overlooked or misunderstood. A full and accurate account of the political dimension—and, in particular, the anarchist dimension—still remains to be written. The importance of the Sacco-Vanzetti case remains not only because it called into question some of the fundamental assumptions of American society, but because it calls into question some of the fundamental assumptions of American history.

FURTHER READING

- D'Attilio, Robert, and Jane Manthorne, eds. Sacco-Vanzetti: Developments and Reconsiderations, 1979. Boston: Boston Public Library, 1979.
- Department of Justice/Federal Bureau of Investigation Sacco-Vanzetti Papers. National Archives, Washington, D.C.
- Ehrmann, H. B. Papers. Harvard Law Library.
- Ehrmann, Herbert B. The Case That Will Not Die. Boston: Beacon Press, 1969.
- Aldino Felicani Sacco-Vanzetti Collection. Boston Public Library.
- Massachusetts State Police Sacco-Vanzetti Files. Massachusetts State Archives.
- The Sacco-Vanzetti Case: Transcript of the Record of the Trial of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti in the Courts of Massachusetts and Subsequent Proceedings, 1920-7*. 5 vols. with supplemental volume. Mamaroneck, N.Y.: P. P. Appel, 1969.
- Sacco-Vanzetti Case Papers. Harvard Law Library.

—ROBERT D'ATTILIO

SAILORS' UNION OF THE PACIFIC. The roots of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific (SUP) go back to 1885 when the Coast Seaman's Union was organized under the leadership of such militant socialists as Burnette G. Haskell and Sigismund Danielwicz. Burnette headed a radical grouping in the West calling itself the International Workingmen's Association, named after the defunct First International; and Danielwicz had distinguished himself as an uncompromising yet unsuccessful foe of the anti-Asian racism which afflicted the West Coast labor movement, extending later into the SUP. In the late 1880s leadership of the union was taken over by the vigorous, practical-minded Andrew Furuseth, who engineered an 1891 merger which formed the SUP and went on to create a larger federation called the International Seamen's Union (ISU), affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (AFL). While embracing the narrow "pure-and-simple" trade unionism which dominated the AFL, Furuseth persistently lobbied "progressive" politicians and—in the context of rising labor militancy in the early 1900s—secured the passage of the 1915 Seamen's Act which greatly improved conditions of maritime workers. During the 1920s, however, his orientation proved less effective, and radical dissidents, including members of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and the Communist Party (CP), began to challenge ISU leadership.

By the 1930s the ISU was disintegrating in the face of the Depression and the challenge of radicals. In the SUP, Harry Lundeberg, a Norwegian-born syndicalist, assumed leadership, while Australian-born syndicalist Harry Bridges took leadership of the West Coast Longshoremen. Both played important roles in the West Coast maritime strike of 1934, Bridges in San Francisco, and Lundeberg in Seattle. When the Maritime Federation of the Pacific was created in 1935, Lundeberg was elected to head it. He and Bridges soon came into conflict. While Bridges maintained close ties with the CP and Roosevelt's New Deal, Lundeberg felt this compromised the interests of workers in general and his own membership in particular. In 1937 when the Congress of Industrial Organizations franchise on the West Coast went to Bridges's union and on the East Coast to the National Maritime Union in which CP influence was also strong, Lundeberg led the SUP back into the AFL.

An important role was played in the SUP and its allied organization, the Marine Firemen's Union (eight thousand and seven thousand members respectively) by a small group of Trotskyist militants who were sharply critical of the reformist orientation of the CP during its Popular Front and pro-Roosevelt period. This was most evident when a dispute arose in 1936-1937 over the Copeland Act. This legislation required every seaman to carry a "continuous discharge book," a record of employment which cited length of employment with previous shipowners, reasons for discharge from such employment, record of conduct from time of hiring to moment of discharge—all of which earned it the nickname of "the fink book." Only Lundeberg and his allies were prepared to fight uncompromisingly, if unsuccessfully, against this Roosevelt-backed legislation, which was militantly opposed in a tough strike spearheaded by the SUP over the objections of the CP, Bridges, and others in the labor movement committed to an alliance with Roosevelt.

Among the Trotskyists who played a prominent role during the 1930s and 1940s were Tom Kerry (later a central leader of the Socialist Workers Party [SWP]), Joseph Hansen (a future secretary to Leon Trotsky), Frank Lovell (later SWP trade union director), and Barney Mayes (who left the Trotskyist movement after 1938 to find a position in the labor bureaucracy). Active in a later period was Stan Weir, a member of the Workers Party and eventual founder of Singlejack Books, an effort to bring low-cost radical literature to workers in a format that would slip into work clothes easily. Lundeberg noted that he was "not a Trotskyite, or any other sort of political emancipator, and never will be," but that Trotskyists such as Tom Kerry were "sincere . . . capable" and would "work day and night" for the union cause. Trotskyists also played an important role in the first of the postwar national maritime strikes in 1946, particularly in the spectacular Oakland general strike, which won back much ground lost during the enforced "no-strike" period of World War II.

Lundeberg adapted completely to the rising tide of Cold War anticommunism which swept the country and the labor movement in the late 1940s just as he had demonstrated a willingness to accommodate racism among his supporters. Such positions put the Trotskyists on a collision course with their erstwhile ally. In 1949–1950 Lundeberg and his loyalists, working in collusion with the government and shipowners, saw to it that Trotskyists were expelled from the union, blacklisted, and driven out of the industry. The Seafarers International Union, with which the SUP became associated in the AFL, developed a widely used loyalty oath in which prospective members had to swear that they were not members "of the Communist Party, the IWW, or any Trotskyite group." Years later Trotskyist veterans of the SUP argued that the union's dwindling influence and membership was an indication that the deradicalization fostered by Lundeberg was a recipe for failure.

[See also Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Kerry, Tom. Workers, Bosses, and Bureaucrats. New York: Pathfinder, 1980.
- Lang, Frederick J. [Frank Lovell]. Maritime: A Historical Sketch and a Workers' Program. New York: Pioneer, 1943.
- Saxton, Alexander. The Indispensable Enemy: Labor and the Anti-Chinese Movement in California. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971.
- Schwartz, Stephen. Brotherhood of the Sea: A History of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction, 1986.
- Weir, Stan. "The Informal Work Group." In Rank and File: Personal Histories by Working-Class Organizers, edited by Alice Lynd and Staughton Lynd. Boston: Beacon, 1973.

—PAUL LE BLANC

SALT OF THE EARTH. See Union-Sponsored Radical Films.

SANDBURG, CARL (1878–1967). Born in Galesburg, Illinois, Carl Sandburg was the son of Swedish immigrants. He left school at thirteen and worked at various jobs to help the family income. At nineteen he hoboed out to the West and worked in wheat fields and hotels. Back in Galesburg, he took a job as driver for a farmer's milk wagon, and later as a painter. During the Spanish-American War, Sandburg served in the Sixth Illinois Volunteers. He worked his way through Lombard College, selling stereoscopic pictures (sets creating a three-dimensional effect) for Underwood and Underwood during vacation with classmate Frederick Dickinson.

Philip Green Wright published Sandburg's first book of poems, In Reckless Ecstasy, through his Asgard Press in November 1904. During this period he worked for some time for the fire department. Some of his articles on labor were published as "Inklings and Idlings" under the pseudonym of Crimson in the Galesburg Evening Mail. He also wrote for the Galesburg Labor News and sent poems and articles to Tomorrow, a Chicago magazine. He joined the Lyceumite (a trade journal of the International Lyceum and Chautauqua Association) as advertising manager in December 1906. When a combine of trusts bought the magazine, he lost his job. In the interim he had given several lectures on Walt Whitman and in July had spoken at the Socialist symposium in the Roycroft Chapel in East Aurora, New York.

Sandburg was active in Wisconsin Social-Democratic Party politics from late 1907 until 1912. In December 1907, as Charles A. Sandburg, he became an effective party organizer for the Lake Shore and Fox River Valley districts, where he was a popular and charismatic orator. In 1908 he married Lilian Steichen, Phi Beta Kappa graduate of the University of Chicago, who had been teaching in Princeton, Illinois. She was a Socialist intellectual who joined in his work as a party volunteer. Sandburg was a delegate to state and national Socialist conventions in 1908, and he campaigned with Eugene Debs on the Red Special tour of Wisconsin, introducing the candidate in Appleton, where he lived.

From June 1909 until the fall of 1912 the Sandburgs lived in Milwaukee. In the fall and winter of 1909, Sandburg spoke in forty-five different Wisconsin cities for the Anti-Tuberculosis Society. During the spring of 1910 he campaigned actively for Emil Seidel and the Social-Democratic ticket and was later given the post of private secretary to Milwaukee's first Socialist mayor. He held his office for eight months, and then resigned, because the party felt he would be more useful as editor of the Social-Democratic Herald. Sandburg's city hall experience gave him a working knowledge of municipal politics and greater visibility in the Wisconsin Social-Democratic movement. He wrote widely reprinted Socialist and labor tracts such as Labor and Politics and You and Your Job for Socialist and general periodicals, including Victor Berger's Social-Democratic Herald, the Milwaukee Leader, Wilshire's Magazine, and La Follette's Weekly.

In the fall of 1912, when Sandburg was on the Milwaukee Leader and still virtually unknown as a poet, he moved his family to Chicago to join the staff of the Socialist Chicago Evening World, which had expanded to 600,000 circulation in the wake of a pressman's strike that had closed down most of the other Chicago newspapers. When the World folded, he went to the Day Book, a liberal and adless Scripps paper.

A group of Sandburg's Chicago poems were published in the March 1914 issue of Poetry, a new magazine founded and edited by Harriet Monroe. Sandburg let his membership in the Socialist Party lapse, but still advocated the reforms of socialism. Some selections of Chicago Poems (1916) reflect this social idealism. He wrote articles at this time for various magazines, including the International Socialist Review and Reedy's Mirror. Cornhuskers came out in 1918, launching him as a major poet. Later that year he went to Sweden to report on the war for the Newspaper Enterprise Association. When Smoke and Steel (1920) appeared, his work was written of as greatly improved. His literary reputation was enhanced by the publication of Slabs of the Sunburnt West and Rootabaga Stories in 1922.

He was working then on Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years (1926); his collection of American folk songs, published in 1927; and a short biography of Edward Steichen, which included some of his master prints. In 1928 Good Morning America was published, the title poem chosen by Harvard as the Phi Beta Kappa poem of the year. Mary Lincoln: Wife and Widow came out early in the 1930s, and The People, Yes followed in 1936. Abraham Lincoln: The War Years was published in 1939 and was awarded the 1940 Pulitzer Prize for history. Sandburg joined with Dorothy Parker and Helen Keller that year to help the American Rescue Ship Mission transport Spanish refugees from France to Mexico to save them from Hitler and Franco.

Sandburg's long novel Remembrance Rock came out in 1948, after he had moved from Michigan to Flat Rock, North Carolina. In 1951 he received another Pulitzer Prize for his Complete Poems. Sandburg wrote an autobiography of his youth in Galesburg, Always the Young Strangers (1952), and a biography of Oliver Barrett, Lincoln Collector (1954), and worked on the second part of his autobiography in the late 1950s. His last book of poetry, Honey and Salt, came out in 1963. During this period he had denounced McCarthyism as "un-American." Carl Sandburg died in July 1967 at the age of eighty-nine.

[See also Poetry, 1870–1930.]

FURTHER READING

- Callahan, North. Carl Sandburg: Lincoln of Our Literature; A Biography. New York: New York University Press, 1970.
 Crowder, Richard. Carl Sandburg. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1964.
 Niven, Penelope. Carl Sandburg. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1994.
 Sandburg, Margaret, ed. The Poet and the Dream Girl. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

—MARGARET SANDBURG

SANDERS, BERNARD. See Municipal Socialism.

SAN FRANCISCO GENERAL STRIKE. The strike that took place in San Francisco on 16–19 July 1934 was an epic moment in the history of the American working class. Although authorized by the city's conservative labor leadership, it was first and foremost an act of rank-and-file solidarity that galvanized more than 100,000 workers in San Francisco and Alameda counties in support of longshoremen and seamen who had struck the entire West Coast. Denounced by local politicians and the press as a Communist-led insurrection, it was accompanied by widespread police and vigilante violence and derided in some quarters as a major defeat for organized labor. But in its aftermath the marine workers won a great victory and the cause of unionism was dramatically enhanced.

The events in San Francisco were part of a larger wave of class conflict that crested in 1934. The year's major strikes were characterized by raw class conflict pitting strikers and their supporters against police, national guardsmen, and, sometimes, vigilantes and "citizens' armies." Political parties of the Left played a major role in several of these upheavals. The Communist Party was particularly active in the West Coast maritime strikes, placing its newspaper, legal apparatus, and human resources at the disposal of the strikers. But it would be easy to exaggerate the Party's role. It was only one factor among many contributing to the extraordinary determination of the maritime strikers, whom one observed described as "redder than any Communist I ever saw."

The general strike had its roots in the struggle of marine workers to rebuild unions such as the International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) and the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, which had been crushed after World War I by the employers' open-shop offensive. In the summer of 1933, responding in part to New Deal legislation that sanctioned the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining, San Francisco dockworkers enthusiastically welcomed the reappearance of the ILA. Led by an outspoken Australian named Harry Bridges, a number of veteran longshoremen with close ties to the Communist Party played a vital role in the union's renaissance and won recognition as the bona fide leaders of the San Francisco local. When the shipowners refused to make any meaningful concessions to the ILA's demand for union-controlled hiring halls and the closed shop, the longshoremen walked out on 9 May 1934. Reluctantly, the conservative leadership of the American Federation Labor's seamen's unions joined the strike. In another critical development, teamsters rejected their officials' counsel and refused to handle scab cargo. Within a week every port on the West Coast except Los Angeles was shut down tight.

After nearly two months, San Francisco's most powerful employers convinced the city administration that it was time to break the deadlock by force. On 3 July, and again on 5 July ("Bloody Thursday"), police attempted to escort truckloads of cargo through massive picket lines on the waterfront. In the face of the sadistic violence and superior firepower of their adversaries, the strikers displayed "insane courage." With two men dead (both shot in the back by police) and downtown San Francisco transformed into a war zone, the governor of California called in the National Guard, and the picketers were driven from the waterfront. But then came the most dramatic moment in what had already been an extraordinary drama. Responding to the maritime unions' call to honor the martyrs of Bloody Thursday, fifteen thousand to twenty thousand people turned out to participate in a massive funeral march. It was, said the San Francisco Chronicle, "a stupendous and reverent procession that astounded the city." In its wake the clamor for a citywide walkout became deafening.

Initially, the conservative labor leadership opposed such a move but felt helpless in the face of rank-and-file pressure. At the crucial moment, however, they were able to seize control of a movement they could no longer suppress. When delegates to the San Francisco Labor Council voted overwhelmingly for a general strike, the council's top officials simply appointed themselves to the strike strategy committee and then used their position to prevent the walkout from becoming an all-out war between labor and capital. After watching the strategy committee send streetcar men back to work and allow all of the city's restaurants to reopen, a marine union spokesman complained that "our general strike seems to be dissolving under our feet. . . . The conservatives, having all the voting power, seem to be attempting to force us back to work immediately."

In this regard, the conservatives had plenty of help. Typographical workers voted not to join the strike, which allowed newspapers to continue publication. The press kept up a steady barrage of accusations that the strike was a Communist plot to starve the city into submission. Police and vigilantes launched a concerted campaign of terror aimed particularly at Communists and other "alien" elements. Homes, offices, and union halls were ransacked; hundreds were arrested on trumped-up charges. Fearing an imminent backlash against all of organized labor, the Labor Council leadership desperately sought to end the walkout. On the fourth day, delegates voted to terminate the general strike immediately.

For a moment it appeared that the supreme act of labor solidarity had given way to division and demoralization. The maritime strikers accepted arbitration and returned to work at the end of July; other unionists braced for a new open-shop offensive. But militant labor quickly regained its momentum, led again by the marine workers, who took the strike back to the job and turned the world of waterfront labor relations upside down. In October, a presidentially-appointed National Longshoremen's Board met several of the dockworkers' crucial demands, and the men continued to build on that foundation. The seamen won an equally impressive victory. And the example of the marine workers proved contagious. Indeed, it triggered a wave of organizing and ferment among a generation of workers on the West Coast.

In the final analysis, then, the general strike had a dual character. Forced upon the union leadership by an avalanche of class feeling at the grass roots, it was quickly reduced by Labor Council officials to a limited gesture of sympathy, designed more to minimize organized labor's losses than to see the maritime strike through to victory. However, because of the marine workers' stunning triumph, the general strike became a powerful symbol of the solidarity that fueled the forward march of labor in the 1930s.

[See also Bridges, Harry; California; Communist Party, USA; International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.]

FURTHER READING

- Bernstein, Irving. Turbulent Years: A History of the American Worker, 1933-1941. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1970.
- Kimeldorf, Howard. Reds or Rackets? The Making of Radical and Conservative Unions on the Waterfront. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.
- Larrowe, Charles P. Harry Bridges: The Rise and Fall of Radical Labor in the United States. New York: Lawrence Hill, 1972.
- Nelson, Bruce. Workers on the Waterfront: Seamen, Longshoremen, and Unionism in the 1930s. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.
- Quin, Mike. The Big Strike. Olema, Calif.: Olema Publishing Co., 1949.
- Selvin, David F. Sky Full of Storm: A Brief History of California Labor. San Francisco: California Historical Society, 1975.

—BRUCE NELSON

SANGER, MARGARET (1879-1966). One of eleven children of an Irish family, Margaret Higgins was born in Corning, New York. While her mother remained loyal to Catholicism, her father was a follower of freethinker Robert Ingersoll and single-taxer Henry George. Margaret attended college, supported financially by her two older sisters, and worked as a schoolteacher before attending nursing school. At first it seemed that her medical training might be in vain, because she was pressured into leaving school and getting married by William Sanger in 1902, giving birth to her first child in 1903. Sanger, an architect and aspiring artist, moved his family to suburban Westchester, where they had two more children while he commuted to New York. After eight years of restlessness with housewifery and isolation, Margaret insisted that they move back to Manhattan, and she began working as a visiting nurse on the Lower East Side. She also joined the Industrial Workers of the World and did support work for the strikes in Paterson, New Jersey, and Lawrence, Massachusetts. In this network she learned from Emma Goldman that issues concerning women's bodies and health might be understood politically. She spoke and wrote on health issues such as venereal disease and in 1912 began a series of articles on sexual issues in the Call. The fact that she received a great deal of enthusiastic response from poor women convinced her that these issues were politically vital. The censorship of one of her columns by the U.S. Post Office in 1913 only brought her more publicity. In 1914 she published several issues of the Woman Rebel, a feminist newspaper that discussed sexual issues, and then Family Limitation, a pamphlet—intended for mass distribution—containing actual instructions about contraception. Fleeing from arrest, she spent a year in Europe in 1914-1915, during which time she learned from Havelock Ellis and Dutch feminist physician Aletta Jacobs.

Upon her return to the United States she was able to crystallize a massive but short-lived radical birth-control movement (approximately 1916-1918). But Sanger's reaction to this mass energy was somewhat negative, perhaps because of her sense that it was no longer hers. She soon began to estrange herself from her former left-wing friends. Instead she courted professionals—particularly doctors and academic eugenicists. In 1921 she established the American Birth Control League, a national, professionally dominated lobbying group, to become Planned Parenthood in 1942. Very much in need of recognition, Sanger consistently promoted a view of birth control as something she had invented, and for which her leadership was irreplaceable and indivisible. Yet she was never timid: until the mid-1920s she kept her birth-control clinics operating by smuggling European diaphragms into the United States. Her professional legal strategy was victorious. Contraception was legalized by many states between the 1920s and 1960s, but legalized as a medical device requiring a doctor's prescription. In 1937 the American Medical Association recognized contraception as a legitimate medical service. After World War II, population-control fears renewed support for promoting contraception, and Sanger was instrumental in getting funding for research into hormonal contraception.

[See also Birth Control; Goldman, Emma; Woman Rebel.]

FURTHER READING

- Chesler, Ellen. Woman of Valor: Margaret Sanger and the Birth Control Movement in America. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992.
- Gordon, Linda. "The Politics of Birth Control, 1920–40: The Impact of Professionals." International Journal of Health Issues 5 (fall 1975). Reprinted in The Cultural Crisis of Modern Medicine, edited by John Ehrenreich. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1978.
- Gordon, Linda. Woman's Body, Woman's Right: Birth Control in America. 2d ed. New York: Penguin, 1990.
- Reed, James. From Private Vice to Public Virtue: The Birth Control Movement and American Society since 1830. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1978.

—LINDA GORDON

SCALES, JUNIUS IRVING (b. 1920). Born into a wealthy southern family with a distinguished history, Junius Irving Scales received an early tutorial education before entering the University of North Carolina in 1936. There he became a member, then state chairman of the American Student Union. He joined the Communist Party (CP) in March 1939, and the following year he attended the national Party training school. He then became an organizer in the textile and hosiery industries. After Pearl Harbor, he volunteered for the army and served four years while being harassed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and army intelligence. He returned to Chapel Hill in 1946 and was active in veterans' affairs and the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. He was also vice president of the Southern Negro Youth Congress, its only elected white official. As district chair of the CP in the Carolinas, he held many public meetings.

Soon named to the Southern Regional Committee of the CP, Scales became responsible for activities in the Carolinas, Virginia, Tennessee, and northern Mississippi. He shifted to the "underground" methods of operation adopted by the CP to resist oppression, but was arrested in 1954 under the Smith Act. His six-year sentence was reversed by the Supreme Court in 1957. Although he had resigned from the CP, Scales was again tried and this conviction and a new six-year sentence were upheld by a five-to-four decision in the Supreme Court. Shortly after he was imprisoned, the deputy attorney general offered him immediate freedom if he would "name names." He refused and served fifteen months in Lewisburg Penitentiary until released by a presidential commutation that followed an international protest movement. Upon his release, Scales became a union proofreader, a job he held until his retirement twenty-five years later.

[See also Communist Party, USA.]

FURTHER READING

- Scales, Junius Irving, and Richard Nickson. Cause at Heart: A Former Communist Remembers. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1987.

SCHAPIRO, MEYER (1904–1995). An enormously gifted scholar trained as a medievalist but with wide-ranging interests that transcended the boundaries of traditional specializations, Meyer Schapiro was born in Lithuania and raised in Brooklyn, where he studied painting with John Sloan at the Hebrew Educational Society. Graduating from Columbia College in 1924 with honors in philosophy and art history, Schapiro went on to write a groundbreaking doctoral dissertation on the sculptural decoration of the Romanesque monastery at Moissac. As a teacher at Columbia and the New School for Social Research, Schapiro offered courses in Byzantine, early Christian, and medieval art and art-historical theory, and pioneered the study of modern art—a field not accorded much academic respectability during the 1930s and 1940s. An amateur artist of some skill, he kept in close touch with artists and often played a crucial role in furthering artistic careers, perhaps most notably in the case of the abstract expressionists.

A lifelong socialist—he joined the Brownsville Young People's Socialist League in 1916—Schapiro became more intensely interested in Marxism during the Depression, when he became actively involved with the Left and helped found the American Artists Congress. During the 1930s Schapiro wrote three lengthy articles (on Romanesque and Mozarabic art at Silos, on the nature of abstract art, and on Courbet and popular imagery) that probe the social determinants of artistic production. Like the best Marxist cultural studies of the 1930s (e.g., those of Walter Benjamin), these articles are idiosyncratic, exemplifying a creative adaptation of Marxist ideas and methods to specific historical problems.

After the 1930s, Schapiro concentrated less on the social bases of art, and his work reflected an interest in psychology, philosophy, and semiotics. Yet unlike many of his former colleagues in the anti-Stalinist Left, Schapiro never repudiated Marxism or socialism and consistently encouraged Marxist approaches to art history. In a well-known essay on style published in 1953, Schapiro reviewed major explanatory theories and, after demonstrating their strengths and weaknesses, concluded that an undogmatic Marxism held out a possibility of a general theory.

As an American Marxist working in the usually elite and conservative field of art history, Schapiro was in many ways a unique figure. Although he deeply influenced several generations of artists and art historians, almost none of his students pursued Marxist approaches. It was not until the 1970s that a U.S. school of Marxist art history began to develop. This school initially looked to European scholarship for inspiration; once highly critical of Schapiro, it later began to acknowledge the richness and profundity of his scholarship.

[See also Partisan Review.]

FURTHER READING

- Epstein, Helen. "Meyer Schapiro: 'A Passion to Know and Make Known.'" Art News 82 (May-June 1983).
 Schapiro, Meyer. "Style." In Anthropology Today, edited by A. L. Kroeber. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953.
 Schapiro, Meyer. Modern Art. New York: G. Braziller, 1978.
 Special Issue. Social Research 45 (spring 1978).
 Wallach, Alan. "Marxism and Art History." In The Left Academy, edited by Bertell Ollman and Edward Vernoff. New York: Praeger, 1984.

—ALAN WALLACH

SCIENCE. The Left view of science, changing enormously with time and place, has proved one of the most difficult if least openly contended philosophical issues of socialism. Within it lie concealed political fault lines that cut across many more obvious differences among radicals and between radicals and U.S. society.

Science in the late nineteenth century had an almost magical allure for socialists as well as others. Spiritualists, often inclined toward socialism, viewed the telegraph key, for instance, as a great potential boon to links with the "Other Side." Utopian literary works depicted a world where machines did much of the labor and freed humanity for cultured pursuits. Immigrant socialists looked to science for leverage against religious obscurantism, and hoped (with Engels) that scientists themselves would naturally favor the social system most suited to their aspirations. Popular scientific explanations, as in the nonsocialist press, took up considerable space in the socialist press.

The new Socialist Party at first seemed to adopt similarly optimistic views. The Charles H. Kerr Company published its Library of Science for Workers, beginning in 1904, a mostly German series of cheaply priced, popular explanations. They made extensive efforts to fit certain notions of science, specifically mental cognition, into a context where the writings of a Joseph Dietzgen made almost cosmic sense of socialist inevitability. Arthur Morrow Lewis, one of the party's most popular lecturers, drew great crowds with his lectures analogizing events in the physical world and events in society as coeval proof of a sort of Marxist Darwinism. For Lewis as for many self-taught working-class intellectuals through the 1920s, Herbert Spencer's writing supplied the bridge, rendering society an organism whose whole outlived individual parts. Adopting a historical sociology, he sought to demonstrate that progress through human history, and progress in thought, could be demonstrated by the acute observer.

The inherent element of passive confidence in this view, and indeed the entire view itself, was shaken by the outbreak of war in Europe, and even more by the seeming inevitability of U.S. participation. The technologies of destruction, focusing scientific energy upon mass murder of civilian as well as military populations, exposed the barbaric uses of science and the evidently non-utopian future ahead for mankind. A concomitant modernism among intellectuals, especially socialist intellectuals, broke from scientific determinism in the other direction, toward a neoromanticism that scorned nineteenth-century evolutionary assumptions. Einstein's discovery of  $E = mc^2$ , by breaking with almost all fixed beliefs in the nature of the universe, may be said to have rendered the older assumptions in some sense scientifically moot. Or so it seemed to many intellectual rebels of the later 1910s and 1920s.

The emergence of the Soviet Union (alongside the growth of fascism) in the 1920s and the world depression of the 1930s effected an unprecedented alliance of many scientists and the Left. These progressive scientists thought the promise of real knowledge, endangered by the dark specter of fascism, might be realized in societies rationally organized. Only the persecutory fury of the Cold War, and disillusionment with the Soviet Union, broke the back of this remarkable rapprochement.

The 1920s–1940s leftist tendency had only small groups of survivors in the 1950s and early 1960s, the most pronounced around the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists and its supportive Federation of American Scientists. They questioned atomic testing and the entire strategic perspective of defensible war fought with megaweapons. With the emergence of the National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy and the “Ban the Bomb” movement of 1960–1962, a handful of scientists lobbied Congress and voiced their opposition in the press to the development of new, destabilizing weapons systems. At the meetings of the American Society of Microbiology, itself linked with the biological-warfare testing of the U.S. government, they protested complicity.

The Vietnam War proved, as in so many areas, to be a watershed. The U.S. government uses of science in that war—from the extraordinary human torture meted out by napalm to the biological warfare of Agent Orange against a million acres of Vietnamese countryside to the “Electronic Battlefield” of apparently perfected technological devastation—became a major issue in the public mind. Soon, Nobel laureates and a legion of scientists signed public protests, once again assuming a leading position among academics, although this time lacking illusions of “scientific socialism” as an alternative in practice somewhere across the globe.

In 1969 the student strike movement hit the scientific field directly, as researchers conducted a one-day stoppage protesting the misuse of scientific knowledge for war purposes. The Scientists and Engineers for Social and Political Action formed out of meetings at the American Physical Society, creating a nucleus for what would later become Science for the People. Meanwhile, as in the 1910s–1920s, philosophers, literary figures, conservationists, and others raised serious questions about the assumptions of science and the fate of the planet.

Mostly younger scientists created the “radical science movement,” really a loose-knit series of groups and tendencies, of which the Boston-based Science for the People has been the largest and best organized. Younger scientists in particular have engaged in a wide variety of fields. Their roles in providing technical aid to noncapitalist developing countries; in supplying and interpreting data for consumer, environmental, and other anticorporate organizations; and their efforts to encourage responsibility of fellow scientists, such as those who work in weapons laboratories or accepted funding for “Star Wars” projects, have all been vital contributions. In a handful of cases, ongoing organizations have presented their own scientific agendas. Computer Professionals for Peace and the Committee for Social Responsibility in Engineering among others have repeatedly challenged the format and contents of the national associations at the regular meetings. Science for the People has gained a special prominence by insisting on women’s issues within the scientific community. Only a few scientists have emerged as major public allies of the Left. Stephen Jay Gould, popular analyst of evolutionism among other issues, is perhaps the most formidable example of a supportive presence at Left events and for Left causes.

Meanwhile, widespread skepticism toward scientific solutions to such problems as the technological devastation of wildlife and various threats to the biosphere has renewed a neoromantic (or “pagan”) resistance even to progressive scientific claims. A radical science, now very much in evolution, has been heavily influenced by the predilection for challenging fundamental assumptions and seeking new premises for the uses of knowledge. Anne Fausto-Sterling’s challenging works on science and gender, and Richard Levins and Richard Lewontin’s studies of scientific assumptions, highlight a recent radical approach.

[See also Scientists, 1920–1950.]

FURTHER READING

- Beckwith, Jon. “The Radical Science Movement in the United States.” Monthly Review 37 (July–August 1986).
Fausto-Sterling, Anne. Myths of Gender: Biological Theories about Women and Men. New York: Basic Books, 1985.
Levins, Richard, and Richard Lewontin. Dialectical Biology. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.

—PAUL BUHLE

SCIENCE AND SOCIETY. An interdisciplinary quarterly journal of Marxist thought and analysis, Science and Society is now the oldest continuing Marxist publication in the English language. Although its circulation, ranging around three thousand, has never been large, it is widely known and read, and is found on the shelves of more than a thousand college and university libraries in the United States and abroad.

Science and Society, founded in 1936, quickly gathered a prestigious board of editors, associates, and contributors from across academic life, including J. D. Bernal, Joseph Needham, Louis B. Boudin, Ralph Bunche, E. Franklin Frazier, Robert Morse Lovett, Broadus Mitchell, Paul Sweezy, Margaret Schlauch, Edwin Berry Burgum, J. B. S. Haldane, Dirk Struik, and Granville Hicks. It published a number of essays (such as Herbert Aptheker's studies of slavery) destined to become, in book form, classics of the Left.

Beginning in the early 1940s and intensifying by the end of that decade and into the next, Science and Society suffered from the severe repression of U.S. intellectual life. Many of its writers and editors were blacklisted. Some notable contributors developed political reservations and dropped away. On the other hand, two of the journal's primary contributors developed from the early 1940s a critical approach to "Lysenkoism," the official Russian approach toward aspects of scientific theory. During the later 1950s, Science and Society felt the shock waves of the Twentieth Congress revelations, and the journal more openly and regularly reflected on the broad changes in Marxist thinking now required.

During the 1960s, Science and Society's unique role offered a forum for many new issues raised and also a ballast of fundamental Marxist theory. By the 1970s, it drew upon a new generation of accomplished scholars from schools large and small, reaching its apex of postrepression days. New theoretical concerns, including Althusserianism, feminism, and dependency theory, were probed and deeper examinations of Marxist political economy undertaken. The 1980s, highlighted by the journal's fiftieth anniversary and a banner celebratory issue, produced penetrating polemics on several key theoretical questions—notably, a new stage in a long-continuing discussion of social transitions, an intense debate on the labor theory of value, and a lively series on the direction of the U.S. economy in the world.

The major accomplishment of Science and Society has been the legitimization of Marxist theory within scholarly discourse, both on campuses and in Left political circles. Partly because of—and partly in spite of—its multidisciplinary character, the journal has sustained a stability rare in the Left.

[See also Aptheker, Herbert; Boudin, Louis B.; Communist Party, USA; Foner, Philip Sheldon; Hicks, Granville.]

FURTHER READING

Goldway, David. "Fifty Years of Science and Society." Science and Society 50 (fall 1986).

—DAVID GOLDWAY

SCIENCE FICTION AND FANTASY. Literary radicals have had a long and complex association with futuristic and other modes of fantastic writing. Three influential progenitors were Edward Bellamy's utopian Looking Backward (1888), Jack London's dystopian The Iron Heel (1908), and Charlotte Perkins Gilman's feminist technological fantasy Herland (1915). With the establishment of Communism as the center of the literary Left during the Great Depression, Marxist writers eminent in other genres episodically forayed into science fiction, as in the case of New Masses critic Granville Hicks's The First to Awaken: A Novel of the Year 2040 (1940), Modern Monthly editor V. F. Calverton's The Man Inside: Being the Record of the Strange Adventures of Allen Steele among the Xulus (1936), and Communist poet Thomas McGrath's The Gates of Ivory, the Gates of Horn (1957).

In addition, Howard Fast, best known for radical historical novels, wrote numerous tales of fantasy and science fiction collected in The Edge of Tomorrow (1961), The General Zapped an Angel (1969), A Touch of Infinity (1971), and Time and the Riddle (1975). A landmark of horror fiction was The Werewolf of Paris (1933), by Guy Endore (born Samuel Goldstein; 1900–1970), which depicted the werewolf's appearance at the time of the Paris Commune. Endore joined the Communist Party shortly after the book's publication and was later a blacklisted Hollywood screenwriter.

In the 1940s, Rolfe Humphries (1894–1969), a poet and former Communist Party member, and Marjorie Fischer (1903–1961), a mystery writer and once an officer in the Communist-led League of American Writers, edited two collections of "marvelous, mysterious and strange" tales, Pause to Wonder (1944) and Strange to Tell (1946). Julius Fast (b. 1919), brother of Howard Fast and an independent radical close to the Communist literary milieu, edited Out of This World: An Anthology of Fantasy in 1944.

In the 1960s, two other blacklisted Hollywood screenwriters with pro-Communist politics published highly imaginative and politically powerful works. The much-reprinted Echo X (1962), by Ben Barzman (1912–1989), contrasts the fates of twin planets evolving differently due to the manner in which each had resolved the struggles of the 1930s; and The Winner of World War III (1966), by Henry Myers (1893–1975), presents the memoirs of a cockroach. Left-wing “tough-guy” writer Ben Appel (1907–1977) contributed his own dystopia in The Fun-House (1959), later reprinted in mass-market paperback as The Death Master. But none of these three became significant in the history of science fiction.

However, starting in the 1920s, writers drawn to the organized Left made more consistent and central contributions to the genre. The earliest science fiction writer who was a committed Communist, George Henry Weiss (1898–1946), was among the pioneers under the pseudonym “Francis Flagg.” As Weiss, he contributed poems to the Daily Worker and other Communist publications, some of which were collected in Lenin Lives (1935), with an introduction by proletarian novelist Jack Conroy. As Flagg, he was highly regarded for his imaginative prowess in tales such as “The Machine Man of Adratha” (Amazing Stories, November 1927), “The Master Ants” (Amazing Stories, May 1928), and “The Lizard Men of Bu-Lo” (Weird Tales, October 1930). In later years he collaborated on stories with the non-Communist Forrest J. Ackerman (b. 1916).

Weiss’s primary orientation to science fiction was anomalous among the established radical writers of the early Depression era, but in the mid-1930s a group of teenagers was irresistibly drawn to the burgeoning field. One of the most active was John B. Michel (1917–1969), a member of the Young Communist League (YCL) and later the Communist Party, who inaugurated a faction within science fiction circles sympathetic to Communism. After a manifesto was issued in Michel’s name, the tendency was known as “Michelism,” now regarded as the first Marxist science fiction philosophy. Michels represented the most conscious left-wing trend, running the Committee for the Political Advancement of Science Fiction within a larger group of aspiring science fiction writers who constituted themselves as the Futurian Society of New York. Over the years the Futurians, about a third of whom were affiliated with the YCL, also attracted important non-Communist writers such as Damon Knight (b. 1922). As an author, Michel was prolific in science fiction journals of the early 1940s under the name “Hugh Raymond,” but later turned to writing for Popular Mechanics and Popular Science, and also light pornography.

Others in the original group had fewer organizational connections to the Left but achieved greater renown. Frederik Pohl (b. 1919) was a member of the YCL from mid-1936 to late 1939, attracted by its Popular Front campaigns against fascism and war. Isaac Asimov (1920–1992), Cyril Kornbluth (1923–1958), Robert Lowndes (b. 1916), and Donald Wollheim (1914–1990) were all part of the core group, and most also participated in YCL activities, although Asimov remained more at arm’s length, probably because he was not a native-born citizen but came at a young age from the Soviet Union.

The output of this circle is enormous not only as novelists and short story writers, but also as editors, publishers, and authors of technical studies, autobiographies, and some popular fiction. Asimov himself produced nearly five hundred books, and his Foundation Trilogy (1942–1945) is surely among the outstanding achievements in science fiction history. Wollheim wrote only a few novels, but edited scores of anthologies and ran a successful science fiction publishing house called DAW, after his initials. Lowndes, too, excelled as an editor, especially of magazines. Pohl and Kornbluth were prolific as both collaborators and individuals, although the latter’s career was cut short when he died of heart failure at age thirty-five. Their works are especially noteworthy for social themes, particularly their jointly written The Space Merchants, which has never been out of print since it appeared in 1953. Like Asimov, Pohl remained a Left-liberal throughout the years, even as his reputation grew to international dimensions.

Other writers with backgrounds in the Communist movement include two veterans of the Spanish Civil War. Art Landis (1917–1985) published a series of four science fantasy novels about imaginary worlds called Avalon and Camelot that was partly inspired by Tolkien’s Lord of the Rings. He also edited Coven 14, a journal of witchcraft and horror, from 1969 to 1971. In these same years, Landis published two major studies of the Spanish Civil War, The Abraham Lincoln Brigade (1967) and Spain: The Unfinished Revolution (1972). The other veteran, Theodore Cogswell (1918–1987), specialized in science fiction short stories, frequently dystopic, some of which were collected in The Wall around the World (1962) and The Third Eye (1968).

Yet another short story writer who was a Communist party member for a while is mathematician H. Chandler Davis (b. 1927), who published as "Chan Davis" in journals such as Astounding Science Fiction in the late 1940s and early 1950s. Davis was fired from the University of Michigan in 1954 for refusing to cooperate with the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Since Davis relied on the First Amendment instead of the Fifth, he was subsequently found guilty of contempt of Congress, serving a six-month prison sentence at a federal prison.

Communism, however, was not the only influence on radical science fiction writers. Judith Merrill (b. 1923), a pen name for Josephine Juliet Grossman, was active in the Trotskyist movement in the late 1930s, and still ideologically influenced by it in the 1940s. Her early publications dealt with the effects of nuclear war, especially her famous story "Only a Mother" (1948) and her first novel, Shadow on the Hearth (1950). Like Pohl, to whom she was married for several years, Merrill collaborated with Kornbluth on a number of novels; the two of them used a joint pseudonym, "Cyril Judd." As a protest against the Vietnam War, Merrill relocated permanently to Canada in 1968.

Bernard Wolfe (1915-1985) was also a Trotskyist in the 1930s. His 1952 novel Limbo is often compared to George Orwell's 1984 and Aldous Huxley's Brave New World.

Mack Reynolds (1917-1983) came from a socialist family and was for many years active in the Socialist Labor Party, serving as a national organizer of the party's election campaigns in the late 1940s. Toward the end of his life he collaborated with other former party members in the organization Socialist Reconstruction. Reynolds published over fifty books, many of which treat contemporary political issues from a Marxist perspective. In particular, the novels Mercenary from Tomorrow (1968) and Time Gladiator (1969) are intended to be militantly anticapitalist, while the story "Freedom" in Analogue (February 1961) is a critique of the Soviet Union from the Left.

In addition, several non-Communist radicals and liberals worked with Communist writers at times. Ray Bradbury (b. 1920) contributed several stories to the Communist-led publication California Quarterly, and his Fahrenheit 451 (1954) is generally regarded as partly an attack on McCarthyism. Anthony Boucher (1911-1968), a pseudonym for William Anthony Parker White, taught the mystery writing class at the Communist-led California Labor School during the early Cold War era. For fifteen years, Boucher was the editor of the Magazine of Fantasy and Science Fiction, and much of his own best work appears in The Compleat Werewolf and Other Stories of Fantasy and Science Fiction (1969).

With the rise of the New Left in the 1960s, science fiction writers rarely identified with particular parties or such varieties of socialist ideology as Communism and Trotskyism. Nevertheless, the influence of left-wing thought, especially in relation to gender issues, is evidenced in the work of many newer writers, such as Ursula Le Guin (b. 1929), Marge Piercy (b. 1937), and Samuel Delany (b. 1942).

[See also Bellamy, Edward; Calverton, V. F.; Futurians; Hicks, Granville; London, Jack; McGrath, Thomas; Modern Quarterly/Modern Monthly; New Left Literature; Popular Fiction.]

FURTHER READING

- Davenport, Basil. The Science Fiction Novel: Imagination and Social Criticism. Rev. ed. Chicago: Advent, 1964.
 Knight, Damon. The Futurians. New York: John Day, 1977.
 Moskowitz, Sam. The Immortal Storm. Atlanta: Atlanta Science Fiction Organization Press, 1954.
 Pohl, Frederik. The Way the Future Was. New York: Ballantine, 1978.
 Schafel, Oscar. "The Social Content of Science Fiction." Science and Society 17 (spring 1953).
 Symposium on "Change, Science Fiction, and Marxism." Science Fiction Studies 1, no. 2 (fall 1973); 1, no. 4 (fall 1974).
 Wald, Alan M. Writing from the Left: New Essays on Radical Culture and Politics. London: Verso, 1994.

—ALAN WALD

SCIENTISTS, 1920-1950. American scientists did not engage in significant left-wing political activity until the very end of the 1930s. Although noteworthy individuals like General Electric research director Charles Steinmetz and psychologist and publisher James McKeen Cattell acted at times on their socialist beliefs prior to World War I, such efforts were at best sporadic and isolated. During the 1920s, even such meager radical activity subsided as scientists strengthened their ties to business and increasing numbers pursued careers in the rapidly proliferating industrial research laboratories. Few dared publicly challenge the dominant conservative ethos at a time when the scientific establishment actively supported Herbert Hoover and career advancement depended on the blessings of an elite who considered unorthodox political views prima facie evidence of untrustworthiness in all judgments, science included. As science advanced, bolstered by corporate and philanthropic funding, scientists received much of the credit for the technologically based industrial prosperity of the 1920s. Confident about the future, scientific spokesmen proclaimed that good science necessarily translated into social progress, and trusted enlightened capitalists to continue making that possible.

During the 1930s, a combination of factors converged to overturn the conservatism that prevailed at the start of the decade. Serious unemployment and sharply reduced research funding eroded scientists' 1920s optimism. On top of this, scientists suddenly found themselves being blamed for the technological unemployment popularly believed to have caused the Depression. Critics, including Secretary of Agriculture Henry Wallace, upbraided them for their political conservatism and social irresponsibility. Such public opprobrium challenged their self-conception as society's benefactors and inspired a number of scientists to reevaluate the facile equation of science and progress. Their exclusion from 1930s relief programs and antagonism to the New Deal's "recovery through scarcity" approach also helped catalyze their political reeducation.

International political developments further heightened scientists' awareness of the socioeconomic and political dimensions of scientific research. Beginning early in the decade, newly radicalized British scientists exerted considerable influence on their American colleagues. Eminent British scientists became spokesmen for the British Association of Scientific Workers (BASW) and articulated the view, commonly associated with crystallographer J. D. Bernal, that capitalism contradicted the ethos of science and inevitably frustrated realization of its liberating potential.

As the decade progressed, American scientists' political views were also influenced by the growing perception of the Soviet Union as a land committed to a rational program of social and economic development based on science and technology. Believing that the Soviets had escaped the ravages of capitalist economic collapse during the 1930s, leading American scientists, including physicist Karl Compton, the chairman of President Roosevelt's Science Advisory Board and president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), contrasted Soviet beneficence toward science with the niggardly attitude expressed by American governmental, philanthropic, and corporate leaders and applauded the demonstrable progress made by Soviet science.

Nazi Germany served as a model of a fundamentally different sort. Thousands of German scientists escaped to the United States and Europe, bringing shocking tales of intellectual and political tyranny. This reinforced American scientists' growing awareness of the subordination of science to politics and alerted them to the dangers of repression at home as well as abroad. Uncertain of their status in the United States, most of these émigrés kept a low political profile until the 1940s.

Under the combined weight of these factors, signs of a leftward shift in the political attitudes of the scientific community became evident shortly past mid-decade. In a widely reported public address in mid-1936, American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS) president E. G. Conklin, a Princeton biologist, attacked the New Deal and called for "democratic socialism." Conklin collaborated with other AAAS leaders to inaugurate a series of "Science and Society" symposia at semiannual association meetings beginning in December 1937.

The movement gained further momentum throughout 1938, peaking with three major events in December—the formation of the Lincoln's Birthday Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom (LBCDIF), the formation of the American Association of Scientific Workers (AASW), and the election of Harvard physiologist Walter B. Cannon to the presidency of the AAAS, in an election in which all five top vote-getters were identified with the science and society movement and three were recognized leaders of the scientific Left.

Cannon's election to head science's leading membership organization, with more than nineteen thousand members and 750,000 affiliates, reflected the new strength of the scientific Left. Widely regarded as one of America's premier scientists, Cannon, a socialist and militant antifascist, had been American science's most visible leftist in recent years. Closely linked to Pavlov, whose initial enmity to the Soviet government had been overcome by the government's munificent support for physiological research, Cannon delivered the keynote address at the International Congress of Physiology in Leningrad in 1935, an extraordinary event attended by some two hundred American scientists. Cannon remained the Soviet Union's most vocal supporter among American scientists. In 1937 he seriously weighed an offer to chair the American Russian Institute. Cannon had also spearheaded the scientists' antifascist movement as chairman of the Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy. The examples set by Cannon and fellow leftist A. J. Carlson of the University of Chicago, who between them totally dominated American physiology for years, contributed to the radicalization of a remarkable number of physiologists during this period.

The LBCDIF represented the culmination of many years of progressive efforts on the part of America's leading anthropologist, Franz Boas. Boas had spent much of his long career employing science in the fight against racism. In the mid-1930s, he collaborated with other Columbia University faculty members, including sociologist Robert Lynd, Nobel Prize-winning chemist Harold Urey, engineer Walter Rautenstrauch, geneticist L. C. Dunn, and zoologist Selig Hecht, in supporting the Spanish Republic, exposing the unscientific nature of Nazi propaganda, and impeding the efforts of reactionary forces in the United States.

In December 1938, Boas released a "Manifesto on the Freedom of Science," signed by 1,284 scientists and college presidents, which condemned Nazi racism and persecution of scientists and teachers and urged a stronger defense of democracy and intellectual freedom in the United States. From these signers, he extracted a core group of nationally prominent scientific progressives who turned Lincoln's Birthday into a day of national demonstrations for democracy and intellectual freedom. Building on the successful mobilization of thousands of scientists and educators in twenty-six cities across the country, Boas and his collaborators decided to turn the LBCDIF into a permanent antifascist organization, the American Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom (ACDIF). Cannon, Urey, Dunn, Carlson, anthropologist Ruth Benedict, astronomer Harlow Shapley, Henry Sigerist, the world's preeminent medical historian, pathologist John Peters, mathematician Dirk Struik, and physicist Arthur Holly Compton joined other nationally prominent scientists to form a steering committee. Boas remained as national chairman and classicist Moses I. Finkelstein (M. I. Finley) served as secretary.

In the following months, the ACDIF carried its an-tifascist message to high schools and colleges, launching a campaign to expose racist ideology in school textbooks, mobilizing the educational community against reactionary legislation, exposing the efforts of the New York State Chamber of Commerce to curtail public education beyond the point of literacy and fan anti-immigrant sentiment, turning spring commencement and Columbus Day into demonstrations for democracy as part of an ongoing effort to highlight the nation's progressive legacy, and generally resisting mounting incursions against civil liberties.

December 1938 also witnessed the formation of the AASW, a more explicitly radical organization with close ties to the BASW. The AASW's distinguished list of national sponsors included physiologists Cannon, Carlson, A. C. Ivy, and Ralph Gerard, pathologist Thomas Addis, physicists J. Robert Oppenheimer, A. Compton, and K. Compton, chemist Urey, geneticist H. J. Muller, anthropologist Boas, physician and historian Sigerist, mechanical engineer Rautenstrauch, and astronomer Shapley. Despite a significant national following among scientists, the association had a membership concentrated in the nation's intellectual and scientific centers—the Boston-Cambridge area, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Berkeley. Conceived as a "unifying body for all progressive-minded scientists," the AASW sought to apply science and the scientific method in restructuring American society. Like the ACDIF, the AASW fought against fascism abroad and defended civil liberties at home, exposing the Nazi destruction of German science and conducting a boycott of German scientific materials. Also alert to capitalism's frustration of science's potential in the United States, AASW branches supported expanded funding for scientific research, socialized medicine, science popularization, consumer education, and upgraded science education in the public schools. While concrete efforts were undertaken to implement some of these programs, for the most part the AASW remained more of an educational than an activist organization.

Despite the advent of war in Europe, both the ACDIF and AASW grew steadily in membership and influence until each was sandbagged by the introduction of anti-war resolutions in late 1939 and early 1940. The resolutions, which clearly echoed the new post-Nazi-Soviet Pact Comintern line in their subordination of antifascism to neutralism, staunchly opposed American entry into the war. Despite the implicit renunciation of both organizations' vehement antifascism, the resolutions garnered substantial support. The ACDIF ultimately dropped the resolution in hopes of avoiding an open rift. The AASW, however, pursued the initiative, presenting a petition signed by more than five hundred scientists to President Roosevelt. The episode shattered the erstwhile harmony of the 180-member Boston-Cambridge branch. In June, several prominent members of the branch resigned in protest of alleged Communist domination. Subsequent testimony indicates that the charge was not entirely unfounded, as several physicists, chemists, and mathematicians from MIT and Harvard later admitted having been Communist Party members, including former AASW national coordinator W. T. Martin, an MIT mathematician. Although few actually defected, the AASW never regained its lost momentum. Nor could the ACDIF's circumspection protect it from a debilitating onslaught of red-baiting by Sidney Hook and John Dewey of the Committee for Cultural Freedom (CCF), who alleged Communist domination. Capitalizing on mistrust engendered by the Nazi-Soviet Pact, the CCF managed to arrest ACDIF momentum in late 1939 by driving a wedge between liberals and radicals and dissuading financial backers. Although the ACDIF continued functioning during the war and the AASW persevered through the 1950s, neither again approached its initial promise or influence.

Wartime developments forced a profound transformation in the scientists' postwar political agenda, as nuclear issues overshadowed all others in their import and immediacy. Late in the war, Manhattan Project scientists at Chicago's Metallurgical Laboratory had prefigured future concerns in their futile attempt to block surprise military use of the bomb against the Japanese and demand that U.S. officials share the bomb secret with the Soviets in hopes of averting a postwar arms race. Subsequently feeling responsible for the devastation of Hiroshima and Nagasaki and aware how short-lived America's nuclear monopoly would likely be, atomic scientists mounted a campaign for international control of nuclear weapons and civilian control of nuclear research in the United States. To coordinate this effort, Manhattan Project scientists launched the Federation of Atomic Scientists, which was soon broadened into the Federation of American Scientists (FAS). Hundreds of scientists participated in lobbying and educational efforts in Washington and elsewhere around the country, contributing significantly to the defeat of the May-

Johnson bill, which would have imposed military control over atomic energy and stringent secrecy provisions. With the support of liberal and left-wing scientists, the McMahon bill (the Atomic Energy Act of 1946) was passed, establishing a civilian Atomic Energy Commission, but compromising on security-related issues. Although many left-wing scientists participated in this effort, the FAS deliberately strove to work within the system and disavowed radical intentions, even rejecting organized participation by the AASW.

Many viewed the scientists' other chief priority, gaining international control of atomic energy, as part of a broader effort to improve relations with the Soviet Union and halt the arms race. Once-warm relations between American and Soviet scientists had cooled in the late 1930s, as the "Lysenko controversy" and resulting purges cut the Soviets off from the world scientific community. Wartime exigencies rekindled closer relations. In November 1943, the science panel of the Congress of American-Soviet Friendship met in New York to commemorate the tenth anniversary of U.S. recognition of the Soviet Union and established a permanent Science Committee of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship. With Cannon as an honorary co-chairman and L. C. Dunn as chairman, left-wing scientists played a prominent role in Science Committee efforts to strengthen ties between Soviet and American scientists. Changing its name to the American-Soviet Science Society in 1945, the organization continued to promote collaboration between the United States and the Soviet Union during the postwar period. MIT mathematician Dirk Struik served as chairman of the Massachusetts Council of American-Soviet Friendship.

Left-wing scientists also took a strong hand in shaping America's postwar science policy. During the war, the AASW worked with Senator Harley Kilgore on drafting legislation for a government science agency, predicated on the belief that scientists should be accountable to the public, with research addressing social needs and its results and applications being made freely available. Following the war, Harlow Shapley and Harold Urey formed a Committee for a National Science Foundation, which mobilized support for a watered-down version of the Kilgore bill. Although Shapley and Urey exerted some influence over the final shape of the National Science Foundation established in 1950, their more democratic approach was largely superseded by the elitist version proposed by Vannevar Bush.

Left-wing scientists attempted to influence many of these developments through their participation in the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions (ICCASP), which had been formed during the 1944 presidential campaign. Among the committee's leaders were Albert Einstein, Peters, Rautenstrauch, Shapley, and Ernst Boas. The Science and Technology Division took active stands on a variety of issues, including full employment, the shape of a postwar science policy, international control and peaceful use of atomic energy, and opposition to oppressive postwar security measures. In late 1946, the ICCASP merged with the National Citizens Political Action Committee to form the Political Action Committee, one of whose divisions developed into the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, chaired by Shapley, who, along with other members, actively supported Henry Wallace's 1948 presidential bid.

Postwar security investigations of scientists began in 1947, when the House Committee on Un-American Activities initiated its probe of the atomic scientists. One of the first targets was physicist Edward U. Condon, head of the National Bureau of Standards. Condon, a former member of the LBCDIF and a recently outspoken proponent of closer relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, had served as technical adviser to Senator McMahon. In subsequent years, thousands of scientists were among the many citizens probed by congressional committees and government loyalty programs and hundreds lost jobs and security clearances. In 1950 Senator Joseph McCarthy charged that the AASW and the American-Soviet Science Society represented the Communists' two principal efforts to mobilize scientists. The ACDIF was also branded a "Communist front."

While such charges lacked merit, a good number of scientists did join the Communist Party, especially during the 1940s. Ellen Schrecker, in fact, estimates that close to half the academic Communists were scientists, showing how remarkable a transformation had occurred in scientists' political attitudes in less than two decades.

[See also Progressive; Science.]

FURTHER READING

Garlin, Sender. Three American Radicals: John Swinton, Cru- sading Editor; Charles P. Steinmetz, Scientist and Socialist;

William Dean Howells and the Haymarket Era. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1991.

Hodes, Elizabeth. "Precedents for Social Responsibility among Scientists: The American Association of Scientific Workers and the Federation of American Scientists." Ph.D. diss., University of California, Santa Barbara, 1983.

Kuznick, Peter J. Beyond the Laboratory: Scientists as Political Activists in 1930s America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.

Smith, Alice Kimball. A Peril and a Hope: The Scientists' Movement in America, 1945-47. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965.

—PETER J. KUZNICK

SCOTTSBORO CASE. The involvement of the International Labor Defense (ILD) in the Scottsboro case, more than any other event, crystallized black support for the Communist Party in the 1930s. Accused of raping two white women (Ruby Bates and Victoria Price) on a freight train near Paint Rock, Alabama, nine young black men (Charlie Weems, Ozie Powell, Clarence Norris, Olen Montgomery, Willie Roberson, Haywood Patterson, Andy and Roy Wright, and Eugene Williams), ages thirteen to twenty-one, were arrested on 25 March 1931, tried without adequate counsel, and hastily convicted on the basis of shallow evidence. All but Roy Wright were sentenced to death. Already in the midst of a mass anti-lynching campaign begun a year earlier, the ILD gained the confidence of the defendants and their parents, initiated a legal and political campaign for their freedom, and in the process waged a vicious battle for control over the case with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), who accused the Communists of using the young men for propaganda purposes.

The Scottsboro case was not simply an isolated instance of injustice, the Communists argued, but represented a common manifestation of national oppression and class rule in the South. Maintaining that a fair and impartial trial was impossible, the Party and its auxiliaries publicized the case widely in order to apply mass pressure on the Alabama justice system. Protests erupted throughout the country and as far away as Paris, Moscow, and South Africa, and the governor of Alabama was bombarded with telegrams, postcards, and letters demanding the immediate release of the "Scottsboro Boys." Through Scottsboro and other related cases, black and white Communists gained entrance into churches, lodges, and clubs in the African American community, and eventually the ILD was regarded by some as a welcome addition to the panoply of "racial defense" organizations. Moreover, although the "Scottsboro Boys" apparently never directly identified with the Party's goals, they became cultural symbols on the Left, the subject of poems, songs, plays, and short stories that were published, circulated, and performed throughout the world.

Cartoon by Jacob Burck from the Daily Worker, c. 1935.

The ILD waged a more conventional struggle in the courts as well. Its lawyers secured a new trial on appeal by arguing that the defendants were denied the right of counsel. For the new Scottsboro trials, which opened on 27 March 1933, the ILD had retained renowned criminal lawyer Samuel Leibowitz.

More significant, a month before the trial date Ruby Bates repudiated the rape charge. Yet, despite new evidence and a brilliant defense, the all-white jury still found the Scottsboro defendants guilty—a verdict that seemed to buttress the Communists' interpretation of justice under capitalism and augmented the ILD's popularity in the black community. In fact, pressure from black militants and some sympathetic clergy and middle-class spokesmen compelled the virulently anticommunist NAACP secretary, Walter White, to develop a working relationship with the ILD in the spring of 1933. Several months later, however, in an unprecedented decision, Alabama Circuit Court judge James E. Horton overturned the March 1933 verdict and ordered a new trial.

Following a number of incredibly foolish legal and ethical mistakes (including an attempt to bribe Victoria Price), star lawyer Samuel Leibowitz bolted the ILD, which began to lose its prestige in the mid-1930s. With support of conservative black leaders, white liberals, and clergymen, Leibowitz founded the American Scottsboro Committee (ASC) in 1934. However, hostilities between the two bodies were slightly mitigated a year later when the ILD turned to the coalition-building politics of the Popular Front. In a tenuous alliance the ILD, ASC, NAACP, and American Civil Liberties Union formed the Scottsboro Defense Committee (SDC), which opted for a more reformist, legally oriented campaign in lieu of mass tactics. After failing to win the defendants' release in a 1936 trial, the SDC agreed to a strange plea bargain in 1937 whereby four defendants were released and the remaining five endured lengthy prison sentences—the last defendant was not freed until 1950.

Although the ILD did not win the defendants' unconditional release, its campaign to "Free the Scottsboro Boys" had tremendous legal and political implications during the early 1930s. For example, upon one of the ILD's many appeals, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1935 that the defendants' constitutional rights were violated because blacks were systematically excluded from the jury rolls—a landmark opinion that spurred a battle to include African Americans on the jury rolls. Moreover, the realization that limited mass interracial action was possible challenged traditional liberalism and the politics of racial accommodation; the often scorned tactics of "mass pressure" would eventually be a precedent for civil rights activity two decades later.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Herndon Case; International Labor Defense; Patterson, William L.]

FURTHER READING

- Carter, Dan T. Scottsboro: A Tragedy of the American South. 2d ed. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1984.
- Martin, Charles H. "The International Labor Defense and Black America." Labor History 26 (spring 1985).
- Murray, Hugh T., Jr. "The NAACP versus the Communist Party: The Scottsboro Rape Case, 1931–1932." Phylon 28 (1967).

—ROBIN D. G. KELLEY

SCUDDER, VIDA DUTTON (1861–1954). Born in India of missionary parents, Vida Dutton Scudder attended Smith College and Oxford, where John Ruskin taught her to look unblinkingly at the injustices of modern civilization. An avowed socialist, she modeled her life on the conviction that Christians should support and foment radical social change. Scudder's center of gravity remained her Anglican (Episcopalian) faith, and she served her church by acting as an agent provocateur for Christian socialism. At age ninety she was still insisting in her final published work, My Quest for Reality (1952), that Christians dare not obfuscate reality with euphemisms.

For Scudder, two forces persisted in constant tension within history—continuity and revolution. "Did either prevail, excluding the other, Christianity would, I think, lose all dynamic power; the Church, which is a profound though partly hidden fact in Western civilization, would either fade into a formal relic or lose all general communal importance to be reckoned with. Would you like me to substitute the word 'Progress' for 'Revolution'? I stubbornly refuse."

A teacher at Wellesley for forty-one years, Scudder was central to the College Settlements Association, providing urban service similar to Jane Addams's Hull House. Author of a score of books on socialism, literature, and religion, Vida Scudder was a founder in 1919 and prime mover of the Church League for Industrial Democracy (CLID). Following World War II, she feared that the middle class would support anti-Left repression. Consequently, she worked at bringing together in CLID a broad-based coalition of middle-class liberals and socialists who would work at civil liberties and industrial reform, under the slogan, "Industrial Democracy." CLID fought the reality that the industrial system was "of, by, and for its owners" and worked toward a society that substituted "fraternal cooperation for mastery in industrial life."

During the 1920s Scudder and William B. Spofford, Episcopal priest and editor of the Witness magazine, who became executive director of CLID, focused the league's organizational efforts around three areas: civil liberties, church education about social justice in the workplace, and corporate responsibility. At the same time, CLID attempted to learn from and support secular movements. This thrust continued until the 1950s, when Spofford was summoned before the McCarthy Committee.

In her later years, Scudder believed that minority groups, driven by Christian impulse, would spark future social change. With this progression, CLID served as a bridge from the Social Gospel movement to the 1960s option of empowerment, which saw the direct participation in and funding of secular movements by church groups. Scudder's autobiography, On Journey (1937), and her later book, My Quest for Reality, encapsulate her experiences.

[See also Christian Socialism.]

FURTHER READING

- Donovan, Mary Sudman. A Different Call: Women's Ministries in the Episcopal Church. Philadelphia: Morehouse, 1986.
- Frederick, Peter J. Knights of the Golden Rule: The Intellectual as Christian Social Reformer in the 1890s. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1976.
- Greathouse, Gordon. "The Church League for Industrial Democracy." In Which Side Are We On? Vol. 2, Christian Commitment for the '80s. Oakland: Interreligious Task Force for Social Analysis, 1980.

—MARY LOU SUHOR

SEATTLE GENERAL STRIKE OF 1919. By 1918, Seattle's labor movement had attained a degree of solidarity, militancy, and radicalism unrivaled on a citywide basis anywhere in the United States. Radical groups, notably the Industrial Workers of the World, played a powerful ideological role that affected the movement as a whole.

On 21 January 1919, shipyard workers struck to protest the denial of a wage hike that had been promised them once the war was over. Convinced that the shipyard strike was the opening battle against the open-shop offensive of the employers, overwhelming majorities in each of the more than one hundred constituent unions of the Central Labor Council voted to "shut it down" in solidarity with the shipyard workers.

In order to avoid hardship, and to intimidate the federal government and the "Eastern capitalists" who were seen by many to be the root of the problem, workers quickly decided they would have not only to close down the city; they would have to reopen it under labor's management. Under the direction of a largely rank-and-file "Committee of Three Hundred" and a fifteen-person executive committee, plans were made for individual unions to carry out necessary tasks such as feeding the populace and policing the city. It was this decision to run the city that made the general strike one of the most radical events in U.S. labor history.

From 6 February through 11 February, labor indeed ran the city. Eventually, however, confusion over whom the strike was aimed at, combined with intense pressure from national officers of the American Federation of Labor (who were horrified at this "Bolshevik" action just when their organization was attaining respectability), forced the Committee of Three Hundred to declare the strike over at noon of 11 February. Workers returned to their jobs, "not feeling defeated but quite reasonably successful, glad they had struck, equally glad to call it off," as the official General Strike History Committee later noted.

In the aftermath of this living demonstration of the feasibility of workers' control, the future of radical unionism in Seattle looked bright. A number of workers' cooperatives opened; the circulation of the Union Record, labor's first daily newspaper, mushroomed; a newly organized Farmer-Labor Party replaced the Democrats as the second largest party in the Puget Sound area; and a number of militant demonstrations took place, including the refusal of longshoremen to load weapons for delivery to the forces fighting against the Russian Revolution.

But with the closing of the shipyards in mid-1919 (since the wartime need for ships had ended), Seattle was plunged into a depression perhaps twice as deep as anywhere else in the economically troubled country. Many of the cooperatives went under—as did many capitalist enterprises—and the resulting high unemployment led to job competition and political fissures among workers.

Although some accounts judge the general strike a "failure," the truth is more complex. The shipyard strike was certainly lost, and the shipyards themselves closed soon after. Yet despite the severe depression, wages and working conditions in Seattle remained relatively favorable, arguably because the general strike served as a warning to employers. The strike also remained a cultural legacy to the Seattle labor movement through the dark days of the twenties; ironically, its militancy may have helped Dave Beck and other union organizers sell business unionism to the employers as an alternative to dealing with radicals.

The strike had greater implications as well. It has been cited as a factor in the Winnipeg general strike several months later, and in encouraging the creation of the American Communist Party. Most important, it was the first great radical event that tied unionists in the United States to the worldwide post-World War I radical wave.

[See also Communist Party, USA; General Strike; Industrial Workers of the World; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Friedheim, Robert L. The Seattle General Strike. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1964.
 O'Connor, Harvey. Revolution in Seattle. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1964.
 Root and Branch, eds. The Rise of the Workers' Movements. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1975.
 Strong, Anna Louise. I Change Worlds. New York: Garden City Publishing, 1937.

—ROB ROSENTHAL

SECOND INTERNATIONAL. A federation of mostly European socialist parties and socialistically inclined labor unions, the Second International was decidedly more substantial than its predecessor and less fractured by internal disputes. For most American socialists, its dominating German Social Democracy remained, thanks to its strength and rigorous internal self-organization, the model to be emulated as far as possible. Its generally biannual congresses, invariably held in Europe, offered opportunities for American delegates to meet the famous and sometimes to offer their own opinions on international affairs. Only rarely, however, did congress resolutions directly affect the conduct of U.S. socialists at home.

A Marxist-led International Workers' Congress held in Paris during July 1889 inaugurated the movement and all but precluded anarchist participation. (Turned back several times, they abandoned efforts at inclusion.) The rise of socialist parliamentary fortunes, trade union activity, and consolidation of political movements long dominated perceptions of and by the Second International. Among other noteworthy efforts, the International established May Day (first celebrated in Chicago, 1886) as the official international workers' holiday. More generally, it established the idea of socialism as a historic force of great consequence rather than a mere terroristic threat to society. Little noticed by the impressionable Americans, and many others, the consolidating Second International also represented a bureaucratic drift into electoralism and institution-building as an accommodation to the apparent stability of capitalism. This drift, culminating in member parties' votes for war credits at the outbreak of the European conflict, meant the end of the International in 1914.

European leaders, following Engels's sentiments in the latter's final years, expressed little enthusiasm for the Socialist Labor Party (SLP) of the 1890s. For its part, the financially strapped SLP sent no delegates, allowing itself to be represented, however ambivalently, by the German Social Democrats. On the other hand, the support of the American Federation of Labor for socialism, much desired by Engels (and by Friedrich Sorge, reduced to being the mere American correspondent of Neue Zeit), appeared after 1896 further away than ever. Samuel Gompers, who avowed his training by First Internationalists, had broken with socialist ideas altogether and planted himself squarely in the American two-party tradition—with a strong inclination toward exclusion of newer immigrants, women, and other (e.g., black or Asian) potential competitors to organized craft workers.

Naturally, then, Second International luminaries warmly greeted the appearance of the Socialist Party of America (SP), however heterodox its approach to questions such as the private ownership of farms. They faced the dilemma, however, of two competing American parties, and as in other such cases, sought for years to mediate a merger between the two organizations, an effort pursued with special vigor when the young Industrial Workers of the World gave many activists of the two parties a common cause. The task proved, however, impossible.

SLP leader Daniel De Leon had by then become an intractable revolutionary critic of parliamentarism within the International. However small his own forces, his views coincided with those of Luxemburg, Lenin, and others protesting the "revisionist" trends toward complete reformism, toward apologies for colonialism as beneficial for the colonized, and toward restriction of immigration as unfavorable to organized workers. De Leon's Flashlights of the Amsterdam Conference (1906), the only substantial document produced by an American on the course of the International, took his tack throughout. Yet in the main course of relations, American delegates looked to their more successful European brethren with something bordering on awe, and understandably admired the influence and theoretical sophistication of their betters.

In at least one respect, the International had a pronounced influence in reinforcing a tendency of American socialism. The 1907 Stuttgart conference adopted a resolution encouraging socialists everywhere to "strenuously" agitate for woman suffrage.

Viewing this as an official endorsement, socialist women successfully pressed for the devotion of greater party resources to the ongoing struggle for suffrage, and the broadening of party support for an annual Woman's Day celebration among other special propaganda efforts. Another element in the 1907 resolution, proscribing collaboration of socialists with bourgeois suffrage elements, could not be so carefully followed in the American context, and proved divisive to women's efforts.

By 1910, the SP's own Left added its voice to the International as William D. Haywood gained election to the Copenhagen delegation. When Victor Berger favored a clause in the resolution presented by the Germans, vetoing the call for a general strike in case of war, Haywood bitterly (and unsuccessfully) opposed him. Likewise, Haywood took the floor to excoriate the American Federation of Labor and to hail industrial unionism, while Berger and Morris Hillquit defended the labor mainstream. Personal rivalry and factional sparring continued (most notably, over Kate Richards O'Hare's election to the International Secretariat, to which the SP's moderate wing adamantly objected) until the outbreak of war rendered the International impotent.

After the war, even Victor Berger opposed U.S. socialist support of a reconvened Second International. A number of the neutral member parties attempted, in wartime, to reestablish contact, and in 1919 formed a skeletal organization with its first congress the following year. Left socialists in 1921 launched an International Working Union of Socialist Parties, known popularly as the "two and a half" international, in an effort to reunify nonrevisionist Socialist and Communist movements. Two years later, the socialist groups merged into the Labor and Socialist International, which drew the interest particularly of European refugees within the badly shrunken SP, but lacked the authority to coordinate international opinion even among the amenable parties. It had little effect in the United States and effectively went out of existence in 1940. The revived Socialist International, founded in 1951, consists of social democratic parties, most prominently the European. The U.S. socialist representatives have, in recent decades, been fractured into the Democratic Socialists of America, the tiny Social Democrats USA, and the Jewish Bund, an observer body. The International has occasionally played a positive role in supporting Third World sister parties, encouraging the peace process in the Middle East, and in urging negotiations rather than U.S. military actions in Latin America. Rather than riding a tide of democratic socialism that many expected after the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Socialist International has remained in an uncomfortable stasis. Its role in the United States, particularly after the death of Michael Harrington, has remained minimal.

[See also De Leon, Daniel; International Woman's Day; May Day; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.
- De Leon, Daniel. Flashlights on the Amsterdam Conference. New York: New York Labor News Co., 1906.
- Miller, Sally M. Victor Berger and the Promise of Constructive Socialism, 1910-1920. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1973.

—PAUL BUHLE

SECRET WORK. A constant theme in American political discourse after the Bolshevik Revolution has been the charge by various political groupings that Communist ideology is not a natural byproduct of native American radicalism but a "foreign" import that is essentially alien to genuine American values. Consequently, anyone involved in the Communist movement, directly or indirectly, was knowingly or unknowingly serving interests abroad. This view made even visible and legal agitation for Communist positions suspect, but critics of Communism further charged that under the surface of legal political life was a complex skein of semilegal and outright illegal activity, including spying. Prosecutions under the Smith Act, the Hiss and Rosenberg trials, the Taft-Hartley Act, and numerous other governmental actions of the Cold War era were predicated on these assumptions. What the anti-Communist rhetoric dramatized, even as it misinterpreted it, was the long history of interaction by American radical movements with like-minded movements in other lands. Such interaction predated the existence of the Soviet Union, could operate independent of and even hostile to Soviet interests, and continued after the demise of the Soviet Union.

German political refugees, in the years after 1848, sent substantial funds to their European comrades and sought to encourage them in other ways viewed as "subversive" by existing governments. Irish Americans and a scattering of other groups, notably Cubans, did likewise, often with radical intentions for the homeland's future. This activity usually had little impact on the dominant American culture. In the immediate post-Civil War era and the severely depressed 1870s, however, the Paris Commune and the role of German American trade unionists sent a shiver of fear through the conservative press. Especially after the Bismarckian repressive laws drove thousands of German radicals to American shores, the connections between new Americans and their homeland comrades tightened. Along with union efforts and fraternal activities, the rallying of support took on major proportions for Left organizational life. If a revolution could not be made in the foreseeable future in a bourgeois America, immigrants could at least support one in the society they had left behind. Inevitably, legal niceties were avoided, sometimes by ingenious methods such as transporting a coffin to the homeland with cash and weights instead of a deceased immigrant inside.

By the end of the nineteenth century, nearly a dozen immigrant groups had established close ties to their homeland Lefts. Some published propaganda in the freer atmosphere of the United States and conducted other work blatantly illegal at home. World War I spawned an intense development of ties, with agents sent to and from the United States by dozens of movements. Only with the Russian Revolution and the actual takeover of a state apparatus, however, did secret work acquire the degree of notoriety (and perhaps for some on the Left, the allure) attached to modern espionage. Intense activities, generally inept on both sides, marked the first years of the Comintern's influence within the United States. Veterans of that time observed much later that the chaos of the first years was largely due to Moscow's lack of control over the new Communist movement in America.

During the decades that followed, the overwhelming flow of money went from American shores to the Soviet Union, mainly for specific campaigns, such as food support in the early 1920s and war relief in the 1940s. Nonetheless, funds also flowed from the Soviet Union to the United States primarily as subsidies for the American Party. The transmission of such funds was the chief aspect of illegal work. Espionage efforts apparently known only at the top levels of the U.S. Communist Party never rivaled vital financial activities.

Supporters of the Soviet Union gained high appointive office under the New Deal, but they lacked access to important security documents until World War II. A handful of trade union officials—most prominent among them, Jay Lovestone, former Communist Party leader and future associate of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA)—and some liberal intellectuals apparently traded secret communications with the Soviet regime in the 1930s, but the substance of them involved personal information without any great importance or high-level security connections. World War II and the establishment of the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) added a crucial new element to secret work.

While seeking to keep revolutionary groups at arm's length, the OSS utilized them to assist military and political groups behind Axis lines. In fact, the OSS unleashed an unprecedented flurry of left-wing spy activity, some of which inevitably continued into the Cold War era. In the urgent but highly secret effort to build atomic weapons, the Roosevelt administration knowingly employed scientists well known for their Soviet or left-wing sympathies, virtually ensuring the passage of some highly classified information to a power which at the time was a formal ally.

Such intrigues had almost no role in the day-to-day activities of the American Left, save for the need of Communists to deny the existence of spying by or for the Russians and for anti-Communist socialists to insist upon its central importance to American Communism at large. Little was said within the Left or outside it concerning the largest incident of illegal activity: the shipment of arms and assorted war materiel to the new state of Israel. Shipments formally banned by American law were vigorously conducted by Communists, Labor Zionists, and others within the vicinity of the Left. Among those Americans wounded or killed in battles protecting Israeli gains from Arabs, Communists played a prominent role.

New revolutionary regimes arising out of the anticolonial movements of the post-World War II period likewise used friends and contacts within the United States. From the Philippines and pre-independence India to parts of Africa and the Caribbean, freelancers and disciplined cadres wrote popular accounts, provided medical services, distributed funds, and engaged in every manner of logistical assistance. Only in China, Puerto Rico, and the English-speaking Caribbean, however, were Americans as important to such works as left-wing European nationals of the former colonial authorities. The Soviet leadership, preoccupied with deteriorating Russo-American relations and the integration of Eastern Europe within a cordon sanitaire, had little to contribute financially or politically to these efforts. Compared to activities of erstwhile American socialists in the other political direction, these efforts were indeed small.

Heavily funded by CIA sources and institutionally backed by the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, Jay Lovestone, now fervently anti-Soviet, used his personal network of associates to shape labor's own counterintelligence agency. Millions of dollars were passed to friendly labor officials in Europe, particularly in France and Italy. Later, connections between the CIA and heroin gangsters reputedly began in a complex alliance against French Communists. The establishment of bodies of the American Federation of Labor and the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations in Asia and Latin America replicated this pattern, often with former socialists and Trotskyists (most of them from the circle of Max Shachtman) in charge of the operation.

Meanwhile, rumors circulated within and without the Left concerning possible Russian agents and contingency plans in case of a shooting war between the superpowers. The distance of the Daily Worker and the U.S. Communist Party from the Rosenbergs reflected the fear of being identified with illicit activities. On the other hand, American Communist leaders may have informally assured members that the Russians could penetrate the renowned American security state, notwithstanding the limited evidence of any noted accomplishment. Garrulous old-timers who had served in the Spanish Civil War and World War II sometimes hinted and even bragged about what they might be able to do in a moment of international crisis. The Cuban missile crisis, which can be seen as a test case, revealed no such activity.

When seeking sympathy and support, Communist leaders outside Russia, such as the Vietnamese, Chileans, Nicaraguans, and South Africans, found it wiser to go over the heads of the American Communists to connect with American student and peace leaders uncompromised by Communist affiliations. Yugoslavian Communists had reached out to ethnic nationals in the United States, but otherwise such leaders had no security agenda to rival their logical needs for hard currency. Central America and Cuba offered a special case as virtually all funds went out from the United States, mainly in humanitarian projects of one kind or another, legally or illegally eclipsing most other efforts on their behalf. By the middle 1980s, the Maryknoll Fathers might rightly have been called the most important left-wing "international" operating among those battling American imperialism in Central America and thus committing the greatest variety of "illegal" acts by American Cold War definitions. A similar pattern can be seen in American support for the African National Congress in its battle to overturn the apartheid regime in South Africa. Numerous African American, religious, and humanitarian groups played more significant roles than did the formal Left.

The collapse of the Soviet Union and the collapse of the Cold War leadership of the American labor movement promised to turn up more documentation of secret relationships between Americans and either the KGB or CIA. The papers of Jay Lovestone and close associates such as Irving Brown and their staffs remained unavailable or, when examined, had been purged of the most concentrated cases of widespread illegal activities. The new documents from the Kremlin were of a similar nature. Disputes continued to swirl around the familiar Hiss and Rosenberg cases, with much of the supposed new evidence based on unverifiable documents. As of the late 1990s, documents examined in the Soviet Union or reprinted for scholars offered little that was new in regard to illegal or secret work by Soviet sympathizers.

[See also Hiss Case; Lovestoneites; Rosenberg Case; Shachtman, Max; Union Reform/Labor Support.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Paul. "Spies Everywhere." Radical History Review 67 (winter 1997).
 Klehr, Harvey, John Earl Hayes, and Fridrikh Igorevich Firsov. The Secret World of American Communism. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.

—PAUL BUHLE

SEEGER, CHARLES (1886–1979). In a career that spanned the period from his graduation from Harvard in 1909 until his death seventy years later, Charles Seeger established himself as a composer and conductor, musicologist, advocate of the modernist musical aesthetic, and political activist. As the chairman of the music department at the University of California at Berkeley, Seeger offered one of the country's first courses on American musicology. He also introduced the field of ethnomusicology to the New School for Social Research in 1932. It was Seeger's interest in the serious study of folk music that contributed to his development as a composer on the Left in the 1930s, even though he found many American songs to be "complacent, melancholy, defeatist." Writing in the Daily Worker as Carl Sands, Seeger advocated the performance of traditional songs that expressed "vigorous resistance" to oppression. As a member of the Composers Collective (1933–1936), Seeger wrote workers' rounds that contributed to that spirit of resistance.

Seeger's commitment to ethnomusicology led to his encouragement of fieldwork in North and Latin America. He served as a musical adviser to the New Deal's Resettlement Administration (1935–1938) and was the deputy director of the Works Progress Administration's Federal Music Project (1938–1941). In both positions, he supervised the collection and cataloging of music used by Americans in many regions of the country. In addition, he headed the music division of the Pan-American Union (1941–1953). His writings on music stressed the importance of observing the acts of musical creation and performance in their historical and social context. He urged a consideration of music beyond the composer-centered Western tradition and contributed to the emergence of folk music as a legitimate area for academic study. The work of his children—Peggy, Mike, and Pete—in collecting and performing folk music has contributed to the popularization of music from a variety of ethnic and working-class sources.

[See also Folk Music.]

FURTHER READING

Cowell, Henry. American Composers on American Music. New York: F. Ungar, 1962.

Dunaway, D. K. "Charles Seeger and Carl Sands: The Composers Collective Years." Ethnomusicology 26, no. 2 (1980).

—BARBARA L. TISCHLER

SEEGER, PETE (b. 1919). Musician, singer, songwriter, folklorist, labor activist, environmentalist, and peace advocate, Pete Seeger was born in Patterson, New York, son of Charles and Constance Seeger, whose families traced their ancestry back to the Mayflower. Seeger grew up in an unusually politicized environment. His father, Charles, had been a music professor at the University of California at Berkeley, where his pacifism won him so many enemies that he quit teaching in the fall of 1918.

At thirteen, Pete Seeger became a subscriber to the New Masses. His heroes were Lincoln Steffens and Mike Gold, and he aspired to a career in journalism. In 1936 he heard the five-string banjo for the first time at the Folk Song and Dance Festival in Asheville, North Carolina, and his life was changed forever.

Seeger spent two unhappy years at Harvard and left before final exams in the spring of 1938. He made his way to New York, where he eventually landed a job with the Archives of American Folk Music. Seeger spent 1939 and 1940 seeking out legendary folk-song figures such as the blues singer Leadbelly and labor militant Aunt Molly Jackson. By 1940 he had become quite an accomplished musician, thanks in no small part to his enormous self-discipline and Puritan rectitude.

On 3 March 1940, a date folklorist Alan Lomax once said could be celebrated as the beginning of modern folk music, Seeger met Woody Guthrie at a "Grapes of Wrath" migrant-worker benefit concert. In 1940 the duo helped form the Almanac Singers, a loosely organized musical collective that included Lee Hays, Millard Lampell, Sis Cunningham, Sonny Terry, Brownie McGhee, and others.

The Almanac Singers initially recorded labor songs like "The Talking Union Blues," which they created as an organizing song for the Congress of Industrial Organizations. The Almanacs also recorded pacifist tunes like "The Ballad of October 16," in retrospect an embarrassingly shrill attack on Eleanor and Franklin Roosevelt and the effort to prepare for the war against fascism.

With the entry of the United States into World War II and the creation of the U.S.-Soviet alliance, the Almanacs suddenly attained respectability. They appeared on a coast-to-coast radio broadcast, the William Morris Advertising Agency offered to help with publicity, and the group was invited to sing in some of New York's poshest nightclubs. The allure of success posed a problem for Seeger and the Almanacs that has been a particularly nettlesome one for him and artists on the Left: What concessions can or should an artist make to a mass audience without loss of artistic integrity and political radicalism?

By the time Seeger was drafted in 1942, however, critics had called attention to the Almanacs' ties, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation had already begun to fill what is no doubt a very fat file on the tall, skinny balladeer. While on his first leave from the army, Seeger also married Tashi Ohta, who virtually all of their friends agree played a crucial role in organizing Seeger's career and managing his finances.

Seeger was apparently not entangled in the sectarian squabbling that contributed to the Communist Party's weakness at the end of World War II. He had joined the Party in 1942 and would depart about 1950, but like many artists within the Party orbit, he was often viewed as unreliable.

But regardless of Seeger's feelings about the Party, it didn't take him very long to realize that amidst the paranoia and reaction of the Cold War, the union movement had no interest in associating itself with singing radicals. In 1948 Seeger accompanied Progressive Party presidential candidate Henry Wallace as he toured the South, an experience that seemed particularly depressing and alienating. Soon the People's Songs collective Seeger had established in 1945 fell apart. On 4 September 1949, Seeger's car was attacked and his wife and three-year-old son were slightly injured by shattered glass at the infamous Peekskill, New York, riot.

Seeger's creativity has always seemed nurtured by adversity. Amid the siegeline climate of the late forties, he and Lee Hays cowrote "If I Had a Hammer," one of the most optimistic paeans to the possibilities of constructive social change. By 1950 Hays and Seeger, along with Fred Hellerman and Ronnie Gilbert, formed the Weavers and enjoyed instant success with highly sweetened versions of "Goodnight Irene" and other folk tunes.

Just as quickly as the Weavers topped the charts, however, their career was torpedoed by blacklisting, red-baiting, and numerous cancellations of their performances at the last minute. Seeger spent the fifties defining and nurturing his own audience. He still performed occasionally with the Weavers, but he mainly supported his family with appearances on the college circuit and at Left summer camps. He also recorded five to six albums per year for Folkways Records.

In 1955 Seeger was subpoenaed by the House Un-American Activities Committee and became one of the few witnesses called that year who didn't invoke the Fifth Amendment. In a dramatic appearance before the committee, Seeger claimed that to discuss his political views and associates violated his First Amendment rights.

The following year, which saw Seeger compose "Where Have All the Flowers Gone?," Seeger, Arthur Miller, and six others were indicted for contempt of Congress by an overwhelming vote in the House of Representatives. In 1961 he was found guilty of contempt and on 2 April he was sentenced to ten years in prison. The following year his ordeal ended when the case was dismissed on a technicality.

Seeger had cultivated a folk music revival in the 1950s, and the movement gathered momentum from 1958 into the early 1960s. ABC decided to cash in on the craze with a weekly television show, Hootenanny, but enthusiasm for the program waned when it was discovered that Seeger had been blacklisted and would not be permitted to appear.

Pete Seeger spent a considerable amount of time in the South during the civil rights marches of the 1960s. It was his variation of an old spiritual, which Seeger called "We Shall Overcome," that has become an anthem of the crusade for equality in America.

The Vietnam War deeply and personally offended Seeger, who used his network television return on The Smothers Brothers Comedy Hour to air a scathing attack on Lyndon Johnson's war policies, "Waist Deep in the Big Muddy." The song was cut by network censors, but Seeger made a second appearance on the program and sang the song without interruption.

Like many Old Leftists, Seeger was not entirely comfortable with the cultural radicalism of the 1960s. He disliked the generational tensions fostered by the movement (he once recorded a song called "Be Kind to Parents") and repeatedly advised young radicals to avoid divisions along generational lines.

Amidst the mud and despair of Resurrection City, an effort by the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.'s followers to carry out his dream of establishing a poor people's community in Washington and focusing the nation's attention on the problems of the poor, Seeger began to question the validity of his activism. In the 1970s and 1980s he continued to perform benefits for causes too diverse to list, but increasingly Seeger focused his attention on environmental issues.

When Pete Seeger and his friends launched the sloop Clearwater into the Hudson River in 1969, he was in effect fulfilling a lifelong love of the outdoors and a longstanding desire to do something to clean up the environment polluted by irresponsible corporate and public water usage.

Pete Seeger has become a highly visible and much beloved figure in American life. He has issued some one hundred records, written and collaborated on numerous radical songbooks, articles, and technical manuals on playing the banjo. Sixty years after the Popular Front, Seeger is one of the last links with the optimistic and expansive culture of Depression-era America.

[See also Folk Music; Guthrie, Woody; Sing Out!/Broadside.]

FURTHER READING

Dunaway, David King. How Can I Keep from Singing: Pete Seeger. New York: Da Capo Press, 1990.

Seeger, Pete. The Incomplete Folksinger. Edited by Jo Metcalf Schwartz. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992.

—RICHARD TASKIN

SEVEN ARTS. Both a magazine (1916–1917) and a coterie, if not a small movement, of left-leaning intellectuals and artists, the Seven Arts crystallized in New York City in the period marked by the First World War. Edited by James Oppenheim, Van Wyck Brooks, and Waldo Frank, the review published in its brief life such legendary figures as journalist John Reed, poet Carl Sandburg, novelists John Dos Passos and Theodore Dreiser, and essayist Randolph Bourne, along with many other notable names including Sherwood Anderson, D. H. Lawrence, and Romain Rolland. It featured many of the same authors as the older, but more colorful Masses. Culture critic Lewis Mumford was one of a few members of the group who did not appear in the magazine because of its early demise. Though vaguely “highbrow” in its tone, the Seven Arts was consciously radical in overall intention, designed to function as an evolving manifesto for a new American society. The main editor, James Oppenheim (1882–1932), was a Whitmanesque poet whose strident verse expressed the spirit of the periodical, which intended to go beyond mere commentary and reflection by inaugurating a “communism of genius” to inspire and educate the nation to set aside the limitations of commercial civilization and culture.

Beneath the editorial posture was a collective desire to promote a national cultural renaissance as an alternative to the militaristic nationalism being drummed up by the advocates of U.S. entry into World War I. When Woodrow Wilson declared war on the Central Powers in April 1917, the Seven Arts was opening its pages to Randolph Bourne (1886–1918), an outspoken critic of the war who had been cut off by most journals because of his stand.

Bourne's ensuing essays against the war, published from June through October 1917, covered the question from several perspectives, trying to capture the atmosphere of silent opposition by youth as well as the ins and outs of official pro-war strategies and rationalizations. His own deep oppositionism is the strongest motif in the unique series, which ended in the last issue of the Seven Arts with “Twilight of Idols.” Here he indicted the failure of instrumental pragmatism as a guide in the crisis and argued for intensified defiance on the part of like-minded “malcontents.” Bourne called for a bold new movement armed with an ultracritical spirit that would lead the younger generation along paths yet uncharted, but certainly envisioned in the dreams of revolutionaries and radical reformers. In a writing that was quite spare of political rhetoric or axioms, his challenge was strikingly direct.

Bourne's controversial articles, a risky gambit on the part of the editors, brought pressure on the magazine's patron, who abruptly withdrew vital financial backing. The demise of the Seven Arts thus repeated within weeks the patriotic suppression of the Masses. With the collective effort curtailed, the Seven Arts group turned to work on individual projects. Bourne continued his investigation of the war mentality on a more generic level in his unfinished work, “The State,” which was interrupted by his death in December 1918.

Waldo Frank and Van Wyck Brooks came together again in 1926 on the editorial board of the New Masses, dedicated to Left culture and politics. With them on the board was Lewis Mumford, who linked with remnants of the Seven Arts circle in 1921 and was close to its leading figures thereafter. Numerous veterans of the Seven Arts and the Masses joined these editors. In 1935 many enlisted in the new League of American Writers, which grew out of the U.S. Communist John Reed Clubs. Waldo Frank was the league's chairman until he split with the Stalinists over the stormy issue of the Moscow purge trials. Mumford and Brooks also withdrew. Later, in 1940, Frank and Mumford resigned in succession from the New Republic because of that journal's shyness about war against the Axis. They tried abortively to start, with the help of Protestant theologian Reinhold Niebuhr, a new magazine that was to focus on the world crisis from a Left perspective.

In his individual work Lewis Mumford turned out to be the most prophetic of the group after Bourne, and perhaps the most influential. His criticism of urban civilization, expressed in more than a score of books, anticipated and helped form the radical environmental movement that began in the 1970s. His new importance for social theory is best indicated in his discovery (or interpretation) of "the megamachine," which was his term for massed and regimented human labor considered as an archetypal true machine. With such a vision latent in him in the thirties it is no surprise that he could not join in the defense of Stalin's grim vision.

More activist, although not a Communist Party member, was Waldo Frank (1889–1967), who for a time gave open support to Communist initiatives and strove to remain in the forefront of intellectual radicalism through the twenties, thirties, and beyond. An unorthodox Judaic mystic, Frank was also prophetic in a way in his plunge into Latin America in the twenties and thirties, meeting Trotsky in Mexico, being assaulted by fascist thugs in Buenos Aires, seeing the sister continent as a lecturer and informal representative of the U.S. Left. Frank also traveled in Republican Spain and other parts of Europe and wrote books about his far-flung observations, his last about Cuba after a visit with Fidel Castro in 1960.

Though his America's Coming of Age (1915) was one of the starting points for the socialistic philosophy of the Seven Arts, Van Wyck Brooks (1886–1963) was never as visible politically as a John Reed or a Waldo Frank. His deliberate concentration was on literary criticism, especially in the relatively remote field of "classical American literature," where his involvement was so intense that it led to periods of instability and a mental breakdown. Brooks's great contribution to literary criticism, an area of culture that seems peculiarly vulnerable to reactionary turns, was his insistence on a literature rooted in the common essence of human life and reflecting democratic and socialistic values. He stood against the petty formalism introduced by the so-called New Critics and, by extension, against the more convoluted formalism of their structuralist and deconstructionist successors.

As a writer on American music and modern art, Paul Rosenfeld (1890–1946) occupied an even more esoteric position than Brooks. He best represents the apolitical strain in the Seven Arts philosophy. A critic of capitalist society and its culture, he was utopian enough to forgo encouragement for the Left's ranks in the thirties because their program did not include radical aesthetic demands. The grain of truth in this position can be granted; it was shared by nearly all of the Seven Arts circle, who felt that a certain poetic temperature not attainable through politics was necessary to fuse the crude and fragmented American masses into a coherent society equal to the awesome potential of twentieth-century civilization.

[See also Frank, Waldo.]

FURTHER READING

- Aaron, Daniel. Writers on the Left. New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1961.
- Brooks, Van Wyck. An Autobiography. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1965.
- Frank, Waldo. Memoirs of Waldo Frank. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1973.
- Hansen, Olaf, ed. The Radical Will. New York: Urizen Books, 1977.
- Mumford, Lewis. Findings and Keepings: Analects for an Autobiography. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1975.
- Rosenfeld, Paul. Port of New York. Reprint. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1966.
- The Seven Arts*. Edited by James Oppenheim et al. New York (November 1916–October 1917). New York: AMS reprint, 1954.

—JOSEPH JABLONSKI

SHACHTMAN, MAX (1904–1972). A teenage enthusiast of the Russian Revolution, a Trotskyist leader, and finally an opponent of U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam, Max Shachtman journeyed over five decades from one extreme to the other of the U.S. Left. Along the way he trained generations of young followers in Marxism, winning lasting devotion from some and causing bitter disillusionment in others.

A Jew born in Warsaw in 1904, Shachtman came with his mother to New York the next year. He learned socialism from his garment-worker father, his East Harlem neighbors (who nearly elected Socialist Morris Hillquit to Congress in 1916), and his history teacher at DeWitt Clinton High School. He dropped out of City College and spent his time cheering the most radical speakers at "Trotsky Square" (110th Street and Fifth Avenue), hoping someone would recruit him. When he was seventeen he joined the Workers (Communist) Party.

Soon he moved to Chicago and began editing the Young Worker. In 1926 Party leader Jim Cannon, whose midwestern Wobbly radicalism and impressive oratory Shachtman admired and imitated, made him editor of Labor Defender. He made it the U.S. Left's first photographic magazine. As Labor Defender editor he fought to save anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti from execution, speaking at street-corner meetings that were broken up again and again by police. He supported Cannon in the Communist factional warfare of the 1920s.

Cannon won Shachtman over to Trotskyism in 1928. From a minor Communist leader Shachtman became a major Trotskyist leader. He edited the Trotskyists' newspaper, the Militant, and their journal, the New International, and founded Pioneer Publishers to publish Trotsky's works. He was Trotsky's admiring and trusted "commissar for foreign affairs," arranging Trotsky's moves from Turkey to France and Norway to Mexico and representing him at European conferences. When the first congress of the Fourth International met in a village outside Paris in 1938, Shachtman presided.

Shachtman's antagonism toward Stalin's regime deepened when he helped expose the 1936–1938 Moscow trials. When the Soviet Union invaded Poland he rejected Trotsky's call to defend the Soviet Union. The Trotskyists split. Shachtman decided that the Soviet Union was a new class society, "bureaucratic collectivism." He opposed the Second World War, calling for Hitler's defeat by resistance movements instead of Allied troops. He attended the United Auto Workers' 1944 convention, convinced its Rank and File Caucus to stand fast against the no-strike pledge, and was vindicated when the convention voted it down.

After the war Shachtman's horror at the spread of Stalinism in eastern Europe and his support for United Auto Workers president Walter Reuther pulled him away from the Fourth International. He called for a rethinking of Marxism as profound as Lenin's. He supported driving Communists from the Congress of Industrial Organizations, urged his followers to back labor candidates in Democratic primaries, and refused to condemn the Bay of Pigs invasion. He also left his second wife and New York City, moving with his third wife to a Long Island suburb. He joined the Socialist Party in 1958 and found new allies among top officials of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) as well as civil rights organizers like Bayard Rustin.

By 1965 Shachtman felt that his dream of a realigned, labor-based liberal party emerging from the Democratic Party was coming true. But before his realigned party was born it was torn apart by the Vietnam War. Shachtman predicted often that the Vietnam issue would go away soon. For five years he kept his small band of followers in line behind a vague call for negotiations. But while the New Left influenced some Socialists, it repelled him. He clung to his allies among hawkish AFL-CIO officials. When he spoke out against U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam in 1970, his old supporters Michael Harrington and Irving Howe denounced him. His distaste for George McGovern's presidential campaign was splitting apart the Socialist Party when he died in 1972.

Shachtman captivated his followers with his slashing wit and irony, awed them with his knowledge of Marxist theory, and swept them up in his fierce emotional loyalties. Admiration turned into intense feelings of betrayal among those who recoiled from his politics. Shachtman felt betrayed in his turn by the many followers who he felt had deserted him. His last years were filled with bitterness at these deserters, whom he blamed for his repeated failures to win a mass following for socialism. But his final resolve to support the "goddamn Democrats" was tempered by nostalgic, even sentimental warmth toward those he had worked with in the 1930s to create the anti-Stalinist Left.

[See also Socialist Party; Socialist Workers Party; Trotskyism; Workers Party.]

FURTHER READING

Drucker, Peter. Max Shachtman and His Left. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1994.

Shachtman, Max. Papers. Tamiment Library, New York University.

Wald, Alan. The New York Intellectuals. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

—PETER DRUCKER

SHAHN, BEN (1898–1969). One of the foremost practitioners of "social realism," Ben Shahn contributed art in several media to the struggles of working people in the 1930s and 1940s. His distinctively stylized photographs of the rural South and Midwest, produced under the aegis of the Farm Security Administration, have remained familiar images of the era, second, perhaps, only to Dorothea Lange's. A stunning group of lithographed posters produced while in the employ of the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the mid-1940s was distributed by the tens of thousands for the first labor Political Action Committee. Working as an assistant to Diego Rivera on the infamous Rockefeller Center murals, Shahn simultaneously sharpened his craft in that medium and earned the enmity of the Communist Party for collaborating with a Trotskyist. (Shahn's own politics stayed an independent shade of red.) While his most famous work dates to the early thirties (a series of paintings and drawings on the Sacco-Vanzetti case), he created art for the civil rights and anti-war movements in the 1960s. The trademark huge-handed workers he had depicted earlier, however, disappeared from his images by 1950, along with his belief in the American working class as central agent of social transformation.

Shahn then sought a middle ground between formal exploration and figurative work—unlike the abstract expressionists, many of whom had been Shahn's comrades-in-arms before the war. For his continuing allegiance to recognizable content his painting was derided by New York critics as "middlebrow." Yet, as other social realists aesthetically died with the Old Left, Shahn arguably grew as a political artist by adapting to changed circumstances and allowing his art to incorporate existential ideas (see, for example, the masterful, anti-nuclear "Lucky Dragon" series of the late 1950s). In his later years he also became the most readily identifiable American artist of Jewish themes.

—FRED GLASS

SHARE CROPPERS UNION. A predominantly black underground organization of sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and agricultural laborers, the Share Croppers Union (SCU) was the largest Communist-led mass organization in the Deep South. Founded in Alabama in the spring of 1931, the organization was first initiated by black tenant farmers in Tallapoosa County. Ralph and Tommy Gray gathered together a small group of black tenant farmers and sharecroppers and requested assistance from the Communist Party in Birmingham. Mack Coad, an illiterate black steelworker originally from Charleston, South Carolina, was dispatched from Birmingham on behalf of the Communist Party and became the first secretary of the Croppers and Farm Workers Union. Based mainly in Tallapoosa and Lee counties, Alabama, under Coad's leadership the union built up an estimated membership of eight hundred within a two-month period.

In July 1931, the union faced its first in a series of violent confrontations with local authorities. A shootout between union members and the local sheriff at Camp Hill, Alabama, left Ralph Gray dead and forced many union and non-union tenant farmers into hiding. Mack Coad was forced to flee Alabama for the time being, but the union regrouped under the leadership of Young Communist League activist Eula Gray, Tommy Gray's teenage daughter. Once the union was reconstructed, it adopted the name SCU.

By the summer of 1932, the reconstituted SCU claimed six hundred members and a new secretary was appointed. Al Murphy, a black Birmingham Communist originally from McRae, Georgia, transformed the SCU into a secret, underground organization. SCU militants were armed for self-defense and met under the auspices of "Bible meetings" and "sewing clubs." Under Murphy's leadership, the union spread into the "black belt" counties of Alabama and into a few areas on the Georgia-Alabama border.

In December 1932, another shootout occurred near Reeltown, Alabama (not far from Camp Hill), which resulted in the deaths of SCU members Clifford James, John McMullen, and Milo Bentley, and the wounding of several others. The confrontation erupted when SCU members tried to resist the seizure of James's livestock by local authorities who were acting on behalf of James's creditors. Following a wave of arrests and beatings, five SCU members were convicted and jailed for assault with a deadly weapon.

Faced with large-scale evictions resulting from New Deal acreage reduction policies, sharecroppers flocked to the union. Its growth was by no means hindered by the gun battle. By June 1933, Murphy claimed nearly two thousand members, and by the fall of 1934 the official figures skyrocketed to eight thousand. Although most of those who joined the union were victims of mass evictions, the SCU led a series of strikes by cotton pickers in Tallapoosa, Montgomery, and Lee counties. Nevertheless, by 1934 the SCU had failed to recruit a single white member. The Party attempted to form an all-white Tenants League, but the effort proved to be a dismal failure.

Murphy, who left Alabama in the winter of 1934, was replaced by Clyde Johnson (alias Thomas Burke and Al Jackson), a white Communist originally from Minnesota who had had considerable experience as an organizer in Birmingham, Atlanta, and Rome, Georgia. Partially reflecting the new outlook of the Popular Front, Johnson made an effort to bring the SCU out of its underground existence and transform it into a legitimate agricultural labor union. He founded and edited the SCU's first newspaper, the Union Leader, and created an executive committee that elected Hosie Hart, a black Communist from Tallapoosa County, as president. Johnson attempted to establish a merger with the newly formed, Socialist-led Southern Tenant Farmers Union, but the leadership of the latter, particularly H. L. Mitchell and J. R. Butler, rejected the idea, claiming that the SCU was merely a Communist front.

Throughout 1935, despite the union's push for legal status in the black belt, SCU activists faced severe repression during a cotton choppers' strike in the spring and a cotton pickers' strike between August and September. In Lowndes and Dallas counties, in particular, dozens of strikers were jailed and beaten, and at least six people were killed.

In 1936 the SCU, claiming between ten thousand and twelve thousand members, spread into Louisiana and Mississippi. It opened its first public headquarters in New Orleans and, in an attempt to transform the SCU into a trade union, officially abandoned its underground structure. However, the SCU failed to deter the rapid process of proletarianization occurring in the cotton South—a manifestation of mass evictions and the mechanization of agriculture. Johnson continued to make overtures toward the Southern Tenant Farmers Union throughout 1936, but all efforts to combine the two unions failed. Thus, with support from Communist rural experts, particularly Donald Henderson, Johnson chose to liquidate the SCU as an autonomous body. All sharecroppers and tenant farmers were transferred into the ranks of the National Farmers Union, and the SCU's agricultural wage laborers were told to join the Agricultural Workers Union, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor. The latter soon transferred into the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing, and Allied Workers of America in 1937.

Failing to solve the problems created by the New Deal and the mechanization of agriculture in the cotton South, the Party's decision to divide the organization "by tenure" in 1937 marked the end of the SCU. Nevertheless, a few SCU locals in Alabama and Louisiana chose not to affiliate with any other organization and maintained an autonomous existence well into World War II.

[See also Agrarian Radicalism; Birmingham, Alabama; Communist Party, USA; Mitchell, H. L.; Southern Tenant Farmers Union; Southern Worker and the Communist Press in the South.]

FURTHER READING

- Beecher, John. "The Share Croppers' Union in Alabama." Social Forces 13 (October 1934).
 Dyson, Lowell K. Red Harvest: The Communist Party and American Farmers. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1982.
 Kelley, Robin D. G. Hammer and Hoe: Alabama Communists during the Great Depression. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.
 Rosengarten, Theodore. All God's Dangers: The Life of Nate Shaw. New York: Vintage Books, 1984.

—ROBIN D. G. KELLEY

SHIRTWAIST MAKERS STRIKE, 1909-1910. Known as the "Uprising of the 20,000," the general strike of New York shirtwaist makers rallied sectors of the entire community. The male leadership of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU) was at first thrown off guard by the unanticipated militancy of these teenage immigrant girls but eventually seized the opportunity to put the union on firm ground. The New York Women's Trade Union League (WTUL) enjoyed its finest hour in assisting the young garment workers. Radicals of various kinds envisioned the birth of the modern proletariat and rushed forward to educate the strikers in the principles of socialism.

The strike began on 22 November 1909 at a mass meeting of shirtwaist makers in Cooper Union. After listening to a round of speeches, the young Socialist Clara Lemlich rose from the floor to address the assembly in Yiddish: "I have listened to all the speakers, and I have no further patience for talk. I am one who feels and suffers from the things pictured. I move we go on strike." The audience of three thousand responded enthusiastically and voted to strike. Preceded by a series of small walkouts, all spontaneous protests over the grueling subcontracting system, the Cooper Union meeting thus marked the beginning of a general strike. More than fifteen thousand workers walked out the next morning, and within a few days their numbers topped twenty thousand. With nearly three-quarters of its workers on strike, the shirtwaist industry virtually shut down.

Officers of ILGWU Local 25, the shirtwaist makers' union, were unprepared to oversee a strike of this magnitude, and the responsibility fell to the WTUL, which had already begun to organize in the garment industry, and to women of the New York City Socialist Party. These women shared the work of managing the twenty halls headquartering strikers, organizing picket lines, coordinating publicity, raising funds, staging parades, bailing out jailed picketers, allotting strike benefits, and signing women into the union. Both the WTUL and Socialist women pledged to support the strikers' central demand, union recognition and the closed shop.

Despite their common loyalty to the spirit of the strike, the WTUL and Socialist women came into bitter conflict during its course and gradually hardened the line between reformist and radical strategies. The WTUL hoped to broaden its base of support by rallying women outside the labor movement, particularly those affiliated with the growing movement for woman suffrage. They won several wealthy women to their cause, notably Alva Belmont, a prominent suffragist and multimillionaire, and Anne Morgan, daughter of the financier J. P. Morgan. Whereas Belmont interpreted the strike as a stage for suffrage agitation, Morgan sought to bar Socialists from public meetings and accused them of taking advantage of the situation "to teach their fanatical doctrines." In response, the Socialists who were members of the WTUL called upon the leadership to discipline Belmont and Morgan.

When the league failed to defend Socialists, several resigned and began to issue salvos against the well-to-do suffragists. Theresa Malkiel published a fictional "autobiography," Diary of a Shirtwaist Striker (1910), which appeared first as a serial in the New York Call. Malkiel, a principal target of Morgan's attacks, worked ceaselessly throughout the strike. She led a vigorous campaign within the Socialist Party to limit cooperation with mainstream activists, especially suffragists, whom she now identified as "class enemies." Outside New York and Chicago, however, Socialist women continued to honor their historic relationship with the woman suffrage movement.

While the ranks of Socialist women split over Malkiel's absolute dictum, the party itself gained several prominent trade unionists, including Rose Schneiderman and Leonora O'Reilly, and Socialists moved into the most influential positions in Local 25, ILGWU. When the strike ended without the closed-job agreement in February 1910, Socialist women blamed their former allies, the WTUL, and pledged to keep close to their own organization in all future agitations. Unlike any previous event, the shirtwaist makers strike served to highlight the limits as well as benefits of cross-class ventures.

[See also International Ladies Garment Workers Union; Malkiel, Theresa Serber; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism, 1870-1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.
- Dye, Nancy Schrom. As Sisters and as Equals: Feminism, Unionism, and the Women's Trade Union League of New York. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1980.
- Schofield, Ann. "The Uprising of the 20,000: The Making of a Labor Legend." In A Needle, a Bobbin, a Strike: Women Needleworkers in America, edited by Joan M. Jensen and Sue Davidson. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1984.
- Tax, Meredith. The Rising of the Women: Feminist Solidarity and Class Conflict, 1880-1917. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1980.

—MARI JO BUHLE

SHOE WORKERS. One of the earliest unions to embrace socialist doctrines, and one of the rare socialistic Irish-dominated unions, the Boot and Shoe Workers Union (B&SWU) reflected the strength of the nineteenth-century socialist movement. Shoemaking, one of the earliest industries organized on a substantial scale, had seen a durable labor institution, the Knights of St. Crispin, and a republican radicalism of sorts, for decades before the appearance of the socialist movement. From the mid-nineteenth century onward, shoe workers also faced a specific, potentially radicalizing condition of accelerated mechanization. Shoe workers formed the largest single segment of the Knights of Labor in Massachusetts. But with the failure of the Knights to consolidate their position, three distinct shoe workers' organizations remained in the field. Successful consolidation took place amid an 1890s boomlet of socialistic sympathies in the labor movement. James F. Carey, later a Socialist state legislator, was among the leaders of the new B&SWU formed in Boston in April 1895, as was Carlton Beals (not to be confused with the journalist of the same name), later a Socialist city marshal of Brockton.

From a political standpoint, the shoe workers provided the most important consolidated constituency for the strong Massachusetts urban socialist movement of the 1890s. As shoe workers had since the 1870s turned toward plans of cooperation to offset the emerging factory system, so shoemakers of the 1890s turned toward socialism in hopes of reducing or reversing the swift decline of conditions and wages.

Socialist influence within the B&SWU faded amid mass unemployment and an internecine conflict with the Socialist Labor Party (SLP). The SLP's Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance, unable to woo the B&SWU from the American Federation of Labor, established a dual union, the General Council of Shoe Workers, both unsuccessful in its own right and destructive in its sectarian approach. At a high point of the controversy, Daniel De Leon himself publicly debated shoe workers' leaders.

Abandoning the SLP, these leaders attempted for a time to guide a socialist union within the labor mainstream. Joining the Social Democratic Party in Massachusetts, they helped greatly to rally support in the election of John C. Chase, a former shoe worker, as mayor of Haverhill, Carey and Louis Scates as state legislators, and Carey repeatedly as city councilman in Haverhill. During this period, Massachusetts gave the socialist movement a higher vote than did any other state.

Shortly after 1900, many shoe workers joined with others in abandoning the socialist movement, one of the Socialist Party's first major defeats and the eclipse of New England as a center of Socialist strength. The Catholic Church rallied enormous energies against socialism, just as it would do against communism, especially among Irish, French Canadian, and, later, Italian workers. (Attempts by Socialists to field "labor priests" proved a failure in the face of hierarchical opposition.) After 1903, the Socialist Party had passed its peak in Massachusetts, and the leaders of the B&SWU had accepted capitalism (indeed, a number of them eventually took business positions) and Democratic candidates vaguely committed to labor sympathies.

A more conservative, dues-conscious, and undemocratic internal regime followed within the B&SWU, prompting the Industrial Workers of the World and militant socialists to contest for power outside and within the union. Denied victory for elected leadership of the union in 1907, rebels established a radical-led United Shoe Workers of America in 1909, primarily among the highly skilled lasters. In time, the differences between the two organizations lessened, the two weak unions barely surviving the 1920s to grow modestly in the 1930s and the early 1940s. In the postwar period, Communist officers were quickly purged, and the union fell into a decline that runaway shops greatly exacerbated.

[See also British Americans; Irish Americans.]

FURTHER READING

Davis, Horace. Shoes, the Workers, and the Industry. New York: International Publishers, 1940.

Laslett, John. Labor and the Left: A Study of Socialist and Radical Influences in the American Labor Movement, 1881-1924. New York: Basic Books, 1970.

—PAUL BUHLE

SIEGMEISTER, ELIE (1909-1991). Called a "composer with a conscience," Elie Siegmeister labored throughout his career to synthesize a modernist compositional bent with a strong desire to compose American music for the American people. As a student at Columbia College, where he earned a B.A. in 1927, Siegmeister studied composition with Seth Bingham and counterpoint with Wallingford Riegger. Between 1927 and 1931, he studied in France with Nadia Boulanger, absorbing valuable lessons from her on compositional technique while feeling ever more dissatisfied with her abstract approach to music's relationship to its audience.

On his return to New York, Siegmeister was a member of the Young Composers Group, which featured meetings and mutual criticism and one performance at the New School for Social Research on 15 January 1933. From 1933 to 1936, Siegmeister was active in the Composers Collective, to which he contributed ideas on the relationship between music and its political and social context as well as several compositions. "Strange Funeral in Braddock" (1933), with a text by Mike Gold, tells the story of Jan Clepak, a Bohemian steelworker who is buried in a vat of liquid metal because of unsafe working conditions. The modernist style of this song conveys the pain and anger of Clepak's family and co-workers, but it was composed for listening rather than audience participation. In contrast, "The Scottsboro Boys Shall Not Die," published by the collective in its first Workers Song Book, is easy to sing while also conveying a sharp political message about racial justice and the evils of lynching. Siegmeister also composed workers' rounds intended for inexperienced performers of the collective's songbooks.

In 1939 Siegmeister founded the American Ballad Singers, a group that performed folk music at a time when the complex American musical heritage was being discovered in the music of immigrants, African Americans, cowboys, and band workers. He conducted this group until 1946. Many of Siegmeister's orchestral compositions from the early 1930s until the late 1940s, including "American Holiday" (1933), "Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight" (1937), "Ozark Set" (1943), "Prairie Legend" (1944), and "Sunday in Brooklyn" (1946), reveal an interest in American settings and folk and popular music. In an effort to make folk music more accessible, Siegmeister published A Treasury of American Folk Song in 1940. His Music Lover's Handbook, first published in 1943, offers many expressions of his philosophy that music and the life of ordinary people must be naturally integrated in order to express an American identity and also be good music. He noted that "Art with a capital A is a menace: music must relate to life."

Siegmeister continued to write music with politically conscious themes and texts long after other composers who participated in the activities of various groups on the Left and who used folk and popular music in their compositions for the concert hall shifted to other styles and aesthetic principles. His later works that demonstrate this commitment include the cantata "I Have a Dream" (1967) and "Cantata for FDR" (1981). Siegmeister helped to organize the 24 May 1968 concert presented by "Composers and Musicians for Peace." He taught at Hofstra University from 1949 to 1976, serving as the school's composer-in-residence during the last ten years of that period.

[See also Composers Collective; Scottsboro Case.]

FURTHER READING

Mandel, Alan. "Elie Siegmeister." In The New Grove Dictionary of American Music, edited by Stanley Sadie and H. Wiley Hitchcock. New York: Grove's Dictionaries of Music, 1986.

Oja, Carol J. "Composer with a Conscience: Elie Siegmeister in Profile." American Music 6, no. 2 (summer 1988).

Siegmeister, Elie, ed. The New Music Lover's Handbook. Irvington-on-Hudson, N.Y.: Harvey House, 1973.

—BARBARA L. TISCHLER

friend that he would rather be "an imp in Hades than a Negro in South Carolina," Modjeska Monteith was born in South Carolina. Part of the brown bourgeoisie (father a businessman and mother a teacher) of the state capital, Columbia, Simkins received her A.B. degree at Benedict College. She taught school until 1930, when she married Andrew Whitfield Simkins, grandson of a Reconstruction black leader. Since state law prohibited married women from teaching, Modjeska Simkins became involved in civil reform activities. She directed the South Carolina Tuberculosis Association for African-Americans and various other social projects, became involved with New Deal agencies, and during the 1930s began focusing on civil rights for blacks. In 1941 she was elected secretary of the newly founded South Carolina Conference for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

She worked for the equalization of salaries between white and black teachers, for the abolition of the white primary system, and for the desegregation of South Carolina public schools (including the Clarendon County case that resulted in the Supreme Court's declaring segregated schools unconstitutional). As a spokesperson for African Americans in South Carolina, Simkins became involved in a number of national organizations. In 1946 she became the South Carolina liaison to the Civil Rights Congress (formed when the International Labor Defense and the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties merged) and served on the Resolutions and the Continuations committees. She was the South Carolina liaison to and on the national advisory board of the United Negro and Allied Veterans of America. In 1947 she joined the Southern Conference for Human Welfare and served on its board of representatives and helped produce several reports for the group. That same year she became active in supporting the Southern Negro Youth Congress. In the 1949 "Freedom Caravan from the Fighting South," she campaigned in Harlem for reelection of councilman Benjamin Davis on the Communist Party ticket. In 1951 she became active in the American Peace Crusade. She was an initial sponsor of the group and held several offices and participated as a delegate at different meetings. She also worked in the Southern Regional Council and the Southern Conference Educational Fund. Her name regularly appeared on petitions and letters in the Daily Worker, the Daily People's World, and the Worker.

SIMKINS, MODJESKA MONTEITH (1899–1992). In the same year Walter Hines Page wrote a

Always outspoken, Simkins had a deep involvement in civil rights, which increasingly led her to Left movements. She was dismissed as state secretary of the NAACP in 1957 because a number of organizations that Simkins worked with were accused of being Communist fronts. She remained in the NAACP but accepted a public relations position at the Victory Savings Bank. During her unsuccessful runs for the Columbia City Council (1966) and the State House of Representatives (1968), she was smeared with red paint for associations with groups the House Un-American Activities Committee (the committee had a two-page list on Simkins's affiliations) had declared "Communist fronts" and subversive organizations. For the next two decades, Simkins's civic and reform activities centered around local projects. Most notably, she served as the public relations director of the Richland County Citizens Committee, an organization that encouraged direct political action on the part of the African American population and sponsored programs to desegregate the city's public schools, to integrate and improve the state mental hospital, and to desegregate the city's recreational facilities. In 1988 she helped bring a victorious voting rights suit against Richland County.

[See also Civil Rights Congress; Civil Rights Movement; Daily Worker; Southern Negro Youth Congress.]

FURTHER READING

Aba-Mecha, Barbara Woods. "Black Woman Activist in Twentieth Century South Carolina: Modjeska Monteith Simkins." Ph.D. diss., Emory University, 1978.

Simkins, Modjeska Monteith. Papers. University of South Carolina Library.

—ORVILLE VERNON BURTON

SINCLAIR, UPTON (1878–1968). The greatest socialist writer of the age, Upton Sinclair poured into novels, plays, and essays his intense hatred for capitalism. He found a readership for denunciations of the many wrongs of American life, and presented an interpretation of society in terms of class struggle, which makes his wide audience all the more interesting. Highbrow readers have often been uncomfortable at the limitations of his work as literature and laughed at his pre-Freudian view of individual psychology. "In so far as Mr. Sinclair's books show us anything real," wrote Van Wyck Brooks in 1921, "they show us the utter helplessness, the benightedness, the ignorance, the naïveté of the American proletarian movement." But such views fail to account for the power of the novels, their widespread influence, and Sinclair's energy and socialist fervor.

He was born in Baltimore and attended City College in New York. His literary career began in the popular fiction and journalism of the turn of the century. He wrote hackwork in the genres of commercial writing, turning out jokes, stories, sketches, serials, romances, and five-cent novels for adolescents. It was poorly paid, exploitative work that gave Sinclair an understanding of the way the poor were trapped. What he learned about plotting and characterization for a mass readership stayed with him when, in 1902, he was freed by the financial support of the Reverend George D. Herron to write his first serious novel, Manassas. His exposure to the Christian socialism of Herron, and the influence of William Morris and his American disciples who published the Comrade, came as a revelation. The conversion experience remained central to Sinclair's radicalism. In his most important novels he sought to portray how the conversion to socialism might come about.

In 1904 he spent seven weeks in the stockyards of Chicago investigating conditions in the meatpacking industry. The novel he produced, The Jungle (1906), which was serialized in the Appeal to Reason, was in the best tradition of muckraking journalism. Jack London called it "the Uncle Tom's Cabin of wage slavery." Despite the efforts of the meatpacking industry to discredit his novel, it made a substantial contribution to the campaign to regulate and inspect conditions. A disillusioned Sinclair remarked that he had aimed at the public heart and by accident hit the stomach.

Sinclair joined the Socialist Party in 1904, helped found the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, and used some of the profits from The Jungle to found the Helicon Hall Home Colony in Englewood, New Jersey. He remained a convinced socialist long after many of his contemporaries had made their compromises with American capitalism. But he was without millennial expectations and shared the perspective of the right-wing leadership of the party, who believed that the future of the movement lay in patient electoral work, party propaganda, and a cautious cultivation of Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor. (In The Industrial Republic, 1907, he argued for a socialism that made no pretensions at changing business methods, or the moral and intellectual inclinations of his countrymen.) Although he broke with the party in 1917 and went on to publish a war novel (Jimmie Higgins), he soon repented his enthusiasm for Woodrow Wilson and in polemical books such as The Brass Check (1919), The Goose Step (1923), and Mammonart (1925), did much to stir up trouble for the establishment. He had an incomparable instinct for the scandals and oppressions of the day. In novels like King Coal (1917) and Oil! (1927) he showed how a journalistic persistence and a flair for exciting narrative could dramatize important contemporary issues from a socialist point of view.

In the early 1930s there was much ambivalence toward Sinclair within the Communist Party. Granville Hicks in The Great Tradition (1933) was curiously impatient with Sinclair's free-floating (i.e., non-Party) socialism, and hostile toward his literary achievement. When Sinclair created a political action group, End Poverty in California (EPIC), which won control of the machinery of the Democratic Party in 1934, Communists bitterly opposed his candidacy. Although supported by a broad coalition of the unemployed, trade unionists, and progressives, he was narrowly defeated for governor in 1934.

After the EPIC campaign, Sinclair grew less politically active but maintained his extraordinary literary output. Beginning in 1939, he wrote a series of eleven "Lanny Budd" novels describing American history through the life of his protagonist. From Dragon's Teeth, third in the series, won the Pulitzer Prize in 1943. Other works notably lionized Franklin Roosevelt. The last in the series, Return of Lanny Budd, dramatized Sinclair's vision of postwar democratic struggles against the Communists worldwide. Sinclair had, in his way, become almost respectable. He was widely praised in the mainstream media and translated into forty languages. And yet he remained, in his own eyes, a socialist and visionary late into his old age.

[See also Radical Novel, 1870–1930.]

FURTHER READING

- Harris, Leon. Upton Sinclair: American Rebel. New York: Crowell, 1975.
- Homburger, Eric. American Writers and Radical Politics, 1900–39: Equivocal Commitments. London: Macmillan, 1986.
- Scott, Ivan. Upton Sinclair: The Forgotten Socialist. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1997.

—ERIC HOMBERGER

SING OUT!/BROADSIDE. Built on the groundwork laid by People's Songs, Sing Out! began monthly publication in May 1950. Like its predecessor, Sing Out! sought to foster a general revival in folk music and topical songs and create a progressive song movement, spearheaded by a singing labor movement. Many of the same individuals were involved in Sing Out!, and many newer singers, composers, and folklorists, like Sis Cunningham, Gordon Friesen, Malvina Reynolds, and others, found space for their endeavors within its pages. Sing Out! retained and expanded on People's Songs' commitment to diverse musical cultures and Pete Seeger remained one of its driving forces. The unexpected commercial success of the Weavers (Seeger, Lee Hays, Ronnie Gilbert, and Fred Hellerman) provided folk music with an audience far broader than previously imagined and laid the foundation for the folk revival of the mid- to late 1950s and early 1960s. After the first few years of financial uncertainty, Sing Out! managed to find a national audience of twenty-five thousand and influenced the establishment of similar magazines in England, continental Europe, Australia, New Zealand, continental Europe, Australia, New Zealand, and Japan. Sing Out! continued into the 1980s to give lyrics and inspiration to popular struggles of the times.

Critical to any understanding of Sing Out! as a phenomenon is the role of editor/publisher Irwin Silber, whose feisty Marxist editorials set the tone of the magazine during its first hungry decade and well into the 1960s. People's Songs had been a multifaceted organization that also booked musical artists and sponsored hootenannies. Silber had entrepreneurial relations with various partners, including Hootenanny Records and Oak Publications, but by the late 1950s, he mainly concentrated on his publishing interests. When the folk revival peaked in the 1960s, many new subscribers and advertisers found Silber's political perspective distasteful. Silber refused to compromise or modify his editorial views. Compounding the magazine's problems was a disastrous 1965 venture into newsstand distribution that left the magazine deeply in debt. In 1967 Silber was forced out as editor/publisher.

Even after Silber's departure, ad revenues and circulation continued to drop. Advertisers and subscribers (many of whom were musicians) seemed more interested in supporting publications that embraced rock and drug cultures. Specialized magazines such as Living Blues, Bluegrass Unlimited, and Guitar Player emerged, further fragmenting the folk music audience that Sing Out! once had exclusively to itself.

Broadside, a "sibling" of Sing Out!, grew out of this tradition. A crudely mimeographed bulletin foreshadowing the 1960s underground press, it began publication in February 1962, was issued "about twice a month," and served as the "National Topical Song Magazine." Although Seeger acted in an advisory capacity, and Sis Cunningham served as editor, Broadside was the project of a younger generation of singers and writers interested in topical songs in which "the 'commercial musical world' had little or no interest." Broadside's existence paralleled the emergence of a whole school of talented topical songwriters like Phil Ochs, Bob Dylan, Gil Turner, Ernie Marrs, Pete La Farge, Ana Perez, Nina Simone, Eric Anderson, Dick Farina, Tom Paxton, and Len Chandler among others. While People's Songs, and to a lesser extent Sing Out!, derived their inspiration from organized labor, Broadside found its voice in the civil rights movement and the emergent New Left. It issued special reports, articles, and songs by civil rights activists like Charles Sherrod, Bernice Reagon, and Julius Lester. Political, but in a highly undoctrinaire New Left style, Broadside, until its demise in 1970, sowed the seeds of the popular song revolution of that era.

[See also Folk Music; Seeger, Pete.]

FURTHER READING

- Seeger, Pete. The Incomplete Folksinger. Edited by J. Metcalf Schwartz. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992.
 Shelton, Robert. No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan. New York: Ballantine Books, 1986.
Sing Out! 1, no. 3 (July 1950).

—ROBERT MACIESKI

SIT-DOWN STRIKES. Workers remain in their workplace in sit-down strikes, which are also known as sit-in or stay-in strikes. They can range from a quick strike in a single department while a particular grievance is negotiated with management to plantwide, companywide, and even nationwide occupation of factories, offices, and stores. An example of the latter was the French general strike of 1968, in which ten million French workers occupied virtually all the factories of France and came close to bringing down the de Gaulle government.

Examples of sit-down strikes can be found in preindustrial societies, although they are rare. Some occurred in the nineteenth century, with the first reported in the United States among brewery workers in Cincinnati in 1884. Major factory occupations took place in Italy just after World War I. Sit-down strikes reached their peak, however, in the 1930s. The first major one to give the technique prominence was at the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company in Akron, Ohio, in February and March of 1936, part of the organizing drive of the then-new Congress of Industrial Organizations. In May and June of 1936 there were major sit-down strikes in France following the election of a People's Front coalition government. French unions were not involved in these strikes until well after they had begun, and the French Communist Party tried to prevent them to avoid damaging the People's Front government. In December 1936 and well into the winter of 1937, the most influential of these strikes in the United States took place at a series of General Motors facilities, centering in Flint, Michigan. This strike achieved the recognition of the United Auto Workers as bargaining agent for General Motors workers and set the pattern for a wave of sit-down strikes all over the United States in factories, offices, stores, and other settings.

There is a significant element of spontaneity in sit-down strikes because union leaders tend to be very uneasy about the inherent challenge to private property contained in the taking over of production facilities and, while they may be forced to support such strikes, rarely initiate them. Local union leaders, however, may be very much involved in organizing and sustaining such strikes.

Sit-down strikes have the advantage to workers of preventing scabbing or the continuing of normal or partial operation by employers; they offer protection from attack by police forces or vigilantes; and they hold the property of employers hostage in negotiations over demands or grievances. They are usually illegal, and in the United States, after the wave of sit-down strikes in the 1930s, were made illegal everywhere by direct statute.

There are possible extensions of the sit-down strike that can lead to further challenges to existing societies. In Japan, at the end of World War II, Tokyo bus drivers went on strike by staying on their jobs and running the buses. They simply did not collect fares, thus not alienating the bus-riding public. At the other extreme, the workers of Hungary in 1956 occupied the factories and took over their management through workers' councils, achieving the beginning of a social revolution. It would seem that sit-down strikes offer too many advantages to workers to disappear entirely from the arsenal of working-class weapons.

New Masses strike graphic by Herb Kruckman, 1937.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; United Automobile Workers.]

FURTHER READING

Fine, Sidney. Sit-down: The General Motors Strike of 1936-1937. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1969.

—MARTIN GLABERMAN

SLAVE INSURRECTIONS. Insurrection was a frequent phenomenon in U.S. slavery. Additional kinds of antislavery activities permeate African American history. There were several individual forms of such activity: the purchase of freedom, suicide (sometimes group), infanticide (especially of female infants), flight (eventually involving tens of thousands), and arson and poisoning attempts (slaves prepared food and heated homes). At times these latter efforts involved more than one slave and were indistinguishable from insurrections.

Organized violent assaults by slaves against their owners and agents recurred. A form of this resistance was the maroon phenomenon—that is, groups of runaway slaves maintaining themselves in surrounding swamps and mountain fastnesses. These maroon communities harassed plantations and served as magnets for other slaves. At times such maroon communities became so menacing as to provoke military expeditions attempting to destroy them.

The most challenging form of group resistance against slavery was insurrection. Uprisings and plots to rebel mark the history of slavery in the United States. Social order rarely was without such attempts. There were periods, however, when they occurred with marked frequency.

In the first half of the eighteenth century such conspiracies and uprisings were especially marked in New York (1712 and 1741) and in South Carolina. In the latter, expressions of organized slave unrest were repeated; especially consequential was that led by Cato in 1739. In that case hundreds of slaves were involved and the very existence of the white-dominated colony was in question.

In all cases of slave plots and uprisings, repression was merciless. Torture was common; scores were executed, often in barbarous fashion, with bodies of the dead publicly displayed. Many were lashed; still others were sold into slavery in the West Indies, marked as dangerous characters.

Contemporary exciting events stimulated slave uprisings: the Haitian rebellion and Gabriel's conspiracy in Virginia in 1800 is an example. Another instance was the national controversy of 1819–1820 concerning slavery (the so-called Missouri question) and the massive plot involving thousands led by Denmark Vesey in South Carolina in 1822. Perhaps, too, a factor stimulating collective slave unrest was the intensification of significant agitation against slavery as evidenced by the appearance of the first black-edited newspaper, Freedom's Journal, in New York City in 1827, David Walker's inflammatory Appeal to the Colored People of the World (1829), the beginnings of the national organization of free colored people (1830), and the agitation associated with Benjamin Lundy and William Lloyd Garrison, starting late in the 1820s and culminating in the appearance of the Liberator (January 1831).

Slave insurrection induced discussion in the abolitionist movement as to the propriety of the use of violence by slaves. The Garrison wing abjured use of force and urged only moral suasion. Another group—epitomized by Frederick Douglass early in his career—advocated political action to alter U.S. adherence to slavery. A third advocated or justified resort to violence by slaves. Henry Highland Garnet early broached this; in time many enemies of slavery, including Douglass and Wendell Phillips, moved to that position. John Brown epitomized this last group, which by the 1850s dominated abolitionism.

Slave unrest induced the reinforcement of federal forts in 1829 in Louisiana, North Carolina, and Virginia. Laws further restricting slaves and free colored people proliferated in the 1820s. Then came the revolt led by the Virginia slave Nat Turner in 1831.

The national agitation around slavery and the question of its expansion, intensifying in 1850, no doubt stimulated the extraordinary degree of slave unrest in the 1850s. Rebellion was particularly widespread in 1856 and in 1860, when the national presidential campaigns certainly reached the ears of slaves: "Beat me, beat me," screamed a tormented slave rebel in Tennessee in 1856, "Fremont hears my screams." During the Civil War, maroon activity and organized slave unrest rocked the Confederacy from Texas and Mississippi to Virginia and the Carolinas.

The denial of the reality of African American resistance to enslavement was maintained successfully in standard American histories until the 1940s. From then on, stimulated by World War II, adherence to this falsehood became increasingly absurd.

One further note: southern white sympathy with and even participation in slave rebellion was not uncommon. Some white people repeatedly suffered imprisonment for such sympathy and assistance. This led to the hanging of Joseph Wood in Louisiana in 1812, the conviction (but escape) of George Boxley in Virginia in 1816, and the jailing of four white men in South Carolina in 1822. John Brown was by no means unique in 1859. Had he been unique, it is unlikely that his martyrdom would have so awakened the nation's conscience.

FURTHER READING

- Aptheker, Herbert. Afro-American History: The Modern Era. New York: Citadel Press, 1971.
- Aptheker, Herbert. Anti-Racism in U.S. History: From the Colonial Era to the End of the Civil War. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1992.
- Aptheker, Herbert. American Negro Slave Revolts. New York: International Publishers, 1993.
- Aptheker, Herbert, ed. A Documentary History of the Negro People. 7 vols. New York: Citadel Press, 1951–1954.
- Egerton, Douglas R. Gabriel's Rebellion: The Virginia Slave Conspiracies of 1800 and 1802. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.
- Jordan, Winthrop D. Tumult and Silence at Second Creek: An Inquiry into a Civil War Slave Conspiracy. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1993.

—HERBERT APTHEKER

SLOVENIAN AMERICANS. Approximately 200,000 Slovenians came to the United States from the Austro-Hungarian Empire between 1880 and the end of World War I. They came from what is now Slovenia and from the adjacent territories along the Austrian and Italian borders. Although Slovenians possessed a higher educational level than surrounding peoples, Slovenian immigrants found themselves overwhelmingly employed in manual labor. A majority settled in the mining regions of the Midwest and Northwest, as well as in industrial cities such as Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and Chicago, where they commonly worked in the steel, iron, and automobile industries.

Due to their language skills, education, and ability to combine effectively with other Slavic groups, Slovenian Americans played a disproportionate role in American socialist movements, unions, and socialistically inclined fraternal organizations. They formed the Slovenian Socialist Federation and later helped form the Croatian and Serbian Socialist Federation. They took a leading role in the Yugoslav Socialist Federation, with Slovenian, Croatian, and Serbian branches, founded in 1909 and surviving into the 1950s. Proletarec (The Proletariat), organ of the Slovenian Socialist Federation, and Ameriski družinski Koledar (Slovenian American Family Almanac) were published in Chicago for decades. The Slovene National Benefit Society (SNPJ), founded in 1904, not only provided its membership with life and accident insurance, but also with social and ethnic camaraderie and with a press, Prosveta, in which its readers could learn about socialist ideas. Its most famed editors, novelist-critic Ivan Molek and Joze Zavertnik, influenced community thought widely.

To the left of the Socialist Party, Slovians played a major role in the "South Slavonian Federation" of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP), in which Croatians and Serbians also participated, with their own press and calendar. Slovenian SLP member Frank Petrovich was, indeed, perhaps the most important public personality of the post-De Leon SLP. Although of marginal importance to the outside world, the South Slavonian Federation (and its organ, Radnika Borba) supplied funds to maintain the SLP's public presence until the federation's demise in the 1960s. Slovenians, unlike the Croatians, never participated significantly either in the Communist Party or its fraternal International Workers Order.

The source of Slovenians' unique alignment within the Left can be traced to national sentiments dramatized by the world wars. The Slovenian faction did not follow the line of the Socialist Party against involvement in the war. Together with liberals, they helped form a Slovenian and later a Yugoslav-Republican Alliance (Hugoslvensko republikansko Zdrunzje), an organization that supported the idea of Yugoslavia as a federated republic. A Slovenian socialist leader from Austro-Hungary, Etbin Kristan—caught in the United States, by the outbreak of European fighting, while on a lecture tour—became leader of the organization. The Slovenian socialists rejoined the Socialist Party after the war and remained one of its faithful (if aging and gradually diminishing) sections, until leaving the party again, once more to favor war participation, in 1941.

Slovenians, like many other South Slavs, widely favored Tito partisans, notwithstanding the partisans' Communist affiliations. They formed the powerful Slovenian American National Council with Etbin Kristan as president and Louis Adamic as honorary president. The council in turn helped form the United Committee of South Slavic Americans under Adamic's presidency. A vital part of the American Slav Congress, they opposed the emerging Cold War as unnecessary and harmful to the new Yugoslavia. In their last major political act, South Slav socialists (and SNPJ loyalists) avidly supported Henry Wallace's campaign for the presidency on the Progressive Party ticket.

Unlike the fraternal societies associated with the International Workers Order, the SNPJ escaped the worst of the McCarthy era repression, and has remained a vital community presence with insurance benefits and an ambitious cultural program. Outlasting its founders by several generations, the SNPJ has retained some fifty thousand members. Its Prosveta, by this time a liberal/social democratic weekly with Slovenian- and English-language sections, has continued to take strong stands on labor and social issues.

[See also American Slav Congress; Croatian Americans; Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

Klemencic, Matjaz. Ameriski Slovenci in Nob v Jugoslaviji. Maribor: Založba Obzorja, 1987.

SNPJ Papers. Immigration History Research Center, University of Minnesota.

Stepanovich, Joseph. "Immigrant Workers and Immigrant Intellectuals in Progressive America: A History of the Yugoslav Socialist Federation." Unpublished dissertation, University of Minnesota, 1978.

—MATJAZ KLEMENCIC

SMEDLEY, AGNES (1892–1950). An American radical, a feminist, and an internationalist, Agnes Smedley achieved distinction as a novelist and foreign correspondent. Born into a Missouri tenant farmer family and growing up in a succession of Colorado mining camps near the site of the Ludlow massacre, Smedley devoted her life to publicizing and supporting what she saw as the most hopeful and humane forces within the Indian and Chinese independence and revolutionary movements, while waging a fiercely independent lifelong struggle for the equality of women and her own autonomy.

Her autobiographical novel Daughter of Earth (1929) is an early feminist classic. However, it was her writing and speaking about and on behalf of independence and liberation movements in India in the 1920s and in China from 1929 until her death in 1950 that left the deepest impression on American and foreign readers during her lifetime.

Smedley was among the first foreign correspondents to report from Communist headquarters in Yenan in 1937. Subsequently, as the only woman war correspondent at the front in the China theater, she traveled with Communist Eighth Route Army forces, reporting from behind Japanese lines. Her posthumously published (auto)biography of General Zhu De (old spelling: Chu Teh), The Great Road: The Life and Times of Chu Teh (1956), and her reportage from the front, Battle Hymn of China (1984), derived from her experiences in wartime China. Both are major works that express her conviction that the Chinese Communist Party was the single force capable of bringing national independence, democracy, and social justice to China. She died in England in 1950 in the midst of a campaign to brand her as a Communist and a spy.

[See also Asian Studies.]

FURTHER READING

Mackinnon, Janice, and Stephen Mackinnon. Agnes Smedley: The Life and Times of an American Radical. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.

Smedley, Agnes. Portraits of Chinese Women in Revolution. Edited by Jan Mackinnon and Steve Mackinnon. New York: Feminist Press, 1976.

—MARK SELDON

SMITH ACT TRIAL, 1943. Adopted by the U.S. Congress in 1940, the Smith Act made it a crime to teach, advocate, or encourage the overthrow of the U.S. government. It was first used against Trotskyists who were members of the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) and of Minneapolis Teamsters Local 544. As the United States was preparing for World War II, the Trotskyists refused to refrain from denouncing what they saw as imperialist war aims of the U.S. government. At the same time, they were a powerful force in the Minneapolis Teamsters Union and were locked in a fierce dispute with conservative Teamster president Daniel J. Tobin, a key national labor supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Of the twenty-eight who were arrested in 1941, eighteen were brought to trial in Minneapolis Federal Court in 1943. Among the defendants were SWP national secretary James P. Cannon; SWP national labor secretary Farrell Dobbs; SWP attorney Albert Goldman; editor of the SWP's weekly Militant Felix Morrow; SWP Minnesota organizers Grace Carlson and Oscar Coover; and such leaders and activists in Teamsters Local 544 as V. R. Dunne and Karl Skoglund.

The Communist Party, which considered the Trotskyists pro-Nazi "fifth columnists," supported the Smith Act prosecution. (The very same law would be turned against the Communist Party a few years later.) Many others associated with left-wing and liberal causes, however, opposed the trial. Hundreds of local unions throughout the country and several national unions also came out in support of the defendants.

Far from disavowing or blurring their revolutionary ideas, the defendants utilized the trial to proclaim, defend, and explain them. James P. Cannon's trial testimony and Albert Goldman's concluding speech were published in large quantities by the SWP as popular socialist educational tools. The defendants were convicted and served twelve- to eighteen-month prison sentences during 1944–1945.

[See also Socialist Workers Party; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

Cannon, James P. Letters from Prison. New York: Merit Publishers, 1968.

Cannon, James P. Socialism on Trial. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1973.

Dobbs, Farrell. Teamster Bureaucracy. New York: Monad Press, 1977.

Farrell, James T., et al. Who Are the Eighteen Prisoners in the Minneapolis Labor Case? New York: Civil Rights Defense Committee, 1944.

Socialist Workers Party. Why We Are in Prison: Farewell Speeches of the Eighteen SWP and 544-CIO Minneapolis Prisoners. New York: Pioneer Publishers, 1944.

—PAUL LE BLANC

SMITH ACT TRIALS, 1949. The Alien and Registration Act of 1940 was proposed by Congressman Howard Smith of Virginia, a poll tax supporter and a leader of the anti-labor bloc in Congress, and is generally referred to as the Smith Act. Signed into law by President Franklin Roosevelt, it was the first statute since the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 to make mere advocacy of ideas a federal crime.

Federal Bureau of Investigation director J. Edgar Hoover, immensely proud of his leading role in the government's nationwide persecution and deportation of radicals and immigrants during the 1919 Palmer Raids, suggested to President Harry Truman in 1948 that the Smith Act be used against the Communist Party and its sympathizers. Truman embraced the idea as a means to outflank Republican rivals who were accusing the Democrats of being "soft" on Communism. Going after domestic Communists also complemented his international policy in subduing "subversion" in Greece, Italy, and France, where Communism was widely popular and Communist parties could conceivably take shared or total control of the national government. The most significant political heresy trial in U.S. history would bring the Cold War home.

The eleven defendants were not charged with any overt acts. The accusation was that "they conspired . . . to organize as the Communist Party and willfully to advocate and teach the principles of Marxism-Leninism," which the government alleged to mean "overthrowing and destroying the government of the United States by force and violence" at some unspecified future time. They were also accused of conspiring to "publish and circulate . . . books, articles, magazines, and newspapers advocating the principles of Marxism-Leninism," again interpreted by the prosecution. The Communist Manifesto by Marx and Engels, Lenin's State and Revolution, and Stalin's Foundation of Leninism were placed into evidence as books from which the defendants taught. Among the eleven charged were Gil Green, a long-time Party leader; Eugene Dennis and Henry Winston, leaders of the national organization; John Gates, editor of the Daily Worker; and Gus Hall, leader of the Party in Ohio. The nine-month trial took place in New York City. Some four hundred police were detailed to the Foley Square courthouse, further feeding an aura of tension and potential violence.

Judge Harold Medina suffused both the pretrial and trial proceedings with consistent prejudicial rulings and quips that were often anti-Communist or racist in nature. At one point, Medina called black defendant Benjamin J. Davis, a Harvard graduate from a distinguished southern family, "boy." The jury was selected in a manner that insured all of its members were at least upper middle class. One showed overt prejudice before the trial even started, but was not dismissed.

The defendants fought the thought-crime nature of the proceedings and the government's caricaturing of their views. They claimed, to no avail, that they were for majority rule and against violence, except as a means of self-defense. Given the climate of hysteria generated by mass media, guilty verdicts for all were more or less foreordained. Ten got and served five years in federal prison and had to pay fines of $10,000. The eleventh defendant, Robert G. Thompson, a bearer of the World War II Distinguished Service Cross for bravery, received his government's gratitude in the form of a slightly shorter sentence of only three years. Four of the defendants forfeited their bail during the appeal process and went underground where they functioned for years before surrendering or being apprehended. While in prison Robert G. Thompson had his skull crushed by a group of Yugoslav fascists armed with a pipe, and Winston, denied essential medical care, was left blinded. Each of the defense attorneys was cited for contempt and served a prison sentence. Among those who served six months was George C. Crockett, an African American attorney who, later in his career, was first elected as a judge in Detroit's criminal court and then as a Michigan congressman.

The successful use of the Smith Act by the Truman administration against the top leaders of the Communist Party drove a large stake into the heart not only of the Party but of every organization in which the Communists had been active and influential. Not least of the indirect casualties was the newly formed Progressive Party. The indictments in the case came on the very eve of the Progressive Party's convention and appear timed to undermine support for the new party. The Communist Party, which was heavily involved with the Progressive movement, had expected the new party to garner between four and eight million votes. The indictments and the charge that the Progressive Party was just a front for Communism was a major factor in the Progressive Party's ultimately receiving just a bit over a million votes.

The convicted Communists appealed their cases, but in 1951 the United States Supreme Court upheld the convictions by a vote of six (including four Truman appointees) to two. Chief Justice Fred Vinson wrote the decision for the majority. Justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas dissented. Black noted that the government indictment was "a virulent form of prior censorship of speech and press" which is forbidden by the First Amendment and therefore unconstitutional.

Douglas wrote of his belief that the Communist Party was impotent and that "only those held by fear and panic could think otherwise." Therefore, the Party could not possibly represent a "clear and present danger" as required in the law. Douglas made clear the distinction between defending the Party's legal rights and supporting its positions. He pointed to the Party's uncritical support of the government of the Soviet Union and quoted Andrei Vishinsky, the chief prosecutor at the third Moscow purge trial, who had written, "In our state, naturally there could be no place for freedom of speech, press, and so on for the foes of socialism."

An ironic aspect of the convictions, which was not lost among civil libertarians and others, was that the Communist Party had fully supported the use in 1941 of the Smith Act against the leaders of the Socialist Workers Party. Motivated by its hatred of Trotskyist political opponents and its fervent support for the Soviet-American alliance of World War II, the Party had judged the Smith Act perfectly constitutional and the subsequent trials a legitimate government action. Those positions gravely undercut the credibility of the Party's efforts in the 1950s to characterize the Smith Act as unconstitutional and to mobilize a defense on the basis of political free speech and freedom of association.

The criminal convictions of the leadership of the Communist Party deprived it of legitimacy in the eyes of most Americans. Although membership in the Party did not significantly decline, the Party was unable to recruit many new members. More significant was the damage to Party fronts and peripheral organizations. Participation of former sympathizers fell away dramatically. Long-established groups became inactive or dissolved, and the creation of new groups virtually ceased. Among the allied groups whose demise was most damaging was the International Workers Order, an insurance and fraternal order with approximately 150,000 members. Although financially sound and not directly connected to the Communist Party, the International Workers Order was forced to dissolve in 1954 on the basis that it was a subversive organization. In addition to the political loss this entailed for the Party, it also deprived Communists of an institution from which they could borrow to finance their legal defense.

After the Smith Act convictions, Hoover, disappointed that only eleven Communists had been prosecuted, wrote Truman criticizing him as "insincere" for not indicting greater numbers. This failing was soon corrected. In 1951, twenty-three more leaders were indicted, including the legendary Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, who had first burst on the American political scene as an organizer and orator for the Industrial Workers of the World. Flynn, a founding member of the American Civil Liberties Union, had squared off with Hoover in the 1920s when she fought for the victims of the Palmer Raids and the 101 members of the Industrial Workers of the World who were sentenced to prison at a mass trial in Chicago. In 1953, Flynn and her codefendants were fined and imprisoned.

Further indictments followed throughout the nation. In the end over 140 Communist Party leaders were indicted. The trials did not cease until a number of Supreme Court decisions in 1957. Two of the most important were Yates v. United States and Watkins v. United States. The Yates decision overthrew the convictions of the second tier of Communist leaders. It drew a sharp distinction between the advocacy of an idea for purposes of incitement and the teaching of an idea as an abstract concept. In Watkins the Court ruled that a defendant who had opted not to use the Fifth Amendment could still use the First Amendment against "abuses of the legislative process." The vote was six to one, with Chief Justice Earl Warren writing the majority opinion.

The net effect of these and related decisions was to bring prosecutions to a halt. The Court had reaffirmed constitutional protections regarding free speech and self-incrimination while raising the requirement of "intent" to a level that made it difficult for prosecutors to show a Communist Party member had a criminal purpose. Nonetheless the Smith Act remained and still remains on the books. Moreover, the prosecutions had been very effective in destroying the momentum of the Party and giving it a subversive image with the general public which it has never totally shed.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley; International Workers Order; Scales, Junius Irving; Smith Act Trial, 1943; Winston, Henry.]

FURTHER READING

Ginger, Ann Fagan, and David Christiano, eds. The Cold War against Labor. 2 vols. Berkeley, Calif.: Meiklejohn Civil Liberties Institute, 1987.

Walker, Samuel. In Defense of American Liberty. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

—MICHAEL STEVEN SMITH

SNOW, EDGAR (1905–1972). Born in Kansas City, Missouri, and educated at the Missouri School of Journalism, Edgar Snow rose from his midwestern background to international fame as an intrepid journalist. After graduating from college, he made his way to Shanghai, China, at the age of twenty-two, and traveled by railroad to much of the rest of the country, which was in a chronic state of turmoil due to conflicts among warlords, the Kuomintang, and the young Communist movement. Snow reported on the situation in China for a number of newspapers and journals.

After several years of teaching in Peking, Snow made his way to far western China's Yenan province, where Mao Tse-tung had established a stronghold. In Yenan Snow obtained the confidence of Mao and other leaders, who had just survived the epic long march of several thousand miles from southern China. Snow's account of this, Red Star over China (1937), was the first by any Western journalist, and brought the remarkable story of China's Communist movement to world attention.

Snow also covered events in Burma, India, and Indochina, as well as the Soviet Union during World War II, and published some eleven books during his lifetime. His honest, straightforward, and plain-speaking style gained him the confidence of leaders as diverse as Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Gandhi, and his books enjoyed wide circulation.

[See also Asian Studies.]

FURTHER READING

Hamilton, John Maxwell. Edgar Snow: A Biography. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press, 1988.

Snow, Edgar. Journey to the Beginning. New York: Random House, 1958.

Snow, Lois Wheeler. Edgar Snow's China. New York: Random House, 1981.

—FRED WHITEHEAD

SOCIALIST FEMINISM. In the mid-1960s, women activists in the civil rights and New Left movements began to apply radical visions of freedom and equality to their own lives. The women's liberation movement that resulted, passionate and iconoclastic, conceptualized feminism in ways that went well beyond earlier feminist movements. Participants developed diverse views of women's liberation, among them socialist feminism. By 1970, socialist feminism had consolidated into a distinct trend within the modern women's movement.

Socialist feminists hoped to meld a materialist analysis of class domination with the best insights of radical feminism—its searing critique of male domination, its insistence that the personal is political, its creative development of nonhierarchical structures, its strategy of organizational autonomy, and its commitment to free sexual choice and expression. Their goal was a collectivist transformation of society that would be simultaneously feminist and socialist. Within the women's movement, socialist feminists sought to develop a feminist practice and theory that could address the needs of the majority of women—be they working-class, poor, black, brown, or red. Socialist feminists considered themselves part of the Left as well as of the women's movement, and many were active in Left organizations. Within the Left, they proposed that progressive individuals and groups pay careful and consistent attention to the special issues of women. Socialist feminists thus attempted to chart a path linking the claims of two quite different social movements. Not surprisingly, they frequently found themselves condemned as "bourgeois individualists" by leftists, and scorned as "male-identified politicians" by radical feminists. Nonetheless, they persisted in their efforts to develop an approach that would integrate the aspirations of the women's liberation movement and the Left.

Socialist feminists emphasized the qualitatively distinct character of the collective experience of diverse groups, and they sought to respect the specificity of each. In particular, they rejected the traditional liberal feminist goal of individual assimilation into the mainstream. They also rejected traditional Left analyses that subsumed issues of racism and sexism within the class struggle, or postponed women's liberation until after the socialist revolution, when all problems would somehow be automatically resolved. The questions socialist feminism posed to and for the Left thus converged, to some extent, with those long posed by the black movement within the United States, and by national liberation movements around the world.

Most American socialist feminists hardly differentiated between Marxist and non-Marxist socialisms, in this way reflecting the weakness of Left traditions in the United States. As the socialist-feminist movement evolved, disagreements concerning the relevance and interpretation of Marx, Marxism, and the Left tradition arose, but it is nonetheless impossible to demarcate some Marxist-feminist trend distinct from socialist feminism. Socialist feminists generally agreed that Marx and Engels paid serious attention to the so-called woman question, and assumed that a historical and materialist approach is necessary. At the same time they argued that the socialist tradition did not provide adequate theoretical or historical accounts of women's situation, much less practical guidance in the struggle for women's liberation. They differed, often widely, on the interpretation of these inadequacies as well as on just which of the tradition's elements remain useful and how to develop more adequate analyses and practice.

Socialist feminism took a variety of organizational forms. Small socialist-feminist collectives worked with poor and working-class women in factories and communities, seeking to raise consciousness while fighting for maternity benefits and child care or staffing battered women's shelters. Socialist feminists joined or formed women's health collectives that critiqued profit-making health care and developed self-help alternatives. Consciousness-raising groups, which were a central focus of the women's liberation movement, provided an exhilarating opportunity for leftist women to think politically on their own. City-wide socialist-feminist women's unions initiated campaigns for reproductive rights and against sterilization abuse. A national network of study groups pledged to dissolve the tensions between its members' Marxism and their feminism. Many socialist feminists also participated in the broader women's and mass movements of the time; they became active in local feminist groupings, in national organizations such as the National Organization for Women (NOW), the National Abortion Rights Action League, and the Coalition of Labor Union Women, and in anti-war, antinuclear, environmental, electoral, and other progressive campaigns. In the legal and policy arenas, socialist-feminist lawyers and activists worked to develop strategies that would go beyond the narrow individualism of traditional liberal feminism. Socialist-feminist scholars played a leading role in the development of women's studies in colleges and universities.

Some socialist feminists chose to work within Left organizations. One group, the New American Movement, described itself from the start as socialist-feminist, and others attempted to deal consistently with issues of women's liberation. But most Left organizations retained a traditional skepticism toward feminism, even in its newly elaborated socialist-feminist variant. Left groups were especially nervous about socialist feminism's critique of relations in the so-called private sphere, its views on the family, its commitment to the organizational autonomy of the women's movement, and its endorsement of gay rights and a freer sexuality. Feminists who were members of such organizations often paid the heavy price of isolation from the socialist-feminist community without being compensated by support for their efforts from within the group.

Socialist-feminist organizations were generally small and short-lived, never able to consolidate the resources and stability of mainstream feminist groups such as NOW. By the late 1970s, the double assault of economic recession and political reaction had taken its toll. Some socialist feminists concluded that their movement had died, but many argued that although weakened it survived in altered form. All agreed that the gap between socialist-feminist practical and theoretical activities had widened. Socialist-feminist activists were continuing to participate in women's organizations, progressive campaigns, and the Left, but now largely without the support of the vibrant socialist-feminist intellectual culture that had earlier been an integral element of socialist feminism as a movement. Socialist-feminist theorists, increasingly settled in academia, pursued research agendas that were less determined by practical questions of social change. New generations of feminists came of age that had never experienced the organic personal connections between activists and theorists which was an everyday experience in the women's liberation movement.

From the start, socialist feminists sought to develop a theoretical foundation that would underpin their myriad practical activities. First in the form of papers, pamphlets, and articles in movement newspapers or magazines, then increasingly as books and scholarly articles, socialist-feminist theoretical work burgeoned. One of the main questions socialist-feminist theorists addressed concerned the sources of women's subordination. Women's activities in the family household constituted, they suggested, the material basis of female oppression. Early socialist-feminist theorists used traditional Marxist categories to examine this "domestic labor." What came to be called the domestic labor debate was heavily criticized, however, as narrow and abstruse. Many proposed that women's experience might better be understood through the concept of patriarchy, imported from radical feminism. By the late 1970s, the predominant view among socialist feminists was that women are trapped within two coordinate systems of oppression, capitalism and patriarchy. In turn, this approach was censured for its simplistic dualism, and for its tendency to leave the analysis of capitalism to an unreconstructed traditional Marxist analysis.

The attempt to generate an integrated Marxist-feminist theoretical framework for the analysis of capitalist patriarchy produced a great deal of frustration among socialist feminists. American efforts to develop socialist-feminist theory were hampered by isolation from the renaissance of Marxist thought that had been flourishing in Europe since the early 1960s, and by a general impatience with theory; in addition, the repressive rightward political shifts of the post-Vietnam era quickly undercut the previous decade's radical optimism. In the more realistic mood of the late 1970s, socialist feminists recognized that the ambiguities of women's experience required a more subtle analytical approach. Many rejected the conceptual frameworks that had led to what they now saw as an "unhappy marriage of Marxism and feminism." They turned instead to historically rooted empirical studies, to more eclectic approaches to theory, or to new philosophical orientations that challenged conventional assumptions about the objectivity and certainty of knowledge. Those socialist feminists who retained the goal of developing a Marxist-feminist theoretical synthesis undertook the task with a more sophisticated awareness of its multitiered complexity.

By the early eighties, socialist feminists were addressing a broad range of concerns: the material basis for and history of women's subordination; the specificity of sexism as opposed to racism or class subordination; the diversity among women, flowing especially from differences of class, race, and ethnicity, but also from distinctions of age, ability, and sexual orientation; the relationship between Marxism and feminism; the role of families in societal reproduction; the place of women workers in the economy; the situation of women in socialist societies; the politics of women's liberation; the interplay of sexuality, consciousness, and ideology; the construction, reproduction, and representation of gendered subjectivity. In addition, numerous socialist feminists found themselves with fairly secure positions in academia, where their work adapted itself to disciplinary boundaries. Socialist-feminist scholars participated in the feminist critique of the traditional academic disciplines, and in the development of new perspectives and methods, often cutting across the disciplines.

Because socialist feminism was a movement committed to social transformation, research on the politics of women's liberation was especially significant. Socialist feminists analyzed the concept of equality, both examining its origins in liberal political theory and affirming its radical potential. They investigated women's activism in earlier social movements, thereby placing contemporary feminist politics in historical context. Socialist-feminist studies of women in Third World countries emphasized the dangers of projecting Western concepts of the politics of women's liberation onto societies with sharply distinct histories and realities. The question of women's liberation in socialist societies was a matter of great interest and debate among socialist feminists, for socialist societies provide an opportunity to examine the relationship between feminism and socialism as it develops in actual historical processes. Socialist feminists offered a diversity of views on both the obstacles to and the prospects for women's liberation in socialist societies.

Despite its commitment to a feminist analysis that includes all women, socialist feminism was a mostly white and predominantly middle-class movement.

Black and other Third World women generally remained at a distance from organized feminism, even in its socialist-feminist variant, as did working-class and poor women. At the same time, a practical version of feminism took hold at the grass-roots level among women in poor, working-class, black, and Third World communities throughout the United States. Although often refusing to call themselves feminists, unprecedented numbers of these women, self-respecting and independent, were active on behalf of themselves and their communities. They joined unions, fought for day care, sued their employers for sex discrimination and sexual harassment, enrolled in college, and formed such organizations as the Association of Black Single Mothers, Mothers for Adequate Welfare, Mothers of East Los Angeles, and the National Congress of Neighborhood Women. Strong, motivated, and persevering, such women embodied in their activism the socialist-feminist analysis of women's subordination as rooted in an integrated system of sex, class, and race oppression.

In the 1980s, the grass-roots activism of poor, working-class, black, and Third World women was complemented by the emergence of networks of progressive feminists of color committed to developing theoretical as well as practical work around their concerns. Moving somewhat independently of organized feminism, black and Latina feminists established research centers, founded publications, and became skilled activists within their professional associations. For example, the Center for Research on Women at Memphis State University assembled a faculty of black, Latina, Native American, Asian American, and white social scientists interested in women of color, poor women, and women of the South. The center supports collaborative research on the intersections of race, culture, gender, and class; publishes newsletters, bibliographies, and a working-paper series; runs speaker programs, curriculum workshops, and summer training institutes; and maintains a computerized information clearinghouse.

Through their activities over more than three decades, socialist-feminist organizations and individuals have had a profound and enduring influence. Within the Left, questions of gender subordination are generally taken more seriously than in the past. Fewer Left organizations dismiss socialist feminism as mere bourgeois individualism, although their assimilation of socialist-feminist analysis may be limited. Some Left periodicals—for example, Radical America,

Socialist Review, Radical History Review, the Review of Radical Political Economics, and Rethinking Marxism—assume socialist-feminist perspectives in their editorial policies and regularly publish important socialist-feminist analyses. Within the mainstream women's movement, issues of class and race are often addressed as a matter of course. NOW, for example, sometimes transcends its liberal individualist origins by conducting campaigns that oppose economic inequalities among women. Socialist-feminist perspectives and concerns have spread well beyond their origins in the women's liberation movement. Socialist feminism has not only contributed importantly to efforts on behalf of all women, it has in many ways set the terms of a new feminist discourse.

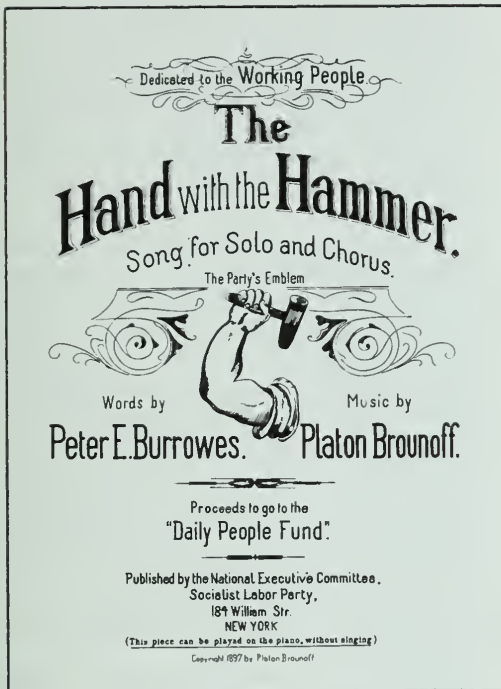

[See also New American Movement; off our backs; Women: A Journal of Liberation; Women's Liberation; Women's Liberation Unions.]

FURTHER READING

- Bookman, Ann, and Sandra Morgen, eds. Women and the Politics of Empowerment. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1988.
- Evans, Sara. Personal Politics: The Roots of Women's Liberation in the Civil Rights Movement and the New Left. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1979.
- Ferree, Myra Marx, and Beth B. Hess. Controversy and Coalition: The New Feminist Movement across Three Decades of Change. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1994.
- Hansen, Karen V., and Ilene J. Philipson, eds. Women, Class, and the Feminist Imagination: A Socialist-Feminist Reader. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.
- Sargent, Lydia, ed. Women and Revolution: A Discussion of the Unhappy Marriage of Marxism and Feminism. Boston: South End Press, 1981.
- Sayers, Janet, Mary Evans, and Nanette Redclift, eds. Engels Revisited: New Feminist Essays. New York: Tavistock Publications, 1987.
- "Socialist-Feminism Today." Series in Socialist Review, nos. 73–79 (January–February 1984 to January–February 1985).
- Vogel, Lise. Woman Questions: Essays for a Materialist Feminism. New York: Routledge, 1995.

—LISE VOGEL

SOCIALIST LABOR PARTY. The first major party of American socialism, the Socialist Labor Party (SLP) has remained in the field to the present, a tiny remnant of late-nineteenth-century political styles. Its history suggests, first, the overwhelming impact of immigrants on American socialism and, second, Sheet music sold to raise funds for the Socialist Labor Party, 1897.

the weight of a single charismatic personality on a Left political movement.

The SLP, founded in 1877 to succeed a one-year experiment, the Workingmen's Party, represented with its earliest breath the curious amalgamation of socialist forces. Heir to the internecine divisions of American socialists, it notably did not include prominent figures in the First International sections linked to Karl Marx and to certain craft unions. Neither did it include many of the American reformers excluded from the First International by the avowed Marxists. Some would return, and other American reformers, including a sprinkling of African Americans, would join the SLP in times of peak interest, such as the late 1870s, the middle 1880s, and the mid-1890s. In general, the native-born (and especially women reformers, unable or unwilling to attend meetings held in taverns) found the SLP socially and culturally unaccommodating.

The SLP seemed instead to promote the hopes of a new type of multiethnic, immigrant working-class coalition. Perennially weak at the national center, it set down hardy roots locally, where even former national leaders of European socialism, relocated to the United States, took their considerable energies. Drawing immediately on the excitement of the 1877 railroad strike—in which small numbers had done yeoman agitation—and the establishment of a German-American socialist daily press in such cities as Philadelphia, Chicago, and New York (where the dailies founded would endure) and Cincinnati and Saint Louis (where only weeklies would survive), the SLP nurtured its gains. Around the dailies or weeklies grew an abundance of social institutions, including clubs, theaters, and socialist-linked taverns. With only a few thousand members at its core, the SLP could rightly claim a following of perhaps five times that size.

For several years after its founding, the SLP enjoyed a brief vigor in electoral socialism, its local sections electing a handful of local and a few scattered state officials. At the peak of this development, the elections of 1878–1879, the SLP elected an Illinois state senator, three representatives, and four Chicago city councilmen on a reform platform similar to that of “municipal socialism” decades later. Characteristically, the party itself garnered few short-term and virtually no long-term benefits from this success. Interest in socialism grew rapidly, but party membership did not. By 1880–1881, when the protest vote had receded, several socialist candidates were “counted out” through ballot-stuffing and at least one elected candidate was expelled from the SLP for voting inconsistently with socialist principles. The boom had ended. At a national level, a hotly contested decision to support the Greenback Labor Party in 1880 proved doubly damaging when many socialists, refusing to compromise themselves, broke with the SLP and the Greenbackers went down to ignominious defeat.

The SLP record in unionism was rather more complex. The International Labor Union, a child in part of former First Internationalists who had given up party for labor activity but who still retained a strong commitment to socialism, experienced brief success in agitation among textile workers in 1877–1879, and quietly expired. The Federated Order of Trades and Labor Unions (FOTLU) was founded in 1881 largely by German socialists (party members and otherwise) and such former socialist protégés as Samuel Gompers. Almost immediately, the political nonpartisanship of the FOTLU (which would change its name to the American Federation of Labor [AFL] in 1885) set off a minor explosion, as did its inclination to achieve labor market stability through limitation of the work force. The ardently socialist Progressive Cigarmakers, established to compete with Gompers's Cigarmakers International Union, looked upon the withdrawal of socialist political commitment as a step toward union conservatism. At a local level, socialists operated best, creating and staffing locals in a variety of trades, striving to work within the existing central labor councils where possible, and establishing new ones where corruption and conservatism reigned supreme.

The SLP could also boast of real intellectual accomplishments, if few organizing results, in the Americanization of socialism. The most famous English-language work of analytical socialist exposition, The Cooperative Commonwealth (1884), was written by a Danish immigrant, Laurence Gronlund, who had played an important role in the 1877 Saint Louis "commune" established during the national railroad strike. Gronlund, no dogmatic Marxist, assailed capitalism's destructive competitiveness, waste, and cruelty, and looked forward to socialism as an advanced form of state control. Hardly a best-seller, The Cooperative Commonwealth acquired readership as a popularization after Edward Bellamy's utopian Looking Backward had expanded the market for socialist ideas. The second and more lasting accomplishment, by C. Osborne Ward—First Internationalist and sometime SLP member, civil servant and brother of famed sociologist Lester Frank Ward—was the ponderous two-volume The Ancient Lowly (1879). Ward energetically detailed the evidence of a proletariat of sorts in pre-Christian days, tracing its rituals and trade organizations, and detailing his thesis that these laboring poor had been the basis for Christianity's triumph (betrayed by the church's turn toward power over the Roman state). A classic on the scale of contemporary texts by European socialists Karl Kautsky, Eduard Bernstein, or E. B. Bax on the medieval origins of the modern proletariat, The Ancient Lowly has remained a tribute to a peculiarly American Christian socialism.

Despite these formidable efforts, the SLP itself did not prosper in the 1880s. Failure at electoral socialism propelled many energetic militants toward "revolutionary socialism," a predecessor to the later ideas and practices of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Unburdened of faith and patience in slow educational efforts, they led protest activity in a variety of spots, notably Chicago, Denver, and San Francisco, until the crushing blows of repression following the Haymarket Affair virtually eradicated this current. The SLP itself meanwhile dwindled down to a mere nominal affiliation of local union-linked socialists and their press. As old-timers later recalled, they suffered a characteristic identity crisis, unable to cast themselves as political party, pressure group, or educational entity.

Most of the links the SLP had created early on with American-born labor reformers and Irish nationalist labor militants had been as good as lost since. This weakness proved catastrophic. As Frederick Engels complained, the SLP found itself utterly unable to encompass the political excitement of the mid-1880s. Socialists in the SLP and outside participated to the fullest in the "eight-hour" movement, led in many cities by German-dominated trades. But they found cooperation with the predominantly American-Irish, temperance-oriented Knights of Labor extremely difficult. New York socialist participation in the 1886 Henry George mayoral campaign brought new energy, but also ended in a sharp disillusionment and internal division.

At a low point, the SLP weakened further. In 1889 the national executive committee, dominated by the New Yorker Volkszeitung, expelled the editor of the party's national weekly, Der Sozialist, and shut down the press, declaring sharp criticism of unions to be treason. As this action revealed, the local organization and above all its union connections—especially in New York—continued to count for more than any other factor. SLP loyalists had, in effect, come to accept their tactical isolation and sought to live within it, much as the "American Exceptionalism" wing of the Communist movement avowed during the later 1920s.

The SLP members had their reasons, based in the continued success of their own intimate institutions. As activists in the brewery union among others, as fraternal organizers of an impressive insurance, health, and recreational network, as educators of their own ranks, the German immigrants managed their limited resources well. As socialists they already came to regard themselves as alte Genossen, "old heads" bloodied from repeated thumps against the stone walls of bourgeois American reality. But their acceptance of insularity did nothing to change socialism's "foreign" image in the United States, and furthermore made the capture of the SLP by would-be Americanizers all the easier a few years later.

The early 1890s brought increasing support from local trades councils and their growing press, and the mass emergence of an entirely new constituency, eastern European Jews. By the mid-1890s, the SLP could call a dozen papers its own, including a new array of Yiddish publications and the first lasting "orthodox" English-language socialist newspaper, the People. Opportunity opened, and the party ran its first serious presidential campaign, gaining more than twenty-one thousand votes for its candidate, Simon Wing, in five states. Meanwhile, under Americanized intellectual Daniel De Leon's firm hand, the People and the SLP set out on a path to create a socialist propaganda presence and a socialist labor federation.

Both strategies fell short, for want of resources and because other radical or socialist ideas of the time, from Populism to Eugene Debs's Social Democratic Party, gained more attention. The People, with its arch "scientific" tone and its bitter scorn for non-SLP radicals, offered a case in point. Taking the editorship in 1892, De Leon, deeply admired by his faithful readers, introduced a quasi-anthropological framework (with considerable debt to Lewis Henry Morgan) to explain socialism as the next step of civilization. A handful of his public speeches, reprinted in the People as a guide to modern socialist principles, became overnight SLP classics. But De Leon devoted as much attention to abuse of the Populists—after 1895 the AFL, the followers of Eugene Debs, and various SLP dissidents—as to the exposition of socialism. In his belief, the end of capitalism drew near, and only the lures offered by false leaders and sham working-class organizations prevented the SLP from leading the revolutionary column. As it threw critics overboard, it could rightly claim a temporary upward spiral of votes: forty thousand for the presidential ticket in 1896, and a combined local tally of more than eighty thousand in 1898.

To skeptics, the advances seemed small, indeed, relative to the political opportunities in this worst of U.S. depressions, with manifestations like the Pullman strike, the Homestead strike, and the "industrial armies" of relief on all sides. Membership never exceeded five thousand. The People, too dry for public taste, seemed moreover increasingly shrill and simply unrealistic. To those just learning about socialism, from former Populists and Bellamy Nationalists to craft workers, the Coming Nation and local socialist papers of central trades federations were vastly more acceptable. To a scattering of new immigrant formations—Italian, Russian, Hungarian, and others—the SLP offered few benefits in return for adhesion.

Such criticisms, especially when directed at De Leon, only reinforced loyalists' determination. Belittled where not scorned, the SLP made one final, glorious effort to establish a labor-political hegemony within the Left. De Leon's lieutenants seized control of Knights of Labor District Assembly 49, where New York socialists had long been active, and projected a coalition aimed at taking national leadership of the failing Knights of Labor. Actually promised the editorship of the Knights' journal (for Lucien Sanial, the most distinguished of party intellectuals other than De Leon), the SLP was outvoted at the Knights' 1894 convention and De Leon himself excluded as a "lawyer." De Leon led a split, and next year called upon socialists in the AFL (still smarting at Gompers's exclusion of SLP delegate Lucien Sanial from the 1890 national convention, and sufficiently powerful to vote Gompers out of office in 1894, from whence he quickly returned) to likewise abandon their organization. The result, the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance (ST&LA), was purportedly to organize the unorganized, but actually to give outright socialist leadership to a labor movement growing out of the ruins of the AFL (badly weakened by the depression) and the Knights.

This scheme had historical roots in the splits that German Americans had led from numerous local trades councils of the 1880s–1890s, including that of New York. But it had little chance of success. Among German American socialists, especially outside New York, the defections from the SLP were many, because the ST&LA could not provide even the limited benefits the AFL offered. Among the Jews, second most important constituency, anarchists joined conservatives to support the existing unions. With a split in Jewish ranks, and a new Jewish non-SLP daily paper, the Forverts, posed against the SLP's dry Abendblatt, the SLP could not recover.

The factional brawls of the next few years exceeded in scope and destruction any thus far in the U.S. Left. Expulsions and defections took the place of agitation. Socialists of various union factions broke each other's strikes. In 1899 the Volkszeitung leaders, who had sniped at De Leon but remained in the organization, helped lead much of the remaining Jewish group, and others, in a fistfight over control of the national office. In essence half the remaining movement of perhaps five thousand split, each side claiming to be the "true" SLP. The anti-De Leonists, known as the "Kangaroos" (so named by De Leon for the kangaroo courts of the lawless western frontier towns), negotiated furiously for two years with Debs's followers until settling upon unity in the new Socialist Party. The SLP, for its part, eliminated all the "immediate demands" from its platform, leaving only the demand for socialism.

Beset by continued small-scale rebellions and individual defections that included some of De Leon's once-trusted friends, the SLP rapidly declined into isolated propaganda circles. It could still claim, however, the Daily People (created at great sacrifice in 1900) and the New York Labor News Company (which would specialize in editions of De Leon's addresses but also bring out many early translated European socialist classics) as well as insist that it possessed more revolutionary virtue than the Socialist Party. The SLP retained special appeal, at the turn of the century and for decades afterward, to the working-class autodidact who instinctively mistrusted the generally middle-class leadership of other radical organizations.

Revolutionaries who believed ardently in political education via the soapbox and the press had by the early years of the new century more reasons to overlook the party's defects. The upsurge in the class struggle, especially in the West, and the increasingly class-collaborationist character of the AFL, led the Western Federation of Miners to help form the American Labor Union in 1902. Still the only English-language socialist daily, the People began to campaign for industrial unionism. De Leon's emissaries took part in the discussions leading to the formation of the IWW in 1905.

The SLP contributed more than material forces to this new movement. The ST&LA had been reduced to a handful of locals, mainly in eastern metal-working and textile centers like Lowell, Massachusetts, Paterson, New Jersey, Schenectady, New York, and Pittsburgh. But its symbolic presence counted, the more so when leading socialists in the AFL refused to endorse the IWW. More important by far, De Leon's intellectual formulations and the daily press under his command set the tone in describing the failed unionism of the present and the democratic society of the future. De Leon's famed address, "The Preamble to the IWW" (later reprinted in many editions as The Socialist Reconstruction of Society), was widely regarded as the industrial union movement's theoretical manifesto. Even Debs, however cautiously, echoed a tone of respect toward his old adversary, considered more faithful to the industrial union vision than were Debs's fellow Socialist Party leaders.

However briefly, the SLP enjoyed the first of two final major bursts of energy. Militants in recent immigrant groups affiliated through federations and established newspapers and clubhouses in their expanding blue-collar neighborhoods. Sometimes short-lived, these groups added numbers and strength to the skeletal organization. Among certain ethnic groups (Bulgarians and South Slavs especially) with fierce anticlerical traditions and a suspicion of reformism, the SLP had a certain appeal for generations. Even the venerable Yiddish-speaking sector, badly reduced by defections, published a reputable weekly, for a time edited by the literary notable David Pinski; it also had future Amalgamated Clothing Workers' leader Joseph Schlossberg as its foremost labor personality.

Prospects for reunifying the American socialist movement, a notion intermittently promoted by the Second International, had never seemed particularly bright. But a "unity" resolution of the Stuttgart Congress in 1907 put the issue on the agenda. For many supporters of the IWW, a revolutionary labor movement would provide the proper foundation for a new or merged political body. A unity conference held in New Jersey that year produced a memorable document, but little optimism even among SLP leaders who could envision entering a larger organization only on a political basis that socialist moderates and IWW members opposed to electoral action would be sure to reject. In fact, De Leon and SLP-oriented unionists found themselves excluded from the following IWW convention in 1908.

Ironically, the IWW's heroic period lay just ahead. As mass strikes of unskilled workers ensued in 1909, the rump "Detroit IWW" organized by the SLP gamely propagandized for its original vision of the IWW. During the strike wave of 1912-1913, the SLP's best orators and organizers threw themselves into the fray and quickly found themselves behind bars. Lacking the publicity or charisma of the "Chicago IWW," the Detroit IWW soon returned to propaganda status. In 1915, largely to avoid the legal persecution falling upon the IWW regulars, it was renamed the Workers International Industrial Union.

Hopes of large-scale revival for the party had by now dissipated. The financial weight of maintaining the Daily People alone emptied party coffers. At De Leon's death in 1914, he was owed $5,000—on a $25 per week salary! The previous year, De Leon's favorite son Solon had joined with his favorite intellectual protégé (and fellow Daily People editor), Louis C. Fraina, on a committee whose minority report recommended the dissolution of the SLP into the ranks of the Socialist Party. Accustomed to their isolation and their propagandizing, the vast majority of SLP members rejected this and any other drastic solution. Four years later, as the socialist movement faced probable U.S. entry into war, a second unity conference drafted a plan accepted in a referendum by SLP membership but never submitted to Socialist Party members by their leadership. This marked the SLP's final effort to break out of its isolation.

New national secretary Arnold Petersen quickly took charge and ruled with an iron hand. Assuming office on the first day of January 1914, he held the position until 1969, casting out real and potential dissidents, "reorganizing" uncooperative branches, and otherwise enforcing a rigorous discipline and dogma. He faced three major crises in the early years: the death of De Leon in May 1914; the widespread repression of immigrant groups during wartime; and the defection of prominent SLP members who had pinned their hopes on the unity movement.

De Leon's ghost, through his editorials, continued to occupy center stage after his demise, and Petersen carefully avoided the appearance of anti-war propaganda. The unity "disruption," as such events were termed in the party, led however to an important splinter group, the Industrial Socialist League, which was headed by Caleb Harrison, the SLP's candidate for vice president in the 1916 election. The Industrial Socialist League merged into the Communist Party in 1921 with Harrison becoming the first national secretary of the legal Communist Party. Few former SLP members stayed with the Communists, but the presence of a self-avowed revolutionary party badly damaged the SLP's claims to unique status.

Thereafter, the SLP remained amazingly unchanged, decade after decade. Party life revolved around the distribution of socialist leaflets and the Weekly People (in addition to the foreign-language press and annual ethnic calendars); local study classes on the works of Marx, Engels, and De Leon; and the collecting of signatures to obtain ballot status. The SLP presidential vote in twelve to twenty-three states ranged from fifteen thousand to fifty thousand depending mostly on the broader political situation and on which other "protest" parties (especially left-wing parties) managed to gain ballot status. The national ticket reached its all-time high of 53,831 in 1972, although its candidate, Louis Fisher, was able to qualify for the ballot in the fewest number of states since 1892.

The reliance on mass leaflet distribution house-to-house, at factory gates, and in downtown shopping centers illustrates a unique aspect of SLP agitation during these decades. Its members' dedication to convincing rank-and-file workers of the necessity of junking capitalism and the political state, and instituting a new "socialist industrial union" form of government, gave them a continued street presence when other left-wing movements had withdrawn into union work or factional warfare. Through millions of leaflets distributed annually for generations, many workers and other Americans received their introduction to the socialist vision of an alternative to capitalism. Likewise, the Weekly People, always published at a loss but widely available through coin-operated boxes or distributed free in many cities, was long known for clear prose and forceful analysis of capitalist economics.

Social life within the SLP meanwhile revolved around the ever-present need for funds to carry on agitation and education. An endless round of socials, picnics, and dinner/lectures, especially in older industrial centers like New York, Detroit, Milwaukee, Chicago, Cleveland, and elsewhere (in later years, the retirement zones of California and Florida), continued. Along with aging but well-organized and determined language federation members, the SLP retained into the 1960s the numbers necessary for a rich cultural life. Small propaganda circles, increasingly held around campuses in later decades, continued the SLP tradition.

Over the decades, individuals and groups intermittently rebelled at Petersen's authoritarian leadership and the party's failure to grow. These insurgents rarely questioned the party's socialist industrial union program or its anti-reformist stance. But because they seemed (from the leadership perspective) to threaten party traditions and internal stability, they often evoked swift retribution and, occasionally, inspired institutional rivals.

The Industrial Union Party (IUP) thus grew from a 1926 letter by Sam Brandon, a member of section

Bronx, to the editor of the Weekly People questioning some statistics that the paper used. The editor's reply and Brandon's rejoinder resulted in the expulsion of an entire section of sixty members, then the largest in the SLP. The dissidents reorganized as the IUP and began publishing their own journal, the Industrial Unionist. They attained a membership of nearly two hundred members in the Bronx and Brooklyn as well as a few local affiliates outside the New York area. During the heyday of independent industrial unionism in the early 1930s, just prior to the rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the IUP played an important role among furniture workers in Jamestown, New York, and shipbuilders in Camden, New Jersey, among others. In 1939, after this heroic era had passed, the IUP itself split. About half the membership of several hundred reorganized, under the leadership of Abraham Ziegler, as the Socialist Union Party, distributing its journal, Labor Power. In 1947 and again during 1967–1969, when the SLP expelled dozens of members, remnants of the IUP took part in unsuccessful efforts to establish a national organization known informally as the "unfrosted De Leonists."

In the meantime, second-generation SLP members filled some of the gaps left by attrition or division, and a thin stratum of fresh recruits came forward. Eric Hass, a former cabdriver who began a thirty-year tenure as editor of the Weekly People in 1939, was easily the most important of these. When Hass resigned in 1969 along with dozens of others upset by the leadership's unwillingness to take part in the anti-war movement, the SLP's downward slide probably reached a point of no return. By 1973 a personnel shortage seemed to endanger the Weekly People. Nathan Karp, who had become a part-time assistant to the aging Petersen in the 1950s and was elected national secretary in 1969, tried to give the SLP a new sense of purpose. He encouraged young people strongly influenced by the New Left to take over the Weekly People. Fewer in pages and with less emphasis on labor and the old jargon, the paper revived modestly.

By this time, however, the last of the language federations had folded (the Bulgarians, in 1969), the crucial funds accrued from these movements had nearly dissipated, and the membership had fallen to under seven hundred. Karp engineered the transfer of party headquarters from its historic location in Greater New York to Palo Alto, California. From this locale, Karp used his popularity among the surviving membership to try and change many of the policies that had isolated the party. Old guard De Leonites, based mostly in New York, withdrew during 1977–1978. Later rebellions against Karp's Petersen-like management style brought expulsions of sections in Missouri, Michigan, and New Jersey.

By the later 1990s, SLP membership had fallen to a few hundred at most, and the Weekly People had become the monthly People. Nevertheless, as the century drew to a close, the only newspaper that gloried in reprinting editorials of a turn-of-the-century intellectual, and one of a handful that called for the abolition of both capitalism and the state while holding a vision of pure socialism as the single solution for humankind's many woes, had not yet expired.

[See also Berger, Victor L.; Bohemian Americans; Boudin, Louis B.; Bulgarian Americans; Calendars; Christian Socialism; Cleveland Citizen; Cloth Hat and Capmakers; Connolly, James; Debs, Eugene V.; De Leon, Daniel; "Detroit" Industrial Workers of the World; Dual Unionism; German Americans; Gilman, Charlotte Perkins; Greek Americans; Greie-Cramer, Johanna; Haywood, William D.; Hillquit, Morris; Hungarian Americans; Industrial Unionism; Industrial Workers of the World; Kelley, Florence; Konikow, Antoinette Bucholz; Latvian Americans; Lillienthal, Meta Stern; Lithuanian Americans; Malkiel, Theresa Serber; Morgan, Lewis Henry; Municipal Socialism; New Yorker Volkszeitung; Parsons, Albert; Paterson Strike of 1913; Petersen, Arnold; Polish Americans; Railroad Strike of 1877; Second International; Shoe Workers; Slovenian Americans; Socialist Sunday Schools; Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance; Textile Workers Unions; United Brewery Workers; Winchevsky, Morris; Workers' Control; Workingmen's Party of the United States; Yiddish Left; Zukunft.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Paul. A Dreamer's Paradise Lost: Louis C. Fraina/Lewis Corey (1892–1953) and the Decline of Radicalism in the United States. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1995.
- Daniel De Leon: The Man and His Work. New York: New York Labor News, 1919.
- Girard, Frank, and Ben Perry. The Socialist Labor Party, 1876–1991. Philadelphia: Livra Press, 1991.
- Socialist Labor Party Papers. State Historical Society of Wisconsin, Madison.

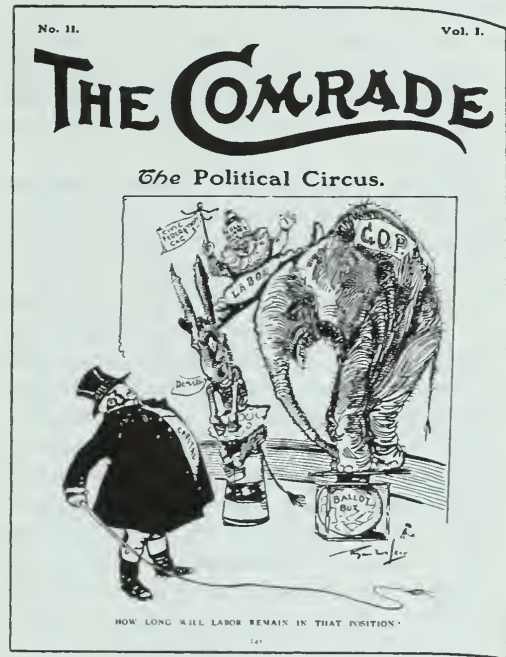

—PAUL BUHLE and FRANK GIRARD

SOCIALIST PARTY. Founded in 1901 and attaining its apex in the 1910s, the Socialist Party (SP) more than any other Left organization in U.S. history impressed its ideas upon the mainstream and propounded a credible, popular vision of socialism. In its failures and its final collapse, it mirrored most of the fundamental weaknesses of the American Left.

The immediate origins of the SP can be found in the 1880s and 1890s, with the rise of labor and social protests and the inability of the mostly immigrant socialists to create a large or durable organization. Eugene Debs, allying his followers from the American Railway Union and Social Democracy of America with dissidents from the Socialist Labor Party, both negotiated the merger and ran for the presidency on a unified ticket in 1900. His own characteristic milieu of native-born skilled workers, lower-middle-class veterans of social protest, and a volatile tenant-farmer population in the Southwest dominated the public tone of the SP in the early years. German, Jewish, and a handful of other immigrant groups, strong in selected neighborhoods and unions, eagerly shared the dream of "Americanizing" the socialist movement.

Popular agitation and education supplied the means to reach the masses, with the Socialist press the key mechanism. By 1912–1913, more than three hundred periodicals, mostly weeklies but including many dailies and monthlies as well, were in circulation. The Jewish Daily Forward, reaching 200,000 by the close of the 1910s, was the Yiddish circulation leader in the world. The Appeal to Reason, peaking at three quarters of a million (and in some special weeks, reaching more than a million) was for a time the most widely circulated political weekly in the United States. Although no clear estimate can be made, a combined circulation figure would run to several million. Most of these had an intense regional or local audience of party members and sympathizers expectant of a swift rise in socialist ranks.

The strength of the Socialist press lay, above all, in its variety and adaptation. Unlike the Socialist Labor Party's Daily People, which presumed to offer a single position for all socialists to follow, SP papers assumed (sometimes in a very insular way) the inevitability of different tastes for different constituencies. One might note, for example, the extraordinary strength of the Hallettsville (Texas) Rebel, supported by twenty-five thousand readers among the district's tenant farmers and followed by supporters of the Cartoon by Ryan Walker, 1901.

Mexican Revolution; or again the monthly National Rip-Saw from Saint Louis, with its 150,000 readers spread across the South and Southwest. In the single district of Chicago, influence was exerted by a dozen or more papers (the Slovakian Rovnost Ludu had a readership of almost ten thousand, the Slovenian Proletarec reached more than four thousand, the Bohemian Spravedelust claimed twelve thousand, and the Christian Socialist had nearly twenty thousand). Many central labor councils such as Cleveland's, with the Cleveland Citizen, and a few important national unions such as the brewery workers and western miners, with Brauer Zeitung and Miners Magazine, respectively, proudly sponsored Socialist loyalties. So widely scattered was this press that Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Texas, Pennsylvania, and Oklahoma each had more than a dozen papers, often with small circulations of less than a thousand but an intense, semirural following.

In that age, public and especially street-corner (or "soapbox") lectures also offered a major arena for attracting political attention. Hundreds of traveling lecturers, often paid through a percentage on sales of pamphlets, toured each possible constituency in a fashion that the abolition, woman suffrage, temperance, and popular movements had long since made successful. To that, Socialists added a religious-populist favorite, the tent meeting, stretching over days of education and entertainment in rural southwestern locations.

If Socialists praised the agitator, however, they offered little solace and less support to the weighty thinker so prestigious in European socialism. Such a figure as Ernest Untermann, translator of Capital's first volume, had to make do with popularizations for American readers, while sending his more original work for publication to Germany. Untermann's favorite U.S. publication, International Socialist Review, jettisoned its theoretically oriented format entirely in 1908 and became a popular magazine, leaving a vacuum never truly filled. The Left's intellectual creation, the New Review, did no better, folding in 1917 after making a brave start four years earlier. Only in the Yiddish monthly Zukunft did the theoretically-minded (at that, often restricted to literary or Jewish topics) have anything like free range to explore deeper questions of socialist philosophy.

In the absence of such a discussion, internal differences hinted at a youthful exuberance but also a deep uncertainty over the problems America held for socialist ideas. From an empirical standpoint, the party did not attract the native-born, urban, eastern or midwestern worker in any significant proportion. Frequently Irish and tied to the Democratic Party (or at any rate Catholic, and successfully repelled from socialism by the clergy's denunciations and warnings), this worker also often enjoyed great material advantages over the unskilled, recently immigrated worker. Exceptions could readily be found. Where ethnic factors (such as German descent) nurtured a socialistic leaning, or where a one-industry town minimized the middle class, or again where Socialists had organized and maintained control over central unions, the SP could exert an exceptional force. Even here, however, defeat—often to a fusion ticket of co-operating Republicans and Democrats—often followed on the heels of a victory.

Disputes often centered on solving this problem of reaching the "real American worker," or of finding alternative constituencies. On the "Right," long-time activists in the American Federation of Labor (AFL), occasionally quite successful (as in Milwaukee) in building a local political machine, stressed the party's respectability. Indeed, such Socialists urged support for the AFL's demand for immigration restriction, and acquiesced in its combination of open racism and general denigration of the unskilled worker. On the "Left," a variety of militants and intellectuals insisted on the presentation of the full Socialist program, and believed the goal could be reached by mobilizing the mass of workers, preferably through radical industrial unions. The formation of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in 1905 galvanized both sides of the dispute. Jockeying on the IWW and other issues continued until the climactic division of 1919.

By no means could all differences be so characterized, however. On the crucial issue of a farm program—whether land would be "nationalized" or returned to the poor farmer—the rural and urban divisions proved far more important, with "scientific" socialists unable to grasp the unpopularity of state landownership. On women's rights and specifically the support of the woman suffrage movement, the "Left" frequently disdained such petty reforms as voting requirements while sections of the "Right" found themselves comfortable with suffrage activists. Among youth groups, both community (Young People's Socialist League [YPSL]) and campus (Intercollegiate Socialist Society), "Right" and "Left" likewise shared encouragement and criticisms. On blacks and their status in the United States, few Socialist voices could be heard before 1915. But the "Left," unwilling to make compromising qualifications for any special status of worker, offered what appeared to be empty promises of egalitarian futures.

The rise of the mass strikes among the unskilled, along with a sharp reversal of electoral successes, set the stage for more fundamental antagonisms within the movement. For a moment it seemed that the IWW would succeed in mobilizing large sections of eastern and southern European workers across the East and Midwest, thus revolutionizing the SP. At the party convention of 1912—the banner year, with nearly a million votes for Debs, and the election of hundreds of local officials—William D. Haywood faced removal from the national executive committee (to which he had been elected by the party at large) for advocating sabotage, a practice widely engaged in (but only sub rosa) by workers of many kinds. Provoked by the "Right," Haywood turned from the party. Many of its younger industrial militants abandoned the organization with him (a few hundred were also removed, through purges of membership rolls, mostly in certain foreign-language groups). Far more devastating, local elected officials in power lacked the ability or opportunity to truly transform political life—in a few cases, so much losing interest in Socialism that the SP local expelled them while they remained in office. In this calamity, membership fell to scarcely more than half its 1912 level of some 100,000.

Two other issues at the same pivotal convention raised question marks over the SP's future. A handful of leading Socialist intellectuals, including historian-editor A. M. Simons, greeted a relative leftward shift within the AFL by proposing Socialist support for a labor party. Not many others could agree to the abandonment of party independence, especially on such a weak reed. But this tendency hinted defections to the Right mirroring those to the Left. Second, the party leadership reluctantly agreed to officially charter the growing foreign-language socialist groups into associative federations. This issue, unlike the Haywood matter, had no "Left" or "Right" tilt despite the heavily immigrant character of the later Communist movement. Taken with other developments, it suggested that the Socialists' infrastructure had begun to give way.

The growth of the foreign-language section to some forty percent of a diminished party by 1916 signaled the consolidation of the changes. While strong local branches, which were organized around election campaigns, arose and rapidly dwindled, specific new immigrant groups integrated the socialist faith and political practice into the logics of their developing communities. Czechs, Finns, Slovenes, Hungarians, Lithuanians, and others, despite their own internal conflicts, revived the Socialist movement in various cities and industrial settlements.

The outbreak of war in Europe underlined the importance of international issues to these constituents in particular. Many felt the aspirations of their relatives in oppressed nations; all, it is safe to say, feared for the worst and sought to gather resources to send back home; in more than a few cases, they also supplied the radical pamphlets and other publications through which the Old World struggle would reorient itself to new realities. Over the next half-dozen years, the problems of connecting class and national struggles became steadily more complex. But in almost every case, Socialists came to a position of new importance within the crisis-ridden communities desperately seeking dynamic leadership.

For the first time, black socialists also became an estimable factor, albeit almost entirely in northern cities rather than in the rural South, and despite being offered no special encouragement by the party. Around Pullman car organizer A. Philip Randolph and his group's stylish monthly, the Messenger, a Harlem group formed. Aroused by a handful of black Socialists elsewhere as well, and touched by incipient black nationalism, an urban race movement of both intellectuals and workers began to show promise.

The economics of these communities also favored a rapid Socialist growth. Wartime conditions both shut off new immigration to the United States—tightening job markets perceptibly—and prompted an American economic boom following the 1913–1914 recession. The IWW, which had hoped to lead these very largely unskilled, mass-production ranks, had been driven to the West by major defeats, and would soon face an unprecedented government-and-business repression. Burgeoning industrial unionism flowed, especially from the U.S. entry into the war, into the existing AFL unions or into newly organized and radical-leaning bodies such as the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. "Practical" unionism with a radical edge emphasized the importance of radical politics, and despite all official party reluctance, the federations became the main recipients of fresh energies.

The party's English-language sector meanwhile suffered serious blows as a result of the war. Woodrow Wilson's appeal for a peace presidency drove socialist electoral tallies far down. European socialist (especially German Socialist) failure to vote against war credits had a devastating effect on morale. Important intellectuals, both Right and Left, defected to patriotism. Repression of the Socialist press fell particularly hard upon the rural papers, which needed second-class mailing permits to survive, and upon rural and small-town constituencies, which now faced severe pressure from the spreading reactionary patriotism. The party's 1917 Saint Louis convention mandated an essentially pacifist anti-war program, and party activists—"Right" as well as "Left"—urgently pushed their appeals for a cessation of the fighting. They were quite literally the only major movement in U.S. society to stand adamant against the war currents.

Rising anti-war sentiment, by 1918 or so, began to reward courage and hard work. Deprived of some constituencies, Socialists began to gain others (most especially, but not only, among the victimized nationalities, such as German Americans). Local electoral strongholds returned in some cases, and in others appeared for the first time. This new burst of electoral enthusiasm brought new Socialists to office in Wisconsin, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Minnesota, Kentucky, and elsewhere. It peaked in 1917 in Ohio, where Socialists received up to fifty percent of the vote in large industrial cities where they had strength; in Chicago, where they received a third of the municipal vote; and in New York.

A second-place finish that year for Morris Hillquit, New York City mayoral hopeful, was viewed not only as an anti-war but also a virtual Socialist mandate. The People's Council for Peace and Democracy, which might be described as the American Left's first Popular Front-style mobilization, drew pacifist and radical labor leaders behind a unified anti-war and anti-repression appeal, and gained much popular attention. Meanwhile, key Socialist-led unions such as the Amalgamated Clothing Workers (whose president, Sidney Hillman, also headed the People's Council) quickly consolidated their grip on industries through careful use of government-based mediations. Even among such weakly represented groups as Italians, Socialist support and (less commonly) membership began to grow significantly. The future of the Socialist movement, now more than fifty percent immigrant, might have been seen as a bright one.

The Russian October Revolution, the failure of the revolution in Europe, and the appearance of the Third International meant Socialist division and the loss of precious political opportunities. A Moscow-mandated split in socialist parties took place via growing challenges over war issues (the emerging immigrant-dominated Left demanded not pacifism but "direct action") and control of the party. Right-leaning functionaries, mostly from the older immigrant groups or at least older generation of immigrants and native-born, had watched the steady demographic change of the movement with unease. Still gripping party mechanisms, they set aside a national executive committee election that would have given pro-Bolsheviks an outright majority. Thereafter, one Communist faction withdrew immediately, and another awaited the 1919 convention, denouncing the expulsions of branches, state party sections, and entire foreign-language federations.

Ironically, as with the war issue, the Socialist "Right" for the most part had often taken very "Left" positions on the Russian Revolution, while future

American Communist leaders did not entirely see its blessings. All this mattered little when the break took place. Amid massive repression, an organization of more than 100,000 members divided into two or three parts, which altogether could manage no more than forty thousand members two years later. The bulk of the Socialist movement had simply faded away; and while the immigrant groups recovered a portion of this loss, the English-language sector disappeared into farmer-labor movements or simply grew quiescent.

The SP often remained larger than the Communist movement, on the membership rolls, through the early 1930s. But its strength lay mainly in older members, a few local political machines (notably, Milwaukee), ethnic groups (mainly Slovenians) with special reasons for resisting the Soviet Union's appeal, and a handful of unions centered in the garment trades. Between Left-leaning youth and the progressive unions, a handful of Socialists effected an important link through the slick monthly Labor Age, and earnestly supported the Brookwood Labor College's activities. Likewise, the Rand School, launched in the 1910s, continued to have a formidable public presence in New York. Christian pacifism also drew a talented group of younger Socialists. But temporary revivals in Socialist activities seemed to end in disappointment.

Most of all, the Socialists exhibited the tiredness of senior radicals who had lost confidence in their mission, and who at times (as in the garment trades and the pages of the weekly New Leader) seemed more intent on attacking Communists than in ending capitalism. Well placed in the leadership of the "Jewish unions," and concentrated in the United Hebrew Trades, they had had enough revolutions for the foreseeable future, and yearned for stability. Communists, exuberant in their near-fanatical optimism regarding world revolution, attracted potential radical activists and intellectuals (including important leaders of the Socialists' reorganized YPSL) with their dynamism. The major outpouring of Socialist energy into Robert M. La Follette's 1924 Progressive campaign added little to the tarnished luster of the party and left further discouragement in its wake.

Norman Thomas almost single-handedly revived the SP. In 1928, the year of his first presidential campaign, membership stood at a staggering low of eight thousand. Thomas generated news with his public addresses, and he appealed forcefully to religious and academic liberals such as John Dewey and Paul Douglas, with whom he formed the League for Independent Political Action. As he attracted a respectable if not especially impressive vote, and as the United States entered the Depression, Socialist fortunes improved and membership doubled by 1932.

In retrospect, this was the high point of the SP revival. Thomas's 1932 presidential campaign, which gained 800,000 votes, agitated campus politics on a scale hitherto unprecedented, and reached a wide diversity of Americans (including many almost but not quite willing to vote for him). Adulation bordering upon the hero-worship previously reserved for Eugene Debs surrounded the former Presbyterian minister in his perpetual speaking tours, banquets, and radio addresses. Due in no small part to the extreme Communist sectarianism, a Socialist youth movement of considerable proportions grew from campus to community, and the Socialist presence within the labor movement waxed strong once more. In Wisconsin, in Reading, Pennsylvania, and in a scattering of other cities, local Socialist electoral campaigns took on new life. Certain ethnic groups, notably Jews and Finns, gained fresh energies from returnees, activists disillusioned with Communist practices but still dedicated to socialist ideals. The political activities of other groups, such as Slovenes, resumed to a degree after a long concentration on fraternal institution-building. Chiefly through the Southern Tenant Farmers Union, the Socialists made new ties in the South.

At this apex of expectation, the SP once more fell to external and internal foes. The most formidable of these, the New Deal, dragged leading Socialist unionists into support for Franklin Roosevelt's 1936 reelection campaign, a contradiction that Socialists (unlike Communists) could not tolerate. Even before then, several of Thomas's most promising supporters had defected to Fiorello La Guardia's mayoral campaign in New York, and Upton Sinclair had seemingly shown another way forward by garnering nearly 900,000 votes on the Democratic ticket in the 1934 gubernatorial race in California. Meanwhile, the generational struggle within the party had begun in earnest with a 1934 showdown of the Old Guard (from the garment unions) against the "Militants" (a heterogeneous force of young Socialists, Milwaukeeans, and others eager to upset the New York Socialist veterans' monopoly on leadership). The Militants, electing Milwaukeean and Amalgamated Clothing Workers leader Leo Krzycki party chair, achieved a narrow and Pyrrhic victory. Disaster for the Socialists lay straight ahead.

Thomas's 1936 campaign, winning less than half the votes of 1932, offered a dour guide to Socialist troubles. After the party's May convention of that year, the Old Guard withdrew in a bloc, forming the Social Democratic Federation, which threw itself immediately into the American Labor Party and indirect support for Roosevelt's reelection. Along with the Old Guard went several of the party's most precious institutional resources: the Rand School, the New Leader, and New York radio station WEVD. Thomas sought to run a campaign that left open the door both for activity in state farmer-labor parties and in the SP. (The next year, Thomas himself would withdraw from the New York mayoral race, leaving the path clear for his supporters to turn to La Guardia's fusion ticket.)

Such maneuvers could not make up for the losses and the party's internal bleeding. With the leftward tilt of the New Deal in 1936 and the subsequent rise of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), promising young socialists either went to Washington as brain-trust bureaucrats or plunged wholly into labor activities. Despite widespread Socialist youth activity on the campuses in particular, the Communist Party, now entering its Popular Front phase, tended to recruit the most promising activists in college and youth movements, or alternatively to capture control of organizations and discourage dissenters. Socialists might publish a respectable weekly (the Socialist Call) and organize effectively to help the Flint, Michigan, sit-down strike, but they gained few members for their efforts. Meanwhile the Trotskyist movement entered the SP en bloc in 1936 and, after nearly two years of bitter factional fighting, withdrew (or was expelled) with the cream of the recent YPSL crop. Other than scattered municipal support and a pacifist remnant, little remained behind Norman Thomas, who by 1938 indeed called for a turn from electoralism to educational efforts.

The socialist caucus around Walter Reuther marked one stunning, if ambiguous, exception. Walter Reuther's brother Victor and Victor's wife, Sophie, Eddie Levinson, and a circle of other SP members played key roles in launching and consolidating the United Auto Workers, even if the party itself continued to have a small Michigan membership. Riveted to union activities, most of the group drifted out of the SP by wartime, but continued with other erstwhile Socialists as Reuther's inner circle. Tacticians of the anticommunist bloc, they nevertheless maintained hopes for a socialistic opposition to capitalism, a vision which faded in time into Democratic Party liberalism with a pinkish tint. Victor Reuther distinguished himself by exposing the Central Intelligence Agency's activities within the labor movement and continuing, into advanced old age, as a fiery speaker at labor conventions.

It was also notable, albeit as a side issue, how little theoretical effort could be seen in Socialist publications, even relative to the modest intellectual work carried on by contemporary Left groups. Haim Kantorovich, a relatively recent refugee intellectual, conducted the American Socialist Quarterly for a few years, with the participation of David P. Berenberg and a small circle of others. They turned their eyes largely to the contemporary European socialists' leftish fringes, and to a vague mulling of the issues of socialism and democracy. Harry W. Laidler, one-man intellectual whirlwind of the League for Industrial Democracy, meanwhile produced volume after volume advocating a British-style nationalization. But perhaps the most notable effort, by Christian socialists in the World Tomorrow and, after its close in 1934, in their separate books and pamphlets, stood the furthest from traditional Marxism and the Second International. Norman Thomas's best efforts, scarcely theoretical but full of intelligent and humane argument, took place within this last context. Having drifted rightward by the 1940s, the New Leader lacked this humane dimension and was characterized by its bitter opposition to enemies on the Left without counterposing any positive vision other than a mildly reformed capitalism.

Under Thomas's leadership, this much-reduced organization (by the later 1930s, under ten thousand members) played its most notable role in anti-war propaganda. Socialists organized the Keep America Out of War Congress in 1938. While adamantly hostile to fascism, Thomas accurately predicted the decline of radical prospects following U.S. entry, the erosion of civil liberties, and a world reshaped under the totalitarian image. His warnings, above all of "armament economics," a permanent war economy ruled by the military-industrial complex, proved sadly prescient, as did his complaints against an all-too-compliant and corrupted liberalism. Thomas had anticipated, perhaps better than anyone else, the future effects of the Cold War on all political discourse. By 1941 only a small portion of the SP remained with him to support (but critically) the war against fascism, and to carry on much-needed work on behalf of conscientious objectors and others newly imprisoned.

From that decline, the party could not recover. But it remained doggedly alive, running Norman Thomas through 1948, denouncing both Stalinism and the denouement of American liberalism in the Democratic Party's broad shift to the right. Waiting (but without any early hopes) for the inevitable disillusionment with Communism and capitalism, the SP drifted. The formerly Trotskyist Independent Socialist League of a few hundred members—many of whom had been expelled by the SP in 1938—rejoined the party in 1957, now merged also with the returned Social Democratic Federation. A few thousand, mostly aged, members confronted the vacuum left by the sorely weakened CP and the newer hopes raised by civil rights and disarmament movements.

By this time, the liberal wing of the Democratic Party and the liberal wing of the existing labor leadership offered the lodestars. "Realignment" of the two-party political system through influence on the Democrats and labor became the all-consuming strategy. Much rested, it was believed, upon the initiatives of well-placed individuals. Michael Harrington, whose The Other America (1960) inspired the War on Poverty, offered the model policy-analyst for Democratic Party liberals. Former Trotskyist leader Max Shachtman, ever closer in influence and views to the top leadership of the AFL-CIO, drafted out influential position papers for labor. YPSL luminaries guided the Student Peace Union's meteoric rise to antibomb militancy in the early 1960s, and remained active in Young Democrats and Campus Americans for Democratic Action (CADA) chapters thereafter. Directors of the Student League for Industrial Democracy, campus connection of the SP since the 1930s, aided the modest rebirth of the movement on a few 1950s campuses and supplied resources for its conversion into Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) in 1963—a move later bitterly regretted as opening doors for the New Left.

Faced with the New Left, the SP in general moved swiftly right. Socialist leaders tended (although not uniformly) to support U.S. military posture when the alternative looked suspiciously Communist. They also forcefully opposed "Black Power" and denounced public criticism of Israeli policies. Bayard Rustin, the most prominent black SP leader, thus broke with the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.'s avowed opposition to the Vietnam War. By the close of the 1960s, a flagging YPSL viewed itself as the centrist alternative to the booming, radicalized SDS.

Once more the party fractured. The most conservative faction, closely linked to the upper echelons of the labor movement, broke away in 1972 to form Social Democrats USA (SDUSA), whose strident anti-communism, opposition to affirmative action, and unwavering support of Israel have been its most notable features.

Several of its youth notables emerged in the 1980s as staff aides to United Nations ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick or as leaders of the hard-line anticommunist National Endowment for Democracy. Ironically, this career shift removed younger operatives from SDUSA's real base of strength, the labor bureaucracy, and left the small but exceptionally well-funded organization with limited influence during the AFL-CIO upheaval of the 1990s. The defeat of the Kirkland bloc (including SDUSA's great favorite, Albert Shanker), like the end of the Cold War, left the badly aging group of Social Democrats with little influence and few issues. SDUSA retained, however, an intimate alliance with bricklayers' president (and labor's most prominent antiabortion figure) Ed Joyce, who supplied the organization office space in the union's Washington headquarters. Its close supporters held leadership positions in the A. Philip Randolph Institute, Freedom House, and the American Federation of Teachers.

A second wing, led by Michael Harrington, in 1972 formed the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee, which a decade later merged with the New American Movement to form the Democratic Socialists of America (DSA). The latter's ecumenical socialism, its support by the few outspoken radical labor leaders such as the machinists' William Winpisinger, and its sometimes lively branch activity seemed most in keeping with the old SP. Its determined loyalty to the Democratic Party, however, marked the great shift taken in the historic socialist movement, and cost DSA dearly when Left influence declined among Democrats after 1978. DSA's largest subsequent mobilization, for the Jesse Jackson nomination campaign a decade later, won it new campus visibility but embittered rightward-drifting older socialists. Afterward, DSA continued through mass mailings to attract dues-paying members, at times reaching beyond ten thousand, but only a handful of branches remained viable into the 1990s—a unique proportion of “inactives” among party members within American Left history. Helping to stage public forums (especially the annual Socialist Scholars Conference in New York), holding summer “institutes” and conventions, putting out discussion bulletins and assorted publications, DSA officers and public figures (especially Barbara Ehrenreich) managed to keep the organization afloat and visible through political hard times.

Meanwhile, a small but stubborn group of loyalists kept the regular SP franchise alive. One of its final major presidential campaigns, in 1976, ran former Milwaukee mayor Frank Zeidler and gained votes disproportionately in that city. The appearance of the Citizens Party in 1980 fairly well submerged this effort, although the SP maintained its national campaigns with such notables as peace activist David McReynolds and labor-feminist author Barbara Garson in titular roles. Outside of a few locations, the SP seemed to have lost its raison d'être. Yet the continued election of an occasional local SP member, usually in nonpartisan races, helped demonstrate the role of noncapitalist parties under proper circumstances and eased the rebirth of third party politics on the Left.

[See also Ameringer, Oscar; Appeal to Reason; Armenian Americans; Berger, Victor L.; Blatch, Harriot Stanton; Bohemian Americans; Boudin, Louis B.; Christian Socialism; Cleveland Citizen; Cloth Hat and Capmakers; Debs, Eugene V.; Farmer-Labor Party; Harrington, Michael; Haywood, William D.; Hughan, Jessie Wallace; Hungarian Americans; Intercollegiate Socialist Society; International Socialist Review; Konikow, Antoinette Bucholz; Laidler, Harry W.; Lawrence Strike; Lilienthal, Meta Stern; Lithuanian Americans; London, Jack; London, Meyer; Lore, Ludwig; Lowe, Caroline A.; Malkiel, Theresa Serber; Maurer, James Hudson; Mitchell, H. L.; Municipal Socialism; O'Hare, Kate Richards; Peace Movements; Polish Americans; Rand School of Social Science; Randolph, A. Philip; Rustin, Bayard; Sandburg, Carl; Sanger, Margaret; Schudder, Vida Dutton; Socialist Sunday Schools; Southern Tenant Farmers Union; Stokes, Rose Pastor; Student Movements, 1930s; Student Peace Union; Thomas, Norman; Ukrainian Americans; Union Square, New York City; United Brewery Workers; United Mine Workers; Walling, William English; Wilshire, H. Gaylord; Winchevsky, Morris; Woman's National Committee; Woman's National Socialist Union; Workers' Education; Workmen's Circle; Yiddish Left; Young, Art; Young People's Socialist League.]

FURTHER READING

- Bell, Daniel. "The Background and Development of Marxism in the United States." In Socialism and American Life, vol. 1, edited by Donald Drew Egbert and Stow Persons. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1952.
- Buhle, Paul. Marxism in the United States: Remapping the History of the American Left. London: Verso, 1991.
- Kipnis, Ira. The American Socialist Movement: 1897-1912. New York: Columbia University Press, 1952.
- Warren, Frank A. An Alternative Vision: The Socialist Party in the 1930s. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1974.
- Weinstein, James. The Decline of Socialism in America, 1912-1925. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1967.
- Socialist Party Papers. Duke University, Durham, N.C.

—PAUL BUHLE

SOCIALIST SUNDAY SCHOOLS. Sunday schools for working-class children were established by American radicals before the twentieth century, notably by German and Finnish immigrant groups. However, the more extensive Socialist Sunday school movement was organized primarily by grass-roots supporters of the Socialist Party of America during the 1900-1920 period. These children's schools were English-speaking, eschewed any ethnic identification, and sought to foster an understanding of and allegiance to working-class interests and basic socialist tenets among the next generation of laborers.

At least one hundred Socialist Sunday schools (sometimes referred to by other names, such as the Children's Socialist Lyceum in Los Angeles) were organized in sixty-four cities and towns in twenty states. Prominent ones were located in New York City (which had fourteen schools in 1912), Rochester, Hartford, Newark, Buffalo (two in 1918), Philadelphia (two in 1912), Washington, D.C., Pittsburgh (two in 1916), Cleveland (three in 1912), Chicago (eight in 1919), Milwaukee (three in 1915), and Los Angeles. Schools varied from a handful of students in one class, as in the case of the Newport, Kentucky, school, to a thousand students in dozens of classes at the school that met at the Brownsville Labor Lyceum in Brooklyn. The average enrollment was probably less than a hundred students. Most schools existed for several years, although there were schools opening and closing in the same year and others that lasted for more than a half-dozen years (e.g., the East Side Socialist School in Manhattan, Williamsburg and Brownsville schools in Brooklyn, Rochester Socialist Sunday School, and International Socialist Sunday School in Milwaukee). The two-hour morning school sessions consisted of age-divided classes and general assembly times (with announcements, recitations, songs, and remarks by visitors).

Socialist Sunday school teaching focused primarily on the nature of working-class life and class conflict, the character of the capitalist system and how it results in serious social problems (such as poverty, crime, and unhealthy living and working conditions), and the value of cooperative industrial and personal relations. The schools were intended to counteract the overly individualistic, competitive, nationalistic, militaristic, and anti-working class themes that seemed to be prevalent in public schools and other aspects of capitalist culture (e.g., the press, mass entertainment, and the church). They were never expected to provide a complete socialist education for youth, only a more formal, systematic one (albeit only two hours a week) than could be gotten at home, at rallies, in youth clubs, and so forth. While some staff members (many of whom had no formal pedagogical training) tended to rely too heavily on the adaptation of adult-oriented reading materials for lessons, the Socialist Sunday school movement as a whole did include a variety of teaching methods and materials, including lecture outlines, question-and-answer discussion formats, socialist and nonsocialist children's readers and magazines, games, role-playing activities, field trips, guest speakers, songs, plays, and pageants.

The first Socialist Sunday schools were initiated soon after the organization of the Socialist Party in 1901. For example, the San Jose school was established by members of the local Socialist women's club in 1902, and schools in Chicago, Boston, and Omaha were organized in 1903. A slow but continuous expansion occurred during the first two decades of the century, with a national organization, intercity conferences, and more supportive party initiatives in general taking place by 1918. All of these efforts came to an abrupt halt, however, when the Socialist Party split apart in 1919-1920. A few schools continued in existence during the 1920s, and about a dozen schools were reorganized in New York City in the 1930s when the party experienced a resurgence. But gone were any prospects for a national movement and the optimistic spirit that had marked the earlier phase of these radical educational experiments. By the end of 1936, when the party experienced another serious split in its ranks, there were no Socialist Sunday schools left in existence in the United States.

[See also Yiddish Schools.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism, 1870–1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.
- Teitelbaum, Kenneth. "Outside the Selective Tradition: Socialist Curriculum for Children in the United States, 1900–1920." In The Formation of School Subjects: The Struggle for Creating an American Institution, edited by Thomas F. Popkewitz. Philadelphia: Falmer Press, 1987.
- Teitelbaum, Kenneth. "Contestation and Curriculum: The Efforts of American Socialists, 1900–1920." In The Curriculum: Problems, Politics, and Possibilities, edited by Landon E. Beyer and Michael W. Apple. New York: State University of New York Press, 1988.
- Teitelbaum, Kenneth. Schooling for "Good Rebels": Socialism, American Education, and the Search for Radical Curriculum. New York: Teachers College Press, 1995.

—KENNETH TEITELBAUM

SOCIALIST TRADES AND LABOR ALLIANCE. The first national effort to launch an explicitly socialist labor federation in the United States, the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance (ST&LA) foreshadowed the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and the Communist Trade Union Unity League in some of its ideals and many of its difficulties. "Dual unionism" already had a venerable history in the United States by the 1890s. The Knights of Labor, formed in 1869, and the American Federation of Labor (AFL), founded twelve years later, operated by the early 1880s in sharp competition with each other. At the local level, in the same period, socialistic German-based trades in many cities broke with conservative (and often corrupt) local federations to found independent citywide labor bodies. Several outright radical unions, notably the Progressive Cigar Makers, fiercely disputed the AFL's political caution and its unaggressive approach toward unskilled workers in particular.

By the early 1890s, a decline of the AFL and near-collapse of the now-small Knights of Labor had become marked. After an unsuccessful effort to exert influence on the latter (in 1894, socialist editor Lucien Sanial had been promised editorship of the Knights' organ, but the offer had been rescinded), District 49, in combination with the New York Central Labor Federation (the more radical of two competing New York bodies), the Brooklyn Socialist Labor Federation, the United Hebrew Trades, and the Newark Central Labor Federation, then formed the nucleus of the ST&LA.

Fired by the expectation that American capitalism—mired in an unprecedented depression—had entered its final crisis, the ST&LA set out to mobilize the working class. At first it seemed to receive promising signals in particular from New England, where the newly organized Boot and Shoe Workers Union and the National Union of Textile Workers joined the new federation. In a few sectors of the desperately impoverished needle trades, militants led strikes of the most exploited workers, women and the young. The ST&LA promised an industrial unionism, issued over two hundred charters, and enrolled between fifteen thousand and thirty thousand members. However, the ST&LA did not draw from the AFL—despite intense internal sparring against AFL president Samuel Gompers—either the existing industrial unions (such as brewery, coal- or metal-mining) or socialistic-minded (likewise brewery, and the machinists or American Railway Union) trades. In effect, the ST&LA had been limited to bodies where Socialist Labor Party (SLP) members played central roles.

As such, the ST&LA could neither effect an industrial union movement nor successfully resist the overpowering strength of the AFL. Indeed, by 1896 the SLP had itself begun to disintegrate from the withdrawal of the craft-oriented dissidents and their considerable local resources. Soon, internal conflicts shook the organization. When the ST&LA removed its general secretary for printing advertisements of Democratic and Republican politicians, the Central Labor Federation withdrew and the labor alliance entered upon a steady decline. By the turn of the century, it had dwindled to a virtual paper organization.

Ironically, other unionists had already embarked upon a parallel course, via the Western Federation of Miners, the Western Labor Union, and (as it was renamed in 1902) the American Labor Union. ST&LA activists joined with them and others in the formation of the IWW in 1905. While many Socialist Party delegates complained that the ST&LA dominated the founding convention, the ST&LA's fourteen delegates were the fewest of the "big five" labor organizations present. As labor historian Paul Brissenden wrote, the ST&LA's only domination was its "supremacy of ideas." The "political clause" in the party's preamble, which advocated political as well as economic organization of workers, had been drafted (and was to be widely popularized) by Daniel De Leon. Its extraction in 1908 marked the end of the SLP influence in that organization, and the renewal of the ST&LA influence, in a sense, through the "Detroit IWW" faction.

[See also De Leon, Daniel; Industrial Workers of the World; Shoe Workers; Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

Brissenden, Paul. The IWW: A Study of American Syndicalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1919.

Daniel De Leon: The Man and His Work. New York: New York Labor News, 1919.

Herreshoff, David. The Origins of American Marxism. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1967.

—DON FITZ

SOCIALIST WOMAN/PROGRESSIVE WOMAN. Published to educate women in the principles of socialism and to encourage them to join the Socialist Party (SP), the Socialist Woman (1907–1909) appeared monthly under the editorship of Josephine Conger-Kaneko, with the assistance of her husband, Japanese socialist Kiichi Kaneko. Renamed Progressive Woman in 1909, ostensibly to reach a broader audience, the magazine resembled the Appeal to Reason in style and tone. Conger-Kaneko, born in Centralia, Missouri, had previously edited a column entitled "Hints to the Appeal's Wise Woman" and continued to share, although intermittently, office space and printing facilities with the parent publication. Aspiring to reach a national audience, Conger-Kaneko never departed politically from her original and most loyal readership, radical women in the Midwest and in California. Her journalism captured a political sensibility rooted in late-nineteenth-century reform movements, ranging from suffrage and temperance to social purity, and lacked the seeming sophistication of a materialist analysis of the "woman question." Although Conger-Kaneko had studied scientific socialism with Ernest Untermann at Ruskin College, she maintained a sentimental, almost mystical view of womanhood. The Progressive Woman stressed the limitations that capitalism had imposed on women in fulfilling their major roles within the home and as preserver of the family.

The magazine served as the voice of women's organizational autonomy within the SP. Conger-Kaneko believed that women demanded a special agitational message as well as political space distant from domineering men. When the SP established the Woman's National Committee (WNC), Conger-Kaneko nevertheless accepted the decision and made her publication its unofficial organ.

During the peak period of the WNC, which supplied plenty of copy, the Progressive Woman achieved a subscription high of three thousand and a total circulation of eighteen thousand for special issues. Alongside regular features, Conger-Kaneko ran large samples of letters from subscribers and inadvertently supplied future historians with information about rank-and-file women from the distant outreaches of Socialist organization. WNC organizers forwarded summaries of their meetings with local women's committees across the country, reported on their involvements in strikes and in state suffrage campaigns, and tested propaganda in the magazine's columns. The Progressive Woman also ran monthly lesson plans for local women's committees and thereby publicized socialist primers on the woman question. Conger-Kaneko edited special issues on woman suffrage, child labor, and prostitution and regularly featured on the front cover a photograph of a prominent Socialist woman.

In 1911 the Progressive Woman ran into a series of technical and financial difficulties that foreshadowed its demise. Publishing from the SP national office in Chicago, Conger-Kaneko managed for another year before asking the WNC to take on the magazine's financial obligations. The SP's well-established policy against a party-owned press militated against this move, and a party subcommittee arranged instead to fund the Progressive Woman through a joint-stock company. Income proved insufficient to support the publication at the same time that the new chair of the WNC, Winnie Branstetter, charged the Progressive Woman's editorial staff with ultraleftism.

In 1912 Conger-Kaneko ended the Socialist women's magazine and resumed, with the assistance of her managing editor, Barnett Braverman, publication under the title of a popular socialist newspaper of the 1890s, the Coming Nation. A general-interest magazine, the Coming Nation ran until July 1913. In its final number, Conger-Kaneko left a long, bitter statement summarizing her experiences as a Socialist editor and crafting a revealing history of the demise of the SP's singular women's magazine.

[See also Woman's National Committee.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Mari Jo. "Socialist Woman, Progressive Woman, Coming Nation." In The American Radical Press, 1880–1960, vol. 2, edited by Joseph R. Conlin. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1974.

—MARI JO BUHLE

SOCIALIST WORKERS PARTY. While never having more than two thousand members, the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) has sometimes enjoyed an influence far beyond its numbers in the labor and radical movements. For most of its history it has strongly identified with the revolutionary Marxist, Bolshevik-Leninist perspectives of Leon Trotsky. In the 1980s it chose to stress an affinity with the orientation of Fidel Castro's Communist Party of Cuba.

The SWP traces its roots to the early Communist movement of the United States. In 1928 prominent members of the Communist Party—James P. Cannon, Max Shachtman, Martin Abern, Rose Karsner, Arne Swabeck, Karl Skoglund, V. R. Dunne, Antoinette Konikow, and others—were expelled for "Trotskyism" and went on to organize the Communist League of America, with about one hundred members when founded in 1929. The organization published the weekly Militant, a theoretical magazine called New International (later renamed Fourth International and then International Socialist Review), and numerous books and pamphlets by Trotsky and others. Opposing what they considered the bureaucratic-conservative degeneration of the workers' state in the Soviet Union under Joseph Stalin—and the consequent Stalinization of the world Communist movement—the Trotskyists stressed the principles of workers' democracy and revolutionary internationalism as essential aspects of the socialist struggle. They exercised a substantial influence among many leading intellectuals (especially through vigorous opposition to the Stalinist purges of 1936–1938). At the same time, the Trotskyists concentrated special attention both in the unemployed movement and among unionizing industrial workers during the Depression years of the 1930s. In 1934 they led the Minneapolis workers to victory during the militant Teamsters' strikes of that city. They played a significant role in other unions—among auto and maritime workers, for example, in the 1930s and 1940s. Some of the SWP's future leaders (such as Farrell Dobbs, Tom Kerry, Joe Hansen, George Breitman, and others) were recruited and developed in this period.

A series of mergers, splits, and fusions led up to the formation of the SWP in 1938, by which time the Trotskyist ranks had swelled to about twelve hundred. In 1934 the Communist League of America merged with A. J. Muste's American Workers Party to form the Workers Party of the United States. In 1936 this organization went into the Socialist Party of America, led by Norman Thomas, but the Trotskyists and many newly won supporters were soon expelled for challenging the Socialist Party's moderate leadership. The 1938 founding of the SWP coincided with the creation of the Fourth International, a worldwide organization of Trotskyists. The SWP was one of the largest components of this international organization, continuing to play an influential consultative role when forced to formally disaffiliate by the Voorhis Act. Another piece of restrictive legislation, the Smith Act, was used first against the Trotskyists, imprisoning eighteen leaders of the SWP and of the Minneapolis Teamsters because of their refusal to refrain from criticizing what they considered imperialist war aims of the U.S. government during World War II. The strategy that Trotskyists advocated for defeating fascism was a working-class united front—independent of the capitalists—that would combine democratic and transitional (socialist-oriented) demands.

Despite wartime repression, the SWP made gains during the 1940s, playing an especially aggressive role in the postwar strike waves. By 1940 it had a membership of fifteen hundred. The Cold War, anticommunist witch-hunts, and the 1950s economic prosperity took a heavy toll, reducing the party to no more than four hundred aging veterans by 1959. Yet their authority among U.S. radicals increased when the 1956 Khrushchev revelations vindicated their long-standing condemnation of Stalin's crimes. The anticolonial revolutions generated renewed interest in Trotsky's theory of permanent revolution, and the trajectory of the Cuban Revolution—hailed by SWP members, who helped to form Fair Play for Cuba Committees—also caused many to take a closer look at Trotskyist perspectives. Further, as one New Left veteran (never in the SWP milieu) has reminisced: "In the 1950s and early 1960s when not much was happening on the Left as such, the SWP's local Militant Labor Forums, where they existed, often reached out to young people; and individual SWPers often conducted themselves with a dignity that made an impression on youngsters."

The rise of the black liberation movement in the United States contributed to a new radicalization; by championing and publicizing the ideas of Malcolm X, the SWP further increased its influence—though Afro-American membership never exceeded seven percent, out of a membership of about twelve hundred by the late 1970s. The student and youth radicalization, and especially the mass movement against the U.S. war in Vietnam, brought many recruits into the SWP and its youth group, the Young Socialist Alliance (founded in 1960). The SWP played a central role in the National Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam and in the National Peace Action Coalition, responsible for drawing hundreds of thousands into active opposition to the war. Members of the SWP and the Young Socialist Alliance also played a role in women's liberation efforts (and to a lesser extent in gay rights activities). In this period female membership rose to about forty percent, with significant numbers of women playing leadership roles. Influence was also exerted in the Chicano and Puerto Rican communities. In many areas the SWP became known for running vigorous and sometimes innovative socialist election campaigns to introduce the public to socialist ideas and to dramatize the need for political independence from the procapitalist Democratic and Republican parties.

Over the years many frictions resulted in groupings and individuals leaving the SWP. Among the best-known splits were those led by Max Shachtman in 1940 and Bert Cochran in 1953 (representing about five hundred and two hundred members, respectively). The Shachtmanites viewed the Soviet Union as a "bureaucratic-collectivist" society no less reactionary than capitalism (some later decided it was even more reactionary than capitalism), whereas the SWP majority insisted that the nationalized, planned economy of the Soviet Union represented a working-class gain worth defending from both Western imperialism and Stalinist bureaucrats. The Cochranites believed the classical Trotskyist analysis and party-building perspectives had become outdated in the face of the Cold War confrontation and anticommunist repression, and they viewed the SWP majority as "sectarian" defenders of "sterile orthodoxies."

Many writers and intellectuals in and around the Trotskyist movement during the 1930s later went on to become influential moderate socialist, liberal, and even conservative ideological and cultural figures. Among ex-members who remained on the left end of the political spectrum, continuing to have an influence on the broader radical movement, were A. J. Muste, Harry Braverman, C. L. R. James, Raya Dunayevskaya, Sidney Lens, Hal Draper, Staughton Lynd, and Murry Weiss. Among the revolutionary veterans who continued to make significant contributions from within the SWP were George Novack, Joseph Hansen, George Breitman, Art Preis, Frank Lovell, Fred Halstead, Paul Siegel, and Evelyn Reed.

By the early 1970s a transition was made to a new leadership team of 1960s recruits headed by Jack Barnes, a former economics student from Carleton College whose predecessors as SWP national secretary had been class-struggle veterans James P. Cannon and Farrell Dobbs. Perhaps a lack of confidence caused the new leadership to impose an increasingly tight internal regime. This lack of confidence was undoubtedly intensified by the failure of a "proletarianization" effort (in which a majority of the members got industrial jobs) to yield hoped-for gains in the late 1970s. In the early 1980s—as the new SWP leadership put forward a far-reaching critique of Trotsky's theory of permanent revolution—about two hundred veteran members were driven out for resisting the abandonment of major aspects of the SWP program. Many more drifted away in demoralization, though the SWP remained one of the major organizations of the American Left, with perhaps seven hundred members. One of its contributions in the 1970s and 1980s was a successful lawsuit against the U.S. government, publicizing many years of vicious and illegal harassment by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other government agencies.

In the 17 May 1991 issue of the Militant it was announced that—largely due to "the historical importance and weight of the communist leadership in Cuba and its political trajectory"—by the end of the 1980s the SWP leadership and its followers "no longer considered themselves Trotskyist and were separate from the world Trotskyist movement and its various competing parties and international groupings." While it continued, in the twilight of the twentieth century, to maintain branches in two dozen cities and carry on modest activities (especially in solidarity with Castro's Cuba and in opposition to U.S. imperialism), the organization failed to regain the dynamism that had characterized it in earlier decades.

[See also Breitman, George; Cannon, James Patrick; Dobbs, Farrell; Dunayevskaya, Raya; Fourth International; Halstead, Fred; Konikow, Antoinette Bucholz; Muste, A. J.; Peace Movements; Shachtman, Max; Smith Act Trial, 1943; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Breitman, George, ed. The Founding of the Socialist Workers Party. New York: Monad Press, 1982.
- Breitman, George, Paul Le Blanc, and Alan Wald. Trotskyism in the United States: Historical Essays and Reconsiderations. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1996.
- Cannon, James P. The History of American Trotskyism. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1972.
- Halstead, Fred. Out Now! A Participant's Account of the American Movement against the Vietnam War. New York: Monad Press, 1978.
- Le Blanc, Paul. Trotskyism in America: The First Fifty Years. New York: Fourth Internationalist Tendency, 1987.
- Wald, Alan. The New York Intellectuals: The Rise and Decline of the Anti-Stalinist Left from the 1930s to the 1980s. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

—PAUL LE BLANC

SOCIALIST ZIONISM. The Socialist Zionist movement, and the larger Labor Zionist movement of which it can be considered a part, played a unique role within North American Jewish radicalism. Linked to both anarchist-utopian and Marxist-nationalist tendencies within the Yiddish-speaking community, it sought to resolve the dilemmas of modern Jewry through socialist activism and active Jewish self-defense in the Diaspora, the territorial concentration of the Jewish people, and the development of a sovereign Jewish polity in the ancestral homeland of the Jewish people, Eretz Yisrael (the land of Israel). Long a small but significant force in the United States, it retains its status as a primary advocate of humanistic Jewish values, culture, tradition, and education, a just society, Arab-Jewish rapprochement in the Middle East, and peace and active cooperation between the state of Israel and its neighbors.

The formation of Socialist Zionism goes back to the first years of the twentieth century in eastern and central Europe. In contrast to other Left trends within Jewish communities, including Bundists and, later, Communists, the Socialist Zionists believed that while socialist theory was important, valuable, and generally correct, the problems of anti-Semitism, social dislocation, and Jewish vulnerability required a particularistic (i.e., Zionist) solution.

Local groups of Poale Zion (Labor Zionists) developed throughout Russia and eastern Europe, and the American branch of the movement can be traced back to 1903. Its weekly Yiddish-language organ, Der Yiddisher Kempfer (The Jewish Fighter, 1907–present), was widely read in the Jewish community, and rapidly became known for its high literary quality and its emphatic political views. The American Poale Zion established its own mutual aid society, the Yiddisher Nationaler Arbeter Farband (Jewish National Workers Association), which operated in overlapping circles with the socialistic Workmen's Circle. Other innovations included national-radical day schools, which promoted Yiddish-language teaching of Jewish and international literature, and secular Jewish education—a model later taken over, with marked political modifications, by the Workmen's Circle and by the Communist-related International Workers Order schools.

In 1913 another Left-Zionist movement, Hashomer Hatzair (The Young Guard), developed in Europe, drawing on currents as diverse as the German Wandervogel, the British Boy Scouts, and Marxism-Leninism. A totally youth-led and youth-oriented movement, Hashomer Hatzair shunned Yiddish for Hebrew and stressed aliya (literally “going up” to Eretz Yisrael). In 1923 immigrants to the United States launched branches, which deprecated formal higher education for internal “movement” education and collective self-development. Like other elements of Socialist Zionism, they were closely tied to their “world units,” which led their organizational bases in Europe, later in Israel.

Three major international figures on the Jewish Left lent their talents to the Socialist Zionist cause in the United States. Ber Borokhov (1881–1917), the most rigorous of the Russian Labor Zionist intellectuals, had been founder of the Zionist Socialist Workers Union. He stressed that the extremely distorted class-structure of the Jewish people through their dispersion necessitated a radical change; Jews should strive for control of their own economic infrastructure, through participating in all strata of a state's economy, liberating the Jewish people both nationally and for a final class-emancipation to follow in the worldwide socialist struggle. Nachman Syrkin (1868–1924), another “founding father” in Europe, was a less doctrinaire socialist, holding that a cooperative mass settlement of the Jewish proletariat in Eretz Yisrael, with cooperative enterprises and trade unionism, would lay the socialist foundations for a new, free Jewish society. Chaim Zhitlovsky (1865–1943), a sweeping figure on the lecture podium and regarded by many as the greatest Yiddish popularizer of ideas in his time, moved from a “Diaspora nationalist” perspective to one of the Poale Zion and offered his pen to Labor Zionism.

During and after the First World War, Labor Zionism swung right, then apparently left, then right again in a desperate effort to effect a solution for the suffering European Jewish masses. David Ben-Gurion, foremost Poale Zion leader during his American years, led Labor Zionism into official support for World War I against the anti-war sentiments of many Jewish Zionists and nearly all Jewish socialists. By attempting to place his movement at the service of the West, with its commitments to national recognition (and its neocolonial interests), Ben-Gurion, and others, hoped that the Balfour Declaration would usher in a Jewish state. In disappointment (and in recognition of Russian Left-Labor Zionist support of the Bolshevik Revolution), he turned momentarily toward the new Soviet regime for support, a plan he abandoned in the 1920s. Only a small section of the movement, “Left Poale Zion,” called for participation in the Third International.

At this time, American Labor Zionism began to go through major demographic and political changes. For a brief period, 1917–1921, Labor Zionists published a daily paper (one of four Yiddish dailies in North America at the time) and waxed strong. Important socialist labor leaders—notably former Socialist Labor Party activist and Amalgamated Clothing Workers leader Joseph Schlossberg—embraced the Zionist cause and established it firmly within the Jewish trades. During the 1920s, however, labor Zionism also became steadily less a working-class and more a transclass movement, especially among younger (i.e., American native-born) members.

As part of this drift, once-fervent opposition against Zionist revisionism—long attacked for its worship of militarism, its chauvinism, and its overt antagonism to socialistic values—eased to a degree as the movements found common ground in the struggle to ease the plight of European Jewry and support for Jewish settlement in Eretz Yisrael. This turn mirrored the move of the Israeli labor movement to shift the focus from “class” to “nation,” and a broad drift within American Jewry from socialist to liberal circles. Many of the original *Poale Zion*ists remained within the Socialist Party. They felt a mutual hostility with Jewish Communists and with the rest of Jewish Social Democracy. A majority of the *Poale Zion*ists in time drifted out of Socialist political activism, even while often retaining their ethical commitments in their “movement activities.” Labor Zionism—noted especially in the 1930s–1940s for the English-language publications Pioneer Woman (by the Women’s Labor Zionist Organization) and Jewish Frontier—supported liberal and labor causes, but in a general sense its socialist commitment waned, and its approach has been marred at times by an obsessive anticommunism. The Labor Zionist youth movement that has its roots in Poale Zion, Habonim (The Builders), retained stronger connections with older socialist ideas, and prepared its members for settlement in the labor sector of Eretz Yisrael.

By contrast, Hashomer Hatzair had always, until the Khrushchev revelations of 1956, held a position of critical support toward the Soviet Union, regarding the Bolshevik Revolution as a struggle for a new world order complementary to that of Socialist Zionist struggle against Jewish life in Galut (exile). Even on the eve of World War II, Hashomer Hatzair continued to call for the creation of a binational Jewish-Arab state in “mandatory Palestine.” After 1947, with the palpable impossibility of that solution, it continued to insist upon amity between the Jews and the Palestinian Arabs, joint victims of a tragic conflict “between two peoples, one returning to its homeland and another already living for many years on that same land.” By 1936, Hashomer Hatzair had reached its maximum size of three thousand in the United States and Canada. With the approach of the war, the movement became rent with dissension over the proper response. A Trotskyist-influenced faction insisted on “revolutionary defeatism,” that is, no support for the coming world war; the majority insisting on “fighting fascism within and without” (a position that emerged dominant with the news of Nazi atrocities and attempted genocide).

With the conclusion of the war, and the realization of the massive tragedy inflicted upon the world Jewish community, Socialist Zionists along with Labor Zionists supported or participated in the underground immigration of Jews from war-torn Europe to mandatory Palestine, and the smuggling of arms to Jewish defense forces.

In 1947 Hashomer Hatzair created an affiliated "adult organization," the Progressive Zionist League, and a less ideologically based support organization, Americans for Progressive Israel. The Socialist Zionists' journal Israel Horizons (1952–present) began publication under the stewardship of former PM foreign editor and European correspondent Richard Yaffe.

With the foundation of the state of Israel, a number of Socialist Zionists and Labor Zionists themselves immigrated to Israel, many to live on kibbutzim of the Kibbutz Artzi Federation, affiliated with Mapam (United Workers Party), or the Ihud, affiliated with Mapai (Israeli Labor Party). The drain on leadership seriously affected Hashomer Hatzair, as did its principled opposition to the Korean War. Attacks upon it spread through mainstream Jewish organizations, not excluding the Labor Zionists, and it was subjected to investigations and harassment by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, a resurgence of Jewish progressive activism brought campus activity and a revival of interest in the writings of Borokhov, Syrkin, and other Socialist Zionist pioneers. In recent years, Socialist Zionists, specifically Americans for Progressive Israel and Israel Horizons, have joined hands with other progressive Jewish organizations, such as New Jewish Agenda, the Progressive Zionist Caucus, the International Jewish Peace Union, and the Jewish Peace Fellowship, in opposition to the rightward drift of Israeli politics, the invasion of Lebanon, and the continued occupation of the West Bank.

FURTHER READING

- Arian, Charles L. "Zionism, Socialism, and the Kinship of Peoples: Hashomer Hatzair in North America." Ph.D. diss., Hebrew Union College, 1986.
- Shpizman, Laib. Geshikhte fun der tsyonistisher arbeter bavegunig Tsofen Amerike. Vol. 1. New York: Farlage "Yiddisher Kempfer," 1955.

—ARIEH LEBOWITZ

SOCIOLOGY. Radical or Left sociology in the United States includes critical, populist, humanist, and Marxian varieties. Scholars associated with these tendencies have produced a prodigious body of work, publish journals, and play significant roles in mainstream professional associations. Their thinking has influence in such subfields of sociology as stratification, criminology, minority groups, social movements, women's studies, development (Third World studies), and conflict theory.

Critical sociology focuses on criticizing and demystifying existing institutions such as the criminal (in)justice system, the (un)health care industry, the structures of (mis)education, and so on. Populist sociology, associated with C. Wright Mills (The Power Elite) and G. William Domhoff (The Power Elite and the State and Who Rules America Now?), is engaged primarily in power structure research on the local, national, and international levels. Humanist sociology has as its agenda the development of a sociology "for the service of humanity." (The words are those of Alfred McClung Lee, cofounder of the Association for Humanist Sociology [AHS].) Marxian sociologists (political economists properly understood, hence multidisciplinary by definition) work in the Marxist or Neo-Marxist tradition. (Some belong to the Section on Marxist Sociology of the American Sociological Association [ASA].) These tendencies all overlap to some degree. The two general journals of Left sociology, Critical Sociology (formerly the Insurgent Sociologist) and Humanity and Society (the journal of the AHS), publish material from all of these tendencies.

The Left sociological tradition shares to varying degrees several assumptions. (1) An objective or value-neutral social science does not exist, and radical sociologists should be upfront about their commitment to investigating issues that will assist in the betterment and/or transformation of society into one in which racism, sexism, oppression, exploitation, war, and poverty will be reduced or eliminated. Therefore they choose their research areas based on that value system. (2) Radical sociologists ought to be at least somewhat active in transformative efforts outside of academia. (3) The profession (and the institution of higher education in which most sociologists work) should be opened up to previously excluded groups, especially minorities and working-class people. These assumptions together form a historical "countertradition" to that of the dominant "mainstream" sociology that is associated with the twin evils of abstracted empiricism (the empirical study of anything for the sake of the empirical process) and formal theorizing (empty of such concepts as class power, imperialism, racism, and oppression, all of which are considered by conventional sociologists as overly "value-laden"). Hence mainstream sociology is viewed as a sociology that legitimates "stable forms of domination" (Mills, The Sociological Imagination).

Many of the founding fathers (sic) of sociology (1890s–1920s) were involved in social reform activities, or at least empirical research and theorizing with social policy implications. But they were not part of a radical, transformative countertradition. These pioneers were actually the precursors of current mainstream sociology because of their commitment to social stability and their elitist assumptions and prescriptions. In this they reflected the politics of the "Progressive Era," which centered on regulation of capitalism. There was Albion Small, who founded the sociology department at the University of Chicago in 1893. He had originally been trained for the ministry. He had studied in Germany (as was true of many other sociologists at the time) and was influenced by German views about the effectiveness of state supervision of the social process. He was also a eugenicist. His fictional Between Eras: From Capitalism to Democracy (1913) was compared by Harry Elmer Barnes to Plato's Republic. His approach was in the tradition of the most popular social democratic tract of the time, Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward (1888), a work in the same elitist tradition as the much later Walden II, by B. F. Skinner (1948).

Lester F. Ward, the first president of the American Sociological Society (as it was then called) in 1906, advocated some public ownership in the form of a system called sociocracy. He worked for the federal government for forty years. His nephew Edward A. Ross had also studied in Germany and was also a social reformer. His book Sin and Society (1907) attracted the admiring attention of President Theodore Roosevelt. Although a racist, he did expose conditions of "coolie" labor building the Central Pacific Railroad and consequently in 1900 was fired from his position at Leland Stanford University. These reformer-sociologists had little in common with socialists like Eugene V. Debs. They abhorred class conflict, were generally contemptuous of the masses (in particular minorities and immigrants), and had little respect for the intelligence of women; most of them supported imperialism and America's involvement in World War I. The only white social scientist who can be considered a forerunner of Left sociology and its power structure research was Thorstein Veblen (The Theory of the Leisure Class, 1899), and he was not strictly speaking a sociologist. He, too, was an elitist, advocating a form of technocracy. In that same year, W. E. B. Du Bois published The Philadelphia Negro. But although Du Bois would move leftward later, that book was little more than a "Chicago School" study some years ahead of its time. In it, he advocated a program of "Negro" self-help.

The "Chicago School" of social disorganization theorists in the 1920s (associated with Robert E. Park and Ernest W. Burgess) also was not "countertraditional." This group did carry out empirical studies of live people, ranging from gangs, ghettos, hoboes, and immigrants to desertion, divorce, and prostitution. The myriad of studies produced in Chicago in that decade contributed to the development of the fields of urbanology and social work. There had been links to the reform work of Jane Addams and her Hull House settlement even before the 1920s, as well as to other women social worker activists. But Chicago's social policy implications did not go beyond liberal reforms aimed at restoring social stability in communities affected by varying degrees of "social pathological" behaviors. As such, the Chicago School laid the foundation for later (and current) "blaming the victim" culture of poverty and underclass ideas.

Sociology did not develop a significant radical wing even following the crash of 1929 and the rise of fascism in Europe, even though large movements of the Left were developing outside the academy. One of very few sociological studies seriously to consider social class as a major issue was the Middletown (1929) and Middletown in Transition (1937) series by Robert S. and Helen M. Lynd. (Robert Lynd's 1939 book Knowledge for What? would become a slogan for New Left sociologists in the late 1960s.) Radical organizations, especially the Communist Party (CP) during its Popular Front period in the mid-1930s, did recruit a handful of sociologists. The pro-CP journal Science and Society, associated with sociologist and CP member Bernhard Stern, was established in 1936. Partisan Review, following its pro-Trotskyist reincarnation in 1937, also had an academic following. (Later, Mills would publish one of his first attacks on academia there.) Activists among sociologists were few; one exception was Jerome Davis, who became national president of the American Federation of Teachers after he was fired by Yale in 1936 for his pro-Soviet pronouncements. He was elected president of the Eastern Sociological Society that same year.

By the 1930s sociology had become a respectable field, useful to capital. (The Hawthorne Western Electric studies that pioneered the "human relations school" of management were partly conducted by sociologists.) After the war the dominant political style among sociologists became that of Cold War liberalism. Many liberals had been anti-Nazi, and the Soviet Union seemed to be a similar totalitarian threat. Talcott Parsons, one of mainstream sociology's leading figures and a founding member of the Harvard Russian Research Center, which was funded by the Carnegie Corporation and worked closely with the U.S. State Department and the Central Intelligence Agency, went to West Germany in 1948, where he was instrumental in establishing contacts with Soviet émigrés who were sources of intelligence. A number were also wanted as war criminals. He helped bring one of them to the United States. Parsons was president of the American Sociological Society in 1949.

This period took some toll on a handful of sociologists who were, or had briefly been, members of the CP. In 1951, after the local American Legion demanded the dismissal of three members of the Sarah Lawrence College faculty including Helen Lynd, who was not a Party member, she and a dozen others were subpoenaed to appear before the U.S. Senate Internal Security Subcommittee (the Jenner Committee). Other objects of political persecution included Robert Bellah, who had been in the CP as an undergraduate, and who was forced by Harvard's Dean McGeorge Bundy to undergo a psychiatric examination before he was finally "cleared"; and Sigmund Diamond, also briefly in the CP, who was first offered, then denied an appointment by Bundy. Both had refused to be informers on their former comrades.

Immediately after the war critical sociology was kept alive by a group of refugees from Nazism centered at the New School for Social Research and at Columbia. This group included Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer (who would soon return to Frankfurt), Erich Fromm (who became a member of Norman Thomas's Socialist Party), and Herbert Marcuse. Robert Lynd was also at Columbia. Daniel Bell was editing the social democratic New Leader then, though he would soon "graduate" to Fortune and become famous for The End of Ideology (1960). Mills arrived in this milieu in 1944. Two other émigrés of importance to Left sociology were Hans Gerth, with whom Mills had worked at Wisconsin, and who would influence New Left developments there; and Lewis Coser, later with Dissent magazine. Coser (The Functions of Social Conflict, 1956) was also associated with a Left socialist group led by a former comrade of Trotsky, Max Shachtman. Shachtman's group included sociologists Philip Selznick (The Organizational Weapon, 1952), Seymour Martin Lipset (Political Man, 1960), and a Detroit union activist and follower of C. L. R. James, Martin Glaberman. Only Glaberman would stick to socialist politics, later on from his position at Wayne State introducing Marxist ideas to Detroit's League of Revolutionary Black Workers.

However, it was not until the civil rights, anti-war, and feminist movements of the 1960s that a significant radical sociology movement appeared. Clusters of critical sociology faculty emerged in response to the student New Left at Washington University in Saint Louis (Alvin Gouldner, Irving Louis Horowitz, Jules Henry, Irving Zeitlin); Brandeis University (John Seeley, Maurice Stein, Marcuse, Coser); the University of Wisconsin at Madison (Gerth, Maurice Zeitlin); Livingston College at Rutgers, where Horowitz organized a Left department that included John Leggett (Class, Race and Labor, 1968), already purged from Connecticut and Simon Fraser in Canada for political reasons, and several Left Latin Americanists (Horowitz is now associated with the "neo-con" National Association of Scholars); the University of California at Berkeley, where a radical criminology program was instituted (Herman Schwendinger, Paul Takagi); and a few other institutions.

Sociology graduates from such universities helped organize Students for a Democratic Society (Todd Gitlin, Richard Flacks, and Robert J. S. Ross, all still active sociologists, helped write the group's "manifesto," the Port Huron Statement, in 1962) and later constituted the nucleus of the "sociology liberation movement." At the 1968 ASA convention, graduate student Martin Nicolaus responded to Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Wilbur Cohen's "keynote" address with a stinging indictment, later published as Fat-Cat Sociology in leaflet form. It is reprinted in Radical Sociologists and the Movement. Protests and disruptions, mainly against the Vietnam War, at subsequent conventions included a memorial tribute to Ho Chi Minh in 1969 and the parading of an eight-foot-high red-white-and-blue plastic penis in 1972. By this time the Insurgent Sociologist had been founded. Radical, women's, and black caucuses appeared within the ASA and in most regional societies. Some of the radical caucuses, which overlapped (albeit rarely) with women's and minority caucuses, organized separate conferences intended to promote the radical "countertradition" of sociology. In 1976, Alfred McClung Lee (Toward Humanist Sociology, 1973) and Elizabeth Briant Lee founded the AHS. (Twenty-five years earlier they had organized the Society for the Study of Social Problems.) The sociology liberationists succeeded in electing Al Lee president of the ASA for 1975–1976.

In 1969 Dick Flacks, then in a hostile department at Chicago led by Morris Janowitz, a "military sociologist," and other establishment sociologists, was nearly murdered in his office, probably by a right-wing militant. It was the most violent incident in a much larger campaign to rid sociology of its new movement (an effort that continues), and there were many firings. A number of radical sociologists dropped out of academia altogether, believing the university system and sociology to be hopelessly corrupt. Most centers of radical sociology had either collapsed due to internal frictions or had been disbanded through political purges by the late seventies, leaving smaller, but still influential, survivors scattered throughout the country.

Today, a series of journals reflect the specializations, interdisciplinary concerns, and debates of Left sociology. Social Justice in criminology, Capitalism, Nature, Socialism in ecology, Latin American Perspectives, the interdisciplinary Rethinking Marxism, the Marxian-oriented Socialism and Democracy, the older Science and Society, the cultural theory journal Social Text, and the informal journal of the ASA's Section on Marxist Sociology, Critical Sociology, all represent a survival and continuation of the radical sociological tradition.

Major issues with which Left sociology grapples parallel those of other social science and humanities fields. The perennial conflict between activism and scholarship in a tight job market and a field that is dominated by the rhetoric of "value-neutrality" have led to the promotion by some of an "academic Marxism" divorced from practice. This is reflected in other issues debated among radical sociologists, all of which pit classical Marxism against various revisions. Among these are: interpretations of the state (e.g., Miliband's classical Marxism or Domhoff's instrumentalism versus Skocpol's state autonomy thesis); interpretations of class (especially the analytical Marxism of Eric O. Wright [Classes, 1985] versus a more traditional, dialectical Marxism); postmodern and deconstructionist influences versus Marxist class-based political economic theory; and multicultural, feminist, and postcolonial identity "discourses" versus class analyses. Reflecting changing empirical realities, there are also continuing debates about dependency theory, the class nature of white collar and service workers, the role of labor unions, the significance of race versus class, the labor process and the future of work, and the meaning of socialist pedagogy.

FURTHER READING

- Oppenheimer, Martin, Martin J. Murray, and Rhonda F. Levine, eds. Radical Sociologists and the Movement. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1991.
- Schwendinger, Herman, and Julia R. Schwendinger. The Sociologists of the Chair. New York: Basic Books, 1974.

—MARTIN OPPENHEIMER and EVAN STARK

SOLEDAD BROTHERS. See Armed Struggle, 1960s–1970s; Davis, Angela.

SORGE, FRIEDRICH. See German Americans; International Workingmen's Association.

SOUTHERN CONFERENCE EDUCATIONAL FUND. Established in 1946 in New Orleans to eradicate segregation in the South, the first interracial organization publicly so committed in that region, the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF) enlisted the support of the most independent-minded, radical spirits among white and black southerners. Aubrey W. Williams, the New Deal Left-liberal former head of the National Youth Administration, was the first president of SCEF and remained so nearly until his death in the mid-sixties. Through Williams, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt was SCEF's link to the national liberal movement. That was decisive in sustaining SCEF against the McCarthyite witch-hunting of arch-segregationists like Georgia governor Herman P. Talmadge and Mississippi senator James O. Eastland from the Right, and the red-baiting tactics of Cold War liberals on the moderate Left, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.'s "vital center," who did what they could to isolate SCEF in the fifties.

Despite this, SCEF enlisted white southerners into the struggle to implement President Harry S. Truman's civil rights proposals of 1948, and kept them engaged through the fallow years before the 1954 Brown decision sparked a grass-roots movement among southern blacks. SCEF then worked alongside the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and other black southerners to make desegregation the living law of the land. The indefatigable Jim Dombrowski, Christian socialist and early associate of the Highlander Folk School, as executive director of SCEF was indispensable in keeping the organization alive and vigorous through these embattled times.

In its final, and in some ways most action-oriented period of the 1960s, SCEF carved out an original role bridging the older Left with the young militants of the New Left, which made the South the most creative theater for radical social movements in the years 1960–1965. SCEF raised funds, publicized the southern struggle, and brought northern activists to the aid of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee from 1960 to 1963, when that lively group was regarded as somewhat of a nuisance by established civil rights organizations. Anne and Carl Braden, independent white socialists and directors of SCEF in its last phase, maintained its older alliances while nourishing the newer ones with younger blacks in the South. Carl's pungent pen and ubiquitous presence was too much for the red-hunting zealots of the House Un-American Activities Committee. Eventually they saddled him with a ten-month prison term for well-deserved contempt of that committee in 1961, making him one of the last victims of the domestic Cold War.

Before the legislative victories of the Kennedy-Johnson years, SCEF had its office ransacked and its files carted off by Senator Eastland's investigators working in collusion with Louisiana authorities in 1963. SCEF retaliated successfully, arguing for federal court intervention in state cases involving federal civil rights violations, a critical legal precedent that benefited the entire civil rights movement. Along with much of the civil rights movement, however, SCEF was a victim, in a sense, of success. The passage of the civil rights acts of 1964 and 1965 that dismantled legal segregation forced these organizations to search for a new raison d'être. Community organizing, the anti-Vietnam War movement, interracial working-class organizing in the Deep South and Appalachia, support of black nationalism—none succeeded in melding black and white activists together with that overriding sense of purpose of the earlier anti-Jim Crow cause. SCEF self-destructed by 1975, when infighting among black nationalists and white ultraleftists who had entered its ranks in the early 1970s destroyed its effectiveness, something that segregationists and anticommunist liberals had failed to do. It was another dispiriting example of the American Left's endemic inability to sustain itself as a continuous, organized presence on the American scene.

[See also Braden, Anne and Carl; Civil Rights Movement; Dombrowski, James Anderson; Highlander Research and Education Center; Southern Negro Youth Congress; Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.]

FURTHER READING

Klibaner, Irwin. "The Travail of Southern Radicals: The Southern Conference Educational Fund, 1946–1976." Journal of Southern History 49 (May 1983).

Klibaner, Irwin. Conscience of a Troubled South: The Southern Conference Educational Fund, 1946–66. New York: Carlson, 1989.

Salmond, John A. "The Great Southern Commie Hunt: Aubrey Williams, the Southern Conference Educational Fund, and the Internal Security Subcommittee." South Atlantic Quarterly 77 (autumn 1978).

—IRWIN KLIBANER

SOUTHERN NEGRO YOUTH CONGRESS. A predominantly black middle-class youth organization, the Communist-led Southern Negro Youth Congress (SNYC) was one of the most significant precursors of the modern civil rights movement. Although SNYC chapters were located throughout the South, its organizational centers remained in Birmingham, Richmond, Atlanta, and New Orleans.

SNYC was conceived of at the first National Negro Congress (NNC) in 1936. Party members and NNC supporters agreed that black youth constituted the most potent political force in the South. Communists Ed Strong, then national youth chairman of the NNC, Chris Alston, and James E. Jackson laid the foundations for a regionwide conference devoted to the problems of southern youth. Appropriately convened on the birthday of Frederick Douglass, the first All-Southern Negro Youth Conference drew more than five hundred delegates to Richmond, Virginia, in February 1937. Rallying around an antiracist, militant program for social change, the participants included church groups, fraternal bodies, and a wide array of political organizations. Several SNYC activists proved their commitment to organized labor by remaining in Richmond and assisting in the organization of tobacco workers in the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Two more highly successful conferences were held in Chattanooga and Birmingham in 1938 and 1939, respectively. In addition to reemphasizing their commitment to black labor in the South, SNYC activists adopted the slogan "Freedom, Equality, and Opportunity." SNYC's program basically called for an end to discrimination, demanded job security, and fought against regional wage differentials. Its specific aims were reduced to supporting various forms of New Deal legislation, an anti-lynching bill, and miscellaneous bills intended to improve the conditions of the unemployed. Nonetheless, SNYC was still in the process of consolidation and thus basically failed to develop a program of direct action by 1939.

The events at the third conference were significant, however, since the delegates agreed to move SNYC's headquarters from Richmond to Birmingham—the industrial center of the South. Only months after the 1939 conference, SNYC began to build a strong cadre of leadership consisting of James E. Jackson, his future wife, Esther Cooper, Ed and Augusta Strong, Herman Long, Ethel Goodman, and Thelma Dale. They were soon joined by Communists Louis and Dorothy Burnham. With an able body of leaders, SNYC activists were now in a position to establish a plan for direct action. By the fourth annual conference in New Orleans in 1940, it was decided to initiate a massive Right to Vote campaign, including voter registration and education throughout the South, and to engage in a resolute battle against police brutality, particularly in Birmingham and Memphis. By May 1941, SNYC published its first edition of Cavalcade: The March of Southern Youth, an attractive tabloid that served as the organ of the nascent organization.

Most of SNYC's active work before 1941 was concentrated in Birmingham and New Orleans. In addition to setting up rural committees in the Alabama "black belt" and in the Louisiana countryside under the leadership of Ethel Goodman and Clinton Clark, respectively, SNYC activists joined the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Communist-led Southern Committee for People's Rights in the fight for individual civil liberties. Perhaps the most prominent case was the defense of Nora Wilson, a black Alabama domestic worker convicted of assaulting her boss with intent to kill.

The development of a radical cultural tradition was also an essential part of its program. Reflective of the Popular Front's leniency with respect to black artistic expression, young black artists from all over the country participated in SNYC activities. In 1939 Birmingham hosted the first all-black visual arts exhibit in the South, organized under the auspices of SNYC. Poets such as Owen Dodson, Eugene B. Williams, and Waring Cuney published their works regularly in Cavalcade. More significant, SNYC activists combined political activity with stage performances of plays by radical black playwrights such as Langston Hughes, Owen Dodson, and Randolph Edmond. Led by Pernell Collins and Thomas Richardson, "People's Theaters" were established in Richmond, Birmingham, and New Orleans, and this work was supplemented by the "Caravan Puppeteers," a roving puppet show that performed plays in the rural black belt.

During World War II, through organizations such as the Citizen's Committee for Army Welfare, it fought against racial discrimination in the U.S. armed forces. SNYC's active support of the war effort did not lead to an abandonment of workers' struggles, the fight against police brutality, or voter education. In 1941, under the leadership of Bertha Boozer, the Atlanta chapter of SNYC attempted to organize black domestic workers, provided critical support in a strike of garbage collectors, and attempted to organize a boycott of stores refusing to hire African Americans. SNYC leaders called on the War Department to issue a statement against the treatment meted out to black soldiers in the South, and even went as far as requesting the department's participation in SNYC's "Victory Mobilization Day." Its new slogan, "Fight Fascism Abroad and K-K-K-ism at Home," served as the unifying theme for the Fifth All-Southern Negro Youth Congress, held at Tuskegee Institute in 1942. The sixth congress, held in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1944, reemphasized SNYC's struggle for constitutional liberties. Among the participants was the Reverend Martin Luther King, Sr., pastor of Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta.

Immediately after the war, the central issues for SNYC were peace and civil rights. In 1946 SNYC held its seventh annual conference in Columbia, South Carolina, at which W. E. B. Du Bois gave his famous "Behold the Land" speech. Du Bois's comments set the tone for both the conference and the future plans of its organizers. A new militancy was expressed, demanding full civil rights, an immediate end to segregation, solidarity with Third World anticolonial movements, and the complete destruction of nuclear weapons. James Jackson even suggested a nationwide general strike of black workers.

Although the Columbia conference was a success, SNYC faced considerable difficulty in the years to come due to postwar anticommunist sentiments. Red-baiting and repression reached a climax by the eighth, and final, conference in 1948. SNYC delegates planned to meet in Birmingham, but Public Safety Commissioner Eugene "Bull" Connor harassed several black ministers and political activists weeks before the intended conference. The Reverend Herbert Oliver, the only Birmingham religious leader who refused to submit to the city's intimidation, allowed SNYC to use his church as a meeting place. Nevertheless, because the delegates violated the city's segregation ordinance, several people were arrested, including Idaho senator Glenn Taylor.

SNYC's confrontation with the city of Birmingham in 1948 was the coup de grace in its destruction. Most of its middle-class supporters were sensitive to charges of Communism, and it failed to develop new leadership from the ranks of younger members. After 1948, most of its leadership body chose to either work full-time in the Communist Party or actively support the campaign of Progressive Henry Wallace. Some chapters continued their activity on a local level for a short while, but in most cases, a substantial portion of its membership went on to become activists in the post-1954 civil rights campaigns.

FURTHER READING

Cavalcade. Schomburg Center for Research on Black Culture, New York Public Library.

Kelley, Robin D. G. Hammer and Hoe: Alabama Communists during the Great Depression. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.

"Southern Negro Youth Congress—Forum." 6 February 1984. Oral History of the American Left, Tamiment Institute Library, New York University.

Strong, Augusta. "Southern Youth's Proud Heritage." Freedomways 4, no. 1 (1964).

—ROBIN D. G. KELLEY

SOUTHERN TENANT FARMERS UNION. In the summer of 1934, a remarkable interracial protest movement arose among the sharecroppers and tenant farmers of eastern Arkansas—the Southern Tenant Farmers Union (STFU). Battered by the Depression and by New Deal crop reduction programs that led to massive evictions from the land, black and white sharecroppers joined together to try to gain economic security from a collapsing plantation system. Aided by local and national leaders of the Socialist Party, they tried to lobby the federal government to win a share of crop reduction payments and to resist planter efforts to drive them from the land. The union, often led by black and white fundamentalist ministers, spread quickly throughout the region. In 1935 it organized a cotton choppers' strike to raise wages for day laborers; it sent members to lobby in Washington, and it maintained interracial solidarity in the face of fierce planter repression. By 1936, the organization claimed more than twenty-five thousand members in Arkansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and Texas, and had won national recognition for dramatizing the plight of sharecroppers under the New Deal.

Seal of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union, drawn by Janet Fraser, 1937.

However, external and internal pressures prevented the union from consolidating its gains. First of all, planter terror—murders, beatings, arrests—made it impossible for the union to maintain headquarters "in the field." After 1936, its organizers had to operate from the relative safety of Memphis. Second, Socialist-Communist conflict frayed the union's solidarity. When the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) formed a new agricultural affiliate, the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America (UCAPAWA), the STFU felt compelled to affiliate; its impoverished membership needed labor support. Unfortunately, the president of UCAPAWA was a Communist ex-professor, Donald Henderson, who regarded the STFU as a utopian agrarian movement rather than a legitimate trade union. Upon affiliation, Henderson flooded the STFU with paperwork and dues requests, demoralizing its membership and panicking its leadership, who regarded Henderson's actions as a Communist plot to take over the union. By 1938, the STFU's Socialist leaders were trying to leave the CIO, or to win a separate affiliation, while Communists in the union were trying to win control of the organization. In 1939, amid a famous protest demonstration by evicted sharecroppers in Missouri, the STFU resolved to leave UCAPAWA. In turn, Henderson sought to persuade rebellious locals to remain in the CIO. By the time the faction fight ended, Henderson had enlisted a few top-flight organizers (Rev. Claude Williams and Rev. Owen Whitfield) but few members, while the STFU had lost two-thirds of its locals. UCAPAWA thereupon left the agricultural field, concentrating on food-processing workers, who were covered by the National Labor Relations Board (and could therefore win federally supervised bargaining elections), while the STFU evolved into a lobbying group for sharecroppers and rural workers. The collapse of the plantation system, and the displacement of its work force, continued apace, unaffected by either organization. But for a brief moment, the STFU had given voice to the poorest of the South's people, demonstrating that blacks and whites could be united around common goals even in the heartland of Jim Crow.

[See also Migratory Agricultural Labor; Mitchell, H. L.; Share Croppers Union.]

FURTHER READING

Mitchell, H. L. Mean Things Happening in This Land: The Life and Times of H. L. Mitchell. Montclair, N.J.: Allanheld, Osmun, 1979.

—MARK NAISON

SOUTHERN WORKER AND THE COMMUNIST PRESS IN THE SOUTH. The idea to publish the Southern Worker, the first southern-based

From the Southern Worker, c. 1930.

Communist tabloid, was proposed in the early part of 1930. Although the Daily Worker ran a few disparate articles on the South, a regionally based weekly was seen as a necessity by the Communists since conditions in the South were fundamentally different from those in the rest of the United States. In the spring of 1930, the Communist Party central committee asked James S. Allen (Sol Auerbach), who was currently editor of the Labor Defender (the journal of the International Labor Defense), to launch a weekly newspaper in the South. Although the paper was datelined Birmingham, it was actually launched in Chattanooga since the repression was seemingly greater in Birmingham.

The first issue of the Southern Worker, selling for two cents a copy, appeared on 16 August 1930. Three thousand copies were printed and distributed throughout Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, and the Carolinas. In its first issue, the Southern Worker professed to be "neither a 'white' paper, nor a 'Negro' paper. It is a paper of and for both the white and black workers and farmers. It recognizes only one division, the bosses against the workers and the workers against the bosses." The only way to achieve the demands of the working class, the statement continued, was through proletarian revolution. Surprisingly, the editorial statement made no mention of the Party's position on self-determination in the "black belt," and it contained very little discussion regarding the specific struggles of Afro-Americans.

Notwithstanding the paper's "credo," most of its columns were devoted to the problems of black sharecroppers and workers in the South. During the early 1930s, the Southern Worker published numerous letters from black sharecroppers describing the dismal conditions on most Alabama plantations and in the coal and ore mines of Jefferson County. Although its official circulation was never great, this did not reflect its actual readership. A single copy was often passed from person to person, and in some cases was read aloud to a group of illiterate and semiliterate working people. Articles dealing with Africa and the Caribbean were particularly appealing to black southerners.

Allen and his wife, Isabelle, left the South in the fall of 1931. The editorship of the Southern Worker was taken over briefly by Harry Wicks, who also used the name James Allen, but he was soon replaced by Elizabeth Lawson. Lawson, using the name Jim Mallory, maintained publication well into 1932, but it was eventually suspended until 20 May 1933. Between 1933 and November 1936, the Southern Worker was published out of Birmingham, appearing irregularly on the average of once a month.

During the fall of 1936, the Southern Worker was changed to a small-magazine format under the editorship of Rob Hall, the Party's district organizer in Alabama. Reflecting the Party's Popular Front policies, the newspaper now carried articles directed toward southern liberals, including a regular column entitled "From the Churches." In September 1937, delegates at the first open All-Southern Communist Party Conference in Birmingham agreed to abolish the Southern Worker and replace it with "an adequate southern Party organ." Hence, in November 1937 appeared the first issue of the New South, a monthly newsmagazine carrying sophisticated political tracts dealing with mainstream southern politics, suffrage, southern liberals, and occasional pieces on southern history. Local news items and letters from workers and sharecroppers were discontinued. And after the first two issues, reference to the Communist Party was removed from its masthead and replaced with "Journal of Progressive Opinion."

In 1939 the New South ceased publication, apparently in response to the Party's rapid loss of liberal support due to the Nazi-Soviet Pact. Although no official Communist publication replaced the New South, Alabama Communist and leading liberal Joseph Gelders personally established his own left-wing newspaper in Birmingham, which practically served as the Party's organ. Gelders's idea came to fruition when left-wing philanthropist Dan Gillmor provided the necessary funds to launch the Birmingham-based tabloid. Its first issue appearing on 25 January 1940, Gelders's Southern News Almanac was geared toward organized and unorganized labor, poor farmers, and African Americans across class lines. While slightly more sophisticated, it was in many ways reminiscent of the Southern Worker, although it never stated an affiliation with the Communist Party.

Gelders also solicited his own staff—a matrix of Communists and non-Communist labor supporters. The original editorial staff consisted of George Londa, Quentin P. Gore, and Sam Hall—three experienced journalists sympathetic to the southern Left and the labor movement. In addition to covering the activities of the southern labor movement in great detail, the Southern News Almanac devoted substantial space to the peace movement, civil rights issues, and police brutality in the Birmingham area. Unlike the early issues of the Southern Worker, the Almanac contained weekly religious columns directed at a working-class audience from radical ministers such as the Reverend Fred E. Maxey and Don West.

The Southern News Almanac was short-lived, however. It apparently ceased publication in November 1941.

[See also Birmingham, Alabama; Share Croppers Union; West, Don.]

FURTHER READING

Allen, James S. "Communism in the Deep South: The Opening, 1930–1931; A Political Memoir." Unpublished manuscript, 1984.

Kelley, Robin D. G. Hammer and Hoe: Alabama Communists during the Great Depression. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.

—ROBIN D. G. KELLEY

SOZIALISTISCHER TURNERBUND. With the arrival of those Germans who had been forced to leave their country after the defeat of the 1848 revolution, the Turner movement grew rapidly within the German American communities around the United States. The first Turngemeinde (Turners Club) was organized in Cincinnati in late 1848, and it was followed rapidly by the formation of numerous others, including the Sozial-demokratische Turngemeinde (Social-Democratic Turners Club) of Baltimore in 1849 and the Sozialistischer Turnverein (Socialist Turners League) of New York in 1850, whose membership drew largely from exiled "Forty-Eighters." In October 1851, the first general Turnfest (Turners Festival) was held in Philadelphia, and an umbrella organization was formed to unite the local groups, called the Sozialistischer Turnerbund (Socialist Turners League). This society published a journal, the Turnzeitung (Turners Newspaper), from 15 November 1851 until 16 April 1861, when so many Turners joined the Union army that the organization disbanded for the duration of the Civil War. In its first number, the Turnzeitung reported that twenty-two local groups with a total of 1,072 members belonged to the Turnerbund. Upon its reorganization in 1865, the designation "socialist" was dropped from the official title of the society, and it was known from then on as the Nordamerikanischer Turnerbund. However, gymnastics continued to be a popular pastime of German American workers throughout the history of German American socialism, and workers' Turner societies were an important part of the socialist subculture that existed as an alternative to other groups in cities with a sizable German immigrant population.

In the context of the political configuration of 1848, the term "socialist" did not designate a solely working-class or proletarian outlook, but applied to those sectors who hoped to establish a republican democracy in Germany. This was the goal of most Forty-Eighters who came to the United States and of those who participated in the Turner societies, such as Friedrich Hecker, Karl Heinzen, Adolf Douai, Gustav Struve, and Joseph Weydemeyer. The Turnerbund viewed its purpose as that of furthering the physical and mental development of its members, and the freedom, prosperity, and education of all social classes. The Turnerbund was affiliated with the Demokratischer Turnerbund in Germany, and many German American Turners still had hopes in the early 1850s of returning to Germany and fighting again (this time victoriously) in another revolution. However, as these dreams faded, Turners became more involved in American issues, taking principled stands against the nativism and Know-Nothingism directed against immigrants, against puritanism and temperance, and against slavery. After about 1853, the Turnerbund placed a decreasing emphasis on socialist principles, and allied itself with the antislavery Free Soil Party. At its 1855 convention in Buffalo, the Turnerbund declared its opposition to slavery, and particularly to the extension of slavery into free states. After the Civil War, the German Turner movement lost its more radical tendencies and concentrated primarily on körperliches (physical) rather than geistiges Turnen (intellectual exercises). However, the Turners still joined together with groups of Freidenker (Free-thinkers) at times to oppose manifestations of puritanism and temperance and prohibition.

[See also Freie Gemeinden and Freidenker; German Americans; Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

Learned, M. D. The German-American Turner Lyric: Reprint from the Tenth Report of the Society for the History of the Germans in Maryland. Baltimore: Schneidereith, 1897.

Schlüter, Hermann. Die Anfänge der deutschen Arbeiterbewegung in Amerika. Stuttgart: Dietz Nachfolger, 1907.

—CAROL POORE

SOZIAL-REVOLUTIONÄRE CLUBS. Along with groups oriented mainly toward electoral participation or union activity, another trend developed in German American radicalism after the national railroad strike of 1877. It centered in Chicago and has been loosely termed "anarchist" though these immigrants called themselves sozial-revolutionär. Disillusioned by the decline in votes suffered by the Sozialistische Arbeiter-Partei (Socialist Labor Party; SLP) after 1878 and by attempts of corrupt politicians in Chicago to prevent legally elected socialists from assuming office, many members of the SLP began to question their party's policy of participating in electoral politics. Another source of dissension within the party was differences of opinion over the use of force in the labor movement, as embodied in the armed socialist organizations, the Lehr- und Wehrvereine. In 1880 the first Sozial-Revolutionärer club was formed in New York City when a group of party members withdrew from the SLP over the question of force. By 1883 membership in the SLP had dwindled to fifteen hundred, while in 1885, at their peak, the Social Revolutionaries numbered around seven thousand.

The ideological direction of these clubs was marked by the influence of German anarchism. The German-American Social Revolutionaries were affiliated with the International Working People's Association (IWPA), also known as the "Anarchist" or "Black" International, which had been revived in 1881 at a congress in London. In 1882 the most influential German anarchist of the time, Johann Most, arrived in the United States, immediately began issuing his paper, Freiheit (Freedom), in New York, and embarked on speaking tours that won many new members for local clubs of Social Revolutionaries. The high point of his influence on German American radicalism was 1882–1883, when the Social Revolutionary groups were expanding, but in general, his extreme standpoint was attractive to only a few radical German immigrants.

In 1883 the Social Revolutionaries held a national congress in Pittsburgh and issued their program as the Pittsburgh Manifesto. Written by Most along with the future Haymarket martyrs Albert Parsons and August Spies among others, this statement of principles was no different from that of the socialists in its analysis of capital, surplus value, crises, and the exploitation of workers, but it incorporated the views of the London Conference with respect to force, viewing its utilization as unavoidable in the revolutionary movement to establish a new social order. Also, while the delegates unanimously rejected participation in elections, a resolution introduced by representatives of the IWPA from Chicago was passed that called for taking part in trade union organizing. This proposal reflected the actual connections between the IWPA and the German working class in Chicago, for the IWPA was quite influential there within the Central Labor Union, a central federation representing about twelve thousand workers in 1885 and composed of unions with a high percentage of foreign-born members with radical leanings. The manifesto was therefore a nonsynthesized program for revolutionary action that reflected uncertainty and disagreement over the strategy and ultimate goals of socialism and anarchism and invested local sections with full autonomy. The only centralization deemed necessary was the creation of a National Information Bureau in Chicago and the designation of certain newspapers, including the Chicago Arbeiter-Zeitung (Workers' Newspaper), Fackel (Torch), Vorbote (Herald), the English-language Alarm, and Most's Freiheit, as official publications.

The Social Revolutionaries represented one of the most radical tendencies within the waves of strikes that culminated in the national strike for the eight-hour day on 1 May 1886. In Chicago, members of the IWPA and its press played crucial roles in the organizing effort after some debate over its revolutionary potential. As a result of violence surrounding this strike and the bomb that killed several Chicago police at the Haymarket gathering on 4 May, the German Social Revolutionaries were singled out by police for especially severe harassment. The Arbeiter-Zeitung was raided and shut down briefly, and six of the eight men who were finally charged with conspiracy and murder were German "anarchists." The reaction of the press and public opinion to the bombing was to call indiscriminately for the suppression of all varieties of radicalism and to vilify their adherents as foreigners, particularly Germans, who were spreading alien doctrines and importing class warfare to the United States.

After 1886, then, the Social Revolutionary movement was dead as an organized political force. However, the Germans who had participated in the movement of 1886 were still quite active publicly throughout the next decade. The papers issued by the Haymarket martyrs increased their circulation under editors such as Joseph Dietzgen and Max Baginski and continued to provide a forum for the German labor movement in Chicago. The Pioneer Aid and Support Association of Chicago, which had been created to assist the families of the executed and imprisoned men, was a unifying center for progressive unions and various clubs and associations of workers, sponsoring large demonstrations every 11 November and benefits attended by thousands. Finally, the larger labor movement in Chicago remained highly visible through attempts at independent political action and intensive trade union organizing, and Germans continued their participation.

[See also Black International; German Americans; Haymarket Incident; Most, Johann; Spies, August.]

FURTHER READING

- Ashbaugh, Carolyn. Lucy Parsons, American Revolutionary. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1976.
- David, Henry. The History of the Haymarket Affair. New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1936.
- Nelson, Bruce C. Beyond the Martyrs: A Social History of Chicago's Anarchists, 1870–1900. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Rocker, Rudolf. Johann Most. Berlin: Verlag "Der Syndikalist," 1924.
- Spies, August. Reminiscenzen. Chicago: Christine Spies, 1888.

—CAROL POORE

SPANISH CIVIL WAR. See Abraham Lincoln Brigade; North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy; Spanish Revolution of 1936.

SPANISH REVOLUTION OF 1936. When Franco's fascist troops invaded Spain in July 1936 with the purpose of overthrowing the young and unstable Republic, the Spanish working class responded by making a revolution that went much further toward realizing the classless and stateless ideal of proletarian socialism than any preceding popular revolt. Spontaneously and almost overnight, workers seized factories and other workplaces; land was collectivized; workers' militias were formed throughout the country; the church—age-old enemy of all working-class radicalism and, indeed, openly profascist—was dismantled, and its property confiscated; established political institutions disintegrated or were taken over by workers' committees.

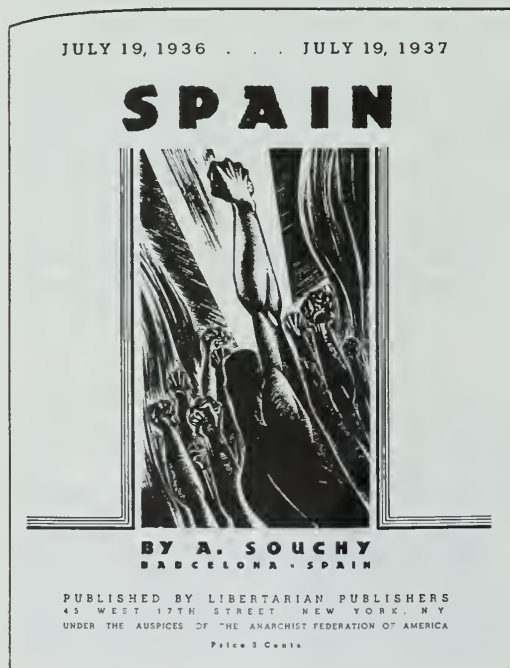

In a decade of cataclysmic worldwide depression and spreading fascism, the revolution in Spain signaled a message of renewed hope to the scattered forces of working-class emancipation throughout the globe, not least in the United States. As elsewhere, actual support for the revolution came only from groups far to the left of the traditional social-democratic and Communist parties and was channeled through various like-minded tendencies in Spain itself.

Supporting the workers' revolution were Spain's largest unions, the anarcho-syndicalist Confederación Nacional del Trabajo (National Confederation of Labor; CNT) and its rival, the Unión General de Trabajadores (General Union of Workers), largely led by the Socialist Party (then in a markedly Left phase), as well as such revolutionary groups as the Iberian Anarchist Federation, the independent Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista (Workers Party of Marxist Unity; POUM), and a small nucleus of Trotskyists. The Spanish Communist Party, however, and many socialists, maintained that Spain was not historically ripe for an anticapitalist revolution and openly declared themselves for the bourgeois republic. After Franco secured military assistance from Hitler's Germany and Mussolini's Italy, the Communist Party, which, in the early days of the revolution, had been a small sect, rapidly became a major power in the land as Stalin's Russia sent numerous military officers and political advisers, as well as some military aid, to shield the fragile remnant of the republican government from both fascists and the revolutionary Left. While the Communist Party viewed Spain's civil war as a struggle between fascism and democracy, more radical leftists argued that workers' revolution was the only sure way of defeating fascism.

The anarchist movement in the United States in the 1930s was not large, but it quickly mounted a nationwide campaign in defense of workers' Spain that vastly exceeded its numerical energies. The CNT's U.S. representative, Spanish-born Maximiliano Olay—veteran of anarchist labor struggles in Cuba and among immigrant cigar-makers in Tampa, Florida, and for many years a leading figure of Chicago's Free Society Group—moved to New York and opened an office for propaganda on lower Fifth Avenue. At his instigation, the various U.S. Jewish, Russian, Spanish, and Italian anarchist federations and groups, as well as English-language groups such as the New York Vanguard group and several branches of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), formed the ad hoc United Libertarian Organizations (ULO) to produce a paper of news and information titled Cover of pamphlet published by the Anarchist Federation of America, 1937.

Spanish Revolution. (Though not actually affiliated, the Gillespie, Illinois, branch of the Progressive Miners of America wholeheartedly supported the effort through a sizable monthly assessment of its members.) Besides publishing Spanish Revolution, the ULO held mass meetings in many cities and raised thousands of dollars for their embattled comrades in Spain. The ULO's constituent groups also promoted the revolution in their own papers, and issued separate publications of their own. The Yiddish-language weekly Freie Arbeter Shtimme brought out an English translation of Rudolf Rocker's pamphlet The Truth about Spain. The Italian-language L'Adunata dei Refrattari carried important communications from Spain by the renowned anarchist theorist Camillo Berneri. The IWW's weekly Industrial Worker and One Big Union Monthly featured reports by Pat Read and other Wobblies in the Spanish trenches.

In many countries the social-democratic parties opposed the revolution, but in the United States the Socialist Party, large sections of which had moved sharply to the left—a development hastened by the influx of a disciplined and energetic group of Trotskyists—took up the banner of the workers' revolution and even organized and funded a substantial military unit, the Debs Column, to fight in Spain. Ernest Erber, a leader of the Young People's Socialist League, joined the editorial staff of the POUM's paper, La Batalla. The Friends of Workers' Spain in Chicago existed primarily to promote English-language POUM publications throughout the American labor movement.

Also oriented toward the POUM, though not without sometimes severe criticisms of its policies, were Hugo Oehler's Revolutionary Workers League, B. J. Field's League for a Revolutionary Party, and Albert Weisbord's Communist League of Struggle. Oehler's oft-reprinted pamphlet Barricades in Barcelona remains an important eyewitness account of the workers' "May Days" revolt of 1937. Weisbord went to Spain as correspondent for the Nation, and issued a "Special Spanish Issue" of his own mimeographed journal, Class Struggle, in September 1937. The Trotskyists, inside the Socialist Party but still producing publications of their own, issued many polemics by Trotsky and others. Other small Marxist groups, including the Proletarian Party and the Lovestoneites, also defended the revolution in Spain and devoted much space to it in their press.

When fascism emerged triumphant in Spain in 1939, many Spanish revolutionaries sought political asylum in the United States. By far the largest group rallied round España Libre, a broad-based bilingual paper devoted to news of struggles in Spain as well as of the widely scattered exile community. Produced in New York by the Confederated Spanish Societies, España Libre continued to appear monthly until the death of Franco in 1975.

The first U.S. study of the Spanish Revolution was Trotskyist Felix Morrow's pamphlet Civil War in Spain (September 1936), followed a little over a year later by his full-length Revolution and Counter-Revolution in Spain. American radicals, especially anarchists, have written prodigiously on the subject ever since. Noam Chomsky's essay "Objectivity and Liberal Scholarship" in his American Power and the New Mandarins (1969), Sam Dolgoff's anthology The Anarchist Collectives (1974), and David Porter's Vision on Fire: Emma Goldman on the Spanish Revolution (1983) are among the more influential works that have emphasized the revolutionary nature of the struggle in Spain.

[See also Abraham Lincoln Brigade; North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy.]

FURTHER READING

- Blackwell, Russell. "Spanish Revolution (United Libertarian Organizations), Spanish Revolution (Workers' Party of Marxist Unification)." In The American Radical Press, vol. 2, edited by Joseph Conlin. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1974.
- Bolloten, Burnett. The Spanish Revolution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1979.
- Low, Mary, and Juan Breá. Red Spanish Notebook. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1981.
- Richards, Vernon. Lessons of the Spanish Revolution. London: Freedom Press, 1983.
- Revolutionary History* (summer 1988).

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

SPARGO, JOHN (1876–1966). One of the most prominent socialist writers and speakers before World War I, John Spargo had the ability to present complex intellectual issues simply. He affiliated himself with the "Right" wing of the Socialist Party, espousing a sophisticated version of a consumer-and-worker democracy. And yet while stridently anti-Left, he vigorously opposed racism, xenophobia, and indifference to women's issues within the socialist movement.

A British granite-cutter by background, Spargo became a union official and member of the executive committee of the Social Democratic Federation, educating himself in part through extension courses at Oxford and Cambridge. He emigrated to the United States in 1901, and five years later wrote the best-selling exposé of slum life, The Bitter Cry of Children. His Socialism (1906) was widely considered the best textbook popularization of the early movement. The Spiritual Significance of Modern Socialism (1907) put forward a bridge to religiously inclined socialist sympathizers. Karl Marx: His Life and Work (1910), the first full-length U.S. biographical treatment, depicted the founder of scientific socialism as sentimental, but above all a pragmatic tactician.

Spargo was often the center of political controversy in the socialist movement. While supporting the woman suffrage movement and suggesting a positive attitude toward blacks, he ardently objected to the strongly held view within socialism's conservative wing that immigration restriction would be necessary to protect American labor (and win over the American Federation of Labor to socialist ideas). He strongly attacked the Industrial Workers of the World, holding that the Wobblies' use of the term "sabotage" and its advocacy of the general strike were inflammatory, inviting employer and state repression. He sought the decentralization of power, calling for each industry and trade to be governed by boards of producing workers and "accredited representatives of society as a whole," and advocating a mixed economy of state enterprises, privately held small business, and worker-owned cooperatives. With the U.S. entry into World War I, Spargo appealed to delegates for a pro-war policy. Defeated, he abandoned the Socialist Party, became antisocialist, and eventually opposed the New Deal. He also founded, in 1927, the Bennington (Vermont) Museum, an important historical and art repository, devoting most of his remaining years to its development.

[See also Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Spargo, John. Papers. Special Collections, University of Vermont Library.

—ROBERT ASHER

SPIES, AUGUST (1855–1887). Leading American spokesperson for revolutionary socialism, a role that contributed to his execution after being framed on charges of conspiring in the 1886 Haymarket bombing, August Spies, a German, was born in Landeck and emigrated to the United States at age seventeen. He settled in Chicago, where, by 1876, he had his own upholstery shop. Radicalized by reading socialist literature and witnessing the 1877 mass strike in Chicago, Spies became an active member of the Socialist Labor Party, on whose ticket he frequently ran for office. In 1880 he became manager of the socialist Arbeiter-Zeitung newspaper. Spies moved away from political socialism in the early 1880s and gradually adopted anarcho-syndicalist positions. He presided at the opening of the 1881 Chicago Congress, which established the Revolutionary Socialistic Party. In 1883 he was a delegate to the Pittsburgh Congress, which established the anarchist International Working People's Association.

His words just before his execution are among the most famous ever spoken by an American radical: "There will come a time when our silence will be more powerful than the voices you strangle today."

[See also Black International; Haymarket Incident; Sozial-Revolutionäre Clubs.]

FURTHER READING

Avrich, Paul. The Haymarket Tragedy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.

Foner, Philip S., ed. Autobiographies of the Haymarket Martyrs. New York: Monad Press, 1969.

Nuhn, Heinrich. August Spies: Ein hessischer Sozialrevolutionär in Amerika. Kassel: Jenior und Pressler, 1992.

—DAVID ROEDIGER

SPIRITUALISM. The general term given to the widespread social and theological movement of the mid-nineteenth century, spiritualism also consolidated and expressed the utopian, pre-Marxist phase of U.S. radicalism. An important factor in the breakup of the First International's U.S. section, it retained an influence within the native-born Left into the early twentieth century.

Spiritualism had deep historical roots. Utopian socialism, or communitarianism, by far the predominant form and ideology of U.S. socialism until the 1870s, continued the Reformation's dual pursuit of true egalitarianism and untainted holiness. Many communitarian ideas (and a number of leading activists, such as Robert Dale Owen) passed directly

PSYCHOSOPHY

In Six Parts.

PART I.

THE SOUL IN HUMAN EMBODIMENTS.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.

Title page, 1915.

from utopian experiments into the spiritualist movement, which sprang up with a rash of seancelike spirit "appearances" in 1848–1850. Over the next decade, more than a hundred periodicals devoted to spiritualism spread the word, intellectuals (including an occasional congressman) declared their adherence, and spiritualist congregations approached the overall size of a respectable Protestant denomination. Contemporary reform movements such as woman's rights, abolitionism, temperance, and peace (and, more quietly, free love) shared constituencies with spiritualism.

Very quickly, a particularly leftward trend within the movement pronounced its version "philosophical spiritualism" (as differentiated from mere seance-oriented "phenomenal spiritualism"). Andrew Jackson Davis (1826–1910), perhaps the leading American devotee of Emanuel Swedenborg, advocated in many of his volumes drastic reforms to restrain financial manipulation and return democracy to the mass of citizens. "The Pantarch," Stephen Pearl Andrews (1812–1886), became the practicing metaphysical theorist—and perhaps political ghostwriter—for Victoria Woodhull. Through Woodhull and her paper, Woodhull and Claflin's, spiritualism reached even into the First International (Marx and his U.S. supporters scoffed at the belief, but other European-based officials adopted a more tolerant view). Woodhull, president of the American Spiritualist Association, served as public symbol for the potential synthesis of the two doctrines. Other spiritualist figures—journalistic spokespersons, practitioners, and poetry or fiction writers, often the same individuals—continued to affirm the centrality of radical reform or socialism to spiritualist expectations of a New World ahead. As late as 1879, a less controversial president of the American Spiritualist Association asserted, in the semiofficial Banner of Light, that "if spiritualism has been under a cloud because of its connection with freeloivism, it is destined to pass under a still darker cloud—but that one has a golden lining. This cloud is called SOCIALISM"; furthermore, "spiritualism . . . will spring up unbidden in the very center of the socialistic camp."

Philosophical spiritualism, in all, offered a philosophy or cosmology akin to the untheoretical socialism of native-born Americans unable to act comfortably within the immigrant-dominated Socialist Labor Party of the later nineteenth century. Spiritualist newspapers from the 1850s to the 1880s argued for women's equality, better treatment of blacks and Native Americans, abolition of capital punishment, and the long-range enactment of a cooperative order. At a deeper level yet, spiritualists suggested a psychic ecology—the oneness of all matter, living and formerly living—in a grand scheme. Universal consciousness would in this view eclipse class society and racial or gender discrimination. In many subtle ways, such spiritualist doctrines would find their way into the native-born ranks of the Socialist Party, through elders active in movements since the 1840s and through the indirect influence of familiar doctrines.

In general, the spreading faith in materialistic science (and the exposure of numerous individual seance frauds) diminished the appeal of spiritualism in the final decades of the century. In an odd way, however, resistance against this public confidence in bourgeois society prompted a radical-mystical turn of mind within reform-minded sections of the Yankee middle classes in the 1880s–1890s. Andrew Jackson Davis's writings were widely reprinted in the Coming Nation, the most popular socialist paper of the day.

Bellamy Nationalists set out their actual cooperative colonizing in league with radical Theosophists. Even in the ferociously orthodox Socialist Labor Party, the leading lecturer on the "Bible question," Peter E. Burrowes (who had sojourned through nearly a dozen religions, and at the time of his death set about creating a chess game that would illustrate the workings of the universe), proclaimed in his "Gospel of the Cosmos" a great mystic vision of socialism as climax to mankind's age-old spiritual yearning.

The Kautskyan scientific emphasis of Second International doctrine militated against any formal association of the new Socialist Party with the spiritualist heritage. Yet in the pages of a number of popular publications—the Comrade, Horace Traubel's the Conservator, and the Socialist Spirit among others—variants of spiritualism found a new home. A sprinkling of homespun, especially elderly women Yankee radicals continued to argue their doctrines in Socialist Party ranks. In Iowa, for instance, "New Thought" believers (mostly aged Yankee reformers) who published the leading state Socialist newspaper claimed to make spiritual contact with others of the same inclination. But spiritualism's greatest impact was upon socialist literature. Jack London, whose mother was a medium, wrote spiritualist ("mind-travel") fiction, and other science-fiction authors, including the highly popular George Allen England and Nathaniel Hawthorne's nephew, Julian Hawthorne, gave their cosmic adventures a socialistic-spiritualist twist. The First World War, virtually destroying the entire milieu for spiritualistic socialism, also produced a last apotheosis of pronouncements of faith's ultimate victory over the gore and cruelty of battle. Anticipating his own death (it would occur in 1919), Traubel—known as the "Socialist Walt Whitman"—depicted his spirit watching over the transformation, and added words of praise and condemnation, in his lyric "I'll Hear It All from Somewhere."

The next radical generation's disapproval of theistic beliefs largely eradicated the memory of their importance and restricted spiritualistic doctrine for decades into personal credos such as Upton Sinclair's Mental Radio (1930). Only in the later 1960s and after, with a return of utopianism, feminist theology, and a nature-centered religiosity, did the themes of spiritualism find sympathetic listeners around the Left. In the hippie movement, for instance, a reverence for Native American wisdom (epitomizing a nature religion) returned from nineteenth-century obscurity into a phenomenon of mass culture. New Left campus and community activists tended to ignore such developments, despite widespread admiration for the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.'s religious commitments, but after the New Left collapse the themes of spirituality grew still stronger. By the 1980s, a sometimes radical Jungian feminism became a major topic of well-selling religious studies. Scholarship and a wide popular following concerning the archeological discoveries of goddess artifacts in vanished societies developed in the 1980s. While closer to ecofeminism than to the formal Left, the proliferating literature about matriarchal societies, seminar-retreats, and "goddess tours" revived discussion of a possible prehistoric age devoid of class and social strife. Recalling the enormously popular Frau und der Sozialismus by August Bebel, this trend offered promises of redemption of the global capitalist debauch evident at the end of the twentieth century.

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Paul. Marxism in the United States: Remapping the History of the American Left. London: Verso, 1991.
 Eller, Cynthia. Living in the Lap of the Goddess. Boston: Beacon Press, 1993.
 Moore, R. Lawrence. In Search of White Crows. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
 Stern, Madeleine. The Pantarch: A Biography of Stephen Pearl Andrews. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1968.

—PAUL BUHLE

ST. JOHN, VINCENT (1876–1929). Nicknamed the Saint by his fellow workers, Vincent St. John helped guide the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) through its near demise in 1906–1907 to become general secretary-treasurer (1909–1915). Born in Newport, Kentucky, to Irish-Dutch parents. St. John spent his teens drifting from job to job. Finally settling in Victor, Colorado, he joined the Western Federation of Miners (WFM) and worked as a hard-rock miner. He was elected president of the WFM's Telluride local in 1901, and led the bitter strikes in Telluride, Leadville, and San Juan. Blacklisted and harassed by state officials, he was arrested and implicated in the murder of Idaho governor Frank Steunenberg. St. John was among the WFM militants who were instrumental in establishing the IWW in 1905. Along with William E. Trautmann, he led the antipolitical prosyndicalist faction that sought to commit the IWW to revolutionary industrial unionism. At the IWW's second convention, St. John helped wrest control from President Charles Sherman and was elected to the IWW's general executive board as a representative of the WFM. In 1907 he became a formal member of the IWW and served as assistant secretary and general organizer (1907–1908). In 1909 he was elected general secretary–treasurer and provided key strategy and strike leadership during the IWW's critical years. St. John authored The IWW: Its History, Structure and Method (1912), which became the IWW's most widely circulated pamphlet. He resigned as general secretary in 1915 to prospect and manage a small mining operation in Arizona. St. John was arrested in the federal government's mass roundup of IWW members in 1917 and spent several years in the federal penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kansas, although he had been inactive in the IWW since 1915. After his release, St. John resumed prospecting until ill health forced him to move to San Francisco.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; Western Federation of Miners/International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers.]

FURTHER READING

Dubofsky, Melvyn. We Shall Be All: A History of the Industrial Workers of the World. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1969.
Industrial Worker, 29 June 1929.

—SAL SALERNO

STATE, COUNTY, AND MUNICIPAL WORKERS OF AMERICA. See Public Sector Unions.

STELTON COLONY. See Utopianism.

STOKES, ROSE PASTOR (1879–1933). Socialist and, later, Communist, Rose Pastor Stokes actively campaigned for women's rights, including fair labor conditions and equal wages, suffrage, and birth control. Born in Augustów, Russian Poland, she spent her early childhood in London and immigrated with her family in 1890 to the United States. Settling in Cleveland, she helped to support her six younger siblings by working alternately in cigar and shirtwaist factories. Her coworkers introduced her to socialism and she began reading about the class struggle. The poetry of Edwin Markham and especially Morris Rosenfeld encouraged her to try her hand at visionary verse. In 1903 an offer of an editorial post on Jewish Daily News and Jewish Gazette took the aspiring young writer to New York, where she joined a circle of reformers. Assigned to interview the wealthy settlement worker J. G. Phelps Stokes, Rose Pastor married him in 1905 and became, according to the tabloids, "Cinderella of the Sweatshops" and, later, allegedly the inspiration for Anzia Yezierska's Salome of the Tenements (1922). In 1906 she and her husband again attracted attention when they joined the Socialist Party.

While Phelps Stokes served as president of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society between 1907 and 1917, Rose Pastor Stokes lectured and wrote for the socialist press. She took part in several important strikes, including the shirtwaist makers in 1909–1910, hotel and waiters in 1912, and garment workers in 1913. She was very active in the birth control movement and was arrested in 1916 for attempting to distribute informational leaflets at a rally in Carnegie Hall. A poet and journalist, Stokes also wrote a play about the sexual double standard, The Woman Who Wouldn't (1916). With her husband, Stokes resigned from the Socialist Party in 1917 in disagreement over its stand against U.S. involvement in World War I. She soon changed her mind, however, and left her husband over his continued support of the U.S. war effort. Having returned to the Socialist Party, Stokes was indicted in 1918 under the Espionage Act for writing a newspaper article on war profiteers. Convicted and sentenced to ten years in prison, she won an overturn on appeal in 1921.

Rose Pastor Stokes became a founding member of the Communist Party in 1919 and again in 1920 faced prosecution for her radicalism. An early member of the central committee of the Party and reporter for the newly founded Negro Commission, she attended the fourth congress of the Communist International (Comintern) in Moscow in 1922.

A seasoned agitator for women's rights, Stokes disavowed feminism in the 1920s. Although she advised the Comintern to establish women's committees, she interpreted their role as purely functional, to spread propaganda among working-class women. She refused to admit a "separate women's problem" and became a rigid interpreter of Third Period policy.

Divorced from Phelps Stokes in 1925, she married Isaac Romaine (V. J. Jerome), a Party cultural functionary, in 1927. Rose Pastor Stokes remained active until her health failed. She died of breast cancer, which her friends attributed to a blow she received from a police club.

[See also Birth Control; Communist Party, USA; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Neidle, Cecyle S. America's Immigrant Women: Their Contribution to the Development of a Nation from 1609 to the Present. Boston: Hippocrene Books, 1975.

Renshaw, Patrick. "Rose of the World: The Pastor-Stokes Marriage and the American Left, 1905-1925." New York History 6 (October 1981).

Stokes, Rose Pastor. Papers. Yale University Library and Tamiment Institute Library, New York University.

—MARI JO BUHLE

STONE, I. F. (1907-1989). Born in Philadelphia and educated at the University of Pennsylvania, I. F. Stone began his long career as a journalist at age fourteen when he launched his own monthly, Progress. Later that year he got his first newspaper job with a county weekly. He soon moved to a position with a Camden, New Jersey, newspaper and then to various newspapers located in Philadelphia. As an editorial writer for the New York Post (1933-1939), he was a strong advocate for the New Deal. In 1938 he began an association with the Nation and served as its Washington correspondent from 1940 to 1946. During a partly overlapping period (1942-1952), he wrote for various liberal New York newspapers: the Star, PM, and the Daily Compass.

Stone reached his greatest influence with I. F. Stone's Weekly (1953-1971). This four-page newsletter, which featured Stone's meticulous reading of government documents, became a major resource for other journalists, scholars, and then the general public. The Weekly, which reached a circulation of seventy thousand, was a virtual one-person Left crusade. From opposition to McCarthy and Hoover in the 1950s to opposition to the war in Vietnam, Stone was an independent Left voice heard by his entire profession.

Stone also authored a number of books. The most sensational was The Hidden History of the Korean War (1952), which argued that South Korea was just as responsible as North Korea, if not more so, for the civil war that rent the peninsula. When the burden of maintaining a weekly publication grew too much for him, Stone retired from journalism to take up his old love of classical literature. In 1988 he published The Trial of Socrates, which drew heavily on original Greek texts. In a letter soliciting funds for the unsuccessful 1988 congressional campaign of Burlington, Vermont, socialist mayor Bernie Sanders, Stone not only reaffirmed his identification with the Left but reminded all that he had been a member of the executive committee of the Socialist Party in New Jersey before he was old enough to vote.

[See also Peace Movements.]

FURTHER READING

Aronson, James. The Press and the Cold War. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1970.

Stone, I. F. In a Time of Torment. New York: Vintage Books, 1968.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

STONEWALL RIOTS. Several nights of rioting began early in the morning of 28 June 1969 at the Stonewall Inn, a gay bar in New York's Greenwich Village, in response to a police raid. Such raids on gay bars were common, but the spontaneous rebellion that followed this one was a new response to such tactics. Ejected patrons congregated on the street outside the bar. As police loaded arrestees into patrol wagons, stones, bottles, and trash cans were thrown, small fires were set, and chants were started by a crowd police said included about four hundred but which observers estimated at closer to two thousand. In the days immediately following the raid, as moderate homophile groups and New Left activists tried to organize this new, unharnessed gay militancy, the Gay Liberation Front was born. The Gay Liberation Front represented for the first time a specifically radical and specifically gay point of view, and continued for the next five years to be in the forefront of the movement for gay rights, and to spawn other organizations that became important in gay politics.

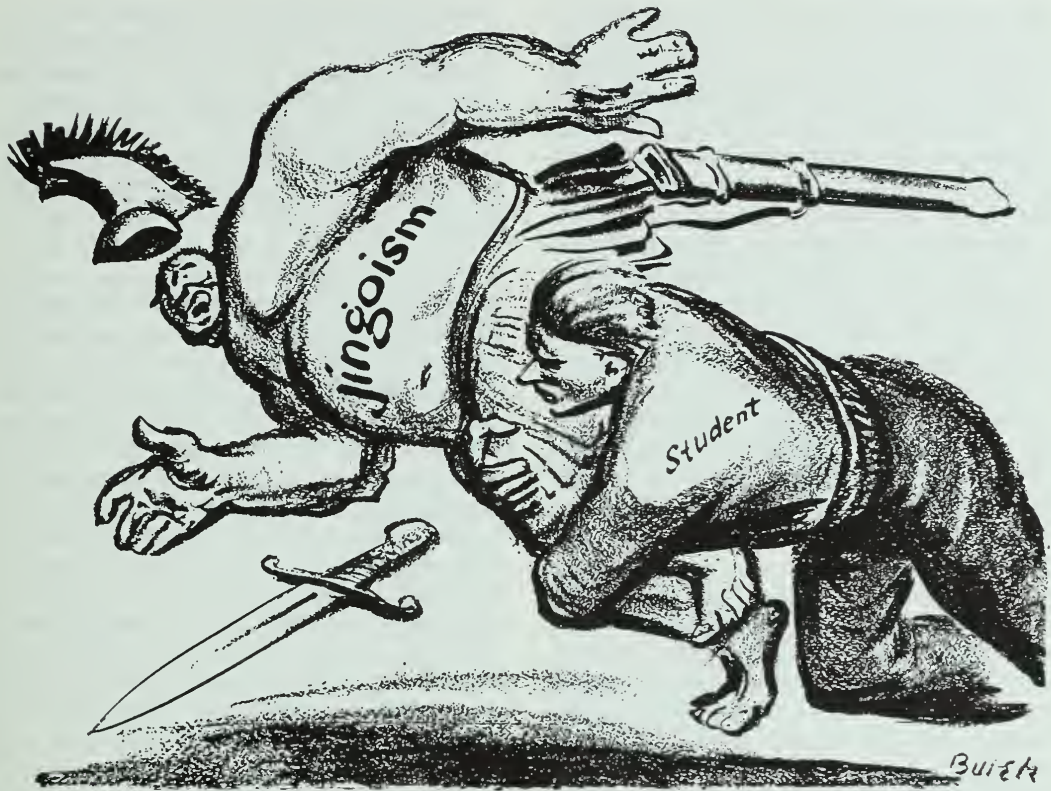

[See also Gay/Lesbian Liberation Movement.]

FURTHER READING

Marotta, Toby. The Politics of Homosexuality. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1981.

—JILL RAYMOND

STUDENT LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY. See Intercollegiate Socialist Society.

Cartoon by Jacob Burck from the Daily Worker, c. 1935.

STUDENT MOVEMENTS, 1930s. Student organizing was one of the American Left's most successful areas of political activity during the Great Depression. Under the leadership of Communist and Socialist undergraduates, the campus activists of the 1930s built the first mass student protest movement in American history. During its peak years, from spring 1936 to spring 1939, the movement mobilized at least 500,000 collegians (about half of the American student body) in annual one-hour strikes against war. The movement also organized students on behalf of an extensive reform agenda, which included federal aid to education, government job programs for youth, abolition of the compulsory Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC), academic freedom, racial equality, and collective bargaining rights.

The emergence of this protest movement on the nation's campuses represented a major shift in American student politics. During the prosperous 1920s the undergraduate population—overwhelmingly middle class and affluent—had endorsed conservative Republican presidential candidates by an even larger majority than had the general electorate. But this collegiate conservatism eroded steadily as a consequence of the Great Depression. Undergraduates in the early 1930s faced hard times, with the collapse of the job market and the exhaustion of student loan funds and parental financial support. In 1932 and 1933 even the student body itself began to diminish because of the sinking economy; some eighty thousand youths who in more prosperous times would have attended college were in these years unable to enroll. The economic crisis and its growing impact on campus led students to start questioning both the logic and value of American capitalism.

Capitalism's loss was the student Left's gain. Prior to the Depression, student radicalism had been in a moribund state. During the 1920s the entire American student Left had been confined to a single national organization, the Socialist-led League for Industrial Democracy (the LID, a direct descendant of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, founded in 1905 by Upton Sinclair); it had only about two thousand members out of a student population of over a million, and was demoralized because of the 1920s undergraduates' indifference and hostility to the Left. By the early 1930s, however, the Depression had increased the Left's prestige on campus because the economic crisis seemed to bear out the radicals' critique of American capitalism. Many collegians seeking to comprehend the economic crisis found that the Left alone was able to explain the Depression and offer alternatives to the faltering capitalist system. In this changed political atmosphere, the LID not only began to grow, but also for the first time faced competition from the Left, with the emergence in 1931 of the Communist-led National Student League (NSL).

The founding of the NSL changed the political style of student radicalism. The NSL prodded the campus Left to become more militant and action-oriented. Where the pre-Depression LID had focused primarily on education and the formation of study groups to discuss radical ideas, the NSL emphasized agitation and the building of a mass student protest movement. The NSL argued that students could be radicalized most effectively not through abstract discussions, but through political organizing drives focusing on issues of concern to the student body. Under the NSL's influence the LID also began to sound more radical. The campus LID emphasized its interest in building a militant student protest movement by changing its name to the Student League for Industrial Democracy (SLID) and by temporarily renaming its national magazine (the LID News Bulletin) Revolt.

This more militant approach to student organizing paid off politically as the NSL obtained an unprecedented degree of press attention in its early campaigns. The first action of the 1930s campus Left to make national headlines was the NSL-sponsored student delegation to Kentucky's strike-torn coal region in March 1932. Kentucky police and vigilantes assaulted the delegation to prevent it from bringing food and clothing to the impoverished miners, and to halt its investigation of alleged coal company and police brutalization of the strikers. This assault kept the delegation from reaching the Harlan miners, but it also provoked indignation on campus: more than three thousand students nationwide sent letters and telegrams of protest. The publicity surrounding this incident helped provoke a Senate investigation of conditions in the coal region. This was regarded as a significant victory by the NSL because it seemed to prove that students could assist workers victimized by the Depression and have some national political impact.

Within a few weeks of the Harlan delegation the student Left was again attracting national attention. This time the issue was free speech. Columbia University had expelled student newspaper editor Reed Harris because he repeatedly criticized the campus administration and supported the new student activism. The NSL led a student strike and free speech campaign on behalf of Harris, which won his reinstatement. The stream of good news continued for the student Left through autumn 1932 as the LID and the Young People's Socialist League ran a national campus campaign on behalf of Socialist presidential candidate Norman Thomas. This campaign helped spread the organizational presence of student radicalism across the country, and—according to college straw polls—won Thomas the endorsement of eighteen percent of the student body, a far higher level of support than he was able to obtain from the general electorate.

Soon after the economic crisis breathed life into the student Left, the rising crisis in international relations gave campus radicalism an even greater boost. Observing Hitler's ascension to power in 1933, Japan's invasion of Manchuria, and Mussolini's belligerent fascism, American students became increasingly worried that a new world war was in the making. These anxieties were compounded by the widespread disillusionment with the First World War. Influenced by the revisionist scholarship on the causes of the Great War, anti-war novels and movies, and by the Nye Committee investigation, many students were convinced that the United States had gone to war in 1917 to serve plutocracy rather than democracy; they believed that Wilson's lofty rhetoric had hidden the fact that America had entered the war to safeguard the profit margins of bankers and munitions makers. A strong anti-war mood took root on campus, as students grew determined to prevent the United States from again being misled into a bloody foreign crusade.

This anti-war atmosphere enabled the student Left to make rapid progress in building a national campus peace movement. The building process began in December 1932, with the NSL-sponsored Chicago Antiwar Conference, a relatively nonsectarian affair that brought Communist, Socialist, pacifist, and liberal student activists together around a common anti-war program—advocating campus peace demonstrations and anti-ROTC campaigns. These anti-war activists received aid from their British counterparts in 1933, when students at Oxford University made headlines on both sides of the Atlantic by endorsing a pacifist pledge refusing to fight “for King and country.” Recognizing an exciting protest tactic when they saw one, student activists in the United States adopted an Americanized version of the Oxford Pledge, in which students declared that they would “refuse to support the government of the United States in any war it might undertake.” By autumn 1933 this pledge had been taken by students at anti-war conferences across the United States, and a national poll found thirty-nine percent of the American student body endorsing the pledge (with an additional thirty-three percent saying that they would take up arms only if the United States was invaded).

At a time when the adult Left was still weakened by bitter sectarian rivalries, the student Left was pioneering a more cooperative and effective approach to political organizing. The NSL and SLID worked together on anti-war campaigns. As early as 1933 the NSL had proposed a merger with the SLID. Though the SLID turned down this offer, the two groups jointly sponsored the first national strike against war in April 1934. This strike consisted of a one-hour boycott of classes, and anti-war demonstrations; it was held on the anniversary of U.S. entry into World War I. The strike day was selected to emphasize the students’ desire to prevent a repetition of the interventionism of 1917. The strike drew some twenty-five thousand students, which though only a minority of the national student body, nonetheless drew great press attention because the anti-war walkout was to that point the largest student protest in American history.

The student strike mushroomed into an annual mass protest, as the NSL and SLID extended their Popular Front style of anti-war organizing beyond the Left to religious and liberal groups. In 1935 the NSL and SLID convinced the National Council of Methodist Youth, the Interseminary Movement, and regional branches of the National Student Federation and campus Young Women’s and Young Men’s Christian Associations to act as cosponsors of the second annual strike against war. This broader sponsorship expanded the peace walkout. Some 175,000 students participated in the 1935 strike. The success of their joint anti-war efforts drew the NSL and SLID closer together, and as the danger of international fascism grew, so did their unity: the two groups merged into the American Student Union (ASU) in December 1935. Strengthened by this merger, the campus anti-war strike of 1936 drew an estimated 500,000 student participants. The ASU soon became the largest student activist organization in the nation’s history, with some twenty thousand members.

As student peace agitation grew more effective so did the movement’s drive to aid youth who had been victimized by the Depression. Having originated the idea of federal student aid in the Hoover years, the student movement during the mid-1930s used its national federation and lobby, the American Youth Congress (founded in 1934), to champion job programs for low-income students and unemployed youth. The Youth Congress initially advocated passage of its own aid bill, the American Youth Act, which would have gone much further than the New Deal in assisting needy youth. Though this bill never passed, the Youth Congress proved so effective in making the case for federal student aid that the Roosevelt administration repeatedly enlisted the Youth Congress’s support in staving off Republican efforts to cut the National Youth Administration’s aid programs. The movement’s activism on behalf of domestic reform also included free speech fights on many campuses, support work for the Congress of Industrial Organizations’ blue-collar organizing, the establishment of campus cooperatives and student labor unions, and campaigns against racial segregation in college area stores, services, recreational facilities, athletic teams, and in university admissions. Black Communist veterans of the student movement went on to establish a regional civil rights group, the Southern Negro Youth Congress (founded in 1937), which battled Jim Crow below the Mason-Dixon line.

The student’s movement unity cracked in the late 1930s as a result of shifts in both the international situation and the Comintern line. During the Spanish Civil War, liberal and Communist students watched in horror as the neutrality legislation that the student movement had endorsed in the early 1930s was used by the Roosevelt administration to embargo the Spanish Republic—paving the way for the fascist triumph there; they concluded that isolationism and the Oxford Pledge would be useless against fascist aggression. Thus the ASU dropped the Oxford Pledge and embraced collective security in winter 1937, but in the process alienated pacifist, isolationist, Trotskyist, and left-wing socialist students. These alienated groups founded their own national organization, the Youth Committee against War (YCAW), which clung to the Oxford Pledge and isolationism. This split was not fatal because most of the student population shifted with the ASU away from isolationism—leaving the YCAW with less than a thousand members. But the ASU was now left without a socialist faction to offset Communist influence.

The consequences of this loss were not immediately apparent, since in both 1938 and the first half of 1939 the ASU's Communist and liberal students were united on a Popular Front antifascist platform. During this period the student movement became even larger and more attractive to liberals because the ASU, in line with the Communist Party's shift rightward, grew more pro-Roosevelt—supporting both the president's domestic reform programs and his "quarantine the aggressor" foreign policy, on the grounds that such support bolstered antifascist unity.

The negative impact of Communist dominance in the ASU became evident after the signing of the Nazi-Soviet Pact in August 1939. Following the new Comintern line, the Communists drove Popular Front liberals out of the ASU's leadership, and forced the organization to drop its militant antifascism in favor of an isolationist "Yanks Are Not Coming" position. This flip-flop and the ASU's refusal to criticize the Soviet Invasion of Finland alienated most students, and led to the collapse of both the ASU and the student movement in 1940–1941.

[See also Intercollegiate Socialist Society; Peace Movements; Young People's Socialist League.]

FURTHER READING

- Cohen, Robert. "Revolt of the Depression Generation: America's First Mass Student Protest Movement, 1929–1940." Ph.D. diss., University of California at Berkeley, 1987.
- Draper, Hal. "The Student Movement of the Thirties: A Political History." In As We Saw the Thirties, edited by Rita Simon. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1969.
- Eagan, Eileen. Class, Culture and the Classroom: The Student Peace Movement of the 1930s. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1982.
- Peterson, Patti. "The Young Socialist Movement in America from 1905 to 1940: A Study of the Young People's Socialist League." Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, 1974.

Phelps, Marianne Beth. "The Response of Higher Education to Student Activism, 1933–1938." Ph.D. diss., George Washington University, 1980.

Rawick, George. "The New Deal and Youth: The Civilian Conservation Corps, the National Youth Administration and the American Youth Congress." Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, 1957.

—ROBERT COHEN

STUDENT MOVEMENTS, 1960s. See Armed Struggle, 1960s–1970s; New Left; Peace Movements.

STUDENT NONVIOLENT COORDINATING COMMITTEE.

Formed in the spring of 1960, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, or SNCC—pronounced "snick"—was the creation of black college students who were involved in the lunch-counter sit-ins then sweeping the South. They met in Raleigh, North Carolina, at the initiative of Ella Baker, a middle-aged black woman, a veteran of civil rights struggles since the 1930s, who from this time would give intellectual guidance and spiritual inspiration to the young people in SNCC.

Advocating nonviolent direct action, SNCC quickly became the militant thrusting point of the civil rights movement. Using a tiny office in Atlanta as headquarters and paid ten dollars a week, several dozen SNCC "field secretaries" moved out into the Deep South, embedded themselves in the black communities, lived in ramshackle "Freedom Houses," gained the confidence of local blacks, enlisted the aid of local youngsters, and began the dangerous work of challenging racial segregation in every form.

They reorganized the "Freedom Rides" in the spring of 1961, after the Congress of Racial Equality encountered bus-burnings and brutal beatings, and ended up beaten themselves, and jailed. They organized local people to demonstrate against segregation in Albany, Georgia, to register voters in Selma, Alabama, and Hattiesburg, Mississippi, and all over the Deep South. In the summer of 1964, they invited more than a thousand northern students to come to Mississippi to help with voter registration, teach in "Freedom Schools," and bring racism to national attention. That summer, three SNCC people (two white, one black) were murdered in Neshoba County, Mississippi, and that August, black Mississippians were rebuffed by the Democratic Party at its national convention, which agreed to recognize only the white voting delegation.

SNCC, based on its own bitter experience with federal inaction in the face of white violence, was certainly the most angry and the most independent of civil rights groups in the South. Speaking to the huge biracial March on Washington in the summer of 1963, SNCC leader John Lewis, in the face of censorship by other black leaders, insisted on criticizing the Kennedy administration for its failure to defend black rights.

It would be wrong, in considering SNCC, to ignore the heritage of older American radical movements. A few of its field secretaries, educated in the North, had some contact with radical ideas. Ella Baker came out of the Left struggles of the thirties and forties, and was also influenced by the socialist, anti-imperialist thinking of W. E. B. Du Bois. There was also some impact from the southern radical tradition: the Southern Conference Educational Fund and the Highlander Folk School. But SNCC was not consciously ideological; its militancy, its spontaneous radicalism, was shaped mostly by its immediate experience in the southern struggle, its closeness to the black poor, its perception that the government, national as well as local, was tied to powerful political and economic interests, and could not be trusted.

When the southern movement had achieved its immediate aims—the right to vote, the end of legal segregation, a new black consciousness, and a new white perception of blacks as refusing to accept the old order—it lost direction and momentum. It was up against the stone wall of the American system. The recognition that racism, while legally eliminated, was deeply embedded in the institutions of the country, especially in those economic arrangements that created a class of poor, and that this class would be largely black, led to more bitterness, more militancy. The cry of “Black Power,” arising in 1965–1966, meant different things to different people but signaled the frustration of a movement that was at once victorious and unfulfilled.

In this climate, SNCC quickly disintegrated, its people scattered and uncertain, some joining new groups, others still battling, though isolated. But it had affected the thinking of countless people, black and white, and played a pioneering role in creating the climate of the sixties. Its hostility to government (SNCC people were among the first draft resisters), its early raising of the issue (by young SNCC women in the Atlanta office) of sexual equality, its suspicion of centralized authority, and its closeness to grass-roots feelings, all prefigured the great movements of the sixties, against the Vietnam War, for gender equality, and the independent radicalism that came to be called the New Left.

[See also Civil Rights Movement; New Left.]

FURTHER READING

Branch, Taylor. Parting of the Waters. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1988.

Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Zinn, Howard. Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee: The New Abolitionists. Boston: Beacon Press, 1964.

—HOWARD ZINN

STUDENT PEACE UNION. For a short period in 1960 and 1961, the Student Peace Union (SPU) was the largest campus organization on the Left in the United States. With more than three thousand members in over a hundred campus chapters concentrated in the Midwest but with outposts throughout the country, the SPU focused attention on nuclear testing, disarmament, and foreign policy questions. Established at a time when American students were beginning to take an interest in political issues and while many of its leaders were involved in such groups as the Young People's Socialist League (YPSL) and in the pacifist movement, the SPU was a broad-based “issue” organization. Its earliest concern was with nuclear testing. Later, the organization was involved with foreign policy questions, and was one of the first groups to focus on the growing conflict in Vietnam. SPU membership peaked in 1962 at thirty-five hundred national members, but its influence was much larger, since many nonmembers identified with the SPU. Among the SPU's major activities were several marches on Washington, D.C., including one in 1962 that was the largest political demonstration in Washington since the 1930s. The SPU emphasized its campus chapters and focused attention on campus-based discussions and activities as well as national activities.

The SPU leadership was a combination of peace-oriented students including many pacifists associated with the Fellowship of Reconciliation and the American Friends Service Committee (both of which lent support to the SPU) and socialists associated with the YPSL. The SPU took a strong "Third Camp" position, criticizing the foreign policies of both the United States and the Soviet Union. This unique combination permitted the SPU to gain strength at many colleges that were not traditionally involved in campus politics in the Midwest and South such as Grinnell, North Central, Lake Forest, and many others as well as the more traditionally active schools.

By 1964, the SPU dissolved itself, feeling that campus activism had gone in other directions and that its leadership was inadequate to the task. The growing Students for a Democratic Society, with its multi-issue orientation, and the civil rights movement were both more potent forces on campus at the time. Nonetheless, the SPU can be seen as an important transition between the apathy of the 1950s and the New Left. Its leadership, to some extent tied to some of the ideas of the Old Left, nonetheless proved that an independent campus-based organization could be successful in mobilizing large numbers of students and in focusing attention on key national issues.

[See also New Left; Peace Movements.]

FURTHER READING

Altbach, Philip G. Student Politics in America: A Historical Analysis. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1974.

Isserman, Maurice. If I Had a Hammer: The Death of the Old Left and the Birth of the New Left. New York: Basic Books, 1987.

Metzenberg, Howard. "Student Peace Union, Five Years before the New Left." Senior Honors Thesis, Oberlin College, 1978.

Vickers, George. The Formation of the New Left: The Early Years. Lexington, Mass.: Lexington Books, 1975.

—PHILIP G. ALTBACH

STUDENTS FOR A DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY

(SDS) was the most visible and important political organization of the 1960s and the organized expression of the broad movement for social change that exploded in that decade. From its start in 1960 as a tiny offshoot of a long-standing socialist group to its demise amid factionalism and violence in 1970, it was the cutting edge of that decade's progress from protest and reform to resistance and rebellion.

As a formal organization SDS grew from a few young people sleeping around their mimeograph machines and surviving on a diet of peanut butter and rhetoric, to at one point (1968) a national organization with a budget of perhaps $125,000, some 350 official chapters, and the claimed allegiance of 100,000 adherents. But it was as an informal force, nurturing and giving voice to both the political revival known as the New Left and the social disaffection known as the counterculture, that SDS made its most important mark.

Cartoon by Lisa Lyons, Independent Socialist, Berkeley, California, April 1968.

SDS was in effect the intellectual headwaters of the New Left, through which both students and the young intelligentsia in and around the academy put forth a variety of challenging new ideas. Its major political document was the Port Huron Statement, adopted at a meeting in Port Huron, Michigan, 11–15 June 1962, which first enunciated the alienation of the college generation and introduced the concept of participatory democracy ("that the individual share in those social decisions determining the quality and direction of his life" and "decision-making of basic social consequence be carried on by public groups"). Other concepts, too, emerged under the SDS aegis, including that of the new working class (academics, intellectuals, and the "information society"), university complicity and the role of academics in support of the liberal state, and student power, concerning the rights and standing of college students on their campuses.

SDS was the source of energy, as well, for many of the activities that marked the 1960s. It was SDS that provided the core of white participants in the early civil rights protests; the original activists (formed as SDS's Economic Research and Action Project) that began the organization of the poor and made poverty a national issue; the women who were instrumental in the ideas and early actions of the women's movement; the shock troops, organizational finesse, protest techniques (including the teach-in), and many of the leaders of the anti-war and anti-draft movement; and the bulk of the activists in the sweeping and tumultuous demonstrations and strikes directed against university administrations (approximately two thousand in all in every state from coast to coast from 1965 to 1970), including the notable actions at Berkeley, Chicago, Harvard, Wisconsin, Cornell, San Francisco State, and Columbia.

SDS came to an end in an acrimonious split between a faction of national officers called Weatherman and a disciplined subgroup from the neo-Maoist Progressive Labor Party, which erupted at the June 1969 SDS National Convention. Thereafter it quickly lost adherents and influence, reducing itself to a small core devoted to violence and revolution and giving up aboveground politics in the spring of 1970, following the accidental explosion of its bombs in a townhouse in Greenwich Village (6 March 1970).

The impact of SDS during the decade was marked, and included a role in the deposition of a president, the defection of the American public that ended the war in Vietnam, the sweeping reforms in campus life and governance at virtually every university, and the political awakening—called “radicalizing”—of a substantial minority of that generation. Its legacy for later generations was the revival and expansion of the Left in America and the development of a homegrown American political perspective, many of whose adherents still play fundamental roles in U.S. political, academic, journalistic, and intellectual circles.

[See also Armed Struggle; Maoism; New Left; Participatory Democracy.]

FURTHER READING

Gitlin, Todd. The Sixties: Years of Hope, Days of Rage. New York: Bantam, 1987.

Miller, James. Democracy Is in the Streets: From Port Huron to the Siege of Chicago. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1994.

Potter, Paul. A Name for Ourselves. Boston: Little, Brown, 1971.

Sale, Kirkpatrick. SDS. New York: Random House, 1973.

Students for a Democratic Society. The Port Huron Statement.

Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1990.

U.S. House Committee on Internal Security. Investigations of Students for a Democratic Society. Parts 1-A–7-B. 1969.

—KIRKPATRICK SALE

STUDIES ON THE LEFT. Like graduate students poised between college and profession, Studies on the Left occupied a precarious, unstable, but intellectually exciting position. Begun in the fall of 1959 at the University of Wisconsin by graduate students in English and history, the journal stood with one leg in the old progressive camp, a distinguished tradition of historical revisionism born with Frederick Jackson Turner, Charles Beard, and maintained by neoprogessives in the history department at Wisconsin. Also in the balance of influence was the old Communist Party Left, a tradition viewed by the editors as a relevant but very uncomfortable heritage. The editors—graduate students James Weinstein, Martin Sklar, Saul Landau, Helen Kramer, Eleanor Hakim, and others—called for a “radicalism of disclosure,” which meant intellectual work with a political purpose.

Influenced by historian William Appleman Williams and sociologists Hans Gerth and C. Wright Mills, the journal published some of the best young American historians, sociologists, economists, and literary critics, and helped launch a revisionism that profoundly altered the historical profession in particular. Choosing as their beginning point the turn of the century, Studies authors reevaluated the modern reform tradition born in that era. Progressives became “corporate liberals.” In the post–World War II era, reformers were known as Cold War liberals.

The uneasy relationship between Studies and the Old Left was gradually dissipated as a younger generation of radicals challenged the premises of the “radicalism of disclosure” that seemed to exist without an activist politics. After the journal moved from Madison to New York in 1963, the problems of relevance and activism became more acute. New editors Tom Hayden and Staughton Lynd pushed the journal hard in the direction of the growing New Left movement. Studies responded in two ways. It became a bimonthly after 1965, instead of a quarterly, and featured a regular, large section devoted to "the Movements." The last issue appeared in March–April 1967. The journal was now committed to working for socialism, but its relationship to various New Left organizations remained ambiguous.

Some of the original editors launched a sequel beginning in 1970 called Socialist Revolution. Actively committed to building a socialist movement, the new journal resolved some of the disputes Studies had with both Old and New Left. But the new journal did not have the impact of Studies, which provided an oasis in the intellectually parched early 1960s.

[See also American Studies; New Left.]

FURTHER READING

Weinstein, James, and David W. Eakins, eds. For a New America: Essays in History and Politics from Studies on the Left, 1959–1967. New York: Random House, 1970.

—JAMES B. GILBERT

SUGAR, MAURICE (1891–1974). The interrelationship between socialist politics and mass struggle was the crux of the career of Detroit labor lawyer and activist Maurice Sugar. Born in Brimley, Michigan, an Upper Peninsula lumber town where his Lithuanian Jewish immigrant parents ran the general store, he saw class conflict between lumberjacks and the paper mills' bosses as a way of life, and the working class as the main force for change.

Sugar was a conscious Marxist who followed the faction fighting of the nascent Communist movement of the 1920s, but he remained an independent Marxist for most of his political life. He first gained national attention for his legal efforts on behalf of the Congress of Industrial Organizations' sit-down strikers and the industrial union drives of the 1930s. He was also a writer of union songs in the 1930s. His two most famous were "Sit Down" and "The Soup Song."

Sugar believed the function of a Marxist was to build mass movements, and that much "theoretical" debate was really jousting for position by untested "leaders." During his tenure in the legal department, the United Auto Workers (UAW) grew from a handful of members to an organization representing 700,000 workers. In addition to his trade union work,

Sugar used his private legal practice to redefine the law on behalf of industrial workers and others discriminated against by the system. He had a Gramscian-type position in which he thought it correct to struggle within the existing law and culture of capitalism while working for socialist change. He always attempted to relate the legal struggle to the overall class struggle, and in the 1930s he believed the immediate task was to build industrial unions.

Another tactical priority was his view that the struggle of the workplace should be linked to the struggles in the community. In Detroit this often meant taking part in the black movement. Sugar defended many blacks throughout the 1920s and 1930s and sought black support in two unsuccessful bids for local office. He was a vital part of a Left culture that helped to shape many of the black leaders of the 1970s and 1980s, among them Detroit's Mayor Coleman Young and Congressman George Crockett.

Despite his political sophistication and organizational independence, Sugar was driven from his UAW post by Walter Reuther's purge of the Left. When the battle for control of the union first broke out after World War II, Sugar believed the anti-Reuther faction would prevail when the rank and file were mobilized. He underestimated the impact of the Cold War and the power of red-baiting. The struggle between factions was as fierce as a civil war, and the losers were vanquished from the union. For Sugar this meant the end of his political life, and the end of his legal activism. He retired to live in rural Michigan until his death.

[See also United Automobile Workers.]

FURTHER READING

Johnson, Christopher H. Maurice Sugar: Law, Labor and the Left in Detroit, 1912–1950. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1988.

Sugar, Maurice. The Ford Hunger March. Berkeley, Calif.: Meiklejohn Civil Liberties Institute, 1980.

—JIM JACOBS

SUMMER CAMPS. Immigrant radicals arriving in the United States early in the twentieth century developed institutions to nurture values brought from eastern Europe and to ease adjustment to new circumstances. Summer camps for adults and children were one such institution.

In the summer of 1923, young trade unionists affiliated with the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU) rented land in Beacon, New York, and established the cooperative Camp Nitgadegit. (In the 1930s, other camps calling themselves Nitgadegit were begun in the Washington, D.C., area and in the Midwest.) Although the Yiddish term meant "No need to worry" and the camp was well attended, a bitter struggle inside the ILGWU engendered by the Russian Revolution led to a split in the union and in the camp. Political differences between socialists and those aligning with the newly formed Communist Party became apparent in disputes over governance. For example, should anyone having the ten dollars required to buy into the cooperative become an equal partner in decision-making or should adherence to certain political principles be required? After one season, a group left to begin Unity Camp.

In 1927, Unity, which called itself "the first proletarian summer colony" and which would become the first interracial adult camp in the United States, purchased a permanent site in Wingdale, New York. In the late 1930s, returning Spanish Civil War veterans were given jobs and the opportunity for rehabilitation at Unity. During World War II, local residents joined with campers and staff to raise funds for the war effort. A vibrant cultural program attracted guests from more traditional resorts. Cold War harassment—including a 1955 investigation to uncover "Communists' use of summer camps to indoctrinate and disaffect American youth . . ."—and internal disputes over camp policy on such issues as "white chauvinism"—with camp management often taking a position different from that of the Communist Party—resulted in declining attendance. From 1958 to 1963, the children's camp Calumet and Webatuck operated on the site.

Camp Kinderland, founded in 1923 by Jewish progressives active in the Yiddish Nonpartisan Shules, was also a target of the 1955 investigation. In 1930 the camp became part of the Jewish section of the International Workers Order. Despite intermittent efforts to lessen the emphasis on Jewish culture, the tradition of "progressive Yiddishkeit," with its focus on working-class Jewish history and values, was always reaffirmed. In 1971 the original site in Hopewell Junction, New York, was sold and Camp Lakeland, the adult component begun on adjoining property in the early 1930s, was closed. Kinderland moved to its current home in Massachusetts, where it remains the oldest Left-oriented Jewish camp in the United States. Other efforts to provide progressive recreational experiences for children were WOCHICA (Workers Children's Camp), which operated at the Wingdale site during the late 1920s and early 1930s, the Socialist Party's Pioneer Youth of America which ran a summer camp during the late 1920s and early 1930s, and the Highlander Folk School's Junior Union Camp, 1940–1944.

[See also Yiddish Left.]

FURTHER READING

- Beck, John P. "Highlander's Junior Union Camps, 1940–1944: Workers' Children and Working Class Culture." Paper presented at the Fourth Southern Labor Studies Conference, 1982.
- Suller, Elsie. "Camp Kinderland Celebrates." Jewish Currents 33 (May 1979).
- Suller, Elsie. Kinderland. Anniversary journal. 1979.

—LINN SHAPIRO

SURREALISM. Successor to a long tradition of European avant-gardes, surrealism developed its own radical critique of "bourgeois-Christian civilization" and allied itself with the revolutionary workers' movement internationally in the 1920s. After scattered beginnings, surrealism asserted itself in the United States during the 1960s–1990s as an important radical intellectual-cultural current.

In its first Manifesto (1924), the movement's leading theorist, poet André Breton, defined surrealism as "pure psychic automatism, by which it is intended to express, verbally, in writing or by other means, the real functioning of thought." Drawing initially on Freud and poets such as Lautréamont, Rimbaud, and Jarry, Breton and his comrades conceived of the "surrealist revolution" as the realization of poetry in everyday life; recognizing their affinities with Marx's project of proletarian emancipation, they joined the French Communist Party in 1927. Their ideas rebuffed by Party leaders, surrealists became early Left critics of Stalinism.

Although international surrealism centered in the diverse Paris group until the 1950s, surrealist groups were active in many other countries in Europe as well as in South America and Japan. Inspired by Hegel (Lenin's notes on this philosopher appeared first in French in the surrealists' journal) and drawn to the various phases of antibourgeois revolt, surrealists felt especially close to the art and struggles of Third World peoples. Aimé Césaire's Return to My Native Land and the "jazz poems" of Ted Joans are among the best known documentations of the reciprocal influences.

Journal cover design by Penelope Rosemont, 1989

Several exhibitions of surrealist painting took place in New York and other cities in the 1930s, but the movement exerted very little influence in the United States until World War II. The short-lived International Federation of Independent Revolutionary Artists (FIARI)—inaugurated by a manifesto Breton coauthored with Leon Trotsky on a visit to Mexico in 1938, and which was published in Partisan Review—failed to establish a U.S. section. Two years later the war brought Breton, Max Ernst, Yves Tanguy, Kurt Seligmann, Leonora Carrington, Roberto Matta, Nicholas Calas, and many others to New York, although total abstinence from political activity was a condition of asylum. Nevertheless, these artists and new U.S. friends organized an International Surrealist Exhibition in New York in 1942, and brought out three issues of a lavish, bilingual surrealist journal whose name, VVV, reflected the popular expectation of victory over more than the Nazis and Japanese. VVV introduced painter Gerome Kamrowski, photographer Clarence John Laughlin, and poet Philip Lamantia, who, at age fifteen, was welcomed into the movement by Breton as "a voice that rises once in a hundred years." VVV also initiated the surrealist examination of the movement's American forerunners, including horror writers H. P. Lovecraft and Clark Ashton Smith, and "anesthetic" philosopher Benjamin Paul Blood. In lengthy visits to Canada, the western United States, and the West Indies, Breton developed views on Native American culture, Fourierist utopianism, and New World natural phenomena that would play a key role in later surrealist activity, especially in the United States. But when Breton and the other exiles returned to Paris in 1945, the New York group fell apart.

A generation later, in 1966, the first U.S. surrealist group was formed in Chicago by half a dozen young activists in the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), who ran the union's Solidarity Bookshop. Poets Franklin and Penelope Rosemont, who visited Breton and took part in surrealist activity in Paris for several months in 1966, played a central role in these and later activities. The first sustained U.S. surrealist-oriented publication, the Rebel Worker (1964–1967), a mimeographed journal of the Chicago IWW branch, spanned the gap between homegrown U.S. radicalism and the avant-garde tradition, the libertarian wing of the Old Left, and the radical spirit of the later 1960s. Its seven issues contained lively texts on bureaucracy, (mis)education, youth culture, anarchism, Wobbly history, and of course surrealism. Among the Rebel Worker pamphlets was a thirty-eight-page anthology, Surrealism and Revolution (1966), edited by Franklin Rosemont, who would go on to produce What Is Surrealism? Selected Writings of André Breton (1978), a six-hundred-page compendium with an introduction situating Breton and surrealism in the revolutionary currents of the twentieth century.

The first U.S. surrealist group show at Chicago's Gallery Bugs Bunny in 1968 featured works by six artists, including Franklin Rosemont, Penelope Rosemont, and sculptor/cartoonist Robert Green—all contributors to the Rebel Worker. They were soon joined by Paul Garon, whose surrealist studies of black music (Blues and the Poetic Spirit, 1976) established him as an important force in the movement.

The following decade brought many new recruits, most notably poet/theorist Joseph Jablonski, poet

Jayne Cortez, poet/novelist Rikki Ducornet, collagist/poet Debra Taub, dancer/choreographer Alice Farley, graphic artist/musicologist Hal Rammel, and three "veterans" from VVV: Kamrowski, Laughlin, and Lamantia, America's most influential surrealist poet. On May Day 1976, the huge World Surrealist Exhibition opened in Chicago, with some six hundred works by nearly 150 artists from thirty-one countries.

In 1970 the group produced a special surrealist issue of the Students for a Democratic Society journal Radical America—and later several Radical America pamphlets in a "Surrealist Research and Development Monograph Series"—with the pregnant insight that U.S. radicalism and popular culture had been full of objectively surrealist manifestations, from Krazy Kat and Bugs Bunny comics to the blues of Peetie Wheatstraw and Memphis Minnie to the work of obscure autodidact painters and sculptors. That discovery also permeated a 1979 Cultural Correspondence anthology, reprinted in book form as Surrealism and Its Popular Accomplices, as well as Free Spirits: Annals of the Insurgent Imagination (1982), published by City Lights, whose codirector, Nancy Joyce Peters, had become one of American surrealism's leading figures. Along with surrealist games, poetry, theory, polemic, social criticism, and correspondence with Herbert Marcuse, the irregular journal Arsenal/Surrealist Subversion (1970–present), one of the most elegantly produced publications of the contemporary U.S. Left, has also pursued the exploration of America's hidden presurrealist heritage. The group's Black Swan Press has published work by most members of the group as well as classics by Leonora Carrington, Toyen, and Mary Low.

Taken together, this collective effort has added a new dimension to the understanding of American radicalism, both of its own origins and of the domain of potentially revolutionary practice. Taking fields of close examination in chronological order for a moment, surrealists and their allies have decisively reinterpreted the origins of American utopianism in the Radical Reformation and its important U.S. offshoots; provided much thoughtful appreciation of Native American life; drawn attention to numerous significant but neglected nineteenth- and twentieth-century thinkers usually regarded as "cranks," including feminist Mary MacLane, Pascal Beverly Randolph, and Benjamin Paul Blood; established new ground in the study of Edward Bellamy, the most important American socialist writer of the nineteenth century; celebrated African American music from blues to "free jazz"; studied the shifts in American vernacular ("slang"); analyzed crime and horror drama from the literary pulps of the 1850s to the radio mystery shows and film noir of the 1930s and after; broadly reassessed the cultural contributions of the IWW; devoted much loving analysis to newspaper comics as well as to film animation and its master, Tex Avery, as major contributions to world culture; reinterpreted the achievements of the most popular of feminist figures, Isadora Duncan, and modern dance generally; related the radical ecological consciousness of such writers as Thoreau and John Muir to the contemporary "practice of poetry"; and deepened our appreciation of such exemplars of popular culture as Spike Jones, "Lord" Buckley, Ernie Kovacs, and Carl Barks. Beyond that, as their declarations on the 1992 Los Angeles Rebellion and the 1994 Columbus Quincentennial make clear, they have served as provocations for an entirely different approach to the many questions of revolutionary transformation.

[See also Art Movements; Beats and the New Left; Dada; Modern Dance; Poetry, 1870–1930.]

FURTHER READING

- Arsenal/Surrealist Subversion*. Chicago: Black Swan Press, 1989.
 Biro, Adam, and René Passeron. Dictionnaire général du surréalisme. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1982.
 Rosemont, Franklin, ed. What Is Surrealism? Selected Writings of André Breton. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1978.
 Rosemont, Franklin, ed. Surrealism and Its Popular Accomplices. San Francisco: City Lights Press, 1981.
 Rosemont, Franklin, Penelope Rosemont, and Paul Garon, eds. The Forecast Is Hot!: Tracts and Other Collective Declarations in the United States, 1966–1976. Chicago: Black Swan Press, 1997.
 Rosemont, Penelope, ed. Surrealist Women: An International Anthology. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1998.

—DAVID ROEDIGER

SWADOS, HARVEY (1920–1972). Novelist, short-story writer, critic, and journalist, Harvey Swados left a small but unique mark on radical literary culture. Born in Buffalo, New York, he was influenced by his sister, Felice, also a novelist, to join the Young Communist League while still in high school. In 1940, at the time he was a senior at the University of Michigan, Swados was converted to Trotskyism and subsequently joined Max Shachtman's Workers Party.

Although he drifted away from the Workers Party in 1942, Swados maintained an independent radical stance for the rest of his life. He was profoundly affected by his youthful work experiences in aircraft factories and, later, in an auto plant, as well as by two years in the merchant marine during World War II. In 1962, a collection of essays called A Radical's America promoted a vision of socialism decidedly to the left of liberalism and independent of all existing states. In his last years he was a militant opponent of the Vietnam War.

Several of Swados's novels are of special interest to issues and episodes in the history of American radicalism. On the Line (1957) describes the lives of nine assembly-line workers to dramatize the effects of the work process under capitalism. Standing Fast (1971) chronicles the radicalization and deradicalization of members of his generation, drawing primarily upon Workers Party history. The posthumously published Celebration (1974) presents the diary of the ninety-year-old Samuel Lumen, whose life telescopes many of the ambiguities of the twentieth-century radical intellectual.

These books are noteworthy for their painful honesty and highly developed sense of craft, but weak in communicating the ideas animating the left-wing movements he depicts. Swados's novels and short stories are also remarkable for their autonomy from the fashions of the times in which he wrote.

[See also New Left Literature; Trotskyism; Workers Party.]

FURTHER READING

Howe, Irving. "On Harvey Swados." Massachusetts Review 24, no. 3 (fall 1983).

Wald, Alan M. The New York Intellectuals: The Rise and Decline of the Anti-Stalinist Left from the 1930s to the 1980s. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

—ALAN WALD

SWEEZY, PAUL. See Monthly Review.

SYMBIONESE LIBERATION ARMY. See Armed Struggle.

SYNDICALIST LEAGUE OF NORTH AMERICA. Launched in Chicago in September 1912, the Syndicalist League of North America (SLNA) represented the purest organizational form of syndicalism in American labor history. The key figure in the organization was William Z. Foster, who laid out the league's theoretical position and strategies in the pamphlet Syndicalism (1912), which he coauthored with Earl C. Ford. Like the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), the league emphasized shop-floor organization and economic struggle to the exclusion of electoral politics, which it saw as an impediment to change. The new syndicalist society would not be based on industrial unions, however, as the IWW claimed, but rather on natural production units already characteristic of large-scale industry. The other major contrast between the two organizations was strategic and important. While the IWW embraced the "dual union" approach, Foster and his league adherents argued vociferously for the strategy of "boring from within" the mainstream unions, an approach Foster had observed among the French syndicalists. Once the working class was fully organized and the labor movement won over to a revolutionary perspective, the means of production would be expropriated through a massive general strike.

The league found its natural constituency among working-class anarchists and those IWW activists who rejected dual unionism. At its height, the SLNA had about a dozen branches located in western and midwestern cities and a membership of perhaps two thousand. League activists joined mainstream American Federation of Labor and Railroad Brotherhood unions and led important organizing drives and strike movements in Saint Louis, Kansas City, and in Chicago, where the league maintained its headquarters. Two lively papers, the Agitator (later the Syndicalist) and the Toiler, carried the SLNA's message. Launched during a period of IWW activity and growth among both immigrant mass-production and lumber workers, the league never achieved a mass following, and it gradually faded out of existence in the course of 1914.

The SLNA is significant, however. It polemicized against the strategy of dual unionism and popularized the notion of boring from within, an approach the Communists and other radicals later used to win a base within the labor movement. The league's other important legacy to the radical labor movement was a cadre of activists with considerable experience and important contacts in local midwestern labor movements. Foster, James Cannon, Jack Johnstone, and others later played important roles in building the Communist Party and providing it with roots in the trade union movement.

[See also Foster, William Z.]

FURTHER READING

- Foner, Philip S. History of the Labor Movement in the United States. Vol. 4. The Industrial Workers of the World, 1905-1917. New York: International Publishers, 1965.
- Foster, William Z., and Earl C. Ford. Syndicalism. Introduction by James R. Barrett. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1990.
- Foster, William Z. From Bryan to Stalin. New York: International Publishers, 1937.

—JAMES R. BARRETT

TAFT-HARTLEY LOYALTY OATH. The major anti-trade union legislation of the postwar years was the Labor Management Act of 1947, which is better known as the Taft-Hartley Act. Its provisions made it difficult for unions to organize aggressively or carry on militant activities. For the Communist-oriented Left, Section 9 (h) contained a poison pill. This section denied any union the right to use the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) unless each of its officers filed an affidavit that he or she (1) was not a member of the Communist Party (CP), (2) was not affiliated with the CP, and (3) did not believe in, was not a member of, or was not a supporter of any organization that believed in or taught the overthrow of the U.S. government "by force or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods." What this meant was that any union with an elected or appointed Communist officer could not use the NLRB to gain certification as a collective bargaining unit even if the majority of workers voted for it and that any certified union that did not meet the act's provisions could be decertified.

Many justifications were advanced for Section 9 (h) by its advocates, but what their reasoning boiled down to was that the elimination of domestic Communists from the trade union movement was an essential ingredient of a larger anticommunist crusade. The authors of the act stated that the Communists must be purged to prevent "political strikes," with the implication that such strikes might be ordered from abroad with the aim of weakening the defenses and economy of the United States. Trade unionists who were hostile to or uncomfortable with their CP colleagues justified their support of Section 9 (h) as necessary to keep their unions from being manipulated by outside organizations with independent political agendas, irrespective of the source of those agendas. The sincerity of such sentiments was suspect as other ideological groups, such as various right-wing organizations, were not singled out for punishment. Nor, for that matter, was the Socialist Party.

As soon as Taft-Hartley was introduced, trade unionists spoke out against it in no uncertain terms. They were joined by allies ranging from religious leaders to Franklin Delano Roosevelt's third-term vice president, Henry Wallace. Ben Gold, the Communist leader of the Fur and Leather Workers Union, urged the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) leadership to take dramatic action by calling for a one-day strike or even a five-hour strike before Congress voted, but his counsel was not taken. After the bill was passed, President Truman vetoed it on the grounds the act violated the principles of the New Deal, but his veto was overridden. John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, then affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (AFL), considered the law "fascistic." At the 1949 AFL national convention, Lewis said the act would be rendered inoperative if all trade unionists refused to comply with its anticommunist affidavit process. His views did not carry, and the United Mine Workers soon left the AFL.

The timidity of the AFL leaders would soon find its counterpart in the more militant CIO. Although conventional trade unionists despised the Taft-Hartley Act, many were willing to live with it while opportunistically using the affidavit clause to oust ideological rivals. Such leaders felt that reformers and other non-Communists in alliance with the CP could be neutralized or intimidated into shifting sides. The room for maneuvering was enormous. Jurisdictional raids could be made on any international or local that did not comply. Even if officers submitted affidavits, government informers could charge the officers were lying. Should a trade unionist resign from the CP in order to fulfill the law's requirements, it could be charged that the individual remained a secret member or still adhered to the Party line.

Legal challenges to Section 9 (h) were soon forthcoming. In 1948 Victor Rabinowitz, representing the American Communications Association, an international CIO union, and the Wholesale and Warehouse Workers Local 65 in New York, a local whose international officers had complied, filed suit that the act illegally abridged rights guaranteed by the First and Cover of anticommunist pamphlet issued by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in the 1930s.

Fifth amendments. A similar suit was filed by the Steel Workers Union when Inland Steel refused to bargain on pensions with a union whose officials had not filed affidavits.

Union attorneys thought they had a decent chance to win over the Supreme Court to their view, but fate played a heavy hand against them. Two justices the attorneys had counted on to support them died unexpectedly, Justice Frank Murphy in July 1949 and Justice Wiley B. Rutledge in September. Making matters worse was that Justice William O. Douglas, an outstanding liberal, fell from a horse in a mountain area of his home state of Washington just a few days before the argument was heard and could not participate. Justice Tom Clark, appointed to replace Murphy, disqualified himself because he had been attorney general when the law was before Congress, and Justice Sherman Minton, the successor to Rutledge, was not appointed until after the case was heard. The truncated Court upheld the law by five to one in American Communications Association, CIO v. Douds. Justice Hugo Black filed the lone dissenting opinion.

Even as the legal challenges moved through the courts, labor's house was falling apart. The relatively small Fur and Leather Workers Union suffered thirty raids on its locals within a single year. The United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers (UE); the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers; and other larger unions that did not comply were hit even harder. Union after union was rent with internal debate on whether to comply or not. But the trend was unmistakable. From 1947 to 1951, 232,000 non-Communist affidavits were filed.

The profoundly disruptive impact of the affidavits issue on radicalism within the trade unions is indicated by a minor incident that did not even involve the CP. In the late 1930s the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) had gained representation in some twenty industrial plants in Cleveland and it had maintained that representation through the war years. If the IWW trade unions did not comply with Taft-Hartley, the IWW would be decertified; but if they did comply, they would violate IWW principles. Expediency won out over ideology, and in the resulting organizational furor, the IWW lost its last foothold in basic industry.

By May 1949, CIO compliance with Taft-Hartley was in high gear. The executive board, which had previously included known Communists, now banned Communists not only from the board itself but from holding office in any CIO union. The board further tightened the screws by dismissing officers who did not endorse board decisions. Among these decisions were the required approval of the Marshall Plan and disavowal of the Progressive Party. Unions that resisted these litmus measures were expelled. Between November 1949 and August 1950, the CIO kicked out ten unions: the UE; the Farm Equipment Workers; the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers; the United Office and Professional Workers; the United Public Workers; the American Communications Association; the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (including the Fishermen and Allied Workers, which had affiliated with the union); the National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards; and the Food, Tobacco, Agricultural and Allied Workers Union. The International Fur and Leather Workers Union withdrew before it, too, could be expelled. The combined membership of these unions came to nearly a million workers. Two of the unions had been among the eight unions expelled by the AFL in 1935 and a third, the UE, had joined them in the formation of the original CIO. These founding CIO unions, still under the same basic leadership as in the 1930s, were suddenly deemed unacceptable by the very movement they had inaugurated.

The pattern that emerged after expulsion was one of constant organizational and individual harassment. Some cities denied public housing to anyone who would not sign non-Communist oaths and some states suspended unemployment compensation to employees of the CP. Various federal agencies used similar measures against individuals until challenged in court by cases that often dragged on for years. The irony in many of these situations was that the benefits denied had often been originally championed by movements led or influenced by the CP.

Within the labor movement itself, the bloodletting was relentless. Complying unions raided expelled unions at every opportunity as the government moved to decertify or charged perjury or insincerity when some trade unionists withdrew from the CP to adhere to the law. In major unions such as the United Auto Workers where there was a considerable CP presence, there was a purge of Communists and their allies. The labor press took a strong anti-communist posture that became a hallmark of the AFL-CIO merger of 1955. More significant than any single conflict in this cataclysmic era was the fact that such traditional goals of labor as organizing the unorganized and advancing the gains of those already organized were severely blunted.

Labor's attempts to have Taft-Hartley repealed failed again and again, but the affidavit proviso came under fire. Understanding that Section 9 (h) was poorly phrased, Congress clarified its intent with the Communist Control Act of 1954. The need to file affidavits was done away with. The new act simply made it a crime to be a member of the CP and simultaneously hold office in a labor union or to hold office within five years of resigning from the CP. The five-year clause was obviously aimed at those who had resigned from the CP to avoid decertification of their unions. Attorneys immediately pointed out the act's legal shortcomings. It created punishments for beliefs rather than for crimes, it punished without due process, and it created penalties for membership in what was still a legal political organization. Despite these unconstitutional aspects, a clear challenge to the act did not develop until the end of the decade.

The person who finally took on the Communist Control Act was Archie Brown, a man who had joined the CP in 1929 and the Longshoremen's Union in 1936. Running as an avowed Communist, Brown was elected to the executive board of Local 10 of the Longshoremen's Union in 1959, 1960, and 1961. He was also very active in an anti-House Un-American Activities campaign centered in San Francisco. In 1961 he was arrested for violation of the Communist Control Act. His case moved to the Supreme Court with speed. Fourteen years after Section 9 (h) of the original Taft-Hartley Act had been found constitutional, the successor Communist Control Act was struck down by a five-to-four decision written by Chief Justice Earl Warren. The Court held the act was a violation of the right of trial by jury in that it allowed Congress to convict and punish citizens in advance or absence of trial by jury.

Civil libertarians of all persuasions rejoiced at the decision. Remaining state and federal laws of like nature gradually fell into disuse under the assault of legal and political challenges. In fact, however, the original intent of the Taft-Hartley Act had been achieved. The tremendous trade union momentum that had been generated by the great organizing drives of the 1930s had been checked and then reversed; and radical influence within the labor movement had been largely exorcised. Whether judged by bread-and-butter measures such as the percentage of work force organized and gains in real wages or by a more abstract criterion of political influence, the trade union movement declined steadily after passage of Taft-Hartley. This deterioration was partly masked by the relative prosperity of the 1950s and 1960s, but was clearly evident by the 1970s. With the election of the aggressively anti-trade union Reagan administration of the 1980s, organized labor had reached a postwar nadir.

[See also Federal Bureau of Investigation; McCarthyism.]

FURTHER READING

Ginger, Ann Fagan, and David Christiano, eds. The Cold War against Labor. 2 vols. Berkeley, Calif.: Meiklejohn Civil Liberties Institute, 1987.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

T-BONE SLIM (1880s–1942). Born Matt Valentine Huhta in the 1880s, the legendary Wobbly known as T-Bone Slim—songwriter, humorist, and pamphleteer—was of Finnish descent and lived for many years in the Finnish community of Ashtabula, Ohio. Little is known of his life. After his marriage ended he took to the road and hoboed from one end of the continent to the other for years. He worked as a logger, logging-camp cook, construction-worker, harvest-hand, and from the early 1930s until his death in 1942, as a barge captain on the Hudson River in New York. Although he was not a public speaker, never held union office, and may not even have held job delegate's credentials, he is still remembered by Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) old-timers as a good organizer, largely because of his exceptional abilities as a writer.

T-Bone's first contribution to the IWW press appears to have been in 1920. His songs—"The Popular Wobbly," "Mysteries of a Hobo's Life," and "I'm Too Old to Be a Scab"—quickly became some of the most popular lyrics in the IWW songbook and, like his "Lumberjack's Prayer" (a poem printed on wallet-size cards), were known by heart by many thousands of migrant workers. His pamphlet Starving amidst Too Much, a black-humor critique of the food industry, was published by the IWW's Foodstuff Workers Industrial Union 460 in 1922. For two decades his columns in the weekly Industrial Worker and Industrial Solidarity, and his occasional pieces in the monthly Industrial Pioneer as well as in less well known Wobbly papers such as the General Construction Workers Bulletin, were the best-read features of the IWW press.

The most popular IWW writer, T-Bone Slim was also one of the most prolific. Humor, frequently outrageous, always playful, is the hallmark of all that he wrote, and it enabled him to express the IWW outlook in original and appealing ways. Many of his zany neologisms ("civilinsanity," "perhapsbyterian") were once part of the everyday argot of America's hobo jungles, and one of them—"Brisbanality," after Arthur Brisbane, top columnist for the anti-labor Hearst newspaper chain—was included by H. L. Mencken in his American Language. Some of T-Bone's Wobbly definitions ("Tear gas: the most effective agent used by employers to persuade their employees that the interests of capital and labor are identical") are as good as anything in Ambrose Bierce. Some of his aphorisms ("Wherever you find injustice, the proper form of politeness is attack") are as forceful as they are funny.

In recent years T-Bone's songs have been recorded by such renowned folksingers as Joe Glazer, Pete Seeger, Utah Phillips, and Faith Petric. It is only a matter of time before the IWW's greatest "man of letters" gains wider recognition as an important figure in the history of American humor.

[See also Humor; Industrial Workers of the World.]

FURTHER READING

Rosemont, Franklin, ed. Juice Is Stranger than Friction: Selected Writings of T-Bone Slim. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1990.

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

TEACHERS UNION. One of the earliest Left unions among professionals, the Teachers Union (TU) was also one of the most internally divided. Originally an American Federation of Labor (AFL) union founded by New York City schoolteachers in 1916, it had close links with the Socialist Party, and suffered severe attacks during the 1919–1920 Red Scare. The union was also hard put in early years to overcome the major organizing obstacle posed by widespread belief (encouraged by boards of education) that teachers, as "professionals," required no unionization.

The TU first experienced rapid growth during the Depression, developing strong locals in such cities as Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, especially among the underpaid and heavily exploited substitute teachers. College faculty also joined the TU, forming in New York City an independent College Teachers Local. New York City remained the union's primary center, with about forty percent of its total membership.

The TU rapidly became a factional arena for competing sections of the Left. Many of the new teachers who swelled TU membership, especially in New York, were either Communists or Lovestoneites—both hostile to the long-established leadership of the Socialists. Alarmed but unable to manage a mass expulsion, the old leaders seceded to form the Teachers Guild. With the support of AFL president William Green, and in the atmosphere of the Rapp-Coudert persecutions, the Teachers Guild effected the ouster of the TU from the American Federation of Labor, an effort made possible by the Hitler-Stalin Pact, which damaged left-wing credibility not long before the convention. The TU, however, was promptly granted a charter by the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO).

Ironically, the TU split from the AFL and affiliation with the CIO temporarily solidified Left leadership in the TU. Bella Dodd (1904–1969), an Italian immigrant and member of the Hunter College faculty, emerged as one of the rare outstanding Communist women labor luminaries. But as in so many other unions, Left leadership could not survive the onslaught of the Cold War and the competition from mainstream unions. Dodd herself, who openly criticized Communist involvement in the 1948 Progressive Party campaign of Henry Wallace as divisive and tactically hopeless, found herself expelled from the Party in 1949, and she converted to a conservative Catholicism (under the guidance of Monsignor Fulton Sheen). Although a purged TU remained alive, it lost members and prestige to the old Teachers Guild, renamed the American Federation of Teachers. Recognizing in 1964 that hopes of challenging the American Federation of Teachers could never be realized, the TU formally disbanded.

Before and after its ouster from the AFL, the TU pioneered the development of antiracist curricula and teaching materials about blacks and other minority populations, especially in such urban school districts as New York and Philadelphia. This pedagogy, originating largely in the antiracist convictions of Communist teachers, foreshadowed Black History Month. This remained the finest legacy of the TU.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Rapp-Coudert Inquiry.]

FURTHER READING

- Dodd, Bella. School for Darkness. New York: P. J. Kennedy and Sons, 1954.
- Iverson, Robert W. The Communists and the Schools. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959.
- Murphy, Marjorie. Blackboard Unions: The AFT and the NEA, 1900–1980. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1990.
- Teachers Union Papers. Cornell University Library, Ithaca, N.Y.
- Zitron, Celia L. The New York City Teachers Union, 1916–1964: A Story of Educational and Social Commitment. New York: Humanities, 1968.

—MARV GETTLEMAN

TENDENCIES. A political tendency within a radical organization refers to members who generally vote the same way on most issues or take their orientation from the same individual or group of individuals. A tendency that persists over a long period of time may evolve into a faction that strives to take power in the organization. A tendency is just as likely to dissolve as events unfold or differences with other members are overcome.

[See also Factions.]

—DAN GEORGAKAS

TEXTILE WORKERS UNIONS. At least four radical textile unions fielded efforts to organize the unorganized across New England and the South from the 1870s to the 1930s. Although ultimately unsuccessful, they provided both a background for the success of the Textile Workers Union of America (TWUA) and an avenue for radical activism, especially in New England.

Building on a New England tradition of philanthropic and gender-conscious appeals for “hours legislation,” and on a mixed tradition of sporadic labor upsurge and tenuous craft organization, radicals began to mobilize textile operatives during the 1870s. In the wake of the 1877 railroad strike and reorganization of the immigrant-based socialist movement, a prominent group of socialists and labor reformers created the International Labor Union (ILU) in the “Little Lancashire” of Fall River, Massachusetts. Founded on a spinners’ union, the ILU conducted a notable relief effort for a major Fall River strike, and essentially joined with strikers in local activities, 1878–1880. Its president, George McNeill, was perhaps the most prominent Christian Socialist-inclined labor leader of the age; its secretary, Carl Speyer, was a German American follower of Marx. The ILU’s weekly paper, the Labor Standard, began as a New York socialist paper and transferred to Fall River under the editorship of J. P. McDonnell, one of the most prominent Irish figures in the First International’s U.S. branches. For a moment, the ILU seemed capable of sweeping through New England to western New York and the South; the Labor Standard served an important role in elementary communications. Employer strength proved too great, American-born labor leaders turned to hours legislation, and the ILU did not survive to benefit from the return of textile militancy during the 1880s.

The Knights of Labor, growing out of a secret labor society and some aggressive efforts in the Philadelphia area, emerged as a major force in textiles during 1883–1885. Predominantly Irish among textile workers in particular, the Knights offered no obvious opening to the mostly German American Marxists. On a local and regional basis, however, socialist branches reorganized around the growing enthusiasm for the Knights. So long as momentum was sustained (i.e., until May Day, 1886), socialists could join with others in calling for strikes where necessary, workers' control of productive processes, and the substitution of a cooperative society for the existing competitive one. In some places, labor reformers and Christian Socialists even founded "socialistic" day-care centers as an adjunct to the Knights. Local Knights leaders, themselves sometimes veteran Irish American craft unionists with a Christian Socialist bent, led the broadening of the socialist movement here and there into a transethnic organization.

The retreat of the Knights' leadership into timidity, and its unwillingness to support the Haymarket victims, both reduced the organization to a shell in textile towns and bitterly alienated socialists from the remnant. Socialist sympathies and hopes for industrial unionism (rather than the craft unions of spinners and other trades, mostly ineffectual, surviving in the mills) spawned continuing support campaigns for textile strikes, and the formation of the National Union of Textile Workers (NUTW) in 1894. The NUTW, based in Providence, Rhode Island, had as its president socialist James P. Reid and as its national affiliation the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance, dominated by the Socialist Labor Party. Strongest in the industrial valleys south of Providence, the NUTW could not survive the deepening depression and the internal strife among socialists. The NUTW folded into the American Federation of Labor's small and cautious affiliate, the United Textile Workers (UTW).

Radicalism revived among textile workers with the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Strong among sections of Italian Americans in particular, the IWW held "free speech" fights in textile towns and directed many strikes in 1912–1913. Dominating public attention, the strikes in Lawrence, Massachusetts, and Paterson, New Jersey, pointed to the hopes and the limits of radical organization. As before, the strike wave revived flagging socialist activity and caused the creation of new branches, although once again often of limited duration. Among local leaders, James P. Reid of Providence especially tied the fate of the socialist movement to that of the Wobblies. By the time wartime prosperity had brought a renewal of militancy, after widespread repression, the IWW had been effectively destroyed as a mass movement. Textile strikers operated temporary organizations of their own, often under "One Big Union" slogans of the IWW.

The Amalgamated Textile Workers Union (ATWU), founded in 1920 and led by the Reverend A. J. Muste, temporarily filled the leadership gap. Undertaking to coordinate and lead where possible the postwar strikes against reductions of wages and lengthening of hours, the ATWU—modeled after the vastly successful Amalgamated Clothing Workers—was overtly militant and covertly radical. Despite considerable success in several strikes, the ATWU faded with the "American Plan" rollback of unionism. Once more the UTW, small in size and conservative by inclination (despite the participation of some scattered local socialist activists), ruled the field unchallenged.

The Communist Party-dominated Trade Union Unity League established the Providence-based National Textile Workers Union (NTWU) in 1929, with James P. Reid as president. Like its radical predecessors, it had few financial resources and tended to join in or support existing strikes rather than lead labor struggles for union recognition. Its most prominent activist, Anne Burlak, was known as the Red Flame, for her fiery oratory. She led some of the most militant strikes in 1931–1932, and was elected national secretary of the NTWU at age twenty-one, the only American woman to hold such a high union post. She carried on NTWU organizing work in New England, South Carolina, Georgia, and New Jersey.

During the "textile general strike" of 1934, the NTWU merged with the UTW, grown somewhat more militant from the pressure of a grass-roots militancy. The failure of the UTW to take maximum advantage of the strike encouraged the formation of the Textile Workers Organizing Committee and another industrial union, the TWUA. Although former NTWU leaders maintained a low profile around the TWUA, Communists played an important role in a number of branches, until purged for the most part from their leadership positions during the Cold War. The UTW, whose New England leader, Tom Gorman, had ironically been among the strongest mid-1930s proponents of an independent labor party, operated as the more conservative and craft-conscious alternative, gradually disappearing as mills closed. The TWUA, for its part, later merged with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers to form the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, one of the most progressive labor bodies in the United States.

[See also British Americans; Industrial Workers of the World; Portuguese Americans; Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Paul. "Italian-American Radicals and the Labor Movement, 1905-1930," and "The Knights of Labor in Rhode Island." Radical History Review 17 (spring 1978).

Kelly, Richard. Nine Lives for Labor. New York: Praeger, 1956.

McNeill, George E., ed. The Labor Movement: The Problem of Today. Boston: A. M. Bridgman, 1887.

—PAUL BUHLE

THIRD INTERNATIONAL. Sustained over decades by Russian direction, the Third International, or Comintern, marked the climax and eclipse of international revolutionary coordination. Its influence on the U.S. Left differed considerably from era to era, and changed with the shift of views among other national parties even while reserving for Russian leaders the final political authority.

The formation of the Third International in 1919 sent out a ringing call to labor militants but mainly to Left socialists to prepare for a new movement. For the initial period, until at least 1921, however, the course of the Left followed activists' inclinations and socialist inner-party dynamics more than any Comintern program. Due to the presence in Moscow of a former Socialist Labor Party leader, Boris Reinstein, the Comintern first issued its call to that party and its tiny unionist organization, the Workers International Industrial Union, in addition to the Socialist Party Left and the Industrial Workers of the World. Meanwhile, an official agency of the Russian government was established in New York, headed by Ludwig C. A. K. Martens, with a staff of some thirty-five. This agency, a source of influence separate from the American political Left proper, carried on its own intrigues in the factional brawls of competing Communist entities.

The major effort of the Comintern in the early period was to unify the American Communists, against their own inclination toward feuding and splintering. It insisted on more open participation in strike movements and more public activity, even as the Palmer Raids drove the Communist movement semi-underground, and it sought to centralize the American Communists by limiting the autonomy of the language federation groups. It succeeded in some of these aims, unification and intervention within the American Federation of Labor of the early 1920s; but its "Bolshevization" effort drove away many ethnic activists, precipitating the virtual destruction of several groups and placing impediments between activists and their communities. The Comintern also, especially after 1928, insisted on the importance of the "Negro question" for the American Left. This final point, along with the stress on combating imperialism, was the most lasting and positive of Comintern contributions.

On the negative side, the Comintern's own factional fights at the highest levels in the 1920s caused a perpetual crisis within American Communism. Comintern "reps," representatives sent throughout the 1920s to guide the Americans, proved themselves inveterate factionalists more concerned about securing their own positions than about the fate of the American Left for its own sake. "John Pepper" (Joseph Pogeny), arriving in 1922 from Moscow, immediately gained a leading role in the Left, articulating best the Communist argument for a labor party, then guiding a series of factions that shared his antipathy for Trotsky. His special protégé, Jay Lovestone, shared Pepper's predilection for intrigue, ultimately serving as a key coordinator of U.S. intelligence agency cooperation with the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations. Pogeny himself, returning to Russia at the close of the 1920s, disappeared in the late 1930s Stalinist purges.

Americans traveling to Moscow at first attempted to defend prewar Left views against Russian leaders, but reconciled themselves for the most part by the middle twenties to seeking Comintern approval for their particular perspectives. In 1927 future American Trotskyist leader James Cannon brought back Trotsky's statements from Moscow, touching off a round of expulsions. In 1928 Jay Lovestone and his followers actually broke with the now-entrenched Stalin leadership in a desperate attempt to protest the effect of the Comintern's wide shift to the left on American Communism; once again, expulsions followed, with the loss of another important outpost of Communist labor influence.

More subtly, the Comintern made the American Left dependent in two important institutional ways. It subsidized activities of the Communist Party of the United States, perhaps to ten percent of Party expenses (a far smaller sum, one should note, than U.S. funds sent to the Soviet Union for famine relief and other purposes). It also created American cadres through training at the Lenin School in Moscow, or other schools, often for several years.

The early Depression reemphasized American Communist reliance on the Comintern, despite the modest growth of Party numbers and influence (particularly notable among intellectuals). The forced march of revolutionary rhetoric, espoused by William Z. Foster and others, portrayed American "soviets" as the future. The Seventh Congress, in 1935, marked a decisive turning point. Americans, joined by leading figures from other parties, argued that their own success in mass activity, alongside the dangers raised by the victories of fascism, had instituted a new era. Communists would henceforth make claims on behalf of a democracy that elements of the bourgeoisie no longer sought to defend. This line, formulated by the Bulgarian Georgi Dimitroff and others, permitted American Communists to abandon their insurrectionary posture and to enter alliances with a broad spectrum of liberal political movements, not excluding the New Deal itself.

This period came to an end, in a sense, with the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939, placing the Comintern in the awkward position of repudiating its members' closest allies. After the invasion of Russia, the Comintern closed its history with a reaffirmation of the antifascist position. The Comintern formally dissolved in 1943. This ended the appearance of fraternal parties always acting in concert, but the American Party, like most other Communist parties, retained its ideological dependence on Russian thinking until the collapse of the Soviet Union. Thereafter, American Communists embarked on various paths. Along with numerous past precedents, many sought for a sense of international orientation in the lessons to be drawn from the Communist governments in Cuba, North Korea, Vietnam, and even China. The Communist Party also valued the party line of the old guard Communists in Russia and the experiences of other parties, particularly in Europe, that had a similar orientation.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Lovestoneites; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

Draper, Theodore. American Communism and Soviet Russia. New York: Viking Press, 1960.

—PAUL BUHLE

THOMAS, NORMAN (1884–1968). The most noted leader of the U.S. socialist movement after Eugene V. Debs, Norman Thomas was a frequent candidate for the presidency and, in later years, was widely regarded as the "conscience of America." Born into a family of clergymen—his father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were Presbyterian pastors—Thomas graduated from Princeton and was ordained at Union Theological Seminary in 1911. Influenced by the Social Gospel and his own ministry experience in the slums, he became a Christian socialist and anti-war pacifist. Editing the World Tomorrow, journal of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, Thomas also worked with anticonscription organizations and the forerunner of the American Civil Liberties Union to support the rights of conscientious objectors. He entered the Socialist Party (SP) in 1918, avowing his libertarian commitments, and left the clergy. During the early 1920s he became associate editor of the Nation and editor of the short-lived Socialist daily New York Leader. In 1924 he entered the race for governor of New York and became a perennial socialist candidate. During the 1920s, Thomas also emerged as a major public spokesman for civil liberties and labor rights. Intervening in the Passaic, New Jersey, silk strike of 1926, he characteristically held a mass meeting in defense of strikers, and was locked up for a "riot law" later declared illegal.

As a political candidate, Thomas won increasing respect within the liberal (and sometimes conservative) mainstream. His 1928 campaign for the presidency did little to revive the membership of a flagging SP, but he drew numerous intellectuals into the Thomas for President clubs. His 1925 and 1929 mayoralty campaigns in New York dramatized his attack on corruption, and inspired support among ministers, rabbis, and professors. His 1932 presidential campaign had a particularly dramatic effect on college students, on some of whose campuses a majority favored Thomas. He received 884,781 votes, far less than many socialists expected, but nearly the number Debs had received in 1912, and vastly more than any radical candidate would receive again in the next half-century.

The New Deal, many conservatives and liberals believed, carried out the Socialist program. (Thomas retorted that it had been carried out "on a stretcher.") Many Socialist intellectuals and labor leaders soon defected to the Democratic Party. Thomas declined to oppose Fiorello La Guardia's progressive campaign for New York's mayor, himself joining the city's Charter Revision Commission. By 1936, when Thomas polled less than 200,000 votes in his bid for the presidency, the grandest electoral hopes of the Socialists had passed.

Thomas struggled meanwhile to hold together an SP disintegrating into internal quarrels. Leader of the "Militant" faction, he opposed, successively, the conservative Old Guard wing of aging garment trades Socialists; ultraradicals, who mostly passed over into Communist movements; Trotskyists, whose entry he had encouraged in 1936, only to see paralyzing factional disaster; and finally those within the party who resisted Thomas's basically anti-war approach (until 1942) toward the impending world war. Due in no small part to Thomas's efforts, the SP emerged as a fighting organization with a solid weekly press (the Socialist Call) and aggressive if scattered activism in labor, student movements, civil liberties, race issues, and resistance to the militarization of American society.

Thomas himself continued to crusade, above all in civil liberties, on national and international scales. He became a selfless public figure who would defend even those (such as Communist Party leader Earl Browder, in 1940) bitterly opposed to him. Thomas appealed to presidents and dictators, sometimes successfully, for the safety of imprisoned political leaders. Fearlessly, he invaded Jersey City, challenging Mayor Frank ("I am the law") Hague to arrest him. He faced vigilantes in Arkansas, sustaining arrest and beatings for his support of tenant farmers. During the Second World War, he appealed for justice toward Japanese Americans, for the continuance of civil liberties and the advance of civil rights in wartime.

His presidential poll diminished from the 1930s (116,796 in 1940, 80,518 in 1944, and 140,260 in 1948), Thomas turned after 1948 to supporting Democratic presidential candidates. Yet he did not endorse the "better dead than red" policies of the Cold War. He upheld the principles of peaceful coexistence, while generally condemning violations of freedom on both sides. In ripe old age, Thomas helped to found the Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy and spoke out against the Vietnam War.

The Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., perhaps the only twentieth-century American (along with Debs) with equivalent moral credentials, sent a taped message to Thomas as King flew to Norway to accept the Nobel Peace Prize: "I can think of no man who has done more than you to inspire the vision of a society free of injustice and exploitation. . . . Your example has ennobled and dignified the fight for freedom, and all that we hear of the Great Society seems only an echo of your prophetic eloquence." Thomas suffered a stroke after returning home from delivering his final speech, for peace in Vietnam. From his hospital bed he dictated a testament to the SP convention that began, "Not for a minute do we need to assume that the human race is irrevocably damned. . . ."

[See also Peace Movements; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Fleischman, Harry. Norman Thomas: A Biography, 1884-1968. New York: W. W. Norton, 1969.

Johnpoll, Bernard K. Pacifist's Progress: Norman Thomas and the Decline of American Socialism. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1970.

Norman Thomas Collection. New York Public Library.

Swanberg, W. A. Norman Thomas: The Last Idealist. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1976.

—HARRY FLEISCHMAN

THOREAU, HENRY DAVID (1817-1862).

Among the American Left, possibly no single essay by an American has had as profound and enduring impact as Henry David Thoreau's 1849 essay "Resistance to Civil Government." (Retitled "Civil Disobedience" after his death, it was often published as "On the Duty of Civil Disobedience" during the 1960s and was still published as a pamphlet by that title in the 1990s by the A. J. Muste Memorial Institute.) The essay was key to the development of the political strategies of Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr.

Although Thoreau is often presented in textbooks as an idiosyncratic rugged individualist, his ideas are a distillation in the American context of concepts central to the Enlightenment. Thoreau focused on the nature of citizenship, democracy, and free thought. He rejected the proposition that partaking in elections defined good citizenship. In fact, he derided electioneering as a kind of game. A genuine citizen was required to oppose the accumulation of power by government and the stifling of individual freedom. In that context, a citizen must oppose any political institution that supported an unjust moral order or legislation that supported injustice. Moreover, such opposition or disobedience must be active. The first forms of resistance might be public discourse, but good citizenship also meant not paying taxes to support unjust governments or wars. Creating an ideological framework that found considerable resonance in the 1960s, Thoreau approved any and all transgressions against a corrupt and corrupting status quo. This extended to violent as well as nonviolent acts. In this own day Thoreau wrote three essays in support of John Brown, arguing that even though Brown's raid and his proposed guerrilla war were extreme responses, violence against injustice was sometimes preferable to peaceful compliance.

Thoreau's observation, "That government is best which governs least," was a statement regarding delegated power that was a rephrasing of Montesquieu and other theorists of government who had been the direct inspiration of the framers of the American constitution. In that sense, the latter-day embrace of Thoreau by some conservative critics of the welfare state is disingenuous. Thoreau's concern was not limiting governmental power per se but maximizing the environment for individual freedom. His immediate political connections were not with the Right but the pre-Marxist Left; and his work has always found great favor with the anarchist and antiauthoritarian Left.

The essay on civil disobedience arose directly from the struggle against slavery. Thoreau's mother and sisters were politically active in various reform causes. Thoreau became a financial contributor to the Underground Railroad and a literary contributor to the Liberator, the most radical of the abolitionist journals. In 1840 Thoreau refused to pay a church tax, and in 1846 he refused to pay a poll tax on the grounds of Massachusetts' complicity with slavery. In 1854 he wrote "Slavery in Massachusetts" and read it at the same convention at which William Lloyd Garrison burned a copy of the federal constitution, which he had characterized as a pact made with the devil. Characteristically, Thoreau's opposition to slavery rested less on theories of racial equality than his categorical opposition to the ownership of one human being by another and the curtailment of the freedoms of any human being by another. The legalization of such relationships by government, much less the requirement by government that its citizens actively support these relationships on pain of punishment as in the Fugitive Slave Act, was simply intolerable.

Thoreau's thought also prefigured other trends of the Left and reform movements. His A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers (1849) and Walden (1854) combined personal narrative with philosophical discourse in a manner that has become characteristic of environmental writing. His work was widely cited by the conservation movement at the turn of the century, which was preservationist in its orientation and tended to idealize nature. The ecological movement that began to take shape in the 1960s also cited Thoreau, understanding more clearly than its predecessors the implications of his observations on the nature and purpose of work. Although consumer culture was still very much in its infancy in the pre-Civil War period, Thoreau was appalled by what the vulgar accumulation of objects meant to the individual and national psyche.

Thoreau had not gone to Walden Pond to escape the world but to better understand it. Rather than being an antimodernist conservative hankering to preserve the values of the past, Thoreau is the archetypal radical. The theme that runs through all his thinking is questioning that which is familiar, that which is the current norm, that which is presented as prescribed wisdom. These are not always found wanting, but they are always to be challenged. Thoreau believed custom and apparent common sense based on custom were coercive forces that ultimately put the mind to sleep. To be fully human required active resistance to these and all other forms of coercion.

[See also American Revolution; Pacifism; Radical Abolitionists; Radical Environmentalism.]

FURTHER READING

- Cameron, Sharon. Writing Nature. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Fox, Richard Wightman, and James T. Kloppenberg, eds. A Companion to American Thought. Cambridge: Blackwell, 1995.
- Harding, Walter. The Days of Henry Thoreau. New York: Dover, 1982.
- Harding, Walter. "Thoreau's Sexuality." Journal of Homosexuality 21 (1991).

—DAN GEORGAKAS

TOVERITAR/NAISTEN VIIRI. Beginning in July 1911, Toveritar (Female Comrade) was published as "the only Finnish women's journal in America" by the Finnish Socialist Federation (Suomalainen Sosialistijärjestö) in Astoria, Oregon. The newspaper ceased publication in June 1978 in Superior, Wisconsin, where it had been published by Työmies (Worker) Society under the title Naisten Viiri (Women's Banner) but appeared for a short time as a section in the society's other weekly, Työmies-Eteenpäin (Worker-Forward). Toveritar was conceived in the years preceding the first edition by socialist Finnish women who wished to improve the oppressed condition of immigrant women living in the United States and Canada. During a discussion of women's role in socialism at the 1906 founding meeting of the Finnish Socialist Federation in Hibbing, Minnesota, three women delegates argued that, indeed, women in America suffer just as men of the working class and in addition are denied the right to vote. To address this and many other problems they experience both as women and as immigrants, the delegates argued, women need their own newspaper.

Established in 1909 with a circulation of three thousand, Toveritar was published by Toveri (Comrade). The weekly remained in Astoria until 1930 and reached a peak of ten thousand regular subscribers in 1925, surpassing Toveri. Its annual Women's Day issue reached fifteen thousand American and Canadian women. In 1930, Toveritar was moved to Superior, Wisconsin, and its name was changed to Työläisnainen (Working Woman). In 1936 the name was changed to Naisten Viiri. After 1919, it reflected generally the views of the Communist Party.

The paper's express purpose was to awaken women to the world around them, to show them that they were exploited and denied full human rights, and to teach them how to improve their lives both collectively and individually. Throughout its existence, the newspaper remained loyal to the labor movement. The editors encouraged working women to contribute writings and thereby opened doors to literary careers for many of them. The paper sought to inspire women to organize, to work together for the common good, for peace and for education of their young. It urged them to participate in elections, to vote for their candidates, and always to fight for their rights as women and members of the working class.

Helmi Mattson, a Finnish immigrant woman, served as perhaps the most successful and best-known editor of the paper. Mattson's literary skills and insight into immigrant life made possible Toveritar's popularity in the 1920s and 1930s. She is the most prolific and versatile of women Left authors in the United States, publishing novels, plays, poetry, and essays, most of which first saw print in the paper.

Aavikon Vaeltajat (Desert Wanderers), given away as a premium for new subscriptions in 1928, developed the story of a Finnish American woman's sojourn through politics and personal life. She also documented the rich history of Finnish American Left theater. Her autobiography was serialized, after her 1974 death, in Naisten Viiri.

[See also Finnish Americans.]

FURTHER READING

Karvonen, Hilja J. "Three Proponents of Women's Rights in the Finnish-American Labor Movement from 1910 to 1930: Selma Jokela McCone, Maiju Nurmi and Helmi Mattson." In For the Common Good: Finnish Immigrants and the Radical Response to Industrial America, edited by Michael Karni and Douglas Ollila, Jr. Superior, Wis.: Työmies Society, 1977.

The Helmi Mattson Reader. Available in draft form from the Immigration History Research Center, St. Paul, Minn.

—VELMA DOBY

TRACHTENBERG, ALEXANDER. See International Publishers.

TRADE UNION EDUCATIONAL LEAGUE.

Formed in Chicago in November 1920 to coordinate the activities of left-wing militants within various unions, the Trade Union Educational League (TUEL) constituted the most important radical opposition group within the American labor movement until its dissolution in 1929. William Z. Foster, a former syndicalist who joined the Communist Party in 1921 and directed its trade union activity, was the league's driving force. While the league was never formally affiliated with the Communist Party and included many non-Communists in its ranks, it generally adhered to the industrial policies of the Party and, in effect, acted as its trade union body.

The TUEL's program called for industrial over craft organization through amalgamation of trades within the same industry; formation of a labor party; organization of the unorganized; a shop delegate system to ensure rank-and-file control of unions; unemployment insurance; support for the Russian Revolution; and eventually the establishment of a workers' republic. Foster and his colleagues hoped to create progressive blocs in each of the major unions. These groups would push for the TUEL's program within their respective industries and in this way help to win the labor movement over to the revolutionary struggle.

Linoleum cut by William Siegel for the New Masses, 1939.

By firmly rejecting the common left-wing strategy of dual unionism while advocating a militant policy within the mainstream unions, the league scored some notable successes in its early years. Foster established an important alliance with John Fitzpatrick, charismatic president of the progressive Chicago Federation of Labor and the key figure in the labor party movement of the early twenties, and also with Alexander Howat, leader of an insurgent movement within the United Mine Workers of America. A TUEL railroad conference held at Chicago in 1922 drew hundreds of delegates from the many disparate unions in that industry, and hundreds of state federations, city labor councils, and local unions passed resolutions supporting the league's amalgamation plan. Activists were elected to local office in the carpenters, machinists, and other unions, and league adherents won control of both the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and the Fur and Leather Workers Union.

The TUEL led important strikes in the textile industry at Passaic, New Jersey, in the New York City garment industry in 1926, and in 1928 at the cotton mills in New Bedford, Massachusetts. The organization and its activists were under attack throughout the twenties, however, from the national leadership of the American Federation of Labor and conservative machines in the various unions. The conflict was most severe during the mid-twenties in precisely those unions, notably the Mine Workers and the needle trades, where the Left opposition was strongest.

The TUEL's decline derived from two divergent forces: the Profintern—the international communist labor organization in Moscow—and the conservative leadership of various American unions. The latter set the stage for the formation of separate, revolutionary unions by expelling not only the Communists but thousands of other activists. Such expulsions in many unions during the mid-1920s provided a mass base and a deep sense of bitterness upon which the TUEL's successor, the Trade Union Unity League (TUUL), was able to build a federation of dual revolutionary unions during the late 1920s and early 1930s. There is little doubt, however, that much of the inspiration for this new initiative came from the Comintern's declaration in 1928 of a new strategic line—class against class—to meet what it saw as the revolutionary challenge of this era. The main rationale for the TUEL—to win the mainstream unions to a revolutionary program—was abandoned as hopeless, and the TUEL gave way to the TUUL.

[See also Communist Party, USA; International Ladies Garment Workers Union; Trade Union Unity League.]

FURTHER READING

- Barrett, James R. American Bolshevik: William Z. Foster and American Labor Radicalism. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, forthcoming.
- Cochran, Bert. Labor and Communism: The Conflict That Shaped American Unions. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1977.
- Johanningsmeier, Edward P. Forging American Communism: The Life of William Z. Foster. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Kopald, Sylvia. Rebellion in the Labor Unions. New York: Boni and Liveright, 1924.
- Saposs, David. Left-Wing Unionism. New York: Russell and Russell, 1926.
- Schneider, David. The Workers' (Communist) Party and American Trade Unions. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1928.

—JAMES R. BARRETT

TRADE UNION UNITY LEAGUE. Established in Cleveland in August 1929 as the American section of the Red International of Labor Unions, the Trade Union Unity League (TUUL) functioned as the industrial arm of the Communist Party during the early years of the Great Depression. The league replaced the Trade Union Educational League (TUEL), founded in 1920 by William Z. Foster. The TUEL was a rank-and-file opposition group designed to "bore from within" mainstream labor organizations and win them over to a revolutionary program. In contrast, the TUUL aimed to build a revolutionary labor movement through the establishment of dual unions. Its program called for a militant "class against class" line and mass strikes rather than labor/management cooperation; organization of the unorganized; the seven-hour day and five-day week; world trade union unity; full equality for black workers; social insurance; and "the overthrow of the present system of capitalist ownership and exploitation and the establishment of a Soviet system."

The TUUL's formation is most often explained in terms of the Comintern's shift from a United Front to a more sectarian line in the course of 1928. The latter held that capitalism was entering a new era offering tremendous potential for revolutionary movements. At this historical moment it was essential for Communists to abandon movements dominated by "reactionaries" and "social fascists" and to develop their own revolutionary labor organizations.

While the TUUL undoubtedly owed its creation in part to such formulations, practical considerations seemed also to dictate this shift. By the beginning of 1929, long before the league's foundation, separate "red unions" had already been created in coal mining, textiles, and the needle trades, where wholesale expulsions of rank-and-file radicals during the late 1920s created a mass base for the revolutionary unions. Communists were also able to build a viable industrial union in the giant New York hotel and restaurant industry. In addition, smaller TUUL unions or leagues were active in auto, electrical manufacturing, meat packing, steel, tobacco manufacturing, shoe and leather, furniture, the maritime trades, and several other industries. The TUUL's National Textile Workers Union led strikes in Gastonia, North Carolina, Paterson, New Jersey, Lawrence, Massachusetts, and Allentown, Pennsylvania, while the Cannery and Agricultural Workers Industrial Union led a desperate strike of vegetable field laborers in the Imperial Valley of California. In mining, the Communists forged a brief alliance with insurgent elements in the United Mine Workers of America under the banner of the Save the Union movement and waged violent strikes in the western Pennsylvania and Kentucky coalfields during 1931. TUUL membership fluctuated wildly, often in relation to the many strikes the organization led, but it seems clear that the league never represented more than a tiny fraction of organized labor in one of labor's weakest eras.

It would be a mistake, however, to conclude from the TUUL's small size that it had little significance. Its activists organized the Unemployed Councils, the bases for a giant unemployed movement in the early 1930s, and its greatest importance may lie in the groundwork it set for the industrial union movement of the late 1930s. As the Communist line shifted once again during 1934 and the TUUL was dissolved in favor of Popular Front cooperation with other unionists, thousands of experienced Communist activists assumed key roles in the movement that created the giant Congress of Industrial Organizations and unionized American basic industry by the end of World War II.

[See also Communist Party, USA; International Ladies Garment Workers Union; National Miners Union; Textile Workers Unions; Trade Union Educational League.]

FURTHER READING

Barrett, James R. American Bolshevism: William Z. Foster and American Labor Radicalism. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, forthcoming.

Cochran, Bert. Labor and Communism: The Conflict That Shaped American Unions. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1977.

Johanningsmeier, Edward P. Forging American Communism: The Life of William Z. Foster. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.

Klehr, Harvey. The Heyday of American Communism: The Depression Decade. New York: Basic Books, 1984.

—JAMES R. BARRETT

TRESCA, CARLO (1879–1943). For three decades Carlo Tresca was a freelance revolutionary paladin among Italian radicals in the United States. His political views had taken shape in his native Abruzzi, where he embraced socialism with the fiery militancy that characterized his entire career. As branch secretary of the Italian Railroad Workers Union and editor of the newspaper Il Germe (The Seed) at age twenty-two, Tresca was a thorn in the side of the local religious, political, and economic elite. Rather than serve a prison term stemming from his activities, Tresca immigrated to the United States in 1904.

He settled in Philadelphia, where he assumed the editorship of Il Proletario (The Proletarian), the official organ of the Italian Socialist Federation, and he was instrumental in orienting the majority federation current to syndicalism. Becoming increasingly anarchistic in his own views, Tresca resigned his editorship in 1906 and began publishing his own newspaper, La Plebe (The Plebs). Two years later he transferred La Plebe to Pittsburgh, where he brought revolutionary ideas to the struggles of Italian coalmine and mill workers in western Pennsylvania. His opposition included the clergy, Italian consular officials, and mafiosi as well as the capitalist owners of mines and mills and their allies in the Pennsylvania government. His opposition retaliated with heavy fines, imprisonment, and an assassination attempt, but Tresca was not intimidated.

Journal cover, 1936.

Tresca entered the mainstream of American radicalism and labor in 1912, when the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) invited him to Lawrence, Massachusetts, to help lead the Italian workers during the campaign to free strike leaders Joseph Ettor and Arturo Giovannitti, who had been falsely accused of murder. Tresca soon became known as the Bull of Lawrence and after the victory in Lawrence was active in the Little Falls, New York, textile workers' strike (1912), the New York hotel workers' strike (1913), the Paterson, New Jersey, silk workers' strike (1913), and the Mesabi Range, Minnesota, strike of miners (1916). While organizing in the Mesabi Range, Tresca narrowly escaped a lynching and was charged with murder. An agreement in which some IWW members pleaded guilty to government charges was negotiated between the Minnesota authorities and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn (Tresca's comrade and lover since 1912). Ettor was also involved in the arrangement by which Tresca was released. Big Bill Haywood, the official leader of the IWW, was enraged by the terms of the negotiations, which included some guilty pleas; and the association of Tresca, Ettor, and Flynn with the IWW quickly withered.

In 1917, when the entire first-, second-, and third-tier leadership of the IWW was indicted by the federal government, Tresca again defied Haywood. With Ettor, Flynn, and a handful of others, he had had his case severed from the mass trial that would take place in Chicago, thereby escaping the long prison terms and huge fines that were to be the fate of those who followed Haywood's strategy. Tresca did not escape other persecution. Even after the federal charges against him were dropped, L'Avvenire (The Future), the newspaper Tresca had published in New York since 1913, was suppressed and its successor Il Martello (The Hammer) was repeatedly confiscated.

The Justice Department kept Tresca under constant surveillance throughout 1919 and 1920, hoping to gather evidence for a deportation. Tresca skillfully avoided running afoul of the law while always remaining a source of assistance for comrades less fortunate in this respect. During this period Tresca became involved in the Sacco-Vanzetti case. He was responsible for bringing the controversial IWW lawyer Fred Moore into the case and helped generate considerable publicity and financial support for the doomed anarchists.

By the time Sacco and Vanzetti were executed, Tresca had become preoccupied with the struggle against fascism. Tresca became the major figure among Italians in America who tried to thwart Mussolini's efforts to organize Italian immigrants into a support group devoted to his fascist principles. In Il Martello, Tresca excoriated Mussolini as the arch-traitor of the working class and he attacked the House of Savoy for its cowardly complicity in the fascist takeover.

Tresca's antifascist activities were carefully monitored in Rome. Fearful that opposition from Italians in America would jeopardize his standing with the U.S. government and lending institutions, Mussolini was determined to silence the voices of his transatlantic opponents. In 1923 the Italian ambassador officially requested that the State Department suppress Il Martello as the source that was "spreading poison among all the Italian workmen in this country." Federal authorities complied by prosecuting Tresca for sending "obscene matter" through the mails. The excuse for this was a two-line advertisement for a book on birth control. Convicted and sentenced to serve a year and a day—a felony charge that qualified him for deportation—Tresca spent four months in the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary in 1925 before public outcry over the transparent persecution forced President Calvin Coolidge to commute the sentence to time served.

Failing to rid themselves of Tresca by legal means, the fascists resorted to violence. There was an unsuccessful attempt to kill him and other antifascists with a bomb during a rally in 1926. Faced with constant physical attacks, the antifascists responded with daggers and pistols as well as mass demonstrations and street fights. By the end of the decade, pro-Mussolini militants could only hold public demonstrations under police protection. While unable to undermine American business support for Il Duce's regime or prevent the takeover of Italian American newspapers, radio stations, cultural institutions, and other important vehicles that influenced the Italian community, Tresca and the antifascists did succeed in derailing Mussolini's grandiose plan for the fascistization of Italian America.

By the 1930s Tresca had added the Communists to his list of totalitarian foes. In contrast to anarchists like Malatesta, Goldman, Berkman, and Kropotkin, who had opposed the Bolsheviks early in the course of the revolutionary process, Tresca had given grudging support. He reasoned that a socialist state was preferable to a capitalist state. Throughout the 1920s Tresca regarded the Communists as useful allies in the fight against fascism, and he collaborated with them in such organizations as the Italian Antifascist Alliance of North America. When the Stalinists crushed the anarchist movement in Catalonia and Aragon during the Spanish Civil War, Tresca became an implacable foe of Stalinism. He subsequently served on the John Dewey Commission, which declared Trotsky "not guilty" of the charges presented at the Moscow purge trials. Once Tresca took such positions, the Communists conducted a campaign of character assassination aimed at destroying his influence in the antifascist movement.

After Pearl Harbor, Tresca obstructed both the Communists and former fascists from infiltrating the Mazzini Society, the leading organization of Italian antifascists in the United States. He also kept them out of the Italian-American Victory Council, organized by the Office of War Information in 1942 to be an agency through which American policy toward postwar Italy might be influenced. The obstacle that Tresca presented was removed on the night of 11 July 1943 when an assassin shot him to death in a New York street.

Many of Tresca's comrades believed that his murder had been ordered by Generoso Pope, the ex-fascist publisher of Il Progresso Italo-Americano, as Tresca had attacked him relentlessly throughout the 1930s and early 1940s. Another suspect was Vittorio Vidali, an agent of the Third International, whom Tresca had accused of murdering anarchist and Trotskyist leaders in Spain during the civil war. The most plausible theory, however, is that Tresca was killed at the order of an Italian underworld figure named Frank Garofalo, whose motives might have been more personal than political. Although the actual triggerman has been identified as a member of the Mafia, the Tresca murder remains officially unsolved.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; Italian Americans; Workers' Control.]

FURTHER READING

Gallagher, Dorothy. All the Right Enemies. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.

Pernicone, Nunzio. "Carlo Tresca and the Sacco-Vanzetti Case." Journal of American History 66 (December 1979).

—NUNZIO PERNICONE

TROTSKYISM. American Trotskyism was founded with the expulsion of James P. Cannon, Max Shachtman, and Martin Abern from the Communist Party (CP) on 27 October 1928. The three had been leaders of a faction aligned with William Z. Foster. The group viewed itself as a Left opposition to official Communism and devoted most of its energy, particularly in its early years, to a critique of the Soviet Union. The Trotskyists held that the Soviet Union had degenerated by becoming bureaucratized under the leadership of Joseph Stalin. They favored a return to the original Leninist regime, which they believed was more internally democratic and internationally revolutionary. Therefore Trotskyism developed very much in this country as it did in other countries, that is, in a reactive fashion with Soviet Communism.

American Trotskyists, like their "Stalinist" competitors, sought to replicate on American soil a revolution modeled on the Soviet one. They believed this required the construction of a vanguard party that adhered to the correct policies. The combination of a tightly organized and disciplined party with a belief that adherence to the correct line was the key to eventual revolutionary success encouraged a process of fracturing and splits. The mainstream Communists were able to partially counter this tendency by combining the authority of the Soviet Union with an undemocratic internal regime. Most Trotskyist groups were more democratic and paid the price in splits.

American Trotskyism did have some positive features over its sister parties in Europe and elsewhere, which led it to become the largest and best organized Trotskyist group during Trotsky's lifetime. Cannon and his supporters had led a section of the American CP relatively attuned to American political conditions and with some experience in the American labor movement. James P. Cannon was a pragmatic American and an excellent organizer. This organization and leadership contrasted sharply with the typically small and badly run bands of feuding intellectuals in Europe.

Between 1928 and 1933 the American Trotskyists were extremely weak, with little more than two hundred members. Activity consisted largely in publishing and distributing their paper, the Militant, for the most part unsuccessfully, to CP-related circles. Factionally ridden, they were all but paralyzed by internal tension on a leadership level between Cannon and Shachtman. They suffered minor but painful splits with groups led by Albert Weisbord, a former Young People's Socialist League leader who briefly rose to fame as Communist field marshal in the Gastonia, North Carolina, strike and who continued to direct a minute group for decades after, and B. J. Field, who had achieved his own fame as Trotskyist strategist of a New York restaurant strike.

During 1933 the Trotskyists began to influence working-class politics in the United States with a very effective campaign in favor of a united front against the rise of fascism in Germany. The official Communists had refused to cooperate with the Social Democrats. After 1934 the "Stalinists" adopted the Popular Front policy and the American Trotskyists criticized the official Communists from the left, particularly their support of the Democratic Party and their more conservative policies in the labor movement.

With the workers' victory in the Minneapolis Teamster strike in 1934, the Trotskyists developed a small but vital labor base. At about the same time, the Trotskyist critique of Russian autocracy brought over a number of intellectuals, including an important group around the journal Partisan Review.

Between 1934 and 1938 the American Trotskyists went through a process of fusion and entry that contributed to the movement's growth and political impact, though producing splits and wounds among fellow members of the non-CP Left. In 1934 the Trotskyists fused with the American Workers Party, led by A. J. Muste, a group that had distinguished itself in the Toledo Auto-Lite strike. In 1936 the group entered en bloc the Socialist Party (SP), whose conservative wing had departed. An opposition faction around Hugo Oehler opposed the entry and split away to form its own movement with a number of notable organizers and intellectuals, including Sidney Lens. The main body of Trotskyists converted several hundred Socialist youth before their expulsion from the SP in 1938 and the founding of the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) as the premier organization of the Fourth International.

Meanwhile, in 1937, Leon Trotsky arrived in Mexico. The American Trotskyists quickly established a special relationship with their exiled leader, providing the bulk of his secretaries, guards, and funds, and establishing a close practical-theoretical collaboration. American Trotskyist intellectuals, led by George Novack, organized a commission of inquiry into the Moscow trials and convinced the philosopher John Dewey to head it. The commission's hearings played an important role in efforts to counter Communist versions of the judicial murders. The assassination of Trotsky by a Comintern agent on 20 August 1940 was a deep personal as well as political trauma for U.S. Trotskyism. Many cadres remaining in the movement for twenty or more years sustained themselves through memories of the "Old Man," memories often more vivid than Trotskyism's contemporary activities.

In all, the period of collaboration with Trotsky between 1937 and 1940 had been most productive. Trotskyists developed most of the ideas that have had their impact within the American labor movement, such as advocacy of a shorter work week to counter unemployment, automatic wage escalators to offset inflation, support of rank-and-file democracy in an increasingly bureaucratized labor movement, and promotion of an independent labor-based political party. Actual Trotskyist recruitment of workers and influence within the trade unions was significant but minor when compared with that of the CP in the same period.

Lesser progress was made in recruitment or even understanding of racial minorities and women. Trotsky had urged upon his American supporters a nationalist class policy and aggressive orientation toward blacks. C. L. R. James (J. R. Johnson) interpreted this view in the press but it was scarcely adopted in practice. Unlike the Communist movement, which had a nominal approach to women, including a press and a small apparatus, American Trotskyists produced little more than an occasional essay urging their participation.

In 1940 the Trotskyists split almost in half over the "Russian question." A group led by Max Shachtman, which included most other prominent intellectuals and most of the youth, developed a new theory of the Soviet Union as a bureaucratic collectivist class society. They refused to defend the Soviet Union and evolved a "Third Camp" perspective of opposition to both Washington and Moscow. Cannon's faction included most blue-collar workers and a scattering of intellectuals and adhered faithfully to Trotsky's view of that society as a "degenerated workers' state" still worthy of defense in a conflict with imperialism. The division separated most intellectuals from most workers, with the result that Shachtman's Workers Party (WP) maintained a lively but isolated intellectual life while Cannon's SWP maintained an orthodox though stifling internal life with working-class participation. During World War II Dwight Macdonald left Shachtman and published a lively maverick libertarian-pacifist journal, Politics. The Smith Act prosecutions of the SWP leaders and Minneapolis Teamster militants soon threw important Trotskyists in prison, which assisted the union bureaucracy in isolating radicals.

Trotsky and both branches of his followers believed that the war would be followed by a revolutionary wave in which leadership could be seized away from Communists and Social Democrats. The combination of successful revolutions led by the "counterrevolutionary Stalinists" (such as in China and Yugoslavia) with prosperity and conservatism in the industrialized countries was most demoralizing. Cannon sought to defy reality with predictions of an imminent revolution, while Shachtman developed frightening visions of a new class system sweeping the world. The confusion led to myriad new splits and recombinations, with an SWP group led by Felix Morrow and Albert Goldman joining the WP, while the WP "Johnson-Forest" group, led by C. L. R. James and Raya Dunayevskaya, joined the SWP. More important, both groups lost the bulk of their membership as prosperity and McCarthyism took a toll on the Left as a whole.

During the 1950s and 1960s the general drift of the Shachtman tendency (the WP, Independent Socialist League, Young Socialist League) was rightward. At first it maintained a course independent of Stalinism and capitalism, advocating a "Third Camp." However, in time, the bulk of the group supported the American camp in the Cold War, abandoned their vanguardism, and evolved into social democrats. Irving Howe dropped out of the group and in 1952 launched the journal Dissent, which maintained a position of critical support for America's foreign policy objectives while defending the victims of McCarthyism. In 1958 Shachtman led his group of little more than two hundred members into the SP, where in 1972 they became the leadership of the small, aging, hawkish, anti-New Left Social Democrats USA. Michael Harrington led a wing of former Shachtmanites that maintained a more critical attitude toward American foreign policy, the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee (later merged with the New American Movement to form the Democratic Socialists of America), which eventually achieved a membership of several thousand. Hal Draper, longtime editor of Shachtman's lively tabloid Labor Action, led the majority of the youth out of the SP in 1964 to form the Independent Socialist Clubs (later called International Socialists and gaining a couple of hundred labor-oriented student supporters), which adhered to a more radical but rather syndicalist version of the Shachtmanite variety of Trotskyism.

The SWP had dwindled down by the 1950s to less than four hundred members who were hard-pressed to maintain a weekly paper and a quarterly journal. The James-Dunayevskaya group left in 1951 with a few dozen adherents, published a workerist paper, Correspondence, for a few years, and divided again into Dunayevskaya's News and Letters and a James-oriented Facing Reality group (the latter disintegrating in the 1970s but a breakaway led by James Boggs and Grace Lee Boggs, called the National Organization for an American Revolution, surviving), both Detroit based and working-class spontaneitists. A faction emerged in the SWP in 1953 around Bert Cochran, Harry Braverman, and George Clarke that was supported by the bulk of its autoworkers. It included both worker elements seeking a more American and less sectarian political existence and intellectuals impressed with Communist achievements in China and Yugoslavia. Cochran and Braverman, after their expulsion, produced their own lively monthly, the American Socialist, which they abandoned in 1960 with Braverman moving on to the Monthly Review Press. In 1960, Sam Marcy led out of the SWP a group of several dozen, largely from the Buffalo area, that had supported the Russian invasion of Hungary. Calling itself the Workers World Party, the Marcy group developed some strength in the late 1960s through the organization of the ultramilitant Youth against War and Fascism.

Trotskyism's revival came with the radical upsurge of the 1960s. A new youth organization, the Young Socialist Alliance, was founded in 1959 through the assistance of former Shachtmanite youth led by Tim Wohlforth, Shane Mage, and James Robertson. These leaders and others, like Peter Camejo, with the support of party intellectuals George Breitman, George Novack, and Murry Weiss, recruited mostly radicalized students who rejected New Left leadership. The SWP drew much interest to a revived and more widely circulated Militant, which popularized support for Fidel Castro and the Cuban Revolution as well as for Malcolm X and black nationalism. But it mainly applied lessons from the 1930s–1940s labor movement to the new anti-war movement, building in a relatively nonsectarian fashion the mass marches of the later 1960s and early 1970s.

All existing Trotskyist groups grew in the aftermath of the collapse of Students for a Democratic Society in 1969, drawing those to the left of the official Communists who rejected Maoism and were attracted to a critical view of Communist-dominated societies and to a rigorous Marxist intellectual life. By 1977 the SWP had more than fifteen hundred members, more than at the time of its founding convention in 1938, but nearly all of them graduates of the student radicalization. Little progress had been made in recruitment among blacks and even less in the Chicano community. Trade union work had been largely ignored. Others attempted to rebuild Trotskyism in a more traditional manner stressing orthodoxy, vanguard building, and the labor movement. James Robertson had split from the SWP in 1963 and built the Spartacist League into a group of two hundred or so members, while Tim Wohlforth left the SWP in 1964 and built the Workers League into a group of about the same size. Both groups opposed the SWP's identification with the Castro leadership of Cuba. The Seattle SWP branch, led by Dick Frazer and Clara Kay, strongly oriented toward civil rights and subsequent black struggles, left the SWP in 1964 to form the Freedom Socialist Party, which eventually grew under Kay's leadership, changing its orientation to the feminist movement. All told there were about three thousand Trotskyists in one group or another by the mid-1970s. As with the SWP proper, this was a historic high point.

Thereafter, Trotskyism of all varieties suffered. The number of grouplets had doubled, while combined membership had shrunk by half. The SWP remains the largest Trotskyist group, with the only significant press, the Militant, and apparatus, but with its veterans of the 1930s–1940s virtually all dead, resigned, retired, or expelled. Small groups split away in the 1980s, forming the Fourth International Tendency (George Breitman, Frank Lovell), which orients toward reforming the SWP; Socialist Action (Nat Weinstein, Jeff Mackler), which competes with the SWP; and Solidarity. The latter organization was formed through a fusion of former members of the SWP and descendants of the Independent Socialists; it publishes the lively journal Against the Current and helps maintain the Teamsters for a Democratic Union and the monthly Labor Notes. Other groups have clung to existence if not real life.

American Trotskyism has, in sum, been a minority trend within an American Left that has been itself a minority movement. It has also had its moments of vitality and made some lasting contributions, both practical and theoretical. In the 1930s, when the CP dominated the Left, Trotskyism represented a lonely and persecuted (if sometimes internally self-punishing) voice of democratic conscience. Within the labor movement it has contributed to the defense of rank-and-file democracy. While generally a movement of organizers and activists rather than theoreticians and thinkers, it has made efforts to grapple with some of the problems facing the American labor movement. It has hindered itself, even while bolstering its own faith, by the self-imposed vanguardist concept of party organization. This concept, rigidly applied, has forced Trotskyism to fluctuate between permitting a democratic internal life, which encouraged fracturing, or suppressing internal democracy—mimicking the worst side of its Communist rivals—and becoming intellectually ossified.

[See also Breitman, George; Cannon, James Patrick; Dobbs, Farrell; Dunayevskaya, Raya; Fourth International; Harrington, Michael; Howe, Irving; James, C. L. R.; Macdonald, Dwight; Minneapolis Teamster Strikes; Oehler, Hugo; Partisan Review; Shachtman, Max; Socialist Workers Party; Workers Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Cannon, James P. The History of American Trotskyism. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1944.
- Deutscher, Isaac. The Prophet Outcast. New York: Oxford University Press, 1963.
- Dobbs, Farrell. Teamster Rebellion. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1973.
- Draper, Theodore. American Communism and Soviet Russia. New York: Viking, 1960.
- Myers, Constance. The Prophet's Army: Trotskyists in America, 1928–1941. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1977.
- Wald, Alan M. The New York Intellectuals. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.
- Wohlforth, Tim. The Struggle for Marxism in the United States. New York: Workers League, 1971.

—TIM WOHLFORTH

TRUTH, SOJOURNER (c. 1797–1883). Born Isabella, a slave in upstate New York, Sojourner Truth went on to become one of the two most famous African American women of the nineteenth century. (The other, Harriet Tubman, also came out of the abolitionist movement.) A woman of remarkable intelligence despite her illiteracy, Truth had a great presence. Some 5 feet 11 inches tall, she possessed a low, melodious singing and speaking voice. Making her first public appearances as a preacher in the years immediately surrounding her emancipation by New York state law in 1827, she drew on her religious convictions for the rest of her life. To transform herself from an enslaved victim of violence and sexual aggression into a powerful public presence, she called on the power of Christianity. Her tapping this source of empowerment, rather than her role as a feminist, makes Sojourner Truth a representative hero of her time.

During the late 1820s, as Truth was making the transition from slavery to freedom, she joined the Methodist church and went to court in Ulster County to recover her son Peter, who had been sold illegally into slavery in Alabama. After her emancipation and the return of her son, she moved to New York City. Immediately attracted to the come-outer holiness communities, in 1832 she joined the Kingdom of the Prophet Matthias, in which she was the only African American among prosperous whites.

Little is known of Truth's life in New York between the breakup of the Kingdom of Matthias in 1835 and her changing her name to Sojourner Truth on the day of Pentecost, 1843. Leaving New York on foot to preach the end of the world, she landed in the Northampton (Massachusetts) Association of Education and Industry in the fall. During her decade in Northampton, Truth met abolitionists and feminists for the first time. She began addressing reform meetings in the mid-1840s and set out on her own after the 1850 publication of her Narrative of Sojourner Truth, dictated to a fellow Northamptonite, Olive Gilbert.

Truth was an abolitionist and feminist who existentially and rhetorically represented working-class American women. The only woman born into slavery to become a regular on the women's rights and abolitionist lecture circuit, she attracted the attention of like-minded women writers. Harriet Beecher Stowe made Truth famous when she published an essay, "Sojourner Truth, the Libyan Sibyl," in the Atlantic Monthly of April 1863.

In response to Stowe's piece, Frances Dana Gage, an Ohio feminist who had chaired a women's rights meeting in Akron, Ohio, in 1851 at which Truth spoke, wrote what became the most famous word portrait of Sojourner Truth in the twentieth century. A phrase of Gage's invention—"Ar'n't I woman?"—has practically become synonymous with Sojourner Truth and has nearly eclipsed Truth's actual antislavery and feminist work during the 1850s and her support of freedpeople during and after the Civil War. Truth also supported woman suffrage, but her most urgent cause from the 1870s to her death was the resettlement of freedpeople on federal lands in the West. Aged and ailing, she traveled to Kansas to welcome the twenty thousand "Exodusters" (from Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Tennessee) in 1879. As a fervent Pentecostal, Sojourner Truth is an unlikely heroine for the American Left, but throughout her life she championed the cause of the poor and disfranchised, especially the least visible: black women.

[See also Women's Liberation.]

FURTHER READING

Bernard, Jacqueline. Journey toward Freedom. New York: Feminist Press, 1990.

Mabee, Carleton. Sojourner Truth: Slave, Prophet, Legend. New York: New York University Press, 1993.

Painter, Nell Irvin. Sojourner Truth: A Life, a Symbol. New York: W. W. Norton, 1996.

—NELL IRVIN PAINTER

TUCKER, BENJAMIN R. (1854–1939). An individualist anarchist, Benjamin R. Tucker was a man of intellect rather than of action, focusing on the development of his ideas and on the publication of books and journals, especially the journal Liberty (1881–1908). Introduced to anarchism, labor reform, and free love by Ezra Heywood in Massachusetts, Tucker was particularly influenced by two individualist anarchists, Josiah Warren and William B. Greene. Tucker summarized his philosophy in this manner: "The Anarchists are simply untterrified Jeffersonian Democrats. They believe that 'the best government is that which governs least,' and that which governs least is no government at all." Besides publishing the writings of the leading individualist anarchists and many other radicals, Liberty was probably the earliest American magazine to publish Nietzsche and George Bernard Shaw.

Besides Liberty, Tucker operated an ambitious book-publishing program, often printing books first serialized in the journal. He translated into English and published the principal works, including What Is Property?, of Pierre-Joseph Proudhon, the first writer in any language to describe himself as an anarchist. He also translated and published Bakunin's God and the State, Chernyshevsky's What Is to Be Done?, and Tolstoy's The Kreutzer Sonata. He published Max Stirner's The Ego and His Own, as well as works by Oscar Wilde, Herbert Spencer, Emile Zola, John Henry Mackay, and many others. After a disastrous fire in New York City in 1908 destroyed his warehouse and Unique Book Shop, Tucker left the United States for France, where he lived for the remainder of his life.

[See also Anarchism; Free Love.]

FURTHER READING

- Coughlin, Michael, Charles Hamilton, and Mark Sullivan, eds. Benjamin R. Tucker and the Champions of Liberty: A Centenary Anthology. Saint Paul: Coughlin Publications, 1987.
- Liberty*, 1881–1908, a hardcover reprint of the full run, with an introduction by Herbert Gutman. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1970.
- Martin, James J. Men against the State: The Expositors of Individualist Anarchism in America, 1827–1908. Colorado Springs, Colo.: Myles Publishers, 1970.
- McElroy, Wendy, ed. Liberty, 1881–1908: A Comprehensive Index. Saint Paul: Coughlin Publications, 1982.
- Reichert, William O. Partisans of Freedom: A Study in American Anarchism. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1976.

—MARTIN BLATT

UKRAINIAN AMERICANS. The Ukrainian immigrant Left, strongly but ambivalently linked to political events in Russia and Austria-Hungary, had a forceful if foreshortened role in the ethnic working-class community. Like numerous other eastern European groups, Ukrainians had never achieved political independence in their homeland. Not until the end of the nineteenth century did the population at large accept a common designation, easing out the "Ruthenian" cognomen given Ukrainian subjects of the Austro-Hungarian empire and retained for decades by American immigration records. Ethno-cultural revival and the worsening condition of the peasantry prompted mass immigration to the United States, numbering (according to varying estimates) approximately 500,000 individuals.

Mostly of peasant origin, Ukrainian immigrants clustered in districts of anthracite coal mining, iron and steel production, meat processing, and auto making, with a minority female work force in textiles and light manufacturing. Swept up in the drives for unionization of underpaid and dangerous work, Ukrainians took part in numerous violent labor incidents. Left organizations took shape against this background, along with religious institutions and fraternal or cultural associations. Socialists and, later, Communists organized with the dual purpose of emancipating labor and attaining the homeland's national independence.

Ukrainian socialists in the homeland, seeking to extend their support network, began to dispatch agitators and propaganda to America after the turn of the century. In the years following the Russian Revolution of 1905, they found a ready welcome in the besida, or public meeting, re-created in the new land. Squabbling over homeland politics and other issues, however, prevented Ukrainian socialists from establishing themselves on a national basis until the outbreak of war in Europe increased membership and consolidated socialist influence in the immigrant community. In 1915 immigrant Ukrainian socialists affiliated twenty locals, numbering approximately a thousand members, with the Socialist Party. Shortly, this membership doubled, with Michigan emerging as a major center of activity. The Ukrainian Federation organ, Robitnyk (Worker), daily from 1917, took an extreme Left position within the Ukrainian community, urging anti-war militance and welcoming the Bolshevik Revolution unreservedly. This position, with events in eastern Europe, fixed the lines of conflict among Ukrainian immigrants, with rival immigrant Social Democrats in the Ukrainian Workingmen's Association denouncing left-wing Ukrainian supporters in the association's organ, the Narodnia Volya (People's Will). The same revolutionary posture also ensured a government attack on Robitnyk with three raids culminating in the 1918 destruction of some nineteen thousand internal documents.

Robitnyk soon reemerged and led a strengthened organization of some six to seven thousand from the Socialist Party to the Communist Party. Meanwhile, fraternal and educational activities blossomed, including "Ukrainian Workers Schools" and women's organizations, libraries, choirs, and temperance efforts. Just as Ukrainian Communists moved to consolidate their position, government repression struck once more, with destruction of the press as well as jailing and deportation of leading members.

As a result of these experiences, Ukrainian Communists learned a measure of caution. Ukrainskyi Shchodennyi Visti (The Ukrainian Daily News), which began in 1920 and continues weekly to the present, never designated itself as a Communist publication. Although adhering to Moscow-aligned policies, the press concerned itself overwhelmingly with practical immigrant problems. Increasing this inward direction, the Ukrainian Left allied itself with the Soiuz Ukrainskykh Robitnychykh Orhanizatsii, or Union of Ukrainian Workers (SURO), founded in 1923, rather than the Ukrainian Federation of the Communist Party. As such, it operated freely within the immigrant community. With considerable success, the Ukrainian Left made the argument that a Communist homeland state was superior to not having a unified country. It also successfully urged more participation in the movement for industrial unions, and in a cultural effort to train the second generation in Ukrainian customs and language.

During the heyday of Communist influence, this practical approach to immigrant problems, and an undaunted devotion to the Ukrainian Soviet Republic, nearly overcame the distrust of immigrants generated by reports of widespread homeland starvation. Ukrainian immigrant Left activities within the community flourished in a host of unions including the furriers, Boot and Shoe Workers, United Mine Workers, and (notably in the New York area) restaurant workers' organizations. By the later 1930s, Communists became especially strident in their denunciations of right-wing Ukrainian nationalists, somewhat accurately depicted as allied with fascist movements. Left Ukrainians also constituted a vital section of the International Workers Order, whose Ukrainian members (along with SURO) in 1936 launched a highly successful "Ukrainian National Association" against war and fascism that included some twenty thousand radical and nonradical members.

Between the time of the Moscow trials and the advent of World War II, SURO membership and activities plummeted. By 1940, SURO ceased to function, while the Left-supported "League of American Ukrainians" numbered scarcely more than a thousand members. Unlike other eastern European Communists, the Ukrainian Left failed to rebound significantly during the Second World War. The resurgence of right-wing nationalism among a new generation of notably non-proletarian immigrants, general mistrust of the Soviet Union, and, finally, Khrushchev's revelations at the Twentieth Soviet Congress in 1956 virtually eradicated Communist support. Remaining public activities of the Ukrainian American Left tended to be largely cultural in nature. A rival immigrant movement, Ukrainian American Social Democrats, centering organizationally in Scranton, Pennsylvania, and publishing Narodnia Volya (1911–present), has exerted considerably less influence, but survived on a narrower gauge, shifting increasingly toward the center of a rightward-turning immigrant public.

[See also Communist Party, USA.]

FURTHER READING

Kuropas, Myron. "The Making of the Ukrainian American, 1884–1939: A Study of Ethno-National Education." Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago, 1974.

Nastisivskyi, M. Ukrainska Imigratsia v Spoluchenykh Derzhavakh. New York: Union of Ukrainian Labor Organizations, 1934.

—MARIA WOROBY

UNDERGROUND COMIX (called "underground" because of their links with the "underground newspapers" of the late 1960s, and spelled "comix" to distinguish them from mainstream comic books) have provided a forum for the occasional expression of a range of noncentrist ideas, including libertarian, socialist, green, feminist, and anarchist sentiments. They rose and fell with the hippie counterculture, but never completely died out.

The generation of cartoonists that created underground comix had been deeply impressed in the early 1950s by the craft and irreverence of EC comic books such as Vault of Horror and Mad. Most of EC's titles were swept away in 1954, when a popular movement against comic book violence led to a collapse of the comic book industry. Some of the most prolific and accomplished underground cartoonists saw their work as a conscious attempt to revive the interrupted EC tradition.

The two most popular underground cartoonists were Robert Crumb, creator of Zap and Mr. Natural, and Gilbert Shelton, creator of The Fabulous Furry Freak Brothers. Their work secured a niche for underground comix in "head shops," which became the primary distribution outlets for the comix.

In addition to Crumb and Shelton, several other underground cartoonists included political themes. Skip Williamson edited Conspiracy Capers (1969) to raise money for the legal defense of the Chicago Eight. Spain Rodriguez, a Marxist, created "Trashman: Agent of the Sixth International," an urban guerrilla, ironic hero. Greg Irons drew nuclear war and ecological disasters as contemporary horror comics, often for Ron Turner's pioneering, environmentalist Slow Death comix series (1970–1979). Guy Colwell, inspired by underground comix while jailed for draft resistance, created Inner City Romance (1972–1979), which dramatized prison and ghetto life.

Appalled by the misogyny in many early underground comix, some women cartoonists responded by creating their own titles, such as Wimmin's Comix (1972–) and Tits and Clits (1973–). Women involved in the early underground comix period included Trina Robbins, who worked to resurrect the Fiction

House rather than EC tradition, Sharon Rudahl, Joyce Farmer, and "Chin Lyvely."

In 1973, five years after Crumb's Zap #1 and Shelton's Feds n' Heads, the underground comix market collapsed. A combination of rising printing costs, tightening obscenity laws, a campaign to shut down the head shops, the waning of the counterculture (partly caused by American withdrawal from Vietnam), and a glut of inferior material on the racks all combined to break the comix momentum. The comix publishers—mainly Ron Turner, Denis Kitchen, and Fred Todd—persevered, preventing the comix from disappearing as a passing fad.

The postcrash period of underground comix saw a rising interest in educational and political themes. In addition to the series mentioned above, these have included Harvey Pekar's autobiographical American Splendor, about his working-class life in Cleveland (1976–), which led to his coauthoring Our Cancer Year (1994) with Joyce Brabner; Leonard Rifa's "EduComics," beginning with All-Atomic Comics about nuclear power's hazards (1976); Larry Gonick's Cartoon History of the Universe (1978–1994); Jay Kinney and Paul Mavrides's superlatively sharp Anarchy Comix (1978); Gay Comix (1980–), founded by Howard Cruse, who went on to create the outstanding graphic novel Stuck Rubber Baby (1995); and World War 3 Illustrated (1980–), in which founding coeditors Peter Kuper and Seth Tobocman updated the underground aesthetic for the 1980s. Raw (1980–) serialized Art Spiegelman's highly personal cartoon history of Nazi oppression, Maus (1980–1991).

After the loss of the head shop distribution system, cartoonists tried several replacements. Clay Geerdes championed the self-publication of "mini-comix" on the newly perfected photocopy machines of the late 1970s. Bill Griffith turned "Zippy" into a daily newspaper comic strip. Some cartoonists found space for progressive cartooning in weekly newspapers, including Tom Tomorrow ("This Modern World"), Lloyd Dangle ("Troubletown"), and Alison Bechdel ("Dykes to Watch Out For"). Leonard Rifa's (Food First Comics, 1982) and Joyce Brabner (Real War Stories, 1987) have worked directly for progressive organizational sponsors. Twisted Sisters (1991, 1995), collections of "bad girl" comix edited by Diane Noomin, have been distributed through mainstream bookstores, thus demonstrating the loosening of mainstream self-censorship. Fantagraphics and other comic book publishers have kept alive the politically charged underground comic book tradition, both by reprinting classic works and by publishing new titles including (to name a few) Joe Sacco's Palestine (1993–1996), Peter Kuper's Bleeding Heart (1991–1993), Roberta Gregory's Naughty Bits (1990–), Peter Bagge's Hate (1990), and Dan Clowes's Eightball (1989). Justin Green, who was among the first to develop comix as a confessional medium, has turned to sign-painting for a living, and creates the comic strip "The Sign Game" for his fellow sign-painters. Zap artist Robert Williams carries on his multilayered assault on art world sensibilities with Juxtapoz magazine.

[See also New Left.]

FURTHER READING

- Davidson, Steef. The Penguin Book of Political Comics. Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1976, 1982.
 Estren, Mark James. A History of Underground Comics. San Francisco: Straight Arrow Books, 1974.
 Kennedy, Jay. The Official Underground and Newave Comix Price Guide. Cambridge, Mass.: Boatner Norton Press, 1982.

—LEONARD RIFAS

1980s-style comix cover by Michael Roman © 1984.

CAPTIVE CITY

UNDERGROUND PRESS. The phenomenon of the underground press flourished in the United States between 1967 and 1973 as a proliferation of predominantly tabloid newspapers devoted to the local application of political and cultural movements that swept the nation during that period. Because the production of these newspapers was conducted from public offices, this press was in no way "underground" in the sense of the prerevolutionary press in the Soviet Union or the Jewish anti-Nazi press in occupied eastern Europe before World War II. At its most millenarian, the underground press of the 1960s did attempt to anticipate postrevolutionary forms of journalism, but by and large "underground" referred merely to the evolving youth culture, whose habits, ideas, art, and slang were, in 1967, still unexpressed in the mass media of the day. It was "underground" merely in the bohemian sense.

The underground press movement reflected the regional styles and concerns of U.S. youth whose experience came to be defined with increasing intensity in this period by a debilitating neocolonial war on the one hand and on the other a growing drug use with its accompanying interest in esoterica and the delegitimizing literatures of all world traditions. The political and cultural poles in this collective experience were characterized by a powerful sense of alienation from and rejection of U.S. social institutions, and each tendency found its definitions in its own cluster of underground newspapers. Most of the anti-war papers were to be found in smaller university cities in what came to be called the "archipelago" of campuses that had strong anti-war movements. Papers in the larger cities, meanwhile, whose readership was usually more diffuse, tended to emphasize cultural, personal, and drug-related questions with one degree or another of political news and agitation added in.

Of the latter, the most prominent was the Los Angeles Free Press, which formed the bridge between the bohemian origins of the underground press in the 1950s and the larger phenomenon of the 1960s. The East Village Other, Chicago Seed, San Francisco Oracle, and Milwaukee Kaleidoscope were examples of that development. Examples of the more "political" papers, that is, those that arose more or less sui generis, without being attached to any organization of the Old or New Left, include the Fifth Estate (Detroit), Berkeley Barb, and Connections (Madison).

There were also the papers that were little more than idiosyncratic—in Boston, Mel Lyman's Avatar advanced a kind of Stalinist spiritualism—and there were personal literary productions like Cleveland poet d. a. levy's Buddhist Third-Class Junk Mail Oracle, and Robert Head and Darlene Fife's paper in New Orleans, Nola Express. Others tried to mediate between the political and cultural tendencies, including the Madison edition of Kaleidoscope, Georgia Straight (Vancouver), the Great Speckled Bird (Atlanta), and Open City (Los Angeles).

For most of its years the underground press survived on a combination of unpaid labor, chiliastic energy, psychotropic stimulants, and the certain sense that its journalists were recording the unfolding of a great social movement whose meaning could not be expressed by other journalists working in more established media. By the same token, the underground press collapsed from a combination of physical exhaustion, an ignorance of the skills required to survive over the long haul in the marketplace, and a sense that the historical moment had passed. As later amply documented, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and local "red squads," which had harassed the underground press from its earliest days, hastened and made more complete its precipitous decline.

Only a handful of publications retained their identity as "underground" rather than "alternative" newspapers after the famous convention of the Underground Press Syndicate in 1973 in Boulder at which this symbolic change in appellation was overwhelmingly endorsed by delegates. At that moment, the well-capitalized, profitable, liberal weekly free tabloids that dominate most big-city markets today, the so-called alternative press, appeared.

Illustration from Helix, Seattle, Washington, late 1960s.

By 1997, the alternative press had become big business. New Times, a paper that had started as an anti-war publication in the 1960s on the campus of Arizona State University, had by 1996 swollen into a privately owned chain of papers across the South and Southwest (Miami, Dallas, Houston, Denver, Phoenix) and California (San Francisco and Los Angeles). Firing staff as they bought up older publications, the New Times chain by the mid-1990s had amassed a combined circulation of 700,000 and annual revenues of about $35 million. As the century waned, there was little to distinguish the alternative papers from the paid-circulation daily newspapers in the same cities.

[See also New Left.]

FURTHER READING

- Gitlin, Todd. The Whole World Is Watching. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.
- Lewis, Roger. Outlaws of America: The Underground Press and Its Context; Notes on a Cultural Revolution. London: Pelican, 1972.
- Peck, Abe. Uncovering the Sixties: The Life and Times of the Underground Press. New York: Pantheon, 1985.
- Rips, Geoffrey. "The Campaign against the Underground Press." In The Campaign against the Underground Press, edited by Anne Janowitz and Nancy J. Peters. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1981.
- Wachsberger, Ken, ed. Voices from the Underground: Insider Histories of the Vietnam Era Underground Press. Forewords by William M. Kunstler and Abe Peck. 2 vols. Tempe, Ariz.: Mica Press, 1993.

—DAVE WAGNER

UNEMPLOYED MOVEMENTS, 1930s. "When you looked out on the scene of misery and desperation during the depression," A. J. Muste later recalled of the 1930s, "you saw that it was the radicals, the left-wingers, the people who had adopted some form of Marxian philosophy, who were doing something about the situation, who were banding people together for action, who were putting up a fight." Muste's recollections are borne out by the history of the unemployed movements of the Great Depression era; while many people talked about the problems of the jobless, it was radicals—particularly Communists, Socialists, and Musteites—who actually mobilized the out-of-work for social and political action.

The Communists were the first in the field. Even before the Wall Street crash, American Communists aggressively sought out the jobless on breadlines, outside factory gates, in relief offices, and in working-class neighborhoods. The coming of mass unemployment in 1930 accelerated their efforts and dramatically increased their ability to mobilize discontent into highly visible protests. On 6 March 1930, which the Communists dubbed International Unemployment Day, hundreds of thousands of jobless workers marched through the streets of the nation's major cities. The size of the demonstrations surprised even radicals and awakened many Americans to the existence of mass unemployment and large-scale unrest.

In the summer of 1930, the Communist Party (CP) brought this burgeoning unemployment movement together into a national organization, the Unemployed Councils of the United States of America. Despite the existence of a national office, the Unemployed Councils remained a largely local and decentralized movement rooted in particular local communities. The strength of these councils rested, in fact, on their ability to resolve specific grievances of concern to the jobless in those communities: to force concessions from local relief authorities or to block police from carrying out evictions. Struggles against evictions, for example, mounted as the Depression deepened in 1931 and 1932. When Chicago blacks received eviction notices, "it was not unusual," according to sociologists Horace Cayton and St. Clair Drake, "for a mother to shout to the children, 'Run quick and find the Reds!'"

Emblem of the Workers' Alliance of America, 1930s.

The local, ad hoc character of the Unemployed Councils was both a strength and a weakness. Jobless workers might mobilize around specific grievances or demonstrations but then drift away when the issue was resolved or they returned to work. CP members often dominated the formal membership of the councils and official Party policy sometimes conflicted with the localism and the "bread and butter" focus of the councils. Many jobless workers did not see the reason why councils should participate in demonstrations against the "imperialist war danger" or hold up placards calling for "Defense of the Chinese Soviets" or denouncing the Socialists and Musteites as "social fascists." Ultimately, the CP agreed. In late 1930, it shifted the Unemployed Councils toward more direct work among the unemployed and away from revolutionary sloganeering. Locally, councils would represent the jobless in their dealings with relief authorities; nationally, they would work for federal relief and unemployment insurance.

The primary national activities centered around petition drives for unemployment insurance and two national "hunger marches" in December of 1931 and 1932. Herbert Benjamin, an energetic Communist organizer, became the national leader in 1931 and remained with the unemployed movement for most of the decade. Despite Benjamin's able leadership, the councils remained a largely local movement, particularly before 1933.

While Communist organizers confronted the Depression with aggressive organizing of the jobless, Socialists initially responded with inertia. At the beginning of the 1930s, Socialist activity on behalf of the unemployed emphasized traditional Socialist propagandizing and disdained direct organization of the out of work. Only with the entrance into the Socialist Party (SP) of a newer generation of young (and often college-educated and native-born) members did the Socialists begin to abandon their passive approach to the unemployed question.

Many of these young, activist Socialists also belonged to the League for Industrial Democracy (LID), an SP offshoot. Under LID leadership, the Chicago Workers Committee on Unemployment organized twenty-five thousand jobless in sixty locals by mid-1932. Inspired by this successful model, Baltimore LID members built the People's Unemployment League, which was surprisingly successful at inter-racial organizing given its border state location.

The LID's success as well as the growing power of younger activists within the SP, the fear of Communist domination of the unemployed, and the deteriorating economic situation finally persuaded the SP's national executive committee to endorse direct organization of the jobless in February 1932. Although the SP's national office provided some guidance to party branches interested in organizing the jobless, the success or failure of most efforts (as was true among the Unemployed Councils) rested largely on local initiative. In 1935, however, Socialist activists, under the leadership of David Lasser, launched a national organization of the unemployed—the Workers' Alliance of America.

The LID and Socialist unemployed groups used many of the same techniques as the Communist unemployed councils: acting as grievance representatives at relief stations, fighting evictions, and holding demonstrations and parades to urge higher relief appropriations. In general, however, Socialists tended to use confrontations and disruptions less than Communists. They often tried to intercede with relief authorities to get money for a family threatened with eviction rather than trying to block it bodily. This moderation gave the Socialist groups a certain respectability that the Communists lacked. "We were not a pariah organization," one leader of the Baltimore People's Unemployment League recalled.

The third major radical movement of the unemployed, which was led by the followers of A. J. Muste, differed in organizing methods and constituency from the Communist and Socialist groups. The Musteites were mostly graduates of Brookwood Labor College, where Muste presided in the 1920s, and adherents of the Conference on Progressive Labor Action, which aspired to be an independent working-class movement competitive with both the American Federation of Labor and the traditional left-wing political parties. Carl Braninn, a Musteite and a Seattle labor editor, was one of the founders of the Seattle Unemployed Citizens League (UCL). The UCL began as a "self-help" cooperative, whose members obtained food and fuel through barter and exchange of labor. This "Republic of the Penniless" was typical of the more than 330 self-help groups (with more than 300,000 members) that sprung up among the unemployed, particularly during the worst years of the Depression. It was more unusual in the overtly political turn that it took after self-help proved to be only a very partial solution to the problems of the jobless. It took control of the city's relief apparatus, successfully backed candidates for mayor and county commissioner, blocked evictions, and illegally restored terminated electric and gas services.

The success of the UCL inspired imitation among Musteites in other parts of the country. They began building groups around self-help and then pushing them toward political militancy. With remarkable success, they mobilized the unemployed in the small industrial and mining towns of Ohio, the steel mills of Pittsburgh, the coalfields of eastern Pennsylvania and West Virginia, and the textile mills of North Carolina. The acceptance that the Musteites won outside the primary centers of American radicalism was due, in part, to what they called their "American approach"—their identification of the Unemployed Leagues (as their groups came to be known) with patriotic symbols and slogans. It was equally due to their explicit focus on the immediate and concrete needs of the jobless and their willingness to work with self-help organizations, which other radicals disdained as "collective picking in garbage cans."

But this willingness to embrace self-help and patriotism did not always lead the Unemployed Leagues to an outcome desired by the Musteites. Some groups remained focused solely on their crop picking, and, in the disdainful words of onetime Musteite Louis Budenz, "Potatoes became the opium of the people." At other times, the Musteites' patriotism and seeming conservatism was taken more seriously than they had perhaps intended. At the first national convention of the Leagues in Columbus, Ohio, on 4 July 1933, the Musteites faced a revolt from a "Stars and Stripes" faction, which was unhappy over the mingling of black and white delegates as well as the failure to open the convention with a prayer and the singing of the National Anthem.

The 1933 national convention represented the high point of the Unemployed Leagues, which gradually declined over the next few years because of the changing political climate (particularly the emergence of the New Deal) and the shifting of the interests and energies of the Musteites away from the organizing of the unemployed as they created first the American Workers Party and then (in alliance with the Trotskyists) the Workers Party (WP). These shifts also embroiled the Musteites in a crippling factionalism and sectarianism that alienated many rank-and-file members of the Unemployed Leagues. Nevertheless, the leagues remained an active force in agitating for the needs and rights of the jobless in particular localities. Probably their most notable success came in the 1934 Toledo Auto-Lite strike, where the Lucas County Unemployed Leagues helped win the strike through mass picketing.

The beginning of the New Deal in 1933 and particularly the inauguration of the Works Progress Administration (WPA) in 1935 transformed the climate in which the radical unemployed movements operated. Many jobless workers began to see the federal government (personified by the charismatic figure of Franklin Roosevelt) as their friend and benefactor. But the federal government also became the focus of jobless protests, since it was now the primary source of relief funds and jobs. At the same time that New Deal liberalism and reformism eroded some of the constituency for the unemployed movement, changes within the Left finally made it possible for the three different unemployed groups to unite in a single organization. The rise of fascism in Europe and the emergence of the Popular Front had made Communists much more willing—indeed eager—to unite with the non-Communist Left. At the same time, Trotskyists within the leadership of the WP, which now subsumed the Musteite movement, sought entrance into the SP in line with worldwide Trotskyist policy. Consequently, in April 1936 the Unemployed Leagues and the Unemployed Councils merged with the Workers' Alliance, which was retained as the name of the new national group.

After 1936, the Workers' Alliance focused much of its attention on Washington, where it became a relatively effective lobbying organization for national relief and unemployment insurance measures. Politically, it operated as a kind of left wing of New Deal liberalism and it developed a close relationship with New Deal relief officials. On the local level, the Workers' Alliance served largely as a bargaining agent for relief recipients and WPA workers. Large demonstrations and eviction protests occasionally flared up, but more often the alliance quietly carried out its trade union-like functions. The alliance faded with the coming of the war and the end of mass unemployment.

The legacy of the unemployed movement lies partially in the ways that it concretely improved the lot of the jobless: resolving individual relief grievances, winning high levels of local relief, establishing more equitable and less degrading relief practices, stopping evictions, fighting WPA cuts, limiting the exploitation of WPA workers. More generally, it helped to refute the still prevalent notion that the jobless were "responsible" for their problems and to establish governmental responsibility for relief and unemployment insurance. Perhaps most important, the unemployed movement raised the political and social consciousness of the thousands of workers who passed through its ranks and learned the power of organization as a political and economic weapon. Veterans of the unemployed movement went on to play crucial roles in other political and social struggles, particularly the campaign for industrial unionism in the late 1930s and early 1940s. Although the unemployed movement of the Depression era never attracted more than a minority of the jobless to its banners, it was the most powerful such movement in U.S. history. It serves, moreover, as a significant example of a locally based, grass-roots movement under radical leadership that worked creatively and militantly to meet the concrete, immediate needs of the unemployed.

[See also Communist Party, USA; League for Industrial Democracy; Muste, A. J.; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Leab, Daniel J. " 'United We Eat': The Creation and Organization of the Unemployed Councils in 1930." Labor History 8 (fall 1967).
- Piven, Frances Fox, and Richard A. Cloward. Poor People's Movements. New York: Pantheon, 1977.
- Rosenzweig, Roy. "Radicals and the Jobless: The Musteites and the Unemployed Leagues, 1932-1936." Labor History 16 (winter 1975).
- Rosenzweig, Roy. "Organizing the Unemployed: The Early Years of the Great Depression, 1929-1933." Radical America 10 (July-August 1976).
- Rosenzweig, Roy. "'Socialism in Our Time': The Socialist Party and the Unemployed, 1932-1936." Labor History 20 (fall 1979).

—ROY ROSENZWEIG

UNION OF PUBLIC WORKERS. See Public Sector Unions.

UNION REFORM/LABOR SUPPORT. The aim of varied radicals since the inception of the modern Left—but defined in a bewildering and contradictory number of ways—union reform took on new salience in the post-1960 era of heightened labor bureaucracy and new youthful radical energies. For many among a New Left generation after the decline of the student movement, union reform became a riveting cause; for their successor generations, labor offered one of the few arenas for youthful idealism and an often harsh introduction into the real world.

By 1959, ten years of congressional investigation into labor racketeering brought the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act. Scattered union reformers faced overwhelming official opposition, but a network of activists began to cohere in the publication Union Democracy in Action. While the New Left proper conducted its activities on campus, often contemptuous of labor traditions, small groups of individual younger radicals joined others in mounting challenges among various unions. In 1970 Jock Yablonski's leadership of the Miners for Democracy, and his murder at the hands of henchmen of United Mine Workers leaders, dramatized the changing situation: union democracy had become a life-and-death issue.

Here, the New Left diaspora found amenable currents for significant reform campaigns. Some groups, tied to Marxist-Leninist organizations of older or newer vintage, sought to "colonize" and recruit followers, with little apparent effect. Others published independent local newspapers, sometimes aided by established union reformers, around which they built popular if generally short-lived alliances. Groups of both types tended to dissipate after a few years, but individuals within them, now disaffiliated from any particular radical entity, remained vocal and credible advocates from within union ranks. Labor Notes, a Detroit monthly whose lineal predecessors led mostly back to the 1940s Workers Party, became a forum and loose organizational center for shared labor-reform research and information. Teamsters for a Democratic Union, closely allied with Labor Notes, proved the most popular and the most durable of the nationally organized union caucuses. The United Steelworkers reform campaign led by Edward Sadlowski, although short-lived, galvanized much of this energy.

By the later 1970s, the Community-Labor Energy Coalition, pieced together by Democratic Socialists of America (DSA) labor figures such as International Association of Machinists president William Winpisinger among others, sought to respond to the "energy crisis" by spawning a proliferation of local labor-consumer groups. In many cities, now aging and long disaffiliated former New Leftists around labor (not infrequently business agents for white-collar, service, and health care trades) helped lead the creation of new labor-support entities. Continuing deindustrialization actually heightened assorted efforts at community coalitions, as around Pittsburgh and Youngstown, Ohio. Of local groups with staying power, the Mill Hunk Herald gathering and the Mon Valley Coalition of Pittsburgh-area activists were outstanding, especially in the democratic production of their occasional magazine and in their good-spirited cultural experimentations in blue-collar life generally. In the long run, the lessening of strikes and the increased sense of job insecurity tended to dampen such coalitions, but not before the Solidarity Day March in Washington in 1982 had rallied a half-million union workers and their friends against Reaganomics.

Radicals now renewed a strategy familiar to the pre-1920 socialist movements of passing resolutions—this time against U.S. military involvement in Latin America and especially against the entanglement of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) in that effort. Several major unions (such as the International Association of Machinists, Screen Actors Guild, Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, and American Federation of Government Employees) recorded themselves as being in opposition to the AFL-CIO leadership on such questions. A landmark if only partial victory—support suspended for U.S. policy on Nicaragua in 1987—marked how far labor had come since the nearly solid AFL-CIO official support of the Vietnam engagement less than twenty years earlier.

The collapse of the Kirkland leadership and its replacement by a Left-linked coalition in 1995 was a stunning turnaround. As domestic membership sagged and disappointments loomed everywhere, the leaders of a half-dozen unions made clear that Kirkland's retirement was overdue. This organized opposition, the New Voice slate, grew in substantial part out of a generation of Left-led local efforts. Opponents gathered around Service Employees' president John Sweeney. Ironically, Sweeney's victory would have been impossible without the Teamsters, whose return to the AFL-CIO Kirkland had helped manage, but whose new leader, Ron Carey, was a reformer.

At a generational level, a group of aging Old Left veterans gone Right had been displaced as supporters, advisers, and middle-level functionaries of the labor leadership by middle-aged New Left veterans. During the home stretch of the presidential race, an exasperated Sweeney joined DSA in response to continual and thoroughly unfounded red-baiting by opponents. Some of Kirkland's closest advisers and many of his senior supporters were officials or advisers of Social Democrats, USA or the Jewish Labor Committee, in either case self-avowed "social democrats." Among the new team and its journalistic and academic boosters, membership in DSA was a mark of measured reformed sentiments.

The victory of a Center-Left coalition had one decisive consequence closely related to this shift: the retirement of International Department officials known for their arch anti-Communism and their close collaboration with the Central Intelligence Agency. The appointment of well-known younger Marxists, veterans of the anti-apartheid campaign, and community activists to high office and regional posts further signaled a remarkable change. In yet another historical departure, AFL-CIO officials encouraged and publicly supported in 1997 the formation of a new broad-front political Left support group: Scholars, Artists and Writers for Social Justice.

Despite these many changes, labor's bureaucratic machinery remained largely intact. While exhibiting a certain warmth toward New Party and Labor Party supporters, labor remained wedded to the Democratic Party. Labor radicals gave most of their energy to base-building and networking that might eventually produce a truly reformed labor movement, revitalized from the bottom up.

[See also International Brotherhood of Teamsters.]

FURTHER READING

- Bardacke, Frank. "Watsonville: A Mexican Community on Strike." In Reshaping the U.S. Left: Popular Struggles in the 1980s, edited by Mike Davis and Michael Sprinker. London: Verso, 1988.
- Buhle, Paul. "Lane Kirkland and the New World Order." In From the Knights of Labor to the New World Order: Essays on Labor and Culture. New York: Garland Publishers, 1997.
- Mann, Eric. Taking on General Motors: A Case Study of the UAW

Campaign to Keep GM Van Nuys Open. Los Angeles: UCLA Institute of Industrial Relations, 1988.

Moody, Kim. An Injury to All: The Decline of U.S. Labor. London: Verso, 1988.

—PAUL BUHLE

UNIONS OF THE UNEMPLOYED, 1935-1941.

In response to the economic devastation created by the Great Depression, several unemployed organizations arose in the early 1930s to assert the rights of America's jobless. The Communist-sponsored Unemployed Councils, Musteite Unemployed Leagues, and the Socialist Workers Committee on Unemployment all played a role in this organizational activity, which ended in the merger of the Socialist-dominated Workers' Alliance and the remnants of the Councils in 1936. The enlarged Workers' Alliance of America assumed leadership of the unemployed movement for the remainder of the 1930s.

The Alliance attempted to meet the needs of both relief recipients and jobless unionists, including the burgeoning ranks of workers employed on federal projects by the Works Progress Administration (WPA). The expansion of government employment resulted in a new worker assumption of employee status, which fostered a sense of entitlement to the collective bargaining rights possessed by employed workers. Alliance leaders professed and practiced solidarity among all workers, employed or unemployed.

The acceleration of unemployed activism coincided with the enormous growth of unions stimulated by Section 7A of the National Industrial Recovery Act and the Wagner Act of 1935. With the rise of industrial unionism after 1936, the Workers' Alliance increasingly sought affiliation with the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). The Alliance's affinity toward industrial unionism reflected the crucial role played by early unemployed organizers in the rise of industrial unions. As the shock troops of John L. Lewis's industrial army, these experienced activists often assumed leadership roles in the organization of mass unions such as the United Auto Workers (UAW), the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, and the Steel Workers Organizing Committee.

The CIO displayed an active interest in the unemployed from the outset of its own organization. This concern deepened with the onset of the recession of 1937-1938. Declaring that "every worker has the right to a job," the CIO demanded that the WPA, the Public Works Administration, and other government agencies absorb all surplus labor. As a follow-up, CIO leaders in November 1937 began to develop a coherent policy on union service to the unemployed.

In so doing, Lewis and John Brophy followed a trail blazed by the UAW, which in 1937 had established a Welfare Department committed to serving its unemployed members and thus retaining them within the union. In 1938 the UAW moved to expand this concept by organizing all workers employed by the WPA. So powerful did the union become in Wayne County, Michigan, that for some time it assumed responsibility for certification of the union unemployed for relief purposes. UAW organizers worked tirelessly to inculcate the spirit of unionism among unemployed workers, many of whom were crucial in the organization of Ford, the last holdout against the UAW in Michigan. At the national level, the CIO moved to institutionalize the UAW model by creating an Unemployment Committee and instructing Internationals to assume responsibility for organizing and serving their unemployed members. Left with a contracting organizational base in 1938, the Workers' Alliance came increasingly to represent relief recipients and those outside the house of industrial unionism. In 1938 this reality led the Alliance to pursue merger with the CIO, but Lewis, fearful of the unemployed organization's increasingly leftist image, held David Lasser, Herbert Benjamin, and the Workers' Alliance at arm's length.

Challenged by CIO activism, the Workers' Alliance struggled for life after 1938. However, pressures from congressional red-baiters, reduced funding for the WPA, competition from CIO unions, and the gradual improvement of an economy stimulated by defense expenditures doomed the Alliance as a mass organization. Because of their greater resources, the CIO Unemployment Committee and the UAW Welfare Department survived into 1941. By this time, they had become the voice of the "unemployables" whose needs remained unmet on the verge of American entry into World War II.

Despite its short duration, the union-based unemployed movement had played an important role in the development of industrial unionism. By promoting solidarity among jobless and employed workers, CIO unions such as the UAW had been able to discourage the exploitation of the unemployed as scab labor. Moreover, in some instances, the WPA projects and Welfare Committees had become a training ground for the union leadership of the future. For a brief moment, a broadened concept of the union as social family seemed to hold potential as a vehicle for mass organization. In American capitalism's darkest hour, the army of the unemployed had become a union force.

FURTHER READING

- Lorence, James J. "Controlling the Reserve Army: The United Auto Workers and Michigan's Unemployed, 1935–1941." Labor's Heritage 5 (spring 1994).
- Piven, Frances Fox, and Richard A. Cloward. Poor People's Movements. New York: Pantheon, 1977.
- Rosenzweig, Roy. "Socialism in Our Time: The Socialist Party and the Unemployed, 1932–1936." Labor History 20 (fall 1979).
- Sargent, James E. "Woodrum's Economy Bloc: The Attack on Roosevelt's WPAs." Virginia Magazine 93 (April 1985).
- Sullivan, Martin Edward. "On the Dole: The Relief Crisis in Detroit, 1929–1939." Ph.D. diss., University of Notre Dame, 1974.

—JAMES J. LORENCE

UNION-SPONSORED RADICAL FILMS.

Immediately following World War II, radicals attempted to revive the ambience of the New Deal coalition by making films with and for industrial unions. One of the most important collectives was Union Films, which produced a series of films in cooperation with the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) for distribution throughout the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). Carl Marzani, who had joined the Communist Party shortly after fighting in the Spanish Civil War and had been a section organizer until his resignation from the Party in 1942, was the major figure in Union Films. His goal was to create a network of union-hall film centers, a library of working-class films, a book club, and a slick labor magazine on the model of Life.

The working-class cultural offensive envisioned by Marzani was to be truncated by Cold War politics, but between 1946 and 1950 Union Films produced seven black-and-white documentaries: Deadline for Action (1946, 40 min.), The Great Swindle (1949, 22 min.), Industry's Disinherited (1949, 21 min.), Our Union (1949, 22 min.), Men against Money (1949, 25 min.), The Fishermen (1950, 20 min.), and Solidarity (1950, 11 min.). Marzani scripted/directed most of these, including Deadline and Swindle. Deadline was the first American film to place major responsibility for the Cold War on the United States, while Swindle explained the relationship between wages, prices, profits, and monopoly control of key sectors of the American economy. One animated sequence in Swindle depicted capitalism as a world-devouring octopus, and as in all Union Film productions the representatives of capital were treated in a rude and negative manner reminiscent of images popularized by the Industrial Workers of the World. Our Union and Solidarity attacked the Taft-Hartley Act, Men dealt with a UE strike in Lynn, Massachusetts, Industry's Disinherited probed the problems of aging workers, and The Fishermen showed how antitrust laws were used to attack the International Fishermen's Union.

Deadline for Action won the approval of Philip Murray and Alex Kroll of the CIO and got a tremendous sendoff in CIO News. Thereafter, as the CIO began to swing to the right, most of the films were shown only by expelled left-wing unions. Marzani was jailed for political activity for approximately a year beginning in March 1949. During his absence, the city of New York harassed Union Films with zoning violation fines and other restrictions. Under such pressures and the accelerating assault upon the UE itself, Union Films folded.

After emerging from prison, Marzani persisted in trying to implement his larger vision. He worked on publications for the UE and was editor of UE Steward, a leadership magazine, until 1954. At that time he established the Liberty Book Club with Angus Cameron, a radical editor previously employed by major publishers. One of the first books released was Labor's Untold Story, published for the UE and reflecting its views. The Liberty Book Club offered members eight books for a ten-dollar yearly membership. The venture's name eventually changed to Cameron Associates and when Cameron left became Marzani and Munsell. The various imprints produced the first book on the Rosenberg case, the first exposé of informers for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and one of the first books on armed black resistance in the civil rights movement. The ventures also published novels and other writing by Ring Lardner, Jr., Alvah Bessie, Abe Polonsky, and Albert Maltz. Five or more pamphlets a year were published and addressed issues such as the Bay of Pigs, the war in Vietnam, and the Warren Commission Report. Publishing activities ended in 1969, when a fire destroyed the Marzani and Munsell offices, which housed all the company's books, mailing lists, and records. The publishers had not been able to secure insurance.

A revival of the filmmaking tradition Marzani hoped to bring to a mass audience occurred in the early 1950s when Salt of the Earth was filmed with the cooperation of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. Based on a 1951–1952 strike by predominantly Mexican American zinc miners in Silver City, New Mexico, the film used the actual strikers for virtually every leading role. The major exception was Rosaura Revueltas, a Mexican film star who played the female lead. Professional actors such as Will Geer played supporting roles depicting management and the police. The filmmakers—director Herbert Biberman, writer Michael Wilson, producer Paul Jarrico, and less well known technicians—were on the Hollywood blacklist. They have since stated that Salt of the Earth was the kind of film they would have made in Hollywood, had they been allowed to express their political views.

No American film has ever faced the harassment endured by Salt of the Earth. Vigilante groups shot into the cars of the filmmakers and beat up some of the crew, and Revueltas was intimidated by immigration officials, who ultimately deported her as an illegal alien before the film was completed. Congressman Don Jackson (California) and Hearst columnist Victor Riesel charged the film was just a cover so that “Communists” could get near the atomic testing grounds at Los Alamos. Various film processors and technicians refused to work on the film, and when the film was finally ready for distribution, numerous groups and individuals emerged to accuse anyone who wished to see or screen the film of being a Communist or a Communist dupe. Roy Brewer, the anticommunist head of the American Federation of Labor's Hollywood Film Council, pledged that projectionists and other professionals who were members of his union would not show the film and would do anything in their power to keep it off the screen. The American Legion undertook a campaign that was directly responsible for the film being kept out of several locations. Pickets and agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation were present at the few sites where the film got a showing.

Given such an environment it is amazing that the film was completed and that it managed to get sporadic screenings in ten cities. The net result of the persecution, of course, was that the film was a financial loss and the chance for further radical feature filmmaking had been killed in the cradle. The film, however, was to prove remarkably viable. Sixteen-millimeter prints were made and Salt of the Earth began to acquire legendary stature. In the late 1960s the New Left filmmakers claimed Salt as part of their patrimony and activists began to screen it. During the 1970s, the film moved more solidly into the educational film market, being shown in filmmaking classes, history classes, and contexts in which the blacklist period was being examined. Books began to appear on how the film was made and in 1984 the film A Crime to Fit the Punishment examined the making, suppression, and impact of Salt of the Earth. By decade's end, the film was recognized as one of the finest radical films ever made in the United States and a film honored by nonpolitical as well as political critics.

The basis of Salt of the Earth's fame lies exactly in its political sensibilities. The most obvious level of the film is that of the conflict between the Mine-Mill trade unionists and a sheriff totally under the control of the company. Naïve critics thought the film simplistic in its portrayals. If anything, the film was relatively mild in depicting a decades-old struggle in which company lawlessness was the rule. What stands out even more strongly than the class struggles are related themes of sexual and ethnic repression. The striking miners are forced to deal with their own oppression of their wives in order to win the strike, and the strike leader is the worst culprit. This intraclass struggle along a sexual dynamic would have considerable poignancy for post-1960s radicals facing sexism as a major political issue. That the miners were mainly Mexican Americans underscored a basic reality about the West not visible in most Hollywood films. Another layer of ethnic reality is provided by the circumstance that both the union organizer who counsels the miners and the sheriff who leads the fight against them are Anglos.

The filmmakers have written that they had to reshape their original concept for a labor film and had to rewrite many scenes in order to satisfy the objectives of the miners with whom they were working. Even with their anemic budget and the constant harassment, the filmmakers were able to bring sophisticated cinematic techniques to a story taken directly from life and filmed on real-life scenes of battle. In that sense Salt of the Earth realized to a large degree the ambition voiced by radicals since at least the time of the Film and Photo League to make films for, by, and with the working class.

The financial and political debacle that immediately accompanied the release of Salt of the Earth discouraged any further union ventures into radical filmmaking. A full ten years would pass before there was any effort in the direction indicated by the UE and Mine-Mill projects. This new initiative, The Inheritance (1964), was undertaken by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers on the occasion of the union's fiftieth anniversary. Composed mainly of old newsreels and still photos, The Inheritance traces the history of labor from 1900 through to the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, March on Washington, with the history of the Amalgamated as a unifying core. The film's tone is set by its opening lines: "Today is born of yesterday. And there is no birth without pain." Class conflict is underlined by scenes of bloody encounters between police and workers. These include newsreel segments showing the on-camera murder of Communist pickets in a steel strike and the carnage at the Memorial Day Massacre in Chicago. The film also includes clips of Norman Thomas and other leftists, although they are not usually identified by name. Capitalist values are ridiculed by clever and often humorous editing. Partly due to the need to reach the increasing number of black and Hispanic workers in the industry the Amalgamated represents, racism is addressed in no uncertain terms. The film is far more timid ideologically. The socialist aspects of the Amalgamated's history are downplayed and there is no rendering of Sidney Hillman's complex relationship with the Communist, Socialist, and American Labor parties.

The power of The Inheritance derives from its graphic and unequivocal support of rank-and-file militancy and its dramatic assertion that for the immigrant worker, the United States was "half-nightmare/half-dream." Original music for the film was created by George Kleinsinger and contains a chorus repeated several times: "Freedom doesn't come like a bird on a wing./ Doesn't come like the summer's rain./ Freedom, freedom is a hard won thing and/ Every generation has to win it again." Other labor oriented songs feature Pete Seeger, Judy Collins, Tom Paxton, the Almanac Singers, and other musicians associated with left-wing causes. The film has a narration by Hollywood actor Robert Ryan written by Millard Lampell, who was on the Hollywood blacklist. Lampell had been writing scripts under assumed names and had had television scripts produced through the kind of process satirized in Woody Allen's The Front. His official rehabilitation came in 1965, when he won an Emmy Award for the television drama Eagle in a Cage.

Despite the film's radical subtext and its use of blacklisted talent, The Inheritance received good reviews in the conventional press. Finding wide acceptance among labor educators as well, the film was soon established as a classic of its kind. The Inheritance also won cinematic awards, including first prize at the prestigious Mannheim Festival in Germany. The Amalgamated, however, did not undertake new projects of like nature and no other union came forward to follow its lead. Unions generally settled for films that lauded their own organization or that could be used for technical training.

When a new generation of radical filmmakers began to emerge in the 1970s, labor unions were not prepared to risk their respectability through direct sponsorship. They increasingly thought it safer economically and politically simply to give grants to filmmakers who had raised funds from other sources as well. The most noteworthy undertaking of this sort was funding by the United Mine Workers toward the costs of Harlan County, USA (1976), a film that won an Academy Award in the category of feature documentary and had a modest theatrical release. The film's radical tone was due more to the bitter class relationships depicted on the screen rather than to ideological commentary inserted by the filmmaker. This stemmed from director Barbara Kopple's belief that the filmmaker should avoid being an invisible all-knowing off-camera voice and simply allow the participants in a struggle to speak for themselves. Trade unions were also willing to use some specifically radical films such as Union Maids (1976), With Babies and Banners (1978), and The Wobblies (1981) in educational programs, but most remained reluctant to show or financially contribute to films in which Communists were openly depicted in a positive manner. The willingness of trade unions to use radical films in their educational work accelerated throughout the 1990s. Even Salt of the Earth gained belated inclusion on lists of films recommended by unions.

[See also Hollywood Blacklist; Newsreel and Post-New Left Radical Filmmaking; Radical Filmmaking, 1930s.]

FURTHER READING

- Biberman, Herbert. Salt of the Earth: The Story of a Film. New York: Zoetrope-Beacon Press, 1987.
- The Cinema Guild Film and Video Catalog*, 1988. Notes on Union Films handled by Cinema Guild.
- Crowdus, Gary, and Lenny Rubenstein. "Union Films: An Interview with Carl Marzani." Cineaste 7, no. 2 (1976).
- Miller, Tom. "Salt of the Earth Revisited." Cineaste 13, no. 3 (1984).
- Navasky, Victor. Naming Names. New York: Viking Press, 1980.
- Wilson, Michael. Salt of the Earth. Old Westbury, N.Y.: Feminist Press, 1978.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY. During the first four decades of the twentieth century, New York's Union Square district became both a center and a symbol of American radicalism. Bounded at the north and south by Seventeenth and Fourteenth Streets, to the east and west by Broadway and Fourth Avenue, the neighborhood offered low rents, inexpensive commerce (street vendors and later Klein's and Ohrbach's discount stores), and entertainment (turn-of-the-century nickelodeons, followed by burlesques and taxi-dance halls), which attracted the immigrant population from the Lower East Side along with artists and writers from Greenwich Village—many of whom contributed to the radical character of the neighborhood by making the working or protesting crowds assembled there the subject of writings and paintings.

A fashionable district in the nineteenth century—home of the original Brentano's bookstore, Tiffany's jewelry store, and the first Academy of Music—the neighborhood changed dramatically as expensive commerce and entertainment moved north. From 1900 to approximately 1920, former residences became sweatshops for the garment industry. The tree-lined Union Square Park, once a private retreat for the well-to-do, served as a contested gathering place and protest center for anarchists, socialists, and members of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). These groups rallied at annual May Day events and frequent Saturday afternoon meetings. Around Union Square, IWW members gained recruits from among the unemployed and itinerant workers who walked north by day from the Bowery's cheap lodgings to congregate in the park. In an ongoing struggle to use the streets and the park to organize for free speech, they often fought against repressive police measures that produced violent responses. At the height of the 1914–1915 economic crisis, the New York press accused the IWW of inciting "the worst elements of the city to plunder" and praised the police, who routinely broke up meetings by clubbing the participants. Only when the Free Speech League denounced police terror did city authorities finally grant the IWW permission to use Union Square for its meetings.

Following a period of relative calm after World War I, with the increasingly tense national and international political climate of the late 1920s, protesters renewed May Day activities, unemployment demonstrations, and protests against police brutality. Conflict resulting from the August 1927 execution of Sacco and Vanzetti began when police injured several of the five thousand sympathizers who had gathered in the park for an all-night vigil. In 1929, five thousand Communists staged the first May Day rally in Union Square since 1916. Eighteen days later, when three hundred Communist Party members displayed a sign from the windows of the Party headquarters reading "Down with Walker's Police Brutality," police entered the building without a warrant, arresting twenty-seven demonstrators, including nine children. The largest (35,000) and most violent unemployment demonstration erupted on 30 March 1930. By the end of the day, a hundred were injured and news accounts across the political spectrum condemned the zealotry with which plainclothes police "pummeled" the victims with their nightsticks.

Such violence galvanized the public against police interference, and city officials once again guaranteed the right to free assembly in Union Square. Though May Day rallies grew substantially in numbers throughout the Depression, they remained peaceful, and continued to reflect the changing political climate. The year 1935 was the last in which Socialists and Communists marched in separate parades; 1936 brought a united demonstration against the threat of fascism—the "quietest parade in years," leading police to set aside their nightsticks. The 1937 parade stressed aid to Spain as its theme.

During the years of greatest political agitation in the early 1930s, many radical organizations achieved high visibility around Union Square. From 1928 until 1930 the block of buildings from 24 to 30 Union Square East housed the offices of the Communist Party; the Daily Worker; the Polish, Jewish, and Hungarian dailies; the Workers' Bookstore and School; the Young Communist League of America; and the Co-operative Cafeteria, where Communist organizers gathered. The New Masses was located across the square at 39 Union Square West, while the John Reed Club made frequent moves throughout the decade: from 65 West Fifteenth Street in the early 1930s to 131 West Fourteenth Street by the mid-1930s. The Debs auditorium, site of frequent Socialist meetings, lay just off the square at 5 East Fourteenth Street.

Regular Union Square protests, initiated by numerous radical organizations, assumed many forms—from huge May Day celebrations to labor pickets of stores failing to unionize, to talks by lonely soapbox orators whose right to free speech made chroniclers equate Union Square with London's Hyde Park. May Day parades at Union Square peaked in the 1930s, although they have continued sporadically with smaller attendance. While leftist artists like William Gropper drew Union Square rallies in cartoons for the New Masses, most mainstream artists avoided depicting protests. Members of the Fourteenth Street School of artists—Kenneth Miller, Reginald Marsh, Isabel Bishop, and Raphael Soyer—painted neighborhood shopping crowds, working women, and unemployed men in ways that expressed a sympathetic awareness of lower-class life. But as leftist artist Philip Evergood pointed out, Marsh painted "classical" bums in acceptable picturesque scenes, as opposed to Evergood's own bands of angry unemployed men. Albert Halper's 1933 Literary Guild novel Union Square drew criticism from leftist writers for failing to outline a program for social change.

Even as Union Square gained acceptance as a center for radicalism, municipal leaders and local store owners, concerned about the effects of demonstrations on business, sponsored patriotic events and organizations designed to rid Union Square of its Communist reputation and "cleanse its atmosphere." The Veterans of Foreign Wars were permitted to hold annual May Day activities immediately after Communist rallies. In April 1932, local businesses staged an elaborate Union Square Centennial featuring a civic pageant with colonial costumes and an Americanization meeting. In his letter of support for the event, President Herbert Hoover praised the neighborhood as a center of "industry, finance, and commerce." Noticeably absent was any mention of the park as a center of free speech, assembly, and the fight for social betterment, which decades of radical voices had struggled to achieve.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Lower East Side, New York City; May Day.]

FURTHER READING

Photographic Views of New York. New York Public Library. Microfiche Collection.

Todd, Ellen Wiley. The "New Woman" Revised: Painting and Gender Politics on Fourteenth Street. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Union Square/Fourteenth Street Archives. Museum of the City of New York.

The WPA Guide to New York City: The Federal Writers' Project Guide to 1930s New York (1939). New York: Pantheon Books, 1982.

—ELLEN WILEY TODD

UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS. Until the period of the Cold War, the history of autoworkers and their unions was interwoven with the history of the American Left. Even though Socialists, Communists, members of the Industrial Workers of the World, and other radicals constituted only a tiny minority of autoworkers at any time, the Left exercised considerable influence in the industry and was involved in nearly every organizing and strike effort in the pre-union period and in many of the key struggles in the early years of the United Automobile Workers Union (UAW).

Though the American Federation of Labor (AFL) chartered the International Union of Carriage and Wagon Workers in 1891, it never seriously attempted to organize the autoworkers and even expelled the Union of Carriage and Wagon Workers in 1918 after it added "automobile" to its name and began organizing autoworkers on an industrial basis. The seeds of unionism in the auto industry were sown first by Wobblies, Socialists, and Communists. The Industrial Workers of the World, which had several hundred Detroit autoworkers as members before World War I, helped lead the first organized strike by autoworkers, a week-long walkout by six thousand Studebaker workers in 1913 that may have contributed to Ford's decision to initiate the "five-dollar day."

After World War I, William Logan and other socialists led the Carriage, Wagon, and Automobile Workers Union. Largely due to the labor shortage after the war, the Auto Workers Union briefly enjoyed a membership of forty thousand and led several strikes in body shops. The Auto Workers Union remained the only union in the industry through the early 1930s, and though its membership never exceeded three thousand, it laid the groundwork for the successful organization of the industry by introducing the idea of industrial unionism to thousands of workers, including many of those who later organized the UAW.

Illustration by William Sanderson, 1937.

In 1926 Communist autoworkers won the leadership of the Auto Workers Union, and they eventually affiliated the union with the Trade Union Unity League. Under the leadership of Communists Phil Raymond and William Goetz, the union held shopgate meetings and circulated a regular newspaper that exposed conditions in the plants, and promoted the idea of industrial unionism and the need to unite all workers regardless of skill, race, age, or sex. The union also aided scores of spontaneous strikes, including the most important strike in the pre-UAW period—the strike of some twelve thousand Briggs Manufacturing workers against wage cuts in early 1933.

In the first years of the Depression, the campaigns for relief and against evictions of the Communist-initiated Unemployed Councils gave many autoworkers their first sense of organization and collective struggle. On 6 March 1930, a Communist-sponsored unemployment demonstration brought more than fifty thousand people into the streets of Detroit and thousands into the streets of such other auto centers as Toledo, Flint, and Pontiac. On 7 March 1932, in what became known as the Ford Massacre, Ford private guards and police fired upon a Communist-led Hunger March outside the Ford plant and killed four workers and wounded fifty others.

The Communists and their progressive allies made their most important contribution to the creation of the UAW in the years between 1933 and 1941. After the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act and the AFL's start of an organizing drive in the auto industry in 1933, the Communists and their allies in Detroit, Cleveland, and Toledo organized the AFL's most successful federal labor unions and spearheaded a rank-and-file movement among autoworkers that eventually forced the AFL to charter the UAW in 1935. The leader of the rank-and-file movement and vice president of the new UAW was Wyndham Mortimer, the organizer of the White Motor local in Cleveland. Outside the AFL, Communists and other leftists organized thousands of tool and die makers, most of whom merged with the newly formed UAW.

The key turning point in the establishment of the UAW as well as the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) generally was the victory of the UAW in the forty-four-day sit-down strike against General Motors in 1936–1937. While many factors produced this victory, not the least was a united front that joined in common struggle a variety of leftists and nonleftists, including Genora Johnson, leader of the Women's Emergency Brigade, the conservative Socialist and CIO representative Adolph Germer, and the socialist Reuther brothers. Key credit, however, must go to the Communists and their supporters. They provided the strategic and ideological direction by their insistence that successful organization required the unity of all workers, an industrial form of organization, and bold strike action, and they provided leaders at every front of the struggle—the early organizational work and strategic planning of Mortimer and Robert Travis, the publicity work of Henry Kraus, the legal help of Lee Pressman and Maurice Sugar, the shop leadership of Walter Moore and Bud Simon, and organization of the strike kitchen by Dorothy Kraus and Margaret Anderson.

While the UAW soon succeeded in organizing most of the industry, except for Ford, the unity that had prevailed during the General Motors sit-down strike quickly dissolved into bitter factional fights. At the center of this fight was a struggle between the union's president, Homer Martin—who had surrounded himself with members of a small group called the Communist Party Opposition—and Wyndham Mortimer and the Communists. This fight lasted until 1939, when Martin was defeated, and the non-political R. J. Thomas was elected president.

Though these factional fights as well as the general growth of the union diluted the influence of the Left in the UAW, individual leftists nonetheless still played important roles in the organization of such shops as Ford, Allis-Chalmers, Vultee, and North American. At Ford in particular, the National Negro Congress and the fraternal organizations connected with the Communist Party played a crucial role in penetrating the Ford terror to recruit union members among the largely black and eastern European work force.

Even though Communist membership in the auto industry peaked during the years of World War II, its influence in the union declined. During the so-called national defense period, several leading left-wingers, including Mortimer, were dismissed for leading strikes in defense industries. During the war itself, the Communists' support for the war blended with that of the mainstream leaders of the UAW and CIO. As inflation and the workers' unresolved grievances increased, the Workers Party—a small Trotskyist group that opposed the union's wartime no-strike pledge—enjoyed a brief popularity among many autoworkers.

After the war, the Left in the UAW was the first to experience the devastation of the Cold War. In 1946 Walter Reuther fashioned a Center-Right coalition that defeated the Left-Center coalition that had led the union since 1939. Aided by congressional investigations and a media Red Scare, Reuther drove Communists and other leftists from the UAW and became the first CIO leader to comply with the anticommunist affidavit provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

While the organized Left virtually disappeared in the union during Reuther's reign, echoes of the radical origins of the union could nonetheless be discerned in the collective bargaining breakthroughs that the UAW made in the 1950s and 1960s, in the union's support for civil rights legislation, and in its opposition to the war in Vietnam. Echoes of the early radicalism could also be heard in the voices of black autoworkers, who fought for better treatment and a greater voice through such groups as the Dodge Revolutionary Union Movement in the late 1960s and early 1970s and in the rank-and-file protests against bargaining concessions and worker-management cooperation schemes in the 1980s and 1990s.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Johnson Dollinger, Genora; League of Revolutionary Black Workers; Sugar, Maurice; Trade Union Unity League; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Keeran, Roger. The Communist Party and the Auto Workers Unions. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1980.
- Kraus, Henry. The Many and the Few. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1985.

Mortimer, Wyndham. Organize! My Life as a Union Man. Boston: Beacon Paperback, 1972.

Peterson, Joyce Shaw. American Automobile Workers, 1900-1933. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1987.

—ROGER KEERAN

UNITED BREWERY WORKERS. Practitioners of an ancient craft, brewery workers of the nineteenth-century United States were largely skilled immigrants from central Europe and England (or Ireland, by way of England). Members of the earliest industrial union outside extractive labor, they epitomized the rise and fall of Germanic influences upon American socialism.

Between the mid-nineteenth century and 1900, brewing was rapidly transformed from an old-fashioned craft to highly mechanized, modern factory work. As befits their central European and artisanal origins, the first brewery workers' organizations in the United States were mutual benefit associations, which counted both employers and workers among their members. Sustained unionization was slow and difficult given the small, isolated character of workers in the lesser breweries as well as the united resistance of the emerging large-scale manufacturers. The formation of the National Union of Brewery Workers (NUBW) in 1886, and the designation of the New Yorker Volkszeitung as the union's official organ, placed brewery workers squarely in the middle of the socialist labor movement.

With an almost entirely German-speaking membership up to the mid-1890s, the NUBW was steeped in the ethnic socialist culture, close to the motherland in spirit and style. Especially in New York and Chicago, where the largest locals were situated, the leaders (who also made up the union's national executive board) remained committed socialists. The union's own newspaper, the Brauer Zeitung (Brewers Journal), endorsed socialist candidates and reported socialist progress in Europe. Within the Socialist Labor Party and later the Socialist Party, leaders saw political education as central to their mission—a cause especially promoted with the founding of the Brauer Zeitung in 1887. The union was active in socialist municipal election campaigns in New York and Milwaukee and supported the convicted Haymarket anarchists in Chicago. In contrast to most American Federation of Labor (AFL) unions, it opposed anti-

Chinese legislation on the West Coast and tried to organize black brewery workers and beer drivers into unions.

From its beginnings, the union was open to any workers in North American breweries, regardless of task, training, or background. The union thus became one of the earliest and most viable industrial unions in the United States. At the same time, the brewery workers' union also remained faithful to tenets of traditional artisanal labor relations: early contracts negotiated by many locals emphasized the craft status of workers and the hierarchy of apprentices and journeymen. The organization of brewery workers into different craft locals (brewers, maltsters, bottlers, etc.) also underlined the craft character of the union.

While the brewery workers' union was not without internal conflicts, many of the problems the union encountered were over jurisdictional conflicts with other unions. Many of these confrontations had political undertones. Usually the NUBW represented the more radical socialist German American groups while other groups, such as the Knights of Labor affiliates in the 1880s and 1890s and craft unions later on, were politically more conservative (and English-speaking). In 1907 a long-simmering dispute with the AFL over the affiliation of firemen and engineers led to a one-year expulsion of the NUBW by the federation. This action had a radicalizing effect on some brewery workers' locals that also had a primary affiliation with the American Labor Union and wanted to affiliate with the emerging Industrial Workers of the World. One of the leading dissenters, William Trautmann, a former editor of the Brauer Zeitung, did indeed defect and became secretary-treasurer (1905-1908) and then general organizer (1908-1913) of the Industrial Workers of the World. But Trautmann remained the exception, and much of the rank and file of the brewery workers' union as well as its leaders remained faithful to the AFL and reentered the federation in 1908. Despite this conflict, for most of its pre-World War I history the brewery workers' organization demonstrated in an exemplary way how the pragmatic unionism of the AFL could well be combined with socialist politics.

Two almost concurrent developments brought the history of the brewery workers as a German American socialist organization to an end: World War I and the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment. The losing battle against Prohibition took up much of the union's resources after about 1910. The outbreak of World War I, and the hostility against Germans, German Americans, and socialists which followed, eliminated the cultural basis for the organization. Although the union survived Prohibition as the International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America and reconstituted itself as part of the brewing industry in 1933, it never reached its former importance and finally merged with the Teamsters in 1972.

[See also Lore, Ludwig.]

FURTHER READING

Laslett, John H. M. Labor and the Left: A Study of Marxist and Socialist Influences in the American Labor Movement, 1881-1924. New York: Basic Books, 1970.

Schlueter, Herrmann. The Brewing Industry and the Brewery Workers' Movement in America. Cincinnati: International Union of United Brewery Workmen of America, 1910.

Schneider, Dorothee. Trade Unions and Community: The German Working Class of New York City, 1870-1900. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1994.

—DOROTHEE SCHNEIDER and PAUL BUHLE

UNITED ELECTRICAL, RADIO AND MACHINE WORKERS OF AMERICA.

Chartered by the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) in 1935-1936, the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) formed as a merger of three distinct union organizations, bringing together workers concentrated in General Electric (GE), Westinghouse, Radio Corporation of America, Philco, and Delco manufacturing plants. GE workers in particular had a rich history of union organization and contact with the Left. In Schenectady, where thousands worked, machinists had led GE operatives in 1918-1919 strikes and given political support for the municipal socialist government. There and elsewhere, industrial union ideas survived conservative times chiefly through members of radical, often foreign-language Left groups. By the mid-1930s, Al Coultard, a veteran socialist and skilled worker, headed the union in Lynn, Massachusetts. Julius Empsak, a toolmaker and college graduate, became the key strategist. Progressives and Communists cooperated widely in organizing drives on GE and Westinghouse.

A second branch of the UE, machinist locals formerly in the Metalworkers Industrial Union (affiliated with the Trade Union Unity League) and later in the machinists union, was led into the UE by radical James Matles. The third branch, a largely young, female work force at radio and home-appliance shops, had little experience in unionism or radicalism. Temporarily an American Federation of Labor "federal labor union," the radio workers later abandoned an inequitable arrangement within the largely male, craft-oriented International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and joined pragmatically with the emerging UE. James Carey, their leader, was a Catholic anti-communist. To assure unity, the merger made Carey president of the new union, Empsak the secretary-treasurer, and Matles the director of organization.

From the beginning, Left individuals and ethnic groups played a major role in the UE, quickly one of the "big three" CIO unions. Italians and, especially, Hungarian workers lent their support to progressive leaders. Aggressive efforts to organize women, who made up a large portion of the electrical union, brought successful, militant unionism and an egalitarian approach toward more equalized wage structures (between men and women, but also between employed and unemployed union members), ideas hitherto unknown in mainstream American unionism.

Already by 1940, factional unrest stirred the union. Avowed anticommunists, led by charismatic Father Owen Rice, launched a public attack on the leadership of a Pittsburgh Westinghouse local. At the national level, union leadership was also contested. A. J. Fitzgerald, the young, newly elected president of Lynn GE Local 201, defeated James Carey for the presidency of the UE. Carey, who went on to become secretary-treasurer of the CIO, used his new position in assaulting alleged Communist domination. This dispute, and the formation of hostile "rank and file" and "progressive" caucuses in the same Pittsburgh plant, foreshadowed the eventual split in the union.

The end of the war brought the first national strike against GE and Westinghouse, in 1946. The union reached a peak membership of approximately 650,000. Successful in its industrial struggle, the UE unwittingly evoked a new strategy from GE in particular, the call for separation of union membership from its leaders. Throughout the late 1940s, major U.S. publications such as the Saturday Evening Post, American Mercury, and Look "exposed" the dangers of "red" leadership in East Pittsburgh, and the House Un-American Activities Committee held hearings on supposed Communist infiltration just as union elections approached. Federal Bureau of Investigation informants "surfaced" to add more scandal.

The announced 1949 expulsion of the UE from the CIO, and the formation of a competing International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers (IUE) under James Carey, partly accomplished the companies' goal. The UE had flatly refused to comply with the Taft-Hartley Act, until forced by law to do so, further refused to fire staff and officers due to political beliefs, and attacked the Cold War by supporting Henry Wallace's 1948 Progressive Party campaign. The IUE, with the support of public officials up to President Truman, appealed to nativism, religious fears, and defense-industry self-interest.

Withdrawing from the CIO before its expulsion, the UE gradually lost members until reaching a low of 100,000 in the mid-1960s, when raiding ceased, and eighty thousand after multiple plant shutdowns in the 1970s–1980s. Nevertheless, the UE remained a moral beacon of the union movement, its UE News (long featuring cartoonist Fred Wright, and in recent years Gary Huck) the most progressive major union newspaper. The UE assumed new significance during the 1960s, as one of the few unions to support the anti-war movement; it prepared the way for a number of unions to oppose U.S. engagement in Central America in the 1980s. In the 1990s, the UE reached down into its roots and developed two innovative strategies. On the one hand, the UE aggressively pursued a community-based organizing strategy. In some respects this organizing approach extended the experiences of the original organizing drives of the CIO, which were often based on strong community support. The UE established strong links with community organizations, and working with them identified potential organizing targets and contacts.

The UE extended the strategy of building organizing drives with community support to include efforts to achieve recognition without recourse to the National Labor Relations Board. With the help of community organizations, churches, and respected neutrals, the union held representation elections and sought to encourage firms to recognize the union based on this show of support. Likewise, the strategy of community-based organization included successful campaigns to win first contracts. In all cases, the community was brought in as an early partner, not as an afterthought.

The UE also became instrumental in new efforts to forge links with workers in Mexico. Working in cooperation with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and with the Frente Autentico Trabajo (FAT, Authentic Labor Front), the UE sought to organize runaway shops located along the U.S.-Mexican border. In its relations with FAT, the UE sought to build bridges between Mexican and U.S. workers and offer direct material support to FAT organizing efforts. Through direct action the UE demonstrated the possibilities for cross-border organizing and mutual cooperation.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Hungarian Americans; Taft-Hartley Loyalty Oath.]

FURTHER READING

- Emspak, Frank. "The Break-Up of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), 1945–1950." Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, 1972.
- Matles, James, and James Higgins. Them and Us: Struggle of a Rank-and-File Union. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1974.
- Schatz, Ronald W. The Electrical Workers: A History of Labor at General Electric and Westinghouse, 1923–1960. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1983.

—FRANK EMLPAK

UNITED FARM EQUIPMENT AND METAL WORKERS. Originally an offshoot of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), the United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers Union (FE) was the first union to organize the International Harvester Corporation and secured recognition at Harvester's Tractor Works plant in Chicago in 1938. The union brought most of the remainder of the company's agricultural implement plants under contract in 1941. Several of the FE's original organizers were members of the Communist Party, and some of the union's leaders retained an association with the Party throughout the FE's existence. The union's two top officers emerged out of Harvester's Chicago plants: Grant Oakes, the FE's longtime president, was a skilled mechanic at Tractor Works; Gerald Fielde, who became secretary-treasurer, had worked at neighboring McCormick Works. The FE went on to organize other farm-implement plants, largely in the Midwest, and claimed to represent eighty thousand workers in the mid-1940s. The union's membership, however, was depleted through raids launched on FE locals by the United Auto Workers (UAW). In 1949 the FE was expelled from the CIO on charges of "Communist domination"; shortly before the CIO's action, the FE had entered into a loosely structured merger with the United Electrical Workers (UE). After a long strike against Harvester in 1952, the FE lost most of the contract clauses that had bolstered the union's strength. In 1955 the FE left the UE and merged with the UAW.

Though the FE's battle with the UAW and with the CIO was seemingly based on questions of jurisdiction and Communist infiltration, larger questions concerning the direction of the labor movement were at the heart of the conflict. The policies pursued by the FE ran counter to the philosophy of labor statesmanship that became predominant in the CIO during the postwar era. Rather than moving to limit shop-floor activity, the FE leadership defended the right to strike between contracts; FE members freely exercised that right, walking out at Harvester 639 times between 1948 and 1951. Harvester's piecework system engendered a high grievance rate, and the FE moved to win these disputes, if possible, at the local level. The FE's Harvester contracts provided for a large number of shop stewards and the union zealously guarded the clause guaranteeing stewards' freedom of movement through the plants. In collective bargaining, the FE's leaders fought to retain one-year contracts, and they opposed both the productivity and the cost-of-living pay increases championed by Walter Reuther in the 1948 UAW-General Motors agreement.

The FE's ideology found expression in politics as well. In 1948, many in the union, from the local to the national level, participated in the Progressive Party campaign; Grant Oakes was the party's candidate for governor of Illinois. These positions drew charges of Communist control from the FE's opponents, particularly the UAW. At International Harvester, however, the FE rank and file was unshaken by the anticommunist campaign. The UAW did not gain representation at any of the ten Harvester plants originally organized by the FE, which comprised the bulk of the membership, until 1954. The decision, the next year, to merge with the UAW was adopted as another Harvester strike loomed and the FE leadership feared for the union's continued existence.

FURTHER READING

- Gilpin, Toni. "Left by Themselves: A History of the United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers of America, 1938-1955." Senior thesis, Lake Forest College, Lake Forest, Illinois, 1981.
- Gilpin, Toni. "Labor Statesmanship v. Rank and File Unionism: Competing Models of Trade Unionism in Cold War America." Paper presented to the Newberry Library Chicago Area Labor History Group, Chicago, Illinois, 20 February 1987.

Ozanne, Robert. A Century of Labor-Management Relations at McCormick and International Harvester. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1967.

Rosswurm, Steven, and Toni Gilpin. "The FBI and the Farm Equipment Workers: FBI Surveillance Records as a Source for CIO Union History." Labor History 27 (fall 1986).

—TONI GILPIN

UNITED MINE WORKERS. Founded in Columbus, Ohio, in 1890, the United Mine Workers (UMW), after winning major strikes in 1897 and 1902, grew rapidly, reaching 300,000 members by 1905. It was then the largest union within the American Federation of Labor (AFL). From its earliest days the UMW was organized on an industrial basis, encompassing not only miners with diverse skills but also other workers of different occupations associated with the mines. Radical influences were strong during the first three decades of the union's existence. Socialist-minded colliers from the British Isles brought with them traditions of political activism and artisanal independence as well as ideas of economic democracy that they had practiced in their cooperative stores. These immigrants came to occupy many positions of leadership at the local and district levels of the union. In 1894 delegates of the UMW annual convention endorsed calls for governmental control of mines, railroads, telegraph systems, and other means of production. After 1900, Eugene Debs's Socialist Party attracted a significant minority of UMW members, notably in Illinois, the largest district within the organization. The majority of miners, however, even those whose sympathies lay with the Socialists, rejected third-party politics for fear of alienating friends in the two major parties from whom they might expect at least occasional support. Similarly, few miners in this early period favored anything that could be considered dual unionism, whether it was the Industrial Workers of the World or a new revolutionary union proposed by Debs.

In 1916 there were widespread defections of socialists to Woodrow Wilson, popular because of the enactment of several pieces of labor legislation during his first term. When Wilson led the nation into war in 1917, most miners readily followed. Such patriotic enthusiasm turned to disillusionment and anger when the government refused to cancel a wartime wage freeze after the November 1918 armistice, in spite of runaway inflation and brazen profiteering. In response, the 1919 UMW convention passed resolutions demanding "nationalization and democratic control of the mines" and the formation of a national labor party.

This revival of radicalism coincided, unfortunately for the radicals, with the ascendancy to power of John L. Lewis, who became UMW president in 1920. Lewis had fought the older generation of socialists in his home state of Illinois and he was no friend of the younger native-born militants who came to the fore in the 1919 insurgency. Over the next dozen years Lewis used his considerable abilities and increasingly dictatorial powers to squash one dissident movement after another. Whether it was the Labor Party of 1920, the Progressive International Committee of 1923, the Save the Union movement of 1926, the National Miners Union formed by the Communist Party in 1928, the Reorganized United Mine Workers Union of 1930, or the Progressive Miners of America of 1932, Lewis was never bested. In putting down these rebellions he was assisted by the pro-business politicians and coal industry operators who preferred the UMW's new brand of business unionism to any kind of rank-and-file democracy espoused by Lewis's critics.

Lewis built a despotic union machine in the 1920s, but he could not prevent the precipitous decline of the UMW, the result of a sick coal industry, the successes of open-shop producers, and continued fighting among the miners. By 1932 fewer than 100,000 miners paid their dues, a drop of more than 400,000 from its 1919 peak. Thus, the UMW's turnabout in the 1930s is more remarkable given its immediate past. In this reversal of fortunes the Left played a conspicuous role, albeit subordinate to Lewis. Adolph Germer, John Brophy, and others who had earlier been purged were now invited back to assume key organizing tasks. The UMW not only regained all that it had lost in the way of members and influence; it also made invaluable contributions toward the birth of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) and a revitalized labor movement.

During World War II and the early postwar years the UMW continued to be a major if isolated force, resisting the growing power of the national-security state and winning important concessions through highly publicized strikes. Its autocratic leadership, however, remained the union's most defining characteristic. Lewis retired in 1960, a Christlike figure to many miners who admired his defiant stance in behalf of the union while overlooking or excusing his excesses as necessary in light of the opposition. In the 1960s the UMW sank further into corruption and tyranny, reaching the depths in 1969 when Lewis's handpicked successor, Tony Boyle, ordered the murder of his presidential rival, Jock Yablonski, along with his wife and daughter. Only then did an organization, Miners for Democracy, come into being committed to reform. Allied with groups such as the Black Lung Association, the Miners for Democracy in 1972 elected its candidate, Arnold Miller, as the new head of the union. In the next few years several changes were made that helped restore democratic rights to the members. Miller, however, proved to be a frail and ineffective leader. Heart problems led to his resignation in 1979. He was replaced by Sam Church, a Boyle loyalist who had been elevated to the vice presidency after Miller grew distrustful of the reformers in his office. In 1982 Church was defeated in the presidential election by Richard Trumka, a young and urbane lawyer with only a few years' experience in the mines. Trumka appeared to have some of Lewis's charisma and ambition, and he soon took up the problem of the general stagnation of the American labor movement. He was a key player in the creation of the New Voice slate which won control of the AFL-CIO in 1995 and began a campaign to revitalize the national labor movement.

[See also Jones, "Mother" Mary Harris; Progressive Miners of America; Trade Union Educational League.]

FURTHER READING

- Dubofsky, Melvyn, and Warren Van Tine. John L. Lewis: A Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
 Laslett, John. Labor and the Left. New York: Basic Books, 1970.
 Singer, Alan. "Which Side Are You On? Ideological Conflict in the United Mine Workers of America, 1919-1928." Ph.D. diss., Rutgers University, 1982.
 Zieger, Robert H. John L. Lewis, Labor Leader. Boston: Twayne, 1988.

—RALPH STONE

UNITED OFFICE AND PROFESSIONAL WORKERS OF AMERICA. Inspired by the industrial unionism of the early Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), dissident organizers from the American Federation of Labor's Bookkeepers, Stenographers, and Accountants Union locals requested a charter in 1937 to form the United Office and Professional Workers of America (UOPWA). After thirteen years of increasing success in organizing white-collar workers, the UOPWA was hounded out of the CIO in the 1950 purge of Left unions. While many UOPWA organizers were members of the Communist Party, the union attracted support from urban clerical workers, white-collar professionals, and independent leftists. Membership reached forty-three thousand workers by 1943.

Along with the United Federal Workers and the State, County, and Municipal Workers of America, the UOPWA was given a CIO mandate to organize what most leftists saw as a problematical segment of the labor force, the "white collars." Never quite certain whether to view these as potential right-wing sympathizers or as workers with legitimate grievances, the CIO leadership, in any case, found it impossible to make office-work organizing a real concern of industrial unionism. The UOPWA's influence was narrowly circumscribed when it was ordered to stay away from office workers falling under the jurisdiction of other industrial unions, which continued, in the 1930s and 1940s, to ignore clerks or to bargain away their interests. The UOPWA was left with paperwork industries, some of which, particularly insurance and banking, had virtually no history of union membership and were managed by interests dead set against unionization. Nonetheless, the UOPWA successfully organized a wide variety of white-collar workers, including direct-mail assembly-line workers, credit-house clearing workers, male insurance agents, book editors, Arthur Murray dance instructors, and thousands of female and male clericals, particularly in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago.

The organizing of the UOPWA's constituency raised important conceptual problems, problems the "workerism" ideology of the Left, focused as it was on male workers in heavy industry and manufacturing, seemed incapable of rethinking. While the union repeatedly challenged racial discrimination, its leaders were unable to confront divisions based on gender and professional elitism, which often happened to combine. Women clerical workers were sometimes patronized, dismissed as incapable of being dedicated unionists, and given almost no professional organizing leadership. Nonetheless, women rose to positions of leadership in some locals, particularly New York's Local 16, and a series of important victories after World War II indicated that wide-ranging office-worker unionism was a real possibility. This optimistic future was ended abruptly in the Taft-Hartley purges of the late 1940s, when the UOPWA leadership refused to sign loyalty oaths; the union was expelled from the CIO and quickly expired. It would be two decades before an industrial unionist approach to white-collar organizing would again appear in the labor movement.

[See also Federal Bureau of Investigation; Taft-Hartley Loyalty Oath.]

FURTHER READING

- McColloch, Mark. White Collar Workers in Transition: The Boom Years, 1940-1970. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1983.
- Strom, Sharon Hartman. "'We're No Kitty Foyles': Organizing Office Workers for the Congress of Industrial Organizations, 1937-1950." In Women, Work and Protest: A Century of U.S. Women's Labor History, edited by Ruth Milkman. Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1985.
- Sturmthal, A. F., ed. White Collar Trade Unions: Contemporary Developments in Industrialized Societies. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1966.

—SHARON HARTMAN STROM

UTOPIANISM. An age-old longing for a society based on harmony and happiness, often merging with the modern ideals of material growth and personal fulfillment, utopianism has played a fundamental role in the development of modern American society and culture. It has also profoundly influenced oppositional or alternative theory and practice during eras of prospective change. In turn, waves of utopianism have often been followed by institutional submergence or ideological displacement into personal salvation, consumerism, and/or nationalist rituals such as war and imperial adventures.

Before 1870, utopianism tended to be defined by the perfectionist thought of the premodern world. "West" on the compass of the Radical Reformation was the direction of human salvation, and many European religious perfectionists established outposts in the New World. Secularization and the beginnings of industrialism added new components. The three modes of utopianism—political, communal, and literary/popular culture—resonated with the millennial passions of Protestant America in the early nineteenth century. Broad reform tendencies such as abolitionism and woman's rights raised ideological challenges containing a religious-utopian premise of sin and salvation. Utopian communes, even in the secular form of Fourierism and Owenism, attempted to escape from corrupt society. An element in the ideological ascension of laissez-faire, utopianism represented a desire to find alternative ways of reconstituting a moral universe in which one could be true to one's own nature. Despite the advocacy of such leading intellectuals as Frances Wright and Horace Greeley, such personal perfectionism did not seriously threaten rising capitalism.

Toward the end of the century, however, the material hardships and moral corruption imposed by monopoly capitalism returned utopianism to public concern. Literary utopias flourished, with hundreds of authors assaying the possibilities of future, better societies, sometimes displaced to undiscovered lands, or even to distant planets. Among them, Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward was not only by far the best-selling, but also the most emblematic. While criticizing the profound inequalities of contemporary life, most utopian authors were, like Bellamy, unwilling or unable to conceptualize the future without some form of political or intellectual elite. Their own commitment to an ideology of Christian socialism or populism could not overcome their fears about the conflicts that emerged in the contest between capital and labor. Such middle-class utopianism looked to the state as an active instrument in balancing class forces and in facilitating progress and prosperity.

Meanwhile, a number of working class-based socialist movements of the 1880s-1890s viewed utopian communalism as an opportunity to challenge state power through example. Eugene V. Debs's followers, many from the defunct American Railway Union, thus saw in the short-lived Brotherhood of the Cooperative Commonwealth a vehicle to translate utopianism into a vanguard movement for workers' independence and self-development somewhere in the West. Like most other such experiments of the time—the single-tax colony at Fair Hope, the socialist Ruskin cooperative in Tennessee, and the anarchist communities at Home and Equality on Puget Sound in Washington, and a number of contemporary immigrant socialist experiments—the Brotherhood faded to the political margins. These nevertheless provided important experiences in social change and helped create a leadership for the mass-based Socialist Party to follow, in which the utopian journalism of a J. A. Wayland and the act of creating colonies gave way to creating socialist propaganda, waging strikes, and seeking political power.

What little utopianism existed in the era of Debsian Socialism usually served the purpose of groups seeking to escape particular environments (such as the Stelton, New Jersey, Colony of mostly removed New York anarchists) or to deal with the collapse of the Socialist movement (such as the Llano Colony). Utopianism resumed during the 1930s in a different and much less radical guise, chiefly under the auspices of the New Deal. Drawing in part from the back-to-the-land sentiments of communalists such as Ralph Borsodi, the Jersey Homesteads, for instance, sought to create a cooperative environment for displaced urban workers. Other New Deal communal projects extended the role of the state in the pursuit of deurbanization and welfare capitalism. Even non-New Deal utopian communities of the 1930s, like the anarchist Sunrise Colony in Michigan (composed of a number of veterans from Stelton), became ensnared in various New Deal agencies. In several other instances, however, utopian longings reflected nostalgic yearnings for the closed communities advocated by such right-wing political and religious fundamentalists as Dr. Francis E. Townsend and Father Charles Coughlin.

The utopian content of working-class and black struggles tended to be translated into unions and Left parties, as outlined ideologically in the "proletarian literature" movement with its icons of class. Dystopian fears in such works as Sinclair Lewis's It Can't Happen Here, and more subtly in the hard-boiled detective and film noir genres, suggested utopianism turned on its head, into the ideologies of the total society against the individual, a condition obvious in fascism, Stalinism, and the mass culture of welfare capitalism.

The 1960s returned utopianism to central concern and gave it the new tasks of challenging the legitimacy not only of the state, but also of materialism and "progress." This was, to a considerable extent, a "children's crusade." Countercultural activities of the young received the theoretical blessing of social critics such as Paul Goodman and Herbert Marcuse, in the search for liberation from the repressiveness of subtly repressive institutions and of bourgeois daily life. The political call for participatory democracy appealed to many of the same utopian desires as the search for new cultural lifestyles, the musical taste for Jimi Hendrix and the Doors, or the literary taste for Samuel R. Delany, Marge Piercy, and Ursula Le Guin.

For a brief moment in history, communal experiments flourished once more. Reflecting a split between political activism and cultural retreat, burned-out radicals tried to "get back to the Garden" (as a song lyric from the Woodstock Festival put it) with self-conscious social experiments in the rural areas of Vermont, New Mexico, California, and Oregon. The more widespread "hippie communes," scattered mostly across the western states, offered a generally vague sense of escape from industrialism. In the cities, many young people established more-or-less collective living styles, replicating in some ways the vanishing extended families of their ancestors. Few communes of any kind survived the tests of time and change.

[See also Bellamy, Edward; Debs, Eugene V.; Llano Cooperative Colony; Ruskin Colony; Science Fiction and Fantasy; Spiritualism.]

FURTHER READING

- Barkin, Michael. "Communal Societies and Cyclical Phenomena." Communal Societies 4 (1984).
- Klaw, Spencer. Without Sin: The Life and Death of the Oneida Community. New York: Penguin, 1993.
- Le Warne, Charles Pierce. Utopias on Puget Sound, 1885-1915. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1975.
- Roemer, Kenneth M. America as Utopia. New York: Burt Franklin and Co., 1981.
- Shor, Francis. "The Utopian Project in a Communal Experiment of the 1930s: The Sunrise Colony in Historical and Comparative Perspective." Communal Studies 7 (1987).

—FRANCIS SHOR

VANGUARD PARTY. A significant variation of Marxist thought was created when V. I. Lenin introduced the concept that revolutionary success is dependent upon a political party composed of professional revolutionaries. This party is to act as the general staff of the revolution and has been compared with the locomotive that harnesses "revolutionary steam." Vanguardists believe that without their intervention, workers and other potential revolutionary social forces will fail to achieve their ends due to inexperience, poor organization, lack of skills, and theoretical underdevelopment.

The vanguard party is organized on a modified military model under a schema termed democratic centralism. Each of the lower bodies of the organization elects representatives to the higher bodies until a central-committee level is reached. The central committee is expected to gather information from all the party units and make final decisions. These decisions comprise the party line and all members are expected to carry out the party line whether they personally agree with it or not. Party members accept this discipline under the assumption that if they had all the information available to the leadership, they would see the wisdom of the decisions made. Rank-and-file members also understand that specific units or fronts may have to be sacrificed in order to save a larger unit or more important position. The process of changing a party line differs from one party to another and is often a point of contention. The guiding principle, however, is that the struggle to change the line must be kept within the party. When the party line shifts, all the members shift their public positions accordingly. On occasion, a complete turnabout in party line gives a poor impression to outsiders, who may judge party members to have slavish loyalty to their organization. Leninists are willing to risk this judgment because they believe uniform adherence to the party line is essential to maximize the vanguard party's impact.

The historical experience of the vanguard party has been that the central committee usually creates an executive that so controls the party apparatus that the organization is far more authoritarian or centralized than democratic. Important posts come to be filled by appointment from above rather than election from below. Critics of the vanguard concept believe the centralizing tendency is inherent in its structure and its underlying elitist notion of revolutionary leadership. They point out that even the smallest vanguard parties usually develop authoritarianism to the point where a cult of personality surrounds the leader. Advocates of the vanguard party concede that maintaining democratic norms within the party is a constant struggle but argue that the experience of authoritarianism in the first period of socialism has made them more sensitive to the needs for democratic safeguards at all levels of party life.

Vanguard parties generally have secret and open members. Secret members are thought necessary because of government repression and volatile public opinion. Open members carry on the official work of the party and give it its public face. The mix of secret and open members depends on the historical conditions of the moment. Communication between members occurs at regularized local meetings augmented by occasional regional and national gatherings and through exposure to party publications. The party press includes a mass newspaper to communicate the party line to the general public, an internal party organ for members only, and a theoretical journal for party and nonparty intellectuals. Larger parties develop youth and arts publications and, depending on circumstances, publications aimed at specific ethnic and racial groups. Frequently there are party schools or workshops to develop the skills of members.

Party work is carried on in identifiable party units, front organizations, special interest groups, and organizations controlled by others. Party organizations are openly identified as linked to the party even though they may accept nonparty participants. A front group is deliberately created by the party as a vehicle for working with nonparty people. Fronts are not expected to become part of the formal party or to adhere to the entire party line. They generally focus on a single issue with broad appeal, such as initiatives against war, civil rights programs, or defense of political prisoners. Fronts are different from groups such as trade unions or civic groups that party members join and simply try to influence.

Recruitment of new members is a goal of all party work but it is not necessarily a high priority. Vanguardists believe that not all persons can accept the discipline of party life even though they may agree with most of the party's positions. These and other individuals willing to work with the party on a regular basis are termed sympathizers or fellow travelers. A party may prefer that an individual remain outside the formal organization in order to minimize the risk of red-baiting. Performing artists and other persons who are dependent on the goodwill of the general public may be actively discouraged from becoming members.

The Leninist party is fundamentally different from the socialist mass party, which operates as a parliamentary group and makes no greater demands on its members than its capitalist counterparts. One form or another of vanguard organization has been adopted by the Communist Party and the various Trotskyist and Maoist organizations in the United States. They may be collectively referred to as Marxist-Leninist organizations.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Factions; Maoism; Preparty Formations; Socialist Workers Party.]

FURTHER READING

Le Blanc, Paul. Lenin and the Revolutionary Party. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1990.

—DAN GEORGAKAS

VIETNAM VETERANS AGAINST THE WAR. Founded on 1 June 1967, the Vietnam Veterans against the War (VVAW) represented, according to one of its members, "the first time in this country's history that the men who fought a war have come to . . . demand its halt while that war is still going on." In its early years, the VVAW was loosely organized, centered around a small core of anti-war veterans who spoke at demonstrations, participated in debates, took out radio, television, and newspaper advertisements to promote their cause, and published a newspaper, Vietnam GI. Many members worked on Eugene McCarthy's presidential campaign in 1968.

By 1970, the VVAW began attracting greater numbers of anti-war veterans, and it started sponsoring specific anti-war actions. The VVAW engaged in guerrilla theater, organizing mock search-and-destroy missions in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, an effective way of bringing the war home to America's streets. In late January and early February of 1971, the VVAW held a war crimes trial in Detroit known as the "Winter Soldier Hearings." In April, VVAW members organized perhaps the most emotional and significant anti-war demonstration during the entire Vietnam War, "Dewey Canyon III," in which veterans angrily threw their medals, ribbons, and citations at the Capitol.

Unlike many anti-war organizations, which were middle class in composition, the majority of VVAW members came from working-class backgrounds. The VVAW, at its height, claimed a membership of thirty thousand men and women. Members organized vets' rap groups, halfway houses, rehabilitation farms, and protests against the horrendous conditions in Veterans Administration hospitals. The VVAW was also targeted by the federal government's extensive program of spying and destabilization, and agents provocateurs were commonplace within its ranks.

After the war ended, the VVAW disintegrated, largely as a result of members splitting over the organization's purpose and future. The VVAW has resurfaced in recent years, with members protesting U.S. involvement in Central America and the Persian Gulf, pressing for normalized relations between the United States and Vietnam, and exposing the shabby treatment of veterans by the government.

[See also New Left.]

FURTHER READING

Kerry, John, and the Vietnam Veterans against the War. The New Soldier. New York: Macmillan, 1971.

Wells, Tom. The War Within. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994.

—ANDREW HUNT

VORSE, MARY HEATON (1874–1966). Feminist, foreign correspondent, and popular author of women's fiction, Mary Heaton Vorse was also one of the nation's leading labor journalists during the first half of this century. Vorse's knowledgeable reports appeared in middle-class journals and major newspapers, as well as in leftist publications and in dispatches and broadsides distributed by the labor press. Unlike most labor reporters of her time, she emphasized the crucial contribution of women to labor advance. Her writing also helped to convince many Americans of the need for industrial labor organization.

Born into a well-off New England family, Vorse was determined to escape domesticity and to pursue a career. By 1910, she had won a national reputation as a writer of women's popular fiction. As an editor of the Masses, a charter member of the Liberal Club and the Heterodoxy Club, and a founder of the Provincetown Players, Vorse was a key member of the group of intellectuals and radicals centered in pre-World War I Greenwich Village. Her experience in the suffrage movement and as a delegate to the women's peace conference held at The Hague in 1915 determined her feminist vision. Twice widowed, Vorse functioned for most of her life as a single mother responsible for the support of her three children. Her desperate struggle to balance the demands of motherhood with those of her profession is a major theme of her life.

Vorse began her career as a labor reporter during the 1912 textile strike in Lawrence, Massachusetts. She continued publicity work with the Industrial Workers of the World in the 1914 New York City unemployed movement and at the 1916 mining strike on the Mesabi Range in Minnesota. After reporting the war in Europe, Vorse served as activist and publicist in the 1919 national steel strike and for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers during 1920. As publicity director of the 1926 Passaic, New Jersey, textile strike, she developed the revolutionary publicity tactics that set the pattern for the successful techniques that marked the labor uprisings of the next decade. Vorse was a firstcomer to the southern labor wars, at Gastonia, North Carolina, in 1929, and in "Bloody Harlan County," Kentucky, in 1931, where she was expelled from the state by night riders. During the 1930s, Vorse reported the Congress of Industrial Organizations' battles across the nation, Hitler's rise to power, and the scenes of Stalin's Soviet Union. She covered the lives of American factory workers during World War II and postwar reconstruction in Europe. Her last big story to win national attention was her 1952 exposé of crime in the waterfront unions.

Vorse became skeptical of the Communist promise while in Hungary in 1919, and in Moscow in 1921 and 1933. Disillusionment came much earlier to her than it did to many of her leftist or liberal friends, and her popularity fell victim to her premature cognizance. She also stumbled at the place where many liberals and democratic socialists turned right. She refused to publicly bait the Communist rank and file during the witch hunts of the fifties, and she denounced U.S. prosecution of the Cold War as a threat to human survival in the nuclear age.

Vorse spent fifty-four years in active battle for libertarian socialism, feminism, and world peace, a union of ideas far too radical for most of her peers to consider. At a time when the Communists knew her to be unreliable and unreasonable, the federal spy-hunters harassed her for more than forty years, maintaining surveillance of her activities until at least 1956, when she was eighty-two years old.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; Masses; Passaic Textile Strike of 1926.]

FURTHER READING

- Garrison, Dee. Mary Heaton Vorse: The Life of an American Insurgent. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.
- Garrison, Dee, ed. Rebel Pen: The Writings of Mary Heaton Vorse. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1985.
- Vorse, Mary Heaton. A Footnote to Folly. New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1935.
- Vorse, Mary Heaton. Papers. Archives of Labor History and Urban Affairs, Walter Reuther Library, Wayne State University, Detroit, Mich.

—DEE GARRISON

WAGES FOR HOUSEWORK. Both a feminist campaign and a distinct and influential theory of the 1970s women's liberation movement, Wages for Housework arose out of the reprinting of the 1953 Selma James essay "A Woman's Place" together with a new essay by Mariarosa dalla Costa, "Women and the Subversion of the Community." The economic meaning of housework in women's lives and the nature of female oppression connected with the housewife role had been explored in feminist literature prior to the publication of James's and dalla Costa's polemic; indeed, the findings of the 1970 Chase Manhattan Bank study "What's a Wife Worth?" (which had calculated the dollar value of the almost one hundred hours a week that the average housewife spends on performing household tasks as being about $13,500) were well known. What was new and dynamic about the James/dalla Costa thesis was its Marxist framework and its revolutionary perspective.

Published at a time when many Marxists were looking for a way to understand women's oppression in terms of the capitalist system, the "Wages for Housework" essays focused on the material nature of unpaid household labor. James and dalla Costa argued that all women are housewives and producers of surplus value. In the workplace of the home, it is the woman who performs the reproductive labor necessary to keep the wage earners of the working-class family fed, clothed, and ready for another day of toil in the capitalist marketplace. And when women work outside the home for wages, they are expected to fulfill their "natural" housewife roles along with the tasks of the job. Thus, the waitress must not only serve food but must do it with a smile, making the restaurant patron's dinner comfortable and "homey."

Wages for Housework castigated traditional Marxism for underrating women's unpaid labor and its crucial value to capitalist production. Liberal feminists' advocacy of economic independence through a career and a paycheck was likewise criticized. Wages for Housework argued that the working-class woman is the "slave of the wage slave" and must be encouraged to struggle against more work in the family as well as outside the home.

But Wages for Housework was more than a debate about women's economic status and destiny. Throughout the 1970s the Campaign for Wages for Housework fomented this analysis throughout the Left and feminist movements, providing a vital theoretical link between socialism and feminism while advocating autonomous and class-conscious women's activism. Issues that were especially important to the campaign usually pivoted on the invisible labor of women. The campaign wholeheartedly involved itself in the welfare-rights movement, the struggle for abortion rights and against forced sterilizations, and in women workers' demands for higher wages and shorter hours. The campaign strongly championed the rights of prostitutes to make a decent living and was the only feminist group to analyze the sex industry in terms of its material rather than moral conditions.

A widely reprinted broadside by the campaign declared, "The women of the world are serving notice. We clean your homes and factories. We raise the next generation of workers for you. . . . We have sweated while you have grown rich. Now we want back the wealth we have produced. We want it in cash, retroactive and immediately. And we want all of it."

International in its appeal, the Campaign for Wages for Housework organized during the mid-1970s in Italy, West Germany, England, and Canada. In the United States there were active chapters in Philadelphia, New York City, San Francisco, and Los Angeles.

[See also Socialist Feminism; Women's Liberation.]

FURTHER READING

dalla Costa, Mariarosa. The Power of Women and the Subversion of the Community. Bristol, England: Falling Wall Press, 1973.

Grimstad, Kirsten, and Susan Rennie. The New Woman's Survival Sourcebook. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1975.

Vogel, Lise. Marxism and the Oppression of Women. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1984.

—MIRIAM FRANK

WALLACE, HENRY. See Progressive Party.

WALLERSTEIN, IMMANUEL (b. 1930). A theoretician of international stature, Immanuel Wallerstein developed a synthetic Neo-Marxist paradigm for historical social science known as the world-systems perspective. Through his institution-building, his teaching, and his voluminous publications, most notably The Modern World-System (3 vols., 1974–1989), he introduced and/or disseminated a number of terms and concepts that quickly gained considerable currency: core, periphery, and semiperiphery; world empire and world-economy; commodity chains; hegemonic cycles.

Born in New York City and educated and first employed at Columbia University, Wallerstein began his academic career as a sociologist of French West Africa. He early showed a gift for synthesis in his Africa: The Politics of Independence (1961), a structural but not explicitly Marxian account of the contradictions of colonialism and of the nationalist movements it inevitably spawned. A radical voice in a predominantly liberal environment, Wallerstein was honored with the presidency of the African Studies Association just as he was coming to find it necessary to move to a global level of analysis in order to comprehend the patterns of change in post-independence Africa.

The conservative aftermath of the 1968 student uprising at Columbia prompted Wallerstein to join the faculty at McGill University in Montreal; in 1976 he moved to a distinguished professorship at the State University of New York, Binghamton, where he rejoined his longtime collaborator Terence K. Hopkins, founded a research institute (the Fernand Braudel Center), and established a journal (Review). With a notable faculty and a steady stream of visiting Marxists and activist intellectuals from around the world, Binghamton became a major center for research and training in Neo-Marxist social science—probably the most cosmopolitan such center in U.S. history. Research groups, many of them international, focused on such diverse topics as Southern Africa, the Ottoman Empire, long cycles in world-economic history, labor movements, households, and semiperipheral countries.

Four main intellectual sources fed Wallerstein's synthesis. From Marxism came a vision of capitalism arising out of the contradictions of feudalism and self-destructing via class struggles. From Continental historical economics, particularly Max Weber and Karl Polanyi, came conceptions of modern national states as protectors of citizen privilege vis-à-vis outsiders, and of reciprocity, redistribution, and markets (minisystem, world-empires, and world-economies in Wallerstein's terminology) as the only possible bases—and hence the three historically existing types—of social organization. From the Annales school of French historiography came the emphasis on long-term structural persistence, as, for example, the tripartite core/semiperiphery/periphery pattern of post-sixteenth-century capitalism, which Wallerstein sees extending into the twenty-first century. Finally, from the dependency theory and Third World revolutionism of the 1960s came the core/periphery understanding itself, with its corollary that working-class and Marxist movements in the core (industrialized) countries were not (could not have been?) the vanguard of world socialist revolution.

Beyond his insistence on a radical holism (i.e., the primacy of the world-economy as a unit of analysis), Wallerstein's most important theoretical contribution to his own synthesis is probably that of the semiperiphery. This refers to a shifting set of countries asserted to be intermediate between core and periphery on a number of dimensions (economic/technical capacity, state power, standard of living) and to stabilize world capitalism by deflecting peripheral opposition away from the core. His most important empirical argument dated the transition from feudalism to capitalism in the sixteenth century and characterized it largely in terms of market expansion. This involved him in the revived debate over the transition; by the logic of his position, he later came to question the received liberal and Marxist wisdom about the industrial and French revolutions, and to engage in numerous historiographic controversies.

[See also African Studies; Sociology.]

FURTHER READING

Wallerstein, Immanuel. The Capitalist World-Economy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979.

—WALTER L. GOLDFRANK

WALLING, WILLIAM ENGLISH (1877–1936). One of the few serious and innovative theoretical minds American socialism has produced, William English Walling was born into a wealthy family. His grandfather had been the Democratic nominee for vice president in 1880. As a youth, Walling committed himself to working on behalf of people who were less privileged than he and worked as a factory inspector and a settlement house resident on the Lower East Side of New York, and helped to found the Women's Trade Union League, which was dedicated to organizing female factory workers into unions. After reporting on a race riot in Springfield, Illinois, he became one of the principal organizers of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, along with W. E. B. Du Bois. Although he had by then become a socialist, he disagreed with some of his comrades by insisting that racial bigotry and discrimination needed to be fought right away instead of waiting for socialism to abolish all forms of discrimination, as they hoped it would. Walling was aware too of the racist attitudes of some American socialists themselves, such as Congressman Victor Berger.

Walling visited Russia during the 1905 revolution and was converted to socialism after meeting and talking with many radical activists. He published one of the few books in English on the thwarted revolution, becoming the first American to write about Lenin in a nationally circulated magazine. He soon gravitated to the left wing within the American Socialist Party, published articles in the Masses, the leading journal of the bohemian Left, and began to publish major works of socialist theory. After examining the latest trends in the international movement, he attempted to integrate the ideas of pragmatists like John Dewey. He came to the conclusion that the way toward real socialism was fraught with dangers, primarily coming from the likely development of an oppressive governmental structure. Although the coming social orders, which Walling referred to as state capitalism and state socialism, would carry out reforms, develop a welfare state, and eventually nationalize industry, they would only further the interests of the middle class and a relatively privileged portion of the working class. True socialism would come about only when the unprivileged were able to express their will and organize a democratic socialism from below, overturning organs of state control and finally abolishing all class distinctions whatsoever.

After leaving the Socialist Party because of its opposition to American participation in World War I, Walling eventually lost his own belief in a socialist future but became an advocate for what he then saw to be the democratic values of the American Federation of Labor and actively supported it as a publicist and consultant.

[See also Philosophy; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Walling, William E. Progressivism and After. New York: Macmillan, 1914.

William English Walling: A Symposium. New York: Stackpole and Sons, 1938.

—JACK STUART

WARD, CYRENUS OSBORNE (1831–1902). C. Osborne Ward, born in western New York on 28 October 1831, was one of the leading American members of the First International and a frequent author on socialist economics and history. Ward was first attracted to working-class politics during his time as a machinist at the Brooklyn Navy Yard during the Civil War. After the war he worked as a reporter, writing article from Europe for the New York Sun, the New York Witness, and the New York Tribune, and met Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels, and other European socialists. In the late 1860s and the 1870s Ward participated in socialist politics in New York as a member of the New Democracy, and joined the First International in 1870. He was arrested as a spy during the Franco-Prussian War, and was elected to the Council of the First International at The Hague Congress (1872) but declined the position. After the demise of the First International in 1876, he ran as a Socialist Labor Party candidate for Congress from Brooklyn in 1878.

Ward was best known for two publications about socialist economics, The New Idea (1870) and A Labor Catechism of Political Economy (1878). Ward's vision of socialist society sought the establishment of a producerist cooperative republic and rejected an industrial system that threatened to enslave the laboring class. His long poem on the Civil War captured a similar spirit and apotheosized Lincoln as the champion of a labor republic. In the early 1880s, Ward edited a New York socialist weekly, Voice. After the failure of the publication, his brother, sociologist Lester Frank Ward, helped him obtain a job at the United States Geological Survey in 1884. During the late 1880s, when he became translator and librarian at the Bureau of Statistics, he began his greatest work, The Ancient Lowly (1890, 1902), a long history of laborers and cooperative movements "from the earliest known times to the adoption of Christianity by Constantine." He left his job in 1900 because of his health, and finished the second volume of his study, "The Origins of Socialism," in early 1902. He died at Yuma, Arizona, on 19 March 1902.

FURTHER READING

Bernstein, Samuel. The First International in America. New York: Augustus M. Kelley, 1962.

"C. Osborne Ward." National Cyclopaedia of American Biography, vol. 13. New York: James White, 1907.

Lause, Mark. "The American Radicals and Organized Marxism: The Initial Experience, 1869-1874." Labor History 33, no. 1 (winter 1992).

Messer-Kruse, Timothy. "The Yankee International: Marxism and the American Reform Tradition, 1831-1876." Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, 1994.

Ward, Frank Edwin. Papers. Manuscripts Division, Special Collections, New York Public Library.

—EDWARD C. RAFFERTY

WASHINGTON COMMONWEALTH FEDERATION. Though it survived for only a decade, the Washington Commonwealth Federation (WCF) was one of the most active and broad-based left-wing movements in U.S. history. A coalition of socialists, advocates of Upton Sinclair's "production for use" proposals, old-age pension supporters, apostles of "technocracy," and labor activists, the WCF sought, with limited success, to win control of the Washington State Democratic Party.

The federation began in 1934 as "the Commonwealth Builders, Inc." Its founders were middle-class socialists who favored electoral action with the goal of a "cooperative commonwealth"—government-owned large-scale industry and banking, producer- and consumer-owned cooperatives, and small private businesses and farms. Such a vision found fertile soil in Depression-era Washington, especially among labor activists engaged in bitter dock and timber strikes, and among the unemployed.

By 1935, the Commonwealth Builders had won support from many key labor and farm organizations. In October of that year, Commonwealth Builders, Inc., officially became known as the Washington Commonwealth Federation. Its members rejected appeals to form a new party like Minnesota's Farmer-Labor Party and, instead, sought political power as left-wing Democrats.

Radical rhetoric was the WCF hallmark at first. The organization championed "production for use and abolition of the profit system." But after a major setback in the 1936 state election, its tone became decidedly more moderate. Concrete reform proposals led to a rapid growth in membership and some key political victories. The WCF became a force to be reckoned with, though Postmaster General Farley's rumored toast to "the forty-seven states and the Soviet of Washington" was far off the mark—WCF legislators were always a minority in Washington politics.

When the American Communist Party abandoned Third Period sectarianism for the Popular Front strategy in 1935, Party members in Washington State saw their major political task as building and influencing the WCF. Initially rebuffed, Communist Party members were permitted to join the federation in 1936. Their organizing skills brought them quickly into key leadership positions.

Early euphoria about WCF prospects turned sour by 1938. Internal splits (between unions of the American Federation of Labor and those of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, for example) as well as red-baiting badly weakened the federation. Communist Party influence proved powerful, resulting in WCF flip-flops on foreign affairs. After the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939, federation newspapers denounced Franklin Roosevelt as a warmonger. From that time until Pearl Harbor, the WCF grew increasingly isolated politically, with sizable defections from its ranks.

Then, during World War II, the organization made a dramatic comeback, winning many legislative seats and sending its leader, Hugh De Lacy, to the U.S. Congress. In that period, Washington State enacted model social and civil rights legislation, and the WCF invented a popular contribution to Left political culture, the hootenanny, a folk-song fund-raiser.

By 1945, the WCF had become the most important single influence in state Democratic Party politics and, in the minds of its leaders, was no longer needed. The federation was dissolved as a contribution to Democratic Party unity. Its members looked forward confidently to the future.

But the future had other ideas. In the Cold War period, the top leadership of the WCF came under attack as Communists or fellow travelers and the federation's hard-won social programs were dismantled.

[See also Popular Front.]

FURTHER READING

Acena, Albert Anthony. "The Washington Commonwealth Federation: Reform Politics and the Popular Front." Ph.D. diss., University of Washington, 1975.

—JOHN DE GRAAF

WAYLAND, J. A. See Appeal to Reason; Ruskin Colony.

WEATHERMAN. See Armed Struggle, 1960s–1970s; Students for a Democratic Society.

WEEKLY PEOPLE'S WORLD. See Daily Worker.

WESTERN FEDERATION OF MINERS/INTERNATIONAL UNION OF MINE, MILL AND SMELTER WORKERS. A legendary radical labor movement of the West, the Western Federation of Miners (WFM) was in its early years an important section of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and later one of the least typical "red" unions in the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). Midwifed by U.S. Army bayonets in prison camps (or "bullpens") in Idaho, the union was marked in its various phases by federal intervention, rank-and-file agitation, hardrock miners' demands for safer working conditions with improved pay, and exemplary interracial relations.

The WFM grew out of the 1892 defeat of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, miners who were resisting massive wage reductions. Officially founded the next year in Butte, Montana, the new union vowed to defend miners from the misuse of new technology which, by producing greater amounts of rock dust, increased the incidence of silicosis. The WFM, influenced by socialists such as Eugene V. Debs and by the need for solidarity, supported the formation of the American Labor Union, an effort of scattered workers in western states to create a more democratic, industrial alternative to the craft-oriented American Federation of Labor. In 1905, the WFM joined the IWW as its metal mining branch—a decision unpopular in Butte, where many miners viewed the IWW as a divisive political rather than industrial organization. Controversy and splits over this move foreshadowed later difficulties faced by the union over its political orientation.

Political infighting and the reluctance of other major unions to join the IWW prompted the WFM to withdraw from the movement in 1907. The actual organization of miners, now split between the WFM and the IWW, weakened as a result. The WFM nevertheless remained in its own way a radical organization, its influential Miners Magazine widely regarded as a socialistic organ.

The First World War and the process of electrification greatly increased the demand for copper. WFM locals in Michigan and Arizona struggled to maintain working conditions and to raise wages as the cost of living soared. Mine owners and the U.S. government fought back. In the bloody 1913 Calumet Copper Strike, casualties included eighty-nine children killed in a Christmas Day fire (an event later memorialized by Woody Guthrie). In Arizona, WFM and IWW members and supporters were deported at gunpoint and left in the desert without water. Repression and worsening conditions destroyed the Butte Miners Union the following year and prompted the rise of IWW organizing activities, in the course of which IWW organizer Frank Little was lynched. Persistent federal intervention, antisubversive legislation, and miners' rage inspired former Pinkerton detective Dashiell Hammett's Red Harvest.

In 1916 the WFM formally became the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers (IUMMS), thereby recognizing the jurisdiction of the metalliferous mining industrial of the American Federation of Labor. Surviving further factionalism and the lean years of the 1920s, the IUMMS developed afresh during the New Deal and expanded its organizing activities into the East and South. Nonwestern locals were, however, to be a source of opposition to the union leadership.

Southern locals, sites of key victories in civil rights and pay standards, were able to capitalize upon traditions of regional coal-miners, federal government neutrality, and the expanding economy of the Second World War. The northeastern advance, essentially a majority of the union's die-casting division (which had amalgamated a formerly independent union into the IUMMS in 1934), sharply raised the issue of Communist influence within the International. Charges of corruption surrounding the otherwise democratic and hard-working union president, Reid Robinson, weakened the IUMMS within the CIO. The passage of the Taft-Hartley Act (IUMMS leaders refused to sign loyalty oaths and refused a referendum on the question) permitted internal opponents, often well organized, such as the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists and its supportive Catholic clergy, to accelerate secession movements. Neither the resignations of Reid Robinson nor of his successor, admitted Communist Maurice Travis, prevented the union's expulsion from the CIO in 1950. By that time the union was practically limited to western miners, who remained largely unshaken by the "red" charges. In the 1960s, however, the weakening union suffered extensive raids from the United Steelworkers and the United Auto Workers. At a 1967 membership of forty-six thousand—just slightly higher than its total thirty year earlier—the IUMMS merged into the Steelworkers Union.

The IUMMS is often cited for its pioneer policies in race relations and in women's involvement. During the 1940s, the union won a lawsuit to end the copper companies' custom of keeping separate payrolls for Anglo-American males, paying all others less. In the South, union policies of integration in work force and leadership were decried as a proof of communistic domination. In one of the best-known labor conflicts of the 1950s, the wives of mainly Chicano miners in Boyard, New Mexico, picketed in place of their husbands, who were forbidden to do so by injunction, and added new demands for their own welfare. This conflict was dramatized in the film Salt of the Earth.

[See also Industrial Workers of the World; Union-Sponsored Radical Films.]

FURTHER READING

- Jensen, Vernon H. Heritage of Conflict. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1950.
- Jensen, Vernon H. Non-Ferrous Metals Industrial Unionism, 1932-1954. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1974.
- Lingenfelter, Richard. The Hardrock Miners. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974.
- WFM-IUMMS Records. Western Historical Collections, Norlin Library, University of Colorado.

—BOB GREENE

WEST INDIANS began arriving in the United States in significant numbers at the end of the nineteenth century, mainly settling in New York City. Largely due to their education and political experience, by 1901 they controlled twenty percent of Harlem business and had begun to work in the left wing of the Democratic Party. The rise of a Harlem

Left and the Left period of Garveyism soon placed a handful of West Indians in the leadership of some leftist African American organizations.

In the late teens, the most prominent politician in Harlem was the Jamaican Marcus Garvey, who had entered the United States in 1916. Garvey advocated community unity, black economic independence, and the celebration of Africa as a cultural homeland. Garvey praised the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 and heartily endorsed anticolonial struggles throughout the world, but especially in Africa. His rhetorical call of "Africa for the Africans" made a deep and permanent imprint on African American thinking. His radicalism greatly concerned the attorney general of the United States. The young J. Edgar Hoover was chosen to monitor Garvey's activities and was instrumental in barring Garvey's return to the United States when Garvey undertook a month-long tour of the Caribbean in 1921.

After Garvey managed reentry into the United States, he began a long rightist drift. In 1923, Garvey was charged with and convicted of mail fraud involving his attempt to form a black-owned shipping line. He served two years in prison before he lost an appeal and was deported in 1927. From that time until his death in 1940, Garvey undertook various economic and political initiatives, but none reached the mass proportions of his years in Harlem. His speeches and writings eventually became overtly anti-Communist and anti-Semitic. Garveyism continued as an ill-defined movement in the United States, identified primarily by its insistence on cultural and economic independence.

Socialist Wilfred Domingo, the first editor of the Garveyite Negro World, broke with Garveyism in the early 1920s and joined Cyril Briggs, father of the African Blood Brotherhood, in the pages of the Crusader, the revolutionary nationalist affiliate of the Communist Party. A third Jamaican, Claude McKay, was an editor of the Liberator, a Comintern delegate, and a prominent figure, along with other West Indians, in the Harlem Renaissance. None of these individuals found themselves comfortable for lengthy periods within the American Left. Despite the claims of Harold Cruse in The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual, Communist leaders did not favor West Indians over African Americans, nor did West Indians keep leadership of black movements for themselves. Only Trinidadian C. L. R. James ascended to anything like leadership of a predominantly white movement.

Beginning in the 1930s, English-speaking West Indians began a mass movement out of Harlem to the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn. The West Indians who remained in Harlem continued to play pioneering roles in the Democratic Party. Bertram Baker of Nevis became the first black member of the New York state assembly in 1948, Hulan Jack of Saint Lucia became the first black president of the borough of Manhattan in 1953, and J. Raymond Jones of Jamaica became the first black leader of Tammany Hall in 1964. The influence of West Indians grew when the Hart-Cellar Act of 1965 reopened the door of mass immigration shut by the quotas established by the immigration statutes of 1924 and reinforced by security measures of the 1950s. From 1965 through the 1990s nearly 100,000 Jamaicans immigrated to Brooklyn, making them the largest group of islanders in the city.

In the early post-1965 period, an upsurge of West Indian nationalism and the desire to pursue graduate studies placed select immigrants in the academy. Emigrés established political clubs, cultural organizations, and reading circles in New York, Montreal, and other large cities. Dozens of the graduate students involved were later prominent in left-leaning governments of Jamaica, Guyana, and Grenada as well as in opposition movements in Trinidad, Barbados, Saint Kitts, and Dominica. Many of them were under the influence of the peripatetic and avuncular C. L. R. James.

Ironically for these intellectuals, the strongest influence of West Indians upon American radical youth was through the arts. Harry Belafonte became the first West Indian to achieve enormous box office success. Although his music was politically sanitized, Belafonte was prominently identified with the civil rights movement and was an outspoken supporter of the Castro revolution in Cuba. American-born but Bahamian-raised Sidney Poitier, an intimate friend and political ally of Belafonte who eventually eclipsed Belafonte in motion pictures, shared most of Belafonte's views. Both were major fund-raisers for black liberation and radical initiatives, and both spoke warmly of the advice and support they had received from Paul Robeson when they were unknowns living in Harlem. The interface of West Indian and African American interests was not unusual, and numerous individuals who identified themselves as African American were also aware of and proud of their West Indian heritage. Examples from the civil rights movement are numerous and include leading personalities such as Stokely Carmichael of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and Bayard Rustin, the tactical coordinator of the March on Washington. From time to time, conflicts between distinctly African American and West Indian interests arose but had aspects of a family quarrel.

A prominent example of an individual who seamlessly combined West Indian, African American, and radical issues was Cleveland Robinson (1915–1995). For forty years Robinson was an officer in District 65 of New York City, one of the most radical unions in the nation. Robinson was among the first labor leaders to assist the Montgomery bus boycott of 1956 and became the labor adviser thereafter to Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. During the course of the civil rights movement, Robinson was identified as a figure on the Left who could maintain warm relationships with both A. Philip Randolph and Paul Robeson. At Robinson's funeral, Harry Belafonte, another long-time friend, noted that Robinson had given him his first paid singing job and had impressed upon him that art that did not serve the cause of human rights was no art at all. In the later years of his career, Robinson was a fervent supporter of the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa, even committing civil disobedience in its service. In 1990 his efforts in behalf of that historic struggle were honored by his being named cochairman of the triumphal ticker tape parade accorded by the city of New York to Nelson Mandela.

With the advent of the New Left and counterculture movements of the 1960s and 1970s, reggae music, particularly the work of Bob Marley and Jimmy Cliff, became a rage with American youth. Touring campuses heavy with the smell of marijuana but also wrapped up in revolutionary dreams, such musicians roused young and not-so-young left-wingers with songs such as "Let's Seize the Time." The Harder They Come, a low-budget film starring Jimmy Cliff as a reggae singer, became an underground hit.

By the late 1970s, West Indian immigrants and their children were enrolling in growing numbers in public colleges. Caribbeans of all backgrounds made the annual Labor Day carnival in Brooklyn not only the largest cultural event of the boroughs but one still influenced by remnants of an earlier Left. Musicians like the Trinidadian schoolteacher "Chalkdust" (Hollis Liverpool) taught history and political lessons through music, making frequent trips to venues in the United States. Tim Hector, a James disciple and the opposition leader on the small island of Antigua, likewise served as a prominent figure on the Caribbean American political stage through appearances and his widely circulated left-wing newspaper, the Outlet.

Non-English-speaking Caribbeans, especially Dominicans and Haitians, also played steadily more important roles in the middle and lower ranks of community organizations, electoral efforts, and labor organizations. Haitians, in particular, had a vibrant press that was usually sympathetic to reformist and revolutionary initiatives in the United States and the Caribbean. Erstwhile political allies and descendants of James such as theorist Sylvia Winter gained prominence, as did once-radical but increasingly conservative West Indian intellectuals such as Nobel Prize-winning poet Derek Walcott and political scientist Orlando Patterson. The younger generation of leftist black intellectuals included many individuals like the philosopher Lewis Gordon who were of West Indian descent.

[See also Civil Rights Movement; Crusader; District 65, United Auto Workers; Domingo, Wilfred A.; Freedomways; Haitians; Harrison, Hubert H.; James, C. L. R.; Jones, Claudia; McKay, Claude; Moore, Queen Mother; Puerto Ricans; Rustin, Bayard.]

FURTHER READING

Foner, Philip S., and James Allen, eds. American Communism and Black Americans. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1987.

Henry, Paget, and Paul Buhle, eds. C. L. R. James's Caribbean. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1992.

Hill, Robert A., and Barbara Bair, eds. Marcus Garvey: Life and Lessons. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

—PAUL BUHLE and DAN GEORGAKAS

WILKINSON, FRANK (b. 1914). A central figure in the Left's fight-back against the political repression of the Cold War era, Frank Wilkinson led the movement to abolish the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC). His civil liberties crusade began in the early 1950s, when McCarthyism cut short his work for integrated public housing in Los Angeles.

In 1958, after years of supporting others called before state and federal investigating committees, he used his own appearance at a HUAC hearing in Atlanta to challenge its authority on First Amendment grounds. In an appeal to the Supreme Court, he lost on a five-to-four decision, with Justice Hugo Black writing an impassioned dissent. Wilkinson and civil rights activist Carl Braden, who had defied HUAC at the same hearing, each served nine months of a one-year prison sentence for contempt of Congress. Undaunted, Wilkinson went on to lead the ultimately successful national campaign against HUAC and to take on the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) for illegal surveillance and disruption of the civil liberties organization he headed.

Born in Charlevoix, Michigan, and raised from the age of ten in southern California, Wilkinson was the youngest son in a devout Methodist family. In 1936, after graduating from the University of California at Los Angeles, where he had been a conservative student leader, he took a world trip that exposed him to extreme poverty for the first time. The sight of beggars in Bethlehem on Christmas Eve transformed him. He gave up his plan to become a minister and instead plunged into the field of public housing, inspired by Msgr. Thomas J. O'Dwyer, president of the Los Angeles Citizens Housing Council. In 1942, after serving as secretary of the Citizens Housing Council for three years, Wilkinson became manager of the city's first integrated housing project (in Watts) and later assistant to the director of the City Housing Authority.

Wilkinson's social activism turned to civil liberties in 1952. At a slum condemnation hearing, he refused to name all the organizations he had belonged to since 1931. Subpoenaed before California's "little HUAC," he and his then wife Jean, a public school teacher, refused to testify. Both lost their respective jobs. In the growing witch hunt, a progressive social agenda was also derailed; Chavez Ravine, the slum slated for new public housing, became Dodger Stadium instead.

From 1953 to 1956, Wilkinson worked as secretary of the Citizens Committee to Preserve American Freedoms, a Los Angeles-based organization that supported victims of the State and House Un-American Activities Committees. In building a national Left/liberal coalition against HUAC, he also worked briefly for the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee in New York. In 1960, he became executive director of the National Committee to Abolish HUAC, cofounded by Aubrey Williams, Harvey O'Connor, Clarence Pickett, James Imbrie, Richard Criley, and renowned constitutional scholar Alexander Meiklejohn, whose staunch convictions regarding the First Amendment had earlier inspired Wilkinson to directly challenge HUAC. Wilkinson and Betty Rottger ran the national office from Los Angeles.

By the time Congress formally abolished HUAC in 1975, Wilkinson's organization had broadened its civil liberties agenda. Now known as the National Committee against Repressive Legislation (NCARL), it helped to defeat civil liberties-threatening Criminal Code Reform bills (S.R. 1 and S.R. 1437) and, in the 1980s, the witch-hunting Senate Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism. NCARL also lobbied against a power-expanding new charter for the FBI.

Through the Freedom of Information Act, Wilkinson learned that the FBI had amassed a 132,000-page file on him. In a 1987 settlement of Wilkinson's NCARL- and American Civil Liberties Union-sponsored suit against the FBI, a federal court barred FBI interference with NCARL and effectively terminated the thirty-two-year surveillance of Wilkinson which J. Edgar Hoover had first authorized in 1942.

In the 1990s, Wilkinson, under the auspices of the First Amendment Foundation, continued to speak around the country, using his personal experience with HUAC and the FBI to talk to organizations, teachers, and students of all ages and political backgrounds about the profound importance of defending and preserving the Bill of Rights.

[See also Braden, Anne and Carl; Federal Bureau of Investigation; House Committee on Un-American Activities; McCarthyism.]

FURTHER READING

- Criley, Richard. The FBI v. The First Amendment. Los Angeles: First Amendment Foundation, 1990.
- Fariello, Griffin. Red Scare: Memories of the American Inquisition; An Oral History. New York: W. W. Norton, 1995.
- O'Reilly, Kenneth. Hoover and the Un-Americans: The FBI, HUAC, and the Red Menace. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1983.

—SARAH COOPER

WILLARD, FRANCES (1839–1898). Widely known as “Woman of the Century,” and a strategist and public spokeswoman for the most powerful women's organization in the world, Frances Willard has been less remembered as a vocal Fabian socialist.

Born outside Rochester, New York, to a cabinet-maker and farmer, she was descended from a long line of Yankee rural folk. Her parents had both enrolled at liberal Oberlin College before moving west to care more properly for young Frances, who had contracted tuberculosis. Reared in the Wisconsin Territory, Willard grew up a tomboy and daughter of a legislator, yearning for more education. She graduated from the North Western Female College in Evanston, Illinois, in 1859, and retained Evanston as a home for most of the rest of her life. She taught and administered at the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary in Lima, New York, became president of the new Evanston College for Ladies, then dean of women and professor of English and art at Northwestern University, which absorbed the college. After friction with Northwestern's president (her former fiancé), she resigned her position in 1874, personally adrift. At this point, the new statewide women's temperance movement of Illinois asked her to become their chairperson, and she readily assented, becoming the corresponding secretary to the newly founded Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU).

She immediately indicated that temperance, per se, was but one of her broader reform interests, in which she hoped the WCTU would become involved. Resigning from her national position, she threw herself into woman suffrage work, and undertook a mass-petition temperance campaign in Illinois, which became the national model for such efforts. By 1879, the WCTU had named her its national president, a position she retained the rest of her life. From this power base, she became an important contemporary personality and an outstanding presence on the lecture circuit. In 1889 she published an enormously popular autobiography, Glimpses of Fifty Years. As her strategy pamphlet, Do Everything (1895), indicated, she urged engagement in every reform arena relevant to women's lives, frequently directing that engagement personally.

By this means, she became involved in radical causes. In the late 1880s, drawn to Knights of Labor leader Terrence Powderly and to the cause of labor more generally, she avowed warm support of the Knights. In 1892, at the People's Party's famed Saint Louis convention, Willard sought unsuccessfully to combine with Powderly and others to effect a coalition of reformers and radicals in a single antimopoly movement. (Temperance, along with other issues, proved too divisive.) She had already converted to socialistic ideas through the reading of Edward Bellamy's novel Looking Backward.

Bellamy had shown, Willard insisted, how the transformation of society could be conducted, and the cooperative order instituted peacefully, through women's decisive participation. Within the WCTU, she frequently evoked Bellamy's views as the answer to the "labor question," and urged members to join Bellamy's Nationalist Clubs, arguing that "in each Christian there exists a socialist; and in every socialist a Christian."

Troubled by her defeat at Saint Louis and the collapse of Populism into the "silver question" in 1896, Willard spent little of her remaining life in the United States. In England, sojourning with a wealthy patron, she joined the Fabian Society. Returning for the WCTU national conventions of 1893 and 1894, she urged Fabian principles of socialism upon the WCTU membership. Over this and other issues, dissidents rose up in the WCTU to challenge her, but members loyally returned her to the presidency. In these last years, she frequently stated that, had she her life to live over, she would have devoted it to socialism rather than temperance. Her health collapsed, and she died in New York in 1898. Her body was moved to Chicago, where a crowd of twenty thousand filed past her casket.

Her influence, however had only begun to affect American socialist women. She had demonstrated by her life and commitment that women had a central role to play in the coming of socialism, and that to do so they had to organize among themselves according to the prevailing moral principles. Socialist women in the rural Midwest, Plains states, and Southwest regarded Willard as their particular avatar. Orators regularly addressed the "woman question" in Willardian tones, asserting that only socialism could bring woman into full equality and meanwhile protect the home. Hundreds or perhaps thousands of erstwhile WCTU members and a handful of leading women agitators, most notably Lena Morrow Lewis and Iowa temperance leader Marion Howard Dunham, moved over from WCTU to socialist agitation. In a broader sense, the format of women's meetings owed much to Willard's influence: the parlor setting, the stress upon women's self-advancement through gender-conscious education, the sentimental evocation of motherhood in the rhetoric.

For their part, socialist publications tirelessly reiterated that (as one headline went) FRANCES WILLARD PREACHED THE "DEBS DOCTRINE." Her photo appeared regularly on magazine covers, especially of the Socialist Woman, and in combined photos of socialist women leaders used frequently by local newspapers. Josephine Conger-Kaneko, editor of the Socialist Woman/Progressive Woman, urged Willard's example on her readership with notable frequency. Debs himself, emotionally close to Willard's view of home and family, adverted to her as a socialist prophet until the end of his life. Thereafter, her memory expunged from the Left pantheon by Communists and claimed for conservatives by the WCTU, Frances Willard disappeared as a radical idol, destined to be rediscovered only by the newer feminist historians.

[See also Socialist Woman/Progressive Woman; Woman's National Socialist Union.]

FURTHER READING

- Bordin, Ruth. Woman and Temperance: The Quest for Power and Liberty, 1873-1900. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1981.
- Bordin, Ruth. Frances Willard: A Biography. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986.
- Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism, 1870-1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.
- Gordon, Anna. The Beautiful Life of Frances Willard. Chicago: Woman's Christian Temperance Union, 1898.

—MARI JO BUHLE

WILLIAMS, CLAUDE (1893-1977). A pioneer in liberation theology, Claude Williams devoted himself to a career of social activism that spanned from the early 1930s until his death. Born in western Tennessee, Williams underwent a transition from a Bible-thumping evangelist to an advocate of socialism and racial justice under the guidance of Dr. Alva Taylor of Vanderbilt University. He first attracted public attention for his work with miners in Paris, Arkansas, a small company town at the foot of the Ozarks. His work in organizing unemployed councils and support for a miners' union got him expelled from his parish, but Williams discovered that religion could be a powerful tool in mobilizing previously conservative southern workers. Williams had developed biblical metaphors for class struggle and trade unionism, crystallized in charts and sermons, that he strongly felt were applicable throughout the South.

Williams next tried his approach with black and white sharecroppers of eastern Arkansas who faced eviction and impoverishment as a result of the Depression and government crop-reduction programs. As an organizer for the Southern Tenant Farmers Union (STFU), Williams discovered that Protestant fundamentalism represented an important cultural link between black and white workers that could be employed to unite them in struggle. After being driven out of eastern Arkansas by local planters, Williams assumed a position as director of Commonwealth Labor College in Mena, Arkansas, where he rallied support for the STFU among students and faculty.

Williams's career in the STFU was cut short by conflict with Socialist leaders of the union over his Communist Party ties and his links to the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). In 1939 Williams left the union, along with several black ministers who had been key local leaders. He thereupon formed the "People's Institute of Applied Religion," an organization designed to train black and white lay preachers as organizers for the CIO. Armed with Bible charts, Williams supporters played an important role in CIO organizing drives in Memphis and Winston-Salem.

In 1942 Williams' work attracted the attention of the Detroit Presbytery, who brought him to that city to help defuse tensions between black and white southerners working in defense plants. Williams sent shop preachers into the factories to counteract the oratory of right-wing evangelists affiliated with the Ku Klux Klan and Gerald L. K. Smith. Williams refused to concede the terrain of fundamentalism to the religious Right; he was convinced that the "scriptural heritage of the people" could be given a progressive slant.

When the war ended, Williams moved to Birmingham, Alabama, where he hoped to aid in a renewed southern organizing drive of the CIO. But the growing atmosphere of anticommunism, coupled with segregationist agitation, made it difficult for him to make ties with the local labor movement. Williams moved his headquarters twenty-five miles south to Fungo Hollow, where he hoped to hold interracial "people's institutes" outside the purview of Birmingham authorities. But the rise of the Ku Klux Klan and White Citizens Councils made it difficult to conduct open political work. Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Williams endured cross burnings, beatings, and fires set on his land. By the early 1960s, civil rights activism had created a new audience for Williams's message. He put his Bible charts and sermons in the service of a voter-registration campaign among blacks in Bessemer, Alabama. He helped train some ministers and students for work in Mississippi. By the late sixties, as segregation finally crumbled, Williams's home became a center of discussion for black and white activists from all over Alabama. The work of black ministers like the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., confirmed the approach that Williams had long advocated—finding a message in Protestant evangelism that could mobilize black people in a struggle for racial justice and working people of both races in their quest for a better life.

FURTHER READING

Dunbar, Anthony P. Against the Grain: Southern Radicals and Prophets, 1929–1959. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1981.

Naison, Mark D. "Claude and Joyce Williams: Pilgrims of Justice." Southern Exposure 1 (winter 1974).

—MARK D. NAISON

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM APPLEMAN (1922–1990). An atypical radical with distinctly conservative traits, not unlike Eugene Debs or various midwestern "Progressives," William Appleman Williams grew up in the farming community of Atlantic, Iowa, and later registered as a Republican who preferred Nixon to Kennedy in 1960; but always dreaming of old-fashioned egalitarian communities, Williams developed into something of a "Christian socialist" or "socialist of the heart." A graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy and injured World War II veteran, Williams first became radicalized by his involvement following the war in civil rights activities in Corpus Christi, a harrowing experience that henceforth left him shy about engaging in direct-action politics. Nevertheless determined "to make sense" out of everything that was going on in America and the world at that time, Williams decided to become a historian at the University of Wisconsin, where a high-powered and heavily Beardian history department favored economics and points of conflict in the study of American history, in sharp contrast to the prevailing "consensus" history of the "Cold War liberals," particularly those at Ivy League schools. Williams also spent several months in England working with Labour scholars. Always fascinated by the instructive experiences of the Soviet Union, his first book surveyed American-Russian relations, particularly during the Russian Revolution.

For most of the fifties Williams was a lone voice, writing frequently in left-wing journals such as the Nation, Science and Society, and Monthly Review. Although denounced by Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., as "a pro-Communist scholar" and later hauled before to the House Committee on Un-American Activities, Williams eventually produced his celebrated Tragedy of American Diplomacy (1959) and The Contours of American History (1961). In these classic works he insisted that the United States had always been an imperialist nation (Vietnam was no aberration) and that American policy leaders, particularly "liberals" in the tradition of Jefferson, Jackson, Wilson, and Franklin Roosevelt, consistently believed that American civilization could not survive without an ever-expanding frontier or by maintaining an "open door" for American trade and political ideology throughout the world. The tragic result was involvement in two world wars (and a cold one) and staunch opposition to social revolutions almost everywhere, while at home the American elite had developed a "corporate liberal capitalist state" that negated any sense of genuine community or responsible citizenship. Lacking any viable socialist alternative, Williams sought inspiration in such "enlightened conservatives" as John Quincy Adams and Herbert Hoover. Radicals not only could but must learn from conservatives. Only forty years old, Williams had shaken historical studies as no one else had since Charles Beard.

Meanwhile, back at Madison since 1957, Williams was developing the "Wisconsin School of Diplomatic History," which produced a number of scholars who substantially rendered the study of American foreign relations more complex and much more rooted in economics. They particularly challenged the "Cold Warriors" by arguing that the United States had been a much more aggressive power than the Soviet Union. This revisionist scholarship inspired and contributed greatly to a wave of "New Left" history that swept across the nation in the next two decades. Williams, himself, greatly sympathized with the Cuban Revolution (The United States, Cuba, and Castro), applied (rather feebly) a Marxist analysis to American society (The Great Evasion), massively documented the imperialist role of agricultural businessmen (The Roots of the Modern American Empire), and sponsored a radical student publication, Studies on the Left, for which he contributed superb essays on American responses to the Russian Revolution. At the same time Williams became increasingly alienated from what he saw as "infantile leftists" on the campus. Student activists needed to reach out and communicate with "middle America" wherein, he naively believed, lay the germs of decentralized, communitarian, indigenous socialism.

Exasperated, Williams left Madison in 1968 for the simpler life of Oregon, thus removing himself from the cutting edge of radical history. Although he popularized his ideas in Empire as a Way of Life and was honored as president of the Organization of American Historians, he never again produced a path-breaking work. A second marriage ended badly, his children had serious problems, and he began drinking more heavily. He died of cancer in March 1990. His social and political involvement had been limited, his solutions vague and even naive, but Williams had left a whole generation of students, leftist scholars, and other concerned citizens with an irreversibly and radically different understanding of the course of American history.

[See also Cold War Revisionism.]

FURTHER READING

- Berger, Henry W., ed. A William Appleman Williams Reader: Selections from His Major Historical Writings. Chicago: Ivan Dee, 1992.
- Buhle, Paul M., ed. History and the New Left: Madison, Wisconsin, 1950-1970. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.
- Buhle, Paul M., and Edward Rice-Maximin. William Appleman Williams: The Tragedy of Empire. New York: Routledge, 1995.
- Gardner, Lloyd, ed. Redefining the Past: Essays in Diplomatic History in Honor of William Appleman Williams. Corvallis: Oregon State University Press, 1986.
- Wallace, Mike. "An Interview with William Appleman Williams." In Visions of History, edited by Henry Abelove et al. New York: Pantheon, 1983.

—EDWARD RICE-MAXIMIN

WILSHIRE, H. GAYLORD (1861-1927). According to a recent historian, H. Gaylord Wilshire "stands out as one of the oddest characters in a movement where eccentricity was entirely normal." A contemporary called him the "P. T. Barnum of American socialism." A real-estate speculator—Wilshire Boulevard in Los Angeles is named for him—publisher, and socialist, Wilshire was born into some wealth; he liked to dress like a dandy and exploit his superficial resemblance to George Bernard Shaw. He knew the leading literary and radical figures in London and New York. He became a billboard magnate and used his billboards to promote his own socialist candidacy as well as his magazines. At one point Wilshire sold gold stock to promote himself, his magazine, and socialism; he promoted health foods, miracle cures, Maxim Gorky's ill-fated American tour, and recordings of famous socialist orators, some of which he faked himself. Above all, Wilshire promoted Wilshire and Wilshire's Magazine.

Magazine cover by unknown designer.

Born in Cincinnati, the son of a wealthy businessman, and educated at Harvard, Wilshire twice ran on Socialist tickets in the early 1890s and then spent four years in England, where he met the radical elite. Returning to southern California in the late 1890s, he began publication of the Challenge in support of his attempt to secure the Social Democratic Party nomination for California's Sixth Congressional District, which he won though he lost the race. Wilshire used the first person singular to glorify himself and his one basic idea, the motto for his publication: Let the Nation Own the Trusts. It was a powerful slogan because it was between 1899 and 1901 that the consolidation of American industry took place, the time when great combinations like U. S. Steel were born. Wilshire used his message, self-promotion in the form of publishing countless letters of praise, and the depth of his pocketbook to reach more than 100,000 readers in the first decade of the twentieth century.

[See also Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Quint, Howard. "Gaylord Wilshire and Socialism's First Congressional Campaign." Pacific Historical Review 26 (November 1957).

Reynolds, Robert D., Jr. "The Millionaire Socialists: J. G. Phelps and His Circle of Friends." Ph.D. diss., University of South Carolina, 1974.

Shore, Elliott. Talkin' Socialism: J. A. Wayland and the Role of the Press in American Radicalism, 1890-1912. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1988.

—ELLIOTT SHORE

WINSTON, HENRY (1911-1986). A leading African American Communist, Henry Winston pioneered the U.S. anti-imperialist movement in aid to African nations struggling for independence, and for decades played a central role in the organizational life of the Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA). The son of a sawmill laborer and steelworker relocated from Hattiesburg, Mississippi, to Kansas City, Missouri, Winston was compelled by family economics to leave high school. His political activities began at age nineteen, in Kansas City, where he led the city's Unemployed Council. Over the next few years, he helped organize similar councils in a number of African American communities, including Harlem and Cleveland. After joining the Young Communist League (YCL) and the CPUSA, he rose quickly through the ranks of both, due to his outstanding organizational skills. By 1936, he became the YCL's national organizational secretary and a member of the CPUSA's central committee. He was also active in the Scottsboro case and in support of Republican Spain.

During the Second World War, Winston helped enlist more than fifteen thousands Communists into the armed forces. His own European tour of duty ended with an honorable discharge, despite government discrimination against Communists. Afterward, he was elected national organization secretary of the CPUSA, then faced the emergence of the Cold War. Sentenced in 1947 to jail for five years under the Smith Act, Winston exhausted his appeals and, by decision of the Party, along with three other leaders went "underground." After five years, it was decided that Winston should surrender. He was sentenced to three additional years in the federal penitentiary in Terre Haute, Indiana.

During his prison term, Winston developed a brain tumor that prison officials refused to treat until too late to save his sight. An international campaign for his freedom, including among its supporters Eleanor Roosevelt, Norman Thomas, A. Philip Randolph, and Reinhold Niebuhr, brought a 1961 commutation of his sentence by the new Kennedy administration. (Fidel Castro had offered to exchange him for a Bay of Pigs prisoner.)

In 1966 Winston was voted Party chairman, in which capacity he played an instrumental role in defending Angela Davis from government persecution, and in rallying Communist opposition to the Vietnam War. As an international figure, Winston became friends with many African leaders, including Amílcar Cabral and Kwame Nkrumah. In his major works, Strategy for a Black Agenda and Class, Race, and Black Liberation, Winston polemicized against theories of race separation, back-to-Africa movements, and black capitalism. He also directed the CPUSA's adoption of a ban on male supremacy. At age sixty-five, Winston received the Order of the October Revolution from the Soviet Union. He died in Moscow, and his ashes were placed in a vault at Waldheim Cemetery in Chicago, with those of other famous American socialists, communists, and labor radicals.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Young Communist League.]

FURTHER READING

Jackson, Maurice. "He Kept His Eyes on the Prize." People's Daily World, 19 February 1987.

—MAURICE JACKSON

WOBBLIES. See Industrial Workers of the World.

WOMAN QUESTION. Since its inception, the American Left has defined itself principally in relation to the working class, the designated agent of revolutionary change. The role of women within the movement has been, consequently, problematical. Women historically have worked for wages in fewer numbers than men, and their jobs, mainly in low-paying manufacturing and service sectors, have not matched the image of proletarian work as established by the male leadership. Only in 1920 did women gain the right to vote, and therefore women had no direct role in electoral campaigns until relatively recently in the history of the Left. The reality of women's oppression or subordination has nevertheless repeatedly challenged Left theorists and strategists to wrestle with matters defined by gender as well as class. This discussion has been known as the "woman question."

Although this discussion generally dates to abolitionists' confrontation with women's controversial role in the antislavery movement, the Left became intimately involved during the decades after the Civil War. At this time an independent and mass woman's movement took shape and presented socialist and reformist organizations alike with a demand for recognition. German American socialists responded most forcefully to die Frauenfrage and experimented with the first organizations designed to address women's special concerns. The most important theoretical work on the woman question appeared in Germany in 1879, August Bebel's Die Frau und der Sozialismus. Translated by Daniel De Leon as Woman under Socialism and published in the United States in 1904, Bebel's text supplied the American Left with its standard "answer" through the 1930s.

Bebel opened his text by acknowledging that "woman and workingmen have, since [days of] old, had this in common—oppression." He then constructed a grand historical framework to trace women's distinct role in social production from ancient times to the consolidation of capitalism in the nineteenth century and to relate each historical stage to the intensification of their oppression. While he regretted the pull of women into the waged labor force under modern industry for its impact on family life, he nevertheless looked optimistically upon this development. The trend in social life, Bebel wrote, "is not to banish woman back to the house and hearth as our 'domestic life' fanatics prescribe . . . but is to lead woman out of the narrow sphere of strictly domestic life to a full participation in the public life of the people." As the material conditions of industrial capitalism forced women into wage labor, they, like male workers, could ready themselves for class war and the socialist reconstruction of society. Bebel not only juxtaposed the sufferings of the working class and women across history but explained how women would attain freedom only insofar as they struggled to overthrow capitalism.

Bebel's parallel construction of the oppression of women and workers did not settle the matter. Because women bear a special relation to what Marx and Engels had termed the "reproduction of labor power," that is, the bearing and raising of children as well as the maintenance of the household, their roles as wage-earners never correspond to those of men. When women work for wages they earn less than men, and as an expanding sector of the labor market, women concentrate into a small number of low-paying occupations. Equally important, waged work does not significantly alter women's responsibilities for the family and household. For these reasons, the persistent Left emphasis on social production as the site of revolutionary consciousness and proletarian agency displaces women and their concerns and ensures their questionable status within the movement and its theoretical formulations.

[See also Socialist Feminism.]

FURTHER READING

- Eisenstein, Zillah, ed. Capitalist Patriarchy and the Case for Socialist Feminism. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1978.
- Kuhn, Annette, and Annemarie Wolpe. Feminism and Materialism: Women and Modes of Production. Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1978.
- Vogel, Lise. Marxism and the Oppression of Women. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1984.

—MARI JO BUHLE

WOMAN REBEL. The short-lived anarchist journal Woman Rebel is notable because of the editorship of birth-control advocate Margaret Sanger. Produced monthly from March through October 1914, this eight-page newspaper addressed working-class women in the name of labor militancy, free love, and anticlericalism. In Sanger's opinion, Woman Rebel was "red and flaming," and its motto, No Gods, No Masters, complemented its advocacy of direct action.

Sanger reprinted the preamble to the constitution of the Industrial Workers of the World and essays by feminist writers Olive Schreiner, Ellen Key, Helen Keller, and Emma Goldman. Sanger's editorials, which included promotion of birth control, were ultraileftist and occasionally struck out at "bourgeois feminists." In the July issue she published an essay, "In Defense of Assassination," by Herbert A. Thorpe, for which the U.S. Post Office rescinded her mailing privileges. Sanger was then indicted the following month for violating the Comstock Postal Act of 1873. The newspaper folded when Sanger, hoping to avoid arrest, sought exile abroad.

[See also Anarchism; Sanger, Margaret.]

FURTHER READING

- Baskin, Alex, ed. Woman Rebel. Reprint. New York: Archives of Social History, 1976.
- Kennedy, David M. Birth Control in America: The Career of Margaret Sanger. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1970.

—MARI JO BUHLE

WOMAN'S NATIONAL COMMITTEE. The purpose of the Woman's National Committee (WNC) was to represent women and their concerns within the Socialist Party. At the 1907 meeting of the Second International in Stuttgart, Germany, delegates adopted a resolution calling upon Socialists to campaign for woman suffrage, but only within their own organizations. The American party responded immediately by appointing its first national lecturer on women's issues. In May 1909 the party's national convention created a special committee "to care for and manage the work of organization among women" and provided funds to maintain a woman organizer in the field.

The establishment of the WNC marked an important event in the history of socialist women because its clear position within the Socialist Party signaled the end of autonomous women's organizations. Although women continued to organize separately, they did so as committees within the regularly constituted Socialist locals.

The WNC coordinated several aspects of women's affairs. Two outstanding organizers, Anna A. Maley and Caroline Lowe, chaired the committee during its most active years and made the WNC a valuable educational service to rank-and-file women. They produced and distributed scores of leaflets focused on women's issues and drew up a more extensive curriculum for study. The WNC endorsed the campaign for woman suffrage and sponsored lectures by the party's most popular speakers. The WNC advised local women's committees on conducting strike-support work and on reaching out to immigrant women. Through its work, the role of women within the Socialist movement gained recognition along the lines established by the Second International.

From Appeal to Reason, 6 September 1903.

As the party endured a bout of intense factionalism around 1912, the national executive committee of the Socialist Party ceased its financial support and the leadership of the WNC fell into disarray. By this time, local women's committees had been established in at least fifteen states, and women's membership remained steady. The final chairperson of the WNC, Winnie Branstetter, nevertheless orchestrated its demise, and in June 1915 the national executive committee, after polling its members, officially abolished the WNC. Although most women accepted this decision without formal protest, a few interpreted the event as an affirmation of their own suspicion that the WNC had been little more than an attempt by the party leadership to bring women under their control. After 1915 Socialist women lacked coordination at the national level as well as a distinctive voice within the larger movement.

[See also Socialist Party; Socialist Woman/Progressive Woman; Woman's National Socialist Union.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism, 1870-1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.

Dancis, Bruce. "Socialism and Women in the United States, 1900-1917." Socialist Revolution 6 (January-March 1976).

Miller, Sally. "Women in the Party Bureaucracy: Subservient Functionaries." In Flawed Liberation: Socialism and Feminism, edited by Sally Miller. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981.

—MARI JO BUHLE

WOMAN'S NATIONAL SOCIALIST UNION.

Organized independently of the Socialist Party, the Woman's National Socialist Union (WNSU) formed in 1901 to rally women to the cause of socialism. Initiated primarily by California women with roots in Bellamy Nationalism and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the WNSU agreed upon a distinct strategy for women's emancipation while allying with the struggle to overthrow capitalism. Although the Socialist Party at its founding convention included in its platform a commitment to "equal civil and political rights for men and women," the WNSU acted on the belief that women could achieve only second-class status in locals officiated by men. For both practical and theoretical reasons, they insisted on autonomy.

Although the WNSU failed to make organizational headway outside California and Kansas, its leaders managed to hold a special meeting prior to the Socialist Party's national convention in 1904. Delegates to this first national meeting of socialist women discussed the role of women within the larger movement and the wisdom of separate organizations. Several delegates from the New York area criticized the WNSU for its potential role in discouraging women from joining regular party locals and thereby weakening the movement. The party press echoed this opinion, and the WNSU lingered for a few years as a regional network of California clubs.

[See also Socialist Party; Woman's National Committee.]

FURTHER READING

Buhle Mari Jo. Women and American Socialism, 1870-1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.

—MARI JO BUHLE

WOMEN: A JOURNAL OF LIBERATION first appeared in fall 1969 and continued publishing, more or less regularly, until 1982. Along with off our backs, Up from Under, and Aphra, Women: A Journal represented the first wave of periodicals to accompany the revival of feminism in the late 1960s. Ideologically, it identified itself with the women's liberation movement, as opposed to the women's rights perspective of the National Organization for Women: "the word 'liberation' . . . implies a deep consciousness of the significance of our struggle: women are asking for nothing less than the total transformation of the world" (from vol. 2, no. 1, 1970). At a less elevated level of rhetoric, the difference between radical and liberal was not so great; Women: A Journal defined its goal for women as greater choice, its target as predetermined social roles. Women: A Journal did not distinguish between what was later called "radical," or "cultural," and "socialist" feminism, but embraced both in its understanding of the tasks of women's liberation. Thus, early issues included articles about both sexuality and class, lifestyle and imperialism. Issues were organized around a thematic focus in a deliberate effort to parallel the consciousness-raising focus of early women's liberation. Early themes included women's history, the family, and women workers under capitalism.

Women: A Journal was published in Baltimore, but served a larger audience. (It estimated its readership in 1970 was fifteen thousand.) Inasmuch as the early women's liberation movement was largely local in structure, with almost no national existence, the Journal played a crucial role in circulating news and writings between cities. Important articles identified with particular localities—for instance, Roxanne Dunbar's article on poor white women, first published by No More Fun and Games in Boston—received a national audience in Women: A Journal. Brief reports on women's liberation activities around the United States played a similar function; there, readers learned about the Miss America protest in Atlantic City, abortion activism in Lansing, and what the Redstockings were doing in New York City.

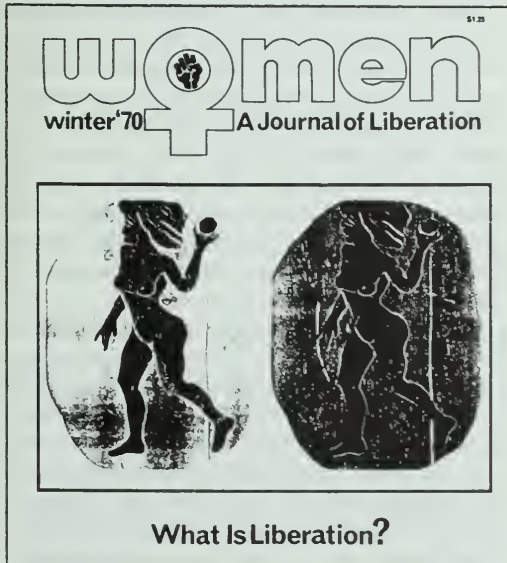

A subscribers' survey (vol. 3, no. 1, 1972) provides information on who read Women: A Journal. Subscribers were well educated but ill paid (most had some graduate education, most earned under $10,000 a year), presumably white women. Despite the Journal's emphasis on communal and other alternative lifestyles, the largest group of subscribers (one-third) lived in nuclear families, which seemed cause for self-criticism ("It seems that we're all fairly conservative in this area, after all").

In keeping with the relentlessly antihierarchical character of the early women's liberation movement, Women: A Journal was published by a collective, albeit of changing membership. Pride of authorship was discouraged. Rotating tasks among collective members, distributing rather than consolidating skills, was the rule, even the pride of the publishing collective. By 1980 the magazine appeared more irregularly, and wider swings in ideological focus between issues suggest a lack of continuity in the collective. A further sign of the decline of Women: A Journal was the appearance, by 1981, of a single editor and other attempts at professionalization, including a rather formal market research study of the magazine's readership. The last two issues appeared in 1981 (Peace and War) and 1982 (Bodies).

[See also Socialist Feminism; Women's Liberation.]

—ELLEN CAROL DU BOIS

Journal cover by unknown designer.

WOMEN'S LIBERATION. Historically, many men and women on the Left have dismissed feminism as a bourgeois reform movement merely seeking to secure women's rights within an otherwise unchanged political-economic structure. American feminists, however, have frequently offered a powerful general critique of their culture and society. As an oppositional movement, American feminism has not only helped redress women's grievances, but has also challenged unarticulated assumptions about men's and women's proper economic, social, and cultural place in American society. In this way, feminists have played a central historical role in addressing the problems accompanying changes in family life and shifting gender relations.

The "first wave" of feminism had its roots in the abolitionist movement of the nineteenth century. As they fought to end slavery, female activists found themselves ridiculed and even prohibited from public speaking. Their growing awareness of their subordinate legal and social status led to the woman's rights movement. Convened by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Lucretia Mott, the first woman's rights conference gathered in 1848 at Seneca Falls, New York. It passed an extraordinary document modeled on the Declaration of Independence, "The Declaration of Sentiment," which described women's social, economic, and cultural grievances and called for woman suffrage. After the Civil War, these women suffered a bitter disappointment when the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments, which conferred the rights and duties of citizens upon newly freed slaves, excluded women. Told to be patient, that it was the "Negro's hour," American women responded by establishing organizations to secure the vote for themselves. It took four generations of women to obtain suffrage. By the time the Nineteenth Amendment (commonly called the Susan B. Anthony Amendment) was ratified, the American woman's rights movement had narrowed into a single-issue campaign.

The word féministe originated in France in the 1880s, spread across the Channel to England by the 1890s, and made its way across the Atlantic by 1910. In 1912 a small group of twenty-five New York women formed Heterodoxy, a prototypical consciousness-raising group that required each member "not to be orthodox" in her opinion. To these young adventurous women, Feminism—which they always capitalized—promised self-fulfillment, encouraged erotic satisfaction, and demanded of its participants radical criticism of the culture at large. Such a radical and expressive definition of feminism appealed to bohemians of Greenwich Village but failed to capture many followers.

Between 1920 and the emergence of feminism's "second wave," in the 1960s, American feminism was represented largely by the National Woman's Party (NWP), a tactically militant though politically conservative offshoot of the suffrage movement, founded by Alice Paul in 1916. Convinced that suffrage by itself would not improve women's status, Paul drafted the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), which would have declared unconstitutional discrimination on the grounds of sex. A single-issue organization, the NWP kept the ERA alive by persistently lobbying both political parties, but it failed to ally with the civil rights or labor movements. Politically isolated, the NWP narrowed into a small, elite band of Paul's followers who frequently expressed flagrant racist, anti-Semitic, and red-baiting sentiments.

The contradictions and frustrations faced by many women during the 1950s and early 1960s in effect set the agenda for the second wave of feminism. While the media painted a roseate portrait of suburban motherhood and the happy nuclear family, the preconditions for a new feminist movement were in the making. Popular culture scorned the working woman, but an expanding service sector, coupled with families' desire for a second income to maintain a middle-class standard of living, drew growing numbers of married middle-class mothers into the paid labor force. A high divorce rate and a revolution in birth-control technology pitted traditional attitudes of sexual restraint against a growing sexual liberalism. As women's life span lengthened, the problem of the "empty nest" became more serious. The growing enrollment of female students in colleges and universities created a generation of young women with elevated expectations and a heightened sense of entitlement.

During the 1950s and early 1960s, McCarthyism effectively silenced any dissent or even the frank recognition of the many problems that accompanied women's growing sexual and economic independence. Housewives, as Betty Friedan revealed in her best-selling 1963 exposé, The Feminine Mystique, suffered profound despair, interminable boredom, and unbearable isolation as a result of living exclusively as wives and mothers. Most housewives, however, blamed themselves for their unhappiness. Friedan dubbed their discontent "the problem that has no name." Working women encountered wage discrimination, sexual harassment, the absence of child care, and unequal pay in a sex-segregated labor force. The sexual revolution, at first celebrated by many young women as an expression of individual emancipation (as well as an act of generational defiance), also created new opportunities for the sexual exploitation of women. New contraceptives increased women's sexual freedom, but when they failed, they had to confront the reality that abortion remained illegal. Some women resented the objectification of their bodies to promote consumerism, the new permissiveness toward pornography, and the unaltered economic situation that made prostitution a profitable means of survival. Stripped of their traditional sexual veto—by which women had traditionally extracted promises of male financial support and emotional commitment—some women began to regard the sexual revolution of the 1960s as a male-defined proposition.

The 1960s ushered in a new progressive spirit that legitimized women's questioning of authority and of social and cultural traditions. The civil rights movement successfully ended legal desegregation, the anti-war movement questioned the arrogance of the American effort to contain communism by destroying Vietnam, and Third World countries all over the globe waged liberation movements against dictatorships and foreign domination. From these movements, women learned the power of direct action, absorbed the idea of "participatory democracy," and witnessed how self-determination could lead to independence.

In the wake of such social change, two generations of women pressed against the limits of male liberalism and radicalism. In 1961 Esther Peterson successfully pushed President John F. Kennedy to establish the President's Commission on the Status of Women. The commission's findings, published as American Women in 1963, documented women's economic and social subordination but offered only timid recommendations that generally ignored working women's basic needs. In 1963 the U.S. Congress passed the Equal Pay Act, which required equal pay for equal work. Symbolically important, the Equal Pay Act never addressed the reality that most women and men work in separate labor forces with separate pay scales. Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act illegalized sex discrimination in employment practices, but the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission had little intention of enforcing it. Besides, the act exempted educational and governmental agencies. At the third annual meeting of the National Conference of State Commissions on Women, in 1966, a group of women fed up with federal government's unwillingness to enforce its own laws founded the National Organization for Women (NOW). Among the founders were Betty Friedan, Aileen Hernandez, Pauli Murray, and two dozen fairly influential women. Organized as a national organization with local chapters, NOW became the most visible and broadly based feminist civil rights organization in the United States. Its goal was "to take action to bring women into full participation in the mainstream of American society now, exercising all the privileges and responsibilities thereof in truly equal partnership with men." Although NOW eventually embraced many of the more radical goals of the women's liberation movement—such as reproductive rights and the rights of lesbians—it generally concentrated on challenging legal discrimination, improving women's educational opportunities, and advancing women's formal equality. Most of NOW's work reflected the liberal feminist belief that government must protect the individual's innate rights to freedom and equal opportunity. NOW therefore worked hard for the ratification of the ERA. In the 1980s, NOW entered mainstream politics, endorsed national candidates, and became closely associated with liberal feminism's effort to secure equal rights for women. NOW was instrumental in ending sex-segregated want ads, enforcing Title VII through successful class-action suits, and publicizing women's problems through national task forces.

During the late sixties, another distinct branch of feminism simultaneously emerged in the United States. These were usually younger women, veterans of other movements, who sought radical change and subjected all authority—especially men's—to close scrutiny. Their experiences in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), and other New Left groups enhanced their sense of personal independence, increased their confidence, and taught them valuable organizing and speaking skills. At the same time, the supposed egalitarianism of these groups frequently collided with young men's automatic assumption of leadership and decision-making. Often relegated to menial chores, sometimes treated as interchangeable sexual objects on young men's revolving beds, women in the New Left—like female abolitionists a century earlier—began questioning their subordinate status within a movement ostensibly dedicated to participatory democracy and nonhierarchical relations.

The ridicule that greeted their concerns angered many New Left women and fueled their difficult but eventual decision to create an autonomous women's liberation movement. As early as 1964, Casey Hayden and Mary King anonymously tried to raise the issue of women's subordination within SNCC, only to elicit Stokely Carmichael's joking but symbolic retort that "the only position for women in SNCC is prone." At the SDS conventions of 1965 and 1966, at the National Conference for New Politics in Chicago in 1967, at the 1969 Counter-Inaugural demonstration in Washington, D.C., New Left women repeatedly witnessed their radical "brothers" ridicule their feminist concerns. First in Chicago, then in New York and in Washington, D.C., women in the New Left gathered in small groups to discuss their shared confusion and resentments. At first, they simply called themselves "radical" women to distinguish themselves from the liberal feminists of NOW. Then, to identify themselves with Third World and black liberation movements, they began describing themselves as the "women's liberation movement."

Unlike NOW, the women's liberation movement was allergic to bureaucratic and hierarchical organization, indeed, even to leadership itself. In style as well as substance, the early women's liberation movement inherited some of the greatest strengths—as well as weaknesses—from the radical men they had ostensibly left. From the early civil rights movement they inherited the certainty that "separate but equal" would never guarantee equality. From the subsequent Black Power movement, they adopted the belief that women required some degree of separatism to assert their power. From the counterculture, which they often criticized for trying to keep women "barefoot and pregnant," they retained the moral imperative of living as though the future had already replaced the present. From the late New Left—in the midst of its own self-destruction—they inherited an apocalyptic utopianism that shunned structure and leadership, romanticized "participatory democracy" and the need for consensus, avoided alliances with "establishment" groups, spoke a garbled revolutionary rhetoric, glamorized vanguardism, and demanded moral absolutism, ideological purity, and "correct politics."

Between 1968 and 1970, women's liberation groups sprouted rapidly across the country. Sometimes an umbrella group coordinated the formation of new groups, but many thrived in isolation. Newsletters and journals—including the Voice of Women's Liberation in Chicago, It Ain't Me Babe in Berkeley, California, off our backs in Washington, D.C., and No More Fun and Games in Boston—sped the rapid transmission of new activities and ideas.

Seeking radical change, women's liberationists shunned established reformist efforts in favor of educating themselves and society about the pervasive sexual inequality that conventional wisdom assumed to be "natural." Kathie Sarachild, an early activist in New York Radical Women, coined the phrase "consciousness-raising" to describe the process by which women discovered the truth of their situation. Within the safe confines of a "consciousness-raising group," women began unmasking the world around them as they discussed childhood experiences, mother-daughter relationships, marriage, sexual experiences, stereotypes of femininity, and body images, among other issues. By sharing individual problems, members soon recognized the commonality of their female experiences, and the power relations hidden in their personal and public lives. Unlike group therapy, consciousness-raising was not intended to adapt the individual to society, but to galvanize each woman to change society.

An important contribution of the women's liberation movement was its grounding of political theory in women's concrete life experiences. In Notes from the Second Year (1970), Carol Hanisch popularized the idea that "the personal is political." This slogan, which soon became central to the women's liberation movement, broke down the false dichotomy between "personal" and "political," and forced women—and some men—to recognize that power relations were just as operative in the bedroom or kitchen as in public life.

Feminist writings—at first printed as pamphlets—quickly made their way across the country, deepening women's understanding of "the personal is political" and accelerating the "consciousness-raising" that was transforming women's perceptions of their lives. Ann Koedt's "The Myth of the Vaginal Orgasm" questioned the Freudian assumption that intercourse was required for female sexual satisfaction, and left open the possibility that, with clitoral stimulation, women could achieve sexual satisfaction with or without men. Naomi Weisstein, a veteran of other 1960s movements, a founding member of the Chicago women's liberation movement and the Chicago Women's Liberation Rock Band (1970–1973), used her training as an experimental psychologist to argue in "Kinder, Kirche, Küche as Scientific Law: Psychology Constructs the Female" that psychology had created and rationalized an artificial ideal of femininity. Pat Mainardi's "The Politics of Housework" disputed the premise that women should bear exclusive responsibility for housework by sardonically repeating the arguments men typically used to avoid sharing domestic work.

To educate the public, early women's liberationists engaged in "zap" actions, essentially street theater. In January 1968, at the Jeanette Rankin Peace Brigade march in Washington, D.C.—the first all-women's anti-Vietnam War peace demonstration—a group of New York radical feminists staged a "Burial of Traditional Womanhood" to dramatize the fact that they were protesting the war as independent women, rather than as mothers or wives of men. Later that year, New York radical feminists gained national attention when they staged an even more theatrical protest at the Miss America contest in Atlantic City. Protesting the use of women as sexual objects to promote consumerism, they crowned a sheep to parody women being treated like meat and threw into a large "freedom trashcan" objects of "female torture"—bras, cosmetics, hair spray, girdles, copies of Ladies Home Journal. Later, the press invented the myth that feminists had burned their bras. There were other famous demonstrations. Women's liberationists invaded bridal fairs to protest the legal inequalities in the marriage contract; they staged sit-downs at famous women's magazines to protest the trivialization of women's concerns; dressed as witches, they hexed Wall Street and companies that exploited the poor. The most significant, broad-gauged event took place on 26 August 1970. Sponsored by a coalition of NOW and women's liberation groups, the national Women's Strike for Equality commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of woman suffrage by staging rallies and marches across the country. In New York, some twenty thousand women marched down Fifth Avenue, calling for the three preconditions of women's liberation: twenty-four-hour child-care centers, abortion on demand, and equal opportunity in education and employment.

At its best, "the personal is political" breathed new life into American radical politics by legitimizing the analysis of hidden exploitation and by giving "women's issues" political prominence. It drew public attention to the thousands of deaths that resulted from illegal abortions, dramatized how the lack of child care prevented women from entering public life as equals with men, and revealed the astonishing prevalence of unsatisfactory sex and "faked orgasms" that remained a well-guarded secret in the midst of the sexual revolution. During the 1970s, it permitted feminists to "name" the many hidden injuries women suffered in silence: rape, sexual harassment, wife battering, and forced sexual slavery.

As political theory, however, "the personal is political" had drawbacks. If theory was based on women's experiences, then the political program that emerged from a largely white middle-class movement was hardly applicable to women of other races, classes, and cultures. Even worse, defining the personal as political frequently led to the position that how one lived was a political end in itself. In the name of "the personal is political," too many women were judged traitors for living with men, bearing children, pursuing a professional career, or even dressing "incorrectly." Many highly skilled women who assumed authentic leadership were trashed by a movement that feared domination by "male styles."

Critics noted that women's liberationists seemed particularly hostile toward marriage, men, and children—and they weren't entirely wrong. Many movement participants were refugees from the 1950s, a decade that vilified female independence and insisted that women's anatomy was their destiny. The immediate past conjured up images of claustrophobic marriages, coercive motherhood, and constrained chastity. A terror of being trapped—again, or for the very first time—drove activists to search for alternatives to the traditional nuclear families they remembered from the 1950s. As the movement matured, hostility gave way to sophisticated critiques of the institution of marriage, the institution of motherhood, and the impossible burden of raising children alone without help from either men or the government.

From the beginning, radical women theorized about the origins of women's oppression and sought remedies for it. Reacting against the biological determinism of the 1950s, as well as that decade's glorification of women's moral superiority as mothers, early writers emphasized the fundamental similarity of the sexes and sought to eliminate—or at least diminish—sexual difference. Kate Millett's famous Sexual Politics (1970), a book that attacked the misogyny of American culture, called for "the annihilation of sex roles." Shulamith Firestone's The Dialectic of Sex (1970) viewed women's oppression as rooted in their biological difference, and argued that test-tube babies might make women equal to men. By the mid-1970s, Carolyn Heilbrun, in Toward a Recognition of Androgyny (1973), and others were exploring the possibility of combining the best of both masculine and feminine characteristics.

But by the late 1970s, many feminist writers had begun the search for a "woman-centered" definition of female experience. The women's health movement—popularized by early pamphlet versions of the book Our Bodies, Our Selves (1971)—redefined birth, menstruation, and menopause as normal processes and helped reverse women's negative feelings toward their bodies. Writers such as Susan Griffin, Mary Daly, and Adrienne Rich began exploring—and celebrating—women's values and experiences. Carol Gilligan's In a Different Voice (1982) even argued that women possess a distinct morality. A "woman-centered perspective" helped women to reclaim their "difference" as a valuable asset, rather than as a liability. But claims of women's special nature and natural superiority sometimes came perilously close to agreeing with the Freudian determinism of the 1950s, the sociobiologists of the 1970s, and the Christian anti-feminists of the 1980s. How to define woman's nature—when men still remained the frame of reference—was and remains a problem that haunts feminist debates over social policy and litigation.

Many of the splits that destroyed the movement's unity originated in women's differing political assessments of the causes of and solutions to women's subordination. Women in NOW, for example, believed that legal reforms would substantively improve women's status in the United States. Early radical feminists argued that women's oppression was the root of all systems of oppression and that women together could revolutionize society. The slogan "Sisterhood Is Powerful," coined by Kathie Sarachild in 1968, best expressed this point of view. Between 1970 and 1972, a "gay/straight split" caused profound ruptures in the movement. Lesbians insisted the movement treat their sexual preference as a legitimate political issue, and some argued that lesbians constituted the political vanguard of the women's movement. During the 1970s large number of lesbian feminists created a separatist woman's culture politically based in a growing network of women's centers, rape crisis centers, battered women's shelters, and culturally expressed in feminist bookstores, coffeehouses, and music festivals. Separatists believed that only a woman's culture could fundamentally challenge the "compulsory heterosexuality" of patriarchal culture. By the later 1970s, feminists further splintered into groups that promoted spirituality (womanspirit and goddess worship), ecology (ecofeminism), and specifically anti-masculinist anti-war and anti-nuclear campaigns.

In the earliest years of the movement, feminists who remained most closely yoked to the Left were derided as "male identified" "politicos" by radical feminists. Later, they described themselves as socialist feminists or Marxist feminists. Like radical feminists, socialist feminists believed that radical change, not merely reform, was necessary to free women. Some leftist feminists accepted the traditional Marxist belief that women's liberation would be achieved after the overthrow of capitalism, the elimination of private property, and the establishment of a socialist society. Noting women's grim position in socialist countries, however, others argued that patriarchy and capitalism both oppressed women. Two short pamphlets in the late 1960s—Margaret Benston's "The Political Economy of Women's Liberation" and Juliet Mitchell's "Women: The Longest Revolution"—were among the first attempts to synthesize the insights of radical feminism with the class analysis of Marxism. One writer called the effort an "unhappy marriage." Still, autonomous socialist-feminist groups formed in dozens of cities. In the late 1960s, the Boston organization Bread and Roses early defined itself as a socialist-feminist group, and throughout the 1970s socialist feminists formed women's unions, attempting—mostly unsuccessfully—to organize working women. In 1975 a national socialist-feminist conference in Yellow Springs, Ohio, drew more than two thousand women.

Still, socialist feminism had a minimal impact on American feminism as a whole. Its highly sophisticated and often jargon-ridden rhetoric limited its ability to appeal to ordinary women. Expressed in abstract language, socialist-feminist writings rarely embodied the emotional appeal of radical-feminist descriptions of women's concrete suffering. Americans' instinctive fear of collectivist solutions and deeply rooted anticommunism, moreover, left socialist feminism a largely self-referential and marginalized group. Its greatest impact was in the universities and colleges, where socialist feminists had a disproportionate influence as faculty members. Their prolific feminist scholarship reinvigorated many feminist issues and analyses with a class and racial dimension and helped keep alive the early women's liberation belief that there can be no individual solution to women's problems.

Neither radical feminism nor socialist feminism had the power to determine how feminism became translated into mainstream culture. By the end of the 1970s, liberal feminists and the media had helped integrate feminism into an American liberal tradition that emphasized individual rights and individual solutions to social problems. In a sudden media blitz during 1970, the national media dramatically turned a small movement into a household cliché and at the same time created fraudulent celebrities, discredited participants as hysterical man-haters or lesbians, and distorted ideas. As the women's liberation movement intersected with the human potential movement, feminism became redefined as a process of individual self-realization. Women's magazines helped women cope with their new responsibilities by teaching assertiveness, dressing for success, stress management, and other privatized techniques.

By 1980, it was clear that the more emancipatory ideas of the women's movement—those that had proposed the transformation of the private sphere—had been excluded from the new image of the “superwoman.” Women's entry into the labor force had not been followed by a commensurate reorganization of public institutions (“flextime,” child care, or paid parental leave), or in the home. Women's lives broadened, but often at the cost of sheer exhaustion as they worked—without help—a “double shift” as both a paid worker and an unpaid housewife. The result, as so many noticed in the 1980s, was a new prescriptive role: the myth that a woman can “have it all” and, moreover, do it all, but by herself. Family problems continued to be defined as women's issues. The fantasy of the superwoman obscured the stubborn persistence of a sex-segregated labor market and the fact that, while substantial numbers of middle-class women had moved into the professions, a growing number of women, especially after divorce, had slid into poverty.

In 1980, too, the press repeatedly pronounced the movement dead. Feminists had to admit that their movement was on the defensive. The ERA, passed by Congress in 1972, met stiff opposition from the New Right and was granted a five-year extension to obtain ratification. By 1982, the ERA still failed to win ratification, and was successfully defeated by right-wing propaganda and poor organization and tactics on the part of its proponents.

By 1980, when the American people elected Ronald Reagan as their president, feminism had entered mainstream national politics. Reagan's campaign, which tried to kindle nostalgia for the 1950s and the traditional nuclear family, helped accelerate the cultural backlash against feminism. The culture wars, kicked off during the 1970s, included the gender wars—the hotly contested struggle over women's and men's appropriate role and behavior in American society. Susan Faludi, in her best-selling Backlash (1991), documented one side of that cultural war, the New Right's effort to sensationalize legal abortion, the media's effort to blame feminism for “superwoman burnout,” and the mythic phenomena of the “infertility epidemic” and the “terminally single woman.” Marilyn French's The War against Women (1992), in contrast, documented the continued subordination of women in American society. Still, pundits repeatedly declared the movement dead and dubbed the era as “post-feminist,” thus contributing to the decade's sense that feminism had become irrelevant to American culture.

The opposite was true. The movement had already spread deeper into mainstream culture and society than most people realized. In films, books, popular culture, and politics, feminism and the conflicts it created took central stage. By the 1980s, the network of self-help centers created by feminists—rape crisis hot lines and battered women's shelters—had become expected services in most U.S. towns and cities. Across the nation, feminist scholars challenged the paradigms and canon of virtually every academic discipline. During the 1970s and 1980s, black, Chicana, Asian, Latina, professional, trade union, religious, and working women had created their own feminist organizations, and, in the process, had redefined and expanded the meaning of feminism.

The United Nations (UN) Decade for Women (1976–1985) further sowed the seeds of feminism deeply into American soil and around the world. At the U.S. government-sponsored National Conference on Women at Houston in 1977, American women—representing all classes, regions, religions, and political and sexual persuasions—managed to agree on a national agenda that incorporated some of the radical visions of the early women's liberation movement.

At the UN conferences held in Mexico City (1975), Copenhagen (1980), and Nairobi (1985), networks of feminists from around the globe gradually transcended cultural and ideological conflicts to shape a new feminist global agenda. At the 1992 UN Vienna meeting on human rights, for example, feminists succeeded in convincing delegates to acknowledge that some customs are indeed crimes and that women's rights are human rights. At the 1993 UN Cairo meeting on population and development, feminists again succeeded in persuading delegates that women's education and economic engagement, not just industrial development, would result in population control. And at the Fourth UN Conference on Women held in Beijing in 1995, feminists agreed upon a plan of action that acknowledged that violence against women is a violation of their human rights.

On the domestic front, the backlash continued during the 1980s and 1990s. In national politics feminism became a litmus test of both the Left and the Right. The New Right's insertion of "family values" into the national agenda curiously testified to feminism's success in making private issues—such as abortion—a matter of public debate.

During these two decades, the gender wars (a large component of the cultural wars) simmered, occasionally erupting into public life. A flurry of sex scandals and controversies titillated—and educated—a public baffled by changing ideas about "appropriate" private and public sexual behavior. The Clarence Thomas hearings, the William Kennedy Smith and Mike Tyson date rape trials, the navy's Tailhook sex scandal, the Spur Posse sexual athleticism in Lake-wood, California, the gang rape of a retarded girl in New Jersey, the furious debate over homosexuals in the military, the O. J. Simpson trial and verdict, and the Bill Clinton–Paula Jones–Monica Lewinsky scandal all publicized various hidden injuries that feminists had successfully named and publicized during the seventies: sexual harassment, date rape, domestic violence, and discrimination against homosexuals.

The battles of the gender wars have left terrible scars, but they have also publicized gender crimes and redrawn the national and international political agenda. The great triumph of feminism during the last quarter of the twentieth century is that it has forced "women's issues" into the public arena, where they are still hotly contested and passionately debated. But a new national consensus has not been achieved. Waves of backlash greet every feminist victory. Some of them have been aided by so-called "new feminists," writers like Katie Roiphe, Christine Hoff Sommers, and Camille Paglia, who, in their different ways, have blamed feminism for the failures of American society to respond to the demands feminists made on men and society.

During this extended backlash African American women have been most successful in giving new life to feminism by redefining the movement's aims according to their historical exigencies. Writers like Alice Walker, bell hooks, Toni Morrison, Gloria Naylor, and many others publicized the particular needs of women in African American communities. And it is poor women in these communities who have tried to publicize the ominous fact that it is women and children who are the poorest group in the United States, as well as in the rest of the world. In their fight for environmental and economic justice, these black women have taken up the banner of the grass-roots movement and redefined the health, shelter, nutrition, and economic security of their families and communities as feminist issues.

As the millennium nears, much more remains to be done. A small percentage of American women have gained the right to have it all, if only they can and are willing to do it all. Neither men nor the government still offer much help to working women. Lesbians, despite decades of efforts to stem institutionalized discrimination, still face cultural and legal efforts to isolate and discredit their lives. Welfare women confront growing blame for their poverty. Women of color still face the double discrimination of gender and race. Still, at the end of the twentieth century, feminists of all political persuasions could claim the not immodest victory of having made gender and women's lives a salient issue in every aspect of American social, economic, cultural, and political life.

[See also Socialist Feminism; Women: A Journal of Liberation.]

FURTHER READING

Carden, Marion. New Feminist Movement. New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1974.

- Castro, Ginette. American Feminism: A Contemporary History. New York: New York University Press, 1990.
- Davis, Flora. Moving the Mountain. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1991.
- Echols, Alice. Daring to Be Bad: Radical Feminism in America, 1967–1975. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1989.
- Evans, Sara. Personal Politics: The Roots of Women's Liberation in the Civil Rights Movement and the New Left. New York: Vintage, 1980.
- Faludi, Susan. Backlash: The Undeclared War against American Women. New York: Crown, 1991.
- Ferree, Myra Marx, and Patricia Yancey Martin, eds. Feminist Organizations: Harvest of the New Women's Movement. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1995.
- Freeman, Jo. The Politics of Women's Liberation. New York: Vintage, 1980.
- Whelehan, Imelda. Modern Feminist Thought: From the Second Wave to "Post-Feminism". New York: New York University Press, 1995.
- Whittier, Susan. Feminist Generations. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1994.

—RUTH ROSEN

WOMEN'S LIBERATION UNIONS. Between 1969 and 1975 upwards of twenty women's unions were founded across the country to express a radical vision of women's liberation. As the term gained currency in the early 1970s, most of these women's unions became explicitly "socialist-feminist" organizations and constituted one of the major institutional vehicles for socialist-feminist politics during the decade.

Unlike many Left organizations, the women's unions were not located only on the East and West Coasts; midwestern and industrial heartland cities had them as well. Although the membership was concentrated among women in their twenties, it included working women as well as students. The first wave of founders frequently came out of organizing experience in the civil rights movement, the anti-war movement, community organizing, and Students for a Democratic Society. Within a few years, however, membership expanded beyond this base, drawing in women for whom the women's union and women's liberation was their first political experience. A substantial portion of women's union members were lesbian or bisexual, and the women's unions prided themselves on good relations between lesbian and straight members.

The organizational structure of the women's unions varied. The San Francisco Women's Union adopted perhaps the most democratic-centralist structure; the Chicago Women's Liberation Union typified the umbrella structure of most of the unions, with project work-groups, a steering committee, and membership meetings. True to their roots in the women's movement, the women's unions took issues of process and internal democracy very seriously. Many of them produced newsletters, which are available in the Special Collections at Northwestern University Library.

Most women's unions tried to select projects that expressed their vision of socialist-feminist politics, which meant an emphasis on anti-Vietnam War agitation, working and working-class women, sexuality/abortion/women's health, prisoner support work, and coalition work with Third World solidarity groups or people of color. Many sponsored successful International Women's Day celebrations. Some unions, notably the Berkeley-Oakland Women's Union, took the development of socialist-feminist theory as a serious task; others such as the Chicago Women's Liberation Union were more project-oriented. The women's unions, in collaboration with the New American Movement, organized a national conference on socialist feminism held in Yellow Springs, Ohio, in the summer of 1975 attended by more than sixteen hundred women.

The women's unions could not sustain themselves following the collapse of the Left in the mid-1970s. The national conference, which appeared to mark the takeoff point for socialist feminism, actually revealed the cleavages within it. The women's unions' actual base was almost exclusively white and heavily middle-class, despite calls for outreach to women of color and working-class women. Some unions collapsed under the pressure from long-term members and from Maoist groups to suspend what they perceived as mindless activity in favor of study and the development of theory. These critics did not see in socialist-feminist theory an adequate strategy for socialist revolution. Other members, now more rooted in their workplaces and communities, wanted to become more involved in mainstream political activity. They felt the call for more study to be a drain in the direction of more mindless theorizing. Almost all of the women's unions had dissolved by 1977.

As concrete achievements, the women's unions provided a generation of women activists with organizing and speaking skills that many have gone on to put to other uses—personal, professional, and political. Former women's union members are found in significant numbers in trade unions, the women's health movement, local and state government, community organizations, and educational institutions. As autonomous but not separatist women's organizations, they made visible the politics of women's liberation and forced the Left to take those politics seriously.

[See also Socialist Feminism; Women's Liberation.]

FURTHER READING

- Hansen, Karen. "The Women's Unions and the Search for a Political Identity." Socialist Review 86 (March–April 1986).
 "The National Conference on Socialist Feminism." Socialist Revolution 26 (October–December 1975).
 Popkin, Ann. "The Personal Is Political: The Women's Liberation Movement." In They Should Have Served That Cup of Coffee, edited by Dick Custer. Boston: South End Press, 1979.
 "The 'Principles of Unity' of the Berkeley-Oakland Women's Union." Socialist Revolution 19 (January–March 1974).
 Red Apple Collective. "Socialist-Feminist Women's Unions, Past and Present." Socialist Review 38 (March–April 1978).
 Strobel, Margaret. "Consciousness and Action: Historical Agency in the Chicago Women's Liberation Union." In Provoking Agents: Theorizing Gender and Agency, edited by Judith Kegan Gardiner. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.
 Strobel, Margaret. "Organizational Learning in the Chicago Women's Liberation Union." In Feminist Organizations: Harvest of the New Women's Movement, edited by Myra Marx Ferree and Patricia Yancey Martin. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1995.

—MARGARET STROBEL

WOMEN STRIKE FOR PEACE. The grass-roots, participatory movement of American women called Women Strike for Peace (WSP) was born on 1 November 1961 as a radioactive cloud from a series of Russian atomic tests was passing over American cities and the United States was threatening its own resumption of atmospheric testing after a three-year moratorium. Worried about the effect of nuclear fallout on the health of children born and unborn, and fearful that the escalation of the nuclear arms race could lead to human extinction by accident or design, tens of thousands of women, in sixty communities from coast to coast, walked out of their kitchens and off their jobs in an unprecedented day-long women's strike for peace. This one-day action was the largest national women's peace protest of the twentieth century.

In the process of transforming the strike into a national woman's peace movement with one hundred locals, ten regional offices, and a network of contacts in Europe, Asia, and Latin America, the women of WSP developed an innovative and feminine political style. It was characterized by an antihierarchical, loosely structured, nonorganizational format, and spontaneous direct action at the grass-roots level. WSP created a nonideological, maternal rhetoric that served the movement well. At a time when peace dissenters were characterized by the political establishment and the media as either "commies" or "kooks," the image projected by WSP of respectable, yet militant, middle-class mothers wearing white gloves and flowered hats while picketing for nuclear disarmament helped to legitimize the movement's radical critique of the Cold War. By stressing the way in which the men in power were undermining mothers' capacity to carry out their assigned role of life preservation and moral guardianship, WSP was able to gain support for confrontations with such sacrosanct military institutions as the Pentagon and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and to win sympathy for its defiance of the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC), which summoned the one-year-old movement to a hearing in December 1962.

WSP had, from its inception, rejected political screening and the exclusion of Communists and former Communists from the movement as a manifestation of outdated Cold War thinking. It is not surprising, then, that WSP did not cower before HUAC. Instead, it challenged the committee's monopoly on Americanism, declaring that, "with the fate of humanity resting on a push-button, the quest for peace has become the highest form of patriotism." When the chairman of the committee asked Dagmar Wilson, one of the five founders of WSP and its acknowledged spokesperson, "Would you permit Communist Party members to occupy leading posts in Women Strike for Peace," she answered, knowing that she spoke for most WSP women:

Well, my dear sir, I have absolutely no way of controlling, do not desire to control, who wishes to join the demonstrations and the efforts that the women strikers have made for peace. In fact, I would also like to go even further. I would like to say that unless everybody in the whole world joins us in this fight, then God help us.

To the follow-up question, "Would you knowingly permit or welcome Nazis or Fascists," Wilson replied, "If we could only get them on our side." The HUAC hearings on WSP did much to discredit the committee in late 1962. For the first time, headlines critical of the committee were featured on front pages of newspapers across the country. PEACE GALS MAKE RED HUNTERS LOOK SILLY, REDHUNTERS DECAPITATED, PEACE LADIES TANGLE WITH BAFFLED CONGRESS, and IT'S LADIES DAY AT THE CAPITOL: HOOTS, HOWLS, AND CHARM were typical.

At its peak, in 1963, WSP estimated that it had a following of from 100,000 to 500,000. But this was a figure that could neither be verified nor refuted as there never was an official membership list or dues-paying structure. WSP's most successful campaign was for the Test Ban Treaty of 1963, which the women supported as the first limited step toward nuclear disarmament. The movement then turned its attention to nuclear proliferation. In May 1964 WSP organized a NATO Women's Peace Force demonstration at The Hague. There, women from the NATO countries, including eight hundred from West Germany, picketed a NATO meeting to draw attention to the dangers of a proposed multilateral nuclear fleet, which would have placed the fingers of German submarine commanders on nuclear triggers. WSP made headlines across Europe as one of its representatives, Ava Helen Pauling, was barred from entering the Netherlands for the demonstration, while the former Nazi general who had been involved in the bombing of Rotterdam was welcomed as a NATO official. While WSP never built a mass movement in opposition to the multilateral nuclear fleet at home or abroad, it mobilized opinion makers in every NATO country. The United States eventually abandoned the plan for a NATO nuclear fleet.

By the end of 1964, WSP was diverted from anti-nuclear organizing by the escalating war in Vietnam. For the remainder of the decade and until the United States withdrew from Vietnam, WSP was an active part of the anti-war coalition. Refusing to accept the government's characterization of the people of Vietnam as their enemy, members of WSP made several trips to Hanoi, and arranged three conferences with the leading women of North Vietnam and the National Liberation Front of the South around the slogan "Not Our Sons, Not Your Sons, Not Their Sons." WSP also played a significant role in the anti-draft movement, reaching across race and class lines to counsel more than 100,000 young men on their legal rights under the selective service system. The movement developed a statement of complicity with resisters, which offered not only moral but financial support. WSP women appeared regularly at induction lines, providing adult support to young men who refused to cross the line, and sat in at the trials of resisters to show the judges that "the women are watching." In 1970 WSP was instrumental in electing its own national legislative chairperson, Bella Abzug, to the House of Representatives. Abzug ran as WSP leader, and found that it was her long anti-war record that won her the election.

Most of the women who participated in WSP came from liberal to Left political backgrounds, having been pacifists, Quakers, anarchists, Socialists, or Communists in the years before World War II. Even those who blamed the United States for the Cold War exhibited a postnuclear sensibility that rejected all ideological and abstract justifications for nuclear brinkmanship. The women were powerfully attracted to A. J. Muste's formulation of a "Third Camp" position that rejected both superpowers' disregard for human rights and human life. "No Tests—East or West" was one of WSP's most widely used slogans in the campaign for the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1963.

I. F. Stone, the independent radical journalist, proclaimed in 1970 that he knew of no anti-war or radical organization of any kind that had been as flexible and intelligent in its tactics, and as free from stereotypes and sectarianism in its strategy as WSP. He was, of course, blind to WSP's political use of sex-role stereotypes. WSP built its movement on female culture. The participants were comfortable campaigning to save the children, but they had not yet learned to demand anything for themselves. Because its key women were socialized in the decades after the first wave of feminism and before the second, WSP had neither the consciousness, the understanding, nor the language with which to connect women's secondary status in the family and the economy with their exclusion from political power.

What WSP did accomplish in the early 1960s was to bring progressive women into the arena of international affairs, from which they had been barred for over a decade by McCarthyism and the feminine mystique. WSP helped to transform the image of the concerned mother from private to public, and from passive to militant. As women in the United States have done many times in the past, WSP used traditional domestic ideology to turn it on its ear, to extend women's influence from the nursery to the body politic.

[See also Peace Movements.]

FURTHER READING

Swerdlow, Amy. Women Strike for Peace: Traditional Motherhood and Radical Politics in the 1960s. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993.

—AMY SWERDLOW

WOMEN'S STUDIES. As the Hunter College Women's Studies Collective explained, "Women's Studies is not simply the study of women, it is the study of women which places women's own experiences in the center of the process. It examines the world and the human beings who inhabit it with questions, analyses, and theories built directly on women's experiences." As an academic field, women's studies developed alongside not only the women's liberation movement but the civil rights, anti-war, and student movements of the late 1960s. The emerging interdisciplinary field therefore gathered young faculty and graduate students who viewed scholarly work as incontestably political and anti-establishment. Although the field soon widened to encompass many perspectives, its pioneering scholars represented the radical sector of the academy.

By 1970 women's studies courses, mainly in the liberal arts, were taught on college campuses, and within a few years the numbers grew at such a rate that the first undergraduate majors were established. By the decade's end, programs in women's studies totaled approximately 350. Specialized journals appeared, such as Feminist Studies, Women's Studies, Signs, Frontiers, and the Women's Studies Newsletter. The National Women's Studies Association formed in 1977, and by the early 1980s its annual meetings drew between one thousand and two thousand participants. The major professional organizations, such as the American Psychological Association, Modern Languages Association, and American Historical Association, housed feminist or women's caucuses by the mid-1980s.

Although feminist scholars began in the late 1960s by criticizing the male bias of contemporary disciplinary literature, a sizable sector turned to study the origins and nature of women's oppression and asked questions concerning women's historical agency. Drawing on older works, such as Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex (1949), Mary Ritter Beard's Woman as Force in History (1946), or Friedrich Engels's The Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State (1884), they came upon an earlier scholarly tradition influenced by historical materialism. Feminist anthropologists, sociologists, and historians in particular centered their initial analyses on the sexual division of labor in its specific cultural and historic forms as a guide to understanding the status of women and the relations between the sexes.

A groundbreaking contribution was Margaret Benston's essay "The Political Economy of Women's Liberation," which appeared in Monthly Review in 1969. Employing Marxist terminology, Benston analyzed women's oppression as a function of their particular place in capitalist production, namely their assignment to the production of use-value in the home. Because the value of domestic work remains unrecognized in a capitalist economy, she argued, women carry the stigma of their distance from commodity production. Although Benston's specific analysis suffered a series of criticisms, her demonstration of the connections between women, the family, and the larger society inspired other scholars to make the study of political economy an important facet of their work.

This framework stood out in the early scholarship in the field of anthropology and especially so in the work of Michelle Rosaldo. Although Rosaldo discarded Engels's dictum that women's subordination occurred only with the institution of private property in favor of a theory of universal female subordination, she nevertheless took a materialist approach. Rosaldo studied social and cultural organization as a function of the sexual division of labor and reasoned that women's reproductive function and responsibility led to a "differentiation of domestic and public spheres of activity." Women's oppression and agency depended, in Rosaldo's analysis, on the degree of "sexual asymmetry."

The concept of distinct "spheres," structural divisions by private and public, showed itself prominently in early feminist scholarship in the field of history. In the influential essay "The Social Relations of the Sexes: Methodological Implications of Women's History," published in 1976, Joan Kelly (1928–1982) speculated that when the differentiation between family and society was minimal, women's status more nearly approximated that of men; when there was a sharp break between the private and public spheres, sexual inequality increased. The historical scholarship of the early 1970s incorporated this line of argument, which generated in turn a major subfield, women's labor history. Shop-floor studies in trades with high rates of female participation, analyses of women's role in specific strikes and unions, and new perspective on the significance of women's domestic labor, all highlighted a challenge made by women scholars to traditional as well as Left labor historiography.

Feminist scholars, Rosaldo and Kelly among the most articulate, did not, however, simply transpose the materially determinist frameworks of earlier generations onto their own work. They insisted that sex, class, and race were coequally integral and interactive concepts.

Outside the social sciences, the influence of the Left has been more circuitous. Feminist literary criticism began in the late 1960s by criticizing the canon for its virtual exclusion of women writers and exposing the misogynist handling of female characters by male authors. Scholars proceeded to uncover a lost tradition of women writers, the Feminist Press under Florence Howe's leadership in the 1970s playing the leading role in reprinting primary sources.

By the mid-1980s an entirely different approach had taken over the field. In a loose combination of Marxism, psychoanalysis, and deconstruction, many scholars proposed new lines of interpretation. The historical materialist approach yielded to theories of representation that highlighted the ambiguity of the text in light of the triumph and subsequent fragmentation of Western thought.

[See also Socialist Feminism.]

FURTHER READING

- Du Bois, Ellen Carol, Gail Paradise Kelly, Elizabeth Lapovsky Kennedy, Carolyn W. Korsmeyer, and Lillian S. Robinson. Feminist Scholarship: Kindling in the Groves of Academe. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1985.
- Hunter College Women's Studies Collective. Women's Realities, Women's Choices: An Introduction to Women's Studies. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

—MARI JO BUHLE

WOODHULL AND CLAFLIN'S WEEKLY appeared in New York City from 14 May 1870 until 10 June 1876 (with an interruption from 22 June to 28 December 1872), at first under the masthead "Upward and Onward," which was later changed to the bolder "Progress! Free Thought! Untrammelled Lives!" Published and edited by two sisters, Tennessee Claflin and Victoria Claflin Woodhull, with the active collaboration of the anarchist philosopher Stephen Pearl Andrews, it reflected their views and promoted Woodhull's career. Inspired by socialist, libertarian, and utopian ideas, the Weekly advocated a comprehensive program of universal justice, women's rights, world government, and free love, tinged with spiritualism.

After Woodhull's experience on Wall Street as a stockbroker, the Weekly launched a muckraking campaign and denounced speculation for "cheating, swindling rich, middle, and laboring classes. . . ." At the same time, the Weekly orchestrated Woodhull's political career based on her commitment to woman suffrage and to the International Workingmen's Association, or First International. On 19 November 1870, the Weekly launched her candidacy for the presidency of the United States and published her "Memorial," in which she argued that, as citizens of the United States, women were enfranchised according to the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution. The National Woman Suffrage Association (NWSA) welcomed this new strategy. Meanwhile, in 1871 the Weekly reported Woodhull's triumph at the NWSA convention in Washington, followed by her call to revolution, the "Great Secession Speech."

In April 1872 the Weekly published a manifesto, endorsed by the NWSA leaders, calling a convention to form the new People's Party "based on human rights," with Woodhull for president. But Susan B. Anthony refused this association, thus terminating their collaboration and Woodhull's political venture. The Weekly supported women in other ways by attacking the current impractical fashions, deploring the harassment of prostitutes, and advocating employment and higher wages for women.

On 30 December 1871, the Weekly published The Communist Manifesto for the first time in English. Thereafter it promoted the views of the American sections of the First International, announced meetings, and reported events such as the celebration of the Paris Commune on 30 March 1872. When Section 12

(a faction within the American movement) came under fire by the International for not toeing the party line on the class-struggle issue and promoting women's rights and "social freedom," the Weekly published discussions, resolutions, and William West's report of the Congress in The Hague in September 1872 confirming the expulsion of Section 12.

Free love was a dominant theme in the Weekly. Woodhull and Andrews criticized marriage as enslaving women and constraining individual feeling and freedom. The Weekly reported Woodhull's sensational speech on social (read "sexual") freedom (21 November 1871) and the mounting insinuations against the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher. The special issue of 2 November 1872 contained two explosive articles: the first revealed Beecher's sexual affair with the wife of Theodore Tilton, a religious and political associate of Beecher; the second described the debauches of a broker, Luther C. Challis, and led to the Claflin sisters' arrest under the Comstock laws, which prohibited sending obscenity through the mail. Nevertheless, the Weekly continued discussing free love, reporting the Beecher-Tilton trial, Woodhull's lectures, and spiritualist meetings. Leaning more and more toward conservatism and mysticism, in 1875 the Weekly prophesied the advent of the Apocalypse and proclaimed its allegiance to the Bible. The new message preached the sanctity of the human body, the holiness of the family, and the redeeming mission of women.

[See also International Workingmen's Association.]

FURTHER READING

Basch, Françoise. Rebelles américaines au dix-neuvième siècle. Paris: Méridiens Klincksieck, 1990.

Sachs, Emanie. The Terrible Siren: Victoria Woodhull. New York: Harper Brothers, 1928.

Sterns, Madeline, ed. The Victoria Woodhull Reader. Weston, Mass.: M & S Press, 1974.

—FRANÇOISE BASCH

WOODWORKERS OF CHICAGO. Chicago's phenomenal growth attracted workers of all nationalities to the expansive construction industry. Hence no one national group numerically dominated the largely foreign-born building carpenters, although the top union leadership was usually Anglo-Irish. Germans and Scandinavians, in contrast, predominated in Chicago's large furniture industry until its decline in the early twentieth century.

Chicago's woodworkers were particularly prominent in trade union organization and Left political activity in the second half of the nineteenth century. In the early 1870s Chicago's German cabinetmakers led the movement for a national furniture workers' union, and their local received the number one in recognition of their efforts; a descendant of this local still exists. Like their international union, Chicago's furniture workers were among the earliest advocates of industrial unionism. During the great railroad strikes of 1877, a meeting of Chicago furniture workers in the Bohemian Turner Hall was attacked by the police in one of the most violent and controversial occurrences in the Chicago upheaval.

Chicago's building carpenters were slower to organize stable unions, in part because of the deeper and more numerous ethnic divisions among them; but by the early 1890s they had created the strongest interethnic union in Chicago. After a huge strike in 1890, they won higher wages, union recognition, and the eight-hour day, victories that put them at the forefront of the Chicago labor movement.

Although it is easier to trace Chicago's woodworkers as unionists than as participants in Left political activity, recent work has found that woodworkers were prominent in the founding of Chicago's socialist German-language labor press in the mid-1870s and were well represented in the constituency of Chicago's anarchist movement. Carpenters made up the largest skilled occupational group among the members of the International Working People's Association, while cabinetmakers ranked fourth. Carpenters were also significantly involved in independent labor political movements in 1886–1887, 1894, and 1919.

Furniture workers formed an important constituency for the Left when the industry was marked by rapid mechanization within production units that nonetheless still utilized large numbers of craft workers in specialized departments. Construction carpenters also felt the impact of mechanization through the production of standardized, prefabricated building parts. Ethnically diverse and well organized, Chicago's building carpenters have been able to maintain an enviable tradition of controlling their industry from the late nineteenth century up to the present, although, with significant exceptions in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, their politics have been confined to the Democratic Party.

[See also Black International; Haymarket Incident.]

FURTHER READING

- Jentz, John B. "Skilled Workers and Industrialization: Chicago's German Cabinetmakers and Machinists, 1880-1900." In German Workers in Industrial Chicago, 1850-1910: A Comparative Perspective, edited by Hartmut Keil and John B. Jentz. De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1983.
- Jentz, John B. "Artisan Culture and the Organization of Chicago's German Workers in the Gilded Age, 1860 to 1890." Amerika-Studien 29, no. 2 (1984).
- Nelson, Bruce C. Beyond the Martyrs: A Social History of Chicago's Anarchists, 1870-1900. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Schneirov, Richard, and Thomas J. Surbuhr. Union Brotherhood, Union Town: A History of the Carpenters' Union of Chicago, 1863 to 1987. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1988.
- Surbuhr, Thomas J. "Ethnicity and the Formation of the Chicago Carpenters Union, 1855-1890." In German Workers, edited by Keil and Jentz.

—JOHN B. JENTZ

WORKERS ALLIANCE OF AMERICA. See Unemployed Movements, 1930s.

WORKERS' CONTROL is one of several terms expressing the idea that workers should make, or at least take part in making, the decisions that affect their working lives. "Self-management" and "anarcho-syndicalism" are more or less synonyms. It would be tempting to conceive workers' control as "participatory democracy" in a workplace setting, but "participation" has often been used to describe management-initiated schemes to co-opt workers by giving them only the appearance of a voice in economic decisions.

In Europe, workers' control has both Marxist and anarchist antecedents. Marx wrote about Selbsttätigkeit, or self-activity, and declared that the emancipation of the working class would be the task of workers themselves. In his pamphlet about the Paris Commune of 1871, Marx envisioned a future society in which ordinary workers would govern through public bodies that were legislative and executive at the same time. Russian Marxists Leon Trotsky and Alexandra Kollontai in certain periods of their lives employed the Russian word samodeyatelnost, which also means self-activity, to articulate a critique of what they considered the overcentralized and undemocratic character of Leninism and the Bolshevik Party. Anarchists, meantime, not only talked about workers' self-government but repeatedly sought to create producers' cooperatives.

During the first quarter of the twentieth century there was widespread enthusiasm about workers' control throughout Europe. In Great Britain, G. D. H. Cole developed the idea of "guild socialism," and during the First World War shop stewards exercised significant control over decisions even about such matters as whether a worker had been wrongly drafted! In Russia, workers created bodies representative of all workers in a given locality during both the 1905 and 1917 revolutions: in form little different from the central labor union commonplace in other countries, but with atypically radical politics, these bodies came to be known as "soviets." In Italy, workers seized factories at the end of World War I, and in Spain anarchists laid the basis for the astonishing efflorescence of worker and peasant self-management during the Spanish Civil War of the 1930s. All over Europe there was excitement among workers about the idea of a general strike that would put an end to capitalism and at the same time empower workers to run the society that would come after capitalism.

Workers' control in the United States developed along both practical and theoretical lines. David Montgomery has described the substantial real autonomy of nineteenth-century craftsmen, whose skills enabled them to impose remarkably broad workplace regulations on those who provided capital. At the same time, Daniel De Leon set forth a vision of industrial unions whereby unskilled workers would create the new society "within the shell of the old."

De Leon participated in the formation of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in 1905. The IWW's preamble declared, among other things, that capitalism could be overthrown only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one and injury to all. . . . The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with the capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of a new society within the shell of the old.

Paul Buhle has shown the extent to which De Leon's syndicalism was carried into the IWW by ex-members of De Leon's Socialist Labor Party (SLP) such as Justus Ebert, Ben Williams, and Frank Bohn. Wobbly strikes of 1909–1917, like the famous “bread and roses” strike of Lawrence, Massachusetts, textile workers in 1912, continually raised philosophical questions of workers' control through propagandistic stress upon workers' creation of all use-value.

The workers' control idea spread far beyond radical groups like the SLP and IWW. Frederick Taylor and his disciples were developing practices such as the timing of each work operation and the assembly line to break the traditional control of craftsmen over their conditions of work. During World War I the general shortage of labor put skilled workers in an especially favorable position to press their demands. As a result of these negative and positive causes, “control strikes” in trades like the machinists flourished in 1916–1920 and the term “workers' control” first came into wide usage. During and just after World War I, moreover, substantial American Federation of Labor (AFL) unions like the railroad workers and miners also demanded workers' control in the broader sense of government ownership of the means of production.

Variegated expressions of workers' control flourished in the early 1930s. The only existing national unions were weak and timid. Favorable government legislation had not yet been passed. Accordingly workers turned to their shop mates and to other workers in the same locality for a series of dramatic direct actions, including general strikes (Toledo, Minneapolis, and San Francisco in 1934), departmental sit-downs (rubber plants in Akron), and even plant occupations (the Independent Union of All Workers in Minnesota). At a local level, some Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) unions also acted in this manner for a few years. They set up extensive steward systems, stopped work to resolve grievances, and in a few situations, like Inland Steel in East Chicago, Indiana, successfully enforced their demands without a written collective bargaining agreement. Workers also formed independent labor parties in many cities. One such party came to power in Berlin, New Hampshire, and a resolution favoring a labor party very nearly passed at the 1935 AFL convention.

Bureaucratization of the new CIO unions proceeded very rapidly during World War II. By the end of the war, the dues check-off (as opposed to voluntary dues payments), the union shop (obliging all new workers to join the union), mandatory use of a grievance procedure culminating in binding arbitration (rather than direct action on the shop floor), as well as no-strike and management prerogative clauses in collective bargaining agreements, had become typical. Nonetheless, the labor shortage during World War II combined with the CIO's acceptance of a wage freeze led to a wave of strikes, authorized among coal miners and unauthorized (“wildcat”) in unions like the United Auto Workers (UAW).

There was a resurgence of interest in workers' control at the end of the 1960s. Theorists associated with this development included C. L. R. James and Paul Mattick in the United States, and Serge Mallet and André Gorz in France, who in turn invoked the names of older Marxists such as Rosa Luxemburg and Anton Pannekoek. The Institute for Workers' Control in Great Britain published a stream of pamphlets. In the United States, the journal Radical America during the decade 1965–1975 provided a forum for writers on workers' control like George Rawick, Jeremy Brecher, and Stan Weir.

Events seemed to justify this revived interest. Student strikes in France in 1968 were to some extent joined by workers. In 1956 in Hungary, and later, in Polish Solidarity, workers showed a capacity for self-organization outside all existing institutions that astonished the world. A strong current of direct action expressed itself in the late 1960s and early 1970s in the United States, for example in the work of the League of Revolutionary Black Workers in Detroit and in the “schmozzle” (in-plant slowdowns and the like) at the new General Motors assembly plant in Lordsburg, Ohio.

This revival of workers' control proved short-lived. Thanks to the Vietnam War, the late 1960s were once again a time when the demand for labor was strong and rank-and-file workers were emboldened to take direct action. Beginning in the early 1970s, a long-term recessionary trend developed. Workers by the mid-1990s earned twenty percent less in real wages than they had two decades earlier. Plant shutdowns, downsizing, and disinvestment became the norm throughout the United States economy. Frightened, workers became less active. Glenn Perusek suggests that dissent in the United States labor movement turned in the 1970s and 1980s to electoral activity rather than direct action.

The idea of workers' control nevertheless persists in various forms. The scattered sectors of successful union organizing (often among women, as at Yale and Harvard Universities) frequently gathered their support from workers most concerned with questions of dignity and job status, and utilized the horizontal, one-on-one style of organizing typical of the workers' control tradition. Plant shutdowns, the workers' worst nightmare, also inspired vigorous resistance sometimes accompanied by direct action. The partially successful miners' strike against the Pittston Coal Company in 1989 featured a three-day occupation of the Moss 3 coal preparation plant. Most promising of all, perhaps, workers at UAW plants in the Southwest and at the A. E. Staley plant in Decatur, Illinois, have returned to the old Wobbly idea of an "in-plant strategy." Working to rule—that is, carrying out the foremen's orders literally, no matter how ridiculous they may be or how much damage to the pace of production they produce—and other forms of action on the job are more likely to elicit workers' participation than an outside strike in an era when companies do not hesitate permanently to replace strikers. Workers' control, virtually absent as a slogan, remains an idea behind resilient labor idealism.

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Paul. A Dreamer's Paradise Lost: Louis C. Fraina/Lewis Corey (1892–1953) and the Decline of Radicalism in the United States. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1995.
- Fritz, Don, and David Roediger, eds. Within the Shell of the Old: Essays on Workers' Self-Organization. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr, 1990.
- Montgomery, David. "The Past and Future of Workers' Control." Radical America (November–December 1979).
- Montgomery, David. Workers' Control in America. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979.
- Perusek, Glenn, and Kent Worcester, eds. Trade Union Politics: American Unions and Economic Change, 1960s–1990s. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1995.
- Rawick, George. "Working-Class Self-Activity." Radical America (March–April 1969).
- Root and Branch: The Rise of the Workers' Movements*. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett Books, 1975.
- "Workers as Owners." Labor Research Review (spring 1985).

—STAUGHTON LYND

nated International Labor Defense in an effort to coordinate legal and financial resources and organize publicly to defend the rights of endangered workers. It has been historically associated with the Socialist movement. Before its formation, Norman Thomas had organized ad hoc defense committees for labor, unemployed, and civil rights campaigns during the early 1930s. These committees were formed in response to the general strike in Terre Haute, Indiana, and the reign of military law that followed; the murder by the Ku Klux Klan of Joseph Shoemaker, a leader of the unemployed in Tampa, Florida, where Thomas helped force the conviction of police who doubled as Klansmen; and the Arkansas cotton choppers' strike of 1936.

That year, Thomas headed a WDL organizing committee that included David L. Clendenin, the Reverend Aron S. Gilmartin, and attorneys Max Delson and Francis Heisler, among others. The new organization rapidly won three important victories in the South. First came the conviction of a sheriff, who was also a plantation owner, for holding farm workers in virtual slavery. The WDL then exposed forced labor in Broward County, Florida, where another sheriff falsely arrested black workers, charged exorbitant fines, and rented prisoners as day laborers to farm growers until their fines were paid. The WDL also helped the racially integrated Southern Tenant Farmers Union win better pay, housing, and working conditions for thousands of tenant farmers and sharecroppers. In 1937 Norman Thomas defied Mayor Frank ("I am the law") Hague of Jersey City, New Jersey, who had barred from the city organizers from the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Stoned, rotten-egged, and run out of town, Thomas and the WDL nevertheless opened Jersey City to unionists.

Among many later activities, the WDL was the first group during World War II to protest the internment of Japanese Americans. It won a change in the military's policies concerning less-than-honorable discharges and helped desegregate the armed forces. It forced reform of the nation's Industrial Personnel Security Program, under which employers had used Cold War tensions to fire union activists as "security risks." In 1949 the WDL created an International Commission of Inquiry into Forced Labor in the Communist countries, southern Africa, and the American South. That effort, with the backing of the American Federation of Labor, led to a United Nations Commission on Forced Labor.

WORKERS DEFENSE LEAGUE. Formed in 1936, the Workers Defense League (WDL) served as a nonpartisan alternative to the Communist-domi-

During the early 1960s, the WDL Apprenticeship Program to train minority youth to pass apprenticeship tests in the building trades evolved into the Recruitment and Training Program, Inc. More than thirty thousand minority men and women throughout the country won union membership and well-paid skilled trades jobs. In the 1990s, the WDL publicized the return of debt peonage to agricultural workers as well as training and providing advocates for unemployed workers denied their unemployment insurance benefits.

[See also Socialist Party; Thomas, Norman.]

FURTHER READING

Sherman, Richard B. The Case of Odell Waller and Virginia Justice, 1940–1942. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

Workers Defense League Golden Anniversary Journal (December 1986).

Workers Defense League Journal (1971).

Workers Defense League Papers. Reuther Library, Wayne State University.

—HARRY FLEISCHMAN

WORKERS' EDUCATION. Beginning around 1918, several dozen "labor colleges" were established across the United States by progressive unionists and pro-labor intellectuals. A kindred movement in England, developing since the establishment of Ruskin College at Oxford in 1899, was to some extent the inspiration of workers' education in America. So were the various socialist schools—from the People's College of Fort Scott, Kansas, to the Work People's College in Duluth, Minnesota, to the Rand School in New York—which never grew large, and which had been raided by federal and local authorities in wartime. Perhaps most important, however, was the labor turbulence and hopes of 1918–1920, with the emergence of what many called the "new unionism," democratic and socially conscious. One of the major publicists of the newer labor education, Arthur Gleason, called it "training in the science of reconstruction."

U.S. labor colleges fell generally into three categories. Programs of evening classes sponsored by central labor councils and the needle trades unions educated the most students by far. In New York, for example, the "Workers' University" sponsored by the International Ladies Garment Workers Union met in public school buildings on evenings and weekends. In other cities, while some programs were ephemeral, schools such as the Boston Trade Union College and the Philadelphia Labor College were well established. Summer schools aimed primarily toward women marked a second type, including the Bryn Mawr Summer School for Women Workers in Industry, the Barnard Summer School, and the University of Wisconsin Summer School. Third were the residential labor schools, such as Brookwood in Katonah, New York, and Commonwealth College in Mena, Arkansas.

Magazine cover by Rockwell Kent, 1910s.

The founders and leaders of these programs included many radicals eager to move beyond the narrow parameters of Socialist and Communist parties proper. Brookwood, for example, was launched by socialist and pacifist opponents of World War I, and proponents of farmer-labor politics following the war. Commonwealth College was founded in 1923 by Kate Richards O'Hare and other southwestern socialists who had moved to the New Llano utopian colony in Louisiana (relocated to Arkansas) seeking a new life. Explicitly class-conscious, workers' education aimed (in Selig Perlman's words) to "educate the worker, not as an individual but as a member of his social class." Consideration of radical possibilities naturally entered into classroom discourse, introduced either by instructors or students. Labor movement and academic supporters of the workers' education institutions sought to maintain a balance between this sometimes radical content and a moderate image intended to minimize public controversy and maintain support.

The rightward shift of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) made this compromise ultimately untenable. In 1928 the AFL charged Brookwood with teaching communism and ordered all AFL affiliates to withhold further support. In 1934 the trustees of Bryn Mawr College drove the summer school off campus amid charges that radical instructors were using the program to supply pickets to nearby strikes. Commonwealth College, which grew more action-oriented and shifted from a Socialist to Communist tilt, was closed after continued harassment by state and local authorities. Even the Workers Education Bureau, founded in 1921 as an umbrella organization for the movement, sharply divided between those critical of conservative AFL policies and loyal adherents of the AFL leadership, which dominated the bureau.

By the later 1930s, many of the labor colleges went into decline or disappeared due to political or financial problems. Encompassed into the New Deal via the Federal Emergency Relief Administration (later the Works Progress Administration) as a workers' education division for the instruction of labor-education teachers, a handful of labor education veterans continued their work. This experiment ended with World War II. Subsequent efforts at revival with congressional support failed, due in part to conservative and corporate hostility. The "labor education" that continued, mostly through union education departments and university-based extension programs, stressed leadership training and disregarded radical ideas or alternatives.

"Workers' education" has survived, as a name, in Workers' Education Local 189, an organization of several hundred founded at Brookwood in 1922. Originally affiliated with the American Federation of Teachers, Local 189 was forced out in 1976 as a result of its criticisms of the federation's leadership. Local 189 members, along with many others, have been instructors in the new wave of "labor colleges" that reappeared during the 1970s–1980s as credit programs within mainstream institutions offering degrees in labor studies. These programs vary widely. But the presence of New Left, anti-war, and (albeit to a considerably lesser degree) feminist movement veterans, and the curriculum combining social science, unionism, writing and speaking skills, harken back in modest fashion to the historic workers' education movement.

[See also Muste, A. J.; Rand School of Social Science.]

FURTHER READING

Brameld, Theodore. Workers' Education in the United States. New York: Harper Brothers, 1941.

Gleason, Arthur. Workers' Education. New York: Bureau of Industrial Research, 1921.

—JON BLOOM

WORKERS LABORATORY THEATER/THEATER OF ACTION. The leader of a workers' theater movement during the 1930s, the Workers Laboratory Theater—later renamed the Theater of Action (TOA)—was characterized by an agitprop style intended to educate working-class audiences about left-wing issues. Founded in 1929 by several young theater enthusiasts in New York City, it was inspired by German and Soviet traveling political theater troupes and cultural efforts by the Communist Party's John Reed Clubs and the New Masses. It performed short, original, highly stylized political sketches for political rallies, strikes, Unemployed Councils, and other organizing efforts associated with the Communist Party.

As a mobile theater able to bring social drama to working-class audiences without previous theatrical exposure, it presented skits that blended elements of symbolism, realism, vaudeville, dance, music, and mass chant into strident Marxist indictments of capitalism, racism, fascism, and the bourgeois state. Characters were portrayed as caricatures in cartoon-like renditions of politicians, factory owners, corrupt union officials, and newspaper editors.

In 1931, responding to growing interest from other workers' theater groups and the desire to create a national network, the Workers Lab (now merged with a German workers' theater troupe, the Prolet Bühne) put out the first issue of Workers Theater. Later that year, a national workers theater conference drew 130 organizations representing artists in theater, film, dance, and literature, including Hallie Flanagan, who several years later would direct the New Deal's Federal Theater Project. By 1933, an estimated 250 workers' theater groups existed as part of a national League of Workers' Theaters. In 1934 Workers Theater was renamed New Theater, achieving a monthly circulation of ten thousand, with Jimmy Durante, Burgess Meredith, and Groucho Marx among its subscribers.

By 1932, the Workers Lab had a studio loft on the Lower East Side. Its core was a full-time "Shock Troupe" of twelve to eighteen members with an "Evening Troupe" of a hundred. Putting their socialist beliefs into practice, the Shock Troupe lived together communally, sharing the meager funds they earned from union and worker fraternal-order bookings. Daily classes were held in acting, movement, voice, current affairs, and Marxist theory. In 1933 they had a repertory of twenty sketches, performed two or three times daily, reaching an estimated 100,000 workers during that year.

Newsboy (1933) was their most successful and well known production. Adapted from a poem by Communist Party cultural official V. J. Jerome, the twenty-minute, montagelike sketch contrasted headlines of the daily press with scenes from Depression life as seen through the eyes of a newsboy. Fast-paced realistic vignettes, dance movement, and mass chants were integrated into what was reviewed as the first application of Eisenstein's film theories to American theater. Newsboy quickly became a standard of workers' theater groups nationwide. Among theater professionals, the Workers Lab was recognized for advancing agitprop to a higher dramatic standard.

In 1934 the Workers Lab changed its name to TOA, marking a growing theatrical sophistication. TOA's prestige was confirmed by the steady stream of artists and intellectuals visiting their loft, including Moss Hart, Bertolt Brecht, Kurt Weill, Orson Welles, and John Howard Lawson. It now had a "younger brother" relationship with the Group Theater, with members Elia Kazan, Sandy Meisner, Lou Leveritt, and Bobby Lewis teaching TOA classes.

While continuing their regular performances for left-wing functions with a repertory of eighty sketches, TOA produced several full-length plays. In 1935 The Young Go First, codirected by Elia Kazan and Al Saxe, was their first and last attempt at a Broadway production. It closed after six weeks. TOA seemed unable to transform its mobile, political style into effective proscenium form. Six years of performing for next to nothing also prompted a desire to seek more established theatrical careers.

In 1936 TOA was incorporated into the Works Progress Administration's Federal Theater Project as the One-Act Experimental Theater, lasting one season. Many of its members then worked in various Federal Theater Project productions—for example, Nick Ray stage-managed the Living Newspapers, and Al Saxe was assistant director for One-Third of a Nation. On a larger level, in terms of affecting mainstream culture, the Workers Lab/TOA influenced a whole generation of young artists and intellectuals who would continue producing works of social significance in the theater, film, and television.

[See also Federal Theater Project; Lawson, John Howard.]

FURTHER READING

- Goldstein, Malcolm. The Political Stage: American Drama and Theater of the Great Depression. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.
- Himelstein, Morgan. Drama Was a Weapon: The Left Wing Theater in New York, 1929–1941. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1963.
- McConachie, Bruce A., and Daniel Friedman, eds. Theater for Working Class Audiences in the United States, 1830–1980. Westport Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1985.
- Samuel, Raphael, Ewan MacColl, and Stuart Cosgrove. Theaters of the Left, 1880–1935: Workers' Theater in Britain and America. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1985.
- Williams, Jay. Stage Left. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1974.

—JOEL SAXE

WORKERS PARTY. The founding of the Workers Party (WP) in 1940 came about as a result of the first major split in the American Trotskyist movement, then constituted as the Socialist Workers Party (SWP). Within the SWP a minority had coalesced around the leadership of James Burnham, Martin Abern, and Max Shachtman that had increasing doubts as to whether the Soviet Union was still some form of workers' state, even a "degenerated" one as proclaimed by the party's majority. The issue was whether revolutionary socialists should continue to give their political support to the Soviet Union and use that country as even a deeply flawed model for socialist transformation. The Soviet Union's attack on Finland, which followed its occupation of eastern Poland and the Baltic states in the wake of the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939, brought matters to a head. The minority was now confronted by what it viewed as Soviet imperialism, a phenomenon not expected from a workers' state. After insisting on expanded freedom to express its factional views, the minority was expelled.

James Burnham, a professor of philosophy, had taken the lead in suggesting that the Soviet Union had become a new form of class society, dominated by a bureaucratic ruling class. After he completed his brief sojourn in the newly founded WP, its intellectual leadership clearly shifted to Max Shachtman and before long the group came to be known as the Shachtmanites. Its theoretical basis was developed in the pages of the New Internationalist, the journal that the minority had taken with it from the SWP. While still identifying with Lenin and the Bolshevik Revolution, Shachtman argued that Stalin had carried out a completely successful counterrevolution.

The WP defined its politics largely on its position on the "Russian question." Labeling the Soviet Union an example of bureaucratic collectivism, it argued that a nationalized economy alone did not constitute socialism, because the entire apparatus of the state was controlled by the privileged Soviet bureaucrats, not the working class. The economic transformation carried out under Stalin's five-year plans was compared with capitalism's period of primary accumulation, except that the Soviet version was more brutal and murderous in its execution. Thus bureaucratic collectivism was not a form of socialism but an alternative form of development to capitalism.

Rejecting both capitalism and bureaucratic collectivism, the WP declared its independence of the leaders of the two systems in its slogan, "Neither Washington nor Moscow," and called for the formation of a revolutionary "Third Camp." It refused to support the United States or its allies during World War II, considering it to be a struggle among rival imperialisms. Although strongly opposed to Nazism and fascism, the party supported only indigenous resistance movements in Europe and not the governments of Great Britain and the United States, which it expected to take fascist turns themselves under the impact of the war. The "no-strike pledge," supported by much of U.S. labor and eventually the Communist Party

(CP) to further the war effort, was scornfully rejected as part of the erosion of workers' rights and democracy expected by the party during wartime.

Membership in the WP generally ran in the low hundreds, the bulk of them intellectuals rather than workers, a large proportion from New York. Among its better-known members or supporters were such writers as Saul Bellow, Harvey Swados, Dwight Macdonald, James T. Farrell, and Irving Howe, who edited its newspaper, Labor Action. Many of its members answered the call to take factory jobs and become active in local unions. By 1949, recognizing that it was not really functioning as a party, but as a "socialist propaganda group," its name was changed to the Independent Socialist League (ISL). As such it became the first group to be granted a hearing by and subsequent removal from the attorney general's list of subversive organizations.

Calling itself an advocate of democratic socialism, the ISL strongly identified itself with the anti-Stalinist upheavals in East Berlin in 1953 and Hungary in 1956 and sought to take advantage of the upheaval in the CP caused by the revelations in Nikita Khrushchev's denunciation of Stalin at the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet CP. Despite this, as well as its efforts in support of the burgeoning civil rights movement, the ISL remained a small, isolated sect and continued to lose members, such as the group led by Irving Howe that later began to publish Dissent. To overcome its isolation, the leadership of the ISL developed a perspective for merger into the Socialist Party and the creation of a broad, revitalized "Debsian" socialist movement.

After the merger was achieved in 1958, Shachtman proposed a political reorientation toward working within the existing Democratic Party and the ultimate carrying out of a "realignment" of the major parties, so that the Democrats would become truly the party of labor, liberals, minorities, and the Left. Under the leadership of Hal Draper, former editor of Labor Action, a vocal group opposed this policy and reaffirmed the traditional ISL support for the formation of a labor party independent of the Democrats.

Shachtman's anticommunism ultimately led to his support for U.S. military involvement in Vietnam. Subsequently the labor-party faction left to form the Independent Socialist Clubs, later the International Socialists, which continued to support the idea of the Third Camp. Another group, under the leadership of writer Michael Harrington, while supporting realignment broke with Shachtman over Vietnam and formed the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee, later Democratic Socialists of America. The remainder of the Socialist Party reorganized as Social Democrats, USA. The WP and its progeny are most notable for sharpening the discussions on the nature and dynamics of Soviet society and for training a number of future leaders of the labor and civil rights movements.

[See also Dunayevskaya, Raya; Harrington, Michael; Howe, Irving; James, C. L. R.; New International/New Politics; Realignment; Shachtman, Max; Trotskyism; Young People's Socialist League.]

FURTHER READING

Drucker, Peter. Max Shachtman and His Left. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1994.

Howe, Irving. A Margin of Hope. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982.

Isserman, Maurice. If I Had a Hammer. New York: Basic Books, 1987.

Wald, Alan M. The New York Intellectuals. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

—JACK STUART

WORKERS PARTY (COMMUNIST). See Communist Party, USA.

WORKERS PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES. See American Workers Party.

WORKERS SCHOOLS. Four years after the founding of the U.S. Communist Party, and after some of the initial factional tensions had subsided, the Party began to develop its educational/propaganda program, including a Party press and Party-run schools. In this, the Communist Party was merely continuing similar efforts carried out by the Socialist Party, most notably at the Rand School of Social Science in New York City. Communist Workers Schools sprang up in several cities around the country where there were a sufficient number of militants, especially in New York City, where a Workers School opened on University Place near Union Square in October 1923 and later moved to Party headquarters on East Fourteenth Street.

Its teaching staff and administrators were drawn from the ranks of Party professionals and intellectuals. The New York Workers School's first codirectors—until the expulsion of the Lovestoneite faction—were Bertram D. Wolfe and Ben Davidson. Afterward, the school was administered by a politically orthodox New York pharmacist named Abraham Markoff, and after Markoff died in the late 1930s the position devolved upon former top Party leader William Winstone.

The Workers School's aims were stated in the initial promotional brochure of 1923, and were revised and restated regularly:

The Workers School has been founded for the purpose of advancing true proletarian education, and of training workers for effective leadership in the American Labor Movement.

A year later, the school's educational aims were spelled out in greater detail, and it is clear that this was intended to be no ivory tower:

Courses [at the Workers School] are designed to give workers that knowledge of revolutionary theory and tactics, and labor history, which is essential for militant activity in the struggle against capitalism.

Later in the decade when the Party adopted its grim "third period" outlook Workers School publications and courses spelled out the educational implications:

Workers education as given in the Workers School renders permanent the class knowledge of the working class, puts it on a broader and deeper basis and projects it forward as an instrument by means of which the American labor movement might cope more effectively with the growing power of the American ruling class.

School publications proudly noted that school members, students, faculty, and administrators actively participated in the struggles of the day: "the fight for Sacco and Vanzetti, the Hands-Off-China Campaign, Passaic Relief, etc." It was obvious that the Workers School and its successors aimed at avoiding "the academic approach." Political advocacy was a regular component of the pedagogical process. The school's teaching, as one brochure put it, "is permeated with the live issues of the day, with the practical activity of the American people, with history in the making." As with the later Jefferson School of Social Science, this was an expression of the Marxian principle of the unity of theory and action; if the evils of capitalism and imperialism were studied in class, it made perfect educational sense to join teacher and fellow students in the next anti-imperialist demonstration, or to march alongside them in the May Day parade.

The school not only trained already signed-up Party members but also functioned as a recruiting mechanism for potential Party activists. The students were mostly proletarian, many foreign-born, drawn from New York's factories and shops—especially shoe, jewelry, and food preparation industries, the building trades, retailing, and especially the needle trades. In time, satellite centers would appear in the Bronx, Harlem, Brooklyn, and in New Jersey industrial towns as well.

Except for a few day sessions for workers on the night shift, classes were held in the evenings, after regular working hours. The core course was "Fundamentals of Communism," which covered such basic concepts as class struggle, dialectic, and the necessity of revolution. The texts were penny pamphlets like Moissaye Olgin's ABC of Communism, or Lenin's State and Revolution. In addition there were, once Workers School enrollments had risen into the thousands, a variety of other courses and special lectures, some conducted by top Party leaders, such as Alexander Bittelman (Tactics of the Third International), General Secretary Earl Browder (The Chinese Revolution), Cochairman William Z. Foster (Trade Union Problems), and so on. Harvey O'Connor, Sender Garlin, and Whittaker Chambers taught journalism; historian Arthur Calhoun offered American labor history; Scott Nearing did contemporary Europe; Bertram Wolfe offered a course on "the American Mind"; writer Michael Gold conducted a seminar on "proletarian writing"; and several staff members expounded on aspects of Marxian economic theory. The Workers School, reflecting the Communist Party's antiracism, developed (under the leadership of writer/teacher Elizabeth Lawson) courses and readings giving an authentic and usable history of black Americans intended both to appeal to black workers and to combat prejudice among whites.

Teachers' pay at the Workers School, which came out of tuition fees, was $12 a week for what a later generation would call a "teaching load" of ten to fifteen two-hour classes a week. Student tuition was $3.50 per twelve-session, one-evening-a-week course, payable in installments. Twice-weekly English courses were $6 a term. A special tuition deal was available: any trade union, working-class fraternal organization, or foreign-language association, on payment of $25, could send a representative to take four courses each term for a whole year.

The content of the readings, courses, and lectures was predictably bounded by the standard Party line of the period—whether the "third period" belief in the imminence of revolutionary struggle, or the later Popular Front conceptions of acceptable collaboration with "progressive" sections of the bourgeoisie. The Soviet Union was of course considered the sacred bulwark of progressive forces everywhere, and even a model for an eventual socialist United States, although the impact of this belief on day-to-day Party work has probably been exaggerated in the standard non- and anticommunist literature. In 1943 the Workers School, after two decades of continuous operation, merged with the Party's Jefferson School of Social Science.

[See also Jefferson School of Social Science; Jewish Workers University.]

FURTHER READING

Workers School catalogues and brochures. New York Public Library Annex.

—MARY GETTLEMAN

WORKERS WORLD PARTY. See Trotskyism.

WORKINGMEN'S PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES. The first nationwide socialist organization in the United States, the Workingmen's Party of the United States (WPUS) was formed in July 1876 through a merger of several groupings, including the North American remnants of Karl Marx's First International. The organization included many immigrant and native-born labor radicals, including Adolf Douai, Samuel Gompers, Laurence Gronlund, J. P. McDonnell, P. J. McGuire, Thomas J. Morgan, Albert and Lucy Parsons, George Schilling, Friedrich Sorge, Adolph Strasser, Philip Van Patten, and Otto Weydemeyer, as well as the first known African American socialist, Peter H. Clark. It published the Chicago Vorbote (Herald), the New York Arbeiter-Stimme (Labor's Voice), and the English-language weekly Labor Standard (edited by J. P. McDonnell, a former Irish Fenian and secretary to Karl Marx in the International Workingmen's Association).

During its brief existence, the WPUS doubled its membership to seven thousand, largely but not exclusively German Americans, the bulk of whom appear to have been skilled craft workers. They were pioneers in trade unionism, socialist electoral work, agitation for the eight-hour workday, and the dissemination and popularization of Marxism and socialist ideas in the United States. When the spontaneous upsurge of mass strikes and working-class street actions swept the country in 1877, WPUS militants played a prominent role—particularly in Saint Louis, but also in Chicago and other cities.

The WPUS favored working-class unity transcending racial and ethnic divisions. Yet there is evidence of prejudice among some members in California toward imported Chinese laborers and in Missouri toward black workers. Nor was there an appreciation in the organization of the catastrophe wrought by the Republican Party's final betrayal of Reconstruction and black rights in the South. There were also differences over whether women workers should be organized or instead driven back to their "rightful place" in the home, so as not to compete with male labor.

The most salient division, however, revolved around electoral activity. The party initially adopted a position favoring independent labor-socialist electoral campaigns only after a trade union movement was securely established. In the wake of the 1877 labor upsurge, however, many WPUS sections ran candidates—with some initial successes (e.g., Chicago, Cincinnati). This resulted in a split by October 1877, with a sizable minority (led by such people as Sorge, Strasser, McDonnell, Weydemeyer, and Gompers) leaving the organization to concentrate on trade union work; many of these were later centrally involved in establishing the American Federation of Labor. The majority of the WPUS transformed the organization into the Socialist Labor Party, which remained a vital force for socialism and labor action until it was split by new differences in the early 1880s.

[See also Railroad Strike of 1877; Socialist Labor Party.]

FURTHER READING

- Commons, John R., et al. History of Labor in the United States. Vol. 2. New York: Macmillan, 1918.
 Foner, Philip S. The Great Labor Uprising of 1877. New York: Monad Press, 1977.

Foner, Philip S. The Workingmen's Party of the United States: A History of the First Marxist Party in the Americas. Minneapolis: MEP Publications, 1984.

Kaufman, Stuart Bruce. Samuel Gompers and the Origins of the American Federation of Labor. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1973.

Sorge, Friedrich A. Labor Movement in the United States. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1977.

—PAUL LE BLANC

WORKING WOMAN/WOMAN TODAY. The magazines Working Woman and Woman Today were the voices of the National Women's Department of the Communist Party of the United States, and their women writers were the key group articulating a Communist position on women's rights. Working Woman grew from the 1920s organ of New York's United Council of Working Class Women. In 1929 it began national publication as an obscure monthly, its readership confined to the Party's hard core of ethnic clubs and women's auxiliaries in the industrial belt. Though as fiercely militant and worker-oriented as the rest of the Party press at that point, Working Woman, edited by Women's Department head Anna Damon, was the one Party text in which the worker's world was not a wholly masculine space. Short stories and readers' letters sounded notes of contradiction and identity beyond the war of class against class. Other than photos of Soviet flyers and female strikers, it had no visual embellishment to its rough newsprint columns.

In the early 1930s, as the Party shifted away from workerism and toward neighborhood and family-centered resistance, Working Woman vividly chronicled women in bread and meat boycotts, miners' strikes, and the struggle to save the "Scottsboro boys," wherein the firsthand experience of black women was a major theme. In 1934 the publication adopted a more modern and attractive magazine format as Margaret Cowl became secretary of the Women's Department and editor.

As a magazine, Working Woman blended an appeal to women as housekeepers (its "Household Corner" column) and young single workers (its regular "Fashion Letter") with an aggressive defense of women's equal role in the labor movement versus husbands and anyone else who would keep them at home. Graphically it approximated the boldness of a good leaflet; for example, the July 1935 cover drawing of massed placards called for "Free Birth Control Clinics," "Equal Pay for Equal Work," "Fight against War and Fascism," "Reduce Meat Prices," and "Free Milk for Workers' Children."

Woman Today replaced Working Woman in March 1936 with a dramatic art-deco look. This change signified the Party's attempt to forge an alliance with radicalized middle-class and intellectual sectors, including feminists. Lasting only until 1938, it championed woman's "democratic rights," under assault internationally by fascism, in the name of New Deal progressivism "for a better world." By contrast to the class-conscious wisecracking of Working Woman, Woman Today was cosmopolitan and even literary, with an impressive list of non-Party contributors and sponsors (Mary Van Kleeck, Freda Kirchwey, and Josephine Herbst, among others).

[See also Communist Party, USA; Rent Strikes, New York City.]

FURTHER READING

Cowl, Margaret. "Women's Struggles for Equality." Political Affairs 53 (May 1974).

Dixler, Elsa Jane. "The Communist Party and the Woman Question, 1929-41." Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1974.

Shaffer, Robert. "Women and the Communist Party, USA, 1930-40." Socialist Review 45 (May-June 1979).

—VAN GOSSE

WORKMEN'S CIRCLE. The roots of the Workmen's Circle (Yiddish: Arbeter Ring), the Jewish Labor fraternal order, go back to 1892, when a group of Jewish immigrant workers met on New York's Lower East Side to found a new mutual-aid society. The new society was to differ from other such groups by its devotion to the cause of the working class and the absence of quasi-masonic or religious ritual. Despite the opposition of many socialist and anarchist intellectuals, who feared that the Workmen's Circle would draw attention away from the weak trade union and political movements, many radical workers joined the new association. By 1899 branches had been organized in Harlem and in Williamsburg, Brooklyn.

The three branches, joined by another in Brooklyn, reorganized the Workmen's Circle into a national fraternal order in 1900. The order grew rapidly, particularly between 1906 and 1910, when it expanded from 6,776 members of 38,866. During this time, the arrival of many veterans of the failed Russian Revolution of 1905 contributed to the order's growth. The new arrivals, most notably followers of the Jewish Labor Bund, successfully pushed for increased support for Yiddish cultural expression, over the objections of the more "cosmopolitan" old guard. Between 1910 and 1920, the Workmen's Circle developed a broad cultural and educational program that included lectures, publications, theater groups, choruses, and orchestras.

One of the most significant new initiatives by the Workmen's Circle was the establishment of a system of secular Jewish schools for children. The first schools opened in 1917, following a resolution passed by the 1916 convention. They aimed to acquaint the children with the Yiddish language and literature, instruct them in Jewish history, and cultivate in them an affinity for the socialist ideals of their parents.

The split between the Socialists and Communists tested the organization severely during the 1920s. The Workmen's Circle's early attitude toward the Soviet Union was one of critical support. Starting in 1922, however, the order's conventions also regularly adopted resolutions calling for the liberation of socialist political prisoners in the Soviet Union. Confrontations between "Left" and "Right" became increasingly acrimonious throughout the 1920s, echoing clashes within the garment unions and other branches of the Jewish labor movement. The Communists and their allies were finally expelled in 1929.

The depression and the rise of fascism in Europe provided the context for the order's development in the 1930s. The Workmen's Circle participated in the decade's anti-Nazi boycotts and protests, raised money for the republican struggle in Spain, and formed the backbone of the Jewish Labor Committee, formed in 1934 to aid Jewish labor organizations in Europe and Jewish socialist refugees from fascism. In 1932 the order continued its traditional support for the Socialist Party, but by 1936 many members had come to support the New Deal as the implementation of much of the Socialist program. In 1940 concern for the fate of the Jews under Nazi rule led the order to repudiate the Socialist Party's pacifist stance and endorse Roosevelt for the first time.

Severe restrictions placed on immigration following World War I eliminated the order's most important source of new members. Membership reached its peak in 1925 at nearly eighty-five thousand, but declined slowly thereafter. The average age of members, on the other hand, grew steadily from 28.3 years in 1911 to 55.03 in 1951. American-born, English-speaking Jews made up an increasingly large proportion of the membership, especially after World War II.

Since World War II, the Workmen's Circle has further deemphasized its adherence to socialism, although it has continued to support a liberal conception of state-supported social programs, maintained ties to the mainstream of the labor movement, and participated in the early years of the civil rights movement. Increasingly, however, it has devoted its energies to aiding the state of Israel politically and materially, defending Jewish rights worldwide, and providing secular Jewish education and cultural activities.

The benefits provided by the Workmen's Circle to its members have always been central to the order's existence. The first convention in 1901 established a series of sick and death benefits, and in later years the order provided its members with an extensive insurance program and low-cost health care. Although the shifting needs of the membership have led to changes in the kinds of services provided (the order's sanitarium for tubercular patients was closed in 1955, four years after the New York branches opened their home for the aged), the benefits offered by the order continued to attract middle-class American-born Jews to the Workmen's Circle at the end of the twentieth century.

[See also Socialist Party; Yiddish Left; Yiddish Schools.]

FURTHER READING

Epstein, Melech. Jewish Labor in USA: An Industrial, Political, and Cultural History of the Jewish Labor Movement. 2 vols. New York, 1950–1953. Reprint. New York: Ktav Publishing House, 1969.

Hertz, J. S. 50 yor arbeter-ring in yidishn lebn. New York: National Executive Committee of the Workmen's Circle, 1950.

Shapiro, Judah J. The Friendly Society: A History of the Workmen's Circle. New York: Media Judaica, 1970.

Zakhs, A. S. Di geshikhte fun arbayter ring. 2 vols. New York: National Executive Committee of the Workmen's Circle, 1925.

—DANIEL SOYER

WORLD SOCIALIST PARTY. The U.S. companion party of the Socialist Party of Great Britain, the World Socialist Party was formed in 1904 by a group of anti-reformist Marxists who had broken with H. M. Hyndman's Social Democratic Federation. During World War I, two members of the Socialist Party of Great Britain, Moses Baritz and Adolph Kohn, came to the United States to avoid conscription, and they established a following in Detroit. In 1916 some of their supporters founded the Socialist Party of the United States, but changed its name to Workers' Socialist Party a few months later when they found that the name Socialist Party had been copyrighted by the Socialist Party of America. The new party at first existed only in Detroit, and from 1919 to 1922 took the name Detroit Socialist Educational Society.

Party locals have existed off and on in several U.S. cities, including New York, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. But its real stronghold, and the only city where it can be said to have had an enduring influence, was Boston, where the tireless I. Rab conducted Marxist study classes and lively forums almost nightly from the early 1930s through the late 1940s and more or less weekly for many years thereafter. In the 1970s the Boston local had a regular program on radio.

In 1939 the Workers' Socialist Party started publication of the Western Socialist ("Journal of Scientific Socialism in the Western Hemisphere"). The name World Socialist Party was adopted in 1947 to avoid confusion with the Trotskyist Socialist Workers Party.

Tractarians and debaters rather than activists, the World Socialist Party persists today as a very small educational group, pamphleteering and leafletting for what it regards as the only truly and purely Marxian socialism.

[See also Proletarian Party.]

FURTHER READING

Jerome, W. "A Brief History of the World Socialist Party." Western Socialist 33, no. 252 (1966).

—FRANKLIN ROSEMONT

WORLD TOMORROW. Published monthly from 1921 to 1934, the World Tomorrow popularized and epitomized a particular Christian socialist view tied to the struggles for peace and social justice, and closely allied to the Socialist Party (SP). The magazine had its immediate roots in the pacifism arising among young Christian socialists during World War I. Devere Allen (1891–1955), leader of a pacifist group in Oberlin, Ohio, articulated a philosophy of nonviolent action and a vision of an international peace movement. Editor of the pacifist Young Democracy from 1918 to 1921, he turned to the newly founded World Tomorrow, becoming its managing editor, which he remained for nearly all the magazine's span. Joined and aided by other leading members of the Fellowship for Reconciliation, Allen guided the magazine on an independent, militant course.

Kirby Page (1890–1957), an ordained minister in the Disciples of Christ and briefly a pastor in Brooklyn, added an important voice to the World Tomorrow. Sherwood Eddy (1871–1963), who had become a worldwide leader in the overseas work of the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) before World War I, took on Page as his personal secretary during the war, becoming himself more radically inclined, and lending Page powerful institutional support for Christian socialist views. Eddy established the Sherwood Eddy Seminars for pastors and others, leading many trips abroad and gaining wide access to world leaders. While Gandhi and his movement understandably impressed most deeply Christian visitors (and World Tomorrow writers), Russia and China became powerful contrasting examples in the fate of the nonindustrial world. Page, joining the World Tomorrow as editor in 1926, related these international experiences to the domestic problems of the United States.

The ascendance of Norman Thomas to leadership of the SP gave these Christian socialists and the World Tomorrow a special importance. The reduced SP, as a critic wrote, attracted YMCA workers more readily than industrial workers, and if it faltered as a class-struggle mechanism, it soared as an organ of moral critique. Mirroring the rise of ministers and Christian laymen in many SP locals, Allen himself ran for the state senate in Connecticut and served at the upper levels of SP councils. He and Page toured almost continuously and wrote a plethora of socialist pamphlets and books, including devotional texts used by Christian socialists and others in their daily meditations.

The Depression heightened the importance of these activities, but also produced overwhelming pressures on the Thomas leadership of the SP and on the World Tomorrow. The magazine survived only by a year Allen's own 1933 departure from it, to establish No Frontiers News Service, a pacifist news source of great importance to the labor, religious, rural, and small-town press. Later renamed the Worldwide Press, it served a vital, religious liberal and crypto-radical milieu until Allen's death. Meanwhile, the approach of World War II once more heightened pacifist issues in and around the SP, especially just before but also during the war (when the SP and the Fellowship of Reconciliation embraced the newer generations of radical pacifists, such as David Dellinger, James Farmer, and Bayard Rustin). Toward the end of their lives, and contrary to the hardening Cold War positions of many ethnic socialists, the milieu that had grown up around the World Tomorrow remained faithful to the anti-war vision. In that sense, they also pioneered the nonviolence of the civil rights movement, and the anti-war sentiment around the New Left, as well as the liberation theology movement that emerged in the 1970s–1980s.

[See also Christian Socialism; Pacifism; Peace Movements; Socialist Party.]

FURTHER READING

Chatfield, C. Charles. Devere Allen: Life and Writings. New York: Garland, 1976.

Chatfield, Charles, and Charles DeBenedetti, eds. Kirby Page and the Social Gospel: An Anthology. New York: Garland, 1976.

—PAUL BUHLE

WORTIS, ROSE (1886–1958). Born in the village of Krasilov, in czarist Russia, Rose Wortis arrived in Brooklyn, New York, in 1900. She immediately went to work in a blouse factory at three dollars a week but also attended school at night. Living in the Williamsburg section, she soon became involved in the very active Socialist Party until the split over the question of U.S. entry into World War I. She then became a charter member of the Communist Party of the United States. At the same time, she became active in Local 22 of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU). She became proficient in speaking and writing and became a leader of the rank-and-file movement to democratize the union. She was found on picket lines wherever workers were struggling for better conditions, particularly in the textile industry. She wrote articles for the Daily Worker, the Communist, and Labor Unity.

When the Trade Union Unity League (TUUL) was organized in 1929, attended by 690 delegates, representing about seventy thousand members, Wortis was elected secretary. The TUUL was an outgrowth of the Trade Union Educational League organized in 1920 to work within the American Federation of Labor to make it more progressive. The TUUL emphasized the organization of the unorganized into industrial, revolutionary industrial unions and organized left-wingers in the old unions on the principle of class struggle. In later years, she was an elected official in the complaints department of Local 22, ILGWU.

[See also Communist Party, USA; International Ladies Garment Workers Union; Trade Union Unity League.]

—ROSE LEWIS

WRIGHT, FRED (1907–1984). The leading labor-Left cartoonist of the 1940s–1970s, Fred Wright was the most universally reprinted artist after Art Young. As labor caricature, his work heralded the abandonment of the symbolic proletarian muscular giant in favor of a workaday Joe (or Jane) fighting back against inflation, automation, and employer attacks.

Wright was born in Derby, England, descendant of many generations of wheelwrights. Emigrating to America with his family, he first learned drawing from his grandfather, an amateur artist and a striper in automobile factories. In his late teens, Fred became a professional saxophone player, in resorts and in New York “clip joints.” During the late 1920s, still interested in drawing, he attended classes at the New York Art Students League, where he first met radicals. The Depression truly radicalized him, and on board ship—where he had gone to work as a musician—he came into close contact with organizers of the National Maritime Union (NMU). Wright drew his first published labor cartoon in 1936, and began drawing regularly for the first time in the NMU organ, the Pilot, and then for an army base newspaper during World War II. He returned afterward as a staff artist of the Pilot, and his work was widely reprinted in the labor press—until the rightward-turning NMU chiefs insisted that he draw Communists as rats.

Tempted to return to a musician's life, Wright chose instead to join UE News. There he came into his own. His Art Young-type philosophical approach to the difficulties of modern existence transcended socialist and class clichés without, however, losing the basic points of unfairness and exploitation. Over the years, he believed, his style became simpler, with more frequent use of old gags in new dress. His weekly cartoons filled several anthologies, the largest, So Long, Partner! (1975). He was more widely reprinted in Europe—he was especially beloved in Italy and England—than any U.S. labor-radical artist since Young. He contributed a campaign satire called Gold-water Coloring Book (1964), several experiments with early animated films, and labor's first series of anti-Vietnam War cartoons of the 1960s. At his death, he was at work on a cartoon history of the industrial revolution.

[See also Humor; United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America.]

FURTHER READING

“U.E. Mourns Fred Wright.” UE News, 14 January 1985.

Wright, Fred. Interview. Oral History of the American Left. Tamiment Library, New York University.

—PAUL BUHLE

WRIGHT, RICHARD (1908–1960). Born in Natchez, Mississippi, Richard Wright became the most famous black writer in the world after publication of his first novel, Native Son (1940). A Book-of-the-Month-Club selection, it sold 250,000 copies in three weeks. Wright's grandparents had been slaves. His grandfather, Richard Wilson, had been the property of John Charles Alexander of Woodville, Mississippi, until he escaped during the Civil War. His grandmother, Margaret Bolden Wilson, was the daughter of a man of Irish-Scottish ancestry and a slave. Wright's mother, Ella Wilson, a country schoolteacher, married an illiterate sharecropper, Nathan Wright, who deserted his family for a woman he met in a saloon.

Wright completed school to the eighth grade. Years later, he commented that his being deprived of anything but a grammar school education had, perhaps, saved him from the pernicious influences of two southern cultural traditions: Christianity, which stresses submissiveness; and philanthropy, which purchases silence. He moved to Chicago in 1927, and to earn a living worked as a bellhop, porter, insurance agent, delivery man in a delicatessen, and postal clerk.

Wright joined the Communist Party in 1932, and a few years later the Party sent him to New York City to take charge of the Harlem bureau of the Daily Worker. Conflicts between the Party line and Wright's view of black life began almost immediately. The Party attacked his Uncle Tom's Children (1938) as an unrealistic portrayal of southern black life. Native Son (1940) alarmed the Communists because of its realistic view of how society drove a black youngster to embrace criminality and his portrayal of the ineffectuality of a Communist Party solution. The Party was also fearful that the murder of a white woman, although accidental and without sexual innuendo, would reinforce popular misconceptions about black lust. Yet some of his most memorable journalism, notably on Joe Louis's triumph over Max Schmeling, was published in the Daily Worker sports columns. Allegations of a warped mentality and muddled thinking, along with demands that he submit to Communist discipline, thoroughly alienated Wright. He stopped working for the Party in 1941, but did not formally resign until 1944.

An underlying theme in Uncle Tom's Children—the inevitability, under present circumstances, of continual conflict between black and white and between black and black—was reemphasized in Black Boy (1945). The difficulty blacks have living as civilized beings in a society that denies their humanity, and the probability of violence as the only solution to social deadlock, continued as a major preoccupation to the end of Wright's life. He suggested that Americans will have to learn how to live as civilized humans "by marching down history's bloody road."

Although henceforth Wright was hostile toward organizations that claimed to be leaders in social change, he remained staunchly revolutionary. While alienated from the dominant Left, Wright was battered by the government Right. His Twelve Million Black Voices: A Folk History of the Negro in the United States (1941), a book of photographs illustrating three centuries of black experience, brought him to the attention of the War Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. For the rest of his life, he was harassed by one or another of America's security organizations.

He moved to Paris in July 1947 hoping to escape the pressures inherent in life as a black man in the United States. Living in exile, Wright wrote increasingly about alienation and the descent into a personal hell. He became a close friend of Jean-Paul Sartre, who was fascinated by this American's understanding of existentialism. Wright also had considerable influence on Jean Genet, advising him during his work on The Blacks. In his Paris diary Wright predicted that "the next great area of discovery in the Negro will be the dark landscape of his own mind." He became a major, acknowledged influence on succeeding generations of black writers, including Ralph Ellison, James Baldwin, Chester Himes, and one of his biographers, John A. Williams. He also produced serious nonfictional works—Bandung Conference (1956), a report on the efforts of Third World leaders to establish the non-Western political-cultural-economic agenda, and White Man, Listen! (1957), a final plea for understanding. Wright died suddenly in Paris in 1960. He was fifty-two years old.

[See also Civil Rights Movement; Communist Party, USA; Daily Worker.]

FURTHER READING

- Baldwin, James. The Price of the Ticket. New York: St. Martin's/Marek, 1985.
- Bennett, Lerone, Jr. Confrontation: Black and White. Chicago: Johnson Publishing Co., 1965.
- Cayton, Horace. Long Old Road. New York: Trident Press, 1965.
- Fabre, Michel. The Unfinished Quest of Richard Wright. New York: William Morrow, 1973.
- Gayle, Addison. Richard Wright: Ordeal of a Native Son. New York: Doubleday, 1983.
- Kinnamon, Kenneth, ed. New Essays on "Native Son." New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Walter, Margaret. Daemonic Genius. New York: Warner Books, 1989.
- Webb, Constance. Richard Wright: A Biography. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1968.
- Wright, Richard. "I Tried to Be a Communist." Atlantic Monthly, August–September 1944.

—CONSTANCE WEBB

YBOR CITY. Presently part of Tampa, Florida, Ybor City was a planned community begun in 1885 by cigar industrialist Vicente Martinez Ybor. The cigar industry provided the context for the community's initial radical orientation. Cuban and Spanish cigar workers brought to Florida a well-developed proletarian consciousness and a firm commitment to leftist political and labor ideologies. Joined soon by Sicilian immigrants, many of whom had belonged to socialist-led workers' leagues (fasci dei lavoratori) in the 1890s, "Latin" immigrants fashioned a radical culture of unusual complexity, durability, and diversity.

The Tampa area was frequently visited by José Martí whose Partido Revolucionario Cubano was the motor of the Cuban independence movement. Martí worked closely with Carlos Baliño and Vicente Diego Tejera, founders of Cuban socialism who were then active among U.S.-based Cuban workers. Though the Cuban communities in South Florida and New York were roughly the same size, Tampa generated eighty-three affiliates of the Partido Revolucionario Cubano to New York's thirteen. Baliño later organized a revolutionary community of fifty Cuban families in Thomasville, Georgia, and, later still, was mayor of radical Martí City, Florida. The Cuban socialist commented that Martí was no socialist proper but an ardent and trustworthy ally. A correspondent for the New York Sun for more than a decade, Martí founded his own newspaper, Patria, in 1892, mainly supported by contributions from tobacco workers in Florida.

By the twentieth century, Ybor City possessed a full spectrum of radical debating clubs, political groups, reading societies, consumer cooperatives, and newspapers. Adherents of virtually every leftist viewpoint could be found in the community, including right- and left-wing socialists, centrists, revolutionary and Industrial Workers of the World syndicalists, and pacifistic and "propaganda of the deed" anarchists. The strength and pervasiveness of radical ideologies could be measured in part by the weakness of organized religion, which struggled for decades to acquire membership and respect. Ybor City quickly integrated itself into a worldwide network of radical settlements, becoming a regular stop on the propaganda tours of various luminaries and maintaining close links with outside events and personalities.

Nowhere was the radical presence more in evidence than in the cigar industry itself. All large factories possessed readers (lectores) who read to workers during the day. Drawing from the works of leftist masters, proletarian novels, and labor tracts, readers were critical elements in the politicization of workers.

Ybor City's militant cigar unions emerged from this environment. Socialists such as Giovanni Vaccaro and anarchists such as Pedro Esteve and Alfonso Coniglio played important leadership roles in organizing workers and directing them in industrywide strikes. Major walkouts occurred in 1899, 1901, 1910, 1920, and 1931, with numerous smaller confrontations taking place in other years. The radical presence—in unions, factories, and the general community—contributed to the strength of employer and native hostility, which often took the form of vigilantism, nativism, and violence. Defeat in the ten-month 1920 strike, the shocks of Red Scare repression, and the collapse of the 1931 strike (led by the Communist Tobacco Workers International Union) seriously eroded the labor position and community standing of the leftists. Anticommunist drives of the 1950s continued the deterioration. Nevertheless, as late as 1948 Henry Wallace carried three of the Ybor City precincts.

Even after radical decline, Ybor City manifested a leftist orientation, as seen in such aspects as support for antifascism, labor unionism, and left-of-center politics. Few post-Castro Cuban émigrés chose Tampa for settlement, further testimony of the enduring image and makeup of the community.

[See also Anarchism; Cuban Americans; Italian Americans.]

FURTHER READING

- Mormino, Gary R., and George E. Pozzetta. The Immigrant World of Ybor City: Italians and Their Latin Neighbors in Tampa, 1885–1985. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
- Perez, Louis A., Jr. "Reminiscences of a Lector: Cuban Cigar Workers in Tampa." Florida Historical Quarterly 53 (April 1975).
- Pozzetta, George E. "An Immigrant Library: The Tampa Italian Club Collection." Ex Libris 1 (1978).

—GEORGE E. POZZETTA

YERGAN, MAX (1892–1975). Born of a literate black seamstress in Raleigh, North Carolina, Max Yergan attended Saint Ambrose and the academy and university divisions of Shaw Institute, Raleigh's premier Negro college. In 1911, Yergan discovered social service in the campus Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), echoing elements of Social Gospel Protestantism.

From 1915 to 1917 Yergan served British forces as YMCA chaplain in Bangalore, India. Transferring to East Africa, he ministered to imperial "Coloured" troops and supply carriers, an experience that deeply affected his global thinking. His position as director (1921–1936) of a "Bantu" (African) section of South Africa's Student Christian Association radicalized him, and by 1934 militant trade unionists, nationalists, and antifascists had won him over to revolution. In a double role, he daily led the Student Christian Association, nightly teaching African cadres socialism. (A protégé, Govan Mbeki, called him "utterly convincing.")

Emboldened by a 1936 Soviet tour, Yergan reemerged a changed man, that summer resigning his YMCA position on political grounds. Stateside, he contacted Communist Party members James Ford, Ben Davis, and Abner Berry, placing himself at the Party's disposal. A pioneering black educator, Yergan taught Negro history at the City College of New York from 1937 to 1941. A noted Harlem celebrity, he assisted Washington-based National Negro Congress (NNC) secretary John Davis, and also cofounded the International Committee on African Affairs with Paul Robeson in an effort to influence U.S. African policy.

As a progressive Popular Front publicist, journalist, lecturer, publisher, and impresario, Yergan—influential rather than disciplined—tied the "Negro questions" of South Africa and the Jim Crow South to Axis incursions into Ethiopia, Spain, and China. By 1939, contacts with NNC members Ford and John Davis landed Yergan a spot on its national executive. In 1940, in a controversial coup, Yergan was elected to succeed NNC president A. Philip Randolph, whose anti-Sovietism had angered the trend's orthodox left-wingers. Both backers and detractors considered Yergan a Communist Party stalwart.

NNC leader from 1940 to 1947 and executive director of a reconstituted Council on African Affairs from 1940 to 1948, Yergan—who had been a 1924 Harmon Foundation awardee and a 1933 recipient of the Spingarn Medal from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People—succumbed to postwar government harassment. By 1948 he had turned, capitulating to Truman-McCarthy Era anti-communism. Until his death in April 1975, Yergan was a hired "ex-Communist expert" informant and pro-apartheid lobbyist.

FURTHER READING

- Anthony, David H. "Max Yergan in South Africa: From Evangelical Pan-Africanist to International Socialist." African Studies Review 34, no. 2 (September 1991).
- Duberman, Martin. Paul Robeson: A Biography. New York: Ballantine Books, 1989.
- Naison, Mark D. Communists in Harlem during the Depression. New York: Grove Press, 1984.
- Yergan, Max. Gold and Poverty in South Africa: A Study of Economic Organization and Standards of Living. New York and The Hague: International Industrial Relations Institute, with the cooperation of the International Committee on African Affairs, 1938.
- Yergan, Max. "An Answer to Japanese Propaganda among Negroes." China Today 5, no. 8 (May 1939).
- Yergan, Max. Democracy and the Negro People Today. New York: National Negro Congress, 1940.

—DAVID H. ANTHONY

YIDDISHE KULTUR FARBAND. See Yiddish Left.

YIDDISHER KEMPFER. See Socialist Zionism.

YIDDISH LEFT. As differentiated from the broader but more diffuse Jewish Left, Left Yiddishists have occupied a special niche with their fusion of linguistic, cultural, and political commitments. Yiddishkayt, literally "Yiddishness," has been a wild card on the Left, unaccounted for by Marxist theories but vital in its successful and unsuccessful applications to the situation of the immigrant Jewish working class in its most influential eras.

A Yiddishist discourse arrived in the 1890s Left unbidden and even unwilling. Rooted in a half-millennium or so of European history, Yiddish (a derivation of Middle High German, with varying elements of Slavic and Hebrew) served as the profane or daily language of shtetl, which is to say village Jews in the Pale. Disapproved by "cultured" (Russian or German, middle-class) Jews who hoped to educate the masses out of a "mongrel" language, Yiddish nevertheless grew up into a miniliterature with the spread of books and literacy at the end of the nineteenth century. The foremost writers—I. L. Peretz and Sholom Aleichem paramount among them—preached a doctrine of ethical uplift, but also a folkish communalism that verged on socialism.

Yiddish came to America with the half-million Jewish immigrants from the middle 1880s, but especially from the early 1890s on. Yiddish-language socialist periodicals appeared almost immediately, often written and edited by intellectuals who had little knowledge of Yiddish before their own immigration. A handful of them would remain important intellectual and political figures of the Jewish Left for decades. Foremost among them was an anarchistic-minded early immigrant from eastern Europe named Abraham Cahan, who was reputedly the first to hold a U.S. radical political meeting in Yiddish, in 1884. Two years earlier the first labor leaflet in Yiddish had been issued, warning immigrants against strike-breaking. The formation of the United Hebrew Trades in 1888 formally announced the emergence of the eastern European Jew (in contrast to the generally middle-class German Jew) as a force in the New York labor movement.

At the same time, a precocious poetic outburst in Yiddish gave the impoverished Jewish immigrants lyrics for the struggle. David Edelstadt (1866–1892), an early fatality to the "proletarishe krank" (workers' disease, i.e., tuberculosis), wrote verses in his short life that would be sung for generations by Yiddish choruses. Fellow anarchist Joseph Bovshover (1872–1915), who wrote a famous elegy to the dead Edelstadt, penned poetic denunciations of the rich, of religion, and of the stupidity of bourgeois life—before going mad himself.

Edelstadt and Bovshover both failed in one important respect, as Yiddish and Yiddishkayt emerged as an issue, if only covertly, in the fierce competition of the early 1890s between anarchists and socialists. By now Cahan, a leading editor of the weekly Arbeter Zeitung (Workers Press), had begun to attract a circle of poets, prose artists, and semiskilled journalists who could appeal to the Jewish proletarian community (which included sizable numbers of petty merchants, salesmen, and other non-wage laborers) at large. The anarchist Freie Arbeter Shtimme (Free Voice of Labor) of Edelstadt and Bovshover, its prose a mere didacticism offset by a little poetry, offered no serious competition. Nor did the anarchists compromise with the religious sentiments of the immigrant majority, mocking the holy days while the Arbeter Zeitung explained socialist ideas in religious phraseology.

Determinedly adapting to America as well as to their immediate audience, Cahan and his fellow early socialists nevertheless nearly all believed in an assimilation that would eradicate Yiddish. They therefore found themselves in the anomalous position of constructing a presumably doomed sensibility. In this curious way, they came to promote cultural figures with deeper Yiddishist sentiments. Two key individuals, both poets, became deeply beloved in the Lower East Side ghetto. Morris Rosenfeld, the master "Teardrop Millionaire" (so named for an ability to raise emotion in his readers), appealed in virtually Zionist tones for the emancipation of the historically downtrodden Jew. With no Zion in sight (as literary critic B. Rivkin later argued), Yiddish with a messianic socialist content itself became a sort of realm of imagined liberation—a mental homeland. Morris Winchevsky, the "zeyde" (grandfather) of Yiddish socialist journalism, relocated from London to New York in 1894 and soon thereafter roused a rebellion of Yiddish socialists from the political and cultural tyranny of Socialist Labor Party leadership.

The Jewish Daily Forward, chief product of the split, evolved after a few years into Cahan's own brilliant journalistic expression. Upholding the cause of socialism and of labor (especially Jewish labor), the Forward rapidly became an example of gele (yellow) journalism to match any in the contemporary New York press. By the mid-1910s, it had reached a circulation of a quarter-million, larger than any socialist paper other than the Appeal to Reason, and by far the most circulated Jewish paper in the world.

Utterly sensationalistic, the Forward was known for its gruesome accounts of murders and its directives on immigrant etiquette as much as its socio-logical investigation of neighborhood life. And in its quasi-assimilationist manner, it evolved a prose increasingly interlaced with English words and phrases. The paper fairly invented, at least for Yiddish, the one-column short story, often brilliant socialist-realist vignettes from daily life by writers such as Z. Libin, capmaker by trade, or Leon Kobrin, known as the Zola of the ghetto.

Marx, "The Modern Liberator," by Saul Raskin, Groysser Kundes, 1911.

In strengths and weaknesses, the Forward fairly represented the mentality of the 1880s–1890s immigrants who had risen to the leadership of the labor and journalistic ghetto spheres. Socialists of a Bundist turn, they had learned that socialism was likely to be very far away, and they had learned to make an institutional accommodation to the realities of the transition. They viewed competitors, especially newcomers or those to the left of themselves, with great suspicion. The Forward notably savaged Cahan's personal enemies, or ignored them and thereby banished them to a corner of Jewish life. "Cahan edits the Yiddish press," as the saying went, suggested the weight of his personal domination of cultural and political life.

Yiddish theater, heavily influenced by socialist themes, offered another important realm of cultural self-definition. Its very creation, at the dawn of the 1890s, had been shaped by political motives. As it rapidly grew commercially viable, socialist giants arose side by side with schlockmeisters. For twenty years Jakob Gordin, a heavy moralist, uplifted the Yiddish theater and created roles that the outstanding actors and actresses could fill out, to great public approval. Socialist ideas took on new graphic guises and (as Gordin in his own numerous literary essays suggested) escaped the abstractions through which they were too often interpreted.

By 1910, the newer immigrants, "1905ers"—who had in many cases experienced the contemporary Russian uprising and the accompanying pogroms firsthand—began to assert themselves across American Jewish life. In their Europe, Yiddish had gained a greater dignity and literary artfulness, and Jewish identity (for bad reasons as well as good) seemed less an option and more a finality. Over a decade or so, they transformed Left institutional life in several important ways. A leading 1890s figure like Morris Winchevsky, poet, comic monologist, and political activist, had become at once revered and outdated. His disdain of the Forward's money-grubbing vulgarity, however, was shared by the doyens of the younger Left, such as B. Rivkin, who gained stature as the outstanding commentator of the new Yiddish literature and arguably the finest anarchist literary critic in the world.

In growing numbers, younger intellectuals entered the major fraternal institution, the Arbeter Ring/Workmen's Circle, and there began to insist (against the inclinations of the older Jewish immigrants) upon a program of Yiddish-language day schools. By the late 1910s, this program became a centerpiece of radical Jewish activities. Their most artistic-minded members (known as di Yunge, the youth) issued a veritable literary manifesto of Yiddish as capable of high artistic, undidactic possibility. Although virtually banned from the Forward, they began their own small-scale publishing, and infiltrated the other presses, including the anarchist Freie Arbeter Shtimme. Their ranks, cultural and political enthusiasts, fed rebellion from the Jewish socialist establishment. Perhaps di Yunge's chief organizer, David Ignatov, anthologizer and organizer, provided its ultimate fictional expression in his three-volume Euf Veite Vegn (Horizons, 1930–1932), in which a protagonist wanders through American life, discovering its wonders and horrors, and seeking finally a socialism with a spiritual quality lacking in the secular Left.

The leftward edge of di Yunge made the Yiddish “revolution of the word” a call for political-economic revolution as well. They shared the rage of young Jewish radicals against the institutional conservatism of Jewish labor leaders who considered themselves cautious socialists. They expressed their special resentment at assimilationism, as a fatal break with a thousand years of cultural tradition and willful abandonment of a tongue equal to the finest literary possibilities. In their Yiddishkayt, they also offered an alternative to the undercurrent of Hebraism (predominantly conservative or Zionist in implication) as well as the overwhelming fact of Americanization. The Russian Revolution, opening up the promise of an institutionalized, socialist Yiddish renaissance, evoked their enthusiasm. Moshe Leib Halpern, one of the most engaged and talented of the younger poets, gladly dedicated himself to the new hopes stirred by Russia. H. Leiveck, another of the famed circle, wrote stunning proletarian dramas in the 1920s. Even the less political, such as aestheticist Mani Leib, could for a time be sufficiently entranced by such Left (and ostensibly non-Jewish) causes as the Sacco-Vanzetti case to write stirring social lyrics. Such figures provoked great pride among Yiddishists at large, and during the era of their radical commitment, also provoked a gnawing uneasiness among the powerfully situated Jewish critics of Bolshevism.

The Yunge rebellion, in one sense, led directly to the founding of the Yiddish Communist daily newspaper in 1922, Morgen Freiheit. Perhaps the most aesthetically successful of the new Communist dailies, its early columns included a handful of the outstanding Yunge, poets and dramatuges, and its supporters included many of the outstanding Yiddish pedagogues and fraternal activists. During the 1920s their circles established the Jewish Folk Chorus, with its outstanding leader, Jacob Shaefer, and Camp Kinderland, a largely Yiddish-inclined summer center. After a split in the Workmen's Circle, Yiddish Communists created their own International Workers Order (IWO) schools as well.

No one author so well symbolized the long-term shift of individual writers and artists toward the Yiddishist Left as did Moshe Nadir (1885–1943). Known as the “bad boy” or the “great cynic” of Yiddish literature in the 1910s, Nadir wrote comic sketches and aesthetic-erotic verses, mocking the self-seriousness of Jewish political and social life. After the Russian Revolution, he swung to the Left and he remained with the Freiheit almost to the end of his life, faithful to designated political positions and (to a lesser degree) favored aesthetic modes. Notwithstanding his notoriously bohemian personal life, the Freiheit and its associated institutions made him an idol with an intense following for his voluminous output—poetry, feuilletons, travelogues, and children's books running to nearly fifteen volumes. For his part, Nadir usually carried the “party line” fairly lightly and in his own peculiar fashion. The 1920s found him honestly enraged at xenophobic American capitalism, the Depression sorrowful at the human waste and hopeful for the Soviet experiment, and the later 1930s thankful for American cultural pluralism. With the Hitler-Stalin Pact, Nadir lost heart, and died a broken man.

The Freiheit never remotely rivaled the Forward in circulation, peaking at no more than ten thousand.

But its readers regarded it almost as a sacred organ for the mission of socialism and Yiddishkayt. It suffered terribly as a result of Communist-style "proletarian literature," which drove away some of its notable writers (although a few, including the fine novelist Isaac Raboi, adapted themselves remarkably to it), and the Palestinian uprising of 1929, whose welcoming by the Communist Party drove away others. A core of talented enthusiasts always remained, strongly influencing Yiddish art, theater, music, even puppet shows (the modernist Zuni Maud created, with writer Yosel Kotler, a Modicut puppet troupe that toured widely), but, above all, literature. At the Freiheit itself and to a lesser degree at Der Hammer, its monthly sister cultural publication (a sort of Jewish New Masses), fine prose flourished almost regardless of shifting political line and, at times, a vulgar general approach to cultural questions. The Freiheit's own publishing company brought out many volumes of centrally important Yiddish literature, including extensive collections of work by Winchevsky.

In the Popular Front era, this approach reached its maximum influence. The Yiddishe Kultur Farband (YKUF) was founded in 1937, an international body to consolidate and further Yiddish efforts. A distinguished journal, Yiddishe Kultur, and a scholarly publishing company demonstrated the Left Yiddishists' seriousness even as the Hitler-Stalin Pact drove out many allies. When the details of the Holocaust began to become known, the leaders of the YKUF demanded and received a greater measure of autonomy within the IWO Yiddish schools, but also a commitment that Communists had never previously made, to a multilinguistic American society.

This commitment arrived too late, both for Yiddish and for the Left. The Cold War and Stalin's attack on Soviet Yiddishkayt uprooted and ultimately discredited, to a large degree, Left Yiddish institutions just as they had reestablished themselves in the years following the war. The number of IWO schools rapidly shrank (as they did in the Workmen's Circle milieu, for nonpolitical reasons as well: suburbanization and assimilation made the schools both impractical to organize and less desirable). The U.S. government destroyed the IWO, although the Jewish Clubs and Societies maintained an insular existence.

In the same years, the creation of Israel detracted seriously from Yiddish concerns. The Poale, or Labor, Zionists, ardent in their own Yiddish literary pursuits even if less determined about the language's ultimate destiny, had been since the 1920s a small milieu increasingly focused solely on the Middle East. The sabotage of Yiddish presses by "revisionist" Hebraists, and the official adoption of Hebrew as the sole official language of the new land, shut off Yiddish as a less-than-desirable element of the past.

At this juncture, Yiddish began to acquire a scholarly life that deemphasized but did not by any means neglect its socialist connections. The YKUF, especially under the leadership of Kalmon Marmor and, later, Nakhman Meisel, published outstanding historical studies of Yiddish literature (in Yiddish), and comprehensive anthologies. No other American radical literature, until the 1970s–1980s, received nearly such close critical attention, notwithstanding the shrinking number of Yiddish writers and readers. Amerike in Yiddishe Vort (America in Yiddish Word), edited by Meisel, provided five hundred quarto pages of poetry and prose, an unparalleled bit of Left-literary scholarship. In English, Irving Howe began his efforts at cultural recuperation via translation and explanation of context. Slanted against the Communist Left, they had nevertheless a great importance in reaching a Jewish audience with the historical validity of the Yiddish experience.

The step-by-step departure of the Freiheit from the Communist milieu encouraged this development, and made the paper a pantheon of Left Yiddishkayt until its demise in September 1988. By that time its editor, Paul Novick, on hand since its founding sixty-six years earlier, had become the most distinguished senior figure of Yiddish journalism in the world, his own writing long a beacon on independent socialist Yiddishkayt.

Among socialists, and the smaller allied scatterings of Bundists and Labor Zionists, a modest Yiddish revival also took place during the 1970s–1980s. The Forward, down to a circulation of twenty-five thousand, had become in old age a champion of Yiddish-language circles and even paid close attention to Yiddish in the hated Soviet Union. It also offered, along with fervent denunciations of Communists and other perceived opponents of Israel, strident criticisms of Israeli warmaking in Lebanon and brutality in the West Bank. Unlike the later generation's roughly neoliberal Jewish publications, it kept somewhat of a radical edge. Its editors, most former editors at the Freiheit, had not entirely left behind the socialism of their youth. By contrast, an English-language Forward edition, edited by a former staffer at the Wall Street Jour- nal, showed a certain nostalgia for Yiddish institutions and historical interest in Jewish socialist tradition, but hostility toward the contemporary Left.

By the latter 1990s, Yiddishe Kultur, still edited by erstwhile Left pedagogue Itche Goldberg, remained one of the finest Yiddish literary publications in the world. A flurry of linguistic efforts around the National Yiddish Book Center, founded and headed by Aaron Lansky, formally distanced itself from any political traditions but inevitably revived a vanished Left ambience. Perhaps most important, klezmer music bands staffed by New Left veterans and younger progressive musicians constituted a major public presence within Jewish festivals and institutions, at once more accessible and more political than any other form of Yiddish activity.

[See also ARTEF; Cahan, Abraham; Freie Arbeter Shtimme; Olgin, Moissaye J.; Socialist Zionism; Workmen's Circle; Zukunft.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Paul. "Jews and American Communism: The Cultural Question." Radical History Review 23 (spring 1980).
 Epstein, Melech. Jewish Labor in USA. 2 vols. New York: Trade Union Sponsoring Committee, 1950.
 Howe, Irving. World of Our Fathers. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1976.
 Maisel, Nachman, ed. Amerike in Yiddishe Vort. New York: Yiddishe Kultur Farband, 1953.

—PAUL BUHLE

YIDDISH SCHOOLS. East European Jewish immigrants created Yiddish children's schools in the early twentieth century as an extension of their veltlekhkayt (secularism). Responding to the challenges of modernization by transforming Judaism and Jewishness, Diaspora-oriented Jewish secularists believed that modern Jewish life was not dependent upon religion or territory, but upon the autonomy of Jewish communal institutions and the creation of a secular culture. School activists hoped that the creation of a nonreligious Jewish educational system would ensure the perpetuation of a progressive Jewish nation in the Diaspora. Yiddish, the everyday language of the Jewish masses, was at the center of their ideology.

Of the five school movements (the Jewish National Workers Alliance, the Sholom Aleichem Folk Institute, the Workmen's Circle [WC], the International Workers Order [IWO], and the Left Poale Zion) that existed in the United States and Canada, only the WC (founded in 1918) and the IWO (founded in 1926) were actively committed to a radical political agenda. They creatively fused either socialism or communism with Diaspora nationalism, and were known as the linke shules (left-wing schools). Providing supplementary afternoon and weekend education for thousands of children from kindergarten through high school, the shules of the WC and the IWO flourished in the 1930s, sponsoring publishing houses, summer camps, and a Jewish Teachers Seminary. By 1935 more than half of all Jewish children who received a Yiddish education attended the schools of the WC and IWO.

The curricula of the two left-wing Yiddish school movements, in particular the mix between nationalism and internationalism, evolved over time. In the late 1910s and early 1920s—encouraged by the success of the Russian Revolution—the WC schools emphasized socialism. Classes stressed the history of the international working class and capitalist exploitation. The children's Yiddish readers highlighted the lives of important socialist figures such as Karl Marx and Jean Jaurès. Marching in the annual May Day parade was a highlight of the school year. Holiday celebration was limited to Passover, Purim, and Chanukah, holidays that could be given a universal, socialist, and secular interpretation.

The IWO schools emerged out of the bitter ideological feuds between the Socialist and Communist Left in the 1920s, which permanently divided politics and the unions into two hostile camps. In 1926 a group of shule activists seceded from the WC, creating the "Nonpartisan Jewish Workers Children's Schools," which in 1930 officially merged with the Communist Party's IWO. From 1926 to 1933 (the "Third Period") the "Nonpartisan/IWO" schools taught a curriculum of "national nihilism" in which few positive symbols of Jewishness appeared. Proletarian culture and activism was paramount. The school's magazine contained articles on Soviet life, Spanish Republicans, and American strikers. Children regularly joined their teachers on picket lines.

Hitler's election in 1933, the growth of fascist anti-Semitism in Europe, and the effect of assimilation on the schoolchildren challenged activists in both movements to reevaluate the weight given to the national element in their curricula. By the end of the decade, WC and IWO school textbooks and magazines had become increasingly sensitive to anti-Semitism and Jewish culture.

Yet, important differences distinguished the two movements. Changes in the WC shules' curriculum were due as much to an internal concern for the perpetuation of Jewish culture as to the external threats of anti-Semitism. WC activists had already created pedagogical materials in the late 1920s that affirmed the uniqueness of Jewish history and the Jewish people. By the mid-1930s a new biography series included Rashi (1040–1105), a medieval figure of traditional piety and learning. Socialism was still central to the schools' curriculum, but cultural self-preservation became their highest priority.

Communist Party policy informed the curricular changes in the IWO schools. During the Popular Front (1936–1939) when the Soviet Union made efforts to cultivate political support from among its national minorities, IWO activists put a new emphasis on the teaching of Jewish history. They taught Yiddish as an end in itself (not only as a means to further Jewish proletarian culture) through the works of the Soviet Yiddish writers (e.g., Leib Kvitko, Peretz Markish, and David Bergelson). The Hitler-Stalin Pact in 1939 forced shule activists to vitiate their commitment to Jewish culture. But by 1942, Hitler again the enemy of the Soviet Union, the national element resurfaced to become an essential component in the IWO curriculum. (Their allegiance to the IWO notwithstanding, some teachers resisted Party doctrine when it contravened their own consciences, such as refusing to keep the schools open on Yom Kippur.)

The devastation of European Jewry during World War II, the linguistic acculturation of the immigrants' American-born grandchildren, and the upward mobility of the Jewish community portended the end of the left-wing Yiddish schools by the 1950s. Yet at their peak they enriched the American Left, embodying a vision of political radicalism in which national and international aspirations coexisted in a taut, but creative, tension.

[See also Socialist Sunday Schools; Yiddish Left.]

FURTHER READING

- Buhle, Paul. "Jews and American Communism: The Cultural Question." Radical History Review 23 (spring 1980).
- Dawidowicz, Lucy S. From That Time and Place: A Memoir, 1938–1947. New York: W. W. Norton, 1989.
- Dubnow, Simon. Nationalism and History. Edited by Koppel Pinson. New York: Atheneum, 1970.
- Frankel, Jonathan. Prophecy and Politics: Socialism, Nationalism, and the Russian Jews, 1862–1917. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981.
- Garfinkle, Harry. "Ideological Elements in the Development of the American Yiddish School Movement." Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 1954.
- Liebman, Arthur. Jews and the Left. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1979.
- Sinkoff, Nancy B. "Learning to Be Free: Socialist and Communist Yiddish Education in the 1930s." Bachelor's thesis, Harvard-Radcliffe College, 1982.

—NANCY B. SINKOFF

YIPPIES. A highly self-conscious creation by Vietnam War protesters in the late 1960s, the "Yippie" phenomenon was never a formally organized party or structured movement. Rather, the term labeled an amorphous group led by anti-war organizers that politicized the countercultural figure of the hippie. The name of the group (and its variations, including "Youth International Party") was created by Abbie Hoffman, Jerry Rubin, and others following the October 1967 March on the Pentagon. Specifically, Yippies were invented to attract media attention and to gain publicity for anti-war rallies planned to coincide with the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago. A Yippie, it was said, was any hippie who was going to Chicago to protest the war. The Yippie phenomenon successfully demonstrated the political content of cultural rebellion.

Yippie war protest was characterized by carnivalesque techniques of burlesque, clowning, and ridicule. As such, it posed a set of problems to the New Left and to formal anti-war efforts, such as the National Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam. On the one hand, the bizarre tactics of Yippies attracted media attention considered crucial to war protest; on the other hand, the anarchic and unstructured nature of Yippie activity made it impossible for the Left to organize and control the group. The nonsense that characterized Yippie protest clashed with the hardheaded seriousness of the anti-war Left.

The name created after the Pentagon march successfully labeled a practice that had been growing in popularity during anti-war rallies. The huge, immovable, and intransigent government machinery responsible for perpetuating the war in Vietnam led many Americans to react with laughter and liberating playfulness. Yippie responses to authoritarianism resembled western European medieval carnival practices. These carnivals were officially tolerated, popular releases held in seasons of church feasts, during which the lower strata of society would mock, ridicule, and figuratively turn upside down the rigid economic and political structures of their society. The rise of modern state capitalism made the destructive potential of such seasonal outbursts intolerable, and the promise of participatory democracy made them irrelevant, and so gradually, through suppression and degeneration, seasonal carnival practices disappeared. Vestiges would nonetheless surface in authoritarian social contexts; for example, American colonial Puritans would report the need to suppress activities such as Maypole dancing in seventeenth-century New England.

Frolic and playfulness were characteristic of many anti-war rallies in this period. At the Pentagon in October 1967 Hoffman led an "exorcism" of demons from the building, surrounding it with young people chanting and singing songs. The juxtaposition of such activities with the armed National Guard troops there to protect government buildings presented a clear package for consumption by print and television news media. Yippie strategists were conscious of the need to present anti-war messages in contexts that the various media would find novel and thus newsworthy. In particular, as television relies heavily on the juxtaposition of images, Yippie protest would often present images of radical contradistinction, such as placing flowers in National Guard gun barrels. Such practices, however, clashed with the anti-war program of the New Left, and pointed to irreconcilable differences between the two strategies. If anything, Yippie tactics pointed to the absurdity of politicking in the liberal sense of the word and argued the closed and totalitarian nature of the American state. Whereas the Left stood for political praxis, Yippies testified to a sense of political insignificance and exhaustion on the part of many Americans in this period.

Yippie carnival tactics were highly visible in the "Festival of Life" held outside the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago, and in the absurdist behavior presented by the Yippie component of the Chicago conspiracy trial defense in 1969-1970. Visual and verbal playfulness were hallmarks of the group's strategy. At Chicago, Yippies nominated a live pig ("Pigasus") as their presidential candidate; in court, their witnesses sang songs from the stand and Yippie defendants mocked judicial structures of decorum. Although speakers Hoffman and Rubin insisted that the group was apolitical, it was, in fact, more a politicization of countercultural temperament than a distinct political program. It was a coalescence of the era's antiauthoritarianism, and through its carnival strategy it was highly conscious of the unwritten rules of social decorum and civil behavior that undergird modern democratic society. Although the public phase of the Yippie phenomenon ended after the Chicago conspiracy trial, an organization calling itself by the same name continued to exist and to publish the quarterly newspaper Overthrow as part of the North American Green network.

[See also New Left; Underground Press.]

FURTHER READING

The New Yippie Book Collective. Blacklisted News, Secret History: From Chicago, '68, to 1984. New York: Bleecker, 1983.
Urgo, Joseph R. "Comedic Impulses and Societal Propriety: The Yippie Carnival." Studies in Popular Culture 10, no. 1 (1987).

—JOSEPH R. URGO

YOUNG, ART (1866-1943). The leading socialist cartoonist and humorist of the early twentieth century, Art Young believed the best political cartoons were those that directly attacked the capitalist system. Young was raised in Monroe, Wisconsin, and at age seventeen moved to Chicago. From 1884 to 1887 he worked for the Daily Mail and the Daily News. During that time he created the definitive sketches of the Haymarket anarchists. After studying art in New York and Paris for eight years, he returned to Chicago and worked for the Inter-Ocean newspaper with Thomas Nast. In late 1895 he returned to New York and drew political cartoons of a Republican and later reformist nature.

His socialist period began around 1910 after he became active with Greenwich Village radicals. His most famous work appeared in the magazines Life, Puck, the Masses, the Liberator, the Metropolitan, and his own radical humor magazine, Good Morning.

In the words of historian Richard Fitzgerald, Young died a "pre-World War I latitudinarian socialist." In 1934 Young wrote optimistically of his socialism: "... I don't know the meaning of 'dialectical materialism.' ... All I know is ... the cause of the workers is right and rule of Capitalism is wrong, and right will win."

Illustration by Art Young for Good Morning, 1920.

[See also Humor; Masses.]

FURTHER READING

Beffel, John Nicholas, ed. Art Young: His Life and Times. New York: Sheridan House, 1939.

Fitzgerald, Richard. Art and Politics: Cartoonists of the "Masses" and "Liberator." Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1973.

Young, Art. On My Way: Being the Book of Art Young in Text and Pictures. New York: Livewright, 1928.

—MIKE KONOPACKI

YOUNG COMMUNIST LEAGUE. The Young Communist League (YCL), Labor Youth League (LYL), Du Bois Clubs, Young Workers Liberation League (YWLL), and (most recently) renamed YCL have operated as the youth wing of the Communist Party. In more successful times, they have reached considerable numbers of youth beyond ordinary Left circles, and exerted a nearly independent force within the social movements of the day. In most times, they have provided a youth corps of future Party activists and leaders, made up in large part—especially in recent decades—of Communists' descendants.

In April 1922, as the Communist movement prepared to come "aboveground" from its persecuted and insular existence, the YCL formed secretly in Bethel, Connecticut; the next month, a "legal convention" was held for the new Young Workers League (YWL). As a document of the latter declared, the new movement sought to play its role "by participating in the struggle of the working-class youth for a better chance to live . . . stressing the most vital issues that confront the youth." The two organizations merged a few years later into the YCL, with the same intent and essentially the same membership, its leaders generally drawn from prominent young members of the Communist Party proper.

The 1920s proved both a difficult and a fascinating time for the YCL. More than the adult movement, largely made up of stable, ethnic community members (such as Finns and Lithuanians) not greatly involved in the frantic factionalism of the period, the YCL was riven by efforts to follow the trends and bitter arguments of the day. At its best, the YCL/YWL recruited thousands of young, largely second-generation ethnic radicals—children of socialists or friends of socialists' children—in urban areas, especially Jewish neighborhoods. These young recruits exhibited enormous energy, determination, and—in many threatening situations—great courage. From Chicago, New York, and smaller towns they ventured out to strike scenes in textile towns or coal patches where Communists had influence, aided logistics, distributed the Daily Worker, and attempted to organize YCL/YWL branches (in many cases, these formed only to dissolve not long afterward). In 1925, the YWL claimed a membership of four thousand and a readership of its lively semimonthly organ, the Young Worker, considerably higher.

It is doubtful that the YCL/YWL reached a figure much higher before the Depression. In many places, younger Communists "assigned" to the YCL had also multiple other duties (such as work in non-English language circles, or Negro-oriented movements, or peace movements, etc.) that prevented them from serious youth engagement. However, they learned the internal logic of the Party as few else could. Among the later national leaders produced by the YCL/YWL could be counted Jack Stachel, John Williamson, Sam Darcy, Harry Haywood, Pat Toohey, Carl Winter, and Gil Green. They also managed, in the Young Worker, to produce at times a fine account of working and living conditions as seen by rebellious, even alienated lower-class youth. Second-generation immigrants, they used the YCL as a mechanism to grow out of their particular ethnic communities, and to seek to establish themselves in the English-speaking majority culture. Holding views distant from those in "American" culture, including the English-speaking working class, the YCLers necessarily formed their own subgroup, whose intensity—and fervent expectation—overcame the sense of collective isolation, but at a cost.

In the early years of the Depression, that cost became more evident. While the YCL blossomed to perhaps ten thousand members, it developed at first little of the momentum anticipated in an obvious social crisis. The Young Worker remained a junior version of adult Communist publications rather than a paper aimed successfully at American youth. Sectarian rancor prevented YCL members from reaching out to liberals and socialists who were also beginning, at the local level, to wrestle with the severe problems of mass poverty and lack of community organization. As in the 1920s, YCLers could be found in mass struggles—such as the Harlan County, Kentucky, mine-workers' mobilization of 1932—but largely by virtue of being sent in from the outside. Outstanding individual YCLers, in any case, often abandoned youth activity as such to travel to a factory sector where unionization seemed possible. Outside the ethnic neighborhoods of major eastern and midwestern cities, that shift meant nominal YCL activity.

Nevertheless, the YCL registered some major successes. Within the Trade Union Unity League organizations, youth sections were formed, through YCL prodding, to articulate the special problems of young workers. In 1932 the YCL launched its earliest efforts to build a broad antifascist youth front, a project that gained steam over the decade. In neighborhood situations of strength, the approach differed in important ways. YCLers began to participate in immediate struggles, and to draw practical conclusions. At first engaged (with other Communists) in direct-action marches on city hall and other such dramatic (but frequently bloody, and generally unsuccessful) tactics, they turned increasingly to lower-profile work among their own unpoliticized peers. Here, the leadership of 1920s YCL veterans, most of all Gil Green, became crucial. Somewhat anticipating the Popular Front, YCLers in many circumstances eased their personal isolation, abandoned the strident calls for a "Soviet America," and began effective mass work on immediate issues at hand.

The turn toward the Popular Front, in 1934–1935, made far more effective action possible. The YCL operated, for the duration of the 1930s, at the historical peak of its influence. Its new publication, Champion of Youth (later, Champion of Youth Monthly), achieved a respectability that earlier YCLers could only have fantasized, with a much-sharpened format, a wide circulation on campuses, and contributors that included Sinclair Lewis, Robert Morse Lovett, sportswriter John R. Tunis, and City College of New York basketball coach Nat Holman.

Ironically, at no point did the YCL receive as much institutional competition from other Communist Party units equally eager for youth and student participation. The National Student League, founded in 1931 and merged with the Student League for Industrial Democracy in 1935, occupied a far more public arena. Youth sections of the International Workers Order, especially among the more ethnically identified teens, also usurped what otherwise might have been (and had been in the 1920s) YCL terrain. The fast-rising labor movement spirited more young people away. Yet the YCL found its niche around and through these and other mass organizations of the Left and of the broader American society. In substantially Jewish, lower-class neighborhoods especially, the YCL was able to establish clubhouses with a nonpolitical, cultural appeal to school friends and others outside the Left networks. At its peak, the New York YCL alone had perhaps twelve thousand members, with clubs of two hundred to five hundred in such districts as the Lower East Side, Williamsburg, Brownsville, Yorkville, Harlem, and the South Bronx.

Within Left-oriented mass-affiliated organizations, such as the American League against War and Fascism, the Southern Negro Youth Congress, and the American Youth Congress, the YCL placed and trained its members in organizing skills and directed their political orientation on specific issues. In sports activities (YCLers tilted toward the Brooklyn Dodgers) and music (YCLers tended to love swing), even more perhaps than in the Popular Front politics of the day, the YCL effected an Americanization more organic than any other section of the Communist movement. The admiration YCLers stirred from the likes of Eleanor Roosevelt, who took up the American Youth Act sponsored by the YCL, seemed to demonstrate this achievement. In all, the YCL seemingly represented, for that optimistic moment, the generation that would make the American Left into a movement of millions.

YCLers had succeeded even more grandly, perhaps, outside the Left orbits proper. Hundreds if not thousands entered industry for the industrial union drive, and many achieved union leadership at the local level during the crucial years. In a scattering of sites, YCLers outnumbered Party members. Their special approach to young workers distinguished their efforts. On the international front, a majority of the thirty-two hundred American Communists who volunteered for the Abraham Lincoln Brigade were YCLers, leaving behind many enthusiastic supporters for whom that war was a peak of activity.

Despite these impressive efforts, the YCL organization had not reached far beyond the older ethnic limits of the Left, or sunk in its roots deeply. With the succession of the Hitler-Stalin Pact, the brief but telling Red Scare, and the national mobilization following the Pearl Harbor attack, the YCL lost its immediate prospects, the bulk of its active members, and even the tone of its periodicals. The 1943 dissolution of the Communist Party also dissolved the YCL, into American Youth for Democracy, but unlike the parent group, it did not reestablish itself as such in 1945. Party youth sections grew but did not especially flourish, and what youth activity took place in the immediate postwar years centered around the revival of fraternal movements such as the powerful Jewish People's Fraternal Order, friendship work with the Soviet Union (the American section of the World Federation of Democratic Youth), coalitions joined to the broader liberal movement and Henry Wallace's Progressive Party campaign for the presidency (American Youth for Democracy, succeeded by the short-lived Young Progressives of America).

The LYL, founded in 1949 on the morrow of the disappointing Wallace vote, had a timbre distinctly different from its predecessors. It aimed itself along familiar lines, with special emphasis on the Cold War crisis, racism, and the war in Korea. It reestablished Challenge as a monthly publication, pressed the government for the eighteen-year-old vote, more money for school building programs, a higher minimum wage, and similar issues intended to gather support from working-class youth. It sponsored and drew close to a journal intended to have more popular appeal, New Foundations, with a format revised in 1951 to feature cultural discussions. Given the period, the LYL carried on a remarkable array of agitation. But times had changed, a fact reflected most evidently in the GI Bill, which opened up college education to the working class for the first time. The LYL gained its basic constituency from college-bound, generally upwardly mobile intellectuals more theoretical-minded and more theoretically open-minded than their predecessors. Claiming up to two hundred chapters and five thousand members, the LYL sometimes—especially after appearances in 1953–1954 before the Subversive Activities Control Board—operated as a semi-secret organization. (On large and liberal campuses such as the University of Wisconsin, it might have “open” and “secret” members.) It did not grow to a mass movement so much as train its activists for intellectual, social, cultural, and organizational contributions to the civil rights, anti-war, and other movements in later decades. Former members loomed especially large in campus life of the 1960s, as senior advisers to the New Left.

The Communist Party dissolved the LYL in 1957, amid the internal upheavals of the Twentieth Soviet Congress. In the aftermath, a few branches of the LYL retained their name, but for the most part, new groups such as the Progressive Youth Organizing Committee, Teens Ahead, or Burning Issues grew up on the local level, sometimes successfully attaching themselves to civil rights and other current movements. In 1965, drawing initially upon local initiatives on the West Coast, the Du Bois Clubs were formed. (Richard Nixon would charge, with unintended hilarity, that the name's similarity to “The Boys Clubs” had been intended to confuse youth.) Never more than a small number within the massive political mobilization of the time, the Du Bois Clubs were distinguished by their multiracial composition and their earnestness. Often raised within the Left, their members had organizing skills especially useful in a variety of campus and community movements. But persistently overshadowed, they dissolved in 1971.

The YWLL, founded that year, represented an effort to recombine campus and community activities in a broader public movement, successor to a collapsing New Left. To a certain extent, the YWLL succeeded in recruiting disappointed New Left veterans and other young people. It hesitantly embraced such new causes as women's liberation (not, however, gay liberation), retaining heavy stress upon racial equality and class issues. Despite activity in a broad spectrum of contemporary movements, however, the YWLL reached no more than a few thousand membership, and dissolved in 1984. The newly reorganized YCL, in effect the YWLL under a different name, made a more ambitious beginning, and enjoyed some scattered campus support until the 1989 split in Communist ranks. Thereafter, there were enthusiastic trips to Cuba and similar symbolic acts, but not much success in relaunching a youth movement.

[See also Communist Party, USA; Student Movements, 1930s.]

FURTHER READING

Bart, Philip, et al., eds. Highlights of a Fighting History: Sixty Years of the Communist Party, USA. New York: International Publishers, 1979.

Buhle, Paul, ed. History and the New Left: Madison, Wisconsin, 1950–1970. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.

Glaberman, Martin, and George P. Rawick. "'Champion of Youth' and 'Champion of Labor Monthly.'" In The American Radical Press, 1880–1960, vol. 1, edited by Joseph Conlin. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1974.

Klehr, Harvey. The Heyday of American Communism: The Depression Decade. New York: Basic Books, 1984.

—PAUL BUHLE

YOUNG LORDS PARTY. Founded in 1969 on the model of the Black Panther Party and composed mainly of second-generation Puerto Rican youth, the Young Lords Party (YLP) played a major role in awakening a spirit of nationalism, unity, and political struggle within the Puerto Rican community. The YLP's thirteen-point program and platform called for equality between men and women, community control of police, schools, and other community institutions, and the establishment of a socialist society. Skilled at using the media, the YLP published a weekly newspaper called Palante, produced the first radio program by New York-born Latinos, and gained extensive television coverage for its activities.

The first YLP headquarters was located in El Barrio—the largest and most important community of the Puerto Rican diaspora—at 1678 Madison Avenue, between 111th and 112th Streets in New York City. Its first political offensive consisted of burning garbage in the streets of El Barrio to force the Department of Sanitation to provide adequate trash removal. Perhaps its most famous action was the takeover of the First United Spanish Methodist Church on Lexington Avenue and 112th Street on 28 December 1969. There, it operated community programs for eleven days that included classes on Afro-Caribbean history and culture, health testing, as well as a free breakfast and clothing program. Many thousands of people participated in activities at the church, and when the police evicted the YLP 105 people were arrested.

At its peak, almost a thousand people were YLP members. Storefront offices opened in the South Bronx and on the Lower East Side, and branches were established in Newark-Hoboken, Bridgeport, Philadelphia, and Puerto Rico. In addition, there were active supporters in Detroit, Boston, and Hawaii, in the military, and in prisons. Support in El Barrio was particularly widespread, as exemplified by a YLP-led October 1970 march of ten thousand people demanding independence for Puerto Rico that wound its way from East Harlem to the United Nations. The YLP contributed to increasing citywide lead and tuberculosis detection tests, creating the mood that led to bilingual education and the teaching of Puerto Rican history, and giving impetus to the struggle for drug treatment services and a new Lincoln Hospital in the South Bronx.

In 1972, the YLP shifted its focus away from community organizing toward theoretical study and organizing at work sites, in the process changing its name to the Puerto Rican Workers Organization. A number of former Young Lords made their way into mainstream institutions. Most prominent of these were Felipe Luciano, once deputy chairman, who became a newscaster on major New York television stations, and Juan Gonzalez, the once deputy minister of information, who became a reporter for the Daily News and other mass media. In one of his columns, Gonzalez wrote, "Before the Lords, Puerto Ricans and other Hispanics were an invisible minority. After our founding, a whole generation experienced a cultural awakening."

FURTHER READING

Abramson, Michael. Palante: Young Lords Party. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1971.

De La Cruz, Evidio. "Los Young Lords: ¿Titeres o Revolucionarios?" Diario-La Prensa, 5 March 1989.

Gonzalez, Juan. "Praise the Lords, Pass the Admiration." Daily News, 18 October 1996.

Guzman, Pablo. "A Lord of the Barrio." Village Voice, 21 March 1995.

Lee, Jennifer. "The Young Lords: A New Generation of Puerto Ricans; An Oral History." Culturefront (fall 1994).

—GIL FAGIANI

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

Long known as YPSL—pronounced "yipsel"—the Young People's Socialist League represented youth and, often, an organized Left within the Socialist Party (SP). Unlike the Young Communist League, it could never be viewed as merely a youth expression of the adult movement, but was seen rather as a radical youth movement in which the SP played a generally supportive, avuncular role.

The youth movement, restricted in the nineteenth-century socialist organizations to fraternal and cultural auxiliaries, grew up in the early years of the SP through a number of individual groups (some with names such as the Athenian Literary Society, or the Social Science Study Club) created by SP locals to attract young people mainly through recreational programs. The Young Socialist League of Chicago, perhaps the best known, occupied a floor of the Chicago Daily Socialist building and claimed three hundred members. By the 1912 apex of the party, the convention officially gave its stamp of approval to such experiments and promised to aid them. Following the logic of the nineteenth-century ethnic movement, the Women's Department was given initial responsibility for building a socialist youth bloc.

By 1915 a coherent national organization had been established, with an age limit established at fifteen to thirty years. YPSL national secretary William F. Kruse claimed a membership of five thousand in 147 cities, the Young Socialists' Magazine as having a circulation of ten thousand, and a special YPSL number of the American Socialist as running to ninety thousand. With the coming of World War I, YPSL fell under government repression, Kruse received a twenty-year sentence and other leaders varying amounts for opposition to American involvement in the war. In 1919, their membership reported at ten thousand, Yipsels voted in convention to join the Communist movement—itself on the verge of debilitating internal division. The first golden age of the movement had come to an end.

By the early 1920s, YPSL had successfully reorganized under the leadership of former Harvard student Albert Weisbord. While Weisbord himself defected to the Communist movement in 1924, the Yipsels carried on a vigorous campaign in Robert La Follette's 1924 Progressive Party presidential bid. The decline of the SP thereafter deprived YPSL of finances and momentum. In 1929 it began to revive in force. The organization reappeared as a national movement in 1932, as part of the dynamic Norman Thomas presidential campaign. By the following year, it began publication of the Challenge and embarked on an ambitious series of campaigns around the labor and unemployed movements.

With an exceptionally strong following in Greater New York of several thousand and ardent branches in Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Pittsburgh, Milwaukee, and elsewhere, the movement became a major player in SP affairs. Indeed, the often aging, foreign-born, and geographically scattered adult movement depended on YPSL (along with its campus sister organization, the Student League for Industrial Democracy) for serious, organized political competition to the Communist Party. This circumstance gave the political favorites of Yipsels—the leftish "Militants" around Norman Thomas rather than the "Old Guard" around the Rand School, the New Leader, and the garment trades—an important factional advantage. It also heightened the internal conflict in the SP, resulting in the 1936 departure of the Old Guard with its major institutions. YPSL overwhelmingly opposed any support of potential imperialist wars, even those against the likes of Hitler, and it shunned electoral alliances with the Democrats. Naturally, then, Yipsels early suspended their cooperation with their Young Communist opposite numbers in the student movement when the Communist Party entered its Popular Front mode.

From an SP viewpoint, YPSL had only avoided the frying pan for the fire. Drawn to the Trotskyists, who had joined the Socialists in 1936 intent upon building internal caucuses and "capturing" members, YPSL came to be looked upon, in large part, as a now-disloyal element. Denied credentials to the 1937 convention—in some cases expelled from "reorganized" Socialist locals—the several hundred Trotskyist-minded Yipsels formed the "YPSL (Fourth International)," which itself dissipated with the war and further splits in the Trotskyist movement. In any case, the overwhelming popularity of Franklin Roosevelt, the growing antifascist sentiment, and the growing influence of the Communist Party limited the appeal of any socialist youth movement uncompromised on liberal capitalism and the war. A second golden age, brief but furious, had nearly closed on the movement.

Many young socialists, organized and unorganized, simply gave their full attention to the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the labor movement generally. YPSL served, in the long run, as a school for labor leadership—without, however, itself taking much benefit from this estimable contribution. Meanwhile, the remnants of YPSL remained a mainstay of the now-floundering, but determined, SP. Working mainly with pacifist and church groups to oppose U.S. involvement in world war, it helped organize the Youth Committee against War, and the youth section of the Keep America Out of War Congress, in which Norman Thomas was a leading figure. Briefly, despite the renewed threats of government repression, the movement caught fire. The invasion of Pearl Harbor dampened such energies and the national mobilization effectively dispersed YPSL personnel.

Maintaining a tenuous existence for another decade, YPSL suffered one final prominent defection in 1953 when its foremost spokesman, Michael Harrington, led a noteworthy group into the Young Socialist League (YSL) of the Independent Socialist League (formerly the Workers Party, whose predecessors had drawn another generation of Yipsels into Trotskyism sixteen years earlier). The YSL, a lively discussion circle on several campuses of the 1950s, returned en bloc to the SP alongside the bulk of the Independent Socialist League for the 1958 merger. With figures such as Harrington, Bayard Rustin, David McReynolds, and Bogdan Denitch, the reconstituted YPSL took on new life.

Although hardly numerous, Yipsels of the late 1950s and early 1960s essentially provided leadership—sometimes openly and sometimes less than openly—to the emerging “movement,” from civil rights to the Student Peace Union. Here and there, they could also be found to be the leading personnel of the campus Young Democrats, or of the youth wing of the Americans for Democratic Action. Despite such widespread influence, YPSL never regained a wide membership, perhaps because its style of maneuver did little to encourage mass enrollment.

The birth of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) in 1962, out of the Student League for Industrial Democracy, placed YPSL in the awkward position of loyal youth wing to the Old Left—similar, in a certain generational respect, to the Communists’ and orthodox Trotskyists’ own youth movements. SDS, and many local movements under a variety of names, rapidly outstripped YPSL, whose leaders increasingly made a reputation for their hard-line Cold War positions. While SDS urged “immediate withdrawal” from Vietnam, YPSL launched its major late-1960s campaign as “Negotiations Now,” a move seen by most student activists as backhanded support for further U.S. occupation. It attracted comparatively little following.

YPSL virtually ceased activity in 1972, with the departure of Michael Harrington and his followers from the SP to the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee (DSOC). Remaining a part of the rightward-leaning Social Democrats, USA, YPSL officially disbanded in 1977. Meanwhile DSOC, and its successor, Democratic Socialists of America (DSA), included among their leadership rolls many former YPSL luminaries. DSA Youth, lineal successor of YPSL, maintained limited activities in an era of campus apathy and was buoyed in the mid-1990s when the Organizing Institute, an arm of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, began recruiting undergraduates for summer campaigns.

[See also Socialist Party; Student Movements, 1930s; Trotskyism.]

FURTHER READING

Peterson, Patti. “The Young Socialist Movement in America from 1905–1940: A Study of the Young People’s Socialist League.” Ph.D. diss., University of Wisconsin, 1974.

—PAUL BUHLE

YOUNG PIONEERS OF AMERICA. The children’s organization of the Communist Party of the United States (CP), the Young Pioneers of America (YPA) was founded to provide “proletarian education” for working-class children between the ages of seven and fourteen. Its membership consisted mainly of children from Communist families.

The YPA was organized in 1923 as the Junior Section of the Young Workers League, which was the youth section of the Workers Party (WP). When the “legal” WP and the “clandestine” CP merged in 1926, the YPA became the designated children’s organization of the CP. The YPA retained this form until 1934, when it faded away and its role was taken over by the Junior Section of the International Workers Order (IWO), the Communist-led federation of ethnically based fraternal benefit societies. YPA publications included the Young Comrade (1924–1926), the Young Pioneer (1926–1931), and the New Pioneer (1931–1934, taken over by IWO Juniors, 1934–1938).

The YPA drew upon the traditions of socialist and anarchist educational programs for children in the United States and was influenced by the development of Young Pioneers organizations in Germany and the Soviet Union. The YPA had three functions within the Communist movement: developing Communist education for its membership; organizing working-class children into political campaigns; and providing the political leadership for more broadly based children's groups within the Communist orbit.

Communist-influenced organizations often had separate children's sections in which Young Pioneers were expected to play a role similar to that of CP members in adult organizations. Such was the case with the Young Liberators of the International Labor Defense. During the 1926 silk strike in Paterson, New Jersey, the 1929 textile strike in Gastonia, North Carolina, and the 1929 strikes led by the National Miners Union, the YPA mobilized workers' children in association with the Trade Union Unity League.

The YPA was strongest among children in the Jewish working-class communities of New York and the Finnish agricultural and mining communities of the Midwest. YPA meetings involved discussions of current events and planning political campaigns. Readings were drawn from a series of Communist children's books. The YPA campaigned against child labor, "bourgeois, reactionary" children's organizations like the Boy Scouts, and patriotic propaganda in the schools. It fought for integrated swimming pools and free lunches for children of the unemployed. It also sponsored summer camps, often in association with other Communist-affiliated organizations.

The YPA emphasized class identities to the exclusion of ethnicity, which it viewed as nationalist and reactionary. This created a tension between the YPA and Communist parents of immigrant backgrounds who wanted to transmit their ethnic heritage to their children. This narrow understanding of culture was transformed later in the 1930s when the ethnically organized IWO Juniors replaced the YPA as the Communist children's organization during the period of the Popular Front.

[See also Young Communist League.]

FURTHER READING

Mishler, Paul C. "The Littlest Proletariat: American Communists and Their Children, 1922–1950." Ph.D. diss., Boston University, 1988.

Teitelbaum, Kenneth, and William Reese. "American Socialist Pedagogy and Experimentation in the Progressive Era: The Socialist Sunday School." History of Education Quarterly 23, no. 4 (winter 1983).

U.S. Congress. House. Special Committee to Investigate Communist Activities. Investigation of Communist Propaganda. 71st Cong., 2d sess., 1930. Vol. 1, pt. 3.

—PAUL C. MISHLER

YOUNG WORKERS LIBERATION LEAGUE.

See Young Communist League.

YOUTH AGAINST WAR AND FASCISM. See Trotskyism.

ZEIDLER, FRANK P. (b. 1912). The last socialist mayor of Milwaukee and the most prominent figure in the Socialist Party after Norman Thomas, Frank Zeidler has been a remarkably successful politician as well as an important spokesperson of the Left during the second half of the twentieth century. Zeidler became active in the Milwaukee movement as the older generation of German immigrant activists dwindled and the Depression offered new opportunities to propose a local socialist alternative to capitalism. Serving as secretary of the Milwaukee socialist movement for several years, he ran unsuccessfully for a variety of positions until elected as a county surveyor for Milwaukee on the Progressive Party ticket in 1938. Three years later, he was elected to the Milwaukee Board of School Directors. In 1948 Zeidler was elected mayor, the marked exception to the Cold War trend of disappearing Left regional or local parties and diminished socialist votes.

In the face of extremely difficult days for the Left generally, Milwaukeeans thrived under Zeidler and elected him to two more terms. Frugal budget policies, the upgrade of city services, and cultural and educational advances made him a popular city figure. Declining to run for a fourth term in 1960, he continued active involvement with the Socialist Party and a host of other religious, pacifist, and community organizations.

During 1972–1973, Zeidler helped spearhead the movement to reorganize the Socialist Party. In May of 1973, when the party was reconstituted at a founding convention in Milwaukee, Zeidler was unanimously elected as national chair of the new organization. Three years later, he ran for president on the Socialist Party ticket, its first standard bearer in twenty years. Now chair emeritus of the Socialist Party, USA, he has remained active in the Socialist Party of Wisconsin and of Milwaukee.

FURTHER READING

Beck, Elmer. The Sewer Socialists. Fennimore, Wis.: Westburg Associates Publishers, 1982.

Hendrickson, Dave. "The Zeidler Legacy." Wisconsin Magazine, 28 February 1988.

Luders, Bill. "Last of a Breed." Milwaukee Magazine, November 1985.

—STEVE ROSSIGNOL

ZUKUNFT. At a time when the prestige of a Yiddish publication stood in indirect proportion to the frequency of its publication, the Yiddish-speaking leftist intelligentsia in New York felt the need for a highbrow monthly. Di Zukunft (The Future) first appeared in January 1892 in response to this need. It was founded by Philip Krantz, Abraham Cahan, Morris Hillquit, and Louis Miller, the same group that had founded the weekly Arbeter Zeitung (Workers' Paper) two years earlier. Except for a hiatus of five years, from 1897 to 1902, it has been published continuously ever since. In 1992, the journal celebrated its hundredth anniversary at the New York Young Men's Hebrew Association.

Di Zukunft began with a challenging and complicated set of goals. A socialist publication from the outset, it was designed to be an organ of political propaganda. Its editors hoped to put out a journal comparable to the "thick journals" published for the tiny, elite group of intellectuals in nineteenth-century Russia. They looked enviously, too, at such highbrow English-language magazines as the Atlantic and dreamed of creating something similar in Yiddish. Unfortunately, their readership lacked the secular education that distinguished members of the Russian intelligentsia and middle-class American readers of the Atlantic, so Di Zukunft of necessity became a vehicle for the edification of the immigrant Jewish community in America.

In the beginning the articles were divided into three categories: socialism, general "science" (or scholarship), and literature. The aim was to give contributors a forum for the exposition of their latest theoretical musings, while giving readers exposure to the basic facts of modern science and the latest writings of some of the world's finest (and many less known) Yiddish writers. Popularization was the key concept, as the editors soon recognized. Until Di Zukunft had succeeded in creating for itself an educated readership, it would be forced to target a level of cultivation far beneath that of the men and women who wrote for it.

Di Zukunft was not a dazzling success in its first decades, and though it is difficult to measure the extent to which it furthered its goal of raising the Jewish masses out of ignorance and into a modern, secular, and politically progressive view of the world, it is fairly safe to say that its impact on the lives of common working people was not enormous. There is no doubt that the quality of its articles was uneven at best. And yet the journal could boast a number of truly extraordinary figures among its contributors, and its pages contain treasures that few researchers have turned up. Di Zukunft was and remains fascinating above all for the picture it gives us of the development of the intellectual vanguard in the Jewish immigrant community.

One of its most noteworthy and most frequent contributors in its early years was Louis Boudin, labor lawyer and author of the widely respected book The Theoretical System of Karl Marx (1907). In addition to many articles on socialist theory and current political trends, he contributed some of the earliest examples of Marxist literary criticism ever published in the United States in any language. Leo Deutsch, the Russified Jewish intellectual who was widely known among Jewish revolutionaries on both sides of the Atlantic for his ordeals during sixteen years of imprisonment in Siberia, published numerous articles on his own experiences and on the heroes and heroines of the Russian Jewish revolutionary movement. Abraham Cahan wrote on a wide range of topics, from literary theory to biology. Morris Winchevsky offered political history and theory, in addition to poetry, stories, and translations. Chaim Zhitlovsky treated readers to the various stages in his intellectual journey through the problems of radicalism and Jewish identity.

Writing in 1912 about the history of Di Zukunft, Morris Winchevsky characterized the political orientation of the monthly in its first twenty years by saying that it had started out presenting a viewpoint that combined Marxism, Blanquism, and traditions taken from the conspiratorial Narodnaia volia (Popular Will) movement in Russia, but that this amalgam of ideologies had gradually given way to the more or less unified worldview of "contemporary Marxism." The goal for the future, he said, was to abandon the doctrinaire assimilationist ideology of the previous era in Jewish socialism and actively take account of the Jewishness of the journal's contributors and the working masses they were trying to serve.

This goal appears to have been met, though in a way that Winchevsky might not have predicted. In 1913, Abraham Liessin took over the editorship and occupied that position for twenty-five years, longer than any predecessor or successor. By one estimate, within a single year he boosted the readership from a modest two or three thousand to an impressive twenty thousand. He attracted a consistently higher caliber of writer than in the past. Above all, he moved the journal away from the antireligious sentiments that characterized its earlier decades to a ready acceptance of Jewish concerns. It was during the 1920s that Di Zukunft gained recognition among Jews around the world, especially on matters relating to the Bund. It also widened the considerably narrower political focus of earlier years.

Liessin's impressive circulation figures did not survive the Depression, and over the years the journal was passed from owner to owner (including for many years the Jewish Daily Forward), generally operating at a loss. Today, with a circulation of some three thousand, Di Zukunft is published three or four times a year by CYCO (Tsentrale yidishe kultur organizatsye) and the Congress for Jewish Culture.

FURTHER READING

- Boaz, Khaim. "Der khoydesh-zshurnal 'Tsukunft'" (The monthly journal Zukunft). Di Tsukunft 73, nos. 3-4 (March-April 1968).
- Shtarkman, Moyshe. "Bashayners fun der 'Tsukunft'" (Luminaries of Di Zukunft). Di Tsukunft 73, nos. 3-4 (March-April 1968).
- Yeshurin, Yefim. "Zibetsik yor 'Tsukunft' (1892-1962) (Bibliografishe statistik)" (Seventy years of Zukunft [1892-1962] [Bibliographical statistics]). Di Tsukunft 67, nos. 11-12 (November-December 1962).

—STEVEN CASSEDY

GLOSSARY

Certain common terms in the vocabulary of the American Left are used throughout the body of the encyclopedia without always being fully defined, and certain movements, organizations, and people are often mentioned without always being fully identified. The following definitions and identifications of frequently used terms and names are therefore offered as aids to the reader.

American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) Founded in 1920 to provide legal aid to citizens whose fundamental constitutional rights are endangered. The ACLU has been involved in many controversial cases over such civil rights as freedom of speech and freedom of assembly. [See Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley; McCarthyism.]

American Federation of Labor (AFL) First organized in 1881 as the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions of the United States and Canada. Became the AFL in 1886. Consistently the most conservative of labor federations, although member unions could be quite radical at given times and locations. Organized on the craft principle and generally dedicated to the philosophy of business unionism.

alternative culture A term popular in the 1960s and 1970s. Indicates cultural trends dissenting from mainstream American culture. Applied to activities as diverse as small-press publishing, avant-garde filmmaking, use of "recreational" drugs, political dissent, and nontraditional sexual involvements. Often used interchangeably with counterculture, but a distinction that could be made is that those who preferred the term alternative culture often thought of it as "dropping out from" dominant culture rather than challenging it. [See Hoffman, Abbie; New Left; Underground Comix; Underground Press; Yippies.]

Althusser, Louis Algerian-born French theorist (1918–1990), best known for his claims to a rigorously scientific Marxist method free of all Hegelian traces. "Theoretical Practice," the prescribed mode of intellectual activity, greatly popularized structuralism and the renewed theoretical emphasis upon language and ideology. It led indirectly to the heavily psychoanalytic poststructuralist modes popular among avant-garde literary critics of the 1980s. [See Literary Criticism.]

Blanquist A supporter of the views of Auguste Blanqui (1805–1881), the French revolutionary who pioneered the doctrine that workers need a dedicated minority to lead them to revolutionary action and that a workers' revolution would entail a temporary dictatorship to carry out a genuine transformation of society.

Bonus March The march on Washington, D.C., in 1932 by fifteen thousand veterans of World War I who demanded immediate payment of a bonus due them in 1945. Their request was denied, and they were dispersed by a federal force commanded by General Douglas MacArthur. Cavalry, infantry, tanks, and tear gas were used against the marchers. [See Unemployed Movements, 1930s.]

Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich Bolshevik leader (1888–1938) identified with the "Right" view of adaptation to capitalist stability, Bukharin became the inspirer of a worldwide tendency that previewed Popular Front perspectives and struggled (until Bukharin's condemnation at the Moscow Trials) for a more democratic, nonsectarian version of them. [See Lovestoneites; Moscow Trials.]

Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) Began in 1935 as the Committee for Industrial Organization within the American Federation of Labor (AFL). Suspended from the AFL in 1936. Became an independent national union in 1938. Merged with the AFL in 1955 to form the AFL-CIO. Based on principles of industrial unionism. During its first decade enlisted ideological radicals, including Communists, as organizers.

Congress on Racial Equality (CORE) Founded in 1942 to advance the cause of racial integration and civil rights for African Americans. [See Civil Rights Movement; Pacifism.]

counterculture A term originating in the 1960s to indicate dissenting cultural movements that consciously posed themselves as adversaries of mainstream or dominant American culture. Often used interchangeably with alternative culture. [See Hoffman, Abbie; New Left; Underground Comix; Underground Press; Yippies.]

Dies Committee Nickname for the Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, established by the U.S. House of Representatives in 1938 and chaired by Martin Dies (1900–1972), a Democrat from Texas. Under Dies, this special committee first investigated the German-American Bund, which was considered pro-Nazi. Later, as the House Committee on Un-American Activities, it investigated Communists in the Hollywood film industry, the Federal Theater of the Works Progress Administration, and various labor unions. [See House Committee on Un-American Activities.]

Fabian socialism Refers to the views originating in the Fabian Society of Great Britain, established in 1884. Fabians believed that socialism could be achieved through mass education and a series of reforms achieved through capture of Parliament. Fabian ideas became the basis of the British Labour Party. Among prominent Fabians were George Bernard Shaw and H. G. Wells. American women reformers such as Frances Willard and other intellectuals were influenced by Fabianism during the 1890s. [See British Americans; Willard, Frances.]

Ferrer schools Schools based on the ideas of Spanish anarchist Francisco Ferrer y Guardia (1859–1909); also called escuelas modernas ("modern schools"). Ferrer devised a curriculum based totally on science and rationality and excluding religion, racism, militarism, and the spirit of revenge. He believed that people educated in such manner would build an anarchist society. His first school was in Barcelona. At least one hundred other Ferrer schools were based on that model, including some in the United States, notably at the Stelton Colony in New Jersey. Ferrer's manuals were often used by his ideological adversaries, including the Roman Catholic church. [See Anarchism; Cuban Americans.]

forty-eighters Refers to European immigrants who left their native lands after the democratic revolutions of 1848 failed. Most commonly indicates German immigrants. In other contexts, the term might indicate the early wave of prospectors who went to California after the discovery of gold in 1848, although forty-niners is more commonly used to name the thousands of people who traveled westward during the Gold Rush of 1849. [See German Americans.]

Fourierism The theories advanced by Charles Fourier (1772–1837), a French revolutionary who believed that an ideal society could be centered on small cooperative agricultural and industrial units that he called "phalanxes." Fourierist communities were set up in the 1840s at Red Bank, New Jersey, and at Brook Farm, Massachusetts, as part of the various American experiments with utopian socialism. [See Utopianism.]

Frankfurt school The style of theory shaped within or influenced by the major theorists associated with the Institut für Sozialforschung (Institute for Social Research) in Frankfurt, Germany. The institute remained in Frankfurt from 1923 until 1933, was relocated to the United States during the Nazi era, and was returned to Germany in the early 1950s. Max Horkheimer, Herbert Marcuse, Theodor Adorno, Walter Benjamin, and others—nearly all German Jews from comfortable backgrounds—elucidated a cultural theory seeking to explain, by way of philosophy, aesthetics, and related fields, the non-revolutionary quality of the contemporary proletariat and the increasingly crushing hegemony of mass culture. [See Marcuse, Herbert; Philosophy.]

Freedom of Information Act Passed in 1966, the Freedom of Information Act requires that records of U.S. government agencies be available to the public. Numerous restrictions apply. These restrictions were increased by an executive order in 1982 signed by President Ronald Reagan. [See Federal Bureau of Investigation; New Left.]

Gramsci, Antonio A founder of the Italian Communist Party, Gramsci (1891–1937) deepened Marxist theory with his writing on workers' culture and the mechanisms of cultural domination. Widely read by post-1960s American radicals.

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Formulator of historical dialectics, the philosophical inspirer of Karl Marx and of countless Marxist intellectuals from Antonio Labriola and V. I. Lenin to Georg Lukács and C. L. R. James. In his lifetime (1770–1831) considered the foremost philosopher of Europe, Hegel explained history as "progress in the consciousness of freedom," albeit (from a Marxist standpoint) conceived of in an idealistic fashion. The Young Hegelians, including Marx himself, radicalized Hegel's doctrines against the philosopher's own ultimately conservative conclusions. [See Dunayevskaya, Raya; James, C. L. R.; Philosophy.]

Jewish Bund The primary organization of Jewish socialism in eastern Europe from its turn-of-the-century founding until the Bolshevik Revolution, the Bund ("band," "league," "union") became a training school for mostly Yiddish-speaking Jewish labor and political radicals in the diaspora as well. Following the Russian Revolution, it represented an anticommunist but also an anti-Zionist socialism, a position maintained by its remaining fragments in the Socialist International of the 1970s and 1980s. [See Yiddish Left.]

Kropotkin, Peter Russian geographer, anarchist, and philosopher, born into a noble family as Petr Alekseyevich Kropotkin. Prince Peter's life (1842–1921), spent in Russia, France, and England, was widely admired as one of personal sacrifice for the masses. His arguments for cooperation rather than competition as the basis of civilization had great appeal, even among early Marxists. His Mutual Aid (1902) presented a scientifically based argument that cooperation was the chief factor in the evolution and preservation of a species. Notwithstanding his support of World War I, his reputation remained high in anarchist circles, especially among American Jewish anarchists. [See Anarchism; Freie Arbeiter Shtimme.]

Lassalle, Ferdinand A much-revered founder of German Social Democracy, Lassalle (1825–1864) was more personally charismatic than Marx and, until his dramatic death in a duel, far more popular. His stress upon electoral politics and reform through the broadening of state influence exerted considerable influence in Germany and the United States. [See Socialist Labor Party.]

Lenin Nikolai Lenin and V. I. Lenin are the two names used after 1901 by Vladimir Il'ich Ul'ianov (1870–1924), foremost leader of the Bolsheviks, strategist of the 1917 October Revolution, and head of the postrevolutionary Russian state. Best known among his American followers for his emphasis on the vanguard-party concept, Lenin's reputation shifted thereafter to formulator of Third World revolutions for "self-determination" and as leader of a largely peasant but revolutionary society. [See Vanguard Party.]

Lukács, Georg Hungarian philosopher and critic; born György Lukács. For decades considered Marxism's most sophisticated dialectician and literary scholar, Lukács shaped much of "Western Marxism," the theoretical edifice of an intelligentsia in nonrevolutionary society. In a long life (1885–1971) of literary activity in his native Hungary and in Germany, Russia, and elsewhere, he reached the apex of his importance with Geschichte und Klassenbewusstsein (History and Class Consciousness; 1923), which sought to restore the Hegelian legacy present in Marx's own early writings to modern Marxist materialism. [See Literary Criticism.]

Mao Zedong Also known as Mao Tse-tung. Leader of the Chinese Revolution and the postrevolutionary Chinese state, Mao emerged in the last decades of his life as the chief symbol of Third World revolution. Like Joseph Stalin, he was a cult figure in his lifetime (1893–1976). Best remembered for his emphasis upon the peasantry in the world-revolutionary process and his dramatic but unsuccessful effort to overcome postrevolutionary bureaucracy through the Cultural Revolution (1966–1967). [See Maoism.]

Marxist-Leninism The interpretation of Marxist thought put forward by Lenin. Emphasizes the need for a vanguard party composed of professional revolutionaries, displacing the more eclectic combination of radical ideas with a single, unified doctrine. Under Stalin, the USSR made Marxist-Leninism into a state doctrine. [See Communist Party; Vanguard Party.]

McCarran-Walter Act The Internal Security Act passed in 1950 over the veto of President Harry S. Truman. Its chief sponsor was Senator Patrick A. McCarran (1876–1954), a Democrat from Nevada. Aimed primarily at Communists, the McCarran-Walter Act sanctioned the jailing, fining, deportation, preventive detention, and political ostracism of "subversives." Other sections barred foreign communists from entering the United States if they did not agree to major restrictions on their movements, activities, and public speech. Much of the Act has been judged unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Its main use was in the 1950s, but it remains in effect. [See American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born; McCarthyism.]

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) Founded in 1905 by a group headed by W. E. B. Du Bois and including a number of socialists. Relatively radical in its early years, it eventually came to focus its efforts on judicial and legislative actions. [See Civil Rights Movement; Du Bois, W. E. B.]

National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) An independent federal agency that administers the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act) of 1935 and its successors. Major responsibilities include supervising recognition elections at the workplace and ruling on the fairness of labor practices. Once a bastion of the New Deal reformers who favored unions, during the Reagan era organized labor charged it was decidedly promanagement. [See Taft-Hartley Loyalty Oath.]

Nye Committee Refers to either of the two major Senate committees headed by Gerald Prentice Nye (1892–1971), a Progressive Republican from North Dakota. His 1927 committee investigated the Teapot Dome Scandal and his 1934–1937 committee investigated the role of American business and bankers in World War I. [See American League against War and Fascism; Peace Movements.]

Old Left A term used in the 1960s and thereafter to contrast with New Left, it connoted essentially the Marxist movements involved in the sectarian quarrels and state-socialist perspective of Communists, Socialists, and Trotskyists from the 1920s through the 1950s. Younger people who joined such groups and some Maoist and Marxist-Leninist groups of like nature were also considered Old Left. [See Communist Party; New Left.]

Owenism The views of Robert Owen (1771–1858), a Welsh utopian socialist who used his personal fortune to create cooperative communities in England and the United States. His son, Robert Dale (1801–1877), assisted in establishing New Harmony, Indiana (1826–1827). Later Robert Dale established a settlement for freed slaves, served in Congress, helped found the Smithsonian Institution, and was a foreign diplomat. After 1859 he became increasingly involved in spiritualism, as had his father. [See Spiritualism; Utopianism.]

Palmer raids Named after A. Mitchell Palmer (1872–1936), the U.S. attorney general in the administration of President Woodrow Wilson. At the conclusion of World War I, Palmer administered mass arrests of alleged subversives, mostly of foreign birth. Thousands were rounded up and hundreds were deported. [See Federal Bureau of Investigation; Red Scare.]

Paris Commune Also known as the Commune of Paris. Two forms of government in France, one in the eighteenth century, one in the nineteenth. (1) Formed in 1789 as the elected city government of Paris, the Paris Commune became a vehicle for radical extremists during the French Revolution. Weakened by the execution of its leaders during the Reign of Terror, it was abolished in 1794. (2) The rebel government formed in 1871 by the inhabitants of Paris was short-lived, lasting only from 18 March until 28 May. Nevertheless, it inspired Karl Marx's The Civil War in France (1871) and proved crucial for Lenin's The State and Revolution (1917). Coming amid the humiliating defeat of France in the Franco-Prussian War, the Commune displaced exhausted bourgeois rule with a government largely of workers, some of them anarchists and socialists. The Commune became central to the mythology and martyrology of revolutionaries worldwide, as well as an incitement to preventive action by ruling groups. [See International Workingmen's Association; Railroad Strike of 1877.]

Popular Front The term given to the political line advanced at the Seventh Congress of the Communist International in 1935. Advocating a unity of all classes in the fight against fascism, it reversed the previous emphasis on class struggle and opened the way for Communist cooperation with liberals, particularly in antifascist ethnic and national policies. [See Antifascism; Communist Party; Daily Worker.]

Proudhon, Pierre-Joseph A founding intellectual of the anarchist movement and a formulator of anarcho-syndicalism, the French philosopher (1809–1865) stressed the "mutualism" of voluntary, collective labor. [See Anarchism; International Workingmen's Association.]

Stalin, Joseph Assumed name of Iosif Vissarionovich Dzhugashvili (1879–1953), the leader of the Soviet Union from the late 1920s until his death and determiner of international Communist policies, which varied enormously from period to period but frequently relied upon great brutality. The only top Bolshevik to emerge from the Russian lower classes, Stalin early followed Lenin and was named general secretary of the Bolshevik Party in 1922. He forcefully identified Marxism with Leninism and advanced the policy of building socialism in one country. [See Communist Party; Maoism.]

Stalinist An identification used mainly in the pre-1956 period by self-avowed Trotskyists to identify the supporters of the policies of the Soviet Union. Stalinoid, a more obscure term, identified those close to but not members of a communist party. After 1956, Stalinist mainly signified Communists who supported authoritarian forms of socialism as historically necessary, and who referred—sometimes in historical defense of Maoism or even Enver Hoxha's Albanian leadership—to Stalin having committed "errors" rather than "crimes." [See Communist Party; Maoism; Trotskyism.]

Swedenborgianism A philosophical system, or more popularly a credulity, postulating the presence of a "spirit world" within the mental reach of humanity, popular as a doctrine in the mid-nineteenth century. Named after Swedish mystic Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), it gained political importance in radical circles in the 1870s and persisted until the 1890s. [See International Workingmen's Association; Spiritualism; Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly.]

Theosophy The mystical doctrine of all-encompassing material and spiritual unity popularized by Madame Blavatsky (born Helena Petrovna Hahn; 1831–1891), it influenced utopian socialist thought in the 1880s and 1890s. [See Bellamy, Edward; Spiritualism.]

third period A term used mostly by Trotskyists and other opponents of Stalin's consolidation of international influence, it refers to the 1928–1935 era, denoting a third and revolutionary period after the initial Communist revolution in Russia, followed by failures in central Europe and the acceptance of "building socialism in one country." In effect, it denotes the "ultra-Left," or confrontational, phase of Communist policy, from the eclectic era of the middle 1920s on one hand to the Popular Front of the later 1930s on the other. [See Communist Party; Daily Worker.]

Trotsky, Leon Assumed name of Lev Davidovich Bronstein (1879–1940), a leading orator in the 1905 Russian Revolution, a strategist for the Red Army in the imme-diated post-1917 era, and foremost figure of the international Left Opposition. Best remembered for his criticisms of Stalinism, his theory of "permanent revolution" (rejecting Stalin's "socialism in one country"), and his book The History of the Russian Revolution (1931–1933). Trotskyist is the term used for a supporter of his views; Trotskyite, considered demeaning, was used primarily by supporters of the Communist Party in the course of ideological and organizational struggles before 1956. [See Trotskyism.]

United Front A term used frequently under varying circumstances and with sometimes ambiguous meanings by the Communist movement. Formulated in the 1920s to address the temporary restabilization of capitalism, it originally signified the unity of socialist and communist organizations for a common goal, often to resist fascism.

It was bypassed in the United States by the absence of a popular socialist movement and later by the Popular Front embrace of liberals. [See Communist Party.]

Wobblies Nickname for members of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), adopted by them in the same way that the once-derogatory nickname "Yankee Doodle Dandy" was taken up by colonial rebels during the American Revolution. [See Industrial Workers of the World.]

Yiddishkayt Literally "Yiddishness"; also spelled Yiddishkeit. The quality or logic of expression flowing from the use of the Yiddish language by the impoverished inhabitants of the European Pale and their worldwide diaspora. [See Yiddish Left.]

GENERAL BIBLIOGRAPHY

Scholarly resource works on the U.S. Left such as reference volumes and research guides were few and topically scattered until the 1970s and 1980s. The accelerating acquisitions of archival materials by a large number of libraries and the diversity in content and classification of published books and essays make any comprehensive listing of available sources highly tentative. Nevertheless, a few guidelines can be usefully offered.

Princeton University professors Donald Drew Egbert and Stow Persons, aided by Thomas D. Seymour Bassett and the Rockefeller Foundation, initiated the first effort to compile a general overview and guide to the American Left. First published in 1952 by Princeton University Press, the two volumes of Socialism and American Life brought together more than a dozen scholars to describe and discuss (in nearly six hundred pages) aspects of the Left ranging from art, philosophy, psychology, and economics to political history. Much of the material analyzed socialist theory in general, with little or no U.S. context, or applied dubious sociological and psychological generalizations with scant relation to particulars. Published at the height of the Cold War and before the broadening of social-historical methodologies, Socialism and American Life conveyed (apart from an essay by Paul Sweezy) an ahistorical approach to communism (which it dealt with as a moral evil rather than a specific social experience) and a narrow reading of political history as a succession of leaderships. Despite these limitations, several of the substantive essays offered valuable insights, and the second volume provided highly useful, if now substantially outdated, bibliographic guides. Individual essays by Paul Sweezy, Donald Drew Egbert, and Daniel Bell have lasting value. Bell's essay was expanded into book form and appeared as Marxian Socialism in the United States.

Other popular overviews of Left history and achievement can be found in Lillian Symes and Travers Clement's Rebel America and in Sidney Lens's Radicalism in America. In the late 1980s Richard Flacks's Making History: The American Left and the American Mind and Paul Buhle's Marxism in the USA attempted scholarly syntheses that drew on the work done by various scholars in the preceding two decades.

The appearance of serious reference works dealing with various separate aspects of radicalism has enriched the research picture by providing considerable accessible research on specific personalities and, to a lesser extent, on available sources. With some exceptions, the works described below must be approached with the understanding that the history of the Left, or even the involvement of personalities in the Left, is of secondary importance to most of the authors and editors of these volumes. To obtain more information on particular subjects the researcher must pursue other avenues.

The Biographical Dictionary of the American Left, edited by Bernard Johnpoll and Harvey Klehr, was certainly the most comprehensive volume to appear before the publication of the first edition of the Encyclopedia of the American Left. The dictionary offers several hundred biographical sketches, often rich in detail and almost always with adequate bibliographical information. The volume concentrates heavily on the Socialist Party and offers a detailed treatment of many minor as well as major figures, but it treats anarchists, Trotskyists, New Leftists, Wobblies, and most nineteenth-century radicals rather cursorily. The treatment of Communists is marred by severe antipathy, and little effort is made to deal with personalities in art and culture. The now outdated Bibliography of the History of Socialism in America, compiled by Virgil Vogel, shows many of the same leanings and limitations from a purely bibliographical standpoint.

Women and the American Left: A Guide to Sources, by Mari Jo Buhle, offers very different subject matter and a different model of reference work. Apart from the bibliographical citations, this work's utility can be found in the evaluative notations, varying in length from a few sentences to several paragraphs. Because of the paucity of scholarly work on women's radical subjects, ranging from literary output to political involvement, Women and the American Left remains a unique resource.

Such large-scale projects as American Reformers: An H. W. Wilson Biographical Dictionary, edited by Alden Whitman; Notable American Women, 1607–1950, edited by Edward T. James, et al.; and Notable American Women: The Modern Period, edited by Barbara Sicherman and Carol Hurd Green, encapsulate information on prominent and, in some cases, not so prominent activists, with ample bibliographical citations. More narrowly defined projects such as the Dictionary of American Communal and Utopian History, by Robert S. Fogarty; A Biographical Dictionary of American Labor, edited by Gary Fink; and Labor Conflict in the United States: An Encyclopedia, edited by Ronald L. Fillipelli, supplement information on movements and institutions. The American Left, 1955–1970: A National Union Catalog of Pamphlets Published in the United States and Canada, edited by Ned Kehde, offers guidance to an important period but, paradoxically, for an era during which pamphlets had ceased to play their once-central role in Left communication.

At a more abstract level, A Dictionary of Marxist Thought, edited by Tom Bottomore and others, has great value as a compendium of general concepts, such as "capitalism," "materialism," and "revisionism." Its nearly six hundred pages have considerably less value, however, as a guide to American personalities and institutions, since the volume focuses largely on Europe, with lesser attention to Asia and the Third World in general, and still less to the United States. The ample bibliography remains useful for its listing of relatively recent works on theory.

Archival holdings of personal papers, various print materials, and oral histories have been little-charted with respect to specific Left concerns. Although the standard bibliographical sources can be useful, they cannot be regarded as comprehensive or up-to-date. Inquiries must be directed to reference librarians for current holdings.

The Union List of Serials in the Libraries of the United States and Canada is a generally reliable source with regard to the names of publications, years of availability, and location of holdings. The State Historical Society of Wisconsin, along with the New York Public Library, maintains the largest list of microfilmed radical publications potentially, if not always actually, available via interlibrary loan. Other more limited but specialized guides include the classic work by Walter Goldwater, Radical Periodicals in America, 1890–1950, and the more updated Journals of Dissent and Social Change: A Bibliography of Titles in the California State University, Sacramento, Library, compiled by John Liberty. Gale Skidmore and Theodore Jurgen Spahn's From Radical Left to Extreme Right: A Bibliography of Current Periodicals of Protest, Controversy, Advocacy or Dissent is yet more up-to-date.

The National Union Catalogue of Manuscript Collections is somewhat less comprehensive than periodical guides because of the quickened pace of collecting in recent years and because general descriptions of characteristics (such as size) reveal little of a collection's value to the potential researcher. Among libraries maintaining substantial collections of radical materials, the Labadie Library in Ann Arbor, Michigan, founded by a noted nineteenth-century anarchist, has long been a Left history researcher's Mecca, particularly, but not only, for nineteenth-century materials. Second only in terms of precedent is the Tamiment Library at New York University, descendent of the Socialist Party-connected Rand School and heir to many socialistic collections. The Immigration History Research Center at the University of Minnesota has by far the largest collection of immigrant materials and microfilms. Its Slavic, Finnish, and Italian holdings are particularly strong.

No particular logic or pattern determines which archive is likely to have a particular Left collection. The Socialist Labor Party collection is housed at the State Historical Society of Wisconsin and the Socialist Party collection is at Duke University. Both are available on microfilm. The Industrial Workers of the World archives have been donated to the Walter Reuther Library at Wayne State University. Other organizations and individuals have placed their papers in diverse repositories too numerous to cite in this volume beyond the bibliographical information following specific entries. Researchers should also bear in mind that Left materials are not always so labeled within larger collections. The Reuther Library, which as noted houses the Industrial Workers of the World archives, also holds the archives of the United Auto Workers and the personal papers of many Detroit-area militants. These collections contain considerable information relevant to the Left, a circumstance to be found in many research centers.

The relatively new field of oral history is small enough for a more thorough if still incomplete description. Well over half the available oral histories of the Left can be found in the Oral History of the American Left collection at Tamiment Library, New York University. Brief summaries of the interviews' contents are available in the subject guide to the collection, and many interviews are transcribed. Other rich oral history collections are found at Columbia University (especially for prominent personalities), the University of Michigan (especially for the New Left), the University of California, Los Angeles (especially for regional personalities and institutions of the Southwest), and the Minnesota Historical Society (especially for personalities and institutions of the Midwest).

- Bell, Daniel. Marxian Socialism in the United States. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1996.
- Bottomore, Tom, et al., eds. A Dictionary of Marxist Thought. London: Basil Blackwell, 1983.
- Buhle, Mari Jo. Women and the American Left: A Guide to Sources. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1983.
- Buhle, Paul. Marxism in the USA. London: Verso, 1987.
- Buhle, Paul, and Robin D. G. Kelley. "The Oral History of the Left in the United States: A Survey and Interpretation." The Journal of American History, vol. 76, no. 2 (September, 1989).
- Egbert, Donald Drew, Stow Persons, and Thomas D. Seymour Bassett, eds. Socialism and American Life. Two vols. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1952.
- Filippelli, Ronald L., ed. Labor Conflict in the United States: An Encyclopedia. New York: Garland, 1990.
- Fink, Gary, ed. A Biographical Dictionary of American Labor. Rev. ed. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.
- Flacks, Richard. Making History: The American Left and the American Mind. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Fogerty, Robert S. A Dictionary of American Communal and Utopian History. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1980.
- Goldwater, Walter. Radical Periodicals in America, 1890-1950. New Haven: Yale University Library, 1964.
- James, Edward T., et al., eds. Notable American Women, 1607-1950: A Biographical Dictionary. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1971.
- Johnpoll, Bernard K., and Harvey Klehr, eds. Biographical Dictionary of the American Left. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1986.
- Kehde, Ned, ed. and comp. The American Left, 1955-1970: A National Union Catalog of Pamphlets Published in the United States and Canada. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1976.

- Lens, Sidney. Radicalism in America. New York: Crowell, 1966.
- Liberty, John, comp. Journals of Dissent and Social Change: A Bibliography of Titles in the California State University, Sacramento, Library. 6th ed. Sacramento: California State University Press, 1986.
- Miles, Dione, comp. Something in Common: An IWW Bibliography. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1986.
- National Union Catalogue of Manuscript Collections. Washington, D.C.: Library of Congress. Annual supplements.
- Sicherman, Barbara, and Carol Hurd Green, eds. Notable American Women: The Modern Period: A Biographical Dictionary. Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1980.
- Skidmore, Gail, and Theodore Jurgen Spahn. From Radical Left to Extreme Right: A Bibliography of Current Periodicals of Protest, Controversy, Advocacy or Dissent. Rev. ed. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1976.
- Swanson, Dorothy, et al., comps. Guide to the Manuscript Collection of the Tamiment Library. New York: Garland, 1977.
- Symes, Lillian, and Travers Clement. Rebel America: The Story of Social Revolt in the United States. New York: Da Capo Press, 1972.
- Titus, Edna Brown, ed. The Union List of Serials in Libraries of the United States and Canada. New York: H. W. Wilson, 1965.
- Vogel, Virgil. Bibliography of the History of Socialism in America. Milwaukee: Socialist Party, 1977.
- Whitman, Alden, ed. American Reformers: An H. W. Wilson Biographical Dictionary. New York: H. W. Wilson, 1985.

SYNOPTIC OUTLINE OF CONTENTS

African American/Antiracist Movements

- African American Anticolonialism
- African Americans
- American Negro Labor Congress
- Black Panther Party
- Civil Rights Congress
- Civil Rights Movement
- Garveyism
- National Negro Congress
- National Negro Labor Council
- Radical Abolitionists
- Reconstruction
- Share Croppers Union
- Slave Insurrections
- Southern Conference Educational Fund
- Southern Negro Youth Congress
- Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee

Agrarian Left

- Agrarian Radicalism
- Farmer-Labor Party
- Greenback Labor Party

American Indians

- American Indian Movement
- Peltier, Leonard

Armed Movements

- Armed Struggle, 1960s–1970s
- Attica
- Slave Insurrections

Art Movements (Literature, Painting, Theater, Dance, Photography, Film)

- American Writers Congress
- ARTEF
- Art Movements
- Beats and the New Left
- Dada
- Federal Theater Project
- Modern Dance
- Modicut Theater
- Murals
- Newsreel and Post–New Left Filmmaking

- Photography
- Political Theater, 1960s–1980s
- Proletpen
- Radical Filmmaking, 1930s
- Union-Sponsored Radical Films

Artists (Painting, Cartoons, Dance)

- Duncan, Isadora
- Evergood, Philip
- Fasanella, Ralph
- Gellert, Hugo
- Gropper, William
- Industrial Workers of the World
- Cartoons
- Minor, Robert
- Rivera, Diego
- Shahn, Ben
- Young, Art

Authors (Fiction)

- Algren, Nelson
- Bellamy, Edward
- Buck, Pearl S.
- Bulosan, Carlos
- Campbell, Helen
- Conroy, Jack
- DuBois, W. E. B.
- Farrell, James T.
- Fast, Howard
- Frank, Waldo
- Gilman, Charlotte Perkins
- Gold, Michael
- Goldman, Emma
- Herbst, Josephine
- Howells, William Dean
- Le Sueur, Meridel
- Lippard, George
- London, Jack
- McKay, Claude
- McKenney, Ruth
- Olson, Tillie
- Parker, Dorothy
- Popular Fiction
- Proletarian and Radical Writers, 1930s–1940s
- Quin, Mike
- Radical Novel, 1870–1930
- Sinclair, Upton

- Swados, Harvey
- Wright, Richard

Authors (Film)

- Hellman, Lillian
- Lardner, Ring, Jr.
- Lawson, John Howard
- Ornitz, Samuel

Authors (Composers and Lyricists)

- Blitzstein, Marc
- Chaplin, Ralph
- Copland, Aaron
- Guthrie, Woody
- Harburg, Edgar A.
- Hill, Joe
- Robeson, Paul
- Robinson, Earl
- Seeger, Charles
- Seeger, Pete

Authors (Nonfiction)

- Bourne, Randolph
- Dietzgen, Joseph
- Chomsky, Noam
- Frank, Waldo
- Gold, Michael
- Harrington, Michael
- Harrison, Hubert
- Haywood, Harry
- Heywood, Ezra
- Hicks, Granville
- Hillquit, Morris
- Hoffman, Abbie
- Hook, Sidney
- Howe, Irving
- Hughan, Jessie Wallace
- Hutchins, Grace
- Inman, Mary
- James, C. L. R.
- Keller, Helen
- Marcy, Mary
- Lens, Sidney
- Lewis, Austin
- Mitford, Jessica
- Mumford, Lewis
- New Left Literature
- Ovington, Mary White
- Paine, Thomas

Reed, John
 Rochester, Anna
 Smedley, Agnes
 Snow, Edgar
 Spargo, John
 T-Bone Slim
 Vorse, Mary Heaton

Authors (Poetry)

de Cleyre, Voltairine
 Giovannitti, Arturo
 Hughes, Langston
 Markham, Edwin
 McGrath, Tom
 McKay, Claude
 Poetry, 1870–1930
 Radical Poetry, 1930s–1960s
 Sandburg, Carl

Authors (Theater)

Hansberry, Lorraine
 Hellman, Lillian
 Odets, Clifford

Community Organizing Campaigns

Food Protests
 Industrial Armies
 Rent Strikes
 Unemployed Movements, 1930s
 Unions of the Unemployed,
 1935–1941
 Wages for Housework

Concepts

American Exceptionalism
 Anarchism
 Anarchist Fiction, 1870–1914
 Animal Rights
 Anticommunism
 Antifascism
 Black Nation
 Chinese Question
 Cold War Revisionism
 Direct Action
 Dual Unionism
 Free Love
 Factions
 Fellow Travelers
 Free Thought
 Front Groups
 Historical Materialism
 General Strike
 Humor
 Labor Party
 Pacifism
 Parlor Socialists
 Participatory Democracy
 Popular Culture

Popular Front
 Pre-Party Formations
 Progressive
 Realignment
 Red Diaper Baby
 Regroupment
 Secret Work
 Tendencies
 Union Reform/Labor Support
 Utopianism
 Vanguard Party
 Woman Question
 Workers' Education

Cultural and Fraternal Movements, Organizations, and Concepts

American Artists Congress
 American Writers Congress
 Anarchist Fiction
 Folk Music, 1930–1960s
 Folk Music, 1970s–1990s
 Futurians
 International Workers Order
 Jazz
 John Reed Clubs
 Jewish People's Fraternal Order
 Lehr- und Wehrvereine
 Science Fiction and Fantasy
 Sozialistischer Turnerbund
 Summer Camps
 Surrealism
 Union Sponsored Radical Films
 Workers Laboratory
 Theater/Theater of Action
 Workmen's Circle

Defense Cases/Institutions

American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born
 Haymarket Incident
 Herndon Case
 Hiss Case
International Juridical Association
Bulletin
 International Labor Defense
 McNamara Case
 Mooney-Billings Case
 National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee
 National Lawyers Guild
 Political Deportations
 Rosenberg Case
 Sacco-Vanzetti Case
 Scottsboro Case
 Smith Act Trial, 1943
 Smith Act Trials, 1949
 Workers Defense League

Editors (Newspapers and Magazines)

Ameringer, Oscar
 Cahan, Abraham
 Chaplin, Ralph
 De Leon, Daniel
 Domingo, Wilfred
 DuBois, W. E. B.
 Galleani, Luigi
 Heywood, Ezra
 Johnson, Olive M.
 Macdonald, Dwight
 Lore, Ludwig
 Novick, Paysakh
 Nowack, Stanley
 Olgin, Moissaye J.
 Rocker, Rudolf
 Reitzel, Robert
 Tucker, Benjamin R.
 Wilshire, H. Gaylord

Educational Activists

Horton, Myles
 Kelly, Harry
 Keracher, John
 Konikow, Antoinette Bucholz
 Laidler, Harry W.
 Muste, A. J.

Educational Institutions

American Fund for Public Service
 California Labor School
 Highlander Research and Education Center
 ICOR
 Intercollegiate Socialist Society
 International Publishers
 Jewish Workers University
 Little Blue Books
 Rand School of Social Science
 Research Libraries and Reading Rooms
 Socialist Sunday Schools
 Workers Schools

Environmental Movements/Activists

Bookchin, Murray
 Mumford, Lewis
 Nature Friends of America
 Nearing, Scott
 Radical Environmentalism

Fashion Design

Hawes, Elizabeth

Free Thought Movements

Free Thought
 Freie Gemeinden and Freidenker

Health Movements/Activists

AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP)
Disability Rights Movement
Health Left
Keller, Helen
Naturism

Hispanic Movements

El Congreso del Pueblo de Habla
Española
Cuban Americans
Mexican Americans
Migratory Agricultural Labor
Puerto Ricans

Historic Events

American Revolution
Free Speech Movement
Hitler-Stalin Pact
Khrushchev Revelations
Moscow Trials
Peekskill Riots
Spanish Revolution of 1936

Immigrant Groups (European,
Middle Eastern, African, Asian, Caribbean, Latin American)

Arab Americans
Armenian Americans
British Americans
Bulgarian Americans
Cape Verdean Americans
Chinese Americans
Croatian Americans
Cuban Americans
Czech Americans
Filipinos
Finnish Americans
Franco Americans
German Americans
Greek Americans
Haitians
Hungarian Americans
Indians (East Indians)
Irish Americans
Italian Americans
Japanese Americans
Jewish Americans
Latvian Americans
Lithuanian Americans
Norwegian Americans
Polish Americans
Portuguese Americans
Puerto Ricans
Russian Americans
Slovenian Americans
Ukrainian Americans
West Indians

Immigrant Institutions

American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born
American Slav Congress
Arbeiter Kranken-und Sterbekasse der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika
Arbeiterbildungsvereine,
Sozialistische Schulvereine,
Arbeiterhallen
Arbeiter-Sängerbund der
Vereinigten Staaten
Jewish Socialist Federation
Jewish Workers University
Workmen's Circle

International Movements

Black International
Cuban Revolution
Fourth International
International Workingmen's
Association (First International)
Second International
Socialist Zionism
Third International

Labor Activists

Bridges, Harry
Embree, A. S.
Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley
Foster, William Z.
Haywood, Harry
Johnson Dollinger, Genora
Little, Frank
Nef, Walter T.
Newman, Pauline M.
Pesotta, Rose
Quill, Mike
Randolph, A. Philip
St. John, Vincent
Stokes, Rose Pastor
Sugar, Maurice
Wortis, Rose

Labor Organizations

Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America
Brotherhood of Timber Workers
Chicago Federation of Labor
Cloth Hat and Capmakers
"Detroit" Industrial Workers of the World/Workers
International Industrial Union
District 65, United Automobile
Workers
Food, Tobacco, Agricultural, and Allied Workers
Fur and Leather Workers
Industrial Workers of the World

International Brotherhood of Teamsters
International Ladies Garment
Workers Union
International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union
International Typographical
Union
International Woodworkers of America
Knights of Labor
League of Revolutionary Black
Workers
Local 1199, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union
Local 9, Packinghouse Workers
Los Angeles Council, Congress of Industrial Organizations
National Maritime Union
National Miners Union
National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards
Packinghouse Workers
Progressive Miners of America
Public Sector Unions
Sailors' Union of the Pacific
Shoe Workers
Socialist Trades and Labor
Alliance
Southern Tenant Farmers Union
Syndicalist League of North America
Teachers Union
Textile Workers Unions
Trade Union Educational League
Trade Union Unity League
United Automobile Workers
United Brewery Workers
United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America
United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers
United Mine Workers
United Office and Professional
Workers of America
Western Federation of Labor/
International Union of Mine,
Mill and Smelter Workers

Legal Defense (Institutions, Movements, Personalities)

Abt, John
American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born
Brodsky, Joseph
*International Juridical Association
Bulletin*
King, Carol Weiss
Kunstler, William

Lewis, Austin M.
Workers Defense League
Wilkinson, Frank

Literary/Artistic Genres

Children's Literature
Science Fiction and Fantasy
Underground Comix

Magazines/Journals

Amerasia
Anvil/New Anvil
Crusader
Dissent
Freedomways
Free Society
Groysser Kundes
International Socialist Review
Jewish Life/Jewish Currents
Liberation
Liberator
Mainstream
Masses
Modern Quarterly
Monthly Review
Mother Earth
New International
New Masses
New Politics
Partisan Review
Ramparts
Science and Society
Seven Arts
Sing Out!/Broadside
Studies on the Left
Working Woman/Woman Today
Zukunft

Military/Antimilitary Campaigns

Abraham Lincoln Brigade
"Bring the Boys Home"
Movement
GI Coffee House Movement
Vietnam Veterans Against the War

Music Movements

Composers Collective
Folk Music, 1930s-1960s
Folk Music, 1970s-1990s
Industrial Workers of the World Songs
Jewish Workers Choruses

Newspapers/Newspaper Services

Adunata dei Refrattari
Appeal to Reason
Chicago Star
Cleveland Citizen
Daily Worker
Federated Press

Freie Arbeter Shtimme
In These Times
Liberation News Service
Lucifer the Light Bearer
Midwest Daily Record
National Guardian/Guardian
New Yorker Volkszeitung off our backs
Party Organizer
People's World
PM
Proletario
Southern Worker and the Communist Press in the South
Toveritar/Naisten Viiri
Underground Press
Woman Rebel
Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly

Political Activists

Alinsky, Saul David
Ameringer, Oscar
Baker, Ella
Berger, Victor L.
Berry, Abner Winston
Blatch, Harriot Stanton
Bloor, Ella Reeve
Braden, Anne and Carl
Breitman, George
Browder, Earl
Cacchione, Peter V.
Cannon, James P.
Connolly, James
Czolgosz, Leon
Davis, Angela
Debs, Eugene V.
De Leon, Daniel
Dellinger, David
Dewey, John
Dobbs, Farrell
Equi, Marie
Flores Magón, Ricardo
Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley
Foster, William Z.
Fraina, Louis C.
George, Henry
Gilman, Charlotte Perkins
Giovannitti, Arturo
Goldman, Emma
Green, Gil
Greie-Cramer, Johanna
Hall, Gus
Haywood, Harry
Healey, Dorothy
Hillquit, Morris
Hinton, Richard Josiah
Hoffman, Abbie
Horton, Myles
Hudson, Hosea
Jones, Claudia
Jones, "Mother" Mary Harris

Kelley, Florence
Kester, Howard
La Follette, Robert Marion
Lewis, Lena Morrow
Lilienthal, Meta Stern
Lloyd, Henry Demarest
London, Meyer
Lowe, Caroline A.
Malkiel, Theresa Serber
Marcantonio, Vito
Maurer, James H.
McKinney, Edward Britt
Mitchell, H. L.
Moore, Queen Mother
Most, Johann
Munro, Evelyn Smith
Muste, A. J.
Oehler, Hugo
O'Hare, Kate Richards
Parsons, Albert
Parsons, Lucy
Patterson, Louise Thompson
Patterson, William L.
Petersen, Arnold
Rustin, Bayard
Ruthenberg, Charles E.
Sanger, Margaret
Scales, Junius Irving
Scudder, Vida Dutton
Shachtman, Max
Simkins, Modjeska Monteith
Spies, August
Thomas, Norman
Truth, Sojourner
Wilkinson, Frank
Williams, Claude
Winston, Henry
Yergan, Max
Zeidler, Frank

Political Movements

Council Communism
Independent Socialist Clubs/Independent Socialists
Irish Progressive League
Italian American Antifascism
Italian Federation of the Socialist Party of America
Lovestoneites
Maoism
New Left
Peace Movements
Sozial Revolutionäre Clubs
Student Movements, 1930s
Student Peace Union
Students for a Democratic Society
Trotskyism
Washington Commonwealth Federation
Yippies
Young Lords Party

Political Parties

American Labor Party
 American Workers Party
 Communist Party, USA
 Greenback Labor Party
 Progressive Party
 Proletarian Party
 Socialist Labor Party
 Socialist Party
 Socialist Workers Party
 Workers Party
 Workingmen's Party of the United States
 World Socialist Party

Publication Types

Calendars

Radical Holidays

International Womens Day
 May Day

Radio

Labor Radio
 Pacifica Foundation

Regional/Geographical Styles of Radicalism

Allerton Avenue "Co-ops"
 Birmingham, Alabama
 California
 Greenwich Village
 Hawaii
 Hollywood Left
 Lower East Side, New York City
 Milwaukee
 Municipal Socialism
 Paterson, New Jersey, Anarchism
 Union Square, New York City
 Woodworkers of Chicago
 Ybor City

Religious Radicals/Radicalism

Brown, William Montgomery
 Catholic Worker Movement
 Christian Socialism
 Dombrowski, James Anderson
 Liberation Theology
 Muste, A. J.
 Spiritualism
 Williams, Claude

Repression (Institutions, Events)

Everett Massacre
 Federal Bureau of Investigation
 Greensboro Massacre
 Haymarket Incident
 Hiss Case
 Hollywood Blacklist

House Committee on Un-American Activities
 Ludlow Massacre
 McCarthyism
 Rapp-Coudert Inquiry
 Red Scare
 Smith Act Trial, 1943
 Smith Act Trials, 1949
 Taft-Hartley Loyalty Oath

Scholars

Aptheker, Herbert
 Baran, Paul
 Bookchin, Murray
 Boudin, Louis
 Chomsky, Noam
 Dewey, John
 DuBois, W. E. B.
 Dunayevskaya, Raya
 Foner, Philip S.
 Fromm, Erich
 Hook, Sidney
 Howe, Irving
 Leacock, Eleanor Burke
 Marcuse, Herbert
 Matthiessen, Francis Otto
 Mills, C. Wright
 Morgan, Lewis Henry
 Schapiro, Meyer
 Wallerstein, Immanuel
 Ward, Cyrenus Osborne
 Williams, William Appleman

Scholarship

African Studies
 American Studies
 Anthropology
 Asian Studies
 Classical Studies
 Collecting the Left
 Criminology
 Critical Legal Studies
 Education
 European Studies
 Latin American Studies
 Literary Criticism
 Philosophy
 Political Studies
 Psychiatry and Psychology
 Psychoanalysis
 Radical Economics
 Radical Professional and Academic Journals
 Science
 Sociology
 Women's Studies

Science

Science
 Scientists, 1920-1950

Sexual Freedom Movements

Abortion/Reproductive Rights
 Birth Control
 Free Love
 Gay/Lesbian Liberation Movement
 Womens' Liberation

Solidarity/Support Movements

American-Soviet Friendship
 Latin American Solidarity Movements, 1960s-1980s
 North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy
 North American Congress on Latin America

Strikes

Gastonia Strike
 Lawrence Strike
 Minneapolis Teamster Strikes
 1919 Strike Wave
 Oakland General Strike of 1946
 Passaic Textile Strike of 1926
 Paterson Strike of 1913
 Railroad Strike of 1877
 San Francisco General Strike
 Seattle General Strike of 1919
 Shirtwaist Makers Strike
 Sitdown Strikes

Utopian Colony Movements

Llano Cooperative Colony
 Pietist Communes in Pennsylvania
 Ruskin Colony
 Utopianism

Women's Movements

Abortion/Reproductive Rights
 Birth Control
 Congress of American Women
 Emma Lazarus Federation of Jewish Women's Clubs
 Illinois Woman's Alliance
 International Woman's Day
 National Women's Commission
 Socialist Feminism
 Woman's National Committee
 Woman's National Socialist Union
 Women's Liberation
 Women's Liberation Unions
 Women Strike for Peace

Youth Movements

Intercollegiate Socialist Society
 Students for a Democratic Society
 Young Communist League
 Young People's Socialist League
 Young Pioneers of America

INDEX

Boldface page numbers indicate an article on the topic.

- A
- A. J. Muste Memorial Institute, 821
- A. Philip Randolph Institute, 709, 710, 773
- Aaron, Harold, 305
- Aavikon Vaeltajat*, 823
- Abbey, Edward, 553, 665
- Abbey, Edwin Austin, 47, 69
- Abbott and Costello films, 340
- Abbott, Berenice, 604
- Abbott, Leonard, 518
- ABC of Communism*, 903
- Abel, Lionel, 556
- Abendblott*, 763
- Abern, Martin, 777, 900
- Abner Berry Freedom Library and Workers Center, 85
- Abortion/Reproductive Rights, 1-2, 91
- Abourezk, James, 58
- Abraham, David, 210
- Abraham Lincoln Battalion, 2
- Abraham Lincoln Brigade, 2-3, 225, 250, 303, 539, 553, 563, 647, 922
- Abraham Lincoln Brigade, The*, 725
- "Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight," 747
- Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years*, 717
- Abraham Lincoln: The War Years*, 717
- Abramovitch, Raphael, 404
- Abrams, Muhel Richard, 397
- Abstract Expressionism, 71
- Abt, John, 4-5, 316
- Abzug, Bella, 154, 891
- Academy Awards. See "Oscar."
- Academy of Political Science, 183
- "A Club," 580
- Accident at the Inn and Other Stories*, 624
- Action in the North Atlantic*, 323, 435
- Activists for Independent Socialist Politics, 350
- Actors Collective, 68
- Actors Equity Association, 698
- ACT UP. See AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power.
- Adamic, Louis, 35, 753
- Adams, Abigail, 34
- Adams, Ansel, 604, 664
- Adams, Eddie, 605
- Adams, John Q., 540, 876
- Adams, Samuel, 33
- Adamson Act, 426
- Addams Jane, 270, 303, 412, 467, 582, 662, 732
- Adderly, Cannonball, 397
- Addis, Henry, 244
- Addis, Thomas, 728
- Adomian, Ian, 157
- Adorno, Theodor W., 449, 603, 617, 648, 783
- Adunata dei Refattari, L'*, 5-6, 46, 254, 388, 793
- Adventures of a Young Man*, 196
- Adventures of Robin Hood, The*, 325
- Aeschylus, 141
- Aesthetic Dimension*, 478
- Aesthetic Realism, 677
- AFL-CIO, 366, 374, 455, 710, 742, 772, 856
- Africa, 137
- Africa: The Politics of Independence*, 866
- Africa Liberation Support Committee, 473
- African Aid Committees, 201
- African American Anticolonialism, 6-8
- African Americans, 8-10
- African Blood Brotherhood, 32, 166, 195, 200, 396, 488, 870
- African National Congress, 7, 28
- African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde, 122
- African Studies, 10-11
- African Studies: The Extended Family*, 10
- African Studies Association, 10, 866
- Afro World Associated News Service, 85
- After Dark, My Sweet*, 624
- Against the Current*, 350, 831
- Agapito*, 678
- Agee, James, 555, 637
- Age of Imperialism, The*, 511
- Age of Reason, The*, 580
- Agitator*, 540, 810
- Agnew, Spiro T., 549
- Agoncillo, Felipe, 224
- Agrarian Justice*, 580
- Agrarian Radicalism, 11-17
- Agricultural Adjustment Administration, 4
- Agricultural Labor Relations Board (California), 496
- Agricultural Workers Organization (AWO), 542
- Aguinaldo, Emilio, 224
- AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP), 17, 262, 606
- Airborne Symphony, The*, 97
- Akselrod, Pavel, 708
- Alabama Communist Control Act, 88
- Alabama People's Educational Association, 88, 335
- Alameda County Labor Council of the AFL, 567
- Alarm*, 92, 582, 791
- Alaska Labor News*, 443
- Alaskan Socialist Party, 443
- Alba Nuova*, 388
- Albright, Ivan, 406
- Albro, Lora, 407
- Alcatraz Island, 599
- Alda, Alan, 341, 429
- Alderson Federal Reformatory, 230, 408
- Alderson Story, The*, 230
- Aleichem, Sholom, 69, 913
- Alewitz, Mike, 526
- Alexander, Robert, 556
- Algiers*, 435
- Algren, Nelson, 17-18, 56, 161, 638, 640
- Aliancistas*, 492
- Alianza Federal de Mercedes*, 492
- Alice*, 626
- Alice Vale*, 48
- Alien Act (1798), 612
- Alien and Registration Act (1940), 755
- Alinsky, Saul David, 18-19
- Alinsky Method, 19
- All-Africa People's Party, 94
- Allard, Gerry, 635
- All-Atomic Comics*, 837
- All Brides Are Beautiful*, 637
- Alleanza Anti-Fascista di Nord America*, 272
- Allegory of California (Mural)*, 699
- Allen, Devere, 31, 344, 593, 702, 906
- Allen, Donald, 77
- Allen, Ernest, 298
- Allen, Henry, 669
- Allen, James S. (Sol Auerbach), 40, 201, 375, 788
- Allen, Woody, 325
- Allende, Salvador, 597
- Allerton Avenue Co-Ops, 19, 696
- Allgemeine Arbeiterfest*, 465
- Allgemeine Deutsche Arbeiterverein*, 382, 465
- All Hands Abandon Ship*, 269
- Alliance for Labor Action, 193
- Alliance for Progress, 429
- All in the Family*, 619
- Allis-Chalmers Strike, 19-20
- All People's Party, 651
- All Shot Up*, 626
- All-Southern Communist Party Conference, 789
- All-Southern Negro Youth Conference, 785
- All the Collected Poems, 1923-1958 (Zukofsky)*, 675
- All the Collected Short Poems, 1956-1964 (Zukofsky)*, 675
- All the Year Round*, 624
- Almanach Dada*, 173
- Almanac Singers, 231, 738, 847
- Almazov, Sal, 347
- Alperovitz, Gar, 144
- Alston, Chris, 785
- Altalanos Magyar Munkas Betegseglyoz*, 343
- Alter, Victor, 404

- Althusser, Louis, 320, 449
Always Coming Home, 665
Always the Young Strangers, 717
 Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, 4, 20-22, 143, 185, 389, 587, 593, 611, 769, 770, 818, 819, 843, 863
 Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen, 578
 Amalgamated Textile Workers of America (ATWA), 526
 Amalgamated Textile Workers Union (ATWU), 818
 Ambijan, 347
Amerasia, 22
America, America, 222
America Dancing, 505
 America First Committee, 594
America Hispana, 241
America Is in the Heart, 225
American, The, 217
Americana, 288
 American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 58
 American Artists Congress (AAC), 22-23, 71, 211, 338, 721
 American Association for Labor Legislation, 302, 416, 632
 American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, 37
 American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS), 727
 American Association of Scientific Workers (AASW), 727, 728, 729
American Beaver and His Works, The, 513
American Capitalism, 1607-1800, 702
American Caravan, The, 671
American Civilization, 394
 American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), 23, 26, 135, 229, 255, 260-261, 358, 417, 482, 575, 587, 593, 756, 732
 American Civil Liberties Union, Northern California Branch, 442
 American Committee for Cultural Freedom (ACCF), 216, 329, 584. See also Central Intelligence Agency
 American Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom (ACDIF), 728, 729, 730
 American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, 23-24, 344-345, 417, 532, 539, 580, 613
 American Committee on Africa, 7, 710
 American Communications Association, 813, 814
 American Communist Party, 121, 225
American Crisis, The, 579
 American Disabled for Accessible Public Transportation (ADAPT), 191
American Dream, 559
 American Economics Association, 120
 American exceptionalism, 24-26
American Fabian, 121, 270
American Federationist, 142
 American Federation of Government Employees, 843
 American Federation of Labor (AFL), 9, 27, 83, 118, 148, 184, 198, 223, 225, 296, 303, 312, 313, 348, 353, 355, 365, 378, 382, 386, 411, 415, 425, 482, 483, 490, 491, 496, 499, 585, 589, 635, 684, 733, 734, 746, 748, 761, 768, 746, 816, 824, 849, 851, 852, 867, 896, 896, 897, 899
 American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), 649, 650
 American Federation of Teachers, 773, 817
American Film, 559
 American Foundation for the Blind, 411
 American Friends of the Soviet Union (AFSU), 37
 American Friends Service Committee, 615, 804
 American Fund for Public Service ("Garland Fund"), 26-27, 424
 American GI Forum, 493
American Guardian, 45
 American Gymnosophical Society, 540
 "American Holiday," 747
 American Indian Movement (AIM), 27-28, 599
 American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), 463
 American Jewish Congress, 402
 American Jewish Labor Council, 461
 American Labor Films, 667
 American Labor Party (ALP), 19, 28-30, 115, 143, 150, 216, 217, 277, 372, 417, 423, 428, 475, 530, 532, 696-697, 771, 847
 American Labor Union, 764, 775
American Language, 816
American-Latvian, 433
 American League against War and Fascism, 30-31, 594, 921
 American League against War and Fascism, Youth Section, 31
 American League for Peace and Democracy, 629
 American Negro Labor Congress, 31-32, 87, 167
American Negro Slave Revolts, 57
 American Negro Theater Company, 623
American Opinion, 677
 American Peace Crusade, 747
 American Peace Union, 592
 American Pilgrimage of Friendship, 414
American Poets Respond, 679
 American Polish Labor Council, 36
American Power and the New Mandarins, 130, 145, 793
 American Public Health Association, 304
 American Railway Union (ARU), 180, 181, 315
American Renaissance, 449
American Review of Soviet Medicine, 304
 American Revolution, 32-35
American Revolution: Pages from a Negro Worker's Notebook, The, 437
American Revolution, The, 57
American Russian Relations, 1787-1947, 144
 American Scottsboro Committee (ASC), 732
 American Slav Congress, 35-36, 55, 166, 565, 612
 American Social History Project, 41
American Socialism of the Present Day, 335
American Socialist, 545, 830, 924
 American Socialist College, 427
American Socialist Quarterly, 772
 American Socialist Society (ASS), 541, 685
 American Socialist Union, 407
 American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 49
 American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, 288
 American Soviet friendship, 36-39
 American-Soviet Music Society, 97
 American-Soviet Science Society, 729
 American-Soviet War Exhibit, 38
 American Spiritualist Association, 795
American Splendor, 837
 American Student Union (ASU), 31, 721, 801, 802
 American studies, 40-42
American Tragedy, An, 620
 American Union against Militarism, 208
 American Veterans Committee, 152
American Voices, 679
American Way of Birth, The, 503
American Way of Death, The, 503
 American West Indian News, 75
American Women, 883
 American Women Pickets, 387
 American Workers Party, 42, 329, 365, 440, 633, 777, 841
 American Writers and Artists Congress, 555
 American Writers Congress, 22-23, 43-44, 161, 215, 241, 435, 489
 American Youth Act, 922
 American Youth Congress, 801, 921
 American Youth for Democracy, 922
 American-Russian Institute of San Francisco, 38
 American-Russian Institute, 316, 728
 Americans for Democratic Action, 608, 633, 636, 925
 Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), 190, 191
America's Road to Socialism, 121
Americke Delnicke Listy, 172
Amerike in Yiddishe Vort, 916
 Ameringer, Oscar, 44-45, 82, 338, 339, 644, 698
Ameriski druzinski Koledar, 753
Ami des Ouvriers, L', 240
 Amle, Thomas R., 571
 Amnesty International, 63, 600
Am Olam, 707
 Amsterdam Congress of 1904, 130
Anarchie, L', 588
 Anarchism, 45-47
Anarchism and Other Essays, 274
Anarchist Collectives, The, 793
 Anarchist fiction, 1870-1914, 47-49
Anarchist Woman, 670
Anarchos, 47

- Anarchy Comix*, 837
Ancient Lowly, The, 141, 762, 867
Ancient Society, 125, 513, 514, 515, 516
And China Has Hands, 675
 Anderson, Eric, 750
 Anderson, Margaret, 274, 851
 Anderson, Mary, 538
 Anderson, Sherwood, 30, 255, 273, 368, 670, 740
Andre Spire and His Poetry: Two Essays and Forty Translations, 673
 Andrews, Stephen Pearl, 45, 795, 893
 Andreytchine, George, 113
 . . . And Spain Sings, 676
And We Are Millions, 656
Angel Arms, 673
Angels in America, 706
Angry Arts Week (1967), 551
Animal Agenda, 50
Animal Liberation, 51
 Animal Liberation Front, 50
 Animal Rights, 49-51
An Inch of Time, 621
Amie Get Your Gun, 504
 Annie Kilburn, 334
 Anniversary Tours, 39
Antara, 85
Anthology of Revolutionary Poetry, 611, 671
 Anthony, Susan B., 49, 246, 689
 Anthony, Susan B., II, 159
 Anthropology, 51-52
 Anticommunism, 52-54
Anti-Dühring, 126, 319, 442, 602
 Anti-Establishment League, 336
 Antifascism, 54-56
 Anti-Fascist League, 343
 Anti-Junta Movement of 1967-1974, 277
 Anti-Martial Law Coalition, 225
 Antinuclear March (New York, 1982), 525
 Anti-Tuberculosis Society, 717
 "Anti-War Cycle" (dance), 505
 Antonini, Luigi, 272
Antorcha, 168
Anvil/New Anvil, 56, 161, 620, 627, 637
Anything but Love, 293
A 1-12, 675
 Apfel, Alfred, 368
Aphra, 881
Apocalypse Now, 326
Apollinaire: An Elegy, 679
Appalachian Spring, 162
Appeal to Reason, 13-14, 56-57, 128, 319, 451, 570, 593, 669, 691, 748, 767, 776, 913
 Appeal Pocket Series, 451
Appeal to the Colored People of the World, 752
 Appel, Ben, 622, 725
 Apple, Michael, 206
 Apprenticeship Program, Workers Defense League, 898
 Aptheker, Herbert, 40, 57, 155, 294, 375, 376, 724
 Arab Americans, 58-59
 Arab Workers Caucus, UAW, 58
 Aragon, Poet of the French Resistance, 676
 Arbeiterbildungsvereine, Sozialistische Schulvereine, Arbeiterhallen, 59
 Arbeiter Kranken- und Sterbekasse der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika, 59-60
 Arbeiterleserzimmer, 59
 Arbeiterlieder, 61
 Arbeiter-Saengerbund der Vereinigten Staaten, 60-61
 Arbeiter-Stimme, 903
 Arbeiterunion, 465
 Arbeiter-Zeitung, 791, 794
 Arbeter Fraint, 246, 702
Arbeter Zeitung, De, 116, 267, 313, 465, 913, 927
 Archives of Labor and Urban Affairs, 698
 Arculeta, Pedro, 310
 Arena, 121
 Arendt, Hannah, 555
 Arensberg, W. C., 173
Arethusa, 141
 Arian, David, 374
Arise, 507
 Aristide, Jean Bertrand, 285
 Arizona Farm Workers, 496
 Arlen, Harold, 288
 Armed Struggle, 1960s-1970s, 61-66
 Armenian Americans, 66-68
 Armenian Bureau, Communist Party, USA, 678
 Armenian Federation, Workers Party, 67
 Armenian Labor Union, 67
Armenian Mirror Spectator, 68
 Armenian Progressive League, 67
 Armenian Revolutionary Federation (Dashnaks), 67, 68
 Armenians and Communist Party, 149
Arme Teufel, Der, 243, 694
 Armistice Day (1919), 118
 Armstrong, Louis, 396
 Arnautoff, Victor, 523
 Arnow, Harriet, 639
 Aronson, James, 529, 530, 531, 532
 Arp, Hans, 173
Arrows in the Gale, 271
Arsenal/Surrealist Subversion, 809
 Art Ensemble of Chicago, 397
Art Front, 71
 Art Movements, 69-72
Art of Lecturing, The, 442
Art of Making Dances, The, 504
 Artaud, Antonin, 507, 614
 ARTEF (Arbeter Theater Verband), 68-69
 Artes Guadalupe de Aztlan, 524
 Artists Ascension, 397
 Artists Committee of Action, 71, 211
 Artists Union, 71, 211
 Asbarez, 68
 Asch, Solomon, 645
 Ash, William, 626
 Ashcan realism, 70
 Ashleigh, Charles, 358
 Asian Indians. See Indians.
 Asian Studies, 72-73
 Asian Study Group, 473
 Asimov, Isaac, 251, 725
 Asinof, Eliot, 626-627
Ask Your Mama, 337
 Asner, Ed, 326
Asphalt Jungle, The, 324
Assiette au Beurre, L', 480
 Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians, 397, 398, 507
 Association Nacionalista, 651
 Association of Asian Studies, 72, 73
 Association of Black Single Mothers, 760
 Association of Catholic Trades Unionists (ACTU), 152, 220, 386
 Association of Concerned African Scholars, 10
 Association of Medical Students, 304
A Strange Voyage: A Revision of the Key Industrial Cooperative Government; An Interesting and Instructive Description of Life on Planet Venus, 669
At the Circus, 288
 Athenian Literary Society, 924
 Atkinson, Brooks, 288
 Atkinson, Ti-Grace, 259
Atlantic Monthly, 271
 Atlantis Community, 191
Atomic Cafe, 558
Atomic Diplomacy, 144
 Atomic Energy Commission, 706
Atom Spy Hoax, The, 705
 Attaway, William, 638
At This Point in Rhyme, 288
 Attica Prison uprising, 63, 73-74, 420
 Auden, W. H., 678
 Audubon, John James, 661
 Audubon Association, 663
 Augustine, Paul, 187
 August Twenty-ninth Movement, 473
Aurora, L', 588
 Aurora Colony, 244
 Authentic Labor Front, 854
Autobiography of Mother Jones, The, 126
Autocracy and Insurgency in Organized Labor, 556
 Auto Workers Union, 850
 Avanti, L', 390
 Avery, Tex, 809
Avvenire, L', 827
Awake and Sing!, 222, 568
 Ayler, Albert, 397
B
 Babb, Sanora, 113
 Baca, Judy, 525
Bachelor Apartment, 435
Bachelor Father, 340
 Bachrach, Marion, 4, 5
Backlash, 887
 Back of the Yards Neighborhood Council (BYNC), 18
Bad Communist, The, 552
 Baez, Joan, 232, 363
Bag, The, 553
 Bagasol, Simeon, 225
 Bagge, Peter, 837
 Bagirski, Max, 48, 291, 518, 791
 Bailey, Bill, 291
 Bailin, Israel Ber, 405
 Baja, California, 228
Bakar, 68
 Baker, Bertram, 871
 Baker, Ella, 75-76, 802
 Baker, Estelle, 670
 Baker, General, 437, 438
Bakke v. University of California (1977-1978), 471
 Bakunin, Mikhail, 45, 92, 382, 587, 832
 Baldwin, James, 169, 242, 443, 909
 Baldwin, Roger, 23, 26, 274, 358, 540, 663
 Balfour Declaration, 780
 Balino, Carlos, 168
Ballad for Americans, 701
Ballad of the Brown Girl, The, 674
 Balokovic, Zlatko, 36
 Bambara, Toni Cade, 553
Bambi, 317

- Banana Bottom*, 488
Bandaged Nude, The, 621
Bandung Conference, 909
Banjo, 488
 Banks, Dennis, 27, 28
Banner of Light, 795
 Ban the Bomb Movement, 545, 596, 598, 723
 Banyaca, Tomas, 138
 Baraka, Amiri (LeRoi Jones), 398, 449, 552, 615
 Baran, Paul, 76, 431, 511, 658, 659
 Barbara McClintock Project to Cure AIDS, 17
Barbary Shore, 640
 Baritz, Moses, 906
 Barker, Elizabeth, 697
 Barks, Carl, 809
 Barnard Summer School, 898
 Barnes, Harry Elmer, 782
 Barnes, J. Mahlon, 442
 Barnes, Jack, 778
 Barney, Nora Stanton, 96, 159
 Barr, Joel, 706
 Barrett, William, 584
Barricades in Barcelona, 569, 793
 Barrio, El (East Harlem), 476
 Barrio, Raymond, 553
 Barry, Thomas B., 385, 419
 Barsky, Edward, 303
 Bartók, Béla, 263
 Barzman, Ben, 618, 725
 Bascom, John, 425
 Bass, Charlotta, 6, 460, 591, 636
Bastard in the Ragged Suit: Writings of, with Drawings by, Hernan Spector, 672
 Bastille Day, 379
Batalla, La, 793
 Bates, Ruby, 731
 Batt, Dennis, 641, 642
Battle Hymn, 222
Battle Hymn of China, 754
 "Battle Hymn of the Republic, The," 609
Battle in the Barnyard, 128
Battleship Potemkin, 667
 Baudrillard, Jean, 603
 Bax, E. B., 762
 Baxandall, Lee, 539, 540
 Bay Area Revolutionary Union, 473
 Bay Area Vietnam Day Committee, 547
 Bay of Pigs Invasion, 694
 Beal, Frances, 138
 Beal, Fred, 255
 Beals, Carlton (journalist), 431
 Beals, Carlton (Boot and Shoe Workers Union), 745
 Beard, Charles, 40, 101, 685, 805, 875, 876
 Beard, Dan, 662
 Beard, Mary Ritter, 892
Beast in View, 674
 Beats and the New Left, 76-78, 258-259, 333, 552, 595
 Bebel, August, 141, 183, 256, 270, 514, 796, 878, 879
 Bebop, 396, 397, 619
 Bechdel, Alison, 837
 Beck, Dave, 567
 Beck, Julian, 507, 614, 615
 Becker, Florence, 675
 Becker, Maurice, 481
Beckoning Waters, The, 623
 Beque, Don Oscar, 222
 Bedacht, Max, 118, 317, 381, 447
Bedelia, 622
Bedfellow, The, 626
 Beecher, Henry Ward, 894
 Beecher, John, 638, 678
 Beffel, John, 698
Before the Brave, 674
Before the Swallow Dares, 677
Beginnings of War Resistance, The, 336
 Behaviorists for Social Action, 646
 Behrend, Hanna, 556
 Beissel, Johann Conrad, 606
 Belafonte, Harry, 242, 397, 871
 Belfrage, Cedric, 529
 Bell, Daniel, 239, 698, 783
 Bell, Thomas, 637
 Bellah, Robert, 783
 Bellamy, Edward, 78-82, 183, 542, 592, 637, 669, 724, 762, 782, 809, 858, 874
 Bellamy nationalism, 117, 796, 880
 Bellanca, August, 272
 Bellanca, Joseph, 21, 389
 Bellocourt, Clyde, 27
 Bellocourt, Vernon, 599
 Bellow, Saul, 308, 584, 901
 Bellows, George, 173, 481
 Belmont, Alva, 744
 Belor, John, 500
Ben Casey, 324, 623
Bench, The, 615
 Benchley, Robert, 339
Bending Cross, The, 40
 Benedict, Jane, 697
 Benedict, Ruth, 159
 Benét, James, 622
 Benét, Stephen Vincent, 622, 675, 685
 Benét, William Rose, 622, 675
 Ben-Gurion, David, 780
 Benjamin, Herbert, 844
 Benjamin, Walter, 449, 603, 721
 Ben Josephson Library, 697
 Benkert, Karoly, 256
 Bennett, D. M., 246
 Bennett, Gwendolyn, 674
 Bennington (Vermont) Museum, 794
 Benson, Allan, 593
 Benson, Elmer, 16
 Benson, Herman, 698
 Benston, Margaret, 886, 892
 Bentley, Elizabeth, 316, 704
 Bentley, Milo, 743
 Bercovici, Leonardo, 618
 Berenberg, David P., 772
 Bergelson, David, 918
 Berger, Victor L., 83-84, 299, 470, 498, 521, 570, 587, 735
 Bergman, Alexander F. (Alexander Frankel), 676
 Berisky, Saul, 461
Berkeley Barb, 838
 Berkeley Free Church, 680
 Berkeley-Oakland Women's Union, 889
 Berkman, Alexander, 46, 77, 84-85, 202, 274, 518, 612, 695, 827
 Berkshire Women's History Conferences, 41
 Berleburg Bible, 607
 Berman, Alex, 441
 Berman, Lionel, 668
 Bermanzohn, Paul, 279
Bermunkas, 342
 Bernal, J. D., 724, 727
 Bernard, Elaine, 556
 Bernard, Sidney, 551
 Bernardi, Herschel, 325
 Berneri, Camillo, 793
 Bernstein, Eduard, 256, 313, 762
 Bernstein, Samuel, 209
 Bernstein, Walter, 325, 326, 618
 Berreitter, Carl, 642
 Berreitter, Sarraïne, 642
 Berrigan, Daniel, 123, 443
 Berrigan, Philip, 63, 123
 Berry, Abner Winston, 85, 912
 Berry, John, 618
 Berryman, John, 584
 Bertelli, Giuseppe, 390
 Bessie, Alvah, 325, 845
 Bethune, Adé, 123
 Bethune, Mary McLeod, 7
 Bethune, Norman, 250
Between Eras: From Capitalism to Democracy, 782
Between the Hills and the Sea, 552
Between the Plow Handles, 674
Beverly Malibu, The, 627
Beyond a Boundary, 394
Beyond Desire, 255
Beyond Geography: The Western Spirit against the Wilderness, 665
 Biberman, Herbert, 325, 846
 Biddle, Francis, 35
 Biddle, George, 523
 Pierce, Ambrose, 479, 480
Big Clock, The, 620, 674
Bigelow Papers, 338
Big Fix, The, 627
 Biggers, John, 524
Big Jim McClain, 326
Big Knife, The, 568
Big Man, a Fast Man, A, 622
Big Money, The, 196, 639
Big Road, The, 677
Big Sea, The, 337
Big Strike, The, 621
Big Time, The, 674
Big White Fog, 222
Bill Haywood's Book, 299
 Billings, Warren K., 369, 511, 512
 Bill of Rights, 873
Billygoat, 338
Billy the Kid, 162
 Bimba, Anthony, 40, 85-86
 Bingham, Seth, 746
 Birmingham, Alabama, Left activity in, 86-88
 Birobidzhan, 347
 Birth Control, 89-91, 879
Bisbee '17, 553
 Bishop, Elizabeth, 584
 Bishop, Isabel, 849
 Bittelman, Alexander, 903
Bitter Cry of Children, 794
Bitter Season, The, 624
 Black, Hugo, 756, 872
 Black Belt Self-Determination, 93, 94
Black Bolshevik, 298
Black Boy, 909
 "Black, Brown and Beige", 396
Black Christ, The, 674
 Black Codes, 688
 Black Congressional Caucus, 8
 Black Economic Development Conference (BEDC), 438
Black Fury, 667
 "Black International," 45, 91-93, 240
Black Jacobins: Toussaint L'Ouverture and the San Domingo Black Legion, 667
 Black Liberation Army, 63, 94
 Black Liberation Movement, 473
 Black Lung Association, 856
Black Man's Verse, 674
Black Mask, 286, 287, 551, 622
Blackmen, Strike for Liberty, 132
Black Music, 398
 Black Nation, 93-94
Black Nationalism and the Revolution in Music, 397
Blackness of a White Night: Stories and Poems by Sherry Mangán, 675

- Black Panther Party, 62, 64, 94-96, 119, 122, 138, 178, 269, 420, 445, 472, 530, 550, 557, 558, 530, 615, 683, 923
- "Black Power," 137, 138
- Black Reconstruction*, 40, 200-201
- Blacks*, The, 909
- Black Scholar*, 242
- Black Star Publishing, 438
- Blackstone, W. L., 490
- Black Swan Press, 809
- Black Troupe, 615
- Black Unicorn*, The, 678
- Black United Front, 8
- Black Workers Congress (BWC), 438, 473, 474
- Black Workers for Justice, 85
- Black World*, 242
- Blake, Eubie, 396
- Blake, Norman, 233
- Blank, Wade, 191
- Blanquism, 928
- Blast*, 84
- Blatch, Harriot Stanton, 31, 96-97
- Blavatsky, Helena, 80
- Blazer, Alfred, 646
- Bleeding Heart*, 837
- Bley, Carla, 398
- Blind Man*, 173
- Blind Man with a Pistol*, 626
- Blish, James, 251
- Bliss, W. D. P., 132
- Blitzstein, Marc, 97-98, 157, 668
- Bloch, Emanuel, 704
- Bloch, Lucienne, 523, 524
- Blockade*, 435
- Bloice, Carl, 600
- Blood, Benjamin Paul, 808, 809
- Blood in My Eye*, 63
- Blood of the Tenement*, 676
- Blood on the Forge*, 638
- "Bloody Thursday," San Francisco general strike, 719
- Bloom, Marshall, 444, 445
- Bloomer Girl*, 288
- Bloor, Ella Reeve ("Mother"), 14, 98, 587
- Blue Blouses, 406
- Bluegrass Unlimited*, 750
- Blues*, 671
- Blues and the Poetic Spirit*, 808
- Blues People*, 398
- Boas, Ernst, 304, 730
- Boas, Franz, 514, 515, 728
- Bodenheim, Maxwell, 173, 673
- Body Language*, 626
- Body of Waking*, 674
- Boelsche, Wilhelm, 126
- Boggs, Grace Lee, 393, 603, 830
- Boggs, James, 437, 830
- Bohemian Americans. See Czech Americans.
- Bohemian Turner Hall Attack, 894
- Bohn, Frank, 185, 376, 407
- Bolshevik Myth*, The, 84
- Bolshevization, 148, 349
- Bonosky, Philip, 470
- Bontemps, Arna, 161
- Bookchin, Murray, 99, 665
- Bookkeepers, Stenographers and Accountants Union, American Federation of Labor, 856-857
- Boorstin, Daniel, 25
- Boot and Shoe Workers Union (B&SWU), 745, 746, 836
- Bootsie*, 341
- Boozar, Bertha, 786
- Borokhov, Ber, 779
- Borsodi, Ralph, 858
- Bosnia, 556
- Boston*, 671
- Boston Bellamy Club, 81
- Boston Globe*, 289
- Boston Tea Party, 34
- Boston Trade Union College, 898
- Botkin, B. A., 161
- Boucher, Anthony, 627, 726
- Boudin, Leonard, 529
- Boudin, Louis B., 99-100, 724, 928
- Boulanger, Nadia, 97, 161, 746
- Boulding, Kenneth, 443
- Bound For Glory*, 283
- Bourke-White, Margaret, 23, 604
- Bourne, Randolph S., 100-101, 190, 280, 647, 740
- Bovshover, Joseph, 643, 913
- Bowles, Samuel, 206, 614
- Bowling Green State University, 619
- Bow of Burning Gold*, 677
- Bowron, Fletcher, 460
- Bows Against the Barons*, 128
- Boxer Rebellion, 351
- Boxley, George, 752
- Boycotts and the Labor Struggle*, 428
- Boyle, Tony, 856
- Boy Scouts, 926
- Bozart-Westminster Magazine*, 677
- Brabner, Joyce, 837
- Bracero*, 553
- Bradbury, Ray, 726
- Braden, Anne, 103-104, 530, 785
- Braden, Carl, 103-104, 530, 785, 872
- Bradley, E. J., 684
- Bragg, Billy, 233
- Braided Lives*, 552
- Brain Guy*, 622
- Brand, Millen, 676
- Brandeis, Louis, 21, 425
- Brandeis University, 178
- Brandler, Heinrich, 463
- Brandon, Sam, 765
- Brandon, Tom, 666
- Braninn, Carl, 840
- Branstein, Richard, 489
- Branstetter, Winnie, 776, 880
- Brass Check*, The, 749
- Brauer Zeitung*, 767, 852
- Braun, Henry, 556
- Brave Cowboy*, 553
- Brave One*, The, 325
- Braverman, Barnett, 776
- Braverman, Harry, 511, 659, 778, 830
- Bravo, Manuel Alvarez, 604
- Braxton, Anthony, 397
- Bray, Donald, 431
- Brazier, Richard, 357, 610
- Bread and Puppet Theater, 508, 614, 615, 616
- Bread and Roses, 886
- Bread Upon the Waters*, 601
- Breaking Open*, 674
- Breathed, Berke, 341
- Breathe No More*, My Lady, 624
- Brecher, Jeremy, 896
- Brecht, Bertolt, 97, 325, 540, 614, 900
- Breen, Paul, 589
- Breitman, George, 777, 778, 830, 831
- Breitmeyer, Harvey, 642
- Brenner, Johanna, 350
- Brenner, Robert, 350
- Bresci, Gaetano, 253, 588
- Breton, André, 173, 807, 808
- Brewer, Roy, 325
- Bridge on the River Kwai*, The, 326
- Bridges, Harry, 23, 103-104, 328, 368, 417, 459, 460, 530, 613, 656, 698, 716, 719,
- Bridges v. Wixon*, 417
- Bridgman convention, 27
- Briggs, Cyril, 93, 166, 395, 488, 870
- Bright, John, 158, 618
- Bright Face of Danger*, 626
- Brill, Ernie, 553
- "Bring the Boys Home" movement, 105-106
- Brinnin, John Malcolm, 56, 676
- Brissenden, Paul F., 368, 776
- British Americans, 106-108
- British Association of Scientific Workers (BASW), 727, 728
- British Labour Party, 426, 699
- Brittain, Vera, 443
- Broach, H. H., 27
- Broadside to the Sun*, 674
- Brodsky, Joseph, 108, 368, 417
- Broken Arrow*, 673
- Broken Codes*, 627
- Bromberg, J. Edward, 325
- Bronx Left, 19
- Brooklyn Dodgers, 921
- Brooklyn Eagle*, 530
- Brooklyn Labor Lyceum, 59
- Brooklyn Socialist Labor Federation, 775
- Brooks, Cleanth, 482
- Brooks, Van Wyck, 101, 519, 740, 748
- Brookwood Labor College, 42, 601, 645, 770, 898
- Broonzy, Bill, 232
- Brophy, John, 844, 856
- "Brother Can You Spare a Dime," 288
- Brotherhood of Cloak Makers, 370
- Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 587
- Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, 179
- Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters (BSCP), 9, 684
- Brotherhood of the Cooperative Commonwealth, 858
- Brotherhood of Timber Workers, 108-109
- Brown, Heywood, 31, 82, 494
- Browder, Earl, 31, 40, 43, 87, 94, 109-111, 151, 174, 238, 286, 321, 375, 408, 416, 447, 501, 628, 646, 667, 821, 903
- Brower, David, 664, 665
- Brown, Archie, 374, 815
- Brown, Charlotte Hawkins, 159
- Brown, Greg, 233
- Brown, H. Rap, 138
- Brown, Irving, 463
- Brown, J. E., 645
- Brown, Jerry, 295
- Brown, John, 9, 314, 315, 336, 377, 657, 752, 822
- Brown, Lloyd L., 700
- Brown, Sterling A., 242, 638, 675
- Brown, William Montgomery, 111, 126, 128, 246
- Brown, William, 499
- Browne, Carl, 352, 353
- Browne, Lillian, 48
- Browne, Malcolm, 605
- Brownell, Herbert, Jr., 24, 704

- Brownson, Orestes, 448
 Brownsville Labor Lyceum, 774
Brown v. Board of Education, 27, 645, 785
 Brubaker, Howard, 581
 Bruce, John E., 167
 Bruere, Robert, 581
 Brushfire Studios, 526
 Bryan, William Jennings, 13
 Bryant, Louise, 111-112, 540
 Bryant, William Cullen, 609
 Bryn Mawr Summer School for Women Workers, 554, 601, 898, 899
 Bryson, Hugh, 538
 Buch, Vera, 255
 Buchalter, Louis, 250
 Buchanan, Joseph R., 45, 92, 319, 378, 419
 Buck, Pearl, 112-113
 Buck, Robert M., 222
 Buckley, "Lord," 809
 Buddhist Third-Class Junk Mail Oracle, 838
 Budenz, Louis, 42, 176, 177, 494, 841
 Budish, J. M., 347
 Bugs Bunny, 809
 Buhle, Paul, 556, 896
 Building Services Employees International Union, AFL, 440
 Bukharin, Nikolai, 462
 Bulgarian Americans, 113, 766
 Bullard, Arthur, 670
Bulletin of Atomic Scientists, 723
Bulletin of Concerned Asian Scholars, 73, 681
 Bullins, Ed, 615
 Bull Moose Party, 426
 Bulosan, Carlos, 113-114
 Bunche, Ralph, 535, 724
Bund der Freien Gemeinden und Freidenker-Vereine von Nord-Amerika, 247-248
 Bundy, McGeorge, 783
 Buñuel, Luis, 325
 Bureau of Women in Industry, New York State Department of Labor, 344
 Burgess, Ernest W., 782
 Burgum, Edwin Berry, 646, 724
 Burke, Edmund, 579
 Burke, Fielding, 255
 Burke, Kenneth, 43, 406, 647
 Burlak, Anne, 818
 Burleson, Albert S., 691
 Burlington, Vermont, 522
 Burn, Mary Hay, 34
 Burnham, Dorothy, 88, 786
 Burnham, James, 544, 602, 900, 901
 Burnham, Louis, 241, 786
Burning Bush, The, 678
 Burning Issues, 922
 Burns, Lucy, 96
 Burns, Robert, 609
 Burns, William J., 490
 Burnshaw, Stanley, 673
 Buroway, Michael, 320
 Burrell, Ben, 167
 Burrell, Theo, 167
 Burroughs, William, 77
 Burrowes, Peter E., 796
 Busick, Bill, 459
Business and Slavery: The New York Merchants and the Irrepressible Conflict, 234 Bustamante, Rosalio, 227
 Butler, Benjamin, 278
 Butler, Brett, 526
 Butler, Hugo, 325, 618
 Butler, J. R., 744
But Not Yet Slain, 622
But Say It Politely, 293
 Butte, Montana, Left in, 287
 Byington, Steven T., 378
 Byrds, The, 232
 Byron, George Gordon ("Lord"), 33, 609
By the Gate, 68
- C
Cabin in the Sky, 288, 507
 Cabral, Amílcar, 122, 878
 Cabral, Olga, 678
 Cacchione, Peter V., 115, 698
Caesar's Column, 669
Cage, The, 670
 Cagen, Steven, 606
 Cahan, Abraham, 20, 115-116, 282, 334, 403, 466, 593, 670, 707, 913, 914, 927, 928
 Calas, Nicholas, 648, 808
 Caldwell, Erskine, 43, 56, 555, 637, 668,
 Calendars, 116-117
 Calhoun, Arthur, 903
 Califano, Joseph, 190
 California, 117-119
 California CIO Council, 460
 California Communist Party, 300
 California Department of Penology, 571
 California Department of Rehabilitation, 190
California Eagle, 460
 California Federation of Labor, 511
 California Labor School, 120, 627
 California Newsreel, 558
California Quarterly, 676, 726
 California State Industrial Union Council, 459
Call Home the Heart, 255
Call of the Wild, The, 457
 Calloway, Cab, 396
Call to Arms, 128
 Calosa, Pedro, 224
 Calverton, V. F., 42, 148, 163, 508, 509, 645, 677, 724
 Camarata, Peter, 350
 Camejo, Peter, 830
Camera del Lavoro, 272
 Cameron, Angus, 845
 Camp, Carter, 27
 Campaign for Economic Democracy (CED), 295
 Campaign for Economic Justice, 533
 Campaign for Wages for Housework, 865
 Campbell, Alan, 580
 Campbell, Helen Stuart, 120-121, 270, 669
Campfires of the Resistance, The, 551
 Camp Kinderland, 807, 915
 Camp Lakeland, 807
 Camp Midvale, 539
 Camp Nitgadegit, 19, 807
 Campos, Don Pedro Albizu, 651
 Camp Solidarity, 60
 Camp Tamiment, 686
 Camp Unity, 287, 363
 Campus Americans for Democratic Action (CADA), 772
 Camus, Albert, 469
 Cannery and Agricultural Workers Industrial Union (CAWIU), 234, 492, 496
 Canning, Martin, 687
 Cannon, James Patrick, 121-122, 149, 177, 197, 299, 369, 741, 742, 754, 777, 778, 819, 828
 Cannon, Walter B., 727, 728
 "Cantata for FDR," 747
 Canton, Ohio, 182
 Cantor, Edith Carroll, 615
 Cantwell, Carlotta, 353
 Cantwell, Robert, 638
 Cap Collier novels, 286
 Cape Verdean Americans, 122-123
Capital (Karl Marx), 51, 125, 602, 659, 711, 768
Capital and Labor: A Farce, 465
Capitalism, Nature, Socialism, 784
Capitalism and Progress, 702
 Caplan, Jane, 210
 Capra, Frank, 324
Caprichos, 282
Captain Blackman, 553
Captain Jinks, Hero, 592
 Caravan Theater, 615
 Cardona-Hine, Alvaro, 678
 Cardoso, Fernando Henrique, 431
Careless Years, The, 435
 Carey, James, 220, 684, 745, 746, 853, 854
 Carey, Ron, 350, 367, 843
 Carli, Angelo, 551
 Carlson, A. J., 728
 Carlson, Grace, 754
 Carmichael, Stokely, 95, 137, 138, 140, 310, 871, 883
Carousel Parkway, 678
 Carpenter, Edward, 125, 243, 257
 Carpenters Union, 342
 Carr, E. H., 693
 Carr, Edward Ellis, 132
 Carreathers, Benjamin, 628
Carreta, The, 639
 Carrington, Leonora, 808, 809
 Carse, Robert, 623
 Carson, Rachel, 663
 Carson, Sandra, 294
 Carter, Rubin ("Hurricane"), 18
 Cartier-Bresson, Henri, 604, 668
Cartoon History of the Universe, 837
 Carver, George Washington, 414
 Carwardine, Reverend William H., 125
 Case, Belle, 425, 427
Case of Rape, A, 626
Case of the Kidnapped Angel, The, 626
Case of the One-Penny Orange, The, 626
Case of the Poisoned Eclairs, The, 626
Case of the Russian Diplomat, The, 626
 Caserio, Sante, 587
 "Casey Jones, the Union Scab," 312
 Caspary, Vera, 506-507, 622
 Casson, Herbert, 707
 Castoriadis, Cornelius, 320
 Castro, Fidel, 169, 777
Catholic Worker, 46, 123, 124, 289
 Catholic Worker Movement, 123-124
Catholic Worker Movement, The: St. Joseph's Home, 604
 Catlin, George, 513, 661
 Cattell, James McKeen, 726
 Cauce, Cesar, 279
 Caudwell, Christopher, 648
Cavalcade: The March of Southern Youth, 786
 Cazden, Norman, 157
Celebration, 552, 810
 Center for Constitutional Rights, 533

- Centers for Independent Living, 190
- Central American Resource Center, 432
- Central Cooperative Wholesale, 227
- Central Dada Council for World Revolution, 173
- Central Intelligence Agency, 55, 170, 285, 444, 553, 597, 683, 700, 736, 737, 772
- Central Labor Council, New York City, 698
- Central Labor Council, Seattle, 733
- Central Labor Union, Chicago, 45, 418
- Central Organization of U.S. Marxist-Leninists, 473
- Central Union of Bund Organizations, 403
- Centro Cultural de la Raza*, 525
- Centro de Accion Autonoma-Hernandad General de Trabajadores (CASA)*, 494 ax
- Centro Obrero Español*, El, 651
- Century of Yiddish Poetry*, 678
- Césaire, Aimé, 808
- Chalk Circle, 551
- Chalk Dust, 222
- "Chalkdust" (Hollis Liverpool), 871
- Chalk Face, 241
- Challenge, 472, 877, 922, 924
- Challenge of Mars and Other Verse*, The, 336
- Challenge of Peace*, The, 446
- Challenging Years*, 97
- Challis, Luther C., 894
- Chamberlain, Kenneth Russell, 481
- Chambers, Whittaker, 316, 317, 318, 344, 406, 486, 903
- Champion of Youth*, 921
- Champion Youth Monthly*, 921
- Chandler, Len, 750
- Chandra, Ram, 352
- "Change the World," 176
- Changing Season: Selected and New Poems*, A, 677
- Chanin, Nathan, 403
- Channing, Henry, 314
- Channing, William Ellery, 49
- Chanukah, 917
- Chaplin, Charlie, 325, 340, 617
- Chaplin, Ralph H., 124-125, 126, 325, 340, 357, 362, 376-377, 406, 610, 617, 662
- Chapman, Tracy, 233
- Chapney, Adeline, 48
- Charles H. Kerr Company, 49, 82, 125-126, 442, 479, 515, 602, 642, 722
- Charvat, William, 449
- Chase, John C., 520, 746
- Chasm*, The, 670
- Chávez, César, 493, 577, 615
- Chelsea Document*, 604
- Chelsea Rooming House*, 673
- Che-Lumumba Club, 154
- Cheney, Ralph
- Chernin, Rose, 24
- Chernyshevsky, Nikolai, 708, 832
- Cherveny, John, 39
- Chesebro, Caroline, 669
- Chesimard, Joanne, 63
- Chesnutt, Charles W., 334
- Chevalier, Haakon, 624
- Chicago: City On the Make*, 18
- Chicago Antiwar Conference, 801
- Chicago Area Project (CAP), 18
- Chicago Daily Socialist*, 924
- Chicago Defender*, 7, 337
- Chicago Eight Conspiracy Trial, 322, 420, 444, 919. See also Chicago Seven.
- Chicagoer Arbeiter-Zeitung*, 267
- Chicagoer Vorbote*, 189
- Chicago Evening World*, 717
- Chicago Federation of Labor (CFL), 15, 126-127, 214, 237, 378, 386, 424, 648, 824
- Chicago Forum on World Affairs, 38
- Chicago Jobs or Income Now (JOIN), 546
- Chicago Labor Party, 126, 127
- Chicago May Day*, 666
- Chicago Mural Group, 525
- Chicago Poems*, 717
- "Chicago School" of sociology, 782
- Chicago Seed*, 838
- Chicago Seven Conspiracy Trial, 185, 186, 322. See also Chicago Eight.
- Chicago Society for American-Soviet Relations, 38
- Chicago Star*, 127
- Chicago Trade and Labor Assembly, 301
- Chicago Women's Club, 348
- Chicago Women's Liberation Rock Band, 885
- Chicago Women's Liberation Union, 889
- Chicago Workers Committee on Unemployment, 840
- Chilcote, Ronald, 431, 432
- Childhood* (mural), 524
- Child Labor Act, 426
- Child Labor Bulletin*, 702
- Child Labor Reform, 412
- Children of Bondage*, 480
- Children of Light*, 670
- Children of the Sun*, 167
- Children's Bureau, 702
- Children's Hour*, The, 307
- Children's literature, 127-128
- Children Under Capitalism*, 344
- Childress, Alice, 591
- Childs, Morris, 177
- Chile, 429, 563
- Chilean exiles, 155
- China: Inside the People's Republic*, 73
- China Daily News*, 129
- China Marches On*, 675
- China Red*, 675
- China Strikes Back*, 668
- China Syndrome*, The, 326
- China Today*, 22
- Chinese Americans, 128-129
- Chinese Anti-Imperialist Alliance of America, 129
- Chinese Hand Laundry Alliance (New York City), 129
- Chinese question, 129-130
- Chinese Revolution, 437, 472, 474
- Chinese Vanguard*, 129
- Chinese Workers Club, 129
- Chinese Workers Mutual Aid Association (San Francisco), 129
- "Chin Lyvely," 837
- Chisholm, Malcolm, 309
- Chisolm, Shirley, 242
- Choctaw Nation, 14
- Chodorov, Edward, 618
- Chomsky, Noam, 73, 100, 130-131, 145, 443, 547, 683, 793
- Chorus for Survival*, 673
- Choy, Chris, 558, 559
- Christensen, Parley P., 127, 214
- Christianity and Crisis*, 133
- Christian Labor Union, 132
- Christian Socialism, 131-134, 330, 344
- Christian Socialist*, 132, 767
- Christian Socialist Fellowship, 132
- Christ in Concrete*, 216, 638
- Christoffel, Harold, 20
- Christopher, Paul, 310
- Chujoy, Anatole, 506
- Church, Frank, 332
- Church, Sam, 856
- Church League for Industrial Democracy (CLID), 732
- Ciancabilla, Guiseppe (Atomo), 588
- Cigarmakers International Union, 762
- Cikovsky, Nicolai, 70
- Cinderella Married*, 675
- Cineaste*, 559
- Cinema Guild, 559
- CIO News*, 223, 845
- "Circus Sketches" (dance), 504
- Cities and Deserts*, 678
- Citizens Alliance (Minneapolis), 499, 500
- Citizens Clearing House for Hazardous Waste, 665
- Citizens Commission to Investigate the FBI, 221
- Citizens Committee for Army Welfare, 786
- Citizens Committee for Constitutional Liberties, 344
- Citizens Committee to Outlaw Entrapment, 258
- Citizens Committee to Preserve American Freedoms, 872
- Citizens Party (1980s), 440, 773
- Citizen Tom Paine*, 217
- Cityarts Workshop, 524
- City in History*, The, 519, 520
- Cityless and Countryless World*, A, 48
- City Lights Bookstore, 77, 117, 577
- City Today*, The, 551
- "Civil Disobedience," 821
- Civilian Poems*, 676
- Civilian Public Service Camps, 336
- Civil Rights Act (1866), 689
- Civil Rights Committee (Robert La Follette), 668
- Civil Rights Congress, 134-135, 287, 344, 368, 369, 370, 591, 592, 598, 698, 747
- Civil Rights Movement, 10, 135-140
- Civil Service Commission, 257
- Civil War in Spain*, 793
- Clafin, Tennessee, 383, 893
- Clancy, Judith S., 672
- Claridad, 653
- Clan na Gael*, 386, 655
- Claridad Proletaria*, 569
- Clark, Clinton, 786
- Clark, Joseph, 556
- Clark, Mark, 95
- Clark, Peter H., 903
- Clark, Tom, 24, 38, 814
- Clarke, George, 830
- Clarke, Henry Leland, 157
- Clarke, John Henrik, 241
- Clark Gifford's Body*, 620
- Clarktown, 217
- Class, Race and Labor*, 783
- Class, Race, and Black Liberation*, 878
- Classical studies, 140-142
- Class of '29*, 222
- Class Struggle*, 99, 239, 458, 793
- Clayton, Revels, 460
- Clearwater*, 739
- Cleaver, Eldridge, 95, 140, 683

- Clef Club, 396
 Clement, Travers, 42
 Clements, Vassar, 233
 Clendenin, David L., 897
 Clepak, Jan, 746
 Cleveland Citizen, 142-143, 767
 Cliff, Jimmy, 871
 Cliff, Tony, 348
 Clinton, Bill, 2, 888
 Cloak Makers' Strike, 1910, 371
 Clods of Southern Earth, 674
 Cloth Hat and Capmakers, 143
 Clothed with the Sun, 540,
 Cloward, Richard A., 614
 Clowes, Dan, 837
 Clurman, Harold, 568
 CNS, 320
 Coad, Mack, 743
 Coady, Robert, 173
 Coal, 678
 Coalition Caucus, 290
 Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy, 429
 Coalition for Nonviolent
 Food, 50
 Coalition of Labor Union
 Women, 378, 758
 Coastlines, 678
 Coates, Robert M., 624
 Cobb, Ron, 341
 Cochran, Bert, 778, 830
 Cochran, Jacqueline, 159
 Cockburn, Alexander, 683
 Cockburn, Bruce, 232
 Cockcroft, James, 431
 Cockrel, Ken, 437, 438, 439
 Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, 869
 Coffin, William Sloane, Jr., 503
 Cogswell, Theodore, 725
 Cohan, George M., 434, 605
 Cohen, Jesse, 340
 Cohen, Mitchell, 192
 Cohen, Morris, 275
 Cohen, Saul B., 647
 Cohn, Roy M., 420, 704
 Cohn, Sol, 368
 Cold Corner of Hell: The Story of the Murmansk Convoys,
 1941-1945, A, 623
 Cold War Fugitive, 277, 278
 Cold War revisionism,
144-145
 Cole, G. D. H., 895
 Cole, Lester, 325, 326
 Cole, Thomas, 661
 Coleman, Glenn, 481
 Collected Poems (Edwin Rolfe),
 673 Collected Poems (George Op-pen), 675 Collected Poems (Muriel Rukeyser), 674 Collected Poems (Rolfe
 Humphries), 676
 Collected Poems, 1924-1974
 (John Beecher), 678
 Collected Poems of John Wheelwright, 675
 Collecting the Left, 145-146
 Collective Black Artists, 397
 College Settlements Association, 732
 Collette, Buddy, 397
 Collier, John, 202, 604
 Collier, Peter, 683
 Collins, Dara, 513
 Collins, Henry, 316
 Collins, Judy, 232, 847
 Collins, Pernell, 786
 Colón, Jesus, 652
 Colonial Era, The, 57
 Colonization Commission,
 315
 Color, 674
 Colorado, 359
 Colorado Fuel and Iron Strike,
 467
 Colored Farmers Alliance, 12
 Colored Socialist Club,
 Harlem, 290
 Columbia Revolt, 557
 Colwell, Guy, 836
 Coming Climax, The, 125
 Coming Home, 326
 Coming Nation, 13, 671, 707,
 763, 776, 795
 Comintern. See Third International.
 Commentary, 289
 Committee for a National Science Foundation, 729
 Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (SANE), 248, 596,
 598, 821
 Committee for a Unified
 Newark, 473
 Committee for Cultural Freedom (CCF), 329, 729
 Committee for Industrial Organization, 459
 Committee for Nonviolent Action and Peacemakers, 595
 Committee for Nonviolent
 Revolution, 185, 275-276,
 577 Committee for Progressive Labor Action, 633
 Committee for the Arts, Sciences and Professions. See Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences and Professions.
 Committee for the Care of Young Children in Wartime,
 293
 Committee for the Defense of Leon Trotsky, 516
 Committee for the Political Advancement of Science Fiction, 251
 Committee in Solidarity with the People of El Salvador
 (CISPES), 430
 Committee of Concerned
 Asian Scholars, 72, 73
 Committee of Forty-Eight,
 213, 222
 Committee of Three Hundred
 (Seattle General Strike), 733 Committees for a National Congress of Spanish-Speaking Peoples, 158
 Committees of Correspondence, 155, 286
 Committees to End the War in Vietnam, 548
 Committee to Aid Mexican
 Workers, 460
 Committee to End Sterilization Abuse, 1
 Committee to Release the Rosenbergs, 539
 Committee to Secure Justice for Morton Sobell, 705
 Committee to Support South
 African Resistance, 710
 Common Sense, 579
 Commoner, Barry, 664
 Commonweal magazine, 133
 Commonweal of Christ, 353
 Commonwealth Builders, Inc.,
 868
 Commonwealth College, 453,
 490, 898
 Commonwealth Federation,
 Oregon, 380
 Commonwealth Federation,
 Washington, 380
 Commonwealth Labor College, 875
 Communications Workers of
 America, 379, 698
 Communism and Christianity,
 126
 Communist, The, 148, 150,
 398, 907
 Communist Clubs, 266
 Communist Control Act
 (1954), 134, 331, 815
 Communist Eighth Route
 Army, 754
 Communist Labor Party (CLP,
 1919-21), 99, 118, 147, 378,
 612, 693
 Communist Labor Party
 (1970s), 438, 473
 Communist Labor Party
 Camp, 438
 Communist League of America, 42, 194, 277, 329, 440,
 568, 777
 Communist League of Struggle, 793
 Communist Manifesto, The, 52,
 81, 181, 319, 755, 893
 Communist Myth and Soviet Reality, 556
 Communist Party (Illinois),
 127
 Communist Party (Majority), 462
 Communist Party, Harlem,
 590-591
 Communist Party, USA, 3, 4,
 5, 9, 17, 23, 27, 30, 31, 40,
 57, 67, 68, 85, 86, 87, 88,
 90, 97, 146-156, 179, 189,
 192, 193, 220, 229, 230,
 235, 237, 254, 258, 276,
 277, 289, 291, 304, 309,
 328, 329, 335, 342, 343,
 344, 347, 366, 369, 370,
 373, 380, 386, 395, 401,
 408, 413, 433, 438, 472,
 454, 459, 477, 485, 486,
 487, 492, 494, 496, 503,
 505, 513, 515, 530, 534,
 538, 541, 565, 582, 585,
 587, 594, 612, 613, 620,
 624, 626, 628, 629, 631,
 641, 645, 646, 651, 655,
 656, 673, 677, 690, 693,
 698, 702, 703, 706, 709,
 716, 721, 726, 747, 754,
 756, 757, 765, 782, 783,
 797, 818, 819, 820, 839,
 845, 847, 848, 849, 851,
 856, 862, 868, 877, 899,
 908, 912
 Communist Party, USA, National Training School, 335
 Communist Party of Cuba,
 777
 Communist Party of the Philippines, 225
 Communist Party Opposition,
 851
 Communist Political Association, 335
 Communists Within the Labor
 Movement, 220
 Communist Workers Party
 (CWP), 66, 278, 279, 473
 Communitas, 275
 Communities for Reevaluation
 Counseling, 647
 Community-Labor Energy
 Coalition, 842
 Community Murals, 525
 Community Services Organization (CSO), 492
 Community Symphony Orchestra, 397
 Compleat Werewolf and Other
 Stories of Fantasy and Science Fiction, 726
 Composers and Musicians for Peace, 747
 Composers Collective,
156-157, 701, 746

- Composers Guild, 397
 Compromise of 1877, 9
 Compton, Arthur Holly, 728
 Compton, Karl, 727, 728
Comrade: Mister, 673
Comrade, The, 448, 480, 514, 670, 748, 796
Comrade Yetta, 670
 Comstock, Anthony, 308
 Comstock Laws, 879, 894
Conceived in Liberty, 217
 Concept East, 615
Concerning the Young, 677
Concert for Francis (of the Saint Variety), A, 701
Condemned, The, 97
Condition of Labor, The, 266
Condition of Man, The, 519
Condition of the Working Class in England in 1844, 412, 541
 Condon, Edward U., 730
Conduct of Life, The, 519
Confederacion de Uniones Campesinos y Obreros Mexicanos (CUCOM), 496
Confederacion Nacional del Trabajo, 792
Confederacion Nacional del Trabajo-Federacion Anarquista Iberica (CNT-FAI), 275
 Confederated Spanish Societies, 793
 Conference for Progressive Labor Action (CPLA), 84, 365, 526, 840
 Conference for Progressive Political Action (CPPA), 84, 426
 Conference of Non-Aligned Nations, 8
 Conference of Studio Unions (CSU), 327, 328, 459
 Conference on Antidiscrimination and Women's Activities, 578
 Conference to Combat Anti-Semitism, 461
 Conger-Kaneko, Josephine, 480, 776, 777, 874
 Congregational Educational Society (CES), 590
Congreso del Pueblo de Habla Española (Spanish Speaking Congress) 151-152, 157-159 460, 492
 Congress Against War, 415
 Congress for Jewish Culture, 928
 Congress of Afrikan Peoples, 473
 Congress of American-Soviet Friendship, 37, 729
 Congress of American Women, 159
 Congress of American Writers, 241
 Congress of Genoa, 1892, 253
 Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), 4, 7, 9, 19, 21, 31, 87, 118, 142, 148, 190, 207, 220 223, 225 291, 330, 342, 355, 366, 372, 378, 395, 450, 454, 455, 492, 502, 532, 537, 552, 532 578, 607, 611, 628, 633, 649, 668, 684, 700, 742, 771, 788, 806, 813, 845, 851, 856, 857, 863, 875, 896, 897, 925
 Congress of Industrial Organizations, California, 656
 Congress of Intellectuals for Peace, 282
 Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), 62, 138, 139, 244, 527, 553, 577, 697, 802
 Congressional Union, 96
 Coniglio, Alfonso, 911
 Conklin, E. G., 727
Connection, The, 615
Connections, 838
 Connelly, Philip "Slim," 328, 459, 460, 461
 Connolly, James, 125, 160, 386, 387, 655
 Connolly, John, 407
 Connolly, Nora, 387
 Connolly Clubs, 386
 Connor, Eugene "Bull," 787
Conquest of Bread, The, 253
 Conroy, Jack, 17, 56, 160-161, 555, 638, 725
 "Conscientization," 429
Conservator, The 270, 609, 671, 796
 Considerant, Victor, 239
Conspiracy, 680
Conspiracy Capers, 836
 Consumers Union, 305
 Contemporary Social Action Collections, 698
 Contemporary writers, 676
Contested Terrain, 659
Contours of American History, The, 876
Contracorrente, 388
Controlling Interest: The World of Multinationals, 558
 Converse, Florence, 670
 Conway, Martin F., 377
 Cooder, Ry, 232
 Cook, George Cram, 670
Cool Million, A, 639
 Cooper, Esther, 786
 Cooper, Frederick, 10
 Cooperative Cafeteria, 849
 Cooperative Central Exchange, 15
 Cooperative Colony, Henderson Bay, Washington, 315
Cooperative Commonwealth, The, 682, 762
 Cooperative League of the USA, 302
Cooperative Movement, The, 407
 Cooperative Publishing Company, 308
 Coover, Oscar, 754
 Copeland Act, 716
 Copenhagen, 407
 Copland, Aaron, 157, 161-162, 157, 701
Copper Sun, 674
 Corbin, Rita, 123
 Cordero, Andrés Figueroa, 652
 Corey, Irwin, 340, 381
 Corey, Lewis. See Fraina, Louis.
Cornhuskers, 717
Corno Emplumado, El, 551, 552
 Corona, Bert, 460, 494
Correspondence, 830
Corriere del Popolo, Il, 388
 Corsini, Harold, 604
 Cortez, Carlos, 361
 Cortez, Jayne, 809
 Cortina, Juan N., 491
 Coser, Lewis, 783
Cosmopolitan, 435
 Costigan-Wagner Anti-Lynching Bill, 415
 Costley, William, 118
Cotton Comes to Harlem, 626
Cotton Pickers, The, 640
 Coudert, Frederic R., Jr., 686
 Coughlin, Charles, 15, 858
 Coulter, Al, 852
 Coulter, Charles R., 520
 Coubman College, 721
 Council Communism, 162-163
 Council on African Affairs (CAA), 6-7, 135, 201, 912, 670
Counterattack, 219
Counterfeit Revolution, The, 440
 Counterintelligence Program (COINTELPRO), 95, 220, 221, 332
Counter-Revolution and Revolt, 478
 Country Joe and the Fish, 232
Country Without Strikes, A, 454
 Counts, George, 205
 Cowl, Margaret, 538, 904
 Cowley, Malcolm, 309, 516, 647
 Coxey, Jacob, 352, 353
 Coxey's Army. See Industrial armies.
Crab-Grass, 674
Cradle Will Rock, 97
 Craig, Bette, 616
Craig and Joan: Two Lives for Peace, 626
 Crane, Stephen, 334, 673
 Crane, Walter, 483
 Cravan, Arthur, 173
 Cravella, Ernestina, 588
Crawdaddy, 551
 Crawford, Max, 552
 Creedence Clearwater Revival, 232
 Criley, Richard, 872
Crime: Its Causes and Consequences, 414
Crime to Fit the Punishment, A, 558, 846
 Criminal syndicalism laws, 118, 496, 692
 Criminology, 163-164
Crise Sociale, 240
 Crisis, 200
Crisis of the Middle Class, The, 239
 Cristo, El, 625
 Crite, Allan Rohan, 71
 Critical Legal Studies, 164-165
Critical Sociology, 680, 781, 784
 Croatian Americans, 165-166
 Croatian Workers Organization, 166
 Crockett, George C., 155, 439, 755, 806
 Crockett, George W., Jr., 242
Cronaca Sovversiva, S, 253, 254, 390, 691, 713
 Cronin, John, 220
 Croppers and Farm Workers Union, 743
 Crosby, Ernest H., 592
 Crosby, Harry, 672
 Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young, 232, 619
 Crosley, George, 316
Cross and the Arrow, The, 638
 Crossen, Ken, 625
Crossfire, 325
 Crotona Park, 696
Crozart Story, The, 620, 674
 Crumb, Robert, 341, 836, 837
 Crusade for Justice, 493
Crusader, 62, 93, 166-168, 195, 395, 870
 Crusader News Service, 167
Crusaders, The, 639
 Cruise, Howard, 837
 Cruz, Philip Vera, 225
Cry, the Beloved Country, 435
 Crystal City, Texas, 493
 Cuba, 137
Cuba, Prophetic Island, 241
Cuba at 25-The Continuing Revolution, 278
 Cuban Americans, 168-169
 Cuban Missile Crisis, 429
 Cuban Revolution, 169-171, 429, 437, 511, 694, 876
 Cuban Revolutionary Party, 168
 Cuban Uprising, 307
 Cudjoe, Selwyn R., 242

- Cuffe, Paul, 93
 Cullen, Countee, 674
Cultural Correspondence, 551, 809
Cultural Critique, 449
 Cultural Workers and Artists Caucus (Labor Party), 526
Culture of Cities, The, 519
Culture of Poverty: A Critique, 436
 Cumbe, Tad, 610
 Cummins, Albert, 425
 Cuney, Waring, 786
 Cunningham, Charles C., 571
 Cunningham, E. V. See Fast, Howard.
 Cunningham, Merce, 507
 Cunningham, Sis, 738, 749, 750
 Cunningham, William, 624
Cupid's Yokes, 308
 Curran, Joe, 171, 684
 Curran, Joseph, 534
 Current Affairs Club, 371
 Currin, Albert, 682
 Cushing, Frank Hamilton, 513
 Cutler, Yosli, 509, 510
 CYCO, 928
Cynthia, 626
 Czech Americans, 171-172
 Czech Uprising, 471
 Czołgosz, Leon, 46, 172, 244, 253, 518, 612
- D
 Dada, 173
Dagger of the Mind, 620
 Dahlberg, Edward, 406
 Daifallah, Nagi, 58
Daily Compass, 177, 607-608, 646, 798
Daily People, 184, 185, 764, 765, 767
Daily People's World, 747
Daily Worker, 27, 85, 149, 150, 151, 153, 174-178, 179, 215, 230, 231, 255, 273, 283, 304, 317, 340, 344, 441, 489, 501, 507, 510, 530, 538, 607-608, 620, 623, 634, 646, 656, 667, 672, 676, 679, 696, 704, 737, 747, 755, 798, 849, 907, 908, 909, 920
Daily World, 177, 600
Dain Curse, The, 287
 Dairy Farmers Union, 16
 Dale, Thelma, 159, 786
 Daley, Richard, 322, 549
 dalla Costa, Mariarosa, 865
 Daly, Mary, 886
 Damon, Anna, 369, 538
Dance-Lover, 506
Dance Magazine, 506
 Dance Project, 221, 506
 Dancers Emergency Association, 506
Dance the Eagle to Sleep, 552
Dance without Shoes, 674
Dangerous Jack: A Phantasy in Verse, 679
Dangerous Thoughts, 621
Dangerous World, The, 679
 Dangle, Lloyd, 837
 Daniel, 326
 Danielwicz, Sigismund, 716
 Danish Folk High School Movement, 330
Danny Thomas Show, The, 340
 Darbas, 85
 Darcy, Sam, 628, 921
Darkness and Dawn, 669
Darkness and Daylight: Lights and Shadows of New York Life, 120
Dark Stain, The, 622
Dark Way to the Plaza, The, 621
 Darrow, Clarence, 81, 125, 164, 181, 246, 298-299, 364, 451, 490, 513
 Darwin, Charles, 513
Darwins, The, 48
 Das, Taraknath, 351 da Silva, Howard, 668
 Dassini, Albert, 326
 Dassini, Jules, 325, 618
 Daugherty, James, 460
Daughter of Earth, 620, 754
Daughters and Rebels, 503
 Daughters of Bilitis, 258
 Daumier, Honoré, 481, 501
 David, Edouard, 240
 David, Ronnie, 615
 Davidman, Joy, 621, 676
David of Sassoun, 701
 Davidson, Ben, 902
 Davis, Andrew Jackson, 795
 Davis, Angela, 63, 178-179, 155, 242, 375, 376, 530, 878
 Davis, Benjamin, J., 115, 179, 308, 375, 598, 747, 755, 912
 Davis, Frank Marshall, 674
 Davis, H. Chandler, 726
 Davis, Hope Hale, 621
 Davis, Jerome, 39, 782
 Davis, John P., 535, 536, 912
 Davis, Leon Julius, 454
 Davis, Natalie Zemon, 209
 Davis, Ossie, 242, 553
 Davis, Rebecca Harding, 334, 572
 Davis, Rennie, 294
 Davis, Richard Harding, 167
 Davis, Robert Gorham, 621
 Davis, Sol, 48
 Davis, Stuart, 23, 70, 481
 Davitt, Michael, 265
Dawn: A Magazine of Christian Socialism and Record of Social Progress, 132
Dawn is Forever, 677
 Day, Dorothy, 100, 123, 280, 519
 Dayal, Har, 351, 352
Day of the Locust, The, 639
Days of Our Lives, 601
 Days of Rage, 65, 420
Days to Come, 307
 Deacons for Defense, 62
Dead End: The Bowery, 604
Deadline for Action, 845
Deadline for the Media, 532
Dead Reckoning, 674
 De Antonio, Emile, 556
Dear Remembered World, 448
Death by Design, 627
Death in the Wind, 625
Death Master, The, 725
Death of a Corinthian, 625
Death Ship, The, 640
 De Basco, Bertha, 166
 de Beauvoir, Simone, 892
 DeBoer, Harry, 499
 de Bright, Josefinia Fierro, 158
 Debs, Eugene V., 14, 17, 82, 98, 132, 179-182, 167, 185, 214, 240, 246, 268, 313, 315, 356, 423, 424, 464, 512, 554, 570, 609, 617, 702, 717, 763, 782, 793, 855
 Debs Column for Spain, 3
 De Caux, Len, 222
 DeCesare, Dona, 606
 Declaration of Independence, 34
 de Cleyre, Voltairine, 48, 182-183, 246, 518, 609
Decline of American Capitalism, The, 239
 Dee, Ruby, 241, 242, 553
Deep Six, 623
Defiant One, The, 326
 DeFord, Miriam Allen, 626
 de Hostos, Eugenio Maria, 653
 Dejacque, Joseph, 239 de la Rosa, Luis, 491
 del Bourgo, Maurice, 176
 De Lacy, Hugh, 868
 Delaney, Martin, 7
 Delano, Jack, 604
 Delany, Samuel, 726
 De Leon, Daniel, 82, 125, 160, 183-185, 239, 313, 356, 407, 419, 514, 602, 698, 734, 746, 763, 764, 765, 776, 878, 895, 896,
 De Leon, Solon, 765
 Dell, Floyd, 202, 271, 274, 280, 368, 447, 481, 506, 540, 554, 647, 670
 Dellinger, David, 185-186, 294, 443, 444, 577, 595, 907
 Dellums, C. L., 684
 Dellums, Ron, 242
 Delson, Max, 897
 DeMarco, Gordon, 627
 DeMent, Iris, 233
 De Mille, Agnes, 264
 Deming, Barbara, 443, 577
 Democratic Front, 628
 Democratic National Convention (1968), 186, 294
 Democratic Party, 150, 384, 385
 Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee (DSOC), 290, 333, 366, 474, 544, 773, 830, 902, 9251
 Democratic Socialists of America (DSA), 119, 133, 192, 290, 333, 366, 384, 544, 773, 842-843, 830, 902
Democratic Vistas, 617 Democratic Workers Party, 475
 Demuth, Charles, 70
 Denishawn School of Dancing and Related Arts, 504
 Denitch, Bogdan, 925
Denmark Vesey, 678
 Dennis, Eugene, 230, 286, 755
 Dennis, Peggy, 539
 Dentists Study Chapter, Intercollegiate Socialist Society, 302
 Department of Industrial Conditions and Social Welfare, New Jersey State Federation of Woman's Clubs, 702
 Department Store and Specialty Clerks Union Local 1265, 567
Deportations of Delirium of Nineteen-Twenty, The, 126
 Derleth, August, 56, 627
Destination Tokyo, 325
Detective Fiction Weekly, 625
Detective Story, 324
Detective Tales, 625 de Tocqueville, Alexis, 583
Detour at Night, 625
 Detroit, Michigan, Left in, 139, 436, 437, 438, 439
Detroit Free Press, 293
Detroit Industry (Mural), 699
 Detroit Insurrection, 63
 "Detroit Industrial Workers of the World," 186-188, 764, 776
 Detroit Newsreel, 438
 Detroit Socialist Educational Society, 906
 Deutsch, Babette, 428
 Deutsch, Leo, 708, 709, 928
Deutsche-Amerikaner Ty-pographia No. 9, 379
Deutscher Reichsverband für Pro-letarische Sexualpolitik, 256 Devall, Bill, 665
 Devereaux, Arthur, 80
Devil's Stocking, The, 18

- Dewey, John, 100, 101, 188, 205, 329, 479, 480, 516, 517, 519 583, 685, 771, 867
- Dewey, Thomas, 599
- "Dewey Canyon III," 862
- Dewey Commission, 827
- Deweyism, 603
- Dialectical and Historical Materialism*, 141
- Dialectical Materialism and Psychoanalysis*, 648
- Dialectic of Sex, The*, 886
- Diamond, Sigmund, 783
- Diary of a Shirtwaist Striker*, 470, 745
- Diaz, Porfirio, 227
- Dick, Philip K., 553
- Dickens, Charles, 57
- Dickinson, Emily, 504
- Dick Van Dyke Show, The*, 340
- Dictatorship of the Proletariat from Marx to Lenin*, 197
- Di Donato, Pietro, 216, 638
- Dies, Martin, 71, 540, 661
- Dies Committee, 88, 221, 222, 380, 536
- Dietzgen, Joseph, 126, 188-189, 267, 642, 722, 791
- Difesa per Sacco e Vanzetti, La*, 6
- DiGia, Ralph, 577
- Dime Detective*, 625
- Dimitroff, Georgi, 113, 628, 820
- Dimsdale, Howard, 618
- Dinkins, David, 455
- di Prima, Diana, 443, 552
- Direct action, 189-190
- Direct Action*, 185
- Directions*, 676
- Dirty Linen*, 233
- "Dirty War" in Argentina, 429
- Disability community, 190
- Disability rights movement, 190-191
- Disciples of Christ, 907
- Discrete Series*, 675
- Disinherited, The*, 161, 638
- Diskin, Lou, 375
- Dispatcher*, 621, 656
- Dispossessed, The*, 553
- Dissent*, 191-192, 333, 440, 783, 830, 901
- Distributive, Processing, and Office Workers of America (DPOWA), 193, 234, 235, 454
- Distributive Trade Council, 193
- District Assembly 49, Knights of Labor, 775
- District 65, United Automobile Workers, 597, 192-194
- Dix, Dorothea, 190
- Dmowski, Roman, 611
- Dmytryk, Edward, 325
- Doak, William, 612
- Dobbs, Farrell, 194, 499, 754, 777, 778
- Doctorow, E. L., 449
- Documentary History of the Negro People in the United States*, 57
- Dodd, Bella, 817
- Dodge, Mabel, 173, 280, 299, 581, 590
- Dodge Revolutionary Union Movement, 851, 698
- Dodo Bird, The*, 616
- Dodson, Owen, 676, 786
- Do Everything*, 873
- Doherty, Catherine de Hueck, 123
- Doho*, 385, 395
- Dolci, Danilo, 123
- Dolgoft, Sam, 793
- Dollars and Sense*, 660
- Dolliver, Jonathan, 425
- Dollmaker, The*, 639
- Dolphin with the Revolver in Its Teeth*, 678
- Dolson, James, 118
- Dombrowski, James A., 133, 194-195, 309, 330, 785
- Dombrowski v. Pfister*, 420
- Domhoff, G. William, 614, 781, 784
- Domingo, Wilfred A., 167, 195-196, 870
- Dominican Republic, 137, 429, 563
- Donna Reed Show, The*, 340
- Donnelly, Ignatius, 669
- Don't You Want to Be Free?*, 337
- Doorbell Rang, The*, 626
- "Do Re Mi," 283
- Dos Passos, John, 43, 196, 434, 435, 447, 639, 640, 740
- Dostoyevsky, Fyodor, 123, 584
- Dotter, Earl, 605
- Doty, Edward, 32
- Douai, Adolf, 248, 267, 315, 465, 790, 903
- Double Bed: From the Feminine Side, The*, 678
- Double Jeopardy*, 625
- Double Take, The*, 625
- Double Trouble*, 624
- "Double V" Campaign, 370, 395
- Douglas, Kirk, 553
- Douglas, Melvyn, 323-324
- Douglas, Paul, 428, 771
- Douglas, William O., 701, 704, 756, 814
- Douglass, Frederick, 383, 657, 658, 752, 785
- Down Beat* magazine, 397
- Drake, St. Clair, 494
- Drama Group, Mobilization for Youth, 615-616
- Draper, Hal, 197, 245, 544, 556, 778, 830, 901
- Draper, Muriel, 159
- Draper, Theodore, 197
- Dream Child, The*, 48
- Dreamers, The*, 622
- Dream Life of Balso Snell, The*, 639
- Dred Scott Decision, 100
- Dreiser, Theodore, 30, 43, 482, 516, 518, 555, 584, 620, 670, 671, 740
- Dreyfus Case, 704
- Dreyfuss, Richard, 341
- Drop Hammer*, 616
- Drug, Hospital, and Health Care Employees Union. See Local 1199, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union.
- Drums of Empire*, 623
- Dryden Press, 673
- Dry Summer in Provence*, 676
- Dual unionism, 197-199
- Duarte, José Napoleón, 430
- Dubinsky, David, 28, 116, 143, 272, 372, 373, 462, 684
- Du Bois, W. E. B., 6, 8, 10, 57, 199-202, 241, 242, 287, 334, 375, 428, 451, 477, 530, 591, 652, 683, 782, 786, 803, 867
- Du Bois Clubs, 920, 922
- Duchamp, Marcel, 173
- Ducornet, Erica ("Rikki"), 809
- Dudley, Jane, 505
- Duke, Vernon (Vladimir Dukelsky), 288
- Duke of Stockbridge, The*, 78
- Dunayevskaya, Raya, 202, 393, 603, 778, 830
- Dunbar, Paul Laurence, 167, 334
- Dunbar, Roxanne, 881
- Duncan, Isadora, 202-203, 503, 647
- Duncan, Robert, 77
- Dunham, Katherine, 507
- Dunham, Marion Howard, 874
- Dunn, L. C., 728
- Dunn, Robert, 26, 222, 344, 701
- Dunne, Grant, 194, 386, 499
- Dunne, Miles, 194, 386, 499
- Dunne, Ray, 386
- Dunne, Vincent R., 194, 499, 754, 777
- Dunne, William F., 386
- Dupee, F. W., 584
- Durante, Jimmy, 381, 900
- Dust Bowl Ballads*, 283
- Dylan, Bob, 233, 283, 551, 595, 750
- Dynamic Sociology*, 270
- Dynamics of Social Change*, 375
- Dynamo*, 672
- Dziennik Ludowy*, 611

E

- Eagle in a Cage*, 847
- Eakins, Thomas, 540
- EAM-ELAS (National Liberation Front of Greece), 277
- Early Years of the Republic, The*, 57
- Earth First!, 50, 553, 665
- East, Clay, 502
- East Indians. See Indians.
- Eastland, James O., 784, 785
- Eastman, Crystal, 280, 446
- Eastman, Max, 70, 163, 202, 271, 272, 273, 280, 202, 336, 446, 447, 467, 480, 516, 540, 554, 581, 602, 610, 647, 671
- East Village Other*, 838
- Eater of Darkness, The*, 624
- Ebert, Justus, 185
- Ebony*, 288
- Echo X*, 725
- Ecodefense*, 665
- Ecofeminism*, 886
- Ecology*, 664
- Ecology of Freedom, The*, 99
- Economic Determinism*, 515
- Economic Justice for All*, 446
- Economic Research and Action Project, SDS, 294, 805
- Economic Rights Task Force, 533
- Economics, radical, 658-660
- Ecstasy of Owen Muir, The*, 428
- Ecumenical Program for Inter-American Communication and Action, 429
- Eda, Eugene, 524
- Eddy, Sherwood, 907
- Edelman, Marian Wright, 191
- Edelshtat, David, 246, 643, 913
- Edelstein, Joel, 432
- Edge, Rosalie, 663
- Edge of Tomorrow, The*, 724
- Edman, Irwin, 71
- Edmond, Randolph, 786
- Education, 205-207
- Education and Living*, 101
- Education of Black People: Ten Critiques, 1906-1960, The*, 205
- Edwards, A. S., 707
- Edwards, Richard, 659
- Ego and His Own, The*, 378, 832
- Ehrenreich, Barbara, 290, 773
- Eichenberg, Fritz*, 71, 123
- Eightball*, 837

- 1844 Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts, 393, 478, 541, 603
- Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte*, 125
- Eight-Hour Leagues, 208, 296
- Eighty Years and More*, 515
- Einstein, Albert, 3, 347, 510, 595, 704, 722, 730
- Eisenhower, Dwight, 37, 704
- Eisenstein, Sergei, 667, 900
- Eisler, Hanns, 157, 701
- Eleftheria*, 276
- Elegy for D. H. Lawrence*, 679
- Eley, Geoff, 210
- Elijah Muhammad, 139, 513
- Eliot, T. S., 447, 482, 584, 672, 673
- Elitcher, Max, 704
- Elly Queen Mystery Magazine*, 625, 626
- Ellington, Duke, 396
- Ellis, Havelock, 243
- Ellison, Ralph, 909
- Ellsberg, Daniel, 529
- Ellul, Jacques, 519
- Elöre*, 263, 343
- El Salvador, 563
- Elsewhere, Elsewhere, Elsewhere*, 626
- Emancipator*, 195
- Embarrassment of Riches*, 624
- Embree, A. S., 207-208
- Embros*, 276
- Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, 634
- Emergency Peace Campaign, 336
- Emergency Work Bureau Artists Group, 71
- Emerson, Laura Payne, 357
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 482, 518
- Emerson, Thomas, 368
- Emma Lazarus Day Nursery, 208
- Emma Lazarus Federation of Jewish Women's Clubs, 208
- Empire as a Way of Life*, 876
- Emspack, Julius, 342, 852
- Encyclopedia Africana*, 201
- Encyclopedia of Dance*, 506
- Encyclopedia of Social Sciences, The*, 239
- End of Ideology, The*, 783
- Endore, Guy, 618, 625, 724
- End Poverty in California (EPIC) Movement, 119, 571, 749
- Enemy Forgotten, The*, 278
- Engdahl, J. Louis, 369
- Engel, George, 297
- Engel, Morris, 604
- Engels, Friedrich, 57, 268, 314, 319, 383, 412, 414, 436, 442, 465, 466, 514, 515, 541, 602, 606, 660, 734, 755, 765, 867, 879, 892
- England, George Allen, 669, 796
- Englewood Woman's Club, 702
- English in America*, 449
- Engstand, Stuart, 56
- Environmentalism, radical, 660-666
- Ephrata Cloister Community, Pennsylvania, 606
- Episodes and Epistles*, 679
- Epstein, Abe, 347
- Epstein, Melech, 347
- Epstein, Schachno, 404
- Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 883
- Equalitarian Bulletin*, 82, 542
- Equality*, 49, 79, 80, 81, 542, 662, 669
- Equality Colony, 858
- Equality League of Self-Supporting Women, 96
- Equal Rights Amendment, 97, 159, 344, 412, 882
- Equi, Marie D., 208-209
- Equity*, 132
- Era of McCarthyism*, 57
- Erber, Ernest, 793
- Ere-Voice*, 675
- Eritassard Hayastan*, 68
- Erlich, Henryk, 404
- Ernst, Max, 808
- Ernst, Morris, 27
- Eros and Civilization: A Philosophical Inquiry into Freud*, 477, 478, 648
- Escape from Freedom*, 248
- Escuela Francisco Ferrer y Guardia*, 651
- Esenin, Sergei, 203
- España Libre*, 793
- Espionage Act (1917), 84, 118, 458, 481, 570, 593, 691, 797
- Espionage, 736
- Esquire magazine*, 530
- Essay on Liberation*, 478
- Esteve, Pedro, 168, 587, 911
- Estrada Courts Housing Development, East Los Angeles, 525
- Ethiopia, 7, 513
- Ettor, Joseph, 271, 272, 389, 434, 826, 827
- Ettor-Giovannitti Case, 713
- Euf Veite Vegn*, 915
- Europa and Other Poems and Sonnets*, 676
- European studies, 209-210
- Evans, George Henry, 12
- Evans, Walker, 604
- Evanston College for Ladies, 873
- Evaporated Man, The*, 678
- Everett Massacre, 208, 210-211
- Evergood, Philip, 23, 71, 211
- Evergreen Review*, 77
- Everson, William (Brother Antoninus), 77
- Everything Falling*, 674
- Everything That Moves*, 640
- Evolution of Man, The*, 126
- Evolution of Property, The*, 514
- Evvie, 622
- Excavations*, 676
- Ex Cranium*, 675
- Executioner Awaits, The*, 307, 638
- Executive Order 8802, 684
- Executive Order 9835, 485
- Executive Order 9981, 684
- Exeunt Murderers: The Best Mysteries of Anthony Boucher*, 627
- Exile From a Future Time: Posthumous Poems of Sol Funaroff*, 672, 677
- Exodus, 326
- "Exodusters," 832
- Experimental Cinema*, 667
- Ezhegodnik*, 708
- F
- Fabian Socialism, 200, 580, 592
- Fabian Society, 96, 874
- "Fables of Faubus," 397
- Fabulous Furry Freak Brothers, The*, 836
- Facing Reality group, 437, 830
- Facing the Chair*, 196
- Fackel, Die*, 247, 791
- Factions, 213
- Factories, Fields and Workshops*, 46
- Facts for Women*, 364, 515
- Facts of Socialism, The*, 336
- Facts to Fight Fascism*, 656
- Faculty Committee on Human Rights in El Salvador, 432
- Fagel, Manuel, 224
- Fahrenheit 451*, 726
- Fain, Sammy, 288
- Fairchild, Henry Pratt, 529
- Fair Employment Practices (FEP), 536
- Fair Hope, 858
- Fair Play for Cuba Committee (FPCC), 169, 170, 241, 429, 440, 546, 694, 777
- Fairy Tales of Worker's Children*, 128
- Faith Activists, 430
- Faith for Living*, 519
- Fallen Angel*, 626
- False Face*, 622
- Faludi, Susan, 887
- Family Circle*, 678
- Family Limitation*, 208
- Famous Long Ago*, 445
- Fanon, Frantz, 94, 137, 547
- Faragoh, Francis, 618
- Farah Company, 471
- Farber, Sam, 350
- Far From Poland*, 559
- Farina, Dick, 750
- Farley, Alice, 508, 809
- Farm Equipment Workers, 127, 220, 814
- Farmer, Fyke, 704
- Farmer, James, 138, 650, 907
- Farmer, Joyce, 837
- Farmer, Mary Virginia, 222
- Farmer-Labor Party, 15, 127, 213-215, 222, 237, 628
- Farmer-Labor Party (Minnesota), 150
- Farmers Alliance (Populists), 12, 13
- Farmers Defender*, 16
- Farmers National Committee for Action, 15, 98
- Farmers National Weekly*, 15
- Farmers Wife, The*, 13
- Farmest*, 644
- Farm Holiday Association, 499
- Farm Labor Organizing Committee, 496
- Farm News*, 16
- Farm News Letter*, 15
- Farm Security Administration, 742
- Farrell, James T., 43, 56, 215-216, 273, 451, 516, 544, 584, 620, 638, 640, 901
- Farther Shore, The*, 624
- Fasanella, Ralph, 216
- Fashion is Spinach*, 293
- Fast, Howard (E. V. Cunningham), 216-217, 599, 625, 626, 640, 724
- Fast, Julius, 625, 626, 724
- Fat-Cat Sociology*, 783
- Father Divine, 150
- Father Hagerty's Wheel, 217-218
- Fatigue Press*, 269
- Fearing, Kenneth, 620, 639, 673
- Featherstone, Ralph, 138
- Feature Group, 604
- Federal Arts Project, Works Progress Administration, 71
- Federal Bureau of Investigation, 3, 22, 28, 62, 94, 95, 152, 218-221, 257, 293, 310, 411, 452, 459, 575, 597, 604, 631, 632, 700, 703, 739, 755, 778, 781, 846, 853, 872

- Federal Commission on Industrial Relations, 491
 Federal Emergency Relief Administration, 899
 Federal Music Project, Works Progress Administration, 738
 Federal Theater Dance Project, 222
 Federal Theater Project, Works Progress Administration, 221-222, 506, 677, 900
 Federal Writer's Project, 161, 626, 675
 Federal Writer's Project, Oklahoma, 624
 Federated Agricultural Laborers Association, 225
 Federated Farmer-Labor Party, 215
 Federated Order of Trades and Labor Unions (FOTLU), 761
 Federated Press, 27, 222-224, 344
 Federation of American Scientists, 723, 729
 Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions, 296, 483
 Federation of Russian Social Democratic Organizations of America, 708, 709
 Federazione Socialista Italiana del Nord America (FSI), 271, 389, 643
 Feds n' Heads comics, 837
 Fed Up, 269
 Feeley, Diane, 350
 Feffer, Itzhak, 644
 Feiffer, Jules, 340
 Felberbaum, Arthur, 694
 Fell of Dark, The, 621
 Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR), 133, 336, 344, 414, 526, 577, 593, 594, 595, 702, 709, 804, 907
 Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, 415
 Fellow Travelers, 224
 Feminine Mystique, The, 259, 882
 Feminism. See Social Feminism; Women's Liberation.
 Feminist Action, 588
 Feminist Press, 893
 Feminist Studies, 892
 Fenians, 385
 Fenichel, Otto, 648
 Ferber, Michel, 503
 Ferenczi, Sándor, 648
 Ferguson, Herman, 63
 Ferlinghetti, Lawrence, 77, 443, 551, 575, 577, 595
 Fernand Braudel Center, 866
 Ferrer Colony, 413
 Ferrer, José, 634
 Ferri, Enrico, 164
 Ferrini, Vincent, 552, 676
 "Festival of Life," 322, 919
 Fiaccola, La, 390
 Fiamma, La, 390
 Field, B. J., 793, 828
 Field, Frederick Vanderbilt, 22
 Field, Marshall, III, 607, 608
 Fielde, Gerald, 854
 Fielden, Samuel, 297
 Fields of Wonder, 337
 Fierro, Antonio, 388
 Fife, Darlene, 838
 Fifteenth Amendment, 689
 Fifth Estate, 47, 838
 Fight Against War and Fascism, 31
 "Fight Fascism Abroad and K-K-K-ism at Home," 786
 Fighting Worker, 569
 Figueiredo, Eula, 631
 Figueiredo, Joe, 631
 Figures of Transition: A Study of British Literature at the End of the Nineteenth Century, 309
 Filipino Federation of Labor, 224
 Filipino Labor Union (FLU), 225
 Filipinos, 224-226
 Filipino Unemployed Association, 224
 Film and Photo League, 604
 Film Comment, 559
 Film Front, 667
 Film in the Battle of Ideas, 435
 Film: The Creative Process, 435
 Finale of Seen: A Lyrical Narrative, 679
 Finally Got the News, 438
 Fincke, William, 526
 Fine Clothes to the Jew, 336
 Fine Old Conflict, A, 503
 Finger, Barry, 556
 Finian's Rainbow, 288
 Finkel, David, 350
 Finkelstein, Moses I., 728
 Finkelstein, Sidney, 397, 470, 618
 Finley, Moses, 141
 Finnegan, Robert, 656
 Finnish-American League for Democracy, 227
 Finnish Americans, 149, 226-227
 Finnish Socialist Federation, 226
 Finnish Workers Federation, 227
 Firebrand, 244
 Firehouse Theater, 615
 Fire on the Mountain, 553
 Firesign Theatre, 341
 Firestone, Shulamith, 886
 Fire Testament, 677
 First Amendment Foundation, 873
 First American Artists Congress, 71
 First International, 315, 385, 795, 867
 First Love, 673
 First Radical Humor Festival, 341
 First to Awaken: A Novel of the Year 2040, The, 724
 First United Spanish Methodist Church, New York City, 923
 "First Wave" of feminism, 882
 First Will and Testament, 674
 First Wounds: A Story in Five Chapters of Verse, 677
 Fiscal Crisis of the State, The, 614
 Fischer, Adolph, 297, 379
 Fischer, Ernst, 375
 Fischer, Marjorie, 626, 724
 Fish Committee, 330
 Fisher, Louis, 765
 Fisherman and Allied Workers Union, 374, 814
 Fishermen, The, 845
 Fitzgerald, A. J., 853
 Fitzgerald, F. Scott, 509
 Fitzpatrick, John, 126, 213, 215, 824
 Fitzsimmons, Frank, 367
 Flacks, Richard, 545, 783, 784
 Flanagan, Hallie, 221, 222
 Flashlights of the Amsterdam Conference, 734
 Flaxer, Abram, 649, 650
 Fleming, D. E., 144, 145
 Flesh of Utopia, The, 678
 Fletcher, Ben, 357
 Florence Crittenton Mission, 570
 Flores Magón, Enrique, 518
 Flores Magón, Ricardo, 227-229, 606
 Flóres, Juan, 491
 Flowering Peach, The, 568
 Flying Fish Records, 233
 Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley, 27, 82, 98, 151, 159, 176, 209, 229-230, 271, 290, 357, 358, 386, 434, 494, 539, 587, 590, 698, 756, 757
 Flynn, Fred, 229
 Flynn, Kathie, 229
 Folk Music, 1930s-1960s, 230-232, 595
 Folk Music, 1970s-1990s, 232-234
 Fonda, Jane, 295, 326, 438
 Foner, Eric, 41
 Foner, Philip Sheldon, 40, 234, 375
 Food, Tobacco, Agricultural, and Allied Workers (FTA), 193, 234-235, 460, 814
 Food and Tobacco Union, 127
 Food protests, 235-237
 For a Labor Party, 423
 Force (music album), 398
 Forces in American Criticism, 448
 Ford, Arnold, 396
 Ford, Earl C., 810
 Ford, James, 37, 87, 912
 Ford, Patrick, 385
 Ford, Robert, 442
 Ford Massacre, 850
 Ford Massacre, The, 666
 Foreign Affairs, 144
 Foreman, Carl, 618
 Foreman, Clark, 529
 Foreman, James, 138, 438
 Forerunner, 270
 For My People, 674
 For Neruda, for Chile: An International Anthology, 679
 Forrest, Katherine V., 627
 Forsythe, Robert, 339
 Fortas, Abe, 368
 Fort Hood Forty-Three, 269
 Fortress in the Rice, 622
 Fortune Machine, The, 623
 Fortune magazine, 783
 Fortune, T. Thomas, 166
 Fort-Whitman, Lovett, 32
 42nd Parallel, The, 196, 639
 47th Street: Poems, 674
 For Us the Living, 624
 Forverts. See Jewish Daily Forward.
 Forward Association, 424
 Foster, William Z., 27, 37, 121, 149, 174, 198, 214, 223, 230, 237-238, 375, 386, 416, 515, 561, 628, 810, 820, 823, 825, 903
 Foundation of Leninism, 755
 Foundation Trilogy, 725
 Found Poems and Others, 679
 Foundry, The, 638
 Fourier, Charles, 49, 239
 Fourierism, 858
 Four Sons, 435
 Fourteenth Amendment, 689
 Fourteenth Street School, 849
 Fourth Decade and Other Poems, The, 677
 Fourth International, 121, 238-239, 829
 Fourth International (journal), 544, 777
 Fourth International Tendency, 350, 831
 Fox, Jay, 386
 Fox is Crazy, Too, The, 627
 FPL Bulletin, 667
 Fraenkel, Michael, 679
 Fraenkel, Osmond K., 368

- Fraina, Louis C. (Lewis Corey), 25, 147, 185, 239, 378, 433, 506, 765
- Francé, Raoul, 662
- Francisco Ferrer Association, 413
- Francisco Ferrer School, 413, 651
- Francisco Ferrer Social Center, 173
- Franco, Francisco, 168
- Franco-Americans, 239-240
- Franco-Prussian War, 867
- Frank, Andre Gunder, 431
- Frank, Barney, 259
- Frank, Jerome, 368
- Frank, Robert, 604
- Frank, Waldo, 43, 240-241, 273, 740
- Frankenstein, 615
- Frankfurt Land Company, 606
- Frankfurt School, 49, 248, 603, 617
- Frankfurter, Felix, 21
- Franklin, Benjamin, 540
- Franklin Street Theater, 615
- Franz von Sickingen, 184
- "Fraternidad universal," 228
- Frauen und Mädchenbund*, 281
- Frau und der Sozialismus*, 141, 183, 270, 796, 87
- Frazier, Dick, 831
- Frazier, E. Franklin, 529, 724
- Free Beaches Sun*, 539
- Freed, Donald, 705
- Freed, Emil, 698
- Freedman, Blanche, 417
- Freedom House, 773
- Freedom Morning*, 97
- Freedom Now Party, 437
- Freedom of Information Act, 221, 332, 873
- Freedom Rides, 134, 709
- Freedom Road Socialist Organization, 475
- Freedom Road*, 217
- Freedom Schools, 802
- Freedom Socialist Party, 831
- Freedom Summer, 1964, 322
- Freedom*, 201, 241, 287, 582, 588
- Freedom's Journal*, 752
- Freedomways*, 201, 241-242, 678
- Free Hindustan*, 351
- Free-Lance Palibearers*, 553
- Free love, 47, 242-244, 894
- Freeman, Joseph, 43, 406, 447, 554, 648
- Freeman, Roland, 606
- Free Society*, 244
- Free Society Group, Chicago, 792
- Free Speech League, 848
- Free speech movement at Berkeley, California, 190, 244-245
- Free Spirits: Annals of the Insurgent Imagination*, 77, 809
- Free Thinkers' Convention, 246
- Free thought, 246
- Free Trade Union Committee (FTUC), 463
- Free Trade Union News*, 463.
- Free Union: A One-Act Drama of "Free Love," A*, 479
- Free Voice of Labor: The Jewish Anarchists*, 558
- Freie Arbeiter Shtimme*, 46, 183, 246-247, 372, 702, 703, 793, 913, 915
- Freidenker-Verein*, 247, 248
- Freie deutsche Schulen*, 59
- Freie Gemeinden und Freidenker*, 247-248
- Freiheit*, Die, 45, 517
- Freiheit Gezangs Farain* (FGF), 404, 405
- Freiligrath, Ferdinand, 465
- Freind*, Der, 405
- Freire, Paulo, 205-206
- French Communist Party, 807
- French general strike of 1968, 750
- French, Marilyn, 887
- French Turn, 568
- Freneau, Philip, 609
- Frente Autentico Trabajo* (FAT), 854
- Fresno Labor League, 395
- Fresno Local 66, Industrial Workers of the World, 228
- Freud*, 325
- Freud, Sigmund, 256, 584, 645, 647, 648
- Frey, William, 707
- Fríaneza, Jorge, 225
- Frick, Henry Clay, 46, 84, 274
- Fried, Emmuel J., 616
- Friedan, Betty, 259, 882, 883
- Friend, Robert, 678
- Friends of Freedom for India, 352
- Friends of New Russia, 147
- Friends of Soviet Russia, 36
- Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, 2
- Friends of the Filipino People (FFP), 225
- Friends of the Russian Revolution, The, 147
- Friends of the Soviet Union (FOSU), 241, 591
- Friends of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, 244
- Friends of Workers' Spain, 793
- Friesen, Gordon, 749
- Fraines, John, 294
- From Dragon's Teeth*, 749
- From Fireside to Factory*, 447
- From Hegel to Marx*, 329, 602
- From Here To Eternity*, 640
- Fromm, Erich, 248-249, 595, 603, 783
- From Marx to Lenin*, 314
- From the Belly of the Shark*, 679
- From the Kingdom of Necessity*, 673
- From the Sea to the Jungle*, 623
- Front*, The, 325, 673, 847
- Front groups, 249
- "Frontier" (dance), 504
- Frontiers, 892
- Frontline, 475
- Frontpage, 530
- Frumkin, Gene, 678
- Fuchs, Klaus, 703, 706
- Fuerzas Armadas de Liberación Nacional* (FALN), 66
- Fugs, The, 340
- Full Metal Jacket*, 326
- Funaroff, Sol, 672
- Functions of Social Conflict*, The, 783
- Fund for Open Information and Accountability (FOIA), 705
- Fun-House*, The, 725
- Funk*, 644
- Fuoco*, Il, 272
- Fur and Leather Workers, 249-251, 285, 813, 814
- Furstadt, Louie, 176, 340
- Furuseth, Andrew, 716
- Fuss, Oscar, 459
- Futurians, 251
- G
- Gabriel's Conspiracy (Virginia), 752
- Gage, Frances Dana, 832
- Gage, Matilda Joslyn, 246
- Galena Guide, 17
- Galesburg Labor News*, 717
- Galleani, Luigi, 5, 6, 46, 253-254, 390, 588-589, 691, 713
- Galleria de la Raza, 525
- Galut*, 780
- Gamson, Annabelle, 503
- Gandhi, Mahatma, 136, 186, 594
- "Gang of Four," 474
- Gannes, Harry, 494
- Gannett, Lewis, 26
- Gans, Herbert, 619
- Garbage*, 557
- Garden is Political*, The, 676
- Gardner, Fred, 268
- Garfield, John, 325
- Garland, Hamlin, 334
- Garland Fund. See American Fund for Public Service.
- Garlin, Sender, 174, 903
- Garman, Betty, 137
- Garnet, Henry Highland, 752
- Garofalo, Frank, 828
- Garon, Paul, 808
- Garrison, William Lloyd, 657, 658, 689, 752
- Garson, Barbara, 341, 616, 773
- Garvey, Marcus, 7, 138, 167, 200, 291, 341, 489, 512, 616, 683, 773, 870
- Garveyism, 447
- Gary, Joseph E., 297
- Gary Schools*, The, 101
- Garza, Catarino, 492
- Gastonia Strike, 27, 254-256, 492, 622, 625
- Gates, John, 177, 230, 755
- Gates*, The, 674
- Gates of Ivory*, the Gates of Horn, The, 487, 724
- Gathering Storm: A Story of the Black Belt*, 255
- Gathering Wave*, The, 678
- Gathings, Lucy, 581
- Gay Activist Alliance (GAA), 260
- Gay and Lesbian Alliance against Discrimination, 261
- Gay Comix*, 837
- "Gay is Good," 260
- Gay/lesbian liberation movement, 256-263
- Gay Liberation Front, 798
- Gay Men's Health Crisis, 262
- Gay Pride marches, 256
- Gay Purr-ee*, 288
- Gebert, Boleslaw "Billy," 35, 611, 612
- Geddes, Patrick, 518
- Geer, Will, 846
- Geerdes, Clay, 837
- Geier, Joel, 348, 349, 350
- Geins, Vladimir Konstantinovich, 707
- Geissler, Ludwig, 81
- Gelbart, Larry, 341, 619
- Gelber, Jack, 615
- Gelders, Joseph, 87, 789
- Gelhorn, Walter, 368
- Gellert, Hugo, 23, 263-264, 343, 447, 555
- Gellert, Lawrence, 222
- Gellhorn, Martha, 3
- General Construction Workers Bulletin*, 816
- General Council (First International, American Section), 383
- General Council of Shoe Workers, 746
- General Died at Dawn*, The, 568
- General Intelligence Section, Federal Bureau of Investigation, 219
- General Motors, 407

- General of the Jungle, The*, 640
 General strike, 264
 General Strike History Committee, Seattle, Washington, 733 General Union of Jewish Workers, 403
General Zapped an Angel, The, 724
Generations of Noah Eden, The, 671
Generous Heart, The, 620
Genesis, 675
 Genet, Jean, 909
Genius of Universal Emancipation, 657
 Genovese, Eugene, 41
Gentlewoman, 435
 Georgakas, Dan, 551
 George, Harrison, 363
 George, Henry, 101, 183, 199, 264-266, 267, 378, 385, 423, 482, 520 720, 762
 George Washington Battalion, 2
 George Washington Brigade, 303
 George Washington Carver School, 675
Georgia Straight, 838
Geraniums in My Window, 622
 Gerard, Ralph, 728
 German Americans, 266-268
 German Assembly Rooms, New York City, 465
 German Communist Party, 256
 German Social Democratic Party, 199
 German Socialist Federation, 458, 459
Germe, Il, 826
 Germer, Adolph, 380, 851, 856
Germinal, 240
Gems of Mind in Plants, 662
 Gernreich, Rudi, 293
 Gerth, Hans, 783, 805
 Gessner, Robert, 673
Gestalt Therapy, 275
Gezangs Farein, Chicago, 405
Ghadar, 351-352
 Ghadar Party, 351, 352
 Ghana, 10, 201
 Ghent, William J., 378, 685
 GI Bill, 922
 GI Coffee House Movement, 268-269
 Giardina, Denise, 553
 Giganti, Joseph, 126
 Gilbert, Ronnie, 749
 Gilden, K. B., 552
 Giles, Barbara, 470
 Gilligan, Carol, 886
 Gillespie, Dizzy, 396
 Gilman, Charlotte Perkins, 82, 167, 183, 269-271, 364, 609, 724
 Gilmartin, Aron S., 897
 Gilpin, DeWitt, 494
 Ginsberg, Allan, 77-78, 259, 443, 548, 577
 Gintis, Herbert, 206, 614
 Giovanni, Nikki, 242
 Giovannitti, Arturo, 271-272, 389, 434, 505, 518, 610, 826
Girl, The, 441
 Giroux, Henry, 206
 Gitlin, Todd, 443, 551, 783
 Gitlow, Ben, 27
 Glaberman, Martin, 393, 437, 783
 Glackens William, 70
 Gladstein, Richard, 698
 Glaspell, Susan, 670
Glas Radnika, 166
Glass Key, The, 287
Glass Mountain, The, 677
Glass Room, The, 626
 Glazer, Joe, 234, 363, 816
 Gleason, Arthur, 898
Glimpse of Fifty Years, 873
 Glintenkamp, Henry, 23
 Global Village, 559
Glos Ludowy, 565, 611
 Glumac, Jurisic, 166
 Goaziou, Louis, 240
God and the State, 92, 832
 Goddess worship, 886
 Godoff, Elliott, 454
 Goetz, George, 508
 Goetz, William, 850
 Goetz Gallery, 525
Go for the Body, 624
Going Away, 552
Going Down Fast, 552
Gold Diggers of 1937, 288
 Gold, Ben, 249, 813
 Gold, Harry, 703, 705
 Gold, Michael, 43, 56, 176, 231, 255, 271, 272-273, 309, 406, 435, 447, 448, 494, 505, 554, 620, 638, 671, 672, 673, 738, 746, 903
 Goldbeck, Eva, 97
 Goldberg, Harvey, 209
 Goldberg, Itche, 402
Goldbergs, The, 340
 Goldblatt, Louis, 327, 328, 374
Golden Book of American Friendship with the Soviet Union, 37
Golden Box, The, 623
Golden Boy, 568
Golden Day, The, 519
Golden Nightmare, The, 620
 Golden Rule Hall, 466
 Golden, Clinton, 27
 Golden, Helen, 387
 Golden, John, 434
 Goldfarb, Max, 404
 Goldfield, Nevada, miners' strike, 357
 Goldman, Albert, 754, 830
 Goldman, Emma, 46, 90, 172, 183, 228, 240, 243, 246, 257, 273-275, 280, 441, 448, 465, 518, 588, 601, 612, 647, 695, 703, 827, 879
 Goldman, Wendy, 210
 Goldmark, Rubin, 161
 Goldner, Sanford, 461
Goldsborough, 639
 Goldstein, Alvin H., 705
 Goldwater, Barry, 547
Goldwater Coloring Book, 908
 Goldwyn, Samuel, 580
Golos Truda, 709
 Golzio, Carrie, 590
 Gómez, Manuel, 672
 Gompers, Samuel, 118, 127, 142, 198, 365, 378, 382, 411, 483, 490, 491, 593, 734, 748, 761, 763, 775, 903, 904
Gone to Soldier, 552
 Gonick, Larry, 837
 Gonzales, Jose, 525
 Gonzalez, Juan, 923
 González, Rodolfo "Corky," 493
Good Fight, The, 558
 Good Life Center, 542
 Goodman, Ethel, 786
 Goodman, Mitchell, 503
 Goodman, Paul, 186, 275-276, 443, 547, 577, 596, 646, 858
 Goodman, Percival, 275
 Goodman, Steve, 232
Good Morning, 338, 919
Good Morning America, 717
Good Times, 619
Goose Step, The, 749
 Gorbachev, Mikhail, 149, 155, 286
 Gordin, Jakob, 914
 Gordon, Don, 676
 Gordon, June, 208
 Gordon, Lewis, 603, 872
 Gordon, Max, 177
 Gore, Quentin P., 789
 Gori, Pietro, 587, 588
 Gorky, Maxim, 167, 560, 877
 Gorman, Patrick, 250
 Gorman, Tom, 818
 Gorney, Jay, 288
Gornas Blancas, Las, 491
 Gorter, Herman, 162
 Gorz, André, 896
 "Gospel of the Cosmos," 796
Go Tell the Spartans, 326
 Gough, Lloyd, 325
 Gould, Jay, 418
 Gould, Stephen Jay, 723
 Gouldner, Alvin, 783
Government, The, 639
Government by Judiciary, 100
 Grace, Parky, 122
 Grace, Ross, 122
 Graham, Barney, 309
 Graham, Marcus, 611
 Graham, Martha, 503, 504, 616
 Graham, Shirley, 201, 241, 242, 591
 Grailton, James, 386, 655
 Gramsci, Antonio, 190, 320, 375
Grand Design, 196
 Grandinetti, Emilio, 21
 Grand Revolutionary Alliance of Chinese Workers and Peasants, 129
 Grange, The (Patrons of Husbandry), 12
 Granich, Irwin, 447
Granma, 169
 Grant, Lee, 324, 325
 Grant, Margaret, 48
 Graul, Rosa, 48
 Gray, Eula, 276, 743
 Gray, Jesse, 697
 Gray, Laura, 340
 Gray, Ralph, 276, 743
 Gray, Tommy, 743
Great American Fortunes, 40
Great Circle, 623
Great Day Coming: A Memoir of the 1930s, 621
Great Evasion, The, 876
Great Madness, The, 541, 685
 "Great Rebellion" of 1967, 437
Great Road: The Life and Times of Chu Teh, 754
Great Speckled Bird, 838
Great Swindle, The, 845
Great Tradition: An Interpretation of American Literature since the Civil War, 309, 449, 749
 Grebanier, Bernard, 687
 Greece, 140
 Greek Americans, 276-277, 595
 Greeley, Horace, 858
 Green, Abner, 24
 Green, Gil, 150, 155, 277-278, 755, 921
 Green, Justin, 837
 Green, Robert, 808
 Green, William, 32, 365, 415, 530
 Greenback Labor Party, 130, 278, 423, 761
 Greenberg, Eliezer, 333
 Greenberg, Samuel, 610
 Greenburg, Clement, 584
 Green Corn Rebellion, 14
 Greene, Nathan, 368
 Greene, William B., 832

- Greenglass, David, 703, 706
 Greenglass, Ruth, 704, 706
Green Hippie, 665
 Green movement, 99
 Greenpeace, 50, 578, 665
 Greenpoint Settlement, 573
 Greensboro Massacre, 278-279
Green Wave, The, 674
 Greenwich House Settlement, 573
 Greenwich Village, 279-281, 289
 Greenwood, Marianne, 523
 Gregory, Dick, 341
 Gregory, Horace, 406, 673
 Gregory, Roberta, 837
 Greie-Cramer, Johanna, 281
 Grenell, Judson, 418
 Grennard, Elinor, 461
 Gresham, William Lindsay, 621
Grido degli Oppressi, Il, 587
 Griffin, Susan, 886
 Griffith, Bill, 341, 837
 Griffith, Nancy, 233
Grifters, The, 624
 Griggs, E. Sutton, 93
 Grimké, Angelina, 658
 Grimké, Sarah, 658
 Groening, Matt, 341
 Groman, George L., 551
 Gronlund, Laurence, 682, 762, 903
 Gropper, William, 23, 30, 70, 281-282, 339, 406, 447, 555, 849
 Grossman, Josephine Juliet, 726
 Grossman, Rudolph, 589
 Grossman, Sid, 604
 Grossmann, Henryk, 163
 Groth, John, 31
 Grottkau, Paul, 267
 Group Theater, 435, 568, 616, 900
 Groves, Leslie R., 706
Growing Up Absurd, 46, 275, 547
Groysser Kibitzer, 282
Groysser Kunden, 282-283, 339, 509
 Grundfest, Dr. Harry, 38
Grundrisse, The, 51
 Grunzing, Julius, 560
 Guabello, Antonio, 588
Guardian. See National Guardian.
 Guatemala, 429, 563
 Guatemalan Scholars Network, 432
 Guevara, Che, 77, 137, 398, 683
Guild Reporter, 223
 Guinier, Ewart, 39
Guitar Player, 750
 Gundlach, Ralph, 646
Gunga Din, 324
 Gunther, Blair, 35, 36
 Guthrie, Arlo, 232
 Guthrie, Woody, 176, 231, 234, 283-284, 340, 738, 869
 Gutiérrez, José Angel, 493
 Gutman, Herbert, 40
 Gut Theater, 615
- ## H
- Habanero, El*, 168
 Haber, Al, 82
 Haber, Robert, 294
 Habermas, Jürgen, 320
 Habima, 68
Habonim, 780
 Haden, Charlie, 398
 Haeberle, Ron, 605
 Haackel, Ernst, 664
 Haessler, Carl, 223
 Hagerty, Thomas J., 356, 360, 386
 Hägglund, Joel Emmanuel, 310
 Hague, Frank, 821, 897
 Hague Congress (1872), 383, 867
Hail, American Development, 677
Hairenik, 68
 Haitian Rebellion, 752
 Haitians, 285
 Hakim, Eleanor, 805
 Haldane, J. B. S., 724
 Haldeman-Julius, Emanuel, 57, 160, 246, 451
 Hale, Edward Everett, 80
 Hale, Hope, 621
Half a Man: The Status of the Negro in New York, 573
Half-Eaten Angel, The, 678
 Hall, Bolton, 202
 Hall, Burton, 556
 Hall, Covington, 357, 610
 Hall, Gertrude, 167
 Hall, Gus, 155, 179, 285-286, 375, 755
 Hall, Jack, 291, 292, 374
 Hall, Robert Fowler, 87, 789
 Hall, Sam, 88, 789
 Hallinan, Vincent, 636
 Halpern, Moshe Leib, 915
 Halper, Albert, 638
 Halstead, Fred, 778
 Hamer, Fanny Lou, 310
 Hamilton, Alice, 303
 Hamitic League of the World, 166, 167
 Hamlin, Mike, 437, 438
Hammer, Der, 405, 509, 643, 644, 916
 Hammett, Dashiell, 134, 286-287, 306, 622, 869
 Hampton, Fred, 63, 95
 Hampton, Rupert, 309
Hand Over Fist, 553
 Hanford, Ben, 378
 Handy, W. C., 395
Hanging on Union Square, 675
Hang-Up, 623
 Hanisch, Carol, 884
 Hansberry, Lorraine, 241, 242, 287-288
Hansberry v. Lee, 287
 Hansen, Joseph, 716, 777, 778
 Hanson, Ern, 360
 Hapgood, Hutchins, 173, 280, 670
 Harap, Louis, 402
Harbor, The, 670
 Harburg, Edgar Y., 288-289
 Harburg Foundation, 289
Harder They Come, The, 871
 Harding, Timothy, 431
 Harding, Vincent, 242
 Hardman, J. B. S., 42, 404
 Hardy, George, 358
Harlan County, U.S.A., 558, 84
Harlem Document, The, 604
Harlem Liberator, 179
Harlem Quarterly, 678
 Harlem Renaissance, 9, 58, 684
Harlem Sketches, 666
 Harlem Suitcase Theatre, 337, 591
 Harlem Tenants League, 696
 Harlem Writers Club, 676, 678
 Harley, Harrison, 646
 Harman, Moses, 242, 246, 466
 Harmon Foundation, 912
 Harmony Society, 606, 607
Harp, 386
Harper's, 489
 Harriman, Job, 117, 118, 452, 453, 490, 491
 Harrington, Michael, 123, 136, 289-290, 443, 544, 555-556, 742, 772, 773, 830, 901, 925
 Harrington, Ollie, 341
 Harris, Abram, 684
 Harris, Frank, 518
 Harris, Lem, 15
 Harris, Zellig, 130
 Harrison, Caleb, 765
 Harrison, Carter, 296, 297
 Harrison, Hubert H., 7, 93, 290-291, 488
 Harry Alan Potamkin Film School, 667
 Hart, Hsie, 744
 Hart, Moss, 900
 Hart-Cellar Act (1965), 871
 Hartford, John, 233
 Hartley, Marsden, 70
 Hartmann, George W., 645
 Hartmann, Sadakichi, 48
Hart to Hart, 325
 Hartz, Louis, 25
 Harvard Russian Research Center, 783
 Harvard Teachers Union, 482
 Harvard University, 715
Hashomer Hatzair, 779, 780, 781
Haskalah, 404
 Haskell, Burnette G., 45, 92, 117, 319, 716
 Hass, Eric, 766
 Hatch, Connie, 606
 Hatcher, Richard, 293, 309
Hate, 837
 Hathaway, Clarence, 175, 176
 Haufrecht, Herbert, 157
Haunch, Paunch, and Jowl, 671
 Hauptmann, Georg, 274
 Havel, Hippolyte, 518
 Hawaii, 291-292
 Hawaii Communist Party, 292
 Hawes, Elizabeth, 293, 309
Hawk and the Lizard, The, 678
 Hawkins, Augustus, 460
 Hawkins, Octavia, 537
 Hawthorne, Julian, 796
 Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 482
 Hay, Harry, 257
 Hayakawa, Sessue, 549
 Hayden, Casey, 137, 443, 884
 Hayden, Robert, 675
 Hayden, Tom, 57, 293-295, 522, 546, 582, 683, 805
 Hayes, Alfred, 157, 162, 312, 363, 640, 674
 Hayes, Max S., 142, 214, 378, 423
 Haymarket Incident, 80, 182, 256, 296-297, 334, 484, 582, 694, 791
 Haymarket martyrs, 301
 Hays, Lee, 231, 738, 739, 749
 Hayward, Harry, 32, 93, 297-298, 299, 488, 921
 Haywood, William D., 121, 124, 190, 246, 271, 290, 298-300, 313, 356, 358, 369, 376, 434, 490, 590, 735, 768
Hazard of New Fortunes, A, 334, 669
 Head, Robert, 838
Head-Fixing Industry, The, 126, 414
 Healer, Carl, 698
 Healey, Dorothy, 119, 155, 300, 461
Health and Hygiene, 304, 305, 645
 Health Law Project, Philadelphia, 305
 Health Left, 300-306
Health/TAC journal (policy advisory center), 305
Hearings regarding Communist Espionage in the United States, 316
 Hearst, Patty, 64
 Hearst, William Randolph, 386

- Hear the Wind Blow: Poems of Protest and Prophecy*, 678
- Heart of Spain*, 668
- Heart of the Beast, 616
- Heart's Desire*, 623
- Heart-Shape in the Dust*, 675
- Heat's On, The*, 626
- Hebrew Actors Union, 68
- Hebrew Educational Society, 721
- Hecht, Ben, 173, 324
- Hecht, Selig, 728
- Hecker, Friedrich, 790
- Hector, Tim, 872
- Hedley, Leslie Woolf, 551
- Heed the Thunder*, 624
- Hegel, G. W. F., 478, 518
- Heidegger, Martin, 478
- Heilbrun, Carolyn, 886
- Heimin, 395
- Heine, Heinrich, 197, 518
- Heinzen, Karl, 248, 790
- Heisler, Francis, 897
- Helen*, 626
- Helen Harlow's Vow*, 48
- Helicon Hall Home Colony, 748
- Helios*, 141
- Helleno-Amerikaniko Vima*, 276
- Hellerman, Fred, 749
- Hellman, Lillian, 3, 134, 306-307, 326, 516, 634
- Hell of a Woman, A*, 624
- Hell's Kitchen*, 622
- Helms-Burton Act, 171
- Help!*, 341
- Helstein, Ralph, 578, 579
- Hemingway, Ernest, 3, 273, 555, 637
- Henderson, Donald, 235, 788
- Hendrickson, Martin, 226
- Hendrix, Jimmy, 858
- Henkelman, William, 361
- Hennacy, Ammon, 123
- Henri, Robert, 70, 173, 274, 282
- Henry, Jules, 783
- Henry Street Settlement, 412
- Hentoff, Nat, 443
- Hepburn, Katherine, 340, 428
- He Ran All the Way Home*, 623
- Herberg, Will, 372, 462, 463
- Herbst, Josephine, 307-308, 555, 638, 905
- Here and Now*, 677
- Here I Stand*, 700
- Heresies*, 261
- Heresy, Yes—Conspiracy, No*, 329
- "Heretic" (dance), 504
- Herland*, 270, 724
- Herman, James, 374, 538
- Hermand, Jost, 210
- Hernandez, Aileen, 883
- Herdon case, 179, 308, 368, 369
- Herrera, Juan José, 491
- Herriman, George, 173
- Herrmann, John, 307
- Herron, George D., 132, 685, 748
- Herskovits, Melville, 10
- Herskovits Prize, 10
- Heterodoxy Club, 863, 882
- Heumann, Judy, 190
- Hewitt, Abram, 265, 520
- Hewitt, Fred, 223,
- Heym, Stefan, 639
- Heywood, Angela Tilton, 308
- Heywood, Ezra, 243, 246, 308
- Hibru*, 671
- Hicks, Granville, 43, 273, 308-309, 406, 449, 555, 724, 749
- Hidden Heritage, The*, 435
- Hidden History of the Korean War, The*, 144, 511, 798
- Higginson, Thomas Wentworth, 81, 364
- Highlander Folk School, 87, 137, 195, 330, 674, 785, 803, 807
- Highlander Research and Education Center, 309-310
- High school student strike "blowouts," 493
- Hightower, Jim, 16
- High Treason Affair, 395
- Hilda's Home*, 48
- Hill, Abram, 623
- Hill, Herbert, 373, 556
- Hill, Joe, 208, 246, 310-313, 362, 610
- Hill, Lewis, 575, 576
- Hillman, Sidney, 4, 21, 22, 27, 116, 143, 185, 192, 272, 372, 403, 593, 770, 847,
- Hillquit, Morris, 20, 313-314, 299, 387, 403, 521, 593, 683, 685, 708, 735, 741, 770, 927
- Hillsboro Relief Scandal*, 666
- Himes, Chester, 626, 638, 909
- Hinkle, Warren, III, 682
- Hindu Association of the Pacific Coast, 351
- Hine, Lewis, 69, 604, 667
- Hinton, Richard Josiah, 314-315
- Hirschfeld, Magnus, 256
- Hispanic American Report*, 431
- Hiss Case, 153, 315-318, 486, 735
- Hiss, Alger, 54, 220, 315-318, 368, 529, 530
- Hiss, Donald, 316
- Historical materialism, 318-321
- History and Class Consciousness*, 478
- History of Black Americans*, 234
- History of Cuba and Its Relations with the United States*, A, 234
- History of Ethnological Theory*, 515
- History of Socialism*, 428
- History of Socialism in the United States, The*, 313-314
- History of Socialist Thought, The*, 428
- History of the American Working Class, The*, 40
- History of the Communist Party of the United States*, 375, 515
- History of the Great American Fortunes*, 125
- History of the Labor Movement in the United States*, 234, 375
- History of the Negro People*, 375
- History of the Working Class Movement*, 86
- Hitchcock, George, 678
- Hitler, Adolf, 800
- Hitler-Stalin Pact, 23, 55, 69, 151, 176, 273, 321-322, 460, 594, 624, 642, 645, 816, 915, 922,
- Hitti, Philip, 58
- Hoan, Daniel, 498, 499, 522
- Hobsbawm, Eric, 491
- Hobson, Chris, 349
- Ho Chi Minh, 297, 783
- Hochschild, Adam, 683
- Hoffa, James, Jr., 367
- Hoffman, Abbie, 78, 294, 322-323, 548, 918, 919
- Hofstadter, Richard, 25
- Hogan's Heroes*, 340
- Hold with the Hares*, 623
- Holiday*, 241
- Hollander, Nicole, 341
- Holley, Marietta, 338
- Hollins, Jess, 369
- Hollow Men, The*, 273
- Hollywood Anti-Nazi League, 328, 580
- Hollywood Blacklist, 323-327
- Hollywood Film Council, 846
- Hollywood Hallucination, The*, 618
- Hollywood Left, 327-329
- Hollywood Quarterly*, 618
- Hollywood studio strikes, 1930s, 698
- Hollywood Ten, 428, 435, 530, 698
- Holman, Nat, 921
- Holmes, Lizzie, 582
- Holmes, Sherlock, 286
- Home Club, 383, 419
- Home Colony, 244, 858
- Homestead Act, 12
- Homestead Steel Strike, 354, 763
- Home to Harlem*, 488, 671
- Honey and Salt*, 717
- Honolulu Record*, 292
- Hood, William R., 537
- Hook, Sidney, 42, 188, 516, 584, 602, 648, 329-330
- hooks, bell, 888
- Hooray for What!*, 288
- Hootenannies, 868
- Hootenanny*, 739
- Hootenanny Records, 749
- Hoover, Herbert, 876
- Hoover, J. Edgar, 219, 411, 576, 692, 714, 755, 756, 870, 876,
- Hoover Institute, 463
- Hopkins, Prynce/Prince, 365, 645
- Hopkins, Terence K., 866
- Horizon*, 623
- Horizons of Death*, 673
- Horkheimer, Max, 603, 617, 648, 783
- Horne, Lena, 288
- Horowitz, David, 683
- Horowitz, Irving Louis, 783
- Horthy, Miklos, 343
- Horton, Lester, 507
- Horton, Myles, 309, 330
- Hospital, The*, 620, 674
- Hostos Community College, 653
- Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana*, 677
- Hotel Berlin*, 325
- Houdini, The Man Who Walked Through Walls*, 621
- Hour After Westerly, The*, 624
- Hourwich, Isaac, 708
- House and Senate Select Committees on Intelligence, 221
- House Committee on Internal Security, 332
- House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC), 4, 38, 97, 134, 282, 287, 330-332, 316, 323, 324, 329, 344, 486, 532-533, 568, 616, 730, 739, 748, 785, 872, 876, 890
- House I Live In, The*, 701
- House of Bondage*, 670
- House of Morgan, The*, 239
- Houses and House-Life of the American Aborigines*, 513
- Houses of Hospitality, 46, 123
- Houston, Cisco, 231
- Houston, Robert, 553
- Howard, Charles P., 378
- Howard, Ebenezer, 518
- Howard, Milton, 469, 555
- Howat, Alexander, 824
- Howe, Ed, 334
- Howe, Florence, 893
- Howe, Irving, 191-192, 332-333, 440, 449, 482, 544, 742, 830, 901, 916
- Howe, Julia Ward, 609
- Howells, William Dean, 78, 333-334, 669, 670

- Howl, 77
 Howland, Marie, 669
How Long Brethren, 222
How She Died, 552
How the Gods Were Made, 414
How the Other Half Lives: Studies among the Tenements of New York, 604
 Hubbard, Lester C., 125
 Huberman, Leo, 144, 170, 510, 658, 668
 Huck, Gary, 854
 Hudson, Hosea, 334-335, 375
 Huerta, Delores, 455
Hugger-Mugger in the Louvre, 625
 Huggins, Roy 624-625
 Hughan, Jessie Wallace, 335-336
 Hughes, Langston, 56, 157, 336-337, 340, 381, 555, 590, 591, 640, 674, 786
 Hughes, Revella, 396
 Hugo, Victor, 179
 Huhta, Matt Valentine (T-Bone Slim), 816
 Huiswood, Otto, 378
 Hull House, 412, 732
Hull House Maps and Papers, 412
 Humane Society, 49
Humanity and Society, 781
 Human Rights Commission (Spain), 600
 Humboldt, Charles, 469
 Humor, 337-342
Humorist, Der, 283, 339
 Humphrey, Doris, 222, 503, 504
 Humphrey, Hubert, 216, 471, 549, 550, 596, 636
 Humphries, Rolfe, 676, 724
 Hunchak Party, 67, 68
 Hungarian Americans, 342-343
 Hungarian Democratic Federation, 343
 Hungarian People's Republic, 343
 Hungarian Revolution, 153, 343, 896, 901
 Hungarian Workers Clubs, 343
 Hunger marches, 840
 Hunter, Robert, 423, 581
Hunter and the Trap, The, 626
 Huntley, Florence, 48
 Hunton, W. Alphaeus, 6, 7, 8
Hurry Up Please It's Time, 293
 Hurston, Zora Neale, 590, 639
 Hurwitz, Leo, 604, 666, 667, 668
Husband, The, 622
Hustlers, The, 623
 Hutchins, Grace, 343-345, 701, 702
 Hyman, Louis, 347, 371
 Hyndman, H.M., 906
 I
I. F. Stone's Weekly, 144
I Am the American Negro, 674
I Been Thinkin' About J. C., 701
 Iberian Anarchist Federation, 792
 Ibsen, Henrik, 274, 563
I Can Get It for You Wholesale, 622
 Icarus/First Run, 559
 ICOR (Organization for Jewish Colonization in Russia), 347, 644
Idiot's First, 97
Idylls of the Poor, 670
If He Hollers, Let Him Go, 638
If You Don't Weaken, 45
"I Have a Dream," 747
I Just Wanted Someone to Know, 616
 Ikon, 261, 552
 Illinois Bureau of Labor Statistics, 412
 Illinois Factory Inspection Act, 347
Illinois Miner, 44
 Illinois Woman's Alliance, 347-348
I Looked Over Jordan and Other Stories, 553
Image of the Jew in American Literature, 402
I Married a Communist, 326
 Imatra Society, 226
 Imbrie, James, 529, 872
"Immigrant" (dance), 504
Immigrants, The, 217
 Immigration Act (1920), 692
 Immigration and Naturalization Service, 613
 Immigration Bureau, 612, 613
 Immigration History Research Center, 698
 Impact Visuals, 605
"I'm Too Old to Be a Scab," 816
In a Different Voice, 886
In a Land of Plenty, 674
In a Time of Revolution: Poems from Our Third World, 679
Incident at Oglala, 600
In Deep, 627
 Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences and Professions (ICCASP), 633, 623, 676, 730
 Independent Miners Relief Committee, 241
Independent Politics, 350
 Independent Progressive Party (California), 119
 Independent Socialist Clubs/International Socialists, 197, 348-351
 Independent Socialist League (ISL), 197, 289, 333, 772, 830, 901, 925
 Independent Socialist Party (ISP), 694
Independent Socialist, 348
 Independent Textile Union, 240
 Independent Union of All Workers (IUAW), 455
 Independent Union of Public Aid Employees (IUPAE), 650
Indian Journals, 1859-1862, 515
 Indians, 351-352
Indigo and Other Poems, 678
 Indochina Peace Campaign, 295, 597
Indochina Story, The, 73
In Dreams Begin Responsibilities, 675
 Industrial armies, 352-354
Industrialist, 226
Industrial Pioneer, 816
Industrial Power, 514
Industrial Republic, The, 748
 Industrial Socialist League, 765
Industrial Solidarity, 816
 Industrial unionism, 354-355, 407
Industrial Unionist, 766
Industrial Union News, 186
 Industrial Union Party (IUP), 765, 766
Industrial Valley, 489
Industrial Worker, 124, 361, 362, 648, 793, 816
 Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), 3, 9, 20, 53, 84, 118, 124, 130, 142, 143, 147, 160, 181, 184, 185, 186, 189, 198, 207, 208, 210, 211, 223, 225, 226, 228, 237, 240, 246, 271, 281, 282, 310, 338, 340, 342, 351, 355-359, 363, 366, 371, 373, 378, 386, 389, 390, 433, 442, 452, 457, 458, 464, 479, 487, 490, 495, 514, 542, 552, 561, 581, 582, 588, 590, 594, 610, 612, 616, 624, 640, 643, 662, 665, 673, 692, 716, 733, 734, 746, 756, 762, 764, 768, 769, 775, 792, 794, 796, 810, 814, 816, 818, 826, 827, 848, 852, 863, 869, 896, 911
 Industrial Workers of the World Cartoons, 359-362
 Industrial Workers of the World Songs, 362-363
Industry's Disinherited, 845
 Infant Cloak Makers Union, 470
 Ingalls, Joshua, 315
 Ingersoll, 451
 Ingersoll, Ralph, 607, 608
 Inglis, Agnes, 698
 Ingram, Rosa Lee, 134
Inheritance, The, 847
Injunction Granted, 221
Injunction, 676
 Inman, Mary, 363-364, 515
 Inman, Will, 551
Inner City Mother Goose, The, 678
Inner City Romance, 836
Inner City Voice, 437
"In-Plant Strategy," 897
In Praise of Learning, 435
Inquest, 705
 Institute for Policy Studies, 445
 Institute for Social Ecology, 99
 Institute for Social Therapy, 646
 Institute of Pacific Relations, 22, 72
Insurgent Mexico, 692
Insurgent Sociologist, 680, 781, 783
Insurgent, 551
Intellectual Things, 676
 Intercollegiate Socialist Society, 101, 364-365, 412, 427, 580, 581, 768, 580, 581, 768, 797, 800
Intercollegiate Socialist, 364, 427-428
 Internal Revenue Service, 310
 Internal Security Act of 1950, 331
 Internal Security Subcommittee, U.S. Senate, 783
International, The, 435
 International African Service Bureau, 393
 International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers (BSIW), 490
 International Association of Filipino Patriots, 225
 International Association of Machinists (IAM), 223, 365-367, 843
 International Association of Theatrical Stage Employees (IATSE), 327, 328, 329
 International Brigades, 673, 674
 International Brotherhood of Teamsters (IBT), 194, 367, 374, 454, 567, 650, 854
 International Colored Unity League, 291
 International Commission of Inquiry into Forced Labor, 516, 897

- International Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, 241
- International Committee for the Fourth International (ICFI), 238
- International Committee on African Affairs (ICAA), 7, 912
- International Council Correspondence*, 162, 163
- International, The*, 435
- "Internationale, L'," 157, 203, 239
- International Federation of Independent Revolutionary Artists (FIARI), 808
- International Friends of the Soviet Union, 37
- International Fur and Leather Workers, 342
- International Harvester, 582
- International Indian Treaty Council, 28
- International Industrial Union, 186-188
- Internationalist Movement (Maoist), 475
- International Jewish Peace Union, 781
- International Journal of Health Services*, 306
- International Juridical Association Bulletin*, 368, 417
- International Labor Defense (ILD), 87, 126, 148, 255, 299, 308, 335, 344, 368-370, 417, 582, 613, 730, 731, 732, 788, 897
- International Labor League of America, 463
- International Labor Union (ILU), 385, 761, 817
- International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU), 370-373, 389, 424, 459, 466, 506, 554, 600, 601, 632, 737, 744, 807
- International League of Darker Peoples, 683
- International Literature*, 676
- International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU), 291, 373-375, 460, 597, 656, 814
- International Longshoremen's Association (ILA), 373, 374, 719
- International Machinists Union, 365
- International Naturist Federation, 541
- International Order of Machinists, 570
- International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War, 304
- International Publishers, 375-376, 620, 673
- International Seaman's Union, 534, 537
- International Socialist Bureau, 570
- International Socialist Organization, 17, 350
- International Socialist Review*, 50, 99, 125, 128, 189, 299, 312, 319, 376-377, 515, 602, 610, 662, 692, 717, 768, 777
- International Socialists, 197, 367, 830, 901
- International Surrealist Exhibition, 808
- International Trade Union Educational League, 237, 823-825
- International Typographical Union (ITU), 377-379
- International Union of Carriage and Wagon Workers, 849
- International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers (IUE), 854
- International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. See Western Federation of Miners/International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers
- International Union of Revolutionary Writers, 554
- International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal and Soft Drink Workers of America, 853
- International Woman's Day, 98, 379-380
- International Woodworkers of America (IWA), 380-381
- International Workers' Conference Against War and Fascism, 98
- International Workers' Congress, 734
- International Workers Order (IWO), 19, 35, 122, 127, 149, 153, 169, 208, 227, 277, 381-382, 402, 591, 652, 698, 756, 836, 915, 917
- International Workers Order, Jewish Section. See Jewish People's Fraternal Order.
- International Workers Order, Junior Section, 926
- International Working People's Association (IWPA), 91-93, 296, 418, 581, 582, 790, 791, 894
- International Workingmen's Association (IWA), 117, 130, 315, 382-384, 892, 903
- Interne Council of America, 304
- Interseminary Movement, 801
- In the King of Prussia*, 557
- "In the Life of a Worker" (dance), 505
- In These Times*, 261, 384-385, 474, 559, 705
- In This Our World*, 609
- "Into the Streets, May First!" 162
- Invasion of Compulsory Sex-Morality, The*, 515
- Invisible Man Returns, The*, 325
- Invitation to an Inquest*, 705
- In What Hour*, 677
- In Wicked Times*, 678
- In Woman's Defense*, 363, 515
- Irish Americans, 385-387
- Irish Famine, 385
- Irish Land League, 265, 385
- Irish Land Question, The*, 265
- Irish Northern Aid, 386
- Irish Progressive League, 873
- Irish Republican Army, 386, 655
- Irish Socialist Federation, 386
- Irish Worker*, 386
- Irish Workers Clubs, 386, 655
- Irish World and American Industrial Liberator*, 385
- Iron Heel, The*, 457, 669, 724
- Iron Land: A Narrative, The*, 673
- Irons, Greg, 836
- Ironside*, 624
- Isa: A Pilgrimage*, 669
- Isaacson, Leo, 29
- Isaak, Abe, 244
- Israel Horizons*, 781
- It Ain't Me Babe*, 884
- Italian American Antifascism, 387-388
- Italian Americans, 388-390
- Italian-American Victory Council, 828
- Italian Antifascist Alliance of North America, 827
- Italian Chambers of Labor, 389
- Italian Dress Makers Union, Local 89, 272
- Italian Federation of the Socialist Party of America (IFSPA), 390-391
- Italian Labor Education Bureau, 272
- Italian Socialist Federation (FSI), 271, 390
- It Can't Happen Here*, 858
- Ithiong, Larry, 225
- I've Got the Time*, 97
- Ives, Burl, 231
- Ivy, A. C., 728
- I Was a Communist for the FBI*, 326
- I Wor Kuen, 473
- IWW: Its History, Structure and Method*, 797
- J
- Jablonski, Joseph, 808
- Jack, Hulan, 871
- Jackins, Harvey, 647
- Jackson, Andrew, 876
- Jackson, Aunt Molly, 738
- Jackson, Don, 846
- Jackson, Esther Cooper, 88, 242
- Jackson, Gardner, 415
- Jackson, George, 63, 140, 178
- Jackson, James E., 785, 787
- Jackson, Jesse, 8, 16, 140, 178, 242, 333, 384, 475, 598, 773
- Jackson, Jonathan, 178
- Jacobi, Abraham, 301
- Jacobs, Jane, 697
- Jacobs, Paul, 373
- Jacobson, Edith, 648
- Jacobson, Julius, 555, 556
- Jacobson, Phyllis, 555, 556
- Jacoby, Russell, 648
- Jaffe, Philip, 22
- Jaffe, Sam, 324, 325
- Jake Home*, 489, 638
- Jamaica Progressive League, 195
- Jamaica*, 288
- James, Burton, 222
- James, C. L. R., 6, 16, 242, 393-394, 437, 544, 603, 778, 829, 830, 870, 871, 896
- James, Henry, 131, 482
- James, Selma, 865
- James, William, 101, 199, 518
- Jameson, Fredric, 333, 449
- Janowitz, Morris, 784
- Japanese Americans, 394-395
- Japanese Workers Association, 395
- Jara, Victor, 525
- Jarrico, Paul, 618, 846
- Jarry, Alfred, 807
- Jaurès, Jean, 209, 299, 917
- Jazz, 395-398
- Jazz: A People's Culture*, 618-619
- Jazz Composers Guild, 397
- Jeanette Rankin Peace Brigade, 885
- Jeffers, Robinson, 273
- Jefferson, Thomas, 34, 876
- Jefferson School of Social Science, 287, 398-399, 405, 580, 675, 902, 903
- Jenkins, Esau, 310
- Jerome, V. J., 157, 227, 797

- Jersey Homesteads, 858
 Jessor, Herman, 19
Jesus Christ and the World Today, 344
 Jewett, Sarah Orne, 482
 Jewish Agitation Bureau of the United States and Canada, 403
 Jewish Americans, 399-401
 Jewish Book Council, 621
 Jewish Bureau, Communist Party, 68
 Jewish Clubs and Societies, 402, 916
Jewish Currents. See Jewish Life/Jewish Currents.
Jewish Daily Forward, 68, 70, 115, 116, 247, 282-283, 371, 372, 403, 424, 466, 564, 571, 691, 763, 767, 913, 914, 915, 916, 928
Jewish Daily News and Jewish Gazette, 797
 Jewish Folk Chorus, 915
Jewish Frontier, 780
 Jewish Labor Bund, 403
 Jewish Labor Committee, 404, 461, 698, 843, 905
Jewish Life/Jewish Currents, 201, 340, 401-402, 676
 Jewish National Workers Alliance, 917
 Jewish Peace Fellowship, 781
 Jewish People's Fraternal Order, 208, 402-403, 922
 Jewish Socialist Federation (JSF), 403-404, 564, 571
 Jewish Socialist Verband, 403, 404
 Jewish Teachers Seminary, 917
 Jewish Verband, 404
 Jewish Workers Choruses, 404-405
 Jewish Workers University, 405
Jews Without Money, 272, 273, 620, 638, 671
 Jiménez, Jose, 653
 Jimmie Higgins, 670, 749
 Joans, Ted, 808
 Jobless March on Washington, 710
Joe the Engineer, 553
 John Birch Society, 690
John Brown and His Men, 315
 John Brown Battery, 2
 John C. Campbell Folk School, 415
Johnny Got His Gun, 639
 John Reed Clubs, 22, 43, 70, 161, 405-406, 448, 555, 637, 645, 656, 672, 674, 675, 676, 849, 899
 Johns, Orrick, 673
 Johnson Dollinger, Genora, 407-408, 851
 Johnson, Andrew, 688
 Johnson, Clyde, 743, 744
 Johnson, Dale, 431
 Johnson, Howard, 292
 Johnson, James Weldon, 27
 Johnson, Josephine, 675
 Johnson, Kermit, 407
 Johnson, Lyndon, 547, 549, 596
 Johnson, Nelson, 279
 Johnson, Oakley C., 642
 Johnson, Olive M., 186, 406-407
 Johnson, Samuel, 33
 Johnson, Tom, 265
 Johnson-Forest Tendency, 202, 393, 394, 603
 Johnston, William, 365
John's Way, 48
 Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, 580
 Jonas, Alexander, 267, 400, 560
 Jonas, Charles, 171
 Jonas, Susanne, 431
 Jones, Christopher Columbus, 352
 Jones, Claudia, 159, 408, 539
 Jones, Ernest, 672
 Jones, J. Raymond, 871
 Jones, James, 640
 Jones, Jesse J., 132
 Jones, LeRoi. See Baraka, Amira.
 Jones, "Mother" Mary Harris, 215, 356, 408-409, 464, 570
 Jones, Paula, 888
 Jones, Spike, 809
 Jordan, June, 449
 Jordan, Joel, 350
Joseph A. Kalar: Poet of Protest, 673
 Josephson, Matthew, 647
Journal of Albion Moonlight, The, 638, 674
Journal of American History, 41
Journal of Public Health Policy, 306
 Journey of Reconciliation, 709
Journey of Simon McKeever, The, 638
 Joyce, Ed, 773
JRC Bulletin, 406
 JRC Film and Photo Group, 406
Judas Time, The, 673
Judgment Day, 215
Judgment of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, The, 705
Jump Cut, 261, 559
 Jung, Theo, 604
 Junger, Esther, 507
Jungle, The, 50, 98, 457, 620, 669, 748
 Junior Wobblies, 207, 357
Juno, 97
Justice Speaks, 85
Juxtapoz, 837
K
 Kael, Pauline, 428, 553, 575
 Kahn, Gordon, 618
 Kahn, Si, 234
 Kahn, Tom, 556
 Ka Huli'au, 292
Kaikyusen, 395
 Kaiser, Ernest, 242
 Kalar, Joseph A., 673
 Kallen, Horace, 101
 Kallet, Arthur, 305
 Kallman, Chester, 678
 Kamin, Leon, 646
 Kamrowski, Gerome, 809
 Kaneko, Kiichi, 776
 Kantorovich, Haim, 772
 Kaplan, Bruce, 233
 Kaplow, Jeffrey, 209
 Karenga, Ron, 95, 138
 Karezza, 89
Karl Marx: His Life and Work, 163, 794
Karl Marx's Theory of Revolution, 197
 Karp, Nathan, 766
 Karsavina, Jean, 128, 620
 Karsner, Rose, 777
 Katayama, Sen, 395
Katipunan ng mga Demokratikong Philipino (KDP), 225
 Katz, Michael, 206
 Katz, Rudolph, 187
 Katzman, Al, 551
 Kauai Progressive League, 291
 Kauffman, Reginald, 670
 Kaufman, Arnold, 582-583
 Kaufman, Irving R., 704
 Kaufman, Samuel H., 318
Kaufman Papers, The, 705
 Kautsky, Karl, 57, 126, 256, 313, 319
 Kaweah Colony, 117
 Kay, Clara, 831
 Kay, Helen, 128
 Kazan, Elia, 324, 326, 616, 667, 668, 900
 Kazin, Alfred, 308
 Keep America Out of War Congress, 336, 594, 772, 925
 Keller, Helen, 190, 246, 271, 411-412, 717, 879
 Kelley, Florence, 302, 412, 515
 Kelley, Harry, 518
 Kellogg, Edward, 278
 Kelly, Gene, 3
 Kelly, Gertrude, 387
 Kelly, Harry, 412-413
 Kelly, Joan, 893
 Kelly, William "Pig Iron," 412
 Kelpius, Johannes, 606, 607
 Kennan, George, 144
 Kennedy, Flo, 341
 Kennedy, John F., 289, 883
 Kennedy, Robert, 549
 Kenny, Robert W., 532, 698
 Kent, Rockwell, 38, 381, 516, 524
 Kent, William, 662
 Kent State University (1970), 420, 597
 Kenya African National Union, 7
 Kenyatta, Jomo, 393
 Keracher, John, 126, 413-414, 641, 642
 Kerouac, Jack, 77
 Kerr, Charles H., 189, 246, 362, 414, 514, 560, 662
 Kerr, Clark, 245
 Kerry, Tom, 194, 716, 717, 777
 Kester, Howard, 133, 414-415
 Key, Ellen, 879
 KFVD radio, 283
 Kharkov Congress, International Union of Revolutionary Writers (IURW), 70, 282, 406
 Kheel, Theodore, 698
 Khmer Rouge, 474
 Khrushchev, Nikita, 149, 238, 286, 300, 401, 517, 552, 564, 700
 Khrushchev revelations, 415-416, 777, 836, 901
 Kibbutz Artzi Federation, 781
 Kibre, Jeff, 327, 328
 Kilgore, Harley, 729
 Killens, John O., 242, 553
Killer Inside Me, The, 624
Kill-Off, The, 624
 Kilman, Theodore, 551
Kind and Usual Punishment: The American Prison Business, 503
 King, Carol Weiss, 368, 416-417
 King, Eleanor, 505
 King, Gordon, 417
 King, Martin Luther, Jr., 9, 63, 64, 75, 135, 193, 220, 289, 446, 443, 455, 471, 524, 577, 578, 596, 650, 683, 684, 710, 739, 773, 785, 796, 821, 847, 875, 884
 King, Mary, 546
 King, Woodie, 615
King Blood, 624
King Coal, 467, 670, 749
 Kingdom of the Prophet Matthias, 832
King in New York, A, 325
King of Paris, 625
 Kinney, Jay, 837

- Kino, 559
 Kinsbury, John, 38
 Kinsey, Alfred, 258
 Kipling, Rudyard, 560
 Kirchheimer, Otto, 164
 Kirchwey, Freda, 26, 516, 634, 905
 Kirkland, Lane, 400, 463
 Kirkpatrick, Jeane, 773
 Kitchen, Denis, 837
 Kitty Foyle, 325
 Klein, Nicholas, 128
Knickerbocker Village, 696
Knife Behind You, The, 622
 Knight, Damon, 251, 725, 551
 Knight, Etheridge, 552
 Knights of Labor, 9, 117, 168, 184, 208, 267, 268, 278, 296, 383, 385, 417-419, 448, 482, 483, 520, 581, 582, 697, 817, 818, 873
 Knights of Labor, District Assembly 49, New York City, 763 Knights of Labor, Massachusetts, 745
 Knights of Saint Crispin, 745
 Knothe, Helen, 541
Know Fish, 676
Knowledge for What?, 782
 Kobrin, Leon, 669, 914
 Koch, Howard, 618
 Kochman, Leo, 171
 Kock, Adolph, 540
 Koedt, Ann, 884
 Koehler, Robert, 69
 Koettgen, Evald, 590
 Kohn, Adolph, 906
 Kolko, Gabriel, 145, 210
 Kollontai, Alexandra, 380, 895
Komagata Maru incident, 352
Komitet Obrony Narodowej, 611
 Konikow, Antoinette Bucholz, 202, 419-420, 777
 Koolish, Elman, 667
 Koop, George, 378
 Kopkind, Andrew, 683
 Kopple, Barbara, 559, 847
 Korean War, 476, 511
 Kombluh, Joyce, 362, 616
 Kornbluth, Cyril, 251, 725, 726
 Kossuth, Lajos, 342
 Kotler, Yosef, 916
Koupos, 450
 Kourpias, George, 366
 Kova, 85
 Kovacs, Ernie, 809
 KPFA radio, 575, 575, 577
 Kracik, Anne, 197
 Kramer, Aaron, 208, 676, 677, 678
 Kramer, Charles, 316
 Kramer, Helen, 805
 Krantz, Philip, 708, 927
 Krasin, Leonid, 203
 Krassner, Paul, 340
 Kraus, Dorothy, 851
 Kraus, Henry, 698, 851
Krazy Kat, 173, 809
Kreutzer Sonata, The, 832
 Kreymborg, Alfred, 673
 Kriegel, Leonard, 250, 553
 Kristan, Etbin, 753
 Kristol, Irving, 544
 Kroll, Alex, 845
 Kromer, Tom, 638
 Kronstadt Uprising, 77, 274
 Kropotkin, Peter, 46, 77, 247, 253, 273, 413, 588, 827
 Kruse, William F., 924
 Krzycki, Leo, 35, 36, 611, 612, 771
 Ku Klux Klan, 66, 135, 278, 310, 475, 561, 875
 Kung Yu Club, San Francisco, 129
 Kunitz, Stanley, 676-677
 Kunstler, William, 420-421
 Kuntz, Charles, 347
 Kuper, Peter, 837
 Kupferberg, Tuli, 340
 Kurikka, Matti, 226
 Kuron, Jacek, 556
 Kurtz, Aaron, 678
 Kurtzman, Harvey, 176, 340, 341
 Kushner, Anita, 322
 Kushner, Sam, 600
 Kvitko, Leib, 918
- L
 Labadie, Charles Joseph Antoine ("Jo"), 317, 418, 698
Labor Action, 42, 197, 332, 340, 830, 901
Labor Age, 364-365, 645, 770
Labor and Coal, 702
Labor and Monopoly Capital, 511, 659
Labor and Nation, 404
Labor and Politics, 717
Labor and Silk, 344
 Labor Art and Mural Project, 526
Labor Balance, 132
Labor Catechism of Political Economy, A, 867
Labor Copartnership, 454
 Labor Day parades, 379
Labor Defender, 742
Labor Enquirer, 385
Labor Fact Book, 344, 375
Labor Herald, 460
Labor History, 698
Labor Inquirer, 92, 93
 Labor Lyceum, 707
 Labor-Management Documentation Center, Catherwood Library, 698
Labor Notes, 350, 831, 842
 Labor Party, 423-424, 635, 843, 856
 Labor Party advocates, 408, 424
 Labor Party (Illinois), 213
 Labor Poets of America, 676, 677
Labor Power, 766
 Labor radio, 424-425
 Labor Research Association (LRA), 344, 375, 701, 702
Labor's Daily, 626
Labor Spy Racket, The, 668
Labor Standard, 817, 903
Labor's Untold Story, 845
 Labor Theater, 616
 Labor theory of value, 320
Labor Unity, 907
 Labor Youth League (LYL), 545, 678, 920, 922
 Labor Zionism, 143
Labour Weekly, 195
 Labriola, Antonio, 126
 Lacroix, Adon, 173
 Lacy, Ed, 623, 624
Ladder, The, 258, 259
 Ladies' Federal Labor Union, 348
 LaFarge, Pete, 750
 Lafargue, Paul, 125, 514
 La Follette, Phillip, 427
 La Follette, Robert, Jr., 4, 427, 587
 La Follette, Robert Marion, 84, 148, 213, 214, 314, 366, 415, 425-427, 428, 499, 633, 635, 651, 770, 924
LaFollette's Weekly, 426, 634, 717
 LaFrance, E. A., 187 sp
 LaGuardia, Fiorello, 29, 37, 115, 477, 541, 633, 649, 651, 652, 771, 820
 Laidler, Harry W., 364, 365, 427-428, 772
Laisve, 85, 450, 451
 Lamantia, Philip, 808, 809
 Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, 261
 Lamont, Corliss, 37, 38, 516, 529, 530, 634
 LaMonte, Robert Rives, 581
 Lampe, Keith, 665
 Lampell, Millard, 231, 738, 847
 Landau, Saul, 431, 805
 Landis, Art, 725
Landmarks of Scientific Socialism, 442
Land of Plenty, 638
Land of Roseberries, 679
 Landy, Sy, 349
 Lane, Burton, 288
 Lane, Mark, 531
 Langdon, Emma, 378
 Lange, Dorothea, 604, 742
 Lange, Oskar, 36, 612
 Langley, Mother, 513
 Lanham, Edwin, 625
 "Lanny Budd" Novels, 749
 Lansky, Aaron, 917
 LaPen Cultural Center, Berkeley, California, 525
 Lardner, Ring, Jr., 325, 326, 341, 428-429, 619, 845
Lardners: My Family Remembered, 428
 LaRouche, Lyndon, 646
 Larson, Bird, 503
 Lasch, Christopher, 100
 Lassalle, Ferdinand, 117, 184, 319, 382, 383, 466
 Lasser, David, 840, 844
Last Carousel, The, 18
Last Frontier, The, 217
Last Stand of Dialectical Materialism, 602
Last Time I Saw Paris, 625
 Lathrop, Julia, 302, 702
Latin America: The Struggle with Dependency and Beyond, 432
Latin American Perspectives, 432, 784
 Latin American solidarity movements, 1960s-1980s, 429-431
 Latin American Studies Association (LASA), 432
 Latin American Studies, 431-432
Latino, 326
 Latvian Americans, 432-433
 Laughlin, Clarence John, 808, 809
Laura, 507, 622
Laureates of Imperialism, 57
 Lava, Vicente, 225
Lavoratore Italiano, 388, 390
 Lavrov, Petr, 708
Law and Freedom Bulletin, 417
Law and Order, 560
 Lawrence, D. H., 441, 740
 Lawrence, Jacob, 71
 Lawrence, Stanley, 327-328
 Lawrence and Wishart, 375
Lawrence of Arabia, 326
 Lawrence Strike, 58, 216, 229, 359, 357, 433-434, 863
 Lawrenson, Johanna, 322
 Lawson, Elizabeth, 789, 903
 Lawson, John Howard, 43, 325, 406, 428, 434-435, 568, 701, 900
 Lawyers Committee on Nuclear Policy, 533
Lawyers Guild Review, 368, 417
 Lazarus, Emma, 208, 246
 Leacock, Eleanor Burke, 435-436, 515
 Leacock, Stephen, 339
Lead with Your Left, 624

- Leadbelly (Huddie Ledbetter), 231, 738
- League for a Revolutionary Party, 793
- League for Independent Political Action, 771
- League for Industrial Democracy (LID), 27, 289, 364, 427, 840, 800
- League for Mutual Aid, 413
- League of American Ukrainians, 836
- League of American Writers, 43, 406, 623, 624, 626, 627, 675, 676, 677
- League of Composers, 161
- League of Frightened Philistines, The, 215
- League of Grey-Eyed Women, The, 626
- League of Nonviolent Civil Disobedience against Military Segregation, 709–710
- League of Professional Groups for Foster and Ford, 241
- League of Revolutionaries for a New America, 475
- League of Revolutionary Black Workers, 138, 436–439, 473, 550, 783, 896
- League of Revolutionary Struggle (LRS), 475
- League of Struggle for Negro Rights, 87, 535
- League of the Ho-de-no-sau-nee, or Iroquois, 513
- League of United Latin American Citizens, 493
- League of Young Southerners, 88
- Lear, Norman, 340, 619
- Leary, Timothy, 548
- Lease, Mary Elizabeth, 13
- Leaving and Living the Good Life*, 542
- Lebovics, Herman, 209
- Lebrecht, Hans, 178
- Lebron, Lolita, 652
- Lechlitner, Ruth, 677
- Lectores*, 911
- Lee, Alfred McLung, 781, 784
- Lee, Algernon, 685
- Lee, Canada, 325
- Lee, Don, 552
- Lee, Elizabeth Briant, 784
- Lee, Euel, 369
- Lee, Grace (Boggs). See Boggs, Grace Lee.
- Lee, Gypsy Rose, 3
- Lee, Russell, 604
- Lees, Robert, 340, 618
- Left Curve*, 551
- Left Face*, 269
- Left Front*, 56
- Left Poale Zion*, 780
- Left Poale Zion schools, 917
- Left Review*, 56
- Left, Right, and Center: Conflicting Forces in American Labor*, 440
- Left turn* magazine, 350
- Leftward*, 56
- Left-Wing Communism: An Infantile Disorder*, 162
- Leggett, John, 783
- Le Guin, Ursula K., 553, 665, 726
- Lehman, Herbert H., 28, 651, 652
- Lehmann, Paul, 529
- Lehrer, Tom, 340
- Lehr- und Wehrvereine, 439–440, 790
- Leib, Mani, 915
- Leibowitz, Samuel, 731, 732
- Leivick, H., 644, 915
- Lemke, William, 15
- Lemlich, Clara, 744
- Lemmon, Jack, 326
- Lenin, V. I., 93, 299, 319, 363, 380, 384, 501, 505, 511, 602, 702, 755, 903
- Leninism, 349, 711, 862
- Lenin Lives*, 725
- Lenin on the Agrarian Question*, 702
- Lenin School, Moscow, 820
- Lennon, John, 243
- Lens, Sidney, 440–441, 443, 526, 555, 569, 778
- Leo XIII, Pope, 386
- Leong, Eugene Moonfooon, 553
- Leopold, Aldo, 663, 664, 665
- Lerner, Max, 516
- Lesbianism, 307. See also Gay/lesbian liberation movement.
- Lessig, Adolph, 590
- Lesson Outlines in the Economic Interpretation of History*, 515
- Lester, Julius, 552, 750
- Le Sueur, Arthur, 441
- Le Sueur, Meridel, 56, 441, 555, 620, 638, 639, 640
- Let Me Breathe Thunder*, 638
- "Let's Seize the Time," 871
- Letters to an Imaginary Friend*, 487, 639
- Letter to a Comrade*, 676
- "Letter to the World" (dance), 504
- Lettsian Federation (Latvian), 433
- Levasseur, Raymond Luc, 65, 66
- Leveritt, Lou, 900
- Levin, Julia, 503
- Levin, Jack, 575
- Levine, Jack, 71
- Levinson, Eddie, 771
- Levison, Stanley D., 136
- Levitt, Alfred Lewis, 618
- Levy, Builder, 605
- Levy, D. A., 838
- Lewenz, Lisa, 606
- Lewinsky, Monica, 888
- Lewis, Arthur Morrow, 442, 722
- Lewis, Augusta, 378
- Lewis, Austin M., 82, 125, 185, 441–442
- Lewis, Bobby, 900
- Lewis, C. S., 621
- Lewis, H. H., 161, 674
- Lewis, John L., 31, 150, 177, 355, 372, 380, 459, 635, 813, 844, 856, 608, 803
- Lewis, Lena Morrow, 442–443, 874
- Lewis, Sinclair, 858, 921
- Lewitzky, Bella, 507
- "Leyendas de Mexico" (dance), 507
- Liberación*, 652
- Liberal Club, 581, 863
- Liberal parties, 477
- Liberal Party, New York, 29
- Liberated Guardian*, 531
- Liberation* magazine, 186, 276, 440, 443–444, 577, 595
- Liberation Music Orchestra, 398
- Liberation News Service (LNS), 444–446, 605
- Liberation of American Literature, The*, 509
- Liberation Theology, 446, 511
- Liberator* (1910s) 123, 272, 273, 307, 446–447, 554, 582, 610, 647, 648, 671, 684, 870, 919
- Liberator* (1840s–1860s), 657, 752
- Libertaire*, 239
- Liberty: Not the Daughter But the Mother of Order*, 45, 182, 832
- Liberty Book Club, 845
- Liberty House, 322
- Liberty League of Negro-Americans, 291
- Libin, Z., 914
- Library of Science for Workers, 126, 722
- Libsohn, Sol, 604
- LID News Bulletin*, 800
- Liebkecht, Wilhelm, 126, 466, 560
- Liebling, Jerome, 604
- Liessin, Abraham, 928
- Life*, 919
- Life, A*, 326
- Life and Death of a Spanish Town, The*, 625
- Life and Death of a Tough Guy*, 622
- Life and Deeds of Uncle Sam*, 40, 44, 338
- Life and Times of Rosie the River, The*, 558
- Life and Writings of Frederick Douglass, The*, 234
- Life Begins at 8:40*, 288
- Life in the Iron Mills*, 572
- Lifeitselfmanship*, 503
- Liga, La*, 168
- Light, Ken, 605
- L'il Green Song Book*, 665
- Lilienthal, Augusta, 447
- Lilienthal, Meta Stern, 447–448
- Limbo*, 726
- Limbo Tower*, 621
- "Lincherei," 671
- Lincoln, Abbey, 397
- Lincoln, Abraham, 494, 610
- Lincoln Collector*, 717
- Lincoln Lyrics, The*, 676
- Lincoln's Birthday Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom (LBPDF), 727, 728, 730
- Lindeman, Jack, 551
- Lindsay, Vachel, 610
- Lindsey, Benjamin Barr, 467
- Line of March Group, 475
- Lingg, Louis, 17, 297
- Lippard, George, 286, 448
- Lippman, Walter, 21, 480, 692
- Lipschitz, Siegfried, 560
- Lipset, Seymour Martin, 25, 783
- Liptzin, Sam, 283
- Listen, Yankee*, 170, 431
- Listen for the Dolphin*, 701
- Literary criticism, 448–450
- Literary Shadows*, 488
- Literary Times*, 173
- Literature and Morality*, 215–216
- Literature and Reality*, 217
- Literature and Revolution*, 215
- Lithuanian Americans, 450–451
- Lithuanian Art Union, 450
- Lithuanian Atheist Association, 450
- Lithuanian Federation, Communist Party, 85
- Lithuanian Workers Association, 450
- Lithuanian Workers Literary Society, 450
- Little, Frank, 451
- Little Blue Books, 160, 451–452
- Little Bosses*, 621
- Little Foxes, The*, 97, 307
- Little Lefty*, 176, 340
- Little Lenin Library, 375
- Little Red Songbook*, 312, 338, 357, 362, 363
- Livens, Edward, 698
- Livermore, Mary, 132

- Liverpool, Hollis ("Chalk-dust"), 871
Living Blues, 750
Living Marxism, 163
Living My Life, 275
Living Newspaper, 221
Living of Charlotte Perkins Gilman, The, 270
 Livingston, David, 192
 Living Theater, 275, 507, 614, 615
Living the Good Life, 541
Living Wilderness, 663
 Llano Cooperative Colony, 452-453, 858
 Llewellyn, Karl, 368
 Lloyd, Henry Demarest, 81, 223, 453-454
 Lloyd, J. William, 48, 662
 Lloyd, Margaret, 504
 Local 1199, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union (RWDSU), 454-455
Local Lives, 676
 Local 9, Packinghouse Workers, 455-456
 Local 70, Fur and Leather Workers Union, 277, 559
 Local 22, International Ladies Garment Workers Union, 907, 908
 Locke, David Ross, 338
 Loeb, Philip, 340
 Logan, Barton, 87
 Logan, William, 849
Logan's Gone, 627
Loma, Citizen of Venus, 48
 Lomax, Alan, 231
 Lomax, Bess, 231
 Lomax, John, 231
 Londa, George, 789
 London, Jack, 118, 125, 199, 364, 456-457, 479, 609, 616, 620, 637, 669, 670, 671, 724, 796
 London, Meyer, 457-458, 466
Loneheart Girl in the World, The, 620
Lonely Are the Brave, 553
Lonely Crusade, 638
Lone Ranger, The (radio show), 115
Lonesome Train, The, 701
 Long, Herman, 786
 Long, Larry, 234
Long Day in a Short Life, A, 638
 "Long Haired Preachers," 363
 Longshoremen's Union, 220
Longshot O'Leary's Garland of Practical Poesie, 487
 Longstaff, S. A., 556
Long View, The, 610
 Lonidier, Fred, 605
Looking Backward, 2000-1887, 48, 79, 80, 81, 132, 183, 301, 542, 592, 669, 724, 762, 782, 858, 874
Loose Leaves from a Busy Life, 314
 Lopez, Frank, 460
 Loray Mill, 254, 255
 Lorde, Audre, 678
 Lordstown, Ohio, industrial militance, 472, 896
 Lore, Ludwig, 458-459, 560
 Lorentz, Pare, 668
 Los Angeles Citizens Housing Council, 872
 Los Angeles Council, Congress of Industrial Organizations, 459-461
 Los Angeles Dance League, 507
Los Angeles Free Press, 838
 Los Angeles Society for Cultural Relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, 38
 Losey, Joseph, 293, 618
Lost Eden, 677
Lost Horizon, 324
Loudspeaker, 435
Lou Grant, 326
 Louis, Joe, 617, 909
Love and Rage, 349
 Lovcraft, H. P., 808
 Lovell, Frank, 716, 778, 831
Lovely Lady, Pity Me, 625
Love's Coming of Age, 125
 Lovestone, Jay, 149, 372, 462, 463, 736, 819
 Lovestoneites, 462-464, 793, 902
Love Story, 489
 Lovett, Robert Morse, 26, 724, 921
 Low, Mary, 809
 Lowe, Caroline A., 464, 879
 Lowell, A. Lawrence, 715
 Lowell, Amy, 481
 Lowell, James Russell, 338
 Lowenfels, Walter, 551, 639, 676, 679
 Lower East Side, New York City, 464-466
 Lowie, Robert, 515
 Lown, Bernard, 304
 Lowndes, Robert W., 251, 725
 Löwy, Michael, 556
 Loy, Mina, 173, 610
 Lozowick, Louis, 23, 70, 406, 643
Lraper, 68
 Lucas, Eric, 128
 Lucas County Unemployed League, 42
 Luciano, Felipe, 923
Lucifer, the Light Bearer, 243, 246, 466
 Ludlow Massacre, 467
 Ludvig, Samuel, 247
 Lugosi, Bela, 263, 343
 Lukács, Georg, 449, 540
 Lumber Workers Strikes, 357
 Lumpkin, Grace, 255, 638
 Lumumba, Patrice, 8
 Lunacharsky, Anatoly, 203
 Lunceford, Jimmy, 396
 Lundeberg, Harry, 716, 717
 Lundy, Benjamin, 752
 Lunn, George R., 302, 521
 Lusk, Clayton R., 697, 685
 Lustig, James, 342
 Luxemburg, Rosa, 49, 299, 611, 896
Lydia, 626
Lying Ladies, The, 621
 Lynd, Helen M., 782, 783
 Lynd, Robert S., 516, 728, 782, 783
 Lynd, Staughton, 57, 294, 443, 444, 547, 577, 697, 778, 805
 Lysenko Controversy, 729
- M
 Maas, Willard, 677
 Mabie, Hamilton Wright, 334
 Macbeth Gallery, 70
Macbird, 341, 616
 Macdonald, Dwight, 100, 186, 469, 540, 544, 577, 584, 594, 595, 618, 829, 901
 MacDonald, Ramsay, 299
 Macedonian-American Freedom League, 113
Machinist's Monthly Journal, 223
 MacIntosh, Ebenezer, 32, 33
 Mackay, John Henry, 695, 832
 MacKaye, Benton, 663
 Mackler, Jeff, 831
 MacLane, Mary, 809
 MacLeish, Archibald, 273, 637, 677
 Macleod, Norman, 673
Mad Comics, 340
 Maddow, Ben, 618, 668, 674
 Maddox, James, 145
Mad magazine, 176, 340, 619, 836
Madness Network News, 680
 Magdoff, Harry, 510, 511
 Mage, Shane, 830
 Maggard, Buck, 310
 Maggie, 334
Magical Mystery Tour, 445
 Magil, A. B., 517
 Magnes, Judah, 26
 Magnet, Louis, 590
 Magón, Enrique. See Flores Magón, Enrique.
 Magón, Ricardo Flores. See Flores Magón, Ricardo.
Magyar Szo, 343
 Mailer, Norman, 191, 530, 640
 Mailly, Bertha Howell, 686
 Mainardi, Pat, 885
Main Currents in American Thought, 40, 449
Mainstream, 428, 469-470, 487, 676
 Major, Clarence, 551, 552
 Makhno, Nester, 77
Making of a Fresco (Mural), 699
 Malaka, Tan, 297
 Malatesta, Errico, 413, 587, 588, 827
 Malcolm X, 62, 63, 94, 139, 140, 298, 437, 513, 530, 546, 778
 Maley, Anna A., 879
 Malina, Judith, 507, 614, 615
 Malkiel, Theresa Serber, 470-471, 745
 Mallarme, Stéphane, 609
 Mallet, Serge, 896
 Maloney, Shaun (Jack), 499
 Malraux, André, 584, 624
Maltese Falcon, The, 287
 Maltz, Albert, 273, 325, 326, 435, 555, 625, 638, 845
 Mammonart, 749
 MAN, 46
 Manassas, 748
Man at the Crossroads (Mural), 699
 Manchester Pan-African Congress, 7
 Mandel, Ernest, 350, 544
Man for Himself, 248
 Mangan, Sherry, 675
 Mangaong, Ernie, 225
Manhattan Transfer, 196
 Manifesto, 807
Man Inside: Being the Record of the Strange Adventures of Allen Steele Among the Zulus, 724
Man Just Ahead of You, The, 624
 Manlapit, Pablo, 224
 Manley, Michael, 8
 Manning, Jack, 604
 Mannix, 623
 Manoff, Arnold, 324
Man on Spikes, 626
Man's Worldly Goods, 510
Man Who Cried I Am, The, 553
Man With the Golden Arm, The, 18
 "Man with the Hoe," 480, 609
Many a Monster, 621
 Maosism, 471-475
 Mao's "Little Red Book," 472
 "Mao Tse-tung Thought," 471
 Mao Zedong, 398, 471, 475, 757
 Mapai, 781
 Mapam, 781
 Marable, Manning, 155-156
 Marcantonio, Vito, 4, 29, 30, 115, 150, 153, 216, 340, 369, 390, 475-477, 530, 651, 652, 694, 697

- Marching Men*, 670
Marching Song, 435
 March on Washington (1963), 684
March to the Monteria, 639
 Marcuse, Herbert, 178, 249, 477-479, 547, 603, 617, 674, 783, 809, 858
 Marcy, Leslie H., 376, 479
 Marcy, Mary Edna, 125, 126, 128, 376, 479, 515, 610, 664
 Marcy, Sam, 830
 Marek, Franz, 375
Margie, 626
 Marin, John, 173
 Marine Engineers Benevolent Association, 534
 Marine Firemen's Union, 716
Mariners, Renegades and Castaways: Herman Melville and the World We Live In, 394
 Marinov, Jakob, 282
 Maritain, Jacques, 123
 Maritime Federation of the Pacific, 373
 Markham, Edwin, 479-480, 609
 Markin, Margaret, 625
 Markish, Peretz, 918
 Markoff, Abraham, 902
Mark of the Beast, 669
 Marley, Bob, 871
 Marmor, Kalmon, 347, 916
 Marquart, Frank, 642
 Marquis, Don, 609
 Marrs, Ernie, 750
 Marsh, George Perkins, 661
 Marsh, Reginald, 447, 555, 849
 Marshall, George, 37
 Marshall, Robert, 663, 664, 665
 Marshall Plan, 235, 461, 814
Martello, II, 46, 388, 390, 827
 Martens, Ludwig C. A. K., 819
 Martí, Jose, 168, 911
 Martí City, Florida, 911
 Martin, Del, 259
 Martin, Homer, 372, 463, 851
 Martin, John, 70, 504, 505
 Martin, W. T., 728
Martin Eden, 620, 670
 Martinez, Refugio, 460
 Martin P. Catherwood Library, 698
 Martinsville Seven, 134
 Marty, Joe, 461
Martyr's Mirror, 607
 Marx, Groucho, 900
 Marx, Karl, 57, 128, 196, 197, 202, 319, 329, 330, 382, 383, 384, 393, 465, 466, 478, 514, 541, 555, 603, 606, 658, 702, 711, 755, 761, 765, 867, 879, 895, 903, 917
Marx-Engels Cyclopedia, 197
 Marx-Engels Institute, 329
 Marxism, 215, 928
Marxism and Form, 449
Marxism and Freedom, 202
Marxism and Moral Concepts, 626
Marxism and "Primitive" Societies, 515
Marxism and the Woman Question, 363
 Marxist Educational Collective, 694
 Marxist Education Press, 376
 Marxist-Leninist Party (MLP), 473, 474
Marxist Perspectives, 680
Mary Jones, 48
 Marzani, Carl, 144, 845
 Marzani and Munsell, 845, 846
*M*A*S*H*, 326, 341, 428, 619, 640
 Maslow, Sophie, 505
 Mason, Timothy, 210
 Mason, Vivian Carter, 159
 Massachusetts Bay Colony, 418
Massacre, 673
Masses, The, 68, 70, 123, 173, 243, 271, 263, 273, 280, 281, 290, 446, 467, 447, 480-481, 506, 551, 554, 581, 610, 645, 647, 648, 671, 672, 692, 740, 863, 867, 919
Masses and Mainstream, 57, 397, 469, 555, 623, 676, 678, 679. See also Mainstream.
Massis, 68
 Mass Party Organizing Committee, 76
Mass Psychology of Fascism, The, 648
Master Race, The, 325
Match, 246
Materialism and Empirio-Criticism, 602
Materials, The, 675
Matewan, 326
 Matles, James, 853
 Matta, Roberto, 808
Mattachine Review, 258
 Mattachine Society, 154, 257
 Matthews, Herbert, 3, 169
 Matthews, J. B., 31
 Matthiessen, Francis Otto, 449, 482, 510
 Matthiessen, Peter, 665
 Mattick, Paul, 163, 320, 556, 642, 896
 Mattson, Helmi, 823
 Maud, Zuni, 509, 916
Maude, 619
 Maurer, James Hudson, 387, 482-483
 Maurin, Peter, 123
 Maus, 837
 Mavrides, Paul, 837
 Maxey, Fred E., 789
 Maxim Gorky Award, 255
 May, Henry, 48
 May Day, 216, 379, 483-485, 734, 848
 "May Day March" (dance), 505
 May Day parades, 917
May Days, 610
Maydays, 671
 Mayer, Arno, 210
 Mayer, Milton, 186
 Mayes, Barney, 716
 Mayfield, Julian, 241, 288
May Pamphlet, The, 275
Mayweed Blossoms, 48
 Mazey, Emil, 642
 Mazzini Society, 828
 Mazzocchi, Tony, 424
 McAdams, Donna Ann, 606
 McCarran Act, 134, 286
 McCarran, Pat, 4
 McCarran-Walter Act, 5, 24, 39, 250, 552, 565, 631
 McCarthy, Eugene, 549
 McCarthy, Joseph R., 318, 322, 340, 386, 420, 533, 599
 McCarthy, Mary, 516, 517, 584
 McCarthy, William, 246
 McCarthyism, 330, 340, 485-487
 McCausland, Elizabeth, 71, 604
 McClure, Michael, 77
 McConnell, Francis J., 562
 McCormack-Dickstein Committee, 330
 McCormick Harvester Works, 483
 McCowan, Archibald, 81
 McDonnell, J. P., 385, 817, 903, 904
 McDowell, Mary, 26
 McElroy, Robert, 533
 McGee, Willie, 134, 503
 McGhee, Brownie, 738
 McGlynn, Edward, 265, 266
 McGovern, George, 290, 543, 634, 742
 McGovern Democrats, 429
 McGrath, James, 589
 McGrath, Tom, 56, 161
487-488, 551, 589, 620, 639, 640, 679, 724
 McGuire, P. J., 130, 385, 903
 McKay, Claude, 123, 167, 200, 336, 447, 488, 610, 640, 671, 870
 McKenney, Ruth, 363, 488-489, 638, 640
 McKeon, Richard, 275
 McKinley, William, 172, 273, 612
 McKinney, Edward Britt, 489-490
 McKinney, Ernest R., 16
 McKissick, Floyd, 138
 McLevy, Jasper, 522
 McManigal, Ortie, 490
 McManus, John ("Jack"), 529, 530, 694
 McMullen, John, 743
 McNamara, James B., 83, 118, 369, 490, 491
 McNamara, John J., 118, 490, 491
 McNamara Case, 452, 490-491
 McNeil, Claudia, 288
 McNeill, George E., 418, 817
 McNutt, Paul V., 35, 622
 McQueen, William, 589
 McReynolds, David, 443, 773, 925
 McWilliams, Brian, 374
 McWilliams, Carey, 431, 461, 516
 Means, Russell, 27
 Meany, George, 400, 463
Meat and Man, 239
 Mechanization and Modernization Agreement, 374
 Mechicano Art Center, 525
Medea and Some Poems, The, 674
 Medem, Gina, 347
 Media Network, 559
 Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy, 303, 728
 Medical Committee for Human Rights, 305
Medical Letter, The, 305
 Medina, Harold, 755
 Medina, Manuel, 652
 Meegan, Joseph, 18
 Meeropol, Michael, 705, 706
 Meeropol, Robert, 705
Meet the People, 288
 Meiklejohn, Alexander, 873
 Meiklejohn Civil Liberties Institute, 533
 Meisel, Nakhman, 916
 Meiselas, Susan, 606
 Meisner, Sandy, 900
 Meister, Robert, 521
 Melish, William Howard, 38
 Mellencamp, John, 234
 Melman, Seymour, 614
Melov's Legacy, 623
Melting Pot, 338, 610
 Melville, Herman, 482, 518
Melville's Poetry: Toward the Enlarged Heart, 678
 Melvin, Sophie, 255
Memoirs of a Bastard Angel: A Fifty-Year Literary and Erotic Odyssey, 679

- Memorial Day Massacre, 847
Men against Money, 845
Menataash, 678
Men Can Take It, 293
 Mencken, H. L., 161, 816
 Mensalvas, Chris, 225
Mental Radio, 796
Mercenary from Tomorrow, 726
 Meredith, Burgess, 900
MERIP Reports, 681
 Merlino, Francesco Saverio, 587
 Merriam, Eve, 208, 678
 Merrill, Judith, 726
 Merrill, Stuart, 609
 Merton, Thomas, 123
 Mesabi Range Ironworkers Strike, 357
Messenger, The 195, 684, 769
 Mestel, Jacob, 68
 Metalworkers Industrial Union, 853
 Met Council, 697
Methinks the Lady, 625
Metropolitan, 919
 Metzel, Kate, 181
 Mexican American Political Association (MAPA), 492-493, 494
 Mexican Americans, 491-494
 Mexican-American Youth Organization (MAYO), 493
 Mexican Revolution, 227, 228, 310, 460, 492
 Meyerhold, Vsevolod, 68
 Meyers, Samuel J., 414, 642
 Meyer London Memorial Library and Reading Room, 686
 Meyers, Sidney, 668
Michael, Brother of Jerry, 50
 Michel, John B., 251, 725
 Michel, Louise, 413
 Michel, Robert, 583
 Michelson, Clarina, 26
 Michener, Lew, 459
 Michigan Civil Liberties Union, 407
 Michigan Women's Historic Center, 408
 Mid-Atlantic Radical Historians Organization (MARHO), 680
Midcentury, 196, 640
Middletown, 782
Middletown in Transition, 782
Midnight Treasure, 622
Midwest Daily Record, 494-495, 536, 591-592, 621
 Migratory Agricultural Labor, 495-497
 Mikhoeis, Solomon, 644
 Mikolanda, Jakub, 171
Miles of Smiles, 558
 Miliband, Ralph, 614, 784
Militant, The, 194, 340, 568, 742, 754, 777, 778, 828, 830, 831
 Militant Faction, Socialist Party, 924
Militant Proletariat, The, 125, 442
Military-Industrial Complex, The, 440
 Milk, Harvey, 259
 Mill, Mine, and Smelter Workers, 207
 Milland, Ray, 620
 Miller, Arnold, 856
 Miller, George Frazier, 167
 Miller, Henry, 77, 639, 679
 Miller, Joaquin, 479
 Miller, Kenneth, 849
 Miller, Louis, 927
 Millet, Jean-François, 480
 Millet, Martha, 676, 679
 Millett, Kate, 886
Millhouse: A White Comedy, 557
Mill Hunk (calendar), 117
Mill Hunk Herald, 843
 Millie, 626
Millions of Us, 667
 Mills, Charles Wright, 26, 100, 169, 170, 431, 497-498, 614, 781, 782, 805
 Mills, Walter Thomas, 602
 Milton, Joyce, 705
 Milwaukee, 498-499
Milwaukee Kaleidoscope, 838
Milwaukee Leader, 44, 223, 498, 717
Mind of Clark Kerr, The, 197
 Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. See Western Federation of Miners/International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers.
 Miners for Democracy, 698, 842, 856
Miners Magazine, 767, 869
 Mingus, Charlie, 397
 Minneapolis Teamsters Local 544, 754, 777, 896
 Minneapolis Teamster Strikes, 499-501
 Minnesota Farmer Labor Party, 16, 499
Minnesota Review, 551
 Minnie, Memphis, 809
 Minor, Robert, 32, 271, 338, 447, 481, 501, 518
Minority of One, 551
Mint Alley, 393
 Minton, Sherman, 814
 Mintz, Sidney, 41
 Miranda, Rafael Cancel, 652
Mirrors of Venus, 675
 Misnik, Joanna, 350
 Miss America Contest, Atlantic City, 885
 Missing, 326
Mission to Hanoi, 57
Mission to Moscow, 323
 Mississippi Challenge, 420
 Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, 138, 75
 Mississippi Peace Cruise, 39
Miss Lonelyhearts, 639
 Missoula, Montana, 229
 Mitchell, Broadus, 724
 Mitchell, Charlene, 155, 63
 Mitchell, H. L., 16, 502, 744
 Mitchell, Joni, 232
 Mitchell, Juliet, 649, 886
 Mitford, Diana, 503
 Mitford, Jessica, 502-503
 Mitford, Unity, 503
 Moberg, David, 384
 Mobilization for Survival, 440
 Model, Lisette, 604
Model for Murder, A, 626
 Modern dance, 239, 503-508
Modern Music, 161
Modern Politics, 394
Modern Quarterly/Modern Monthly, 163, 243, 508-509, 648, 677
 Modern School, Stelton, New Jersey, 46, 203, 503
 Modern schools, 205
Modern World System, The, 866
 Modicut Theater, 509-510
 Modzelewski, Karol, 556
 Mohegan Colony, 413
 Molek, Ivan, 753
 Molinari, Alberico, 390
Molly Maguires, The, 86, 326
 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. See Hitler-Stalin Pact.
Monito, II, 6
Monkey Wrench Gang, 47, 553, 665
Monopoly Capital, 76, 511, 659
 Monroe, Marilyn, 580
Monster Midway, 621
Montage of a Dream Deferred, 337
 Montage theory, 667
Montagnais-Naskapi "Hunting Territory" and the Fur Trade, The, 436
 Montalban, Ricardo, 288
Montgomery, Alabama, Money, Mississippi and Other Places, 678
 Montgomery, David, 40
 Montgomery Bus Boycott, 85, 135
Monthly Review, 144, 170, 209, 288-289, 472, 510-511, 634 658, 659, 876
 Monthly Review Press, 376, 511, 552, 830
 Montreat Anderson College, 415
 Mon Valley Coalition, 843
 Moody, Kim, 349, 350
 Moon, Henry Lee, 7
Mooncalf, 670
 Mooney, Rena, 512
 Mooney, Thomas J., 27, 118, 121, 369, 501, 511, 580, 582
 Mooney-Billings Case, 511-512
 Moore, Eloise, 513
 Moore, Fred H., 713, 715, 827
 Moore, J. Howard, 662
 Moore, Michael, 559
 Moore, Queen Mother, 512-513
 Moore, Richard (Dhoruba), 64
 Moore, Richard B., 488, 696
 Moore, Walter, 851
Morada, The, 673
 Moravian Community, Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, 606
 Morawski, Stefan, 540
 Morea, Ben, 65
More Dangerous Thoughts, 621
 Moreno, Luisa, 157, 460, 492
 Morford, Richard, 38
 Morgan, Anne, 745
 Morgan, Elizabeth Chambers, 301, 348
 Morgan, J. P., 745
 Morgan, Lewis Henry, 51, 125, 319, 513-516, 642, 763
 Morgan, Thomas J., 365, 903
Morgen Freiheit, 19, 92, 247, 283, 339, 401, 404, 405, 459, 509, 510, 563, 564, 571, 624, 643, 791, 915, 916
 Mori, Toshio, 553
 Morosco, Oliver, 434
 Morris, George L. K., 584
 Morris, Gouverneur, 34
 Morris, William, 57, 92, 319, 334, 441, 518, 589, 609, 748
 Morris, William, Jr., 38
 Morrison, Toni, 455, 888
 Morrow, Felix, 754, 793, 830
 Mortimer, Wyndham, 851
 Moscow Trials, 44, 151, 188, 273, 329, 463, 516-517, 740
 Moscow Trials Campaign Committee, 517
 Moses, Robert, 520, 697
 Most, Johann, 92, 240, 339, 517, 588, 695, 791
 Mostel, Zero, 324, 325, 340, 381
Mother Earth Bulletin, 518
Mother Earth, 48, 84, 274, 413, 501, 518
Mother Jones magazine, 683
Mothers and Daughters, 573
 Mothers' Anti-High Price League, 236
 Mothers' Bill of Rights, 538
 Mothers for Adequate Welfare, 760

- Mothers of East Los Angeles, 760
Mother to Daughter, Daughter to Mother: A Day Book and Reader, 572-573
 Motion Picture Alliance for the Preservation of American Ideals, 329
 Motion Picture Artists Committee, 328
 Motion Picture Democratic Committee, 328
Motion Picture Worker, 327
 Motion Pictures Producers' Association, 428
 Motion Picture Workers Industrial Union (MPWIU), 327
 Motley, Willard, 640
 Motor City Labor League (MCLL), 438
 Mott, Lucretia, 882
 Mounier, Emmanuel, 123
Mountains of California, The, 661
 Mount Airy, 413
 Movement for the Popular Liberation of Angola (MPLA), 474
Movie at the End of the World, The, 487
Movimiento Artístico Chicano (MARCH), 525
Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlán, El (MEChA), 493 Mowat, Farley, 665
 Mowbray, Charles W., 413
 Moxon, Cavendish, 646
 "Mr. Block," 312
Mr. Block and the Profiteers, 360
Mr. Natural, 836
Mrs. Herndon's Income, 120, 669
Muhammad Speaks, 86
 Muhlen, Herminia zur, 128
 Muir, John, 661, 665, 809
 Mujeres muralistas, 524
 Muller, H. J., 728
 Mulzac, Hugh, 694
Mumbo Jumbo, 553
 Mumford, Lewis, 100, 123, 443, 518-520, 595, 740
 Mungo, Raymond, 444, 445
 Municipal socialism, 520-523
Mural Manual, 525
 Murals, 523-526
Murder at Cypress Hall, 622
Murder Chop Chop, 621
Murder in the Stork Club, The, 622
Murder on My Street, 625
Murder on the Left Bank, 625
Murder Stalks the Wakeley Family, 627
 Murieta, Joaquin, 491
 Murphy, Al, 743
 Murphy, Frank, 814
 Murray, Pauli, 883
 Murray, Philip, 534, 845
Music Lover's Handbook, 747
 Mussolini, Benito, 387, 389
 Muste, A. J., 31, 42, 136, 186, 440, 443, 526-527, 577, 593, 594, 633, 777, 778, 818, 839, 840, 891
Mutual Aid, 46
 Mydans, Carl, 604
My Disillusionment in Russia, 274
 Myers, Gustavus, 40, 125
 Myers, Henry, 725
My Mother, My Father and Me, 307
My Quest for Reality, 732, 733
My Sister Eileen, 488
My Son John, 326
 "Mysteries of a Hobo's Life," 816
Mysterious Mickey Finn, The, 625
Myth of the Machine, The, 519, 520
Myth of the Negro Past, The, 10
Myth of the Vaginal Orgasm, The, 884-885
Myths of Male Dominance: Collected Articles on Women Cross-Culturally, 436, 515
- N
NACLA: Report on the Americas, 563, 681
NACLA's Latin American and Empire Report, 681
 Nader, Ralph, 305
 Nadir, Moshe, 339, 644, 915
 Nafe, Gertrude, 48
Nailebn-New Life, 347
Naked and the Dead, The, 530, 640
Naked City, 623
Naked God: The Writer and the Communist Party, 217
Naked Lunch, 77
Name of the Game is Murder, The, 626-627
 Nancy Blake, 233
Napalm Bugle, The, 624
Narodnia Volya, 835, 836, 928
 Nash, Roderick, 665
 Nathan, Michael, 279
Nation, The, 317, 516, 517, 625, 634, 635, 705, 793, 798, 820, 876
 National Abortion Rights Action League, 758
 National Alliance Against Racist and Political Repression, 179
 National American Women Suffrage Association, 448
 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), 135, 199-200, 201, 414, 437, 460, 532, 573, 709, 730, 731, 732, 748, 786, 867
 National Association of Christians and Jews, 600
 National Black Assembly, 473
 National Black Independent Party, 8
 National Bureau of Economic Research, 428
 National Bureau of Standards, 730
 National Caucus of Labor Committees, 646
 National Child Labor Committee, 604, 702
 National Chile Center, 429
 National Citizens Political Action Committee, 633, 730
 National Civil Liberties Union, 593
 National Coalition of Education Activists, 207
 National Colored Labor Union, 9
 National Committee against Repressive Legislation (NCARL), 873
 National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (SANE), 248, 595, 723
 National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, 591
 National Committee for the Restoration of Civil Liberties in the Philippines, 225
 National Committee for Unity of Rural and Agricultural Workers, 234
 National Committee to Abolish HUAC, 332
 National Committee to Reopen the Rosenberg Case (NCRRC), 705
 National Committee to Secure Justice in the Rosenberg Case, 704
 National Conference on Women (1977), 887
 National Congress of Neighborhood Women, 760
 National Consumers League, 412
 National Council of American Soviet Friendship, 38, 39, 729
 National Council of Churches, 133, 429
 National Council of Methodist Youth, 801
 National Council of Negro Women, 7
 National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, 730
 National Democratic Party, 611
 National Eight-Hour Association, 581
 National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee (NECLC), 24, 529
 National Endowment for Democracy, 463, 773
 National Farmers Union, 16
 National Farm Organization, 16
 National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, 134
 National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, 261, 262
National Guardian, 127, 153, 177, 201, 241, 261, 470, 472, 474, 475, 529-532, 475, 551, 559, 569, 634, 640, 678, 704
 National Health Law Program, 305
 National Hunger March, 666
 National Immigration Project, 533
 National Independent Party, 278
 National Indian Youth Council, 27
Nationalism and Culture, 702
 Nationalist Clubs, 874
 Nationalist Party, 651
Nationalist, 80, 121
 National Jewish Musical Union, 405
 National Labor Conference for Negro Rights, 536
 National Lumber Party, 214
 National Labor Union, 9, 315
 National Lawyers Guild, 368, 438, 532-533
 National League for the Protection of Colored Women, 573
 National Liberation Front (Vietnam), 294, 348
 National Lumber Workers Union, 380
 National Maritime Union (NMU), 510, 533-535, 908
 National Miners Union (NMU), 535, 856, 926
 National Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam, 294, 778
 National Negro Congress (NNC), 32, 134, 153, 408, 460, 535-536, 785, 684, 851, 912

- National Negro Labor Council, 536-537
- National Network in Solidarity with the Nicaraguan People, 430
- National Organization for an American Revolution, 830
- National Organization of Women (NOW), 1, 259, 758, 883, 886
- National Peace Action Coalition, 778
- National Peace Conference, 336
- National Public Radio (NPR), 576
- National Research League, 645
- National Review*, 196
- National Rip-Saw*, 338, 515, 570, 610, 767
- National Student Association, 444, 683
- National Student Federation, 801
- National Student League (NSL), 31, 800, 801, 921
- National Textile Workers Union (NTWU), 254, 385, 631, 818
- "National Topical Song Magazine," 750
- National Unemployed League, 42
- National Union of Brewery Workers (NUBW), 852
- National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, 285, 454
- National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards (MCs), 537-538, 814
- National Union of Textile Workers, 385, 818
- National United Committee to Free Angela Davis, 178
- National War Labor Board, 366
- National Woman Suffrage Association, 893
- National Women's Commission, 538-539
- National Women's Department, Communist Party, USA, 904
- National Women's Party (NWP), 96, 344, 882
- National Yiddish Book Center, 917
- National Youth Administration, 784, 801
- Nation of Islam, 62, 94
- Native American Church, 27
- Native Americans. See Indians.
- Native Land*, 668
- Native Son*, 620, 639, 908-909
- NATO Women's Peace Force, 891
- Natural Human*, A, 701
- Natural Man: A Romance of the Golden Age*, 48
- Natural nights, 602
- Nature Friends of America, 539
- Nature of Capitalism, The*, 702
- Nature of Human Brain Work, The*, 189
- Nature Talks on Economics*, 128
- Naturalism, 539-541
- Naturist Action Committee, 540
- Naturist Society, 539, 540
- Naughty Bits*, 837
- Naujoji Gadyne*, 450
- Naye Geist*, 99
- Naye Welt*, 403
- Naylor, Gloria, 888
- Nazi Party, 278
- Nazi-Soviet Pact, 27, 201, 337, 536, 555, 644, 686
- Neal, Claude, 415
- Neal, Larry, 552, 615
- Near, Holly, 233
- Nearing, Helen, 50, 542
- Nearing, Scott, 26, 50, 82, 541-542, 685, 903
- Nedrick Young, 326
- Neebe, Oscar, 297
- Needham, Joseph, 470, 724
- Needles Trades Workers Industrial Union, 157, 372
- Neel, Alice, 71
- Nef, Walter T., 82, 542
- Negations: Essays in Critical Theory*, 478
- Negrin, Juan, 3
- Negro, The*, 10
- Negro and the American Labor Movement, The*, 556
- Negro and the Nation, The*, 291
- Negro Champion*, 32
- Negro Commission, 797
- Negro Labor Councils, 536
- Negro Liberation*, 298
- Negro Looks at Soviet Central Asia, A*, 337
- Negro National News*, 75
- Negro Slave Revolts*, 375
- "Negro Spirituals" (dance), 504
- Negro Theater, 221
- Negro Worker*, 167
- Negro World*, 167, 195, 291, 870
- Nehru, Jawaharlal Pandit, 699
- Neighborhood Film Project, 559
- Nelson, Caroline, 128
- Nelson, Cary, 673
- Nelson, Eugene, 553
- Nelson, Truman, 553, 639
- Nemiroff, Robert, 287
- Neo-Malthusianism, 89, 91
- Neon Wilderness, The*, 18
- Neruda, Pablo, 674
- Ness, Henry, 500
- Nettlau, Max, 587
- Neue Volkszeitung*, 268, 560
- Neue Zeit, Die*, 256, 447, 734
- Neugass, James, 674
- Never Come Morning*, 17
- Never On Sunday*, 325
- New Alliance Party, 17, 646
- New America*, 289
- New American Movement (NAM), 384, 543-544, 773
- New American Poverty, The*, 289
- New Anvil*, 161
- New Appeal*, 57, 691
- Newark Central Labor Federation, 775
- Newark Community Union Project, 546
- Newark Insurrection, 63
- New Bedford, Massachusetts, textile strike (1928), 587, 612, 631
- New Castle Free Press*, 160
- New Communist Movement, 66, 471, 472
- New Criticism, 640
- New Critics, 482
- New Dance*, 505
- New Dance Group, 505
- New Dance League, 506, 667
- New Day, 559
- New Deal, 388
- New Democracy, The, 867, 382
- New Democratic Movement, 475
- Newest England*, 454
- Newfield, Jack, 294
- New Film Alliance, 667
- New Force, 56
- New Foundations*, 922
- New German Critique*, 210
- New Gymnosophy, The*, 540
- Newhouse, Edward, 638
- New Idea, The*, 867
- New International, 197, 216, 544-545, 742, 777, 901
- New Jersey Consumers' League, 702
- New Jewel Movement, 8
- New Jewish Agenda, 781
- New Leader*, 309, 770, 771, 772, 783, 924
- New Left, 545-551
- New Left and the Origins of the Cold War, The*, 145
- New Left Clubs, 545
- New Left Literature, 551-554
- New Left Review*, 545, 603
- New Llano, 453
- New Majority*, 222, 648
- Newman, Fred, 646
- Newman, Pauline M., 554
- New Masses, The*, 27, 44, 70, 100, 150, 161, 162, 196, 215, 225, 255, 273, 307, 309, 317, 337, 338, 339, 363, 405, 406, 435, 441, 469, 489, 507, 510, 554-555, 580, 608, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 637, 643, 656, 671, 672, 673, 676, 677, 724, 738, 849, 899, 916, 645, 646
- New Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam, 440
- New Motherhood, 270
- New Nation*, 81
- New Negro Movement, 290
- New Outlook Press, 376
- New Party, 384, 843
- New Pioneer*, 677, 926
- New Playwrights Theater, 435
- New Politics*, 197, 555-556
- Newport Folk Festival (1965), 233
- Newport, Gus, 155
- New Radicalism, The*, 278
- New Reasoner*, 545
- New Reformation*, 276
- New Republic*, 42, 101, 333, 384, 517, 530, 633, 634, 705, 740
- New Review*, 99, 200, 239, 573, 645, 768
- News and Letters*, 202, 830
- News and Letters Committees, 202
- Newsboy*, 900
- New Slavery: Investigation into the Sweating System*, 301
- New Songs of Freedom*, 610
- New South*, 789
- Newspaper Guild, 459
- Newsreel, 557
- Newsreel and Post-New Left Radical Filmmaking, 556-560
- New Theater*, 507, 637, 900
- New Theatre and Film*, 637
- New Theater League, 667
- New Thought, 796
- New Tide, The*, 113, 225
- New Times*, 838
- Newton, Herbert, 645
- Newton, Huey, 94, 95, 96
- Newton, Jane Emery, 645
- New unionism, 21
- New Voice, 856
- New Voices, 367
- New Workers School, 462
- New World Review*, 37
- New Writers*, 627, 676
- New York: Its Upper Ten and Lower Million*, 448
- New York Art Students League, 908

- New York Bureau of Legal Advice, 464
New York Call, 70, 99, 123, 273, 290, 338, 411, 447, 448, 473, 501, 670, 696, 745
 New York Child Labor Committee, 702
 New York City Board of Higher Education, 687
 New York Communist Club, 382
New York Dada, 173
 New York Drama Circle Critics Award, 288, 307
New Yorker, 293, 339, 489
New Yorker Turnzeitung, 465
New Yorker Volkszeitung (NYVZ), 267, 268, 281, 447, 458, 459, 539, 560, 707, 762, 763
 New York Fifth Avenue Parade Committee, 596
New York Head Shop and Museum, The, 678
 New York Labor News Company, 764
New York Leader, 315, 820
New York Listy, 171
 New York Marxist School, 694
 New York Nationalist Clubs, 183
 New York Poetry Society, 480
New York Post, 530, 798
 New York Radical Women, 884
 New York Rent Protective Association, 695
 New York's Disabled in Action, 190
 New York Stock Exchange, 322
 New York Theatre League, 568
New York Times, 559
 New York Writers School, League of American Writers, 623, 625
Next-to-Last-Things: New Poems and Essays, 677
 Niagara movement, 199
 Nicaragua Network, 430
 Nicaraguan Revolution, 155, 563
 Nicolaus, Martin, 783
 Niebuhr, Reinhold, 131, 133, 136, 446, 518, 740, 878
 Nietzsche, Friedrich, 832
 Nigerian Mine Workers Union, 7
Night, 675
Nightmare Alley, 621
Nightmare Blond, The, 625
Nightwalkers, The, 621
 Nin, Anais, 679
 1919 strike wave, 560-562
 1905 Revolution, 571
 Nineteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, 852, 882
 1937 "Little Steel" Strike, 286
 Nixon, E. D., 137
 Nixon, Richard, 4, 220, 549, 664
Nixon Poems, The, 678
 Nkrumah, Kwame, 8, 201, 375, 878
Nkrumah and the Ghana Revolution, 394
 NMU Pilot, 534
No Apology for Poetrie and Other Poems Written, 1922-1932, 675
No Arch, No Triumph, 676
 Nobel Peace Prize, 821
 Nockels, Edward N., 424
No for An Answer, 97
 No Frontiers News Service, 907
No Greater Glory, 667
No Hiding Place, 625
Nola Express, 838
 Noland, Edward D., 512
No More Fun and Games, 881, 884
 Nonconformity, 18
 Nonpartisan Jewish Workers Children's Schools, 917
 Non-Partisan League, 15, 214, 222, 241, 487, 558
 Noomin, Diane, 837
Nordamerikanischer Turnerbund, 790
No Retreat, 673
Norma Rae, 326
 Norris, Frank, 560
 Norse, Harold, 679
Norte, El, 558
 North, Alex, 157
 North American Committee on Latin America, 133
 North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, 562
 North American Congress on Latin America (NACLA), 563
 Northampton, Massachusetts, Association of Education and Industry, 832
 North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), 474, 636
Northern Lights, 558
 Northern Student Movement, 546
 North Irish Civil Rights Association, 386
North Star Country, 441
 Norwegian Americans, 563
 Norwegian Labor Club, 563
No Smoke, 676
 "No Tests—East or West," 891
Not Guilty, 188
Note on Literary Criticism, A, 215
Notes From the Second Year, 884
Notes on Dialectics, 393
Nothing Like It, 48
Nothing More Than Murder, 624
Not Without Laughter, 336
 Novack, George, 188, 516, 544, 603, 778, 830
 Novel, radical. See Radical novel, 1870-1930.
 Novick, Paysakh (Paul), 347, 563-564, 916
 Novy Mir, 693, 708, 709
 Now, 678
 Nowak, Margaret Collingwood, 565
 Nowack, Stanley, 35, 564-565, 611, 612, 642
Now and After: The ABC of Communist Anarchism, 84
Now and on Earth, 624
Now Voices, The, 551
 Noyes, Henry, 553
 Noyes, John Humphrey, 89
 Nuclear fallout, 595
 Nuclear freeze movement, 598
 Nuclear Test Ban Treaty (1963), 596
Nude and Natural, 540
Number One, 196
Number One Son, 553
 Nuorteva, Santeri, 693
Nuovo Mondo, Il, 390
 Nuyorican Poet's Cafe, 654
 Nye, Russell B., 338
 Nykino, 667, 668
 Nye Senate Committee, 316
Ny Tid, 563
O
 Oakes, Grant, 127, 854, 855
 Oakland general strike of 1946, 567
Oakland Labor World, 443
 Oak Publications, 749
Obrana, 172
 O'Brien, Charles M., 642
Occupied Country, 678
 Ochs, Phil, 232, 283, 750
 O'Connor, Harvey, 174, 223, 698, 872, 903
 O'Connor, James, 320, 614
 O'Connor, Jessie, 223
October, 157, 449
October Heat, 627
 October League (OL), 473, 474, 475
 October Revolution, 770
 "October Revolution, The" (jazz festival), 397
 Odeh, Alex, 58
 O'Dell, Jack, 136, 242
 Odets, Clifford, 325, 567-568, 616
 Odetta, 232
 O'Dwyer, Thomas J., 872
 Oehler, Hugo, 568-569, 793
 Oehlerites, 568
Of Being Numerous, 675
 Office of Price Administration (OPA), 503, 696
 Office of Strategic Services (OSS), 3, 510, 736
 Office Workers Dance Group, 505
 Offner, Mortimer, 618
Off our backs, 569-570, 881, 884
 Oglesby, Carl, 443
 O'Hare, Francis Patrick, 570, 571
 O'Hare, Kate Richards, 451, 515, 570-571, 735, 898
 Ohmann, Richard, 449
 Ohta, Tashi, 739
 Oil!, 749
 Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers, 424
 Oklahoma Farmers Union, 14
 "Oklahoma Hills," 284
Oklahoma Leader, 44
 Olay, Maximiliano, 792
 Old Guard (Socialist Party), 771, 924
 Old Tassel, 34
 Old-Time Printers Association, 379
Old Ways, The, 665
 Oleo Strut GI Coffee House, 268
 Olerich, Henry, 48
 Olgin, Moissaye J., 404, 564, 571-572, 643, 644, 903
 Oliver, Herbert, 787
 Oliver, Sidney, 488
 Olsen, Tillie, 449, 572-573
 Olson, Charles, 552
 Olson, Culbert, 119, 300, 460, 512
 Omaha Platform (People's Party), 13
O Mountaineers!, 674
 Om Theater, 615
On Doing Time, 705
One Big Union Monthly, 793
 One Big Union Movement, 366
One Foot in America, 701
100 Flowers, 551
One Magazine, 258
One Man's Initiation-1917, 196
One Murder Too Many, 625
 One-Act Experimental Theater, 900
 O'Neal, James, 40
One-Dimensional Man, 477-478, 547, 603
 Oneida Community, 89

- O'Neill, Eugene, 221, 274, 540
One-Third of a Nation, 900
One-Way Ticket, 337
On Freedom's Side: An Anthology of American Poems of Protest, 676
On Journey, 732
Only Humans with Songs to Sing, 552
Only the Years, 677
Ono, Yoko, 243
Onsonis, Jim, 137
On The Drumhead: A Selection from the Writing of Mike Quin, 621
On the Line, 810
On the Road, 77
On the Ward, 676
On the Waterfront, 326
Opatoshu, Joseph, 671
Open City, 838
"Open Door," 876
Oppen, George, 675
Oppenheim, James, 740
Oppenheimer, J. Robert, 624, 648, 706, 728
Oral History of the American Left Collection, 698
Orange Tree, The, 678
Orbis Books, 446
O'Reilly, Leonora, 386, 387, 745
Organizational Weapon, The, 783
Organization of African Unity, 8
Organization of American Historians, 876
Organization of Patriotic Haitian Women, 285
Organization of Puerto Rican Revolutionary Workers, 653
Organized Labor and the Black Worker, 1619-1973, 234
Organizer, 500
Organizing Committee for an Ideological Center, 475
Organizing Institute, 925
Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State, The, 51, 141, 436, 514, 515, 660, 892
Origins and History of the Cold War, The, 144
Orlemanski, Stanislaus, 36
Ornitz, Sam, 241, 325, 622, 671
Orozco, Jose Clemente, 523
Orpheus, 674
"Oscar" (Academy Award), 428
Osman, Arthur, 192, 193, 454
Oswald, Lee Harvey, 170
Other America, The, 289, 772
Otto-Walster, August, 267
Our America, 241
Our Cancer Year, 837
Our Daily Bread, 460
Our Dead Behind Us, 678
Our Union, 845
Outlaw Years, The, 624
Outlet, 872
Outlook, 581
Out of This Furnace, 637
Out of This World: An Anthology of Fantasy, 724
Outward Room, The, 676
Overthrow, 919
Ovington, Mary White, 199, 573
Owen, Chandler, 167, 200, 684
Owen, Robert, 128, 606
Owen, Robert Dale, 89, 794
Owen, William C., 82
Owenism, 858
Oxford Book of American Verse, 482
Oxford Classical Dictionary, 142
Oxford Pledge, 577, 802
"Ozark Set, The" 747
- P
P.O.V., 559
Paci, Enzo, 603
Pacific, 623
Pacific Foundation, 575-576
Pacific Radio, 46, 575-576, 595
Pacific Coast IWA, 130
Pacific Coast Woman's Press Association, 270
Pacific Maritime Association, 374
Pacific Street Collective, 559
Pacifism, 576-578
Pacifism and Invasion, 336
Packinghouse Workers, 578-579
Paddock, Robert L., 562
Padmore, George, 7, 393
Page, Kirby, 593, 907
Page, Myra, 255
Pageant of the Paterson Strike, 281, 590
Pageant Players, 615
Paglia, Camille, 888
Paine, Thomas, 34, 382, 579-580
Painters Union, 342
Palante, 923
Palda, Lev, 171
Palestine, 837
Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), 437
Palmer, A. Mitchell, 683
Palmer Raids, 27, 147, 219, 417, 441, 564, 692, 755
Pan-African Caucus, 10
Pan-African Congresses, 200, 201
Pan Afrikan People's Arkestra, 397
Pan-American Union, 738
Pan-American Unity (mural), 699
Panic, 677
Pannekoek, Anton, 189, 896
Panther and the Lash, The, 337
Papa's Own Girl, 669
Papayanis, Nicolas, 209
Paper Tiger, 615
Parade, 507
Paradise Lost, 568
Paradise Now, 615
Parce, Lida, 515
Paris Commune, 239, 379, 382, 736
Paris World Congress for Peace, 201
Paris Yiddish Congress (1937), 644
Park, Robert E., 664, 782
Park Avenue: North and South, 604
Parker, Dorothy, 3, 339, 516, 580, 637, 717
Parker, George Wells, 167
Parker, Mike, 350
Parker, Theodore, 314
Parks, Larry, 325
Parks, Rosa, 137, 191, 310
Parlor socialists, 580-581
Parmelee, Maurice, 540
Parnell, Charles, 265
Parola dei Socialisti, La, 390
Parola del Popolo, La, 388
Parola Proletaria, La, 390
Parrington, V. L., 449
Parsons, Albert, 296, 297, 378, 418, 581, 582, 903
Parsons, Lucy, 246, 296, 356, 581-582, 903
Parsons, Talcott, 783
Participatory Democracy, 582-583
Partido la Raza Unida, El, 493
Partido Liberal Mexicano (PLM), 227, 228, 492, 495, 496
Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista, 463, 792
Partido Revolucionario Cubano, 911
Partisan, 656
Partisan Review, 44, 56, 406, 469, 583-584, 617, 637, 648, 675, 782, 829
Partito Socialista della Pennsylvania, 389
Part of the Solution, 552
Part of the Truth, 309
Party Builder, 585
"Party Building is Our Central Task," 473
Party of Haitian Workers, 285
Party Organizer, 585
Party Politics in the West Indies, 394
Party Workers School, 462
Passage after Midnight, 674
Passage to Danger, 625
Passaic, New Jersey, 229
Passaic Relief Committee, 587
Passaic Textile Strike of 1926, 27, 585-587
Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti, The, 217
Passover, 917
Passport to the War, 676
Patchen, Kenneth, 56, 638, 674
Paterson, New Jersey, anarchism, 587-589
Paterson Pageant, 281, 590
Paterson Singing Society, 404
Paterson Strike of 1913, 357, 589-590
Pathfinder Press, 376
Patlan, Ray, 524
Patria, 911
Patten, Simon, 541
Patterson, Joseph, 581
Patterson, Louise Thompson, 590-591
Patterson, Orlando, 872
Patterson, William L., 369, 375, 494, 591-592
Paul, Alice, 96, 882
Paul, Eliot, 625
Paul Ardenheim, the Monk of Wissahickon, 448
Pauling, Ava Helen, 891
Pauling, Linus, 664
Pause to Wonder, 724
Pavanne for a Fading Memory, 674
Paver, Chaver, 339
Pavlov, Ivan, 646
Patton, Tom, 233, 750, 847
Peace and Freedom Party, 119, 348
Peace Information Center, 201
Peacemakers, 186, 577
Peace March, 676
Peace movements, 592-598
Peace Now, 645
Peck, Gregory, 326
Peck, Jim, 577
Pecka, Joseph, 171
Pedagogy of the Oppressed, 205
Peekskill, U.S.A.: A Personal Experience, 217
Peekskill riots, 598-599
Pekar, Harvey, 837
Peltier, Leonard, 599-600
Pen and Hammer Clubs, 645
Penelope, 626
Penino, Pedro, 225
Penn, William, 606
Penn School, Beaufort, South Carolina, 415
Pennsylvania Magazine, 579

- Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor, 483
Pentimento, 307
 People, 763, 764
People, The, 184, 763, 764. See also Daily People; Weekly People.
People of the Abyss, 457
People of the Cumberland, 668
 People's Art Guild, 70
 Peoples Auditorium, 406
 People's College, 898
 People's Council of America for Peace and Democracy, 593, 770
People's Daily World, 600
 People's Democratic Party, 652
 People's Educational Camp Society (PECS), 686
People's Forests, The, 663
 People's House, 685
 People's Institute of Applied Religion, 875
 People's National Movement, 394
 People's National Party, 195
 People's Painters, 524
 People's Party (1970s), 440. See also Populism.
 People's Pocket Series, 451
People's Songs, 231, 749
 People's Theaters, 786
People's Tribune, 473
 People's Unemployment League, 840
 People's University, 611
People's Voice, 86
People's Weekly World, 155, 286
People's World, 119, 283, 363, 461, 503, 600, 621, 656, 676
People Talk, The, 622
People versus Blatcher: Black Men and White Law in Bedford-Stuyvesant, 626 Perelman, S. J., 339
 Peret, Benjamin, 173
 Peretz, I. L., 913
 Peretz, Martin, 333, 683
 Perez, Ana, 750
Perfect Motherhood, 48
 Performance Group, Chicago, 615
 Perlin, Marshall, 705
 Perlman, Fredy, 47
 Perlman, Selig, 899
 Perlo, Victor, 316
 Perls, Fritz, 275
 Permanent Fair Practices Commission, 461
Permit Me Refugee, 673
Perplexed Philosopher, A, 266
 Perusek, Glenn, 896
 Pesotta, Rose, 600-601
- Peter, Paul and Mary, 232
 Peters, John, 728, 730
 Peters, Nancy Joyce, 809
 Petersen, Arnold, 187, 601, 765
 Peterson, Esther, 883
 Peterson, Willie, 369
 Petras, James, 431
 Petric, Faith, 816
 Petrograd Soviet, The, 82
 Pfaff, Ken, 350
 Phelps, Elizabeth Stuart, 49, 669
 Philadelphia Labor College, 898
 "Philadelphia Lawyer," 283
Philadelphia Negro: A Social Study, 199, 782
Philip Meyer's Scheme: A Story of Trade-Unionism, 81
 Phillips, Charles Francis, 672
 Phillips, Elsie Cole, 303
 Phillips, John Franklyn, 48-49
 Phillips, Utah, 234, 816
 Phillips, Wendell, 383, 658, 752
 Phillips, Wilbur C., 303
 Phillips, William, 71, 406, 584, 648
 Philosophy, 601-603
Philosophy and Revolution, 202
Phoenix and the Tortoise, The, 677
Phone tou Ergatou, 276
 Photography, 603-606
 Photo League, 604, 605. See also Film and Photo League.
 Photo Notes, 604
 Phyllis, 626
 Physicians for a National Health Program, 306
 Physicians for Social Responsibility, 304
 Physicians Forum, 304, 305
Physicians' Manual of Birth Control, 419
 Picabia, Francis, 173
 Picasso, Pablo, 704
 Pickens, William, 31
 Pickett, Clarence, 872
 Pickett, George, 453
Pictures of a Gone World, 77
Pie in the Sky, 667
 Piercy, Marge, 552, 553, 726
 Pierre Degeyer Club, 157
 Pietist communes in Pennsylvania, 606-607
 Pietri, Pedro, 552
 Pillin, William, 674
 Pillsudski, Josef, 611
Pilot, 908
 Pimpino, Luigi, 253
 Pinchot, Cornelia Bryce, 159
 Pinchot, Gifford, 661
 Pine Ridge Reservation, 599
Pins and Needles, 372
- Pinski, David, 671
 Pinto, Augusto, 631
 Pioneer Aid and Support Association of Chicago, 791
 Pioneer Publishers, 742
Pioneers of American Freedom, 703
Pioneer Woman, 780
 Pioneer Youth of America, Socialist Party, 807
 Pirinsky, George, 35, 36
 Pittsburgh Congress, 45, 794
Pittsburgh Courier, 7
 Pittsburgh Manifesto, 517, 791
 Pittston Coal Company Strike, 897
Pitt Street, 604
Pity Is Not Enough, 307, 638
 Piven, Frances Fox, 614
 Pizana, Aniceto, 491
Plan B, 626
Plan de San Diego, El, 491
Plane and the Shadow, The, 677
 Planned Parenthood, 91
 Platt, David, 666
Plebe, La, 826
 Plechanov, George, 560
 Pledge of Resistance Campaign, 430
Plow That Broke the Plain, The, 668
 Plumb Plan, 426
Plum Plum Pickers, The, 553
 Plunder, 622
 PM, 177, 293, 510, 530, 607-608, 798
 Poale Tzion (Labor Zionist) Movement, 246, 779
 Poale Tzion Singing Society, 404
 Pocket Library of Socialism, 125
Poems (Kenneth Fearing), 673
Poems (William Pillin), 674
Poems and Prints, 678
Poems for a Prose Age, 677
Poems for Workers, 672
Poems of Justice, 671
 "Poems of 1917" (dance), 504
Poems of the Chinese Revolution, 675
Poet in New York, 676
 Poetry, 1870-1930, 608-611
 Poetry, radical. See Radical poetry, 1930s-1960s.
Poetry and Prose of Heinrich Heine, The, 678 Poetry Society of America, 480
Poets, Poetics and Politics: America's Literary Community Viewed from the Letters of Rolfe Humphries, 1910-1969, 676
Poets of Today, 679
- Pogeny, Joseph ("John Pepper"), 423, 819
 Pohl, Frederik, 251, 725, 726
 Point Loma, 117
Point of Order, 556
Poison Penmanship: The Gentle Art of Muckraking, 503
 Poitier, Sidney, 288, 871
 Polanyi, Karl, 866
 Policy Alternatives for the Caribbean and Central America, 432
 Polier, Shad, 368
 Polish Americans, 611-612
 Polish Bund, 404
 Polish Bureau, 611
 Polish National Alliance, 611
Political Affairs, 286
 Political Arts Documentation/Distribution, 598
 Political Deportations, 612-613
Political Economy of Growth, 76, 511, 658
 "Political Economy of Women's Liberation, The," 886
Political Man, 783
Political Science Quarterly, 183
Political Self-Portrait, 675
 Political studies, 613-614
 Political theater, 1960s-1980s, 614-616
Political Thought of James Foreman, The, 438
Political Unconscious, The, 449
Politics and History in Band Societies, 436
Politics is Murder, 625
Politics magazine, 46, 163, 275, 469, 577, 594, 595, 646, 829
 "Politics of Housework, The," 885
 Pollak, Walter H., 417
 Polonsky, Abraham, 618, 622, 845
 Pomeroy, William, 178
 Poole, Ernest, 581, 670
 Poor People's Campaign, 710
Pop, 1280, 624
 Pope, Abner J., 244
 Pope, Generoso, 388
 Popular culture, 616-620
Popular Culture and High Culture, 619
 Popular fiction, 620-627
 Popular Front, 176, 555, 627-630, 868, 921
 "Popular Wobbly, The," 816
 Populism, 12, 13 81, 117, 181
Populist Movement in the U.S., The, 702
Portable Walter: From the Prose and Poetry of Walter Lowenfels, The, 679

- Porter, David, 793
 Porter, Elliot, 664
 Port Huron Statement, 289, 294, 546, 582, 783, 804
 Portman, Julie, 615
Portrait of America (mural), 699
Portrait of a Tenement, 604
Portugal's Revolution, 278
 Portuguese Alliance, 631
 Portuguese Americans, 630-631
Port Unknown, 623
 Portz, Chuck, 616
 Post, Louis F., 126, 612
 Postal Workers of America, 649
Post-Scarcity Anarchism, 99
 Potash, Irving, 249
 Potter, Grace, 48
 Pound, Ezra, 677
Poverty, Yesterday and Today, 440
 POW, 269
 Powderly, Terrence V., 385, 418, 873
 Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr., 30, 536, 696
 Powell, John Wesley, 513
 Powell, Adam Clayton, Jr., 151
Power Elite, The, 497, 781
Power Elite and the State, The, 781
Powerful Long Ladder, 676
Power House, The, 622
 Powers, J. F., 123
 Poyntz, Juliet Stuart, 371, 416, 631-632
Practice of Absence, The, 678
"Prairie Legend," 747
 Prayer Pilgrimage to Washington, 684
"Preacher and the Slave, The," 312
"Preamble to the IWW, The," 184
 Preis, Art, 778
Premiere, 559
 Pre-party formations, 632
 President's Commission on the Status of Women, 883
 President's Council on Farm Tenancy, 490
Press and the Cold War, The, 532
 Pressman, Lee, 316, 368, 851
Pretty Boy, 624
 Price, George M., 708
 Price, Victoria, 731
Pride of the Marines, 325
Primitive, 675
 Primus, Pearl, 507
 Prine, John, 232
Prisoners of Poverty, 120
Prison Memoirs of an Anarchist, 84
 Pritchett, Harold, 380, 381
Private Killing, A, 622
"Prize Fight Studies" (dance), 504
Problems of Soviet Literature, 621
Processed World, 341
Processional, 222, 434, 435, 701
Producers and Parasites, 414
Producers News, 14, 214
 Professional and academic journals. See Radical professional and academic journals.
Profits and Wages, 702
Progress, 708, 798
Progress and Poverty, 264, 265, 266
 Progressive, 632-635
 Progressive AFL Committee for Political and Legislative Action, 633
 Progressive Cigarmakers, 762
 Progressive Citizens of America, 152, 633
 Progressive Cloak Makers, 370
Progressive Dentist, 302, 364
 Progressive education, 205
 Progressive history, 633
 Progressive International Committee, 856
 Progressive Labor Party (PL), 472, 475, 553, 805
Progressive magazine, 426, 440, 634, 635
Progressive Miner, 635
 Progressive Miners of America (PMA), 635-636, 793, 856
 Progressive Party (1924), 15, 84
 Progressive Party (1948), 16, 201, 208, 213, 214, 235, 277, 316, 423, 532, 565, 594, 633, 640, 636-637, 753, 755, 814, 817, 854, 855, 922, 924, 927
Progressive Woman (Socialist Woman/Progressive Woman), 480, 570, 776-777, 874
 Progressive Youth Organizing Committee, 922
 Progressive Zionist Caucus, 781
 Progressive Zionist League, 781
Progresso Italo-Americano, II, 388, 828
 Progress Publishers, 375
Proletarec, 753, 767
Proletarian and Petit-Bourgeois, The, 442
 Proletarian and radical writers, 637-641
 Proletarian Artists and Writers League, 435
Proletarian Literature in the United States: An Anthology, 673, 674, 676
Proletarian News, 413
 Proletarian Party, 126, 189, 413, 564, 641-642, 793
Proletarian Revolution in Russia, The, 147, 239
 Proletarian Unity League, 475
 Proletarian University, 413, 414, 514, 641, 642
 Proletarian Writers Group, 643
"Proletariat Across the Ages," 184
Proletario, II, 46, 271, 389, 610, 642-643, 826
Prolet Buhne, 900
 Proletcult, 405, 540
Proletcult (Portland and Seattle), 406
Proletpen, 643-644
Promise and Pitfalls of Revolution, The, 440
Promoting Enduring Peace, 39
Prophet and the Ass, The, 338
Prophetic Tradition in American Poetry, The, 678
Prosveta, 753
Protection or Free Trade, 266
Protesta Humana, La, 588
 Protocol of Peace, 371
 Proudhon, Pierre-Joseph, 45, 832
 Proudhonists, 92
 Provincetown Players, 863
 Psychiatry and psychology, 644-647
Psychoanalysis, 647-649
Psychoanalysis and Feminism, 649
 Psychologists for a Democratic Society, 646
Psychologists League Journal, 645
 Public Art Workshop, 525
 Public Citizen, 305
 Public sector unions, 649-650
Public Speech, 677
Puck, 919
Pueblos Hispanos, Los, 652
 Puerto Rican Independence Cause, 923
Puerto Rican Obituary, 552
 Puerto Rican Revolutionary Workers Organization, 473
 Puerto Ricans, 429, 476, 650-654
 Puerto Rican Socialist Party (PSP), 653
 Puerto Rican Solidarity Committee, 76
 Puerto Rican Workers Organization, 923
 Pulitzer Prize, 749
 Pullman Strike, 763
Pullman Strike, The, 125
"Pumpkin Papers," 317
 Punk rock, 47
Pure at Heart, The, 435
- Q
Quadragesimo anno, 123
Quaker City, or the Monks of Monk Hall, The, 448
Quaker City Weekly, 448
 Quest for Peace Campaigns, 430
Question Sociale, La, 253, 587, 588
 Quill, Michael, 386, 534, 655-656
 Quin, Mike, 600, 621, 656
Quitting Time, 250, 553
- R
 Rabinowitz, Matilda, 357
 Rabinowitz, Victor, 813
 Raboi, Isaac, 916
 Race, 671
Races of Man, The, 159
 Race suicide, 90
 Radcliffe Institute, 572
 Radical abolitionists, 657-658
Radical America, 41, 47, 261, 551, 603, 680, 681, 760, 809, 896
Radical America Komiks, 341
 Radical economics, 658-660
 Radical Education Project (SDS), 681
 Radical environmentalism, 660-666
 Radical filmmaking, 1930s, 666-668
 Radical films. See Union-sponsored radical films.
Radical History Review, 41, 680, 681, 760
Radicalism in America, 440
 Radical novel, 1870-1930, 669-671
Radical Philosophers' Newsletter, 680
 Radical Philosophy Association, 603
 Radical Pietists, 607
 Radical poetry, 1930s-1960s, 671-679
 Radical professional and academic journals, 679-681
Radical Religion, 133, 680
 Radical Republicans, 688, 689
Radical's America, A, 810
 Radical Socialist Club, San Francisco, 351
Radical Sociologists and the Movement, 783
Radical Teacher, 449, 680

- Radical Therapist*, 646
 Radical Therapy Collective, 646
Radnicka Straze, 166
Radnicki Glas, 166
Radnik, 166
Radnika Borba, 753
 Radosh, Ronald, 705
Rag, 341
 Rahv, Philip, 406, 584, 648
Railroad Notes, 344
 Railroad strike of 1877, 171, 681-682
 Rainbow Coalition, 242, 475, 530
Rainbow Walker, The, 678
Rain of Ashes, 674
Raisin in the Sun, A, 287, 288
 Raitt, Bonnie, 232
Raivaaja, 226, 227
Rakoczi, 343
 Rakosi, Carl, 675
 Ramkavar Freedom Party, 68
 Rammel, Hal, 809
Ramparts magazine, 95, 682-683
 Rand, Carrie Sherfey, 685
 Randall, Margaret, 551-552
 Randolph, A. Philip, 3, 9, 27, 137, 167, 200, 455, 535, 536, 683-685, 709, 710, 769, 871, 878
 Randolph, John, 39, 222, 325
 Randolph, Pashal Beverly, 809
 Rand School of Social Science, 27, 203, 344, 503, 580, 632, 685-686, 697, 771, 898, 902, 924
 Rank, Otto, 646
 Ransom, John Crowe, 482
 Ransom, Reverdy C., 199
 Rantauzzo, James, 461
 Raoul, William, 86
 Rapf, Maurice, 618
 Rapp, George, 606
 Rapp, Herbert, 686
 Rappaport, Charles, 209
 Rapp-Coudert Committee, 321
 Rapp-Coudert Inquiry, 234, 686-687
 Rashi, 918
 Raskin, Marcus, 503
 Rauschenberg, Robert, 619
 Rauschenbusch, Walter, 131, 133, 136
 Rautenstrauch, Walter, 728, 730
 Ravitz, Justin, 437, 439
Raw, 837
Raw Edge, The, 622
Rawhide, 623
 Rawick, George, 556, 896
 Ray, Man, 173, 174, 518
 Ray, Nicholas, 900
 Raya, Marcos, 525
 Rayburn, Sam, 353
 Raymond, Phil, 850
 Raynes, Rose, 208
 Raysen, Abraham, 247
 Razafkieriefio, Andrae (Andy Raza), 166-167, 396
 Razran, Gregory, 645
 Read, Pat, 793
Ready for the Tiger, 623
 Reagan, Ronald, 325, 430
 Reagon, Bernice, 750
Real Cool Killers, 626
 Realignment, 687-688
 Realignment Caucus, 290
Realist, 340
Reason and Revolution: Hegel and the Rise of Social Theory, 478, 603
Rebel, The (1890s), 413
Rebel, The (1910s), 14, 767
 Rebel art, 505
 Rebel Dance Group, 505
Rebel Girl, The, 230
Rebel Poet, 56, 160, 672
 Rebel Poet's Society, 672
Rebellion in Newark, 294
Rebellion of the Hanged, 639-640
Rebel Worker, 808
 Recht, Charles, 464
 Reclus, Elisé, 588
 Reconstruction, 688-690
 Reconstruction, 41
Reconstruction: The Battle for Democracy, 40, 200, 375
 Recreation Farm, 59
Red Channels, 97, 219
 Red Clay Ramblers, 233
Red Cock, 644
 Red Dancers, 505
Red Death, A, 627
Redder Than the Rose, 339
Red Detachment of Women, The, 557
 Red diaper baby, 690-691
 Red Family, 295
 Redford, Robert, 326, 600
 Redgrave, Vanessa, 326
Red Harvest, 287, 869
Red Menace, The, 326
Red Renaissance, 674
Reds, 326
 Red Scare (1910s-1920s), 343, 691-692
Red Spark (Cleveland), 406
 Red Special Tour, 717
 Red Squads, 698
 "Red Square," Tyronza, Arkansas, 502
Red Star Over China, 757
 Red Tide, 349
 Reece, Florence, 310
 Reed, Evelyn, 515, 778
 Reed, Ishmael, 552, 553
 Reed, John, 229, 271, 280, 281, 326, 431, 446, 540, 581, 590, 610, 692-694, 740
Reedy's Mirror, 717
 Reese, James, 396
Reflections of a Neoconservative, 544
Reflections on the Revolution in France, 579
 Refregier, Anton, 70, 524
Regenaración, 46, 227, 228
Regina, 97
 Regroupment, 694
 Reich, Annie, 648
 Reich, Wilhelm, 49, 256, 515, 540, 646, 647, 648
 Reid, James P., 818
 Reinecke, Aiko, 292
 Reinecke, John, 292
 Reinstein, Boris, 187, 819
 Reiss, Bernard, 646
 Reissig, Herman F., 562
 Reitzel, Robert, 243, 248, 694-695
 Religion and Socialism Commission, Democratic Religious Task Force on El Salvador, 430
Religious Socialism, 133
 Rella, Ettore, 677
Remembrance Rock, 717
 Renner, Al, 642
 Rent strikes, New York City, 695-697
 Reorganized United Miners Workers Union, 856
 Replansky, Naomi, 679
Report to the Stockholders and Other Poems, 678
Reprints from the Soviet Press, 621
 Reproductive Rights National Network (R2N2), 1
 Republic, 387
 Republican Party, 689
 "Republic of the Penniless," 840
Rerum novarum, 123, 386
 Rescue Ship, 580
 Research libraries and reading rooms, 697-699
 Resek, Carl, 515
 Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC), 799
 Resettlement Administration, 738
Resistance Haitienne, 285 ax
 "Resistance to Civil Government," 821
Response to Lenin, 162
 Resurrection City, 739
 Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union (RWDSU), 193
Rethinking Marxism, 449, 760, 784
Rethinking Schools, 206
Retort, 275
Return Again Traveler, 677
Return of Lanny Budd, 749
Return to Life, 668
Return to My Native Land, 808
 Reuben, William A., 530, 704, 705
 Reuben Reuben, 97
Reunion in Poland, 620
 Reuther, Sophie, 771, 772
 Reuther, Victor, 407, 771, 851
 Reuther, Walter, 20, 407, 537, 742, 851, 855
Reveil des Mineurs, Le, 240 ax
 Review, 866
Review of Radical Political Economics, 658, 760
 Reville, Louise, 588
Revolt, 512
 "Revolt" (dance), 504
Revolt Among the Sharecroppers, 415
Revolution, 473
Revolution and Counter-Revolution in Spain, 793
 Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), 94, 137, 298, 437
Revolutionary Age, 433, 462, 463
 Revolutionary Communist League, 473
 Revolutionary Communist Party (RCP), 473, 474, 475
 "Revolutionary March" (dance), 504
 "Revolutionary Poems," 552
 Revolutionary Policy Committee (Socialist Party), 62, 87, 415, 462
Revolutionary Socialism, 239
 Revolutionary Socialistic Party, 794
 Revolutionary Socialist League, 349
 Revolutionary tendency, 349
 Revolutionary Union (RU), 473
 Revolutionary Union Movement (RUM), 436, 437, 438
Revolutionary Worker, 473
 Revolutionary Workers Headquarters, 474, 475
 Revolutionary Workers League, 440, 568, 793
 Revolutionary Youth Movement (RYM), 472
Revolution Cuban Style, 278
Revolution for the Hell of It, 323
Revolution Is to Be Human, The, 679
Révolution Surréaliste, La, 174
 Revueltas, Rosaura, 846
 Rexroth, Kenneth, 71, 77, 575, 677
 Reynolds, Mack, 726
 Reynolds, Malvina, 120, 232, 749
 Rhymes for the Irreverent, 288

- Rhymes of Early Jungle Folk, 128
 Rice, Elmer, 337
 Rice, Owen, 853
 Rice-Maximin, Edward, 209
 Rich, Adrienne, 886
 Richardson, Thomas, 786
 Richland County Citizens Committee, 748
 Richmond, Al, 600
 Richter, Hermann, 186, 187
 Ride a Paper Tiger, 626
 Ridge, Lola, 610
 Ridgefield Gazook, 174
 Ridgeway, James, 683
 Riebe, Ernest, 360
 Riegger, Wallingford, 746
 Riesel, Victor, 846
 Rieve, Emil, 31
 Rifas, Leonard, 837
 Rififi, 325
 Riggs, Lynn, 675
 Rights of Man, The, 579
 Right to Existence Group, 588, 589
 Right to Live Club, Providence, Rhode Island, 386
 Right to Strike, The, 126
 Right to Vote Campaign, 786
 Right to Vote Club, 335
 Riis, Jacob, 69, 604
 Riley, James Whitcomb, 609, 617
 Rinaldo, Fred, 340, 618
 Ring and the Lamp, The, 622
 Ring Song, 679
 Rip-Saw Mother Goose, The, 338
 Rise of David Levinsky, The, 115, 670
 Rise of Silas Lapham, The, 334
 Rise of the American Proletariat, The, 442
 "Rising of the Twenty Thousand" (1909 strike), 371
 Rising of the Women: Feminist Solidarity and Class Conflict, 1880-1917, 553
 Ritt, Martin, 325, 618
 River, The, 668
 Rivera, Dennis, 455, 654
 Rivera, Diego, 523, 699, 743
 Rivera, Librado, 227
 Rivera, Oscar Garcia, 30, 651
 Rivington Street, 553
 Roach, Max, 397, 398
 Road, The, 671
 Road is Rocky, The, 674
 Road to Freedom, 46, 601
 Road to Utterly: Poems Written by a Missouri Farmhand and Dedicated to Soviet Russia, 674
 Robbins, Bernard, 646
 Robbins, Trina, 836
 Robert F. Wagner Labor Archives, Tamiment Library, 686, 698
 Roberts, Ed, 190
 Roberts, Marguerite, 618
 Robertson, James, 830, 831
 Robeson, Eslanda, 6
 Robeson, Paul, 6, 134, 241, 242, 250, 287, 337, 363, 381, 530, 575, 591, 592, 598, 599, 668, 699-701, 871, 912
 Robinson, Boardman, 271, 447, 481
 Robinson, Cleveland, 193, 871
 Robinson, Earl, 157, 231, 363, 668, 698, 701
 Robinson, James Harvey, 685
 Robinson, Reid, 86, 869
 Robitnyk, 835
 Rochester, Anna, 344, 701-702
 Rock and Shell, 675
 Rockefeller, John D., 467
 Rockefeller, Nelson, 63
 Rucker, Rudolph, 247, 372, 413, 602, 702-703
 Rucker Publications Committee, 703
 Rocket to the Moon, 568
 Rocky Mountain Social League, 92, 385
 Roda, Maria, 588
 Rodeo, 162
 Rodney, Lester, 175, 176
 Rōdō Shimbun, 395
 Rodriguez, Irving Flores, 652
 Rodriguez, Spain, 836
 Roediger, David, 556
 Roemer, Milton, 305
 Roger and Me, 559
 Roger Bloomer, 434
 Rogers, J. A., 138
 Rogovin, Mark, 524, 525
 Rogovin, Milton, 605
 Roheim, Geza, 648
 Roiphe, Katie, 888
 Roland-Holst, Henrietta, 189
 Rolfe, Edwin, 626, 673
 Roll, Jordan, Roll, 41
 Rolland, Romain, 740
 Rollins, William, 255, 622
 Roll the Forbidden Drums, 677
 Romero, Oscar, 430, 597
 Romilly, Esmond, 503
 Rondani, Dino, 643
 Rongwrong, 173
 Roosevelt, Eleanor, 697, 784, 878, 922
 Roosevelt, Fay Emerson, 159
 Roosevelt, Franklin D., 4, 28, 37, 219, 372, 150, 190, 196, 460, 614, 651, 701, 749, 754, 771, 876, 905, 924
 Roosevelt, Theodore, 90, 213, 265, 581, 593, 633, 662
 Roosevelt Story, The, 701
 Root, Merrill, 677
 Rootabaga Stories, 717
 Root and Branch, 163
 Roots of the Modern American Empire, The, 876
 Rope of Gold, The, 307, 638
 Rorty, James, 42
 Rosaldo, Michelle, 892
 Rosa Luxemburg, Women's Liberation and Marx's Philosophy of Revolution, 202
 Rose, Alex, 28, 143
 Rose, Ernestine L., 208
 Rose, Jacqueline, 649
 Rosecrest Cell, The, 622
 Rose Door, The, 670
 Rosemont, Franklin, 808
 Rosemont, Penelope, 808
 Rosen, Samuel (Sam Ross), 623
 Rosenberg, Ethel, 54, 703
 Rosenberg, Harold, 71, 191
 Rosenberg, Julius, 54, 703, 704
 Rosenberg case, 153, 316, 326, 530, 531, 703-706, 735
 Rosenberg File, The, 705
 Rosenbergs: Poems of the United States, 676
 Rosenblum, Walter, 604
 Rosenfeld, Morris, 643, 913
 Rosenthal, Mel, 606
 Ross, Edward A., 782
 Ross, Robert J. S., 783
 Ross, Sam, 623
 Rosset, Barney, 77
 Rosten, Norman, 677
 Roszak, Theodore, 443
 Roth, Henry, 516
 Rothstein, Arthur, 604
 Rotkin, Michael, 522
 Rottger, Betty, 873
 Rounder Records, 233
 Rovnost Ludu, 767
 Rowan, James, 210
 Roxas, Danny, 225
 Roy, M. N., 297, 463
 Roycroft Chapel, 717
 Rozins, Fricis, 433
 Rubenstein, Bruce, 146
 Rubin, Jerry, 78, 294, 322, 918
 Rubin, Morris, 634
 Rubinow, I. M., 302
 Rubinstein, Annette, 470, 530, 694
 Rubinstein, H. J., 187
 Rudahl, Sharon, 837
 Rühle, Otto, 163
 Rukeyser, Muriel, 120, 674
 Rulers of America: A Study of Finance Capital, 702
 Runaround, 622
 Rusche, Georg, 164
 Ruskin, John, 57, 518, 732
 Ruskin College, 685, 776, 898
 Ruskin Colony, 706-707
 Russell, Bertrand, 137, 443, 451, 595, 685
 Russell, Charles Edward, 200
 Russian Americans, 707-709
 Russian Federation, 147
 Russian-Jewish Workingmen's Association, 707
 Russian Progressive Union, 707
 Russian Revolution, 182
 Russian Soviet Government Information Bureau, 693
 Russian War Relief, 38
 Russian Workingmen's Union, 707
 Russkii Novosti, 708
 Russkii Golos, 709
 Russkii Listok, 708
 Russko-Amerikanskii Vestnik, 708
 Rustin, Bayard, 136, 138, 443, 455, 577, 684, 709-710, 742, 772, 773, 871, 907, 925
 Ruthenberg, Charles E., 710-711
 Rutledge, Wiley B., 814
 Ryan, Frank, 363
 Ryan, Paul William. See Mike Quin.
 Ryan, Robert, 847
- S
 Sabotage, 189
 Sacco and Vanzetti, 97
 Sacco and Vanzetti Case, S, 54, 121, 207, 229, 272, 344, 369, 389, 441, 447, 580, 591, 601, 671, 713-716, 742, 827, 837, 848, 902, 915
 Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee, 182, 203
 Sadlowski, Edward, 842
 Sahara, 325, 435
 Said, Edward, 333
 Saidu, Fred, 288
 Sailors' Union of the Pacific, 373, 374, 716-717, 719
 Saima Aid Society, 226
 Saint Louis "Commune" (1877), 669
 Saint Louis Convention, People's Party, 873
 Saint Louis Platform, Socialist Party, 458, 593
 Salamander: A Legend, 669
 Salazar, Antonio, 630
 Salinger, J. D., 56
 Sally, 626
 Salome of the Tenements, 797
 Salsedo, Andrea, 714
 Salt, Henry S., 49
 Salt, Waldo, 618
 Salt Eaters, The, 553
 Salten, Felix, 317
 Salt Gifts, 678
 Salt of the Earth, 846, 847, 870
 Saltzman, Rubin, 381

- Salud! Poems and Sketches of Spain by American Writers*, 676
- Salute to Spring*, 441, 638
- Salutsky, J. B., 403, 404
- Salvador, 326
- Salvation, 674
- Samantha*, 626
- Sampson, Leon, 25
- Sampson, William, 279
- Samuel Adams School of Social Studies, 646
- Sanchez, Sonia, SS2
- Sanctuary Movement, 430, 446
- Sanctuary V*, 640
- Sandburg, Carl, 336, 481, S80, 610, 675, 693, 701, 717-718, 740
- Sand County Almanac*, 663
- Sanders, Bernard, S22, 798
- Sandhog*, 701
- San Diego, 118
- Sandinista Revolution, 350
- Sandor, Gluck, 222
- Sands, Carl, 738
- SANE. See Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy.
- Sane Society. The*, 248
- San Francisco Actors Workshop, 615
- San Francisco Chinese Students Club, 129
- San Francisco general strike (1934), 150, 718-720, 896
- San Francisco Labor Council, 719, 720
- San Francisco Mime Troupe, 341, S08, 614, 615
- San Francisco Oracle*, 838
- San Francisco State University strike, S49
- San Francisco Women's Union, 889
- Sanger, Margaret, 89, 90, 208, 280, 386, 720-721, 879
- Sanger, William, 720
- Sanial, Lucien, 240, 763
- Samminzhuyi Yanjiushe* (Association for the Study of the Three Principles of the People), 129
- Santa Cruz, California, city government, 119
- Santa Monica, California, city council, 295
- Santiago, Jose, 651
- Saposs, David, 365
- Sarabia, Manuel, 227
- Sarachild, Kathie, 884, 886
- Sarant, Alfred, 706
- Saroyan, William, 339, 637
- Sarrett, Lew, 610
- Sarria, José, 259
- Sartre, Jean-Paul, 169, 170, 470, S84, 704
- Sartre on Cuba*, 170
- Sartre Society of North America, 603
- Saturday Evening Post*, 428
- Saturday Review*, 309
- Sauer, Eva, 456
- Saumoneau, Louise, 380
- Savage, Augusta, S91
- Save Our Homes, 697
- Save the Union Movement, 825, S86
- Savio, Mario, 245
- Saxe, Al, 900
- Saypol, Irving, 703
- Sayre, John Nevin, S26
- Scales, Junius Irving, 721
- Scandinavian Communist Federation, S63
- Scandinavian Workers Club, S63
- Scanner Darkly, A*, SS3
- Scarlott, Jennifer, SS6
- Scates, Louis, 746
- Scenery of the Play, The*, 677
- Schapiro, Meyer, 71, 721-722
- Schappes, Morris U., 208, 401, 402, S17
- Schechner, Richard, 615
- Schecter, Amy, 255
- Schecter, Danny, SS9
- Schecter, Gladys, 143
- Scheer, Anne Weills, 295
- Scheer, Robert, 683
- Schevitsch, Sergei, S60, 707, 708
- Schiavina, Raffaele, 6
- Schiffirin, Anya, 608
- Schilling, George, 903
- Schlauch, Margaret, 724
- Schlesinger, Arthur, Jr., 145, 239, 636, 784
- Schlesinger, Benjamin, 371
- Schlossberg, Hattie, 411
- Schlossberg, Joseph, 21, 185, 780
- Schlüter, Hermann, S60
- Schmalhausen, Samuel, S08
- Schmeling, Max, 909
- Schmidt, Franz, 247
- Schmidt, James Norman, 621
- Schneider, Benno, 68
- Schneider, Isidor, 241, 673
- Schneider, Jack, 249
- Schneiderman, Rose, 745
- Schneiderman, William, 24
- Schneiderman v. United States*, 417
- Schneir, Miriam, 705
- Schneir, Walter, 705
- Schoenberg, Arnold, 97
- Schoenman, Ralph, 137
- Scholars, Artists and Writers for Social Justice, 843
- School for Jewish Studies, 405
- Schooling in Capitalist America*, 206
- Schreiner, Olive, 879
- Schroeder, Theodore, 246
- Schroeter, Eduard, 248
- Schulberg, Budd, 324, 639, 640
- Schuman, Frederick, 210
- Schumann, Peter, S07-S08, 615
- Schünemann-Pott, Friedrich, 248
- Schwab, Justus, 465
- Schwab, Michael, 297
- Schwartz, Delmore, S84, 675
- Schwartz, Louis, 461
- Schwartz, Maurice, S10
- Schweitzer, Louis, S75
- Schwendinger, Herman, 783
- Science, 722-723
- Science and History for Boys and Girls*, 128
- Science and Politics of I.Q., The*, 646
- Science and Society*, 40, 209, 210, 449, 602, 645, 646, 723-724, 782, 784, 876
- Science fiction and fantasy, 724-726
- Science of Political Economy, The*, 266
- Science of Revolutionary Warfare, The*, S17
- Scientific Humanitarian Committee, 256
- Scientists, 1920-1950, 726-730
- Scientists and Engineers for Social and Political Action, 723
- "Scissor Bill," 312
- Scott, Cyril K., 241
- Scott, Evelyn, 241
- Scott, Joan Wallach, 209
- Scott, Leroy, S81, 670
- Scott, Margaret Hunter, 49
- Scott, Robert Adrian, 325
- "Scottsboro Boys Shall Not Die, The," 746
- Scottsboro Case, 7, 27, 134, 157, 335, 337, 368, 369, 408, S05, S39, S80, S90, S91, 730-732, 877
- Scottsboro Defense Committee (SDC), 732
- Scoundrel Time*, 307, 326
- Screen Actors Guild (SAG), 325, 326, 618, 843
- Screen Writers Guild (SWG), 327, 328, S80
- Scudder, Vida Dutton, 732-733
- Seafarers International Union, 716
- Seale, Bobby, 95, 294, 322
- Seaman's Act, 426
- Sea of Tranquility, The*, 676
- Searching Wind, The*, 307
- Seascape*, 675
- Seattle general strike of 1919, 733-734
- Seattle Union Record*, 223
- Second Congress of the Communist International, 693
- Second Hurricane, The*, 162
- Second International, 130, 734-735, 764, 796
- Second International Congress, 270
- Second Sex, The*, 892
- "Second wave" of feminism, 882
- Secrets of Grown-Ups, The*, 622
- Secret work, 735-737
- Sedition Act, 458
- Seeger, Charles, 157, 737-738
- Seeger, Pete, 231, 234, 363, S75, 738-740, 749, 750, 816, 847
- Seeing Red*, SS8
- Seeley, John, 783
- Seidel, Edmund, 407
- Seidel, Emil, S21
- Sekula, Allan, 605
- Sel, 285
- Selected Poems* (Stanley Kunitz), 676-677
- Selections from the Prose and Poetry of Emma Lazarus*, 208
- Selective Service Act, 118, 691
- Seligmann, Kurt, 808
- "Sell-Out" (dance), S05
- Selsam, Howard, 399, 602
- Seltzer, Leo, 666, 667
- Seltzer, Thomas, 480
- Selznick, David O., 428
- Selznick, Philip, 783
- Sen, Katayama, 395
- Senate Civil Liberties Committee, 427
- Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, 650
- Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, 332
- Senate Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, 873
- Seneca Falls, New York, 882
- Serra, Rafael, 168
- Serrati, Giacinto Menotti, 643
- Servant-Master-Lover*, 434
- Service Employees International Union, 843
- Sessions, Roger, 161
- Seton, Ernest Thompson, 662
- Setzer, C. E., 361
- Sevareid, Eric, 120
- Seven Arts*, 100, 101, 241, 280, S19, 740-741
- Seven Days*, 186, 444
- Seven Poets in Search of an Answer: A Poetic Symposium*, 676, 677

- Seven Shares in a Gold Mine*, 625
- Seventh World Congress, Comintern, 71, 820
- 77 Sunset Strip, 625
- Seven Who Waited, The*, 627
- Sewell, William, 209
- Sexual Politics*, 886
- Sex-Pol, 49
- Sez, 551
- Shachtman, Max, 197, 289, 290, 332, 463, 544, 698, 741, 741-742, 772, 777, 778, 783, 829, 830, 900, 901
- Shadow, The*, 573
- Shadow Before, The*, 255, 622
- Shadow of the Hour, The*, 677
- Shadow of the Sun*, 678
- Shadow on the Hearth*, 726
- Shaefer, Jacob, 157, 404-405, 915
- Shaffer, Deborah, 558
- Shahn, Ben, 23 523, 524, 604, 742-743
- "Shakers, The" (dance), 504
- Shakespeare, William, 221, 451
- Shanker, Albert, 463, 773
- Shannon, John, 627
- Shapiro, Jacob, 250
- Shapiro, Karl, 56, 161
- Shapley, Harlow, 728, 729, 730
- Share Croppers Union (SCU), 87, 276, 502, 743-744
- Sharecroppers' Voice*, 502
- Sharecroppers Week, 502
- Sharp, Malcolm P., 705
- Sharpeville Massacre, 8
- Shaw, George Bernard, 221, 265, 299, 488, 699, 832
- Shaw, Irwin, 640
- Shawn, Ted, 504
- Shays, Daniel, 33
- Shays Rebellion, 33, 78
- Shearer, Derek, 683
- Shearer, Sybil, 507
- Sheehy-Skeffington, Hannah, 387
- Sheen, Fulton, 817
- Sheen, Martin, 526
- Shelley, Joshua, 325
- Shelley, Percy B., 609, 673
- Shelter Half GI Coffee House, 268
- Shelton, Gilbert, 341, 836, 837
- Shenandoah*, 675
- Shenkan, Isaac, 187
- Shepard, Paul, 665
- Shepp, Archie, 398
- Sheppard-Towner Maternity and Infancy Protection Act, 412
- Sheridan County, Montana, Left, 14
- Sheriffed*, 666
- Sherman, Charles O., 186, 356, 797
- Sherman, Susan, 552
- Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 181
- Sherrod, Charles, 750
- Sherwood Eddy seminars, 907
- Shils, Edward, 548
- Shinn, Everett, 69
- Shirley*, 626
- Shirtwaist Makers strike (1909), 386, 470, 554, 744-745
- Shocked, Michelle, 233
- Shoe Workers, 745-746
- Shoemaker, Joseph, 897
- Sholom Aleichem Folk Institute, 917
- Shop papers, 148
- Shop Stewards Body, 407
- Shop Talks on Economics*, 125, 479
- Short, Isaac, 417
- Show Boat*, 504
- Shule*, 402
- Shūsui, Kōtoku, 395
- Sibeko, David, 8
- Sidewalks Are Free, The*, 623
- Siegel, Eli, 677
- Siegel, Paul, 517, 778
- Siegmeister, Elie, 157, 746-747
- Sierra Club, 664
- Sigal, Clancy, 552
- Sigerist, Henry E., 304, 728
- Sigman, Morris, 371
- Signal, Dos*, 509, 644
- Signature of All Things, The*, 677
- Signatures*, 676
- Signs*, 892
- Sikh Kalhsa Diwan, 351
- Silas Timberman, 217
- Silber, Irwin, 531, 749
- Silences*, 572
- Silent Partner, The*, 669
- Silent Spring*, 663
- Silkwood*, 326
- Sillen, Samuel, 555
- Silverman, Hannah, 590
- Simkins, Andrew Whitfield, 747
- Simkins, Modjeska Monteith, 747-748
- Simmons, Ernest, 210
- Simon, Bud, 851
- Simon, Roger, 627
- Simone, Nina, 750
- Simons, A. M., 40, 356, 376, 423, 581, 662, 769
- Simplicissimus*, 338, 480
- Simpson, O. J., 888
- Simpson, "Sockless Jerry," 13
- Simpsons, The*, 341
- Sin and Society*, 782
- Sinatra, Frank, 120, 152, 634
- Sinclair, Upton, 30, 57, 82, 98, 119, 125, 243, 364, 451, 457, 459, 467, 571, 620, 637, 648, 664, 669, 670, 671, 748-749, 771, 796, 800
- Sing America!*, 676
- Singer, Peter, 51
- Sing for Your Supper*, 701
- Singing Cowboy: A Book of Western Songs*, 625
- Single Tax Clubs, 482
- Singlejack Books, 716
- Sing Out/Broadside*, 232, 233, 531, 749-750
- Sin in Their Blood*, 624
- Sin of the Prophet, The*, 639
- Sipapu*, 680
- Siporin, Mitchell, 406
- 'Sippi, 553
- Siqueiros, David Alfaro, 523, 524
- Siren Song*, 623
- Siskind, Aaron, 604
- Sissle, Noble, 396
- Sister Carrie*, 670
- Sisulu, Walter, 7
- Sitdown '37*, 615
- Sit-down strikes, 359, 750-751
- Six Black Camels*, 625
- Six Day War of 1967, 401
- Sixth World Congress, Young Communist International (YCI), 277
- Sixth World Congress of the Comintern, 86, 93
- Six to One: A Nantucket Idyl*, 78
- 60 Minutes*, 600
- Škarda, Frank, 171
- Sketches of Soviet Russia*, 677
- Skin Diving in the Virgins*, 676
- Skinner, B. F., 782
- Sklar, George, 622
- Sklar, Martin, 384, 805
- Skocpol, Theda, 784
- Skoglund, Carl, 194, 499, 500, 754, 777
- Slabs of the Sunburnt West*, 718
- Slater, George, 132
- Slaughter, Jane, 350
- Slave insurrections, 751-752
- Slavic American*, 35
- Sleep in Thunder*, 624
- Sleepy Lagoon Defense Committee, 158, 329, 396, 461
- Slenker, Elmina D., 48, 89
- Sloan, John, 70, 202, 280, 481, 721
- Slochow, Harry, 646
- Slovene National Benefit Society (SNPJ), 753
- Slovenian American National Council, 753
- Slovenian Americans, 753-754
- Slow Death comics*, 836
- Socialist Labor Party (SLP), 130, 160, 172, 268, 270, 276, 278, 281, 313, 340, 342, 351, 352, 356, 365, 370, 383, 406-407, 412, 418, 439, 447, 450, 457, 470, 482, 514, 560, 581, 601, 611, 642, 746, 790, 795, 796, 819, 852, 867
- Socialist Labor Party Papers, 698
- Slug It Lay*, 625
- Small, Albion, 782
- Small Changes*, 552
- Smashup*, 435
- Smedley, Agnes, 167, 555, 620, 754
- Smiley, Glen, 710
- Smith, Alfred, 372
- Smith, Anna, 353
- Smith, Arthur J., 388
- Smith, Bennie, 684
- Smith, Bernard, 448
- Smith, Betty, 375
- Smith, Charles, 37
- Smith, Clark Ashton, 808
- Smith, Elizabeth Oakes, 609, 669
- Smith, Eugene, 605
- Smith, Gerald L. K., 875
- Smith, Gibbs, 362
- Smith, Jack, 531
- Smith, Jessica, 4
- Smith, Sandra, 279
- Smith, Vern, 514
- Smith, William Kennedy, 888
- Smith Act, 3, 4, 39, 194, 277, 220, 300, 344, 374, 408, 416, 501, 530, 679, 721, 735, 777, 829, 878
- Smith Act trial, 1943, 754-755
- Smith Act trials, 1949, 755-757
- Smoke and Steel*, 717
- Smothers Brothers, 341
- Snothers Brothers Comedy Hour*, 739
- Snajdr, Václav, 171
- Snow, Edgar, 757
- Snow, Walter, 620
- Snyder, Gary, 77, 665
- Sobell, Helen, 705
- Sobell, Morton, 703, 705
- Soboul, Albert, 376
- Social action, 646
- Social Action Department, National Catholic Welfare Conference, 220
- Social Democracy of America, 181, 313, 315, 582
- Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania, 611

- Social Democrat*, 315
 Social Democratic Federation, 400, 443, 771, 772, 794, 906
Social-Democratic Herald, 717
 Social Democratic League, 581
 Social Democratic Party, 83, 256, 695, 746, 866
 Social Democratic Party (Germany), 478
 Social-Democratic Party of Lithuania, 450
 Social Democratic Women's Federation, 281
 Social Democrats, Milwaukee, 521
 Social Democrats USA (SDUSA), 216, 400, 709, 773, 843
Social-Economics Movements, 428
Social Forces in American History, 40
Social Frontier, 205
Social Gospel, 912
Socialism, 794
Socialism: Past and Future, 290
Socialism, Utopian and Scientific, 314, 319, 602
Socialism and Democracy, 784
Socialism for the Farmer Who Farms the Farm, 44
Socialism in Theory and Practice, 314
Socialism Made Easy, 125
Socialist, 582
 Socialist Action, 831
 Socialist Armenian Organization of the United States, 67
Socialist Call, 771, 821
 Socialist Caucus, American Public Health Association, 304
 Socialist Club, 462, 692
 Socialist Cooperative Publishing Association, Socialist Labor Party, 560
 Socialist Feminism, 757-760, 886
 Socialist Feminist Philosophers in Action, 603
 Socialist International Congress, 290
 Socialist Labor Party (SLP), 21, 83, 92, 98, 115, 117, 143, 183, 198, 217, 246, 301, 734, 760-766, 896
Socialist Labor Party, 1890-1930, 407
 Socialist Labor Party National Executive Committee, 130
 Socialist Party, 3, 9, 13, 14, 16, 20, 28, 40, 67, 83, 84, 96, 99, 121, 181, 184, 200, 214, 222, 236, 237, 261, 263, 268, 289, 290, 291, 299, 301, 329, 336, 342, 343, 344, 365, 371, 386, 391, 403, 407, 412, 423, 426, 427, 432, 447, 457, 457, 464, 470, 480, 489, 490, 554, 564, 570, 573, 577, 580, 581, 593, 594, 611, 632, 633, 644, 675, 684, 685, 687, 693, 695, 702, 708, 711, 734, 742, 753, 767-774, 780, 792, 793, 797, 820, 829, 840, 847, 848, 852, 855, 858, 867, 880, 901, 902, 905, 906, 906, 907, 927
 Socialist Party, Arkansas, 14
 Socialist Party, Flint, Michigan, 407
 Socialist Party, Louisiana, 14
 Socialist Party, National Executive Committee, 147, 570
 Socialist Party, Nebraska, 572
 Socialist Party, New York sections, 554
 Socialist Party, Oklahoma, 14
 Socialist Party, Polish section, 611
 Socialist Party, Puerto Rican section, 651
 Socialist Party, Texas sections, 14
 Socialist Party of Canada, 189
 Socialist People's College, 451
Socialist Perspectives, 556
 Socialist Primer, 128
 Socialist Propaganda League (SPL), 147, 433
Socialist Readings for Children, 128
Socialist Reconstruction of Society, The, 764
Socialist Revolution (Socialist Review), 41, 364, 384, 428, 681, 760, 806
 Socialist Scholars Conference, 773
Socialist Songs with Music, 362
Socialist Spirit, 796
 Socialist Sunday schools, 774-775
 Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance (ST&LA), 142, 143, 184, 198, 370, 470, 746, 763, 764, 775-776
 Socialist Unity, 350
Socialist Worker, 350
 Socialist Workers Chorus, 404
 Socialist Workers Party (SWP), 55, 121, 139, 194, 197, 213, 220, 221, 238, 261, 277, 350, 350, 407, 501, 545, 546, 597, 675, 694, 754, 777-779, 829, 830, 831, 900
 Socialist Zionism, 779-781
Socialized Medicine in the Soviet Union, 304
Social Justice, 784
 Social Revolutionary Party, 395
 Social Science Research Council, 10
 Social Science Study Club, 924
 Social Security Act (1935), 190
 Social Service Employees Union (SSEU), 650
Social Significance of the Modern Drama, The, 274, 448
Social Text, 449
Social Work Today, 645
Sociedad Albizu Campos, La, 653
 Society for Human Rights, 257
 Society for Individual Rights, 259
 Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues (SPSSI), 645
 Society for the Study of Social Problems, 784
 Society of the Woman in the Wilderness, 606
Sociological Imagination, The, 782
 Sociology, 781-784
 Sociology Liberation Movement/Union of Radical Sociology, 680
Soil, 173
Soiuz Ukrainskykh Robitnychykh Orhanizatsii (SURO), 835
Sojourners, 133
 Sojourners for Truth and Justice, 591
 Sojourners group, 134
 Sokolow, Anna, 505
 Soldier's Council, Berlin, 478
 Soledad Brothers, 178
Solidarität, 59
Solidarity, 124, 350, 362, 845
 Solidarity Day March, 843
 "Solidarity Forever," 124, 357
Solomon's Place, 623
So Long, Partner!, 908
 Sombart, Warner, 25
Somebody in Boots, 17, 638
Some Deaths, 679
Some Deaths: Selected Poems, 1929-1962, 679
Something to Guard, 532
 Sommers, Christine Hoff, 888
 "Song About America" (dance), 505
 "Song for Che," 398
 "Song for Soviet Youth Day" (dance), 505
Song of Atlantis, 701
Song of Russia, 323
Songs for Patricia, 677
Songs of Protest, 222
Songs of the Workers: On the Road, in the Jungles, and in the Shops; Songs to Fan the Flames of Discontent, 362
Sonnets of Love and Liberty, 679
Sonntagsblatt, 560
 Sontag, Susan, 443
Soon to Be a Major Motion Picture, 322
 Sorel, Edward, 683
 Sorel, Felicia, 222
 Sorge, Friedrich, 130, 267, 382, 383, 384, 465, 734, 903, 904
Sorrows of Cold Stone, 676
 Sostre, Martin, 63
Soul and Body of John Brown, The, 674
Soul of the Russian Revolution, The, 571
Souls of Black Folk, The, 199
 Soul Student Advisory Council, 94
 South Africa, 155
 South African Campaign for the Defiance of Unjust Laws, 7
 South African Passive Resistance Campaign, 7
South American Journal, 241
 South Carolina Conference, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 747 South Carolina Tuberculosis Association for African-Americans, 747
South End, 437
 South End Press, 376
 Southern California Library for Social Studies and Research, 698
 Southern Committee for People's Rights, 786
 Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), 135, 139, 279, 455, 578, 710, 785
 Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF), 75, 137, 195, 747, 784-785, 803
 Southern Conference for Human Welfare (SCHW), 87, 88, 195, 330, 721, 747
 Southern Negro Youth Congress (SNYC), 88, 721, 747, 785-787, 801, 921
Southern News Almanac, 789
 Southern Regional Committee, Communist Party, USA, 721
Southern Road, 675
 Southern Tenant Farmers Union (STFU), 16, 27, 414, 415, 489, 502, 787-788, 875, 771, 897
 Southern Worker and the Communist press in the South, 788-789
 South Slovenian Federation, Socialist Labor Party, 753

- Sovereigns of Industry, 383
 Soviet American Woolens, 39
 Soviet-Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, 404
 Soviet Karelia, 227
 Soviet Marxism: A Critical Analysis, 477
 Soviet Review, 621
 Soviet Round-the-World-Flies, 37
 Soviet Russia Relief Campaign (1920s), 597
 Soviet Russia Today, 37
 Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.
 Sowerwine, Charles "Chips," 209
 Soyer, Moses, 23, 30, 71
 Soyer, Raphael, 23, 70, 849
 Sozial-demokratische Turngemeinde, 790
 Soziale Partei, 465
 Sozialist, Der, 188-189, 762
 Sozialistische Arbeiter-Partei, S9, 790
 Sozialistischer Turnerbund, 789-790
 Sozialistische Turnverein, 464, 465
 Sozial-Revolutionäre clubs, 790-791
 Space Merchants, The, 725
 Spain: The Unfinished Revolution, 725
 Spanish Children's Relief, 580
 Spanish Civil War. See Spanish Revolution of 1936.
 Spanish Communist Party, 792
 Spanish Earth, The, 307
 Spanish Revolution, 793
 Spanish Revolution of 1936, 55, 151, 168, 273, 303, 307, 339, 463, 555, 792-793, 801, 895
 Spanish-Speaking Peoples Congress. See Congreso del Pueblo de Habla Española.
 Spargo, John, 128, 199, 514, 581, 793-794
 Sparrow Hawks, 677
 Spartacus (film), 217, 640
 Spartacus (journal), 643
 Speaking and Language, 275
 Spector, Herman, 672
 Speeches for Socialism, 121
 Speed of Darkness, The, 674
 Spencer, Herbert, 832
 Spero, Sterling, 684
 Speyer, Carl, 817
 Spider and the Clock, The, 672
 Spiegelman, Art, 837
 Spies, August, 296, 297, 794
 Spingarn Medal, 912
 Spirit of Vulcan: The Genius of the Workers in Iron and Spiritual Significance of Modern Socialism, 794
 Spiritualism, 794-796
 Spivak, Gayatri Chakravorty, 333
 Spivak, John L., 555
 Spock, Benjamin, 503, 529
 Spofford, William B., 732
 Spokane free-speech fight, 229, 237
 Spooner, Lysander, 45
 Spotlight, 408
 Spravednost, 171, 767
 Spravochnyi Listok, 708
 Spring Mobilization to End the War in Vietnam, 186, 596
 Spring Song on an Old Theme and Other Poems, 677
 Springsteen, Bruce, 234, 619
 Spun Sequence, 677
 Spur Posse, 888
 "Square Dances" (dance), 504
 Stachel, Jack, 921
 Staley, A. E., 897
 Stalin, Josef, 36, 149, 176, 319, 416, 463, 644, 700, 863, 916
 Stalingrad, New Years, 677
 Stalingrad Day, 37
 Stalin Peace Prize, 217
 Stamp Act protests, 32
 Stampa Libera, La, 390
 Standard, The, 265-266
 Standards, 434
 Stander, Lionel, 324, 325
 Standing Fast, 552, 810
 Standish, Miles, 504
 Stanislavsky, Konstantin, 68
 Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, 49, 82, 96, 246, 515, 689, 882
 Stanton, Henry Brewster, 96
 Star, The, 607, 798
 Star Men, U.S.A., 677
 Starobin, Robert, 549
 Stars and Stripes Forever, The, 625
 State, County, and Municipal Workers of America (SCMWA), 649, 857
 State and Revolution, 755, 903
 State in Capitalist Society, The, 614
 Statement, 676
 St. Denis, Ruth, 503, 504
 Steal This Book, 323
 Steal This Urine Test, 323
 Steard, Julian, 41
 Steel, The, (mural), 69
 Steelmakers, The, 557
 Steel Workers Organizing Committee (SWOC), Congress of Industrial Organizations, 854
 Steffens, Lincoln, 43, 738
 Stegner, Wallace, 362
 Steichen, Lillian, 717
 Stein, Maurice, 783
 Steinberg, Stephen, 556
 Steinem, Gloria, 341
 Steiner, Ralph, 668
 Steinhilber, Walter, 340
 Steinmetz, Charles, 726
 Stephens, Uriah, 418, 448
 Stern, Bernhard, 782
 Stern, Sol, 705
 Sternberg, Harry, 31
 Stetson, Charlotte Perkins. See Gilman, Charlotte Perkins.
 Steunenberg, Frank, 298
 Stevedore, 120
 Stevens, Alzina P., 378
 Stevens, Thaddeus, 9, 688
 Stevens, Wallace, 584
 Stewart, Donald Ogden, 339, 340, 618
 Stieglitz, Alfred, 173, 280
 Stirner, Max, 378, 832
 St. John, Vincent, 121, 186, 796-797
 Stockham, Alice, 89
 Stokes, J. G. Phelps, 581, 797
 Stokes, Rose Pastor, 647, 797-798
 Stolen Moments: Red, Hot and Blue (record), 398
 Stoleshnikov, Vladimir, 707, 708
 Stone, Ben, 517
 Stone, Harlan, 219
 Stone, I. F., 144, 511, 798, 891, 529, 530
 Stone, Martha, 628
 Stonewall Riots, 798
 Stories of the Cave People, 128, 515
 Storm, 157
 Storming Heaven, 553
 Stormy Weather, 507
 Story magazine, 17
 Story of Lola Gregg, The, 217
 Story of Utopias, The, 519
 Stout, Rex, 626
 Stoval, Tyler, 209
 Stover, Fred, 16
 Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 269, 617, 637, 832
 Stradnicks, 433
 Strand, Paul, 604, 668
 "Strange Funeral in Brad-dock," 746
 Strange to Tell, 724
 Stranger at Coney Island, 674
 Stranger Than Truth, 622
 Strasser, Adolph, 382, 903, 904
 Strategy for a Black Agenda, 878
 Strauss, Johann, 465
 Street of Fear, 626
 Street Scene, 337
 Stricklands, The, 625
 Strike!, 163, 255
 Strindberg, August, 274
 Strong, Anna Louise, 176, 451, 531, 561, 786
 Strong, Augusta, 88
 Strong, Ed, 786
 Structure of Literature, The, 275
 Struggle for a Proletarian Party, The, 121
 Struggle for Existence, The, 602
 Struik, Dirk, 724, 728
 Struve, Gustav, 790
 Stryker, Roy E., 604
 Stuck Rubber Baby, 837
 Student Christian Association, 912
 Student Fair Play Committee, 169
 Student League for Industrial Democracy (SLID), 31, 365, 546, 800, 801 921, 924, 925
 Student movements, 1930s, 799-802
 Student movements, 1960s. See Armed struggle, 1960s-1970s; New Left; Peace movements.
 Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), 62, 75, 135, 137, 139, 178, 294, 437, 438, 443, 530, 546, 550, 785, 802-803, 883
 Student Peace Union, S9S, 772, 803-804, 925
 Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), 47, 65, 66, 137, 154, 289, 294, 341, 348, 429, 445, 469, 543, 546, 547, 552, 582, 596, 772, 773, 783, 804-805, 883, 889, 925
 Studies on the Left, 41, 384, 540, 681, 805-806, 876
 Study of International Government, A, 336
 Stump, Henry J., 522
 "Stung Right," 312
 Stoves, Preston, 324-325
 Stuttgart Congress (1907), 130, 734, 764
 Suarez, Ray, 654
 Subversive Activities Control Board, 3, 4, 24, 38, 399, 477, 922
 Success at Any Price, 435
 Success Story, 435
 Sudermann, Ernst, 480
 Sue, Eugene, 179, 184
 Sugar, Maurice, 806, 851
 Sugar Law Center for Economic Justice, 533
 Suhl, Yuri, 208, 701
 Suhr, Herman, 442
 Suicide, The, 679

- Suller, Chaim, 405
 Sullivan, Anne, 411
 Sullivan, Harry Stack, 647
 Sultan, Joseph, 347
 Summer camps, 806-807
 Sumner, Charles, 688
 "Sunday in Brooklyn," 747
Sunday Worker, 592
Sunnyside, 667
 Sunrise Colony, 858
 Suny, Ronald, 210
Suomalainen Sosialistijärjestö, 226
 Surrealism, 807-809
Surrealism and Its Popular Accomplishes, 809
Surrealism and Revolution, 808
Survey, 344
Survey of Current Business, 510
 Susan B. Anthony Amendment, 882
Suzanni, 113
Sviesa, 85
Svobodnoe Slovo, 709
 Swabeck, Arne, 777
 Swados, Harvey, 552, 566, 809-810, 901
 Swedenborg, Emanuel, 795
 Sweeney, John, 455, 463
 Sweet Honey in the Rock, 233
 Sweezy, Paul, 144, 170, 510, 516, 517, 658, 659, 724
Swell-Looking Babe, A, 624
 Swinburne, A. C., 609
 Swing music, 921
Sylvia, 626
 Symbionese Liberation Army, 63-64, 119
 Symes, Lillian, 42
Symposium, 602
Syndicalism, 810
Syndicalist, 810
 Syndicalist League of North America (SLNA), 237, 366, 810-811
Syntactic Structures, 130
Systems of Consanguinity and Affinity of the Human Family, 513
- T
 Tabor, Ron, 349
Tacoma Labor Advocate, 124
Tactics of Survival and Other Poems, 678
 Taft, William Howard, 334
 Taft-Hartley Act, 20, 134, 193, 223, 250, 329, 374, 461, 631, 845, 857, 869
 Taft-Hartley Loyalty Oath, 378, 813-815
 Taggard, Genevieve, 610, 673
 Tajima, Renee, 558
 Takagi, Paul, 783
Take-Off, 626
Tale of One January, A, 638
 "Talking Dust Bowl," 283
 "Talking Union Blues, The," 738
 Talmadge, Herman P., 784
 Talmy, Leon, 347
 Tambo, Oliver, 8
Tamburitza orchestras, 165
 Tamiment Institute, 697
 Tamiment Institute Library, 686
 Tamiris, Helen, 222, 503, 504, 505, 506
 Tane, Laura, 610
 Tanguma, Leo, 525
 Tanguy, Yves, 808
 Tanner, Antero F., 226
 Taok, Epifanio, 224
Tape Found in a Bottle, 678
 Tapscott, Horace, 397
 Tarloff, Frank, 618
 Tarry, Ellen, 488
 Tartakow, Jerome, 705
 Taub, Debra, 809
 Tax, Meredith, 553
 Taylor, Alva, 414, 874
 Taylor, Charles, 214, 215
 Taylor, Frederick, 896
 Taylor, Glen, 16, 634, 787
 Taylor, James, 232
 Taylor, John, 118
 T-Bone Slim (Matt Valentine Huhta), 338, 357, 816
 Teachers Guild, 816, 817
 Teachers Union (TU), 649, 816-817
Teaching and Learning in City Schools, 436
 Teamsters for a Decent Contract, 367
 Teamsters for a Democratic Union (TDU), 350, 367, 698, 831, 842
 Teamster United Rank and File, 367
 Teapot Dome Affair, 426
Teatro Campesino, El, 615
Technics and Civilization, 519
 Technology Bill of Rights, 366
 Teens Ahead, 922
Teeth of the Lion, The, 674
 Teller, Charlotte, 670
Tell Me a Riddle, 572
Telos, 603
 Temperance, 873
Temptation of Anthony and Other Poems, The, 673
 Tenants League, 743
 Tenayuca, Emma, 492
Ten Days That Shook the World, 446, 693
 Tendencies, 817
Tenebre Rosse, 272
 Tenney Committee, 435
 Terray, Emmanuel, 515
Terror in a Texas Town, 435
 Terry, Sonny, 738
Testing Tree, The, 677
 Texas Farm Workers, 496
 Texas Land Renters' League, 14
 Textile Workers Organizing Committee, 192, 818
 Textile Workers Union of America (TWUA), 631, 817, 818
 Textile workers unions, 817-819
Thanksgiving before November, 673
 Thayer, Webster, 714
 Theater Guild, 507, 568
 Theater of cruelty, 507
 Theater Union, 625
 Theatre Union Dance Group, 505
The House I Live In, 120
Their Eyes Were Watching God, 639
Thelma, 622
Theme is Murder, The, 626
Theoretical Review, 475
Theoretical System of Karl Marx, The, 99, 928
Theory and Technique of Playwrighting, 435
Theory of Capitalist Development, The, 510
Theory of Flight, 674
Theory of Silence, 674
Theory of the Labor Movement, A, 25
Theory of the Leisure Class, The, 782
 "Theory of Three Worlds," 474
 Theosophy, 81
There Comes a Time, 637
The Strike (painting), 69
They Look Like Men, 676
They Seek a City, 161
They Shall Have Music, 435
Thicker Than Water, 622
Thine Alabaster Cities, 679
Thinking of Russia, 674
Thin Man, The, 287, 307
 Third Camp, 348, 441, 891
Third Eye, The, 725
 Third International, 819-820
 Third World liberation movements, 445
Third World Newsreel, 557, 558
 Third World Woman's Alliance, 138
Thirty Seconds over Tokyo, 325
This, Too, Is Love, 623
This Coffin Has No Handles, 487
This Gun for Hire, 325
This in Which, 675
This is Your Day, 638
 "This Land is Your Land," 283
 Thomas, Clarence, 888
 Thomas, J. Parnell, 317, 428
 Thomas, Norman, 26, 133, 272, 277, 289, 387, 407, 414, 424, 428, 498, 502, 516, 526, 556, 577, 587, 593, 594, 595, 596, 635, 770, 771, 772, 800, 820-821, 847, 878, 897, 907, 924, 925
 Thomas, R. J., 851
 Thomasville, Georgia, 911
 Thompson, Ernest, 537
 Thompson, Fred, 126, 542
 Thompson, Jim, 624
 Thompson, John, 330
 Thompson, Robert G., 755
 Thompson, William, 714
 Thomson, Alan, 39
 Thoreau, Henry David, 482, 540, 661, 665, 809, 821-822
 Thorne, Arne, 247
 Thorpe, Herbert A., 879
Thoughts on the Destiny of Man, 607
Thousand Mile Walk to the Gulf, A, 661
Thou Shalt Not Overkill: Walter Lowenfels' Peace Poems, 679
 Thrane, Marcus, 563
Three Soldiers, 196
Three Stigmata of Palmer Eldritch, The, 553
Three Who Made a Revolution, 463
Thrive upon the Rock, 677
Through Sepia Eyes, 674
Through the Eye of the Needle, 334
Thru Every Window!, 677
Thunder of the Grass, The, 677
 Tiananmen Square Massacre, 475
 Tichenor, Henry M., 338, 610
 "Tierra y Libertad" (dance), 507
 Tiger, Edith, 529
Tight Corner, The, 623
 Tijerina, Reies López, 138, 492
 TIKKUN magazine, 400
 Till, Emmett, 134, 530
Till I Come Back to You, 637
Till the Day I Die, 568
 Tilly, Charles, 209
 Tilly, Louise, 209
 Tilton, Josephine, 246
 Tilton, Theodore, 242, 383, 894
Time and the Riddle, 724
Time Gladiator, 726
Time magazine, 317, 530
Time of Fortune, A, 622
Time of the Toad, The, 326
 Tingley, Katherine, 117

- Tito partisans, 753
 Tkachev, Petr, 707
To America with Love: Letters from the Underground, 323
To an Imaginary Daughter, 679
 Tobacco Workers International Union, 169, 911
 Tobenkin, Elias, 671
To Be Young, Gifted, and Black, 287
 Tobin, Daniel J., 194, 500, 501, 754
 Tobocman, Seth, 837
 Todd, Fred, 837
Toil and Hunger, 674
 Toiler, 810
 Toledo Auto-Lite Strike, 42, 896
To Live and Die in Dixie and Other Poems, 678
 Tolstoy, Leo, 256, 265, 334, 480, 832
To Make My Bread, 235, 638
 Tomasek, Anna, 642
 Tomich, Dale, 209
 Tomlin, Lily, 615
 Tom Mooney Case, 505
 Tom Mooney Labor School, 120
Tomorrow, 717
 Tomorrow, Tom, 837
Tomorrow Morning, 678
Tomorrow's Phoenix, 677
 Tompkins Square, New York City, 383, 465
To My Contemporaries, 673
 Toohey, Pat, 921
Too Late for Tears, 625
 Toomer, Jean, 241, 447
Torpille, La, 240
 Torresola, Griselio, 652
Torture of Mothers, The, 553
To the Northwest Indians, 701
 Totten, Ashley, 684
 Toveri, 226, 823
Toveritar/Naišten Viiri, 822-823
Toward an Ecological Society, 99
Toward a People's Art, 525
Toward a Recognition of Androgyny, 886
Toward Humanist Sociology, 784
Towards a New Cold War, 131
Towards a Soviet America, 149
Towards the Understanding of Karl Marx, 329, 602
 Townley, A. C., 15
 Townsend, Francis E., 858
 Toyon, 809
 TRA (Toward Revolutionary Art), 551, 553
 Trachtenberg, Alexander, 43, 375, 406
 Tracy, Spencer, 428
 Trade Union Educational League (TUEL), 27, 31, 143, 148, 823-825, 907
 Trade Union Unity League (TUUL), 148, 198, 237, 380, 492, 496, 612, 613, 818, 825-826, 850, 853, 907, 921, 926
 Trades Union Advisory Council, 195
Tragedy of American Diplomacy, The, 144, 876
 Train of Broken Treaties, 27, 599
Traitors in American History: Lessons of the Moscow Trials, 40
Tramp, Der, 339
 TransAfrica, 8
Transformations of Man, The, 519
 Transitional Program, 238
Transition magazine, 625, 679
Translations from Scorpis, 679
 Transport Workers Union, 386, 534, 649, 698
 Traubel, Horace, 270, 609, 610, 671, 796
 Trautmann, William E., 186, 356, 796, 852
Traveler from Altruria, A, 334
Travels in Alaska, 661
 Travis, Maurice, 207, 870
 Travis, Robert, 851
 Trease, Geoffrey, 128
Treason, 551
Treasure of the Sierra Madre, The, 640
Treasury of American Folklore, 161
Treasury of American Folk Songs, A, 747 Treat, Lawrence, 625
 Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 491, 492
Tree by the Waters, 128, 621
 Trenton Six, 530
 Tresca, Carlo, 54, 77, 230, 271, 389, 390, 590, 632, 643, 703, 715, 826-828
 Treuhaft, Robert, 503
Trial, The, 326
Trial of Dr. Spock, The, 503
Trial of Socrates, The, 798
 Triangle Fire, 216
Tribuna del Pueblo, La, 168
Tribune Libre, La, 240
 Trilling, Lionel, 584
 Tripp, Luke, 438
Tropic of Cancer, 77
 Trotsky, Leon, 44, 188, 215, 238, 393, 544, 560, 694, 709, 777, 808, 895
 Trotskyism, 716, 742, 828-831
 Trotter, William Monroe, 199
 Trudell, John, 27
True Story, 621
 Truman, Harry, 485, 633, 704, 755, 784, 785, 854
 Trumbo, Dalton, 323, 325, 326, 435, 639
 Trumka, Richard, 856
Truth, 117, 319
 Truth, Sojourner, 455, 658, 831-832
Truth About Spain, 793
Truth about the American Liberty League, The, 344
Truth in Small Doses, 93, 117
Truth Seeker, 246
 Tsiang, H. T., 675
 Tubman, Harriet, 9, 831
 Tucker, Benjamin R., 45, 182, 695, 832-833
 Tunis, John R., 921
 Turner, Doris, 455
 Turner, Frederick Jackson, 40, 665, 805
 Turner, Gil, 750
 Turner, John, 588
 Turner, Nat, 9
 Turner, Ron, 836, 837
 Turner Societies, 59
 Turner tradition, 439
Turngemeinde, 789
Turning the Tide, 145
Turning Wind, A, 674
Turnvereins, 83, 267
Turnzeitung, 790
 Tussey, Jean, 378
 Tutu, Desmond, 8, 600
 Twain, Mark, 339, 411, 637
Twelve Million Black Voices: A Folk History of the Negro in the United States, 909 Twentieth Soviet Congress, 153, 177
Twilight of Empire, The, 541
Twisted Sisters, 837
Two Forms of Production under Capitalism, 364
Two Poems, 675
"Two Songs About Lenin" (dance), 505
Two Worlds, 317
 Tydings-McDuffie Act, 113
 Tyler, Parker, 618
 Tyler, Robin, 341
 Tynan, Kenneth, 470
 Työläisnainen, 823
 Työmies, 226
 Työmies-Eteenpäin, 227, 823
 Työväen Opisto, 226
 Typographical Union No.16, 581
 Typographical workers, San Francisco, 719
 Tyson, Mike, 559, 888
 Tzara, Tristan, 173
- U
 U.S.A. trilogy, 196, 639
 U.S. Catholic Conference, 429-430
 U.S. Council for International Friendship, 39
 U.S.-Cuba Health Exchange, 306
U.S. v. Brown, 374
U.S. Week, 510
UE News, 854, 908
UE Steward, 845
 UFO Coffee House, Columbia, South Carolina, 268
 Uhuru, 437
 Uj Elöre, 343
 Ukrainian Americans, 835-836
 Ukrainian Federation, 835
 Ukrainian National Association, 836
 Ukrainian Workers Schools, 835
 Ukrainian Workingmen's Association, 835
Ukrainskyi Shchodennyi Visti, 835
Uncle Tom's Cabin, 617, 637, 748
Uncle Tom's Children, 639, 908, 909
 Uncle Tupelo, 234
Under Fire, 326
Underground, 557
Underground comix, 836-837
Underground press, 837-839
Underground Press Syndicate, 838
Underground Railroad, 657
Underground Stream, 638
Undersea Mountain, The, 679
Undzer Vort, 402
 Unemployed Citizens League (UCL), 840
 Unemployed councils, 86, 115, 696, 698, 839, 840, 841, 844, 877, 899
 Unemployed leagues, 841, 844
 Unemployed movements, 839-842
 Unemployed union, 407
 Unemployment Day, 839
Unfinished Task: Economic Reconstruction for Democracy, 239
Unfinished Woman, An, 307
Unidad Popular, 429
 Unija, 450
Union Democracy, 378
Union Democracy in Action, 842
Union des Travailleurs, L', 240
 Union for Democratic Action, 633
 Union for Radical Political Economics (URPE), 658
Unión General de Trabajadores, 792
 Union Hall and Library Association, Atlanta, Georgia, 697

- Union Leader*, 744
Union Maids, 558, 847
 Union of Democratic Filipinos, 225, 473
 Union of Needletrades, Industrial and Textile Employees
 (UNITE), 373
 Union of Russian Workers,
 612
 Union of Soviet Socialist Republic (USSR), 137, 340,
 403, 722, 730, 905
 Union Printers International
 Baseball League, 379
Union Record, 733
 Union reform/labor support,
842-844
 Unions of the Unemployed,
844-845
 Union-Sponsored Radical
 Films, 845-848
Union Square (1931), 644, 849
Union Square (1988), 553
Union Square, New York City,
848-849
 Union Theological Seminary,
 330, 526
Union Workers, The, 240
 Unique Book Shop, 832
Unità del Popolo, L', 388
United Action Means Victory,
 668
United Automobile Worker, 223
 United Automobile Workers
 (UAW), 20, 37, 58, 127, 193,
 220, 293, 342, 372, 407,
 439, 440, 459, 461, 536,
 642, 668, 742, 750, 771,
 806, 849-852, 854, 870,
 896
 United Brewery Workers,
852-853
 United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, 380
 United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America (UCAPAWA),
 113, 225, 235, 291, 415,
 460, 489, 490, 492, 496, 788
 United Cloth Hat and Cap
 Makers of America, 143
 United Committee of South
 Slavic Americans, 36, 753
 United Communist Party, 147, 693
 United Council of Working Class Women, New York,
 904
 United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE), 216, 220, 342, 460,
 597, 634, 814, 845,
853-854
 United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers (FE),
854-855
 United Farmers League, 234
 United Farm Workers of America, 58, 133, 496, 600,
 615
 United Federal Workers of
 America, 649, 857
 United Federation of Teachers,
 684
 United Food and Commercial Workers International
 Union, 251, 455
 United Front, 148
 United Front Committee, 585
 United Furniture Workers,
 460, 492
 United Garment Workers, 20
 United Hebrew Trades, 20,
 323, 403, 466, 695, 775, 913
 United Libertarian Organizations (ULO), 792, 793
 United Mexican American Students (UMAS), 493
United Mine Workers Journal,
 223
 United Mine Workers of
 America, 86, 305, 342, 355,
 426, 454, 635, 650, 813,
 825, 836, 855-856
 United Nations, 7, 85
 United Nations Commission on Forced Labor, 897
 United Nations conferences,
 888
 United Nations Year of Indigenous People, 599
 United Negro and Allied Veterans of America, 747
 United Office and Professional
 Workers of America
 (UOPWA), 193, 235, 814,
856-857
 United Packinghouse, Food and Allied Workers (UPWA),
 127, 456, 578, 579
 United Party of Haitian Communist, 285
 United Public Workers (UPW),
 649, 650, 814
 United Retail and Wholesale Employees of America (UR-WEA), 192
 United Secularists of America,
 246
 United Services Employees
 Union, 440
 United Shoe Workers of America, 746
United States, Cuba, and Castro,
The, 144, 876
 United States Serviceman's
 Fund (USSF), 268
 United States Student Press
 Association (USSPA), 444
 United States Supreme Court,
 118
 United Steel Workers, 286,
 342
 United Textile Workers
 (UTW), 587, 631
 United Toilers of America, 147
 United Workers Party, 642
Unity, 475
 Unity Camp, 807
 Unity Center, International
 Ladies Garment Workers
 Union, 632
 Unity Centers, 554
 Unity Congress, 473
 Unity House, International
 Ladies Garment Workers
 Union, 601, 632, 686
 Universal Association of Ethiopian Women, 513
Universal Kinship, The, 49, 662
 Universal Negro Improvement
 Association (UNIA), 167,
 387
Universities and Left Review, 545
 "University in Print," 451
 University of the Toiling People of the Far East, 591
 University of Wisconsin Summer School, 898
 "Unquiet Death of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, The" (TV documentary and book),
 705
Unrealist, 551
Unrepentant Radical, 440
Unrest 1929, 672
Unrest 1930, 672
 Unstable Coffeehouse, 615
 Untermann, Ernest, 514, 768, 776
 Untermeyer, Louis, 481, 672
Unvanquished, The, 217
Unwelcome Man, The, 241
 Up Against the Wall Mother-fuckers, 65
Update/USSR, 37
Up from Under, 881
 Uphaus, Willard, 133, 530
Upsurge, 673
 Urban League, 590
 Urey, Harold, 704, 705, 728, 729
 U5 (black power organization),
 62
 "Us Hoboes and Dreamers," 610
 Ut, Nick, 605
 Utah Labor Party, 214
 Utopianism, 857-859
- V
 Vaccaro, Giovanni, 911
 Vakhtangov, Eugene, 68
 Valdez, Miguel, 615
 Valenti, Girolamo, 390
Valley Town, 97
Values for Survival, 519
 Van Doren, Mark, 675
 Van Dyke, Willard, 668
 Van Kleeck, Mary, 538, 905
Vanguard, 792
Vanguard, The, 591
Vanguard Party, 861-862
Vanguard Press, 27
 Van Patten, Philip, 903
 Vanzetti, Bartolomeo, 5, 6, 54,
 369
 Varela, Maria, 137
 Vargas, Enrique, 615
Variety, 559
 Varney, John, 677
 Vázquez, Tiburcio, 491
Vault of Horror, 836
 Veblen, Thorstein, 101, 196,
 497, 518, 519, 782
 Vega, Suzanne, 233
 Vegetable Packers Association, 225
 Vegetarianism, 48
Veltro, Il, 272
 Venceremos Brigades, 429
 Venona, 706
Verloday, 343
 Vertov, Dziga, 667
 Vesey, Denmark, 752
 Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, 580
 Victory Mobilization Day, 786
Vida, 552
 Vidali, Vittorio, 828
Vida Obrera, La, 651
 Vietnam Day Committee,
 Berkely, California, 596
 Vietnam Syndrome, 54
 Vietnam Veterans against the War, 862
 Vietnam War, 290, 432, 444,
 469, 896
 Villa, Pancho, 692
Village Voice, 619, 640, 697
 Vilnius, 450, 451
 Vinson, Fred M., 704
 Viola, Lynne, 210
 Virgil, 141
Virgin Spain, 241
 Vishinsky, Andrei, 756
Vision on Fire: Emma Goldman on the Spanish Revolution, 793
Viva Zapata!, 326
 Vladeck, Baruch Charney, 404
 Vlag, Piet, 480
 Vogt-Downey, Marilyn, 517
Voice, The (c.1880s), 867
Voice, The (c.1920) 291
Voice of American-Soviet Friend- ship, The, 38
Voice of Labor (c.1905), 217
Voice of Labor (c.1921), 127
Voice of Labor (c.1937), 291

- Voice of the Federation*, 124, 373
Voice of the Negro, 291
Voice of Women's Liberation, 884
 Volga Peace Cruise, 39
Volia, 709
Voluntary Motherhood, 419
 Von Freytag-Loringhoven, Elsa, 173
 Voorhis Act, 777
Vorbote, 46, 267, 791, 903
Vormärz Poets, 319
 Vorse, Mary Heaton, 255, 447, 480, 698, 862-863
Vorwärts, 560
Votel, 323
 Voting Rights Act (1964), 10
Voyage Thirteen, 128
Voz, La, 169, 652
 VVV, 808
- W
 W. E. B. DuBois Clubs, 137, 154, 546
Wabash Factor, The, 626
 Wachtel, Chuck, 553
Waco Spectator, 581
 Wages for Housework, 865-866
 Wagner Act, 21
Wahre Jacob, Die, 338
 Waisbrooker, Lois, 48, 243, 466
 "Waist Deep in the Big Muddy," 739
Waiting for Lefty, 568
Waiting for Nothing, 638
Wake Island, 674
 Walcott, Derek, 242, 872
 Walcott, Marion Post, 604
 Wald, Alan, 350
 Wald, Lillian, 412
Walden, 822
Walden II, 782
 Waldheim Cemetery, 238, 275, 878
 Waldinger, August, 365
Walk a Little Faster, 288
Walk East on Beacon, 326
 Walker, Alice, 242, 888
 Walker, David, 752
 Walker, John H., 213
 Walker, Margaret, 161, 674
 Walker, Ryan, 338
 Walker, William, 524
 Walker, Wyatt Tee, 242
Walk Hard—Talk Loud, 623
Walking Delegate, The, 670
Walk in Shadow, 626
Walk in the Sun, A, 701
Walk On the Wild Side, A, 18
- Wall, Irwin, 209
 Wallace, Henry, 4, 16, 30, 37, 88, 152, 235, 337, 353, 461, 510, 530, 532, 538, 595, 633, 636, 652, 655, 727, 753, 813, 854, 911
Wall Around the World, The, 725
 Waller, Fats, 396
 Waller, James, 279
 Wallerstein, Immanuel, 10, 866
 Walling, William English, 199, 200, 480, 581, 866-867
Wall of Men, The, 622
Walls Came Tumbling Down, The, 573
Wall Street, 326, 702
Wall Street Journal, 916-917
 Walter P. Reuther Library, Wayne State University, 698
 "Walt Whitman Suite" (dance), 504
 Walzer, Michael, 192, 333
War against Women, The, 887
 Warbasse, James P., 302, 303
 Ward, Cyrenus Osborne, 141, 762, 867-868
 Ward, Douglas Turner, 288
 Ward, Harry F., 26, 195, 330
 Ward, Lester Frank, 270, 762, 782, 867
 Ward, Theodore, 222
 War Department, 691
 Ware, Harold, 4, 15
 Warhol, Andy, 619
War in Eastern Europe, The, 693
 War Labor Board, 235
War Poems of the United Nations, 676
 Warren, Fred, 57
 Warren, Josiah, 45, 832
 Warren, Robert Penn, 482
 Warren Commission Report, 845
 War Resisters League (WRL), 275, 336, 577, 710
Warriors, The, 553
 Warsaw Ghetto, 282
 "Warsaw Ghetto" (dance), 507
 Washington, Booker T., 683
 Washington, Harold, 155
Washington and His Generals, 448
 Washington Commonwealth Federation (WCF), 868-869
 Washington Office on Latin America, 429
Was Justice Done?, 705
Wasn't That a Time, 231
Waste Land, The, 447
Watchful at Night, 626
 Watchmakers Union, 512
Watch on the Rhine, 287, 307
- Waterfront*, 640
Waterfront Worker, 621
Waterlily Fire, 674
 Waters, Jim, 673
Watkins v. United States, 756
 Watson, John, 437, 438
 Watts, Alan, 575
 Watts, John, 535
 Wayland, J. A., 13, 56, 338, 570, 706, 707
 Wayne State University, Detroit, Michigan, 359
Way We Were, The, 326
 WBAI radio, 575, 576
 WCFL radio, 424
We, the People, 510
Wealth Against Commonwealth, 453
Weapon, 551
We Are All Poets, Really, 679
We Are Many, 98
We Are Your Sons, 705
Weary Blues, The, 336
 Weatherman, 65
 Weaver, James B., 278
 Weavers, The, 231, 739, 749
 Webb, Marilyn, 569
 Weber, John, 524, 525
 Weber, Max, 23, 70, 866
 Webster decision, 1
 Webster, Milton P., 684
We Can Be Friends, 144
We Charge Genocide, 134
 Wechsler, Herbert, 368
 Wechsler, James, 608
Wecker, Der, 403
 Weegee, 604
Weekly People, 185, 506, 765, 766
Weekly Review, 408
 Weekly Service, American Federation of Labor, 223
Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, A, 822
 Weeks, Rufus, 480
 Weems, Carrie Mae, 606
We Gather Strength, 672, 673, 676
 Weichsel, John, 70
 Weidman, Charles, 222
 Weil, Simone, 469
 Weill, Kurt, 337, 990
 Weinberg, Israel, 512
 Weinberg, Jack, 244, 348, 350
 Weiner, Dan, 604
 Weiner, Lee, 294
We Insist! The Freedom Now Suite, 397
 Weinstein, James, 384, 705, 805
 Weinstein, Nat, 831
 Weinstock, Louis, 342
 Weinstone, William, 902
 Weir, Stan, 82, 716, 896
 Weisbord, Albert, 585, 587, 793, 828
- Weiss, Henry George, 672, 725
 Weiss, Marc, 559
 Weiss, Murray, 778, 830
 Weiss, Myra Tanner, 515
 Weiss, Peter, 540
 Weissman, Susan, 350
 Weissstein, Naomi, 885
 Weitling, Wilhelm, 45
Welcome to the Castle, 674
 Weld, Theodore Dwight, 658
 Welles, Orson, 120, 900
Wellfleet Whale, The, 677
 Weltfish, Gene, 159
Werewolf of Paris, 625, 724
 "We Shall Overcome," 739
 West, Don, 674, 789
 West, Nathanael, 516, 639
 West, William, 383, 894
Western Evangel, 132
 Western Federation of Miners (WFM), 228, 301, 356, 451, 764, 775, 460
 Western Federation of Miners/International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers (IUMMSW), 86, 492, 814, 846, 869-870
 Western Labor Union, 775
Western Socialist, 906
Western Worker, 600, 621, 656
West Indian Gazette, 408
 West Indians, 870-872
 Weston, Edward, 604
 WEVD radio, 424, 617, 771
 Wexley, John, 618, 705
 Weydemeyer, Joseph, 790
 Weydemeyer, Otto, 903, 904
 Whalen, Philip, 77
 Wharton, Marian, 441
What Every Woman Wants, 344
What is Philosophy?, 602
What is Property?, 832
What is Surrealism? Selected Writings of Andre Breton, 808
What Is to be Done?, 832
What Makes Sammy Run?, 639
What's Happening to Labor, 278
 Wheatland riot of 1913, 182, 442
 Wheatstraw, Peetie, 809
 Wheeler, Burton K., 426
 Wheelwright, John Brooks, 675
When Africa Awakes: The Inside Story of the Stirrings and Strivings of the New Negro in the Western World, 291
 "When the Leaves Come Out," 610
When the Mountains Tremble, 558
Where Angels Fear to Tread, 509
 "Where Have All the Flowers Gone," 739

- Where is Vietnam?*, 551, 639, 679
 Whiskey Rebellion, 34
 Whitaker, Robert, 118
 White, Charles, 242, 524
 White, Josh, 232
 White, Leslie A., 515
 White, Walter, 7, 731
 White, William Anthony
     Parker (Anthony Boucher), 726
 White Citizens Council, 875
 White Collar, 497
 White Eagle, Dark Skies, 621
 White Girl, The, 622
 White Man, Listen, 909
 White Rose, The, 640
 Whitlock, Brand, 265
 Whitman, Walt, 77, 101, 244, 257, 482, 540, 609, 617, 637, 673, 717
 Whitney, A. J., 31
 Whitney, Anita, 118
 Whittier, John Greenleaf, 609, 637
 Who Killed Vincent Chin?, 558, 559
 Wholesale and Warehouse Workers Local 65, 813
 Wholesale Drygoods Workers Union (WDGU), 192
 Who Lost an American?, 18
 Who Rules America Now?, 781
 Why?, 275
 Why Farmers are Poor, 702
 Why Is There No Socialism in the United States?, 25
 Why Women Cry, or Wenches with Wrenches, 293
 Wickes, Marlene, 569
 Wicks, Harry M., 642, 789
 Widmar, Francis, 588
 Wiggins, Ella May, 255, 625
 Wight, Clifford, 523
 Wilcox, Ella Wheeler, 609
 Wildcat Strikes, 896
 Wilde, Oscar, 256, 832
 Wilder, Thornton, 273, 448
 Wilderness and the American Mind, 665
 Wilkins, Roy, 64, 368
 Wilkinson, Frank, 872-873
 Wilkinson, Jean, 872
 Will, Mary Ertz, 642
 Willard, Frances, 48, 132, 82, 592, 873-874
 Williams, Aubrey W., 784, 872
 Williams, Ben H., 185
 Williams, Claude, 133, 490, 530, 874-875
 Williams, Eric, 242
 Williams, Eugene B., 786
 Williams, John, 438
 Williams, John A., 553, 909
 Williams, Joyce, 133, 874
 Williams, Pat Ward, 606
 Williams, Robert, 837
 Williams, Robert F., 94, 437, 513
 Williams, Robin, 341
 Williams, William Appleman, 41, 144, 145, 556, 805, 875-876
 Williams, William Carlos, 56
 Williamson, John, 375, 921
 Williamson, Skip, 836
 Willis, Bruce, 616
 Willkie, Wendell, 24, 423
 Wilshire, H. Gaylord, 117, 876-877
 Wilshire Boulevard, 876
 Wilshire's Magazine, 570, 662, 717, 877
 Wilson, Edmund, 309, 329, 447, 516, 584, 647
 Wilson, H. H., 529
 Wilson, J. Stitt, 118
 Wilson, Michael, 326, 846
 Wilson, Reginald, 556
 Wilson, Theodore Carl, 677
 Wilson, Woodrow, 14, 96, 200, 312, 458, 491, 512, 560, 571, 593, 749, 855, 876
 Wilson-Pakula Act, 29, 476
Wimmin's Comix, 836
 WIN (Workshop in Nonviolence) Magazine, 221, 577
 Winchell, Paul, 340
 Winchevsky, Morris, 339, 643, 702, 913, 915, 928
 Windsor, William, 48
 Windy City, 623
 Winner of World War III, The, 725
 Winogradsky, Joseph, 249
 Winpisinger, William, 366, 843
 Winslow, Barbara, 350
 Winslow, Cal, 350
 Winston, Henry, 375, 375, 755, 877-878
Winston Affair, The, 626
 Winter, Carl, 921
 Winter, Sylvia, 872
 "Winter Soldier Hearings," 862
 Winthrop, John, 25
 "Wisconsin Idea, The," 425
 Wisconsin School of Diplomatic History, 876
Wisconsin Vorwärts, 83
 Wise, Stephen, 587
Wisteria Cottage: A Novel of Criminal Impulse, 624
 Witcop, Milly, 702
With Babies and Banners, 407, 558, 847
Witness, The, 133, 317, 732
 Witness for Peace, 430, 597
Witness to War: An American Doctor in El Salvador, 558
 Witt, Nathan, 316
Wizard of Oz, The, 288
 Wobblies. See Industrial Workers of the World.
Wobblies, The, 558, 847
Wobbly, 124
 Wohl, Robert, 209
 Wohlforth, Tim, 830, 831
 Wolf, Eric, 51
 Wolfe, Bernard, 627, 726
 Wolfe, Bertram D. 25, 462, 463, 902, 903
 Wolfe, Glenn, 349, 350
 Wolfe, Lizzie Marsh, 663
 Wolff, Adolph, 174
 Wolfson, Theresa, 365
 Woll, Matthew, 223, 365
 Wollheim, Donald A., 251, 725
 Wolson, Morton, 625
Woman and Economics, 183, 270
Woman and Socialism (Frau und der Sozialismus), 514, 878
Woman and the Socialist Movement, 407
Woman Aroused, The, 623
Woman as Force in History, 892
Woman of the Year, 325, 340, 428
Woman on the Edge of Time, 552, 553
Woman-Power, 363
 Woman question, 878-879
Woman Rebel, 386, 879
 Woman's Auxiliary (GM Strike 1937), 407
 Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU), 13, 442, 873, 874, 880
 Woman's National Committee, Socialist Party, 570, 776, 879-880
 Woman's National Socialist Union (WNSU), 880-881
 Womanspirit, 886
 Woman Suffrage Party, 336
Woman Who Wouldn't, The, 797
Women: A Journal of Liberation, 881
 "Women: The Longest Revolution," 886
Women and Colonization, 436
Women and the American Labor Movement, 234
Women as Sex Vendors; Or, Why Women are Conservative, 479
Women in the Soviet Union, 98
 Women for Peace, 407
 Women Make Movies, 559
 Women Negroes' Cooperative League, 75
Women of the Future, 447
Women of the Soviet Union, 38
 Women's Charter, 538
 Women's Classical Caucus, 141
 Women's Commission, Communist Party, USA, 408
 Women's Emergency Brigade, General Motors Strike of 1937, 407, 851
 Women's International Democratic Federation (WIDF), 159
 Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, 593, 595
 Women's liberation, 882-889
 Women's liberation unions, 889-890
 Women's National Abortion Action Coalition, 1
 Women's Peace Party, 270, 593
 Women's Peace Society, 336
 Women's Peace Union, 336
 Women's Strike for Equality, 885
 Women's studies, 892-893
Women's Studies, 892
Women's Studies Newsletter, 892
 Women's Trade Union League (WTUL), 96, 386, 417, 867, 744
 Women Strike for Peace, 597, 890-892
Women's Work, 436
Women Wage-Earners, 120
Women Who Work, 344
Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 417
 Wood, Ellen Meiskins, 511
 Wood, Joseph, 752
 Woodbey, George Washington, 82, 132
Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly, 242, 795, 893-894
 Woodhull, Victoria Claflin, 240, 242, 383, 795, 893
 Woodrum Committee, 221, 222
 Woods, Katherine Pearson, 669
Woodstock Nation, 323
 Woodworkers Industrial Union of Canada (WIUC), 381
 Woodworkers of Chicago, 894-895
 "Woody Sez," 283
 Wooten, Chuck, 438
 Word, The 246, 308
Word for World is Forest, The, 553
Words on Paper, 678
Worker, The, (c.1900), 132, 383

- Worker Adjustment and Re-training Notification Act, 533
- Worker Education Clubs, 113
- Workers Age*, 372, 462, 463
- Workers Alliance of America, 87, 335, 652, 841, 844
- Workers Alliance, Los Angeles, California, 459
- Workers Bookstore and School, 849
- Worker's Children's Camp (WOCHICA), 807
- Workers' Control, 895-897
- Workers Cooperative Colony, 19, 347
- Workers Councils*, 163
- Workers Dance League, 505, 506, 507
- Workers Dance League Bulletin*, 505
- Workers Defense League (WDL), 229, 289, 897-898
- Workers Defense Union, 98
- Workers Education Bureau, 899
- Workers Education Local 189, American Federation of Teachers, 899
- Workers' education, 898-899
- Workers' Film and Photo League, 666, 668
- Workers Health Bureau of America, 303
- Workers in America: History 40*
- Workers International Industrial Union, 366, 819
- Workers International Relief, 255, 666, 667
- Workers Laboratory Theater/Theater of Action, 701, 899-900
- Workers Monthly*, 447
- Workers Music League, 157
- Workers on the Waterfront*, 666
- Workers Party, 121, 147, 167, 197, 215, 216, 227, 277, 552, 687, 716, 777, 829, 830, 841, 900-902, 925
- Workers Power, 350
- Workers' Power*, 349
- Workers School, New York, 27, 100
- Workers School, North Carolina, 85
- Workers schools, 591, 902-903
- Workers Songbook*, 157, 162, 231, 746
- Workers Theater*, 900
- Workers University, 632
- Worker's University, International Ladies Garment Workers Union, 898
- Workers Viewpoint Organization (WVO), 279, 473
- Workers World Party, 261, 830
- Working Class Union, 14
- Workingmen's Party, Women's Branch, 682
- Workingmen's Party of California, 130
- Workingmen's Party of Illinois, 423
- Workingmen's Party of the United States, 117, 278, 301, 506, 761, 903-904
- Working Woman/Woman Today*, 904-905
- Workman, Reggie, 398
- Workmen's Circle, 381, 403, 405, 695, 703, 905-906, 915, 917
- Work Peoples College, Duluth, Minnesota, 226, 514, 357, 898
- Workplace Democracy Project, 366
- Workshop in Nonviolence, 577
- Works Progress Administration (WPA), 4, 75, 87, 150, 523, 591, 841, 842, 844, 899
- World Federation of Democratic Youth, 922
- World League for Sexual Reform, 256
- World of C. Wright Mills, The*, 57
- World Revolution: The Rise and Fall of the Communist International, 1917-1936*, 393
- World Socialist Party, 189, 906
- World Today, The*, 667
- World Tomorrow*, 31, 133, 344, 577, 593, 594, 702, 772, 820, 906-907
- World War 3 Illustrated*, 837
- World War III project, 525
- World Yiddish Cultural Congress, 572
- World Youth Congresses, 31, 277
- World Youth Festival, 178
- Wortis, Rose, 907-908
- Wounded Knee, Confrontation at, 27, 420
- WPFW radio, 575
- Wreath for Margery, A*, 673
- Wretched of the Earth*, 94, 547
- Wright, Charles, 599
- Wright, Eric O., 784
- Wright, Frances, 89, 239, 858
- Wright, Frank Lloyd, 120
- Wright, Fred, 854, 908
- Wright, James G., 603
- Wright, Philip Green, 717
- Wright, Richard, 43, 176, 406, 555, 620, 622, 639, 640, 674, 908-909
- Writers Project, Works Progress Administration, 17, 441
- Writing on the Wall: 108 American Poems of Protest, The*, 676, 679
- Wurf, Jerry, 650
- Wysocki, Al, 642

X Y Z

- "X-Club," 580
- Yablonski, Jock, 856
- Yaffe, Richard, 781
- Yakovlev, Anatoli, 704
- Yank, 623
- Yanks Are Not Coming, The*, 656
- Yannarelli, Joseph, 187
- Yanofsky, Sh., 246, 702
- Yates v. United States*, 756
- Ybor City, 911-912
- Year of Consent*, 625
- Year of the Pig*, 557
- Year's End*, 675
- Yekl, 334
- Yellow Back Radio Broke Down*, 553
- "Yellow Wallpaper, The," 270
- Yerby, Frank, 56, 161
- Yergen, Max, 6, 912
- Yesterday's Burdens*, 624
- Yezierska, Anzia, 797
- Yglesias, Helen, 552
- Yiddish Art Theater (ARTEF), 510
- Yiddische Kultur* (journal), 644, 916, 917
- Yiddische Kultur Farband* (YKUF), 644, 916
- Yiddisher Kempfer, Der*, 779
- Yiddisher Nationaler Arbeter Farband*, 779
- Yiddish Left, 510, 912-917
- Yiddish nonpartisan shules, 807
- Yiddish Schools, 371, 917-918
- Yippies, 322, 918-919
- Yokohama, California*, 553
- Yoneda, Karl, 225
- Yonnonidio: From the Thirties*, 572
- Yoseloff, Thomas, 676
- You and Your Job*, 717
- You Are There*, 325, 640
- You Belong to Me*, 623
- You Can't Sleep Here*, 638
- Young, Andrew, 140
- Young, Art, 23, 30, 140, 271, 480, 481, 908, 919
- Young, Coleman, 155, 191, 439, 537, 806
- Young, Whitney, 64
- Young Americans for Freedom*, 196
- Young Communist*, 921
- Young Communist League (YCL), 3, 99, 255, 277, 285, 703, 709, 743, 725, 849, 877, 920-923
- Young Composers Group, 746
- Young Comrade*, 926
- Young Democracy*, 906
- Young Democrats, 772, 925
- Young Go First, The*, 900
- Young Labor Poets, 677
- Young Liberators, International Labor Defense, 926
- Young Lonigan: A Boyhood in the Chicago Streets*, 215, 620
- Young Lords Party (YLP), 473, 653, 923-924
- Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan, The*, 215
- Young Men's Christian Association, 330, 414, 594, 912
- Young People's Socialist League (YPSL), 192, 289, 348, 364, 595, 721, 768, 770, 771, 772, 773, 793, 800, 803, 924-925
- Young Pioneer*, 679, 926
- Young Pioneers of America (YPA), 27, 99, 255, 925
- Young Progressives of America, 922
- Young Socialist Alliance, 137, 154, 546, 694, 778, 830
- Young Socialist League, 830, 925
- Young Socialist League of Chicago, 924
- Young Socialist's Magazine*, 924
- Young Women's Christian Association, 414, 801
- Young Worker*, 672, 921
- Young Workers League, 920
- Young Workers League, Junior Section, 925
- Young Workers Liberation League (YWLL), 920, 923
- Your Dollar Under Roosevelt*, 702
- Youth against War and Fascism, 66, 830
- Youth Committee Against War (YCAW), 802, 925
- Youth in Industry*, 344
- Youth International Party, 918
- Youth Marches for Integrated Schools, 684
- Yugnt, 643
- Yugoslav-Republican Alliance, 753

- Yugoslav Socialist Federation, 753
Yunge, di, 202, 643, 925
Yung-Kuzhie, 643
Yung Varg, 402
Yunyon Arbeter, Der, 372
Yurick, Sol, 553
Zackheim, Bernard, 523
Zaibei Rōdō Shimbum, 395
Zajednicar, 166
Zametkin, Michael, 708
Zap comics, 836, 837
Zaritsky, Max, 143
Zavertnik, Joze, 753
Zdřubek, Frantisek, 171
Zeidler, Frank P., 499, 522, 773, 927
Zeigler, Abraham, 766
Zeitlin, Irving, 783
Zeitlin, Maurice, 783
Zellner, Bob, 137
Zeluck, Steve, 350
Zeta, 551
Zetkin, Clara, 281, 299, 363, 379, 380, 560
Zhitlovsky, Chaim, 780, 928
Zietz, Louise, 379
Zimmerman, Charles (Sasha), 371, 372, 462, 463
Zinberg, Leonard S. ("Ed Lacy"), 623, 624
Zinoviev, Grigori, 693
Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig von, 606, 607
Znamia, 708
Zola, Émile, 256, 832
Zoot Suit Riots, 158, 329, 492
Zoula, Robert, 171
Zukofsky, Louis, 675
Zukunft, Di, 99, 116, 319, 768, 927-928
Związek Młodzieży Polskiej, 611
Związek Socjalistów Polskich, 611
Związek Sokołów, 611

Archbishop Mitty High School Library
5000 Mitty Way
San Jose, CA 95129

9 780195 120882

90000

9 780195 120882